And learned their works Their practices; their customs and habits: learned to live as they did. This was an illustration of the danger of contact with the wicked and the worldly. What occurred in their case has often occurred since in the history of the people of God, that by “mingling” with the world they have learned to practice their “works;” have become conformed to their manner of living, and have thus lost their spirituality, and brought dishonor on the cause of religion. There is some proper sense in which the people of God are not to be conformed to the world; in which, though living among them, they are to be separate from them; in which, though they are parts of the same nation, and live under the same government and laws, they are to be a distinct and special people, ruled supremely by higher laws, and having higher and nobler ends of life. <sup><5112></sup>Romans 12:2; <sup><4064></sup>2 Corinthians 6:14-17.

<sup><4966></sup>Psalm 106:36. And they served their idols <sup><4002></sup>Judges 2:12,13,17,19; 3:6,7.

Which were a snare unto them Like the snares or toils by which birds and wild beasts are caught. That is, they were taken unawares; they were in danger when they did not perceive it; they fell when they thought themselves safe. The bird and the wild beast approach the snare, unconscious of danger; so the friend of God approaches the temptations which are spread out before him by the enemy of souls — and, ere he is aware, he is a captive, and has fallen. Nothing could better describe the way in which the people of God are led into sin than the arts by which birds are caught by the fowler, and wild beasts by the hunter.

<sup><4968></sup>Psalm 106:38. And shed innocent blood ... The blood of those who had committed no crime; who did not “deserve” the treatment which they received. That is, they were sacrificed “as” innocent persons, and “because” it was believed that they “were” innocent: the pure for the impure; the holy for the unholy. It was on the general principle that a sacrifice for sin must be itself pure, or it could not be offered in the place of the guilty; that an offering made for one who had violated law must be by one who had “not” violated it. This was the principle on which “lambs” were offered in sacrifice. It is on this principle that the atonement for sin by the Lord Jesus was made; on this depend its efficacy and its value.

And the land was polluted with blood That is, Either so much blood was thus poured out, that it might be said that the very land was polluted with it; or, the sin itself was so great, that it seemed to defile and pollute the whole land.

<sup><4969></sup>Psalm 106:39. Thus were they defiled with their own works By their very attempts to deliver themselves from sin. They were corrupt, and the consciousness that they were sinners led them to the commission of even greater enormities in attempting to expiate their guilt, even by the sacrifice of their own sons and daughters. Thus all the religions of the pagan begin in sin, and end in sin. The consciousness of sin only leads to the commission of greater sin; to all the abominations of idol-worship; to the sacrifice — the murder — of the innocent, with the vain hope of thus making expiation for their crimes. Sinners have never yet been able to devise a way by which they may make themselves pure. It is only the great Sacrifice made on the cross which meets the case; which provides expiation; and which saves from future sin.

And went a whoring Apostacy from God and backsliding are often illustrated in the Scriptures by the violation of the marriage compact, as the relation between God and his people is often compared with the relation between a husband and wife. Compare <sup><2315></sup>Isaiah 62:5; <sup><2434></sup>Jeremiah 3:14; 7:9; 13:27; <sup><2460></sup>Ezekiel 16:20,22,25,33,34; 23:17.

Insomuch that he abhorred his own inheritance He was offended with his people; he treated them “as if” they were an abomination to him. He punished them; he cast them off; he left them to the just results of their own conduct. Were ever any writers more candid and honest than the sacred penmen? There is no effort to vindicate the nation; there is no apology offered for them; there is no concealment of their guilt; there is no attempt to soften the statement in regard to the feelings of God toward them. Their conduct was abominable; they deserved the divine displeasure; they were ungrateful, evil, and rebellious; and the sacred writers do not hesitate to admit the truth of this to the fullest extent.

<sup><BAG1></sup>Psalm 106:41. And he gave them into the hand of the heathen That is, of foreign nations. They were indeed “pagans,” in the sense in which that term is used now — that is, they were ignorant of the true God, and worshipped idols; but that idea is not necessarily in the original word. The word “Gentiles” expresses all that the word implies.

And they that hated them ruled over them Had them in subjection.

<sup><BAG2></sup>Psalm 106:42. Their enemies also oppressed them Septuagint, “Afflicted them,” They invaded their country; they destroyed their vintages; they laid desolate their land; they made them captives.

And they were brought into subjection Hebrew, made to bow.

<sup><BAG5></sup>Psalm 106:43. Many times did he deliver them From danger of invasion; from foreign arms; from entire overthrow. Numerous instances of this are recorded in the history of the Hebrew people.

But they provoked him with their counsel This does not mean that they gave counsel or advice to God; but it refers to the counsel which they took among themselves; the plans which they formed. These were such as to offend God.

And were brought low for their iniquity Margin, “impoverished or weakened.” The Hebrew word means to melt away, to pine; and hence, to decay, to be brought low. See ~~<8304>~~ Job 24:24, where it is rendered “brought low,” and ~~<2108>~~ Ecclesiastes 10:18, where it is rendered “decayeth.” The word does not occur elsewhere. The meaning is, that they were weakened; their national strength was exhausted as a punishment for their sins.

~~<9464>~~ Psalm 106:44. Nevertheless, he regarded their affliction literally, “And he looked upon the trouble that was upon them;” or, “and he saw in the distress to them.” The meaning is, that he did not turn away from it; he saw the need of interposition, and he came to them.

When he heard their cry literally, “In his hearing their cry.” Their cry for help came before him, and he did not refuse to look upon their affliction. The idea is, that he was attracted to their case by their loud cry for help; and that when he heard the cry, he did not refuse to look upon their low and sad condition. God assists us when we cry to him. We ask his attention to our troubles; we pray for his help; and when he hears the cry, he comes and saves us. He does not turn away, or treat our case as unworthy of his notice.

~~<9465>~~ Psalm 106:45. And he remembered for them his covenant His solemn promises made to their fathers. He remembered that covenant in their behalf; or, on account of that, he came and blessed them. He had made gracious promises to the patriarchs; he had promised to be the God of their posterity; he had his own great purposes to accomplish through their nation in the distant future; and on these accounts, he came and blessed them.

And repented He averted impending judgments. He checked and arrested the calamities which he was bringing upon them for their sins. He acted toward them as though his mind had been changed; as though he was sorry for what he was doing. The word “repent” can be applied to God in no other sense than this. It cannot be applied to him in the sense that he felt or admitted that he had done wrong; or that he had made a mistake; or that he had changed his mind or purposes; or that he intended to enter on a new course of conduct; but it may be applied to him in the sense that his treatment of people is “as if” he had changed his mind, or “as if” he were sorry for what he had done: that is, a certain course of things which had been commenced, would be arrested and changed to meet existing circumstances, because “they” had changed — though all must have been foreseen and purposed in his eternal counsels.

According to the multitude of his mercies The greatness of his mercy; the disposition of his nature to show mercy; the repeated instances in which he had shown mercy in similar circumstances.

<sup><9A66></sup>Psalm 106:46. He made them also to be pitied of all those that carried them captives That is, he exercised such control over the minds of the pagan that they were willing to show them mercy and to release them. It was not by any native tenderness on the part of the pagan; it was not because they were disposed of themselves to show them any favor; it was not because they had any “natural” relentings on the subject; but it was because God had access to their hearts, and “inclined” them to show compassion for their suffering prisoners. This is a remarkable instance of the power of God over even the hardened minds and hearts of pagan men; and it shows that he holds this power, and can exercise it when he pleases. If he could excite in their hard hearts feelings of compassion toward his own people in bondage, what should prevent his having such access to the hearts of the pagan now as to lead them to repentance toward himself? On the exercise of this power the salvation of the pagan world — as of all sinners — must depend; and for the putting forth of this power we should most fervently pray. The “literal” rendering of this verse would be, “And he gave them to compassions before all those that made them captive.” That is, he inclined them to show favor or compassion. Compare <sup><27009></sup>Daniel 1:9; <sup><10850></sup>1 Kings 8:50.

<sup><9A67></sup>Psalm 106:47. Save us, O LORD our God, and gather us from among the heathen From among the nations. From this it would seem that the psalm was composed when the nation was in captivity, or was dispersed among the nations that were hostile to them. The prayer is, that as God had, in former periods, recovered his people when they were in exile, or were scattered abroad, he would again graciously interpose and bring them to the land of their fathers, where they had been accustomed to worship God.

To give thanks unto thy holy name Unto thee; a holy God. That we may praise thee in the place where thou art accustomed to be worshipped — in the sanctuary.

And to triumph in thy praise To exult; to rejoice; to be glad in praising thee — in thy worship.

<sup><1968></sup>Psalm 106:48. Blessed be the LORD God of Israel from everlasting to everlasting Forever. As he has been adored in the past — even from the beginning of the creation — so let him be adored and praised in all periods to come — forever and forever. See the notes at <sup><19113></sup>Psalm 41:13.

And let all the people say, Amen In <sup><19113></sup>Psalm 41:13, this is, “Amen and amen.” The idea is, Let all the people join in this; let them all express and declare their assent to this: let them all say, “Be it so.” The word “Amen” is a word expressing assent — meaning verily, truly, certainly.

APPENDIX NOTES ON PSALM 105 AND PSALM 106

“The Historical Psalms.” I have not attempted to compute the relative space given to the historical element in the Psalter, but it must be very considerable. Several of the longest of the psalms are historical from beginning to end. Psalm 68, although it is brightened with an ultimate reference to Christ and the gospel times, is, in the first instance, a glowing recital of the march out of Egypt and the conquest of Canaan. Psalm 78; 105; 106 all traverse the same field. In Psalm 78 Asaph, taking up his parable, teaches the people to read the dangers and the duties of their own time in the light of the history of the nation between the exodus and the reign of Solomon. In Psalm 105, one of the later psalmists, taking the materials furnished by the same history, builds them up into a lofty ode of thanksgiving, that so the Lord’s name may be hallowed in the continual commemoration of his mighty acts. Psalm 106, which is also from the later period of Old Testament psalmody, partakes of a quite different character: it is a sorrowful confession of the sins by which the nation had brought dishonor on the name of the Lord and provoked him to anger in every period of its long history. These are the most prominent of the historical psalms. Others of less note will occur to the reader’s memory; and there are, besides, historical allusions in very many of the non-historical psalms.

This historical quality of the Psalter deserves more consideration than it has commonly received. It proceeds upon the great principle of the unity of the church in its successive generations. The events of the past are celebrated, not as matters foreign to the people of the present generation, but as matters in which they are vitally interested. They are summoned to humble themselves in the retrospect of sins long past, and to say with Daniel, “O Lord, to us belongeth confusion of face, to our kings, to our princes, and to our fathers, because we have sinned against thee.” They are invited also to commemorate with thanksgiving the years of the right hand of the Most High — the times when the Lord revived his people and prospered the work of their hands. ...

Running through these and many other passages there is a sentiment of national continuity, analogous to that of personal identity. I know I am the same person I was twenty years ago: and, believing as I do, that all the events of my life are governed by the provident wisdom of God, I feel it to be my duty carefully to keep in memory and often to meditate upon, the way he has led me and tended me from my youth. I know it would be both a dereliction of duty and a forfeiture of inestimable benefits, were I to forget the errors of my youth or the dispensations of God’s providence in ordering my lot. How often in times of perplexity or sorrow has the believer found the strongest comfort in calling to remembrance instances in which God heard his prayer and sent him help in years gone by! Well, the psalmists recognize a similar identity — a corporate identity — as pertaining to the church, and linking together its successive generations. Accordingly, they represent the church of any given time as having very much the same interest in its prior history which any individual has in his infancy or childhood: and, in their hands, the principle is wonderfully fruitful both of admonition and comfort. How admirably is it applied, for example, in Psalm 77! In a time of deep distress, a dark and cloudy day, the daughter of Zion is at the point of despair: “Will the Lord cast off forever, and will he be favorable no more? Is his mercy clean gone forever? doth his promise fail for evermore? Hath God forgotten to be gracious? Hath he in anger shut up his tender mercies?” How does her faith obtain the victory in this conflict? It is by reverting to her own history in better days, and calling to remembrance God’s doings of old. “I said, this is my infirmity: but I will remember the years of the right hand of the Most High. I will remember the works of the Lord; surely I will remember thy wonders of old. I will meditate also of all thy work, and talk of thy doings.” ...

The facts of the history are viewed, not as mere events — things that fell out in those old times — but rather as divine dispensations, the judgments of the Most High, each of which, since it embodied a thought of God's heart, was full of instruction for the generations following. This is the view which the apostle teaches us to take of the history of God's ancient people, for the things which befell them, he writes, "happened unto them for ensamples: and they are written for our admonition, upon whom the ends of the world are come." As Christ during his personal ministry instructed the church with spoken parables, so during the long centuries of the Old Testament he instructed it with acted parables. It is impossible to estimate the profit, in the shape both of doctrine and reproof, and correction, and instruction in righteousness, which serious persons have derived from the events of the history of which so large a portion of the Psalter is the lyrical memorial.

Rationalists will, of course, sneer at this account of the historical psalms. They see in them nothing but national songs. If there be any lyrical faculty in a nation, it naturally applies itself to the celebration of the national heroes and the most memorable passages of the national history: and what more reasonable than to attribute to this source the historical poems of the Bible? The explanation can be dressed so as to captivate the unwary. But it will not stand. Not to dwell upon the fact that all the psalmists are careful to testify, either explicitly or by clear implication, that, in their judgment, the national history is a "parable," that it is everywhere replete with religious significance, and that their design in making it the burden of their song, is to spread abroad the lessons it was meant to teach — not to dwell, I say, on that fact, it is enough to remark, that there is no glorifying, either of the nation itself or of its great men. This is quite fatal to the notion that these psalms are national songs and nothing more. That the lyrical genius of the Hebrew bards was quite capable of celebrating great men and chivalrous deeds, is sufficiently proved by David's lament for Saul and Jonathan. Yet the Psalter does not contain one song of that order. There is not a single ode in praise of any national hero, Abraham or Joseph, Moses or Joshua or Samson. If David seems to be an exception, it is to be remembered that he occupies a singular place in the history, as the ancestor and type of Christ. When the Psalter extols him, it is not as a national hero, but as the Anointed of the God of Jacob; and the praise is intended for the royal office and the divine antitype. When David, in his individual person, comes before us, it is not as a hero at all, but in the totally different character of a sinner saved by grace. As for that glorifying of the nation which is the habit of every other lyrical literature, there is no trace of it in the Scriptures. On the contrary, the ordinary drift of the historical psalms is to inculcate on the people the remembrance of their sins, and to make them feel that in no respect were they intrinsically better than their neighbors. Let anyone who doubts this read Psalm 106. The key-note is that sorrowful confession with which, as we have seen, it begins, "We have sinned with our fathers, we have committed iniquity, we have done wickedly," and that penitential tone is maintained to the close. The poets of the nations have never written in this humbling strain. The world does not contain another instance of a collection of national lyrics so totally devoid of everything that could inflame national vanity, so redolent of a sense of the unworthiness of the nation, and of the marvelous grace of the Most High.

NOTES ON PSALM 107

This psalm is without a title, and its author is unknown. The occasion on which it was composed is not particularly designated, though from ~~19A7B~~Psalm 107:2,3, it is probable that it was on a return from exile or captivity. There is nothing in the psalm to forbid the supposition that this was the return from the captivity at Babylon, and that the psalm was designed to be used at the re-dedication of the temple after the restoration. Every part of it would be appropriate to such an occasion, and it is every way probable that so important an event would be celebrated with appropriate songs of praise.

The “design” of the psalm, so far as it has a practical bearing, is indicated in ~~19A7B~~Psalm 107:8,15,21,31, in the language repeated in those verses: “Oh that men would praise the LORD for his goodness, and for his wonderful works to the children of men!” The purpose of the psalm is so to set forth these “works,” or these “doings” of God, as to lead men to praise and adoration.

The psalm is very regular in its structure. The first three verses are introductory, intended to designate the people who were specially called on to praise God — as those who had been redeemed from the hand of the enemy, and gathered out of the lands — east, west, north, and south.

The remainder of the psalm is divided into portions marked by the above words, “Oh that men would praise the Lord for his goodness,” etc., ~~19A7B~~Psalm 107:8,15,21,31. These portions are of unequal length, and this language (with a few appropriate words added) is placed “at the close of each part,” as being that which was suggested by the previous thoughts. In the closing portion, however, (~~19A7B~~Psalm 107:32-43,) this language is not employed, but the expression of “desire” in the other cases is changed into an “affirmation” that all who were wise would “observe these things,” and would “understand the loving-kindness of the Lord.”

The particular parts of the psalm are the following:

I. A reference to the redeemed of the Lord as having wandered in the wilderness; as having been hungry and thirsty; as having no city to dwell in; and then, as calling upon the Lord in such a manner that he heard them, and led them in a right and safe way. For “this” the psalmist expresses the wish that “men would praise the Lord for his goodness,” <sup><19A70></sup>Psalm 107:4-9.

II. A reference to God as displaying goodness toward those who sit in darkness and in the shadow of death, and who are bound in affliction and iron: illustrated by a reference to the people of God in the times of bondage, as being cast down and punished for their sins, and as then calling upon the Lord in their trouble, so that he brought them out of that darkness and shadow of death, and brake their bands asunder. For “this” the psalmist expresses the wish that “men would praise the Lord for his goodness,” <sup><19A70></sup>Psalm 107:10-16.

III. A reference to the deliverance performed for the people of God. They had sinned; they had shown their folly; they had drawn near to the gates of death, and then they cried unto the Lord, and he sent his word and healed them. For “this” the psalmist expresses the desire that “men would praise the Lord for his goodness,” <sup><19A71></sup>Psalm 107:17-22.

IV. A reference to the goodness of the Lord as manifested toward those who go down to the sea in ships, and do business in the great waters. They see the wonders of the Lord in the deep. They encounter storms and tempests. They are raised up to the heavens on the waves, and then sink to a corresponding depth. They reel to and fro and stagger like a drunkard; and then they cry to the Lord, and he hears them, and makes the sea calm, and brings them to the desired haven. For “this” the psalmist expresses the wish that “men would praise the Lord for his goodness,” <sup><19A72></sup>Psalm 107:23-32.

V. A reference to the goodness of the Lord in preparing a place for men to dwell in: turning rivers into a wilderness, the water-springs into dry ground, the wilderness into standing water, and the dry ground into water-springs: making arrangements for people to dwell upon the earth, so that they may sow the fields and plant vineyards — setting the poor on high from affliction, and making them families like a flock. In reference to “this,” and to “all” that God does, the psalmist says, in the conclusion of the psalm, that all who are “wise, and will observe these things, shall understand the loving-kindness of the Lord,” <sup><19A73></sup>Psalm 107:33-43.

For his mercy endureth for ever He is unchanging in his mercy. It is an attribute of his very nature. He is constantly manifesting it. The word rendered “mercy” here, however — dsjē<sup>42617></sup> — is more general in its signification than our word “mercy.” Our word means “favor shown to the guilty;” the Hebrew word means kindness, goodness, benignity in general. It is this which is celebrated in the psalm before us.

Psalm 107:2. Let the redeemed of the LORD say so They are especially qualified to say so; they have special occasion to say so; they can and will appreciate this trait in his character. The word rendered “redeemed” here — from l aē<sup>41350></sup> — means “delivered, rescued,” without reference to any price paid for the deliverance. It refers here not to a ransom from “sin,” but to deliverance from “danger.” The probable allusion is to the deliverance from the captivity in Babylon. Compare the notes at Isaiah 43:3.

whom he hath redeemed from the hand of the enemy the power of the enemy. That is, He has saved them from their enemies, and has not suffered them to be destroyed by them. What is here said is true in the most eminent sense of those who are redeemed by the blood of the Son of God, and who are made heirs of salvation. Every consideration makes it proper that they should praise the Lord. Of all on earth, they have most occasion for such praise; of all among people, it may be presumed that they will be best qualified to appreciate the goodness of the Lord.

Psalm 107:3. And gathered them out of the lands The countries where they were scattered. In the times of the captivity the people were not all taken to one place, or did not all abide in one place. In the long exile — of seventy years — in Babylon, they would naturally be much scattered in the different provinces; and the attempt to collect them together, to restore them again to their native land, might be attended with much difficulty.

From the east ... From all quarters; from the places where they were scattered abroad. That is, one taking his position in Babylon would see them dispersed from that place as a center into all the surrounding country.

And from the south Margin, as in Hebrew, “from the sea.” In general, in the Old Testament, the word “sea” is used for the west, because the western boundary of the land of Palestine was the Mediterranean Sea. Compare Psalm 139:9. But the supposed position of the speaker here is “Babylon,” and on that account the south might be fitly designated by the word “sea;” as, on the south of Babylon, the Persian Gulf and the Indian Ocean would be soon reached.

Psalm 107:4. They wandered in the wilderness On their return from Babylon; or, when God was conducting them again to their own land. The word “wilderness” in the Scriptures means a desolate, barren, uninhabited region, usually destitute of trees, of springs, and of water-courses. It does not denote, as it does with us, a region of extensive “forests.” Compare the notes at Matthew 4:1.

In a solitary way Rather, in a “waste” way; a land that was desolate and uncultivated.

They found no city to dwell in In their journeyings. This was true of the region between Babylon and Palestine; a wide, barren, desolate waste.

Psalm 107:5. Hungry and thirsty As they would be, when wandering in such a desert. A more literal and expressive rendering would be, “Hungry — also thirsty.”

Their soul fainted in them The word used here — אִפְּסָה<sup>15848</sup> — means properly to cover, to clothe, as with a garment, Psalm 73:6; or a field with grain, Psalm 65:13; then, to hide oneself, Job 23:9; then, to cover with darkness, Psalm 77:3; 102, title; thus it denotes the state of mind when darkness seems to be in the way — a way of calamity, trouble, sorrow; of weakness, faintness, feebleness. Here it would seem from the connection to refer to the exhaustion produced by the want of food and drink.

Psalm 107:6. Then they cried unto the LORD in their trouble The language in this verse is repeated in this psalm in Psalm 107:13,19,28 — as if this were the main subject of the psalm, that when the people of God in different circumstances, or under various forms of trouble, call upon God, he hears them and delivers them.

And he delivered them out of their distresses The verb from which the noun used here is derived has the idea of being “narrow, straitened, compressed.” Hence, the word comes to be used in the sense of distress of any kind — as if one were pressed down, or compressed painfully in a narrow space.

Psalm 107:7. And he led them forth by the right way A literal version, if the term necessary to express it might be allowable, would be, "He wayed them in a straight way;" he made a way for them, and that was a straight way. He conducted them in the most direct path to the land to which they were going.

That they might go to a city of habitation A city where they might permanently dwell. The word "city" here seems to be used in the sense of "abode;" and the idea is, that he led them to a land where they might cease to be wanderers, and might find a settled home.

Psalm 107:8. Oh that men would praise the LORD for his goodness More literally, "Let such — or, let these — praise the Lord for his goodness," the word "men" having been supplied by our translators. Yet it is not improper to suppose that a wider range is intended than would be denoted if it were confined to those who had then been delivered. It was evidently designed to impress the minds of those who might use this psalm in their devotions; and the idea is, that the deliverance then vouchsafed to the people of God in their troubles should lead all to praise and adore him. Such a surprising interposition suggested an important lesson in regard to God, applicable to all people; and should lead all to praise him in view of the trait of character thus manifested, as that of a God who hears prayer when his people are in trouble, and who can make a straight path before them when they are in danger of being lost, and who can conduct them through the wilderness — the waste places — of this world, as he did his people across the pathless sands of the desert. The true use of all history is to teach us lessons about God.

And for his wonderful works to the children of men His doings as suited to excite wonder and admiration. His dealings with his people in the desert furnished one illustration of this; the world is full of such illustrations. The desire expressed in this verse suggests the great lesson of the psalm.

Psalm 107:9. For he satisfieth the longing soul This does not mean — what is indeed true in itself — that God has made provision for the "soul" of man, and satisfies it when it longs or pants for its needed supply, but the reference is to the creatures of God — the living things that he has made; and the idea is, that he has made provision for their needs. He gives them food and drink, so that their needs are met. The "particular" reference here, however, in the word rendered "longing" is to "thirst," as contradistinguished from the other member of the verse, where the reference is to “hunger.” So the word is used in <sup><2318></sup>Isaiah 29:8.

And filleth the hungry soul with goodness Supplies the needs of the hungry with “good;” that is, with that which is “good” for it; which meets its needs, and imparts strength and happiness.

<sup><1970></sup>Psalm 107:10. Such as sit in darkness The reference in these verses (<sup><1970></sup>Psalm 107:10-14) is evidently to the children of Israel, when in Babylon; and the design is, to show the goodness of God to them in their trouble, and the occasion which they had for praising him on that account. To “sit in darkness” is significant of great ignorance (compare the notes at <sup><1079></sup>Luke 1:79; <sup><2302></sup>Isaiah 9:2); or of affliction and trouble, as darkness is an emblem of calamity.

And in the shadow of death A dark, gloomy, chilly shade such as “Death” would cast if he stood between us and the light. See the notes at <sup><1815></sup>Job 3:5; compare <sup><1801></sup>Job 10:21; <sup><1923></sup>Psalm 23:4; 44:19; <sup><2302></sup>Isaiah 9:2. The reference is to the sad and gloomy residence of the Hebrews in the land of captivity.

<sup><1971></sup>Psalm 107:11. Because they rebelled against the words of God The commands of God. They did not keep his commandments. Their captivity was produced by national disobedience. See the notes at <sup><2015></sup>Daniel 9:5-8.

And contemned the counsel They despised the instructions of God. The law of God, at the same time that it “is” law, is of the nature of “counsel,” since it is indicative of what God regards as wise and good, and since it is the best “advice” that God can give to people. A just and righteous law, while it involves “obligation” to obey it, is also the best counsel that can be given, and implies that the highest “wisdom” would be shown in being obedient to it. God will “command” nothing which he would not “advise,” and which it would not be “wisdom” to obey.

Of the Most High Of God, who, being supreme, has a right to rule over all, and to require that his laws shall be obeyed.

<sup><1972></sup>Psalm 107:12. Therefore he brought down their heart Their pride; their self-sufficiency; their self-complacency. They thought that they could do without God; they relied on their own resources, and were self-satisfied; but God showed them that all this was vain, and humbled them, as he often does the proud, in the dust.

They fell down They, as it were, “stumbled” — for so the Hebrew word means. They were walking along with a haughty air, and a high look, and suddenly they stumbled and fell.

And there was none to help No God to interpose; no nation to befriend them; no human arm to be stretched out for their deliverance. God gave them up, helpless, to the just consequences of their folly and wickedness.

Compare Daniel 9. This is repeated in the psalm in <sup><9A706></sup>Psalm 107:6,13,19,28 — in all the divisions of the psalm except the last. See the notes at <sup><9A706></sup>Psalm 107:6.

<sup><9A714></sup>Psalm 107:14. He brought them out of darkness and the shadow of death From their captivity; from calamity which seemed to be as gloomy as the shadow of death.

And brake their bands in sunder Delivered them from their bondage, as if the bands of a prisoner or captive were suddenly broken.

<sup><9A708></sup>Psalm 107:8. The idea here is that the things just referred to “should” call forth expressions of gratitude to God. The immediate reference is to those who had partaken of these proofs of the divine goodness, but still the language is so general as to be applicable to all classes of people.

<sup><9A716></sup>Psalm 107:16. For he hath broken the gates of brass The immediate “reason” here given for praising the Lord is that he had “broken the gates of brass,” continuing the thought from <sup><9A710></sup>Psalm 107:10-14. In the previous part of the psalm, in giving a reason for praising the Lord, the fact that he feeds the hungry was selected (<sup><9A709></sup>Psalm 107:9) because in the preceding part the allusion was to the sufferings of hunger and thirst (<sup><9A704></sup>Psalm 107:4,5); here the fact that he had broken the gates of brass is selected, because the allusion in the immediately preceding verses

(<sup><9A7D></sup>Psalm 107:12-14) was to their imprisonment. In the construction of the psalm there is great regularity. The “gates of brass” refer probably to Babylon; and the idea is, that their deliverance had been as if the brass gates of that great city had been broken down to give them free egress from their captivity. Thus the conquest of Babylon by Cyrus is announced in similar language: “I will break in pieces the gates of brass, and cut in sunder the bars of iron,” (<sup><28FD></sup>Isaiah 45:2. See the notes at that passage.

<sup><9A7D></sup>Psalm 107:17. Fools, because of their transgression Wicked people, considered as fools, because they “are” transgressors. Compare the notes at (<sup><9A4D></sup>Psalm 14:1; 73:3; 75:4. The immediate allusion here, probably, is to the Jews, who had been so wicked and so supremely foolish in violating the commands of God, and making it necessary to bring upon them as a punishment the captivity at Babylon; but the language is made general because it will with equal propriety describe the conduct of ALL wicked people. There is nothing more foolish than an act of wickedness; there is no wisdom equal to that of obeying God.

And because of their iniquities, are afflicted A more literal rendering of this verse would be, “Fools from the way of their transgressions (that is, by their course of transgression), and by their iniquities, afflict themselves.” The idea is, that it is “in the very line” of their transgressions; or, that they “bring it upon themselves.” All punishment is in fact in the line of the offence; that is, sin leads directly to it; or, in other words, if a man treads along in the path of sin, he will come to this result — to punishment. Punishment is not arbitrary on the part of God, and it is not of the nature of a mere direct infliction from his “hand.” It is what people mete out to themselves, and what they might have avoided if they had chosen to do so.

<sup><9A7D></sup>Psalm 107:18. Their soul abhorreth all manner of meat All food; all that is to be eaten. The word rendered “abhorreth” is a word which is used with reference to anything that is abominable or loathsome; that from which we turn away with disgust. The language is expressive of sickness, when we loathe all food.

And they draw near unto the gates of death They are sick, and are ready to die. The reference is to the under world — the world where the dead are supposed to dwell. This is represented here as a city which is entered through gates. See the notes at (<sup><99B3></sup>Psalm 9:13.

Psalm 107:19. Then they cry unto the LORD ... See the notes at Psalm 107:6,13. The meaning here is, that if the “sick” cry to the Lord, he hears them, and delivers them. This cannot mean that it “always” occurs, but it occurs “so often” as to show that God can and does interpose to save; “so often” as to encourage us thus to call upon him when we are sick; “so often” as to lay a proper foundation for praise. Many persons — very many — can recall such instances in their own lives, when they seemed to all human appearance to be drawing near to the gates of death, and when, in connection with prayer, their disease took a favorable turn, and they were restored again to health. Compare the notes at James 5:14,15.

Psalm 107:20. He sent his word, and healed them He did it by a word; it was necessary for him merely to give a command, and the disease left them. So it was in the life of the Saviour, who often healed the sick by a “word” (Matthew 8:8; Luke 7:7); and so now restoration from disease often seems to be accomplished as if some word had been spoken by one who had power, commanding the disease to depart. In all cases, also, whatever means may be used, healing power comes from God, and is under his control. Compare Psalm 30:2.

And delivered them from their destructions From what would have destroyed them, if it had not been checked and removed.

Psalm 107:21. Oh that men ... See the notes at Psalm 107:8. Who can help joining in this wish, that those who have been restored from sickness, who have been raised up from the borders of the grave, “would” praise God for it! Who can help wishing that they had the feelings of Hezekiah when he was saved from the sickness which threatened his life — saved by the direct and manifest interposition of God — when he said (Isaiah 38:20),

“The Lord was ready to save me: therefore we will sing my songs to the stringed instruments, all the days of our life in the house of the Lord!”

Who can help wishing that people everywhere would see in such interpositions the proof of the benevolence of God, and would thank him that he has not forgotten guilty and suffering people!

Psalm 107:22. And let them sacrifice As in the cases before (Psalm 107:9,16), this is connected with the preceding part of the psalm, or is a “continuation” of the thought which had been interrupted by the prayer, “Oh that men would praise the Lord.” The particular idea here is, that they who have been sick, and who have been restored to health, should offer the sacrifice of thanksgiving; or, that they are the proper persons to praise the Lord. The word “sacrifice” here is used in a large sense to denote worship or adoration. Let them worship God with thanks or praises.

And declare his works with rejoicing Margin, as in Hebrew, “singing.” Let them set forth his “doings” in songs. Compare Psalm 9:11.

Psalm 107:23. They that go down to the sea in ships The scene here changes again. From those that wander in the desert — from those who are in prison — from those who are sick — the eye of the psalmist turns to those who encounter the perils of the ocean, and he finds there occasion for praise to God. The phrase “go down” or “descend” is employed here because the sea is lower than the land, and because we “descend” when we embark on board of a vessel.

That do business ... Whose business or employment is on the ocean.

Psalm 107:24. These see the works of the Lord They — sailors — have a special opportunity to see the works of God. They see manifestations of his power which are not seen on the land. They see things which seem to come “directly” from God; which are “immediately” produced by him — not as the things which occur on the land, which are the result of “growth,” and which are slowly developed. They seem in the solitariness and grandeur of the ocean to stand more directly in the presence of the great God.

And his wonders in the deep In the abyss; in that which is distinguished for its “depth,” as the mountains are for their height. Compare Psalm 148:7.

Psalm 107:25. For he commandeth Hebrew, “he says;” that is, He speaks the word, and it is done. The mere expression of his will raises up the storm, and throws the sea into commotion.

And raiseth the stormy wind Margin, as in Hebrew, “Maketh to stand.” The “stormy wind” is literally, the wind of the tempest.

Which lifteth up the waves thereof The waves of the ocean. The wind seems to take them up, and lift them on high.

Psalm 107:26. They mount up to the heaven The mariners. That it refers to the seamen, and not to the waves, is apparent from the close of the verse: “their soul is melted.”

They go down again to the depths The word here is different from that used in Psalm 107:24, and rendered “deep,” but the idea is essentially the same. It is the sea or ocean considered as “deep;” as bottomless. The idea here is, that they seem to descend into the very depths of the ocean.

Their soul is melted because of trouble It seems to dissolve; it loses all its vigor; it faints. The word used — gWm<sup><4127></sup> — means to melt; to flow down; to soften; and is then applied to the heart or mind that loses its courage or vigor by fear or terror. Exodus 15:15; Joshua 2:9,24; Nahum 1:5. The “trouble” here referred to is that which arises from fear and danger.

Psalm 107:27. They reel to and fro The word used here — ggje<sup><42287></sup> — means to dance as in a circle; then, to reel, or be giddy as drunkards are.

And stagger ... This word means to move to and fro; to waver; to vacillate; and it is then applied to a man who cannot walk steadily — a drunkard. So the vessel, with the mariners on board, seems to stagger and reel in the storm.

And are at their wit's end Margin, as in Hebrew, “All their wisdom is swallowed up.” That is, They have no skill to guide the vessel. All that has been done by the wisdom of naval architecture in constructing it, and all that has been derived from experience in navigating the ocean, seems now to be useless. They are at the mercy of the winds and waves; they are dependent wholly on God; they can now only cry to him to save them. Often this occurs in a storm at sea, when the most skillful and experienced seaman feels that he can do no more.

Psalm 107:28. Then they cry unto the LORD in their trouble ... See Psalm 107:6,13,19. Sailors pray. If they do not pray elsewhere, they often do in a storm, when in danger of being wrecked and lost. A storm at sea brings hundreds on their knees who never prayed before — for they feel that their only help is in God, and that it is a fearful thing to die. Then they do “right.” They do what “ought” to be done. But they do then only what people ought always to do, for it is as plain a duty to pray when we are in safety as when we are in danger; when sailing on a smooth sea as in a storm; when on the land as on the ocean. People anywhere, and at any time may die; and people everywhere and at all times “should,” therefore, call upon God. Storms, tempests, fire, disease, and danger, only impel people to do what they SHOULD do always from higher motives, and when their motives will be likely to be more disinterested and pure.

Psalm 107:29. He maketh the storm a calm God does this, and God only can do it. The fact, therefore, that Jesus did it (<sup>4085</sup>Matthew 8:26), proves that he was divine. There can be no more striking proof of divine power than the ability to calm the raging waves of the ocean by a word. This is literally, “He places the tempest to silence.”

So that the waves thereof are still Are lulled. The ocean ceases to be agitated, and the surface becomes smooth. Nothing is more still than the ocean in a calm. Not a breath of air seems to stir; not a ripple agitates the surface of the sea; the sails of the vessel hang loose, and even the vessel seems to be perfectly at rest: “As idle as a painted ship upon a painted ocean.” So God can calm down the tempest of the soul. He can make the mind which was heaving and tossed, like the ocean, with anguish on account of guilt, and which trembled in view of the coming judgment, as calm as the ocean is when in its state of perfect repose. God can do “this,” and none “but” God can do it; and as Jesus thus stills the agitation of the guilty soul, as he did the waves of the sea, “this” proves also that he is divine.

Psalm 107:30. Then are they glad because they be quiet Because the storm subsides, and they have the feeling of safety from danger.

So he bringeth them Rather, “And he guides them.”

Unto their desired haven The word translated “haven” occurs nowhere else. By some it is rendered “shore,” but the word “haven” or “port” seems best to express the sense of the passage: “the haven of their desire.” No one can appreciate this fully who has not been long at sea, and who has not experienced the intense desire once more to see “land.” Even then no one experiences it fully who has not some object there which he desires to see, or to accomplish. If his business is there, if it is his native land, if his father, mother, wife, or children are there, if it is the place of his father's sepulchre, and the place where he was born and reared, how intense becomes the desire to see that land once more. So God brings his people to rest in heaven — their haven, their home. After being tossed by the tempests of life, after encountering its storms and dangers, after the fear and agitation experienced, he stills the storms; the way becomes smooth and calm; the end of the voyage is serene; and death is like the ship smoothly gliding into port with its sails all set. The soul enters heaven — the desired haven — the port that was longed for; a safe haven, beyond all storms or tempests; an eternal home!

Psalm 107:31. Oh that men ... See the notes at Psalm 107:8,15,21. Assuredly they who are thus delivered from the dangers of the sea should praise the Lord; they who have seen the wonders of God on the great ocean should “never” forget God.

Psalm 107:32. Let them exalt him also Let them lift up his name on high; let them make it conspicuous. The word means “to lift up,” and is applied to praise because we thus, as it were, “lift up” God, or make him conspicuous.

In the congregation of the people Not merely in private, but in public. As his doings are public and conspicuous — as they pertain to all — people should acknowledge him in their public capacity, or when assembled together.

And praise him in the assembly of the elders The old men; the men eminent for experience and wisdom. Perhaps this refers to those who occupied some official position in public worship, as appointed to preside over that worship, and to conduct it. We know that the arrangement was early made to appoint a body of aged men to preside over the assemblies for worship, and to direct the devotions of the people. In the presence of such venerable and venerated men, they are here exhorted to give due praise to God. The “reason” for this seems to be partly drawn from what had been referred to in the previous verses — the power of God as seen in stilling the tempests of the ocean; and partly from what is immediately referred to — the blessing of God on the labors of man in cultivating the earth.

Psalm 107:33. He turneth rivers into a wilderness He makes great changes in the earth; he shows that he has absolute dominion over it. See the notes at <sup>23405</sup>Isaiah 44:26,27. On the word “wilderness,” see the notes at <sup>194704</sup>Psalm 107:4. The point here is, that God had such control over nature that he could make the bed of a river dry and barren as the rocky or sandy desert. He could effectually dry up the stream, and make it so dry and parched that nothing would grow but the most stunted shrubs, such as were found in the waste and sandy desert.

And the water-springs into dry ground The very fountains of the rivers: not only drying up the river itself by leading it off into burning wastes where it would be evaporated by the heat, or lost in the sand — but so directly affecting the “sources” of the streams as to make them dry.

Psalm 107:34. A fruitful land Hebrew, A land of fruit. That is, a land that would produce abundance. The word “fruit” here is not used in the limited sense in which we now employ it, but means any productions of the earth.

Into barrenness Margin, as in Hebrew, “saltness.” The word is used to denote a barren soil, because where salt “abounds” the soil “is” barren. Thus it is around the Dead Sea. Compare <sup>48906</sup>Job 39:6; <sup>24176</sup>Jeremiah 17:6. See also Virg. Geor. II. 238, “Salsa ... tellus — frugibus infelix;” Pliny, Hist. Nat. 31. 7; Bochart, Hieroz. t. i., p. 872.

For the wickedness of them that dwell therein As he overthrew Sodom and Gomorrah; probably alluding to that.

Psalm 107:35. He turneth the wilderness into a standing water A pool; a lake. See the notes at <sup>23316</sup>Isaiah 35:6,7.

And dry ground into water-springs Not merely watering it with rain from heaven, but causing gushing fountains to break forth, and to flow continually, diffusing fertility and beauty everywhere.

Psalm 107:36. And there he maketh the hungry to dwell Those who were in want; those who would have perished. It is not necessary to refer this to any particular case. It is a general statement, pertaining to changes which God makes upon the earth, as great as if he “should” thus convert a desert into a fruitful field — a barren waste into a land abounding in springs of water; as if he SHOULD conduct there a company of famished men, and provide for them food in abundance.

That they may prepare a city for habitation A permanent dwelling-place for man.

Psalm 107:37. And sow the fields, and plant vineyards Cultivate the earth. The culture of the vine was an important feature in agriculture in Palestine, and hence, it is made so prominent here.

Which may yield fruits of increase The fruits which the earth produces.

Psalm 107:38. He blesseth them also In the manner immediately specified.

So that they are multiplied greatly This was regarded as one of the highest blessings which God could confer, and hence, it was so often promised by him to the patriarchs, as a proof of his favor, that their seed should be as the stars of heaven, and as the sand upon the sea-shore. <sup>GEN 13:16;</sup> 22:17; 26:4; 32:12.

And suffereth not their cattle to decrease The keeping of herds of cattle was also an important point in husbandry, and hence, it was a blessing that they were made to increase, and that they were kept from the diseases to which cattle are subject.

Psalm 107:39. Again, they are minished ... literally, “And they are made to decrease.” That is — all is in the hand of God. He rules and directs all things. If there is prosperity, it comes from him; if there are reverses, they occur under his hand. People are not always prosperous. There are changes, misfortunes, disappointments, sorrows. God so deals with the race as in the bests manner to secure the recognition of himself: not always sending prosperity, lest people should regard it as a thing of course, and forget that it comes from him; and not making the course of life uniformly that of disappointment and sorrow, lest they should feel that there is no God presiding over human affairs. He visits now with prosperity, and now with adversity; now with success, and now with reverses, showing that his agency is constant, and that people are wholly dependent on him. In existing circumstances — since man is what he is — it is better that there should be alternations, reverses, and changes, than that there should be a uniform course.

Through oppression Anything that “presses” or “straitens.”

Affliction Evil; here, in the sense of calamity.

And sorrow Anguish, pain: of body or mind.

Psalm 107:40. He poureth contempt upon princes He treats them as if they were common people; he pays no regard in his providence to their station and rank. They are subjected to the same needs as others; they meet with reverses like others; they become captives like others; they sicken and die like others; they are laid in the grave like others; and, with the same offensiveness, they turn back to dust. Between monarchs and their subjects, masters and their slaves, mistresses and their handmaidens, rich men and poor men, beauty and deformity, there is no distinction in the pains of sickness, in the pangs of dying, in the loathsomeness of the grave. The process of corruption goes on in the most splendid coffin, and beneath the most costly monument which art and wealth can rear, as well as in the plainest coffin, and in the grave marked by no stone or memorial. What can more strikingly show “contempt” for the trappings of royalty, for the adornings of wealth, for the stars and garters of nobility, for coronets and crowns, for the diamonds, the pearls, and the gold that decorate beauty, than that which occurs “in a grave!” The very language used here, alike in the Hebrew and in our translation, is found in <sup><1812></sup>Job 12:21. The word rendered “princes” properly means “willing, voluntary, prompt;” and is then applied to the generous, to the noble-minded, to those who give liberally. It then denotes one of noble rank, as the idea of rank in the mind of the Orientals was closely connected with the notion of liberality in giving. Thus it comes to demote one of noble birth, and might be applied to any of exalted rank.

And causeth them to wander in the wilderness Margin, “void place.” The Hebrew word — <sup><1841></sup>WhTo — means properly wasteness, desolateness; emptiness, vanity. See <sup><1000></sup>Genesis 1:2; <sup><1837></sup>Job 26:7; <sup><2342></sup>Isaiah 41:29; 44:9; 49:4. Here it means an empty, uninhabited place; a place where there is no path to guide; a land of desolation. The reference seems to be to the world beyond the grave; the land of shadows and night. Compare the notes at <sup><1812></sup>Job 10:21,22.

Where there is no way literally, “no way.” That is, no well-trodden path. All must soon go to that pathless world.

Psalm 107:41. Yet setteth he the poor on high from affliction

Margin, “after.” The sense is not materially different. The idea is, that while he thus humbles princes, bringing them down from their lofty position, he has respect to the poor in their condition of suffering and trial, and raises them from that depressed state, and gives them prosperity. Thus he orders the circumstances of people, and shows his sovereignty.

And maketh him families like flock Numerous as a flock. Large families were accounted a blessing among the Hebrews. See the notes at Psalm 107:38.

Psalm 107:42. The righteous shall see it, and rejoice Shall see all these changes; shall see in their own case the proofs of the divine favor. They shall thus have occasion for praise.

And all iniquity shall stop her mouth The wicked shall be silenced; they shall be dumb. The righteous shall find, in these varied scenes, occasion for praise and joy; the wicked shall be able to find no occasion for complaining or murmuring. The divine dealings shall be manifestly so just, and so worthy of universal approval, that, even though the wicked are disposed to complain against God, they will be able to find nothing which will justify them in such complaints.

Psalm 107:43. Whoso is wise All who are truly wise. That is, all who have a proper understanding of things, or who are disposed to look at them aright.

And will observe these things Will attentively consider them; will reason upon them correctly; will draw just conclusions from them; will allow them to produce their “proper” impression on the mind. The meaning is, that these things would not be understood at a glance, or by a hasty and cursory observation, but that all who would take time to study them would see in them such proofs of wisdom and goodness that they could not fail to come to the conclusion that God is worthy of confidence and love.

Even they shall understand the lovingkindness of the LORD They will perceive that God is a merciful Being; that he seeks the welfare of the universe; that he desires the good of all; that the whole system is so arranged as to be adapted to secure the greatest good in the universe. No one can study the works of God, or mark the events of his providence, without perceiving that there are “innumerable” arrangements which have no other end than to produce happiness; which can be explained only on the supposition that God is a benevolent Being; which would not exist under the government of a malevolent being. And, although there are things which seem to be arrangements to cause suffering, and although sin and misery have been allowed to come into the world, yet we are not in circumstances to enable us to show that, in some way, these may not be consistent with a desire to promote the happiness of the universe, or that there may not be some explanation, at present too high for us, which will show that the principle of benevolence is applicable to all the works of God. Meantime, where we can — as we can in numberless cases — see the proofs of benevolence, let us praise God; where we cannot, let us silently trust him, and believe that there will yet be some way in which we may see this as the angels now see it, and, like them, praise him for what now seems to us to be dark and incomprehensible. There is an “eternity” before us in which to study the works of God, and it would not be strange if in that eternity we may learn things about God which we cannot understand now, or if in that eternity things now to us as dark as midnight may be made clear as noonday. How many things incomprehensible to us in childhood, become clear in riper years!

APPENDIX NOTES ON PSALM 107

Here commences the fifth and last Book of Psalms. (See the Introduction.)

This Psalm may doubtless be regarded as based on the deliverance from the captivity. It is therefore a captivity hymn. It is not, however, to be regarded as historical in the strict sense, nor are the figures used to be explained as exclusively illustrating the condition of the Jews in Babylon and the joy of their deliverance. The psalm is a psalm of praise for the divine goodness illustrated by God’s dealings with wilderness wanderers, with prisoners, with sick and dying men, and with sailors in a storm.

Psalm 107:23,32. They that go down to the sea in ships ... Fourth example: seafarers tossed and driven by the tempest, and brought at last safe into port. The description may be compared with the language of Jonah 1:11. It is the most highly finished, the most thoroughly poetical of each of the four pictures of human peril and deliverance. It is painted as a landsman would paint it, but yet only as one who had himself been in “perils of waters” could paint the storm — the waves running mountains high, on which the tiny craft seemed a plaything, the helplessness of human skill, the gladness of the calm, the safe refuge in the haven.

Addison remarks that he prefers this description of a ship in a storm before any others he had ever met with, and for the same reason for which “Longinus recommends one in Homer, because the poet has not amused himself with little fancies upon the occasion, as authors of an inferior genius, whom he mentions, had done, but because he has gathered together those circumstances which are the most apt to terrify the imagination, and which really happened in the raging of a tempest.” “By the way,” he adds, “how much more comfortable as well as rational is this system of the psalmist, than the pagan scheme in Virgil and other poets where one deity is represented as raising a storm and another as laying it! Were we only to consider the sublime in this piece of poetry, what can be nobler than the idea it gives us of the Supreme Being thus raising a tumult among the elements, and recovering them out of their confusion; thus troubling and becalming nature!” — Spectator, No. 489. Perowne.

Addison’s beautiful rendering of this passage and application to Christian experience in the following hymn will be appreciated by the reader:

*“Think, O my soul! devoutly think,
How, with affrighted eyes,
Thou sawest the wide-extended deep,
In all its horrors rise.*

*“Confusion dwelt on every face,
And fear in every heart;
When waves on waves, and gulfs on gulfs,
O’ercame the pilot’s art.*

*“Yet then, from all my griefs, O Lord!
Thy mercy set me free;
While in the confidence of prayer,
My soul took hold on thee.*

*“For though in dreadful whirls we hung
High in the broken wave,
I knew thou wert not slow to hear,
Nor impotent to save.*

*“The storm was laid, the winds retired,
Obedient to thy will;
The sea that roared at thy command.
At thy command was still?*

NOTES ON PSALM 108

This psalm is ascribed to David, and there is no reason to doubt the correctness of the title in this respect. The psalm is not an original composition, but is made up, with slight alterations, of parts of two other psalms, <sup><157></sup>Psalm 57:7-11; 60:5-12.

When the psalm was so arranged, or why the parts of two former psalms were thus brought together to form a new composition, it is impossible now to determine. It “may” have been for a mere purpose of art; or it may, more probably, have occurred when the two parts of psalms already in use might be so combined as to be adapted to some new event. It may have been, also, that what had been expressed “on two different occasions” might now be fulfilled or accomplished “on some one occasion,” and that thoughts which had been expressed separately before might now be unitedly uttered in praise. Rosenmuller supposes that the psalm in its present form was arranged on the return from the captivity at Babylon, and that the parts of the two separate psalms were found to be suitable for a national song at that time, and were therefore thus brought together. This supposition would have much probability if the psalm were not ascribed to David; and perhaps this fact need not be an insuperable objection — since, if the two psalms from which this is compiled were the work of David, the author of the arrangement might without impropriety attribute the composition itself to David.

There are some slight variations in the psalm, as here arranged, from the original psalms; but why these were made cannot now be determined. Substantially all that will be necessary in the exposition of the psalm will be to notice these variations.

<sup><158></sup>Psalm 108:1. O God, my heart is fixed Prepared, suited, ready. See the notes at <sup><157></sup>Psalm 57:7. In <sup><157></sup>Psalm 57:7, this is repeated: “My heart is fixed; O God, my heart is fixed:” indicating that there “might” have been some doubt or vacillation caused by the circumstances then existing, and the repetition would have respect to that, as if the psalmist had been unsettled and wavering for a time, but was at last firm. In such circumstances it would not be unnatural to “repeat” the assertion, as if there were no longer any doubt. In the beginning of a psalm, however, where there had been no previous expression or feeling of doubt so far as appears, there would be no propriety in repeating the assertion.

I will sing and give praise See the notes at <sup><1570></sup>Psalm 57:7.

Even with my glory This is not in Psalm 57. It is literally here, “truly my glory.” In <sup><1578></sup>Psalm 57:8, however, the expression, “Awake up, my glory,” occurs, and this seems to correspond with that language. It means here that it was his glory — his honor — thus to be employed in giving praise to God. It was worthy of all that there was elevated in his nature; of all that constituted his glory; of his highest powers. At no time is man employed in a more noble and lofty work than praise.

<sup><1486></sup>Psalm 108:6. That thy beloved may be delivered The word rendered “beloved,” and the verb rendered “may be delivered,” are both in the plural number, showing that it is not an individual that is referred to, but that the people of God are intended. This is taken without any alteration from <sup><1515></sup>Psalm 60:5. In that psalm the prayer for deliverance is grounded on the afflictions of the people, and the fact that God had given them “a banner that it might be displayed because of the truth,” — or, in the cause of truth. See the notes at that psalm. In the psalm before us, while the prayer for deliverance is the same, the reason for that prayer is different. It is that God is exalted; that his mercy is above the heavens; that his glory is above all the earth, and that he is thus exalted that he may interpose and save his people.

<sup><B016></sup>Psalm 108:7. God hath spoken ... This is taken, without change, from <sup><B016></sup>Psalm 60:6. See the notes at that place.

Thus the psalm, though made up of parts of two separate psalms, is complete and continuous in itself. There is no break or discrepancy in the current of thought, but the unity is as perfect as though it had been an original composition. It is to be remarked, also, that though in the original psalms the parts which are used here have a different connection, and are separately complete there, yet as employed here, they seem to be exactly suited to the new use which is made of the language; and though the original “reasons” for the use of the language do not appear here, yet there is a sufficient reason for that language apparent in the psalm as rearranged. To an Israelite, also, there might be a new interest in the use of the language in the fact that words with which he was familiar, as employed for other purposes, “could” be thus combined, and made applicable to a new occasion in the national history.

NOTES ON PSALM 109

This psalm is ascribed to David, and there is nothing in the psalm to make us doubt the correctness of the title. Kimchi supposes that it refers to the enemies of David in the time of Saul. Grotius and Knapp suppose that it refers to Ahithophel; Dathe, to Shimei; DeWette, that it refers to national foes at a later period than the time of David. It is impossible now to ascertain the occasion on which it was composed. It would seem to have been one of the most trying in the life of David, when his enemies were most bitter against him. It is one of the “imprecatory” psalms, and one which is as difficult to reconcile with a kind and forgiving spirit as any other in the book.

In the New Testament (~~401~~ Acts 1:20) a part of the psalm is applied to Judas the traitor, but without its being necessary to conclude that it had any original reference to him. The conduct of Judas was like the conduct of the enemy of David; the language used in the one case might be properly used in the other.

The psalm consists of three parts:

I. A description of the enemies of the psalmist (~~1901~~ Psalm 109:1-5), as

- (a) deceitful and lying;
- (b) as using words of hatred;
- (c) as fighting against him without cause;
- (d) as returning evil for good, and hatred for love.

From this it would seem that the persons referred to were some who had been closely connected with the author; who had received important benefits from him; who had been the subjects of his prayer; and who pursued him from mere malice.

II. A prayer for the punishment of those who had thus wronged him — referring particularly to some one person who had been prominent, or who had instigated others, imploring the infliction of just punishment on him as if he were alone responsible, ~~1906~~ Psalm 109:6-20. It is in this part of the psalm that the principal difficulty in the interpretation consists, as this is made up of severe and apparently harsh and revengeful imprecations. All is in fact invoked on him that any man could ever desire to see inflicted on an enemy.

III. A prayer for the sufferer's own deliverance, with a promise of thanksgiving, <sup><PAG2></sup>Psalm 109:21-31. The psalmist here describes his miserable and suffering condition, and prays that God would interpose — expressing a willingness to suffer anything at the hand of man if God would be his friend — a willingness that they should continue to “curse,” if God would “bless.” As the result of all, he says that he would find delight in praise — in the public acknowledgment of the goodness of God.

On the phrase in the title, “To the chief Musician,” see the notes at the title to Psalm 4.

<sup><PAG2></sup>Psalm 109:1. Hold not thy peace That is, Speak for my defense — as if God had looked with unconcern on the wrongs which were done to him. See the notes at <sup><PAG2></sup>Psalm 83:1.

O God of my praise The God whom I praise; whom I worship and adore. It implies that he was accustomed to praise him, and desired still to praise him. He sought that God would interpose now that he might have new occasion for praise.

<sup><PAG2></sup>Psalm 109:2. For the mouth of the wicked and the mouth of the deceitful literally, “The mouth of wickedness, and the mouth of deceit.” This acquaints us with the nature of the wrong which had been done him. It was slander; undeserved reproach.

Are opened against me Margin, “have opened;” that is, have opened themselves.

They have spoken against me with a lying tongue They have accused me of things which are not true; they have made false charges against me. David, as has not been uncommon with good people, was called repeatedly to this trial.

<sup><PAG2></sup>Psalm 109:3. They compassed me about also with words of hatred They attacked me on every side; they assailed me, not merely in one form and direction, but in every form, and in every direction. I could turn no way — I could go nowhere — where I did not encounter these slanderous reports.

And fought against me without a cause Contended against me, or fought against me, with “words.” They sought to do me all the harm they could. The phrase “without a cause” means that he had given them no occasion for this conduct; he had not wronged them; it was mere malignity. See ~~1887~~ Psalm 35:7; 69:4. Compare ~~1852~~ John 15:25.

~~1904~~ Psalm 109:4. For my love ... As a recompence for my love; or, this is the return which I get for all the expressions of my love to them. The enemies referred to were those whom he had treated kindly; to whom he had done good. This is not uncommon in the world. It was illustrated in an eminent degree in the life of the Saviour.

But I give myself unto prayer literally, “I — prayer;” that is, I am all prayer; I continually pray. This may mean, either, that he bore these trials with a meek spirit, and did not allow these things to disturb his devotions; or, more probably, that he prayed constantly “for them;” he desired their good, and sought it from above.

~~1916~~ Psalm 109:5. And they have rewarded me evil for good literally, “They have placed against me.” They have put it in my way; it is what they had to set before me. See the notes at ~~1852~~ Psalm 35:12, where the same expression occurs.

And hatred for my love Instead of loving me in return for my love, they have met me with the expressions of hatred. This often occurred in the life of David; it was constant in the life of the Saviour; it is habitually manifested by people toward God; it is often experienced by good men now; it “may” occur in the life of any man — and if it “does” occur to us, we should not think that any strange thing has happened to us.

~~1906~~ Psalm 109:6. Set thou a wicked man over him This commences the imprecatory part of the psalm, extending to ~~1901~~ Psalm 109:20. The first thing that the psalmist asks is, that his foe might be subjected to the evil of having a man placed over him like himself: a man regardless of justice, truth, and right; a man who would respect character and propriety no more than he had himself done. It is, in fact, a prayer that he might be punished “in the line of his offences.” It cannot be wrong that a man should be treated as he treats others; and it cannot be in itself wrong to desire that a man should be treated according to his character and deserts, for this is the object of all law, and this is what all magistrates and legislators are endeavoring to secure.

And let Satan stand at his right hand As his counselor and adviser. The language would be properly applicable to one who had been a counselor or adviser to a king in the administration of the government; and the prayer is, that he might know what it was to have such a one as his counselor and adviser. The language used would seem to make it not improbable that David here refers particularly to someone who had occupied this position in reference to himself, and who had betrayed his trust; who had given him crafty and malignant counsel; who had led him into bad measures; who had used his position to promote his own interests at the expense of his master's. David had such counselors, as anyone in authority may have. The prayer, then, would be, that such a man might be punished in his own line; that he might know what it was to have a bad and wicked adviser. The word rendered "Satan" — ~ⲢϢ, <sup><h7854></sup> — is in the margin rendered "adversary." In the Septuagint it is <sup><h1228></sup>δίαβολος; in the Vulgate, "diabolus." See the notes at <sup><h8006></sup>Job 1:6, for its meaning. The prayer here seems not to be that the devil or Satan might stand near him as his counselor; but that a man — a real adversary — an accuser — one with a malignant heart — one who would make use of his position to accomplish his own purposes, and to betray the interests of his master, might give him counsel, as seems to have been done in the case of David.

<sup><h9407></sup>Psalm 109:7. When he shall be judged ... When for his offences he shall be arraigned. The psalmist supposes that he "might" be put on trial; he seems to suppose that this "would be." Such wickedness could not always escape detection, and sooner or later he would be arrested and brought to trial. "When" this should occur, the psalmist prays that justice might be done; that he might be condemned, as he "ought" to be. Such a prayer could not in itself be wrong, for assuredly it cannot be proper for magistrates to pray that the wicked man may escape, or that they may themselves fail in the very object for which they are appointed. See the general introduction, 6 (5) e. f.

And let his prayer become sin Evidently his prayer in reference to his "trial" for crime; his prayer that he might be acquitted and discharged. Let it be seen in the result that such a prayer was wrong; that it was, in fact, a prayer for the discharge of a bad man — a man who ought to be punished. Let it be seen to be what a prayer would be if offered for a murderer, or violator of the law — a prayer that he might escape or not be punished. All must see that such a prayer would be wrong, or would be a "sin;" and so, in his own case, it would be equally true that a prayer “for his own escape” would be “sin.” The psalmist asks that, by the result of the trial, such a prayer might be “seen” to be in fact a prayer “for the” protection and escape of a “bad man.” A just sentence in the case would demonstrate this; and this is what the psalmist prays for.

Psalm 109:8. Let his days be few Let him be soon cut off; let his life be shortened. It cannot be wrong for an officer of justice to aim at this; to desire it; to pray for it. How strange it would be for a magistrate to pray “that a murderer or a traitor should be long lived!”

And let another take his office So every man acts, and practically prays, who seeks to remove a bad and corrupt man from office. As such an office must be filled by someone, all the efforts which he puts forth to remove a wicked man tend to bring it about that “another should take his office;” and for this it is “right” to labor and pray. The act does not of itself imply malignity or bad feeling, but is consistent with the purest benevolence, the kindest feelings, the strictest integrity, the sternest patriotism, and the highest form of piety. The word rendered office here is in the margin “charge.” It properly denotes a “mustering, an enumeration;” then, care, watch, oversight, charge, as in an army, or in a civil office. In Acts 1:20, this passage is applied to Judas, and the word — the same word as in the Septuagint here — is rendered in the text “bishopric,” in the margin, “office.” See the notes at that passage. It had no original reference to Judas, but the language was exactly adapted to him, and to the circumstances of the case, as it is used by the apostle in that passage.

Psalm 109:9. Let his children be fatherless Hebrew, “his sons.” This is what “always” occurs when a criminal who is a father is executed. It is one of the consequences of crime; and if the officer of justice does his duty, of course, the sons of such a man “must” be made fatherless. The prayer is, simply, that justice may be done, and all this is but an enumeration of what must follow from the proper execution of the laws.

And his wife a widow This implies no malice against the wife, but may be consistent with the most tender compassion for her sufferings. It is simply one of the consequences which must follow from the punishment of a bad man. The enumeration of these things shows the enormity of the crime — just as the consequences which follow from the execution of a murderer are an illustration of the divine sense of the evil of the offence.

Psalm 109:10. Let his children be continually vagabonds, and beg

Let them continually wander about with no home — no fixed habitation. Let them be compelled to ask their daily food at the hand of charity. Here we enter on a part of the psalm which is more difficult to be reconciled with a proper feeling than the portions which have been considered. It is, indeed, a frequent consequence of crime that the children of those who are punished “are” vagabonds and beggars, but this is not a necessary consequence; and there “seems” here, therefore, to be a mixture of personal feeling, or a feeling of revenge. This runs through the remaining portion of the imprecatory part of the psalm. I confess that it is difficult to explain this without admitting that the expressions are a record only of what actually occurred in the mind of a man, truly pious, but not perfect — a man who thus, to illustrate the workings of the mind even when the general character was holy, was allowed to record his own feelings, though wrong, just as he would record the conduct of another, or his own conduct, though wrong, as a simple matter of fact — a record of what actually was felt. The “record” may be exactly correct; the sentiment recorded may have been wholly incapable of vindication. See the General Introduction, Section 6 (6).

Let them seek their bread also out of their desolate places In places uninhabited by man; in barren regions; in deserts: let them be compelled to live on the scanty food which they may pick up there — the roots, or the wild fruits, which will simply keep them alive. See the notes at Job 30:4.

Psalm 109:11. Let the extortioner catch all that he hath literally, “Let the extortioner cast a snare over all that he hath;” that is, let him seize all his property. The word rendered “catch” — vqæ<sup>45367</sup> — is a word which means to lay a snare, as for birds and wild animals, and hence, it means to ensnare, to entrap, to catch. The word rendered “extortioner” means literally one who lends or borrows money; a money-loaner; in our times, a “broker.” Here it refers to one who loaned money on interest; or who took advantage of the necessities of others to lend money at high rates — thus sooner or later seizing upon and securing the property of another. The prayer here is, that he might be in such circumstances as to make it necessary to fall into the hands of those who would thus come into possession of all his property.

And let the strangers spoil his labor Let strangers “plunder” his labor; that is, the fruit of his labor. Let them seize and possess what he has earned and gained to enjoy it themselves. The remarks made on <sup><39A9D></sup>Psalm 109:10, will apply to this verse and the following.

<sup><39A9E></sup>Psalm 109:12. Let there be none to extend mercy unto him Let him find compassion and sympathy in no one. When he suffers, let him be left to bear it alone. Let there be none found to shed a tear of compassion over him, or to relieve him. Literally, “Let there be no one to draw out kindness to him.”

Neither let there be any to favor his fatherless children To show them mercy or kindness. See the notes at <sup><39A9D></sup>Psalm 109:10.

<sup><39A9E></sup>Psalm 109:13. Let his posterity be cut off To have a numerous posterity, to have the name and family perpetuated, was regarded among the Hebrews as one of the greatest and most desirable blessings. Hence, to pray that all one’s family might be cut off was one of the severest forms of malediction which could be employed.

And in the generation following The very next generation. Let not his family be perpetuated at all.

Be remembered with the LORD Or, by the Lord. The doctrine of the Bible is, that God “visits the iniquities of the fathers upon the children unto the third and fourth generation of them that hate” him (<sup><02115></sup>Exodus 20:5); the matter of fact is that children and children’s children often suffer from the errors, the crimes, and the follies of their parents, as in the case of intemperance, murder, and treason (compare the notes at <sup><61512></sup>Romans 5:12ff); and the prayer here is, that this regular effect of sin might follow in this instance; that these consequences might not be arrested by divine interposition.

And let not the sin of his mother be blotted out This is probably added to complete the parallelism; the sin of his father and his mother. There may, however, if this is a composition of David, be a similar allusion to that which occurs in <sup><45105></sup>Psalm 51:5, “Behold, I was shapen in iniquity, and in sin did my mother conceive me.” The prayer is, that whatever effects might properly follow from the fact that his mother was a sinner — either in some special sense, or in the general sense that all are sinners — might come upon him.

~~1915~~ Psalm 109:15. Let them be before the LORD continually Let their sins never pass from the mind of God. Let him never so forget them as not to inflict punishment for them.

That he may cut off the memory of them from the earth That they may be wholly forgotten among people. Let their very name perish; and let the offender in this case be in the condition of those who have no ancestors to whom they can refer with pride and pleasure. The idea here is drawn from the honor which is felt in being able to refer to ancestors worthy of being remembered for their virtues.

~~1916~~ Psalm 109:16. Because that he remembered not to show mercy He had no compassion; he was severe, harsh, unjust, unfeeling.

But persecuted the poor and needy man The man that was destitute of friends; that was a wanderer and a beggar. There were times in the life of David when this would be strictly and literally applicable to him.

That he might even slay the broken in heart The man whose heart was crushed by sorrow — that he might put “the finishing stroke” to all, and send him to the grave. Whatever might have been the “feeling” which prompted to this prayer, or however difficult it may be to vindicate the psalmist’s expression of feeling, there can be no doubt as to the propriety of inflicting punishment on such a man. The sufferings invoked are none too severe to be inflicted on a man who persecutes the poor and needy, and seeks so to multiply sorrows that the man already crushed and broken in heart shall sink to the grave.

~~1917~~ Psalm 109:17. As he loved cursing ... As he loved to curse others; as he seemed to have a pleasure alike in the act of cursing and in the feeling which prompts to cursing, let him see what it is; let it come upon him in its fullness. He has chosen this as his portion; let it be his. This, in the original, is in the indicative mood, and not, as in our version, in the optative form: “He loved cursing, and it has come upon him; he did not delight in blessing, and it is far from him.” Still, the connection would rather seem to require that we should understand this as a prayer, and not as an affirmation, for the object of the whole seems not to be to state what had come upon him, but what the psalmist wished might come upon him.

As he delighted not in blessing ... As he had no pleasure in wishing that others might be happy, or in any measures which would tend to promote their happiness, so let everything that could be regarded as a blessing be put far from him; let him know nothing of it.

Psalm 109:18. As he clothed himself with cursing like as with a garment Moral qualities are often compared with raiment — as that in which we “appear” to our fellow-men. See <sup><1015></sup>1 Peter 5:5; <sup><1014></sup>Job 29:14.

So let it come into his bowels like water Margin, “within him.” Hebrew, “In his midst.” Let it penetrate him through and through. Let no part of him be unaffected by it.

And like oil into his bones As if oil flowed through all his bones, so let the effects of cursing pervade his whole frame. The prayer is, that his entire nature might feel the effects of cursing; that he might know to the full what he was endeavoring to bring on others.

Psalm 109:19. Let it be unto him as the garment which covereth him He has chosen to put it on, to wear it, to appear in it; so let him constantly feel its consequences. As he is always obliged to wear clothing, so let this be as constantly with him and upon him as his mantle and his sash.

And for a girdle wherewith he is girded continually The belt or girdle which he constantly wears. See the notes at <sup><1015></sup>Matthew 5:38.

Psalm 109:20. Let this be the reward of mine adversaries from the LORD, ... The word rendered “reward” means usually work, labor, occupation, business; then, what one earns by his work — reward, recompence, <sup><1013></sup>Leviticus 19:13. The meaning here is, Let them constantly receive these things which I have prayed for (<sup><1016></sup>Psalm 109:6-19); let them be constantly treated in this manner. This is a summing up of his entire wish — his whole desire. It cannot be proved that they did “not deserve” all this; it cannot be shown that if all this came upon them at the hand of God, it would be unjust; it cannot be denied that such things as these, either singly, in groups, or in succession, do actually come upon wicked people; and the prayer in the case “may” have been merely that justice might be done. Still, as before remarked, it is not easy wholly to vindicate the expressed feelings of the psalmist. See the notes at <sup><1010></sup>Psalm 109:10.

Psalm 109:21. But do thou for me, O GOD the Lord, for thy name's sake That is, Interpose for me; exert thy power in my behalf. The phrase “for thy name’s sake” implies that the motive which prompted him was a desire that God might be honored. It was not primarily or mainly for his own happiness; it was that God might be glorified, that his character might be illustrated, that his plans might be accomplished. Compare the notes at Daniel 9:18,19.

Because thy mercy is good That is, It is the characteristic of mercy to do good; to show kindness.

Deliver thou me He prays that God would “manifest” himself as he really was, as a God of mercy.

Psalm 109:22. For I am poor and needy I am helpless and dependent. I am in a condition where I need thy gracious interposition.

And my heart is wounded within me I am as one that is prostrated by a weapon — as if my heart had been pierced. I have no courage, no strength. I am like one who lies wounded on a battlefield.

Psalm 109:23. I am gone like the shadow when it declineth See the notes at Psalm 102:11.

I am tossed up and down as the locust Agitated, moved, driven about, as a cloud of locusts is by the wind. The meaning of the whole is, that he was frail and weak, and needed strength from on high.

Psalm 109:24. My knees are weak through fasting Hunger; want of food. Strength to stand is connected with firmness in the knee-joints, and hence, weakness and feebleness are denoted by the giving way of the knees. Compare Hebrews 12:12.

And my flesh faileth of fatness I am lean and weak. There is not the proper supply for my strength. The idea seems to have been that fatness (Hebrew, oil) was necessary to strength.

Psalm 109:25. I became also a reproach unto them They reproached or reviled me as a bad man. Compare the notes at Psalm 22:6. The plural here — “unto them” — shows that there were more than one to whom the psalm had reference, though one of them was so prominent that a considerable part of the psalm might properly be spoken of him alone.

<sup><1926></sup>Psalm 109:26. Help me, O LORD my God ... Stand by me; interpose.

<sup><1927></sup>Psalm 109:27. That they may know that this is thy hand That this has been done by thee; that it has all occurred under thy direction, or has been ordered by thee. The reference seems to be particularly to God's interposition: "Let it be manifest to all that thou hast interposed in my behalf; that thou hast undertaken for me; that thou art my Friend." He desired an interposition from God that he might be vindicated before all his enemies.

That thou, LORD, hast done it Let it be such an interposition that it will be manifest to all that no other one but God could have done this.

<sup><1928></sup>Psalm 109:28. Let them curse, but bless thou See <sup><1927></sup>Psalm 109:17. Let them continue to curse me, provided thou wilt bless me. I am willing to bear all these reproaches, if I may have thy favor. That favor I value infinitely more than I do theirs; and it is a small matter that I am reviled and cursed by people, if I may secure the favor and friendship of God.

When they arise When they rise up against me; when they attempt to persecute me.

Let them be ashamed ... Let them be disappointed; let them not be successful in their designs against me. On the word "ashamed," see the notes at <sup><1915></sup>Job 6:20; <sup><1922></sup>Psalm 25:2,3.

<sup><1929></sup>Psalm 109:29. Let mine adversaries be clothed with shame Let confusion and disappointment seem to cover them, so as to constitute a garment. See the notes at <sup><1928></sup>Psalm 109:18,19. They had "clothed themselves with cursing" (<sup><1928></sup>Psalm 109:18), and the prayer now is, that the covering of shame might be as complete and entire.

And let them cover themselves with their own confusion as with a mantle As with an outer garment — the mantle or robe — which they might wrap all round them. Let it be so abundant that they may entirely wrap their person in it. Let their confusion correspond with their sin in the fullest manner.

Psalm 109:30. I will greatly praise the LORD with my mouth I will sing abundant praises to him. Compare the notes at Isaiah 38:20.

Yea, I will praise him among the multitude In the great congregation. I will publicly acknowledge his goodness and mercy. See the notes at Psalm 22:25.

Psalm 109:31. For he shall stand at the right hand of the poor He will thus show that he befriends the poor and the helpless.

To save him from those that condemn his soul — Margin, “from the judges of his soul.” The Hebrew is, “from those that judge his soul.” The meaning is, from those that pronounce a harsh or unjust judgment; from those that condemn the innocent.

APPENDIX NOTES ON PSALM 109

This is the last of the imprecatory psalms. An abler or more satisfactory exposition of the principles involved in these than that presented by our author in his Introduction, can scarcely be desired (Psalm 25—40.) He expresses himself doubtful of the Messianic character of the psalm and the designed application of its maledictions (Psalm 109:8) to Judas. For a full examination of these points the reader is referred to Psalm 69, Appendix. The admission under Psalm 109:10 of wrong feelings on the part of David seems unnecessary even on the author’s own principles, and proceeds from misapprehension of the true character of the psalm. It is the utterance of a holy man and prophet in sympathy with the law and providence of God.

NOTES ON PSALM 110

This psalm is entitled “A Psalm of David.” It is also ascribed to David by the Saviour (<sup><4126></sup>Matthew 22:43); and by Peter (<sup><4123></sup>Acts 2:34); and there is no reason to doubt the correctness of the title. There is nothing, however, in the title, or in the psalm, to determine at what period of David’s life, or on what occasion it was written. Aben Ezra supposed that it was at the time referred to in <sup><41215></sup>2 Samuel 21:15-17; and others have selected other occasions in the life of David. But all this is conjecture. The psalm has no particular reference to anything in his history, and as it is wholly prophetic of the Messiah, it might have been composed at any period of his life.

The psalm is repeatedly quoted in the New Testament as referring to the Messiah, and in such a manner as to show that this was the customary interpretation among the Jews, or that it might be referred to by way of “proof” in regard to the Messiah, so that the relevancy and pertinence of the argument would be at once admitted. <sup><4124></sup>Matthew 22:44 (compare <sup><4126></sup>Mark 12:36; <sup><41210></sup>Luke 20:42); <sup><4123></sup>Acts 2:34; <sup><41216></sup>Hebrews 5:6; 7:17,21. The way in which it is quoted shows that this was the prevailing and received mode of interpreting the psalm.

Yet this belief has not been uniform. DeWette supposes that it refers to David himself. Jarchi supposed that it referred to Abraham; Borhek, to Solomon; Justin Martyr and Tertullian, to Hezekiah. See Rosenmuller.

The application of the psalm in the New Testament to the Messiah is so clear and unequivocal, that we are bound to defend the opinion that it was “designed” to refer to him; and the manner in which it is quoted shows that it was in no secondary sense, and in no way of “accommodation,” but that it had an original and exclusive applicability to him. Every principle of honesty in interpretation demands this. There may be difficulties in the interpretation itself, but the fact that it refers to the Messiah involves no difficulty, if it be once admitted that there is such a thing as prophecy at all, and that “any” portion of the Old Testament has reference to a Messiah. There is no part of the Old Testament that is more clearly applied to him in the New Testament than this psalm; there is no part that more naturally suggests the Messiah; there is none that is more difficult of explanation if it be maintained that it does not refer to him; there is none that is made more plain by referring it to him. It will be assumed, therefore, in this exposition, that the psalm had an original and exclusive reference to the Messiah, and that the friends of revelation are bound to show that in him who claimed to be the Messiah, and to whom it is applied in the New Testament — the Lord Jesus — there is a “fair” fulfillment of the predictions which are contained in it.

The idea in the psalm is that of the exaltation, the conquest, the priesthood, and the dominion of the Messiah. Two things — the kingship and the priesthood of the Messiah — are combined. The leading idea is that of the “priest-king” or the “king-priest,” as in the case of Melchizedek, in whom the two offices of priest and king were in a very unusual manner and form united in one person. Usually they were separate, even in the earliest ages of the world. In the case of Melehizedek they were “combined,” and hence, he was selected as a proper representative of the Messiah — of one who should combine these offices, apparently incongruous, in one.

The psalm embraces the following points:

I. The appointment of the Messiah — acknowledged by the author of the psalm as his “Lord” — to that high office, to be held until he should subdue all his enemies, <sup><9B0></sup>Psalm 110:1.

II. His being endowed with “power” needful for the accomplishment of the design for which he was appointed, <sup><9B0></sup>Psalm 110:2.

III. The assurance that his people would be made “willing” in the day when he should put forth his power, <sup><9B0></sup>Psalm 110:3.

IV. The special characteristic of his reign, as that of a “priest-king,” after the order of Melehizedek; combining the two functions of king and priest in his own person and office, <sup><9B0></sup>Psalm 110:4.

V. His conquest and triumph, <sup><9B0></sup>Psalm 110:5-7.

<sup><9B0></sup>Psalm 110:1. The LORD said unto my Lord In the Hebrew, “Spake Jehovah to my Lord.” The word <sup>h3068</sup>hwbyj is the incommunicable name of God. It is never given to a created being. The other word translated “Lord — <sup><h136></sup>wnda — means one who has rule or authority; one of high rank; one who has dominion; one who is the owner or possessor, etc. This word is applied frequently to a creature. It is applied to kings, princes, rulers, masters. The phrase “my Lord” refers to someone who was superior in rank to the author of the psalm; one whom he could address as his superior. The psalm, therefore, cannot refer to David himself, as if Yahweh had said to him, “Sit thou at my right hand.” Nor was there anyone on earth in the time of David to whom it could be applicable; anyone whom he would call his “Lord” or superior. If, therefore, the psalm was written by David, it must have reference to the Messiah — to one whom he owned as his superior — his Lord — his Sovereign. It cannot refer to God as if he were to have this rule over David, since God himself is referred to as “speaking” to him whom David called his Lord: “Jehovah said unto my Lord.” The reasoning of the Saviour, therefore, in <sup><123></sup>Matthew 22:43-45, was founded on a fair and just interpretation of the psalm, and was so plain and conclusive that the Pharisees did not attempt to reply to it.

Until I make thine enemies thy footstool Until they are entirely subdued under time. See the notes at 22:44. The enemies here referred to are the enemies of the Messiah considered as King (see Psalm 2); and the promise here is, that “he must reign until he shall have put all enemies under his feet.” See the notes at <sup><155></sup>1 Corinthians 15:25.

<sup><102></sup>Psalm 110:2. The LORD shall send the rod of thy strength out of Zion The scepter of thy power; that with which thou shalt rule. It will be given to thee by Yahweh; and it will be given to thee, as it were, “out of Zion;” that is, as proceeding from the church, and as derived from that. It will be an appointment connected with the church, and will be “as if” the church had conferred it on thee. The idea is, that the Messiah would receive, as it were, his designation, authority, commission, power from the church. He would spring from it (<sup><210></sup>Isaiah 11:1); would act for it; would do what was needful for its good; would wield the power which properly belongs to the church on the earth. Compare the notes at ~~400~~Psalm 2:9.

Rule thou in the midst of thine enemies Set up thy power over them, and reign in them. This is a commission to set up a kingdom “in the very midst” of those who were his enemies; in the hearts of those who had been and were rebellious. His kingdom is set up not by destroying them, but by “subduing” them so that they become his willing servants. They yield to him, and he rules over them. It is not here a commission to cut them off, but one much more difficult of execution — to make them his friends, and to dispose them to submit to his authority. Mere “power” may crush people; it requires more than that to make rebels willingly submissive, and to dispose them voluntarily to obey.

~~400~~Psalm 110:3. Thy people All who are given to thee; all over whom thou art to rule. This verse has been variously translated. The Septuagint renders it, “With thee is the beginning in the day of thy power, in the splendor of thy saints, from the womb, before the light of the morning have I begotten thee.” So the Latin Vulgate. Luther renders it, “After thy victory shall thy people willingly bring an offering to thee, in holy adorning: thy children shall be born to thee as the dew of the morning.” DeWette, “Willingly shall thy people show themselves to thee on the day of the assembling of thy host in holy adorning, as from the womb of the morning, thy youth (vigor) shall be as the dew.” Prof. Alexander, “Thy people (are) free-will offerings in the day of thy power, in holy decorations, from the womb of the dawn, to thee (is) the dew of thy youth.” Every clause of the verse is obscure, though the “general” idea is not difficult to perceive; that, in the day of Messiah’s power, his people would willingly offer themselves to him, in holy robes or adorning, like the glittering dew of the morning; or, in numbers that might be compared with the drops of the morning dew. The essential ideas are:

- (1) that he would have a “people;”
- (2) that their subjection to him would be a “willing” subjection;
- (3) that this would be accomplished by his “power;”
- (4) that they would appear before him in great beauty — in robes of holy adorning;
- (5) that they would in some way resemble the dew of the morning; and

(6) that to him in thus subduing them there would be the vigor of youth, the ardor of youthful hope.

Shall be willing literally, “Thy people (are, or shall be) willing-offerings.” The word rendered “willing” — hbdn<sup>7h5071</sup> — is in the plural number; “thy people, ‘willingnesses.’“ The singular — hbdn<sup>7h5071</sup> — means voluntariness, spontaneousness: and hence, it comes to mean spontaneously, voluntarily, of a willing mind. It is rendered a “willing offering,” in <sup><1232></sup>Exodus 35:29; “free offering,” in <sup><1238></sup>Exodus 36:3; “voluntary offering,” in <sup><1876></sup>Leviticus 7:16; “free-will offering,” in <sup><1828></sup>Leviticus 22:18,21,23; 23:38; <sup><0453></sup>Numbers 15:3; 29:39; <sup><5126></sup>Deuteronomy 12:6,17; 16:10; 23:23; <sup><4314></sup>2 Chronicles 31:14; <sup><1504></sup>Ezra 1:4; 3: Ezra 5; 8:28; <sup><1908></sup>Psalms 119:108; “willingly,” in <sup><1438></sup>2 Chronicles 35:8; “plentiful,” in <sup><1981></sup>Psalms 68:9; “voluntary, and voluntarily,” in <sup><3612></sup>Ezekiel 46:12; “freely,” in <sup><2144></sup>Hosea 14:4; and “free-offering,” in <sup><1015></sup>Amos 4:5. It does not occur elsewhere. The idea is that of “freeness;” of voluntariness; of doing it from choice, doing it of their own will. They did it in the exercise of freedom. There was no compulsion; no constraint. Whatever “power” there was in the case, was to make them “willing,” not to compel them to do a thing “against” their will. That which was done, or that which is here intended to be described as having been done, is evidently the act of devoting themselves to him who is here designated as their Ruler — the Messiah. The allusion may be either

(a) to their devoting themselves to “him” in conversion, or becoming his;

(b) to their devoting themselves to his “service” — as soldiers do in war; or

(c) to their devoting their time, wealth, talents, to him in lives consecrated to him.

“Whatever” there is as the result of his dominion over them is “voluntary” on their part. There is no compulsion in his religion. People are not constrained to do what they are unwilling to do. All the power that is exerted is on the will, disposing people to do what is right, and what is for their own interest. No man is forced to go to heaven against his will; no man is saved from hell against his will; no man makes a sacrifice in religion against his will; no man is compelled to serve the Redeemer in any way against his will. The acts of religion are among the most free that people ever perform; and of all the hosts of the redeemed no one will ever say that the act of his becoming a follower of the Redeemer was not perfectly voluntary. He chose — he “professed” — to be a friend of God, and he never saw the time when he regretted the choice.

In the day of thy power The power given to the Messiah to accomplish the work of his mission; the power to convert people, and to save the world. <sup><1298></sup>Matthew 28:18; 11:27; <sup><870></sup>John 17:2. This implies

(a) that “power” would be employed in bringing people to submit to him; and

(b) that there would be a fixed time when that power would be put forth.

Still, it is power which is not inconsistent with freedom. It is power exerted in making people “willing,” not in “compelling or forcing” them to submit to him. There “is” a power which may be exerted over the will consistent with liberty, and that is the power which the Messiah employs in bringing people to himself.

In the beauties of holiness This power will be connected with the beauty of holiness; or, holiness will be manifested when that power is put forth. The object is to “secure” holiness; and there will be beauty in that holiness. The only power put forth in the case is to make people holy; and they will, in their lives and conduct, manifest all the beauty or attractiveness which there is in a holy and pure character. The word rendered “beauty” is in the plural number, and the allusion may be to the raiment of those who are referred to. They would appear in pure garments — in sacerdotal vestments — as priests of God. Compare <sup><8104></sup>Leviticus 16:4. The idea may be that they would be a “kingdom of priests,” clad in priestly vestments (<sup><1295></sup>Exodus 19:6; compare the notes at <sup><1115></sup>1 Peter 2:5,9), and that they would be adorned with “robes” appropriate to that office. This may refer, however, to their actual, internal holiness, and may mean that they would, when they were subjugated to him, appear as a holy or a righteous people.

From the womb of the morning: thou hast the dew of thy youth Margin, more than the womb of the morning, thou shalt have, etc.” The expression here is evidently designed to refer to the source of the dew — the dew of the early dawn — as having its “birth” then, or as seeming to be “born” then. The morn is represented as the “mother” of the dew. The figure is highly poetic and beautiful. The ground of the comparison may be either

(a) that the “beauty of holiness” — the beautiful array of the saints — “is more than” that produced in the womb of the morning; or

(b) that the dew of youth is more beautiful than the dew produced in the morning. As the word “dew,” that on which the comparison must turn, occurs in the last member of the sentence, it is probable that the second of these interpretations is the true one, as indicated in the margin: “More than the womb of the morning (more than the morning produces) thou hast the dew of thy youth.” That is, “as the young morning — the youth of the day — has its beauties in the abundance and luster of the dew-drops, so shall the dew of thy youth be — the beginning of thy glorious day.” May there not be here also an allusion to the multitudes that would be among his “people” — numerous as the dewdrops of the morning, and as beautiful as they — on his going forth to the world with all the beauty of a bright dawn?

The meaning of the whole, I apprehend, is, “Thy reign shall be like the day — a long bright day. Thy coming — the morning of that day — shall be like the early dawn — so fresh, so beautiful, made so lovely by the drops of dew sparkling on every blade of grass. More beautiful by far — more lovely — shall be the beginning of the day of thy reign; — more lovely to the world thy youth — thy appearing — the beginning of thy day.” Thus understood, the verse is a most beautiful poetic description of the bright morning when the Messiah should come; the dawn of that glorious day when he should reign. Compare <sup><200></sup>Isaiah 9:1-3.

<sup><300></sup>Psalm 110:4. The LORD hath sworn He has confirmed the appointment of the Messiah by a solemn oath, or as by an oath. That is, It is as sure and fixed as if he had taken an oath. Compare <sup><300></sup>Hebrews 6:13. The “time,” so to speak, if the word time can be applied to transactions in a past eternity, was that when he was designated in the divine purpose as Messiah; in the eternal counsels of God. Compare <sup><300></sup>Psalm 2:7.

And will not repent Will not change his purpose.

Thou art a priest forever after the order of Melchizedek The word rendered “order” here means properly a word, a thing, a matter; hence, a way or manner. The meaning here is, that he would be a priest “after the manner” of Melchizedek; or, such a priest as he was. He would not be of the tribe of Levi; he would not be in the regular line of the priesthood, but he would resemble, in the characteristics of his office, this ancient priest-king, combining in himself the two functions of priest and king; as a priest, standing alone; not deriving his authority from any line of predecessors; and having no successors. See this verse explained at length, in its application to the Messiah, in the notes at <sup><886></sup>Hebrews 5:6,10; 7:1-3. The passage as it stands here, and as looked at without any reference to the use made of it in the New Testament, would imply these things:

- (1) That he who was spoken of would be, in a proper sense, a priest.
- (2) That he would have a perpetual or permanent priesthood — “forever.”
- (3) That he would not be of the established line of priests in the tribe of Levi, but that his appointment would be unusual and extraordinary.
- (4) That the appointment would come directly from God, and would not be “derived” from those who went before him.
- (5) That as a priest he would “resemble” Melchizedek, according to the record which was found of Melchizedek in Genesis.
- (6) That as Melchizedek was a priest of the Most High God, so he would be.
- (7) That as Melchizedek combined in himself the functions of both priest and king, so these would be found in him.
- (8) That as Melchizedek had no successors in office, so he would have none.

How far these things were applicable to the Lord Jesus Christ, and with what propriety the passage might be applied to him, may be seen by examining the Epistle to the Hebrews, Hebrews 5—7.

Shall strike through kings The Hebrew word here rendered “shall strike,” — from xj ec <sup>h4272</sup> — means “to shake, to agitate”; and then, “to shake in pieces, to dash in pieces, to crush”; and here it has the sense of dashing in pieces, smiting, wounding, crushing. The “kings” referred to are the enemies of God and the Messiah, and the idea is that all would be subdued before him; that he would set up a universal dominion; that none would be able to stand before him; or, that he would reign over all the earth. The

In the day of his wrath <sup><41112></sup>Psalm 2:12.

<sup><41106></sup>Psalm 110:6. He shall judge among the heathen Among the “nations.” That is, he shall set up a kingdom, or shall rule over the nations of the earth. He shall come to execute judgment and justice, and shall apportion to people what is due to them. See the notes at <sup><21103></sup>Isaiah 11:3-5.

He shall fill the places with the dead bodies He shall make a great slaughter — indicative of conquest, and of the subjugation of the world to himself. It would be “as if” the bodies of the slain in battle strewed the ground, or filled the valleys of the earth.

He shall wound the heads The same word is used here that occurs in the previous verse, and that is there rendered “shall strike.” It is the language of “conquest,” as if the world was to be subdued to himself by war.

Over many countries Margin, “great.” Over vast and extensive regions, carrying his conquests into distant lands. This will be fulfilled only when all the earth shall be subject to the reign of the Messiah. <sup><41124></sup>1 Corinthians 15:24-28.

<sup><41107></sup>Psalm 110:7. He shall drink of the brook in the way The design here seems to be to represent the Messiah as a victorious king and conqueror pursuing his enemies. In the previous verse the psalmist had represented him under the image of one engaged in battle, and slaying his enemies with a great slaughter. He here represents him as pursuing those who should escape from the battle, and as pursuing them without fainting or exhaustion. He is like one who finds abundant springs and streams of water in his journeyings; who refreshes himself at those fountains and streams; who, therefore, is not faint and weary. He pursues his foes vigorously and with success.

Therefore shall he lift up the head Therefore shall he triumph, or be successful. The head falls when we are faint and exhausted, when we are disappointed and are ashamed, when we are conscious of guilt. It is lifted up in conscious rectitude, in success and triumph, in the exuberance of hope. The idea here is, that the Messiah would be triumphant. He would achieve the victory over all his foes; he would pursue, without exhaustion, his flying enemies, and he would return from the conquest joyous, exulting, triumphant. All this is under the image of a victorious hero; all this will be accomplished in the conquest of the world by the Gospel; in the subduing of the foes of God; in the final scene when the Redeemer shall deliver up the kingdom to God. ~~1~~ 1 Corinthians 15:24-28.

APPENDIX NOTES ON PSALM 110

The Messianic interpretation is the only one that yields a tolerable sense. Several alternatives have been proposed. For example, Herder and Ewald affirm that David himself is the prince to whom the psalm refers; that (like Psalm 21) it is a prayer for the king, in which the people speak of him as their Lord, whose throne was exalted at the right hand of the Lord's throne in Sion, and whom God had invested with such honor in connection with his house, that he might be said to be a priest like Melchizedek, the ancient king of Salem. The theory can be dressed so as to wear a plausible air. But it will not bear examination. For

- (1) the psalm is in the title attributed to David's pen, and there is not a tittle of evidence pointing to any other writer. Would he have written of himself as "My Lord?"
- (2) The king is invited to sit at the right hand of Yahweh: a manner of speech nowhere else in Scripture used with reference to an earthly king. The Jewish kings sat "on the throne of Jehovah," as his representatives or vicegerents: not "at his right hand," as his fellows.
- (3) The people are represented as following the king in sacred attire, the beauty of holiness; that is to say, in holy sacerdotal vestments as an army of priests: a thing of which we find no trace in the history of David or any of the kings. It is Christ alone of whom we ever read that his "armies followed him, clothed in short linen, white and clean" when he went in righteousness to make war.
- (4) The king is, by the oath of God, constituted a priest, "a priest forever after the order of Melchizedek." One would think this at least cannot apply to David. But the exigencies of the Rationalistic theory are great, and a bold attempt must be made. Ewald, girding up the loins of his ingenuity, sets himself to show that in David's reign there was a remarkable conjunction of the royal and sacerdotal functions. How he goes to work may be gathered from the picture of David's administration that has been recently sketched by the elegant pencil of the Dean of Westminster. Thus it is gravely related of the king, as if it were matter of ascertained fact, that “though not himself a priest, he yet assumed almost all the functions usually ascribed to the priestly office. He wore the priestly dress, offered the sacrifices, gave the priestly benedictions, Walked round about the altar in sacred processions.”

But all this is asserted without a shadow of warrant from the sacred narrative. No doubt David is related to have “offered burnt-offerings and peaceofferings” at the bringing up of the ark; but that he did so with his own hand is no more likely than that Solomon, on a yet more solemn occasion, offered with his own hand the twenty thousand oxen and the hundred and twenty thousand sheep which he is related to have offered at the dedication of the house. David doubtless sings in Psalm 26 of “compassing God’s altar;” but that is no more to be taken literally than the prayer in Psalm 27, that he might “dwell in the house of the Lord all the days of his life.” As for the allegation that he wore the priestly dress, it is enough to say that the ephod in which he arrayed himself at the bringing up of the ark was not the priestly robe so named; this was made of byssus (fine linen), whereas the king’s was of ordinary linen — a festal robe, no doubt, but not special to the priesthood. This is not all. Let it be supposed, for the moment, that all these fancies about David’s intromissions with the functions of the priesthood had been matters of fact; let it be supposed that this man after God’s own heart was accustomed to officiate often in rites which the law of Moses had so sacredly appropriated to the sons of Aaron, that Saul, for venturing to officiate in them on one solitary and pressing occasion, was rejected, he and his house, from reigning over Israel; let it be supposed that he performed habitually, with high commendation, sacred offices like that for which Uzziah, when he attempted to perform it but once, was sharply reproved and smitten on the spot with leprosy — would all this have sufficed to vindicate the application to David of the oracle in the psalm? Such conduct might, perhaps, have warranted the application of the priestly title; certainly it could not have warranted the lofty and emphatic declaration: “Jehovah hath sworn, and will not repent, Thou art a priest forever after the order of Melchizedek.” The allegations so boldly made, if they had been true, would have amounted merely to this, that David exercised such priestly functions as belonged to all princes and heads of families under the patriarchal dispensation, before the law restricted the priesthood to Aaron and his sons — that he was a priest in the sense in which Abraham and Jacob were priests. But how far is this from answering to the grandeur of the oracle! The king here addressed is constituted a priest after the order of Melchizedek, to whom Abraham, the patriarchal priest, paid tithes in token of homage, and from whom he was content to receive a benediction; and the priesthood is confirmed by the irrevocable oath of Yahweh, and declared to be a perpetual priesthood. It shows how hard men are pressed by the exigencies of their theory when they can plead for the application to David of a declaration so far-reaching and magnificent.

After all, it is no wonder the Rationalistic interpreters fight hard for the identification of David with the priest after the order of Melchizedek — the throned priest of Zion, for incredible as this is, it is less so than any other of the non-Messianic interpretations; than that of Hupfeld, who suggests (not without a misgiving) that the psalm celebrates the dynasty of David rather than any individual king; and than that of some others who fancy they see in it a reference to the martial exploits of the priesthood in the age of the Maccabees. Besides these, I do not know that there is any other theory worth notice, unless it be the wild notion of DeWette, that the psalm comes from the pen of some prophet who chose in this way to express his approval of king Uzziah's presumptuous invasion of the priestly functions! It is to shifts like these that learned and able people are driven when they abandon the natural and obvious sense of this great Messianic psalm. — Binnie.

The reader will admire the following accurate and spirited paraphrase from Perowne:

“Thus saith Jehovah — it is his revelation that I hear, it is his word addressed to one who, though he be my son, is yet my lord — ‘I give thee honor and dignity equal to my own, I associate thee with myself in kingly rule and dominion, until I have subdued every enemy who shall dare to lift himself up against thee.’”

Then turning to the king who has thus been solemnly placed on the throne of Yahweh, and who rules as his vicegerent in Zion, the psalmist says,

“From Zion, thy royal seat, shall Jehovah himself, on whose throne thou sittest, stretch out the scepter of thy dominion. So close shall be the fellowship between him and thee. Thou shalt sit on his throne, he shall wield thy scepter, his might shall be thy might, his kingdom shall be thy kingdom, and thou shalt not only subdue thine enemies, but before they are yet vanquished thou shalt rule in the midst of them. When thou goest forth to war, thine own people shall flock with glad and wiring hearts to thy standard. They shall come clad, not in armor, but in holy vestments as ministering priests, for thou hast consecrated them to be thy priestly soldiers. They shall come a youthful host, in numbers numberless as the dews, bright and fresh as the dew from the womb of the morning.

“Yet another solemn word concerning thee have I heard. It is a word confirmed by an oath, the oath of the Most High which cannot be broken. By that oath he hath made thee priest as well as King; King thou art, priest thou shalt be henceforth. Priest not after the law of a carnal commandment, or by descent through the Levitical priesthood, but after the order of Melchizedek, priest therefore not of the Jew only, but of the Gentile also — priest not for a time, but forever.”

Then, looking on the leader, the host, the conflict, the poet exclaims, “The Lord, the God of hosts who is with thee, O king, who is at thy right hand to succor and give thee the victory in the battle, hath already crushed the rival monarchs that dispute thy sway. Thou shalt be a judge and ruler among the nations whom he has given thee as thine inheritance. The vast battlefield is strewn with the corpses of thy foes. Far and wide hast thou extended thy conquests, vanquishing one leader after another; and thou shalt reap the fruit of thy victories like a warrior who, pressing hotly on the rear of his enemies as they flee before him, scarcely pauses for a moment to snatch a hasty draught from the wayside brook, and then with renewed ardor, with head erect and kindling eye, continues the pursuit. Thus shall victory be crowned and not a foe remain.”

~~1810~~ Psalm 110:3. From the womb of the morning thou hast the dew of thy youth Thy “youth-like soldiery are as dew for beauty” (Hengstenberg); some say also in perpetual succession; and we must add, for number too. But is there not this other idea — they come suddenly as the dew appears, seen all at once under the light of the new risen Sun of Righteousness? And may we not adopt yet another from Hengstenberg, “All begotten from above” — as ~~1838~~ Job 38:28 might lead us to remember. The meter version of Tate and Brady has thus expressed some of these views:

*“Shall all (redeemed from error’s night)
Appear as numberless and bright
As crystal drops of morning dew.” — A. A. Bonar*

Psalm 110:7. He shall drink of the brook in the way; therefore shall he lift up the head Not a few interpreters expound this verse in a very harsh manner: that the carnage would be so great as to cause the blood of the slain to flow in torrents, out of which Christ, the Conqueror, might drink until he was satiated. Akin to this is the exposition of those who would have it to be a figurative representation of misery and grief, and thus descriptive of the many afflictions to which Christ was liable during this transitory life. The similitude seems rather to be drawn from the conduct of brave and powerful generals, who, when in hot pursuit of the enemy, do not suffer themselves to be diverted from their purpose by attending to luxuries; but without kneeling down are content to quench their thirst by drinking of the stream which they are passing. It was in this way that Gideon found out the brave and warlike soldiers; regarding such as kneeled down to drink as destitute of courage, he sent them back to their homes. It therefore appears to me that David figuratively attributes military prowess to Christ, declaring that he would not take time to refresh himself, but would hastily drink of the river which might come in his way. This is designed to strike his enemies with terror, intimating to them the rapid approach of impending destruction. Should anyone be disposed to ask, Where, then, is that spirit of meekness and gentleness with which the Scripture elsewhere informs us he shall be endued? Isaiah 42:2,3; 61:1,2; I answer that as a shepherd is gentle toward his flock, but fierce and formidable toward wolves and thieves; in like manner Christ is kind and gentle toward those who commit themselves to his care, while they who willfully and obstinately reject his yoke, shall feel with what awful and terrible power he is armed. In Psalm 2:9 we saw that he had in his hand an iron scepter, by which he will beat down all the obduracy of his enemies; and, accordingly, he is here said to assume the aspect of cruelty, with the view of taking vengeance upon them. Wherefore it becomes us carefully to refrain from provoking his wrath against us, by a stiff-necked and rebellious spirit, when he is tenderly and sweetly inviting us to come to him. — Calvin.

NOTES ON PSALM 111

The author of this psalm is unknown, as is the occasion on which it was composed. It is one of the psalms, of which there are in all ten in number, that commence with the phrase “Hallelu-jah” in the Hebrew; in our version rendered, “Praise ye the Lord.” Those psalms are Psalm 106; Psalm 111; Psalm 112; Psalm 113; Psalm 135; Psalm 146; Psalm 147; Psalm 148; Psalm 149; and Psalm 150: The use of this phrase shows that the psalms where it is found were designed for public worship. It is probable that this was one of the later psalms — a fact that might be indicated by the very use of this phrase “Hallelujah.” Venema supposes that it was composed in the time of the Maccabees, but of this there is no evidence.

This is one of the alphabetical psalms. In that class of psalms there is considerable variety. In some a letter of the Hebrew alphabet commences each verse in the psalm; in others, the successive letters of the alphabet begin each two or three verses in succession, or, as in Psalm 119; eight verses in succession; in others, the successive letters of the alphabet are used in the beginning of separate clauses of the “verses” of a psalm.

The peculiarity of this psalm is that the first eight verses of the psalm contain “two” clauses, beginning with the letters of the alphabet taken in their order; the last two verses, “three”. Why this arrangement was adopted, it is impossible now to determine — as it is in regard to “many” things which are thought to be beauties in poetry. There is very much in the measure, the rhythm, the rhyme, of modern poetry, that is quite as artificial, and quite as inexplicable, as this.

The psalm is call to the praise of God on account of his “works,” and is designed to suggest grounds of confidence in him as drawn “from” those works. It is, therefore, of universal applicability; and may be used in any nation, at any time, and among any people. It is a psalm which may be translated into all the languages of the world, and whatever language people may speak, it would express in their own tongue what they have occasion to give thanks for in the various lands where they dwell.

~~EB101~~ Psalm 111:1. Praise ye the LORD Margin, “Hallelujah.” See

~~EB101~~ Psalm 106:1.

I will praise the LORD with my whole heart With undivided affections; holding back nothing. I will allow nothing to be in my heart that would interfere with the fullness of praise; no coldness or dividedness of affection; no love for other things that would deaden my love for God; no suspicion respecting him that would chill my ardor; no unbelief that would drag me down to earth, while the language of my lips ascended to God. See the notes at <sup><1862></sup>Psalm 86:12.

In the assembly of the upright With the righteous when they are gathered together for public worship.

And in the congregation See <sup><1877></sup>Psalm 22:22,25; 66:13; 89:5.

<sup><1882></sup>Psalm 111:2. The works of the LORD are great They are great in number; great in magnitude; great in wisdom; great in goodness. This language was appropriate in the time of the psalmist, when people looked upon the heavens with the naked eye alone, and when they had very imperfect views of the real magnitude of the universe as it is now disclosed by the telescope. It is entirely appropriate now, and conveys a more solemn and sublime impression than it would in the time of the psalmist. It will still be appropriate under the larger views which may yet be obtained of the universe by more perfect instruments, by more accurate observation, and by more profound study. And it will be appropriate when people shall survey the greatness of the universe from the heights of heaven.

Sought out of all them Studied by all such.

That have pleasure therein More literally, “Sought to all their wishes.” Perhaps the meaning is, that they would find all their desires gratified in those works; they would find in them all that they would wish to find respecting the power, wisdom, goodness, and majesty of God. Still it implies that they have a desire thus to study his works, or that they do find a pleasure in examining the proofs of the being and attributes of God in his works. A man who loves God will have real pleasure in studying his works as well as his word; and it is as proper to find pleasure in the one as in the other — as proper to wish to find the knowledge which the one imparts as that which the other bestows. One great error among the friends of God is the neglect to study his works. In doing this, people need not neglect or undervalue the Bible and the knowledge which it gives, for such studies would be among the best means of illustrating the Bible.

Psalm 111:3. His work is honorable and glorious literally, “Honour and glory is his work;” that is, All that he does is honorable and glorious. The language would cover all that God does in the works of creation, providence, and redemption. There is honor — there is majesty — in “everything” that he does.

And his righteousness endureth for ever That is, It will be found in all the investigations of his works, that he is unchangeably righteous or just. All that he has done, or that he now does, goes to demonstrate this. There are doings of people — even of good people — which will not bear investigation; but there are no such acts of God. There are things that people do which excite admiration only when there is no investigation in regard to them; but the works of God are admired the more, the more they are studied. There are things which appear beautiful, or appear sweet only when they are not shaken; a collection of perfumes will give out sweets the more it is stirred.

Psalm 111:4. He hath made his wonderful works In heaven and in earth.

To be remembered literally, “Memory hath he made for his wonderful works.” “They” are so made, that man may remember them; the memory of man, also, is so made, that it may retain them. The highest and most appropriate exercise of memory is to retain the lessons which the works of God inculcate; to treasure up for gratitude and for use what he teaches his intelligent creation through those works. Memory can never be better employed than in treasuring up the truths which the Creator teaches in his providential dealings with us, and in his word. How much better would it be for man if he labored more to “remember” these things; if he sought to forget many of those things which he is so careful now to retain in his recollection.

The LORD is gracious ... See the notes at Psalm 86:5. This is stated here as the result of the careful study of the doings of God; as the conclusion to which all will come who carefully study his works. “Illustrations” of what God has done that deserves to be remembered occupy the remainder of the psalm, except the last verse.

Psalm 111:5. He hath given meat unto them that fear him Margin, “prey.” The idea is, that he has supplied their needs. The Hebrew word is, “prey,” and the allusion is to the mode in which the needs of the beasts of the field are supplied. The meaning may be that they had obtained this from their enemies, as beasts of prey take their food by making war; or the word may be used in a general sense, as meaning that God had supplied their needs.

He will ever be mindful of his covenant He will never leave or forsake his people; he will be faithful to all the promises that he has made to them.

Psalm 111:6. He hath showed his people The Jewish people. He has made this known to them. The reference here is not to his “announcing” it, or stating it, but to his acts of interposition in their behalf in which he had manifested the greatness of his power.

The power of his works The power of his acts; the power involved in what he does. The power referred to here was that which was evinced in destroying the Egyptians, and in subduing the nations of Canaan.

That he may give them the heritage of the heathen The nations; to wit, the nations of Palestine. The word “heritage” is often used in the large sense of possessions; and the meaning here is, that God had shown the greatness of his power by giving all that they possessed into the hands of his people.

Psalm 111:7. The works of his hands All that he does in the works of creation and providence; all in his acts toward the children of men.

Are verity Truth. That is, They tend to establish and confirm the truth; they are done in the cause or the defense of truth. Truth in any case may be ascertained by what God “does,” for all that he defends and protects is “truth,” and his acts, therefore, may be regarded as an expression of what is true and right.

And judgment In the cause of justice; or, in maintaining the principles of right. God never does anything to vindicate wrong. None of his acts can be fairly interpreted as having been done to sustain injustice, fraud, deceit, ambition, oppression, murder, or licentiousness. That he suffers free agents to do these things without interference is no evidence that he approves of them. That he “disapproves” of them is shown

(a) by his declarations;

(b) by his threatenings;

(c) by all that he does to punish the wicked here.

All his commandments are sure His statutes; his ordinances. They are sure; that is, they are to be relied on; or, are worthy of confidence.

Psalm 111:8. They stand fast forever and ever Margin, “established.” The Hebrew word means “sustained, supported.” They will not fail or fall. Whatever else may be shaken, his law, his word, and the principles of his administration, will not fail. See the notes at Matthew 5:18. Compare Luke 16:17; Matthew 24:35. The great principles of truth and righteousness will stand, and whatever is founded on those principles will endure forever.

And are done in truth and uprightness Are based on truth, or on a just view of things; they are done in such a way that truth will be maintained and promoted. The word “uprightness” here means that all this is done on the principles of equity — of what “ought” to be done, or what is “best” to be done. Compare Psalm 19:9.

Psalm 111:9. He sent redemption unto his people In their deliverance from Egypt. He has now sent it in a higher sense under the great Deliverer, the Saviour.

He hath commanded his covenant for ever He has ordained or appointed it. The covenant is here represented as if it were obedient to the will of God, or under his control. The covenant refers to his arrangements with his people; his assurances of favor, with the terms on which that favor will be shown.

Holy and reverend is his name Holy and to be venerated; literally, “to be feared.” That is, he has shown in all this that he is holy, and that he is a Being who is to be had in reverence.

Psalm 111:10. The fear of the LORD Reverence for God; respect for his law, his will, his government, himself; the fear of offending him, which will lead us to do right. This fear is not that of a slave; it is not mere dread; it is not terror. It is consistent with love, and springs from it. It is consistent with calmness of mind, and promotes it. It does not produce terror, but rather delivers from it, and preserves the mind from alarms. The word here rendered “fear” is a noun of the same origin as the word rendered “reverend” in the previous verse. The suggestion to the mind of the psalmist that the “name of the Lord” was “reverend,” or was to be venerated, introduced this thought that such reverence is the very foundation of wisdom.

Is the beginning of wisdom The foundation, the origin, the commencement of being truly wise. It is so. There is no true wisdom which does not recognize the being, the perfections, and the claims of God. The highest wisdom — the most lofty endowment of man — is that he “may” know and honor God. This, in capability, makes him wise above the brute creation; this, in exercise, makes one man more wise than another; this, when it springs up in the soul, makes a man more wise than he was before — or, is the “beginning” of true wisdom in the soul. Compare <sup><31007></sup>Proverbs 1:7; 9:10; <sup><6906></sup>Deuteronomy 4:6; <sup><8333></sup>Job 28:28; <sup><2123></sup>Ecclesiastes 12:13.

A good understanding ... Margin, “good success.” The original word — יָדָע, <sup><17922></sup> — is rendered “understanding” (as here) in <sup><9278></sup>1 Samuel 25:3; <sup><8388></sup>Ezra 8:18; <sup><8174></sup>Job 17:4; <sup><3104></sup>Proverbs 3:4; 13:15; 16:22; “wisdom” in <sup><3722></sup>1 Chronicles 22:12; <sup><3128></sup>Proverbs 12:8; 23:9; “prudence,” <sup><4722></sup>2 Chronicles 2:12; <sup><3891></sup>Proverbs 19:11 (margin); “sense,” in <sup><3688></sup>Nehemiah 8:8; “knowledge,” <sup><4822></sup>2 Chronicles 30:22; and “policy” in <sup><7825></sup>Daniel 8:25. It “may” denote, therefore, understanding, wisdom, knowledge, success, prudence; and it is true in regard to “all” of these — for the fear of the Lord, or true religion, produces them “all.” It is not necessary, therefore, to endeavor to ascertain precisely which of these is the meaning here.

That do his commandments Margin, as in the Hebrew, “do them.” That do the things connected with the fear of the Lord; that is, who obey God.

His praise endureth for ever That is, the foundation for his praise endures to all eternity; or, is unchangeable. As God is always the same, so there is, as derived from his being and perfections, always the same foundation for praise. As there will always be created beings who can and will appreciate this, so it will be literally true, as it should be, that his praise “will” be celebrated forever.

General Note on Psalm 111 and Psalm 112

Acrostic Psalms. See the Appendix on Psalm 25. The only feasible method (of exhibiting the structure of these psalms to an English reader) is to omit from our alphabet the four letters that are of least frequent use, and make the 22 characters that remain stand for the 22 consonants of the Hebrew. Thus:

PSALM 111Hallelujah!*

1. A-dore will I Jehovah with all my heart: B-oth in the meeting of the upright and in the congregation.
2. C-onfessedly great are the deeds of Jehovah: D-elighters in them search them out.
3. E-xcellent for honor and majesty is his work: F-or evermore doth his righteousness endure.
4. G-racious and compassionate is Jehovah: H-is wonderful works hath he made to be remembered.
5. J-ehovah hath given food to them that fear him: K-ept his covenant forever.
6. L-oudly hath he declared to his people the might of his deeds: M-aking them to inherit the heathen.
7. N-otable for truth and judgment are the deeds of his hand: O-n all his commandments men may trust.
8. P-lanted firmly are they forever and ever: Q-uestionless is their truth and uprightness.
9. R-edemption hath he sent to his people: S-tablished forever his covenant: T-errible and holy is his name.
10. U-nderstanding pertaineth to all who obey the commandments: W-isdom's beginning is the fear of Jehovah: Y-ears without end shall his praise endure. — Binnie

NOTES ON PSALM 112

The author of this psalm, as of the preceding, is unknown, and equally with that it is impossible now to ascertain the time or the occasion of its composition. It is a psalm of the same structure as that, with the same number of verses; like that, it is alphabetical in its form, and composed in the same manner — the first eight verses with two clauses each, beginning with successive letters of the Hebrew alphabet — and the last two verses with “three” clauses, beginning, in like manner, with three letters of the alphabet in succession. This peculiarity of structure makes it highly probable that it was composed by the same author.

It is further to be noticed that this psalm “begins” where the other “ends,” with the happiness or blessedness of “fearing God,” and is designed to set forth that blessedness, or to show what are the advantages of true religion. This fact makes it further probable that the two psalms were composed by the same author.

This psalm is very simple in its structure. It sets forth the advantages or benefits of the fear of the Lord, or of religion in respect

- (a) to the posterity of the man, <sup><HEB></sup>Psalm 112:2;
- (b) in securing wealth, <sup><HEB></sup>Psalm 112:3;
- (c) in the light which springs up in darkness, <sup><HEB></sup>Psalm 112:4;
- (d) in the discretion with which such a man is enabled to manage his affairs, <sup><HEB></sup>Psalm 112:5;
- (e) in the firmness and composure of his mind in times of danger and trouble, <sup><HEB></sup>Psalm 112:6-8;
- (f) in his being so prosperous, and so exalted, that he will become an object of envy to the wicked, <sup><HEB></sup>Psalm 112:9,10.

Blessed is the man Hebrew, “The blessings of the man.” See the notes at <sup><HEB></sup>Psalm 1:1. That is, Blessed, or happy, is such a one.

That feareth the LORD In <sup><3810></sup>Psalm 111:10, the psalmist had referred to “the fear of the Lord” as “the beginning of wisdom,” and had “alluded” to the success, prosperity, or happiness which attends the fear of the Lord, or true religion. This psalm is designed more fully “to illustrate” that thought.

That delighteth greatly in his commandments See the notes at <sup><3900></sup>Psalm 1:2. It is a characteristic of true piety to find pleasure in the commands of God; in the commandments themselves, and in obedience to them.

<sup><402></sup>Psalm 112:2. His seed shall be mighty upon earth His children; his posterity. That is, they shall be prospered; honored; distinguished among people: distinguished for their virtues, for their influence, for their success in life. This refers to what was regarded among the Hebrews as an object of great desire, and is in accordance with the promises everywhere found in their Scriptures. See the notes at <sup><40253></sup>Psalm 25:13; 37:25,26. Compare <sup><4112></sup>Genesis 12:2; 17:6; <sup><4206></sup>Exodus 20:6. It is in accordance, also, with a general fact in the course of events. The best security for the virtue and success of children is the virtue and the piety of parents; the surest inheritance as pertaining to happiness, respectability, and usefulness in life, is that which is derived from the example, the prayers, the counsel of a pious father and mother.

The generation of the upright shall be blessed The family; the children. Such promises are to be expected to be fulfilled in general; it is not required by any proper rules of interpreting language that this should be universally and always true.

<sup><433></sup>Psalm 112:3. Wealth and riches shall be in his house The Septuagint and the Vulgate render this, “glory and riches shall be in his house.” The word, however, properly means riches or wealth, and the two terms are used apparently to convey the idea that wealth or property in “varied forms” would be in his house; that is, not merely gold and silver, but all that was understood to constitute wealth — variety of garments, articles of furniture, etc. This promise is of the same nature as that of the previous verse. It pertains to a general truth in regard to the influence of religion in promoting prosperity. Compare the notes at <sup><5048></sup>1 Timothy 4:8.

And his righteousness endureth for ever That is, The effects of it shall be transmitted from age to age in the prosperity, the respectability, the wealth, the happiness of his descendants. It travels on from age to age, and blesses distant generations.

Psalm 112:4. Unto the upright The just; the pious; the man who fears God.

There ariseth light in the darkness This is a new form of the blessing which follows the fear of the Lord, or another of the benefits which spring from true religion, and by which the pious man is distinguished from other people. The distinction is not that days of darkness will not come upon him as well as upon others, for he may be sick as others are, he may be bereaved as others are, he may lose his property as others do — since there are general laws that affect mankind in these respects. God has not promised that he will interpose to save his people from these things, but that he will save them in them. The peculiarity in regard to those who fear God is, that these things will not always continue; that they shall not be overwhelmed by them; that it will not be uninterrupted and unmitigated gloom; that the sky shall not be always overcast. Compare the notes at <sup><1971></sup>Psalm 97:11; <sup><1817></sup>Job 11:17.

He is gracious, and full of compassion, and righteous These words are designed to be applied to the “upright” man, and are intended more fully to designate his character, and to show “why” light shall spring up to him when he is in darkness. It is because his character is “really” pure and holy, so that whatever cloud may come over it for a time, however it may be temporarily obscured, however he may be calumniated by men, or however God may for a time seem to forsake him and to treat him as if he were a bad man, yet ultimately his character will appear as it really is. Light will come in upon the darkness. The clouds will break away. The prejudices against him will be dispersed. Full justice will be done to his character both by man and by God, and the world will see that he is a just and pious man. See the notes at <sup><1975></sup>Psalm 37:5,6. Every man will ultimately be seen as he is; every man will attain the position, and have the reputation which he “ought” to have.

Psalm 112:5. A good man showeth favor He has the means to show favor to others, or to promote their welfare, and he is disposed to do this. It is the characteristic of a good man — of a heart that is truly pious — to do good to others; to promote their welfare here, and to assist them in their endeavor to secure happiness in the world to come.

And lendeth The original word here — hwj <sup><13867></sup> — means to join oneself to anyone; to cleave to him; then, to form the union which is constituted between debtor and creditor, borrower and lender. Here it is used in the latter sense, and it means that a good man will accommodate another — a neighbor — with money, or with articles to be used temporarily and returned again. A man who always “borrows” is not a desirable neighbor; but a man who never lends — who is never willing to accommodate — is a neighbor that no one would wish to live near — a crooked, perverse, bad man. True religion will always dispose a man to do acts of kindness in any and every way possible.

He will guide his affairs The word used here means literally to hold, contain; to hold up, or sustain; to nourish, to furnish the means of living. <sup><451></sup>Genesis 45:11; 47:12; 50:21. Here it means that he would uphold or manage his business.

With discretion Margin, “judgment;” so the Hebrew. He would do it prudently, sensibly, economically, wisely. This is, or should be, one of the characteristics of a good man. Religion prompts to this; religion will aid a man in doing this; religion will tend to check everything of a contrary nature. A man who neglects his “affairs,” who pays no attention to his business, who is indifferent whether he is successful or fails, is a man who gives “just so evidence” that he is a stranger to true religion.

<sup><451></sup>Psalm 112:6. Surely he shall not be moved for ever Luther, “For he shall remain always.” He shall be fixed, stable, firm, prosperous. He shall not be driven from place to place. He shall have a permanent home. He shall have a steady reputation. He shall have a constant influence. He shall be a firm, established, prosperous man. Of course this is to be taken in the general, and should not be pressed to mean that it will be, in the most literal sense, and always, true, for a good man “may” be “unfortunate in business,” and suffer with others; he may be sick; he may see reason to change his residence; he will certainly die. But still it is true that religion “tends” to produce this permanency, and that in this respect there is a marked difference between people who are truly pious, and those who are not.

The righteous shall be in everlasting remembrance In <sup><300></sup>Proverbs 10:7, it is said that “the name of the wicked shall rot;” and the meaning here is, that the way to secure a grateful remembrance among people after we are dead is to be righteous — to do something that shall deserve to be remembered. It cannot mean that a man who is righteous will “never” be forgotten, or that his name and deeds will never pass from the recollection of mankind — for that would not be true; but that people will delight to cherish the memory of the righteous; that they will be disposed to do justice to their character after they are dead; that the benevolent and the upright will be remembered when the names of the wicked shall be forgotten. The world has no interest in keeping up the memory of bad people, and as soon as it can be done hastens to forget them. Wicked people are remembered only when their deeds are enormous, and then their memory is cherished only to admonish and to warn. The world has no interest in keeping up the memory of Benedict Arnold, or Alexander VI, or Caesar Borgia except to warn future generations of the guilt and baseness of treason and profligacy; it “has” an interest in never suffering the names of Howard, of Wilberforce, of Henry Martyn, to die, for those names excite to noble feelings and to noble efforts wherever they are known. Such names are to be had “in everlasting remembrance.”

Psalm 112:7. He shall not be afraid of evil tidings Of bad news; of reverses and losses; of the destruction of his ship at sea, or his property by land; of disaster by flood, by famine, by war. His heart will so fully confide in God that he can commit all calmly into his hands. He will feel assured that all will be well; that nothing occurs but that which the wisest and the best Being in the universe sees it best should occur; and that in all which “does” take place he is able to sustain the sufferer. There is nothing so well suited to make the mind calm as trust in God. What has a man to be afraid of who does trust in him? Compare Psalm 27:3; 46:2; 56:3,4; Hebrews 13:6; Proverbs 1:33.

His heart is fixed Is firm; is established. See the notes at Psalm 57:7.

Trusting in the LORD This is the reason “why” his heart is “fixed” or firm. It is not any native courage or resolution; it is not any firmness of his own; it is simply because he has confidence in God, and feels assured that all things will be well.

Psalm 112:8. His heart is established Sustained; upheld. This is the same idea, though somewhat varied in form. The word means to sustain; to support; and the idea is, that there is some basis of support — some strength — which is not his own.

He shall not be afraid When he is assailed by enemies.

Until he see his desire upon his enemies This implies that he had nothing really to fear. He would certainly overcome his foes; and in the meantime he might look calmly on all their efforts to destroy him, for those efforts would be vain. So the believer now looks calmly on all his spiritual foes. He has nothing to fear, for he will overcome them all; he will certainly triumph; he will trample them all under his feet. He may well, therefore, endure these conflicts for a brief period, for the issue is certain, and the conflict will soon come to an end.

Psalm 112:9. He hath dispersed ... This is another characteristic of a righteous man, and another reason of the permanent honor which will be rendered to him. The meaning is, that he is liberal; he freely scatters what he has; he divides it with those who are needy and unfortunate. One part of mankind have an overplus — have more than they need for themselves and their families — and that overplus is what is designed to meet the needs of the unfortunate, the weak, the aged, the imbecile, the infirm, who have “not” enough. It is the “treasury” of God — the “reservoir” where that is gathered which is to be distributed for the needs of the helpless and the dependent. The righteous man is one who enters fully into this arrangement, and who feels that all this overplus belongs to God, and is to be appropriated as he shall direct.

His righteousness endureth for ever His acts of charity are constant. His piety is not fitful, spasmodic, uncertain; it is steady principle; it is firm and solid; it may always be relied on. See Psalm 112:3.

His horn shall be exalted with honor See the notes at Psalm 75:10.

Psalm 112:10. The wicked shall see it, and be grieved They shall see his prosperity; shall see the evidence that God approves his character and his conduct. The word rendered “grieved” means rather to be angry or enraged. Perhaps the word “fret” would best express the sense.

He shall gnash with his teeth As indicative of hatred and wrath. See the notes at Psalm 37:12.

And melt away Disappear — as snow does that melts; or as a snail (see the notes at Psalm 58:8); or as waters that run away (see the notes at Psalm 58:7); or as wax (see the notes at Psalm 68:2). Their wrath shall be of no avail, for they themselves shall soon disappear.

The desire of the wicked shall perish He shall not be able to accomplish his desire, or to carry out his purposes. He shall be disappointed, and all his cherished plans will come to nought. This is in strong contrast with what is said in the psalm would occur to the righteous. They would be prospered and happy; they would be able to carry out their plans; they would be respected while living, and remembered when dead; they would find God interposing in their behalf in the darkest hours; they would be firm and calm in the day of danger and of trouble; they would put their trust in the Lord, and all would be well. Surely there is an advantage in our world in being a friend of God.

APPENDIX NOTES ON PSALM 112

Psalm 112:6. Surely he shall not be moved There is a strange power in piety to beget calmness, self-possession, and firmness of character, even in the midst of fierce assaults and of dire conflicts with every kind of adversity and adversary. Luther: “Unless there were in us divine strength communicated by Christ, it would be impossible that we could stand against such numerous and mighty assaults of temptation.” The righteous will not be dismayed when all nature is dissolving. Arnd:

“Look at examples — how Moses says at the Red Sea, Stand still and see the salvation of God. How does Jehoshaphat stand firm as a wall when one hundred thousand men invade the land, and he slays them all with one song of praise! How firmly does David stand when hunted by Saul! How overwhelmed is Saul with despair when his land is invaded by the Philistines, and he seeks advice from a witch! What firmness is in Daniel when in the lions’ den! What joy in Stephen! How did the holy Basilus say when Caesar Valens threatened him so dreadfully: ‘Such bugbears should be set before children!’ Athenasius when Julian persecuted him: ‘He is a mist, and will soon disappear!’“ There is indeed a fascinating power in the world to make its devotees dream of happiness as long as their prosperity lasts. But it is only the child of God who can in triumph repeat <sup><317></sup>Habakkuk 3:17,18. — Plumer.

NOTES ON PSALM 113

The author of this psalm, as of those which immediately precede it, is unknown. It is very general in its character, and has no allusion to any circumstances by which one could determine the name of the author, or the occasion on which it was written. In connection with the five following psalms, it constitutes what was known among the Hebrews as the “Hallel”; that is, the song of praise, sung on great occasions, at the annual festivals, and especially at the Passover and the Feast of tabernacles. Buxtorf, Lexicon. Tal., p. 613, et al.

This psalm, which is expressive of the majesty of God, as having a claim to universal praise, consists essentially of two parts:

I. The general statement that God is to be praised, and a call on all to engage in that service, <sup><980></sup>Psalm 113:1-3ú

II. Reasons why he should be praised, <sup><980></sup>Psalm 113:4-9.

(1) He is exalted above all nations, <sup><980></sup>Psalm 113:4;

(2) None can be compared with him, <sup><985></sup>Psalm 113:5;

(3) he is condescending, and looks with interest on the things in heaven and on earth, <sup><985></sup>Psalm 113:6;

(4) He exalts the poor to positions of honor and influence, <sup><987></sup>Psalm 113:7,8;

(5) He constitutes and appoints families, with all that is tender and joyous in the domestic relation, <sup><989></sup>Psalm 113:9.

Praise, O ye servants of the LORD You who profess to serve and obey him; who acknowledge him as your God. In the original this is also the word “Hallelu,” | | <sup><1984></sup>æ.

Praise the name of the LORD Still the same word “Hallelu.” The name of the Lord is put here, as it is often, for the Lord himself.

Psalm 113:2. Blessed be the name of the LORD Blessed be the Lord; or; Let the name of the Lord be blessed.

From this time forth and for evermore Now and forever. He is worthy of praise now, and he ever will be. What he is now, he will always continue to be; and as praise is proper now, it will be forever and ever. An eternal God has claims to eternal praise.

Psalm 113:3. From the rising of the sun ... From the farthest east to the farthest west — the sun in its rising and setting being the remotest object that we see in the horizon.

The LORD'S name is to be praised This does not mean that it “will” be — though that is true; but that it “ought” to be — that it is worthy of universal praise. All people in the east and in the west — everywhere — “should” praise and adore that name.

Psalm 113:4. The LORD is high above all nations Hebrew, Exalted above all nations is Yahweh. That is, he rules over all nations; he directs their affairs; he is their sovereign king. As a matter of fact, and from the necessity of the case, he is on a throne which is elevated above all the kings and kingdoms of the world. He is the Sovereign not only of one nation, but of all; and it is meet that this should be acknowledged by them all.

And his glory above the heavens That which renders him glorious. The manifestations of his glorious character are not confined to the earth; they extend to the heavens; they are not confined to the visible heavens; they extend far beyond, in the regions of illimitable space. The universe — the earth and the starry worlds — all are full of the manifestations of his glory; and far beyond the bounds of created things (if they have a boundary), God is there — without limit — the same God — worthy there of universal praise! Who can comprehend such a God? Compare the notes at Psalm 8:1.

Psalm 113:5. Who is like unto the LORD our God? Who can be compared with Yahweh our God? See the notes at Isaiah 40:17-25. The meaning is, that no creature — no idol — can be compared with Yahweh. The remark here has special reference to his attributes as immediately specified — his humbling himself to behold the things in heaven and in earth; his raising up the poor, etc. It is true “in general,” in regard to God, that no creature can be compared with him; it is true, in regard to each one of his attributes, that they are far above all created excellence.

Who dwelleth on high Margin, “exalteth himself to dwell.” Literally, “The one making high to sit.” The language is applicable to one who is seated on a lofty throne. Compare <sup><BR></sup>Psalm 8:1. He has his dwelling — his throne — his permanent seat — in the heavens: so high and exalted that it requires infinite condescension to look upon the earth, or even upon the heavens.

<sup><BR></sup>Psalm 113:6. Who humbleth himself ... So high that it is necessary he should stoop even to behold the things which seem most lofty to us; and who actually does stoop thus to regard the things which he has made in heaven and on earth.

To behold the things that are in heaven, and in the earth! More literally, “to look in heaven and in earth.” Even to look on heaven, high as it is to us — still more to look on earth, so insignificant as compared with the vast bodies in the heavens — is condescension on the part of God. It requires him to stoop — even to look on the sun — the stars — the distant worlds! Yet he does this. There is not a world which he does not survey constantly; not a creature whose interests he does not regard; not an insect — a flower — an atom — that he does not regard with as much minute attention as though there were nothing else to demand his care.

<sup><BR></sup>Psalm 113:7. He raiseth up the poor out of the dust From the most humble condition in life. He exalts them to conditions of wealth, rank, honor. He has power to do this; he actually does it. This is not intended to be affirmed as a universal truth, or to assert that it is always done, but that it is among the things which show his majesty, his power, and his goodness, and which lay the foundation for praise.

And lifteth the needy out of the dunghill From the condition of lowest poverty. Instances are sufficiently abundant in which this is done, to justify such an assertion, and to show that it is a proper foundation of praise to God.

<sup><BR></sup>Psalm 113:8. That he may set him with princes May give him a rank — a position — with nobles and great people upon the earth. Many instances of this nature have occurred in the history of the world. Not a few of the nobles of England, including several of its lord chancellors, have been raised thus from very humble life; and in every nation God shows that he has power to give to those of humblest rank a name and place which no hereditary titles and honors can bestow: thus Shakespeare was the son of a glover and woolstapler. God has power to come into the humblest cottage of poverty, and to bring forth those who shall stand foremost in their generation as people of genius and power. Nothing is more absolute than the power which God thus holds over the nations of the earth, and it is meet that a Being who has this power, and who exercises it, should be praised and honored.

Even with the princes of his people Among those who are selected to preside over the people whom he has chosen for himself. It is implied here that this would be a higher honor than to be exalted to power among a pagan people — a people ignorant of the true God. It is a higher honor to be counted worthy to rule a Christian nation than a pagan people; it is a higher honor to be a ruler in the church — over those whom God has redeemed for himself — than it is to administer a secular government.

Psalm 113:9. He maketh the barren woman to keep house ...

Margin, as in Hebrew, “to dwell in a house.” That is, to be at the head of a family. See the notes at Psalm 68:6. Compare 1 Samuel 2:5. This, too, is suggested as a reason why God should be praised and adored. In instances where all hope of posterity is cut off, he interposes, and diffuses joy through a dwelling. We may look abroad, and see abundant occasion for praising God, in his condescension to human affairs — in his lifting up the poor from the humblest condition — in his exalting those of lowly rank to places of honor, trust, wealth, and power; but, after all, if we wish to find occasions of praise that will most tenderly affect the heart, and be connected with the warmest affections of the soul, they will be most likely to be found in the domestic circle — in the mutual love — the common joy — the tender feelings — which bind together the members of a family. In such a family, the words with which this psalm begins and ends, “Hallelujah,” “Hallelujah,” are especially appropriate; and if any community on earth should apply these words to itself it should be such a family, called upon by everything tender, holy, and lovely, to “praise the” LORD.

APPENDIX NOTES ON PSALM 113

With this psalm begins “the Hallel,” which was sung at the three great feasts, at the feast of the dedication, and at the new moons. At the feast of the passover it was divided into two parts, the first of which, consisting of Psalm 113; 114, was sung before the meal, that is, before the second cup was passed round; and the second, consisting of Psalm 115—118, after the meal, when the fourth cup had been filled. This last, probably, was “the hymn” which our Lord and his apostles are said to have sung (<sup><4183></sup>Matthew 26:30; <sup><4146></sup>Mark 14:26) after his last passover.

Paulus Burgensis styles Psalm 113—118 Alleluia Judaeorum Magnum, and this has been a very usual designation. But according to the ancient Jewish tradition this series of psalms is called simply “the Hallel,” or sometimes “the Egyptian Hallel,” whereas the name “Great Hallel” is given to Psalm 136. (See Delitzsch, from whom the above is taken.) The psalm may be said to be a connecting link between the song of Hannah and the Magnificat of the Virgin. — Perowne.

<sup><4183></sup>Psalm 113:9. He maketh the barren woman to keep house Hannah’s song in <sup><4116></sup>1 Samuel 2:5-8, seems kept in view, as well as God’s own words to David, <sup><4008></sup>2 Samuel 7:8,9, all to furnish suitable language to express redemption-acts. And the long-barren woman of <sup><4183></sup>Psalm 113:9, while it reminds us of Sarah, Rebecca, Rachel, Manoah’s wife, Elizabeth, who all in the end were “filled with joy,” may point to one and the same period the world’s history from its full and final consummation, as does <sup><2841></sup>Isaiah 54:1. Isaiah seems expressly to allude to this psalm as receiving its fulfillment to the full when the Messiah’s work of suffering (Isaiah 53) issues in illimitable blessing to Israel and the world. — A. A. Bonar.

NOTES ON PSALM 114

This psalm, a part of the Hallel (see the notes at the Introduction to Psalm 113), is occupied in celebrating the praises of God for what he had done in the delivering of his people from Egyptian bondage, and in conducting them to the promised land. It is the language of exultation, joy, and triumph, in view of the gracious interpositions of God in their deliverance. The psalmist sees the mountains and hills seized as it were with consternation, leaping and skipping like sheep; Jordan, as it were, frightened and fleeing back; the very earth trembling — at the presence of God. Everything is personified. Everything is full of life; everything recognizes the presence and the power of the Most High. It would be appropriate to use such a psalm on the great festivals of the Jewish nation, for nothing could be more proper than to keep these events in their history before the minds of the people. The author of the psalm is unknown; and the occasion on which it was composed cannot now be determined. It is a most animated, elevated, cheering psalm, and is proper to be used at all times to make the mind rejoice in God, and to impress us with the feeling that it is easy for God to accomplish his purposes.

Psalm 114:1. When Israel went out of Egypt literally, “In the going out of Israel from Egypt.” This is not to be confined to the exact act of the exodus, but embraces all that properly entered into that migration — the whole train of events which resulted in their being brought into the promised land.

The house of Jacob The family of Jacob — a name appropriately used here, since it was the family of Jacob that had gone down into Egypt, and that had increased to these great numbers.

From a people of strange language Speaking a foreign or a barbarian tongue. See the notes at Psalm 81:5.

Psalm 114:2. Judah was his sanctuary His home; his abode; his sacred dwelling-place. Judah was the principal or leading tribe, recognized as the tribe where power was to be concentrated, and from which the Messiah was to proceed (Genesis 49:8-12); and hence, the name was early used to denote the entire people, and ultimately, as modified in the word Jews, became the common name of the nation.

And Israel his dominion The nation that he ruled; the nation that had his law; the nation that he governed by his presence — or, of which he was the recognized king. There can be no doubt that the reference here is to God, but it is remarkable that the name “God” is not used. Perhaps the reason may be that this psalm was designed to be employed in connection with the preceding one, and as that consists entirely of the praises of God, it was not necessary to repeat the name when his praise was to be continued under another form, and in connection with another line of thought.

Psalm 114:3. The sea saw it The word it is supplied, not very properly, by our translators. It would be more expressive to say, “The sea saw:” that is, The sea — (the Red Sea) — saw the mighty movement — the marshalled hosts — the moving masses — the cattle — the pursuing enemies — the commotion — the agitation — on its usually quiet shores. We are to conceive of the usual calmness of the desert — the waste and lonely solitudes on the banks of the Red Sea — and then all this suddenly broken in upon by vast hosts of men, women, children, and cattle, fleeing in consternation, followed by the embattled strength of Egypt — all rolling on tumultuously to the shore. No wonder that the sea is represented as astonished at this unusual spectacle, and as fleeing in dismay.

And fled As if affrighted at the approach of such an host, coming so suddenly upon its shores.

Jordan was driven back Referring to the dividing of the waters of the Jordan when the children of Israel passed over to the promised land.

Joshua 3:13-17. They also seemed astonished at the approach of the Hebrews, and retired to make a way for them to pass over.

Psalm 114:4. The mountains skipped like rams As flocks in their gambols. They seemed to move from place to place; everything seemed to be unsettled, and acknowledged the presence of the Omnipotent One. The word rendered “skipped” means to leap for joy; to dance. See the notes at Psalm 29:6. The reference here is to the agitations and commotions of the peaks of Sinai, when God came down to deliver the law. Exodus 19:16-18.

And the little hills like lambs Hebrew, Like the sons of the flock. The reference here is to the less prominent eminences of Sinai. The lofty hills, and the smaller hills surrounding, seemed to be all in a state of commotion.

Psalm 114:5-6. What ailed thee, O thou sea, that thou fleddest? ...

literally, “What to thee, O sea,” etc. That is, What influenced thee — what alarmed thee — what put thee into such fear, and caused such consternation? Instead of stating the cause or reason why they were thus thrown into dismay, the psalmist uses the language of surprise, as if these inanimate objects had been smitten with sudden terror, and as if it were proper to ask an explanation from themselves in regard to conduct that seemed so strange.

Psalm 114:7. Tremble, thou earth, at the presence of the Lord ...

This is at the same time an explanation of the facts referred to in the previous verses, and the statement of an important truth in regard to the power of God. The true explanation — as here implied — of what occurred to the sea, to the Jordan, to the mountains, and to the hills, was the fact that God was there; the inference from that, or the truth which followed from that, was, that before that God in whose presence the very mountains shook, and from whom the waters of the sea fled in alarm the whole earth should tremble.

Psalm 114:8. Which turned the rock into a standing water That is, Before him who could do this, the earth should tremble; the inhabited world should stand in awe of such amazing power. The words rendered “a standing water,” mean properly a pool of water. They indicate nothing in regard to the permanency of that pool; they do not imply that it remained as a standing pool during the sojourn of the Israelites in the wilderness — whatever may have been the fact in regard to that. The simple idea is, that, at the time referred to, the rock was converted into a pool; that is, the waters flowed from the rock, constituting such a pool.

The flint Another name for the rock — used here to describe the greatness of the miracle.

Into a fountain of waters That is, The waters flowed from the rock as from a fountain. The Bible is a book of miracles, and there is nothing more improbable in this miracle than in any other.

In the Septuagint, the Latin Vulgate, the Syriac, the Arabic, and in many manuscripts, there is no division of the psalm here, but the following psalm is united with this, as if they were a single poem. Why, in those versions, the division of the Hebrews was not followed, cannot now be ascertained.

The division in the Hebrew is a natural division, and was evidently made in the original composition.

APPENDIX NOTES ON PSALM 114

Psalm 114:2. Judah was his sanctuary and Israel his dominion It is indeed remarkable that the name of God is not mentioned here, and is introduced only at the close of the psalm. It may be, as our author suggests, that the psalm was designed to be used in connection with Psalm 113, which consists entirely of the praises of God. But there is a reason for the omission of the name in the first instance, in the requirements of poetic structure and beauty. Addison was much struck with the fact in this view. "I perceived," says he, "a beauty in the psalm which was new to me. The poet utterly conceals the presence of God in the beginning of it, and rather lets a possessive pronoun go without a substantive than he will so much as mention anything of divinity there ... If God had appeared before, there could be no wonder why the mountains should leap and the sea retire; therefore, that this convulsion of nature may be brought in with due surprise, his name is not mentioned until afterward, and then, with a very agreeable turn of thought, God is introduced at once with all his majesty." Hengstenberg has the same idea, and observes that the questions in Psalm 114:5,6 would have been anticipated, and their appropriateness destroyed, by an earlier introduction of the name of God.

NOTES ON PSALM 115

It is not possible now to ascertain on what occasion this psalm was composed, or who was its author. It has been generally believed that it was written in the later periods of the Jewish history, and after the captivity in Babylon. There is no improbability in the supposition, though there is nothing so marked in the psalm as to make this supposition necessary. It is evident from ~~HBSP~~ Psalm 115:2,3, that it was composed in a time of national calamity, and especially of such national disaster as might lead the surrounding nations to say of them that they were forsaken by the God whom they worshipped. This charge is replied to by saying that what had occurred had taken place under the divine permission, and was no proof that Yahweh was not the true God. This thought leads the author of the psalm to prove the utter powerlessness of idols as compared with Yahweh, and, in view of this, to exhort the people of Israel still to trust in their own God as the Being in whom alone they could hope for protection and safety.

The psalm, therefore, comprises the following parts:

- I. A statement that all which they had was to be traced to God, ~~HBSP~~ Psalm 115:1.
- II. The existing troubles of the nation as being so great that the pagan were led to infer that Yahweh could not help them, and to ask, with some show of plausibility, where now was the God in whom they trusted? ~~HBSP~~ Psalm 115:2.
- III. The general statement of the psalmist that what had occurred was to be traced to God; that it was not evidence that he had forsaken them, but was proof that he was a sovereign, ~~HBSP~~ Psalm 115:3.
- IV. A statement of the utter weakness, helplessness, and inefficiency of idols; of their entire powerlessness as being without life; and of the stupidity and folly of worshipping such lifeless objects, ~~HBSP~~ Psalm 115:4-8.
- V. An exhortation to trust in the Lord, on the ground of what he had done, and of the blessings which were to be expected of him, ~~HBSP~~ Psalm 115:9-16.
- VI. An exhortation to do this at once, since death would soon occur, and praise could not be rendered to him in the grave, ~~HBSP~~ Psalm 115:17,18.

Psalm 115:1. Not unto us, O LORD, not unto us, but unto thy name give glory This apparently abrupt commencement of the psalm was undoubtedly in reference to some circumstances which would be well understood at the time when the psalm was composed, but which cannot be definitely ascertained now. It seems to have been in view of some existing troubles, and the language at the same time expresses a hope of the divine interposition, and a feeling that the praise of such interposition would belong wholly to God. The phrase “give glory” means, give all the honor and praise. See the notes at Psalm 29:1,2.

For thy mercy The mercy or the favor which we seek and look for — thy gracious help in the time of trouble.

And for thy truth's sake Thy faithfulness to thy promises; thy faithfulness to thy people. The psalmist anticipated this manifestation of faithfulness with confidence; he felt that all the praise for such an anticipated interposition would belong to God.

Psalm 115:2. Wherefore should the heathen say The nations; they who worshipped idols, and who claimed that those idols were true gods. Why should we, thy people, be so left, so forsaken, so afflicted, as to lead these idolaters to suppose that we worship a false God, or that the God whom we adore is destitute of power or faithfulness; either that he does not exist, or that he cannot be relied on. It is evident that they were now in circumstances which would give some plausibility to the question here asked.

Where is now their God? They seem to be forsaken. God, the God whom they worship, does not come forth for their defense. If he exists at all, he is destitute of power, or he is not true to the people who worship him, and he cannot be trusted. Compare the notes at Psalm 42:3,10; 79:10.

Psalm 115:3. But our God is in the heavens The Septuagint adds, “and in the earth.” This is not, however, in the Hebrew. The idea is, Our God really exists. He is the true God. He reigns in heaven. His plans are such as are and should be formed in heaven: lofty, vast, incomprehensible. But he is still our God; our Ruler; our Protector. He is not a god of earth — whose origin is earth — who dwells on earth alone — like the idols of the pagan; but the whole vast universe is under his control.

He hath done whatsoever he hath pleased And, therefore, what has been done is right, and we should be submissive to it. He is a sovereign God; and mysterious as are his doings, and much as there seems to be occasion to ask the question “Where is now your God?” yet we are to feel that what has occurred has been in accordance with his eternal plans, and is to be submitted to as a part of his arrangements. It is, in fact, always a sufficient answer to the objections which are made to the government of God, as if he had forsaken his people in bringing affliction on them, and leaving them, apparently without interposition, to poverty, to persecution, and to tears, that he is “in the heavens;” that he rules there and everywhere; that he has his own eternal purposes; and that all things are ordered in accordance with his will. There must, therefore, be some good reason why events occur as they actually do.

Psalm 115:4. Their idols Their gods — the gods which they worship, as contrasted with the God whom we adore. The design of this description (~~HEB~~ Psalm 115:4-8) is to show the utter vanity of trusting in such gods, and to lead the people of Israel to put their trust in the true God — in Yahweh.

Are silver and gold Made of silver and gold, and they must have, therefore, the properties of silver and gold. They can be of value only as silver and gold. They cannot do the work of mind; they cannot do the work of God. The psalmist was not disposed to depreciate the real value of these idols, or to throw contempt on them which they did not deserve. He was disposed to treat them fairly. They were silver and gold; they had an intrinsic value as such; they showed in the value of the material how much the pagan were disposed to honor their objects of worship; and they were not held up to contempt as shapeless blocks of wood or stone. The psalmist might have said that most of them were made of wood or stone, and were mere shapeless blocks; but it is always best to do justice to an adversary, and not to attempt to underrate what he values. The argument of an infidel on the subject of religion may be utterly worthless as an argument for infidelity, but it may evince ability, learning, subtilty, clearness of reasoning, and even candor; and it is best to admit this, if it is so, and to give to it all the credit which it deserves as a specimen of reasoning, or as stating a real difficulty which ought to be solved by somebody — to call it “silver and gold” if it is so, and not to characterize it as worthless, weak, stupid — the result of ignorance and folly. He has great advantage in an argument who owns the real force of what an opponent says; he gains nothing who charges it as the offspring of stupidity, ignorance, and folly — unless he can show that it is so.

The work of men's hands Shaped and fashioned by people's hands. They cannot, therefore, be superior to those who made them; they cannot answer the purpose of a God.

Psalm 115:5-7. They have mouths ... They are shaped like people, but have none of the attributes of intelligent beings.

Psalm 115:8. They that make them are like unto them Stupid; senseless; irrational. See the notes at <sup>240</sup>Isaiah 44:9-20.

So is everyone that trusteth in them People who do this show that they are destitute of all the proper attributes of reason, since such gods cannot help them. It is most strange, as it appears to us, that the worshippers of idols did not themselves see this; but this is in reality no more strange than that sinners do not see the folly of their course of sin; that people do not see the folly of worshipping no God. In fact, there is less of folly among the pagan than there is in this class of men. The worship of an idol shows at least that there is some religious tendency in the mind; some conviction that God ought to be worshipped; some aspiration after a proper object of worship; some appreciation of the true dignity and rank of man as made for worship; but what shall be said of the man who evinces no such tendency — who has no such aspiration or desire — who endeavors to extinguish in his nature all that was designed to express the idea of worship, or to lead him to God — who never starts the inquiry whether there is a God — who never prays for light, for guidance, for pardon, for a preparation for death and eternity — who never even testifies so much interest in religion as to set up an image of gold, or wood, or stone, as indicative of the fact that he is made above the brutes? There are multitudes of the pagan less stupid and foolish than people in Christian lands.

Psalm 115:9. O Israel, trust thou in the LORD This exhortation is founded in a great measure on what had been just said in regard to idols. They had no power. There was no reason why they should be confided in. They could not help in the day of trouble; and as people need a god, and as the idols cannot be to them as gods, the exhortation is addressed to his people to trust him. He would be to them all that was implied in the name God; all that was wanted in a God.

He is their help The help of those who trust in him. He is able to help them in the time of trouble; he is willing to help them; he will help them. They who put their trust in him will find him a sure and certain help. This is the experience of all who confide in him.

<sup><4851></sup>Psalm 115:11. Ye that fear the LORD ... All the people that reverence God; all his true worshippers.

<sup><4852></sup>Psalm 115:12. The LORD hath been mindful of us This would be especially appropriate if the psalm was written, as is commonly supposed, after the return from the captivity of Babylon. In such circumstances it would be every way proper to bring before the mind of the people the fact that God had remembered them and had delivered them.

He will bless us Our past experience furnishes the fullest evidence that he will continue to bless us. He who has delivered us from so great calamities, and who has restored us to our native land after so long and so painful a captivity, will not forsake us now. There can be now no circumstances in which he cannot bestow on us all the blessings which we need; there will be none when we may not hope that he will bless us. If he could save us from such troubles, he can save us from all; if he did thus interpose, we may argue that he will always grant us his help when we need it.

He will bless the house of Israel; he will bless the house of Aaron Compare <sup><4859></sup>Psalm 115:9,10.

<sup><4853></sup>Psalm 115:13. He will bless them that fear the LORD Compare <sup><4851></sup>Psalm 115:11.

Both small and great Margin, as in Hebrew, with. The little with the great; children and grown persons; the poor and the rich; the ignorant and the learned; those of humble rank, and those of most exalted birth and condition.

Psalm 115:14. The LORD shall increase you more and more He will increase your numbers and your power. We may suppose that the people were greatly diminished by the captivity, and that on their return to their country their number was comparatively small. This promise of a great increase was in accordance with the cherished wishes of the Hebrew people, and with the repeated promises which God had made to their fathers. Compare <sup><4157></sup>Genesis 15:5; 22:17; 32:12.

You and your children The blessing shall be not only on you, but it shall go down to future generations,

Psalm 115:15. Ye are blessed of the LORD Blessed in your present comforts and mercies; blessed in his promises in regard to the time to come; blessed in the prospects which are before you.

Which made heaven and earth The true God; the great Creator of all things. It was not the blessing of a creature — man or angel — it was the blessing of the living God.

Psalm 115:16. The heaven Hebrew, “The heavens.”

Even the heavens are the LORD’s A more literal and correct rendering of this would be, “The heavens are heavens for Jehovah.” That is, he has reserved the heavens as a home for himself, or as his special possession and home. Compare <sup><2601></sup>Isaiah 66:1; <sup><4153></sup>Matthew 5:34; <sup><4074></sup>Acts 7:49.

But the earth ... He prepared earth for the abode of man; he has placed man upon it to cultivate it; he has given its fruits and productions to man, to be held and enjoyed by man; he has made all on earth subject to man — the dwellers in the air, the land, and the waters. All this he has given to man; not to the angels. Earth is the home of man, the birth-place of man; the place where he lives, where he shows the result of his toil, his skill, and his ingenuity; the place where he builds houses, bridges, monuments, works of art; the place where he prepares for another state of existence; the place where he dies, and is buried. It is, as formed by the Creator, a beautiful home outfitted for mankind; how much more beautiful would it be, if man never defiled or desolated it by sin! how happy an abode would it have been if sin had never entered it!

Psalm 115:17. The dead praise not the LORD The meaning of this is, that as those who are dead cannot praise God, or cannot worship him, this should be done while we are in the land of the living. This opportunity, like all other opportunities, will be cut off in the grave, and hence, we should be faithful in this duty, and should avail ourselves of this privilege, while life lasts. In regard to the sentiment here expressed, and the grounds on which that sentiment was entertained, see the notes at <sup><2388></sup>Isaiah 38:18,19; <sup><905></sup>Psalm 6:5.

Neither any that go down into silence Into the grave — the land of silence. <sup><947></sup>Psalm 94:17. Nothing is more impressive in regard to the grave than its utter silence. Not a voice, not a sound, is heard there — of birds or human beings — of song or conversation — of the roaring of the sea, the sighing of the breeze, the fury of the storm, the tumult of battle. Perfect stillness reigns there; and the first sound that shall be heard there will be the archangel's trump.

<sup><958></sup>Psalm 115:18. But we will bless the LORD ... While life lasts; now and ever onward. Our lives are spared; and while those lives shall be continued they shall be spent in praise. We will transmit the praise to future times; and when we are dead, the voice of praise shall be prolonged by those who come after us. It may be added here that we have now higher and clearer views of the grave and of the future world than the psalmist had, and that though it is certain that our voices of praise must be stilled by death, yet in another world we shall continue the work of praise in strains more lofty than here, and in a continuance of service that shall never end. The grave is, indeed, before us all; but so is also heaven, if we belong to those who truly fear the Lord, and who sincerely worship him through Christ Jesus.

APPENDIX NOTES ON PSALM 115

The general tenor of the psalm, and its particular contents, make it perfectly well suited to the state of things in which the series is supposed to have been written, namely, that succeeding the return from exile, but before the actual rebuilding of the temple. — Alexander.

NOTES ON PSALM 116

The author and date of this psalm are unknown. It seems to be rather of a private than a public character, and there are expressions in it which must have been drawn from the personal experience of its writer. It is adapted to public use only because in all public assemblages there are those who would find their own experience represented by the language of the psalm. It may have been composed after the return from Babylon, but there is nothing in the psalm to limit it to that time, and the language is such that it may have been composed at any period after Jerusalem became the place of public worship, <sup><BB9></sup>Psalm 116:19.

The Septuagint and the Latin Vulgate, which combined the two previous psalms into one, divide this into two, at the end of <sup><BB9></sup>Psalm 116:9. The reason why this was done is unknown.

The psalm appears to have been composed in reference to a dangerous sickness, or some deep affliction which threatened life, <sup><BB13></sup>Psalm 116:3,8,9,15; and it expresses a purpose to praise and serve God in view of the fact that the author had been delivered from impending death, and that his days had been lengthened out upon the earth.

The psalm embraces the following points:

I. An expression of love and gratitude in view of the mercies of God, and of a purpose to serve him as long as life should last, <sup><BB10></sup>Psalm 116:1,2.

II. A description of his sufferings, as if the pains of hell had seized him, <sup><BB13></sup>Psalm 116:3,4.

III. A description of the mercy and goodness of God as interposing in answer to his prayer, and delivering him, <sup><BB15></sup>Psalm 116:5-11.

IV. A solemn declaration of his purpose to praise God for all his mercies; to take the cup of salvation and call on his name; to pay his vows in the presence of the people of God; to offer the sacrifice of thanksgiving; to worship in the courts of the Lord's house, in the midst of Jerusalem, <sup><BB12></sup>Psalm 116:12-19.

Psalm 116:1. I love the LORD The Hebrew rather means, “I love, because the Lord hath heard,” etc. That is, the psalmist was conscious of love; he felt it glowing in his soul; his heart was full of that special joy, tenderness, kindness, peace, which love produces; and the source or reason of this, he says, was that the Lord had heard him in his prayers.

Because he hath heard ... That is, This fact was a reason for loving him. The psalmist does not say that this was the only reason, or the main reason for loving him, but that it was the reason for that special joy of love which he then felt in his soul. The main reason for loving God is his own excellency of nature; but still there are other reasons for doing it, and among them are the benefits which he has conferred on us, and which awaken the love of gratitude. Compare the notes at ~~GEN~~ 1 John 4:19.

Psalm 116:2. Because he hath inclined his ear unto me See the notes at ~~GEN~~ Psalm 5:1. Because he has been gracious to me, and has heard my prayers. This is a good reason for serving God, or for devoting ourselves to him, but it is not the only reason. We ought to worship and serve God whether he hears our prayers or not; whether he sends joy or sorrow; whether we are favored with prosperity, or are sunk in deep affliction. People have worshipped God even when they have had no evidence that he heard their prayers; and some of the most pure acts of devotion on earth are those which come from the very depths of darkness and sorrow.

Therefore will I call upon him as long as I live Margin, as in Hebrew, “in my days.” Encouraged by the past, I will continue to call upon him in the future. I will retain a firm faith in the doctrine that he hears prayer, and I will express my practical belief in the truth of that doctrine by regular and constant habits of worship. When a man once has evidence that God has heard his prayer, it is a reason why he should always call on him in similar circumstances, for God does not change.

Psalm 116:3. The sorrows of death What an expression! We know of no intenser sorrows pertaining to this world than those which we associate with the dying struggle — whether our views in regard to the reality of such sorrows be correct or not. We may be — we probably are — mistaken in regard to the intensity of suffering as ordinarily experienced in death; but still we dread those sorrows more than we do anything else, and all that we dread may be experienced then. Those sorrows, therefore, become the representation of the intensest forms of suffering; and such, the psalmist says, he experienced on the occasion to which he refers. There would seem in his case to have been two things combined, as they often are:

- (1) actual suffering from some bodily malady which threatened his life, <sup><116></sup>Psalm 116:3,6,8-10;
- (2) mental sorrow as produced by the remembrance of his sins, and the apprehension of the future, <sup><116></sup>Psalm 116:4. See the notes at <sup><18></sup>Psalm 18:5.

And the pains of hell The pains of Sheol — Hades; the grave. See the notes at <sup><16></sup>Psalm 16:10; <sup><10></sup>Job 10:21,22; <sup><14></sup>Isaiah 14:9. The pain or suffering connected with going down to the grave, or the descent to the nether world; the pains of death. There is no evidence that the psalmist here refers to the pains of hell, as we understand the word, as a place of punishment, or that he mean, to say that he experienced the sorrows of the damned. The sufferings which he referred to were these of death — the descent to the tomb.

Gat hold upon me Margin, as in Hebrew, “found me.” They discovered me — as if they had been searching for me, and had at last found my hiding place. Those sorrows and pangs, ever in pursuit of us, will soon find us all. We cannot long escape the pursuit Death tracks us, and is upon our heels.

I found trouble and sorrow Death found me, and I found trouble and sorrow. I did not seek it, but in what I was seeking I found this. Whatever we fail to “find” in the pursuits of life, we shall not fail to find the troubles and sorrows connected with death. They are in our path wherever we turn, and we cannot avoid them.

<sup><116></sup>Psalm 116:4. Then called I upon the name of the LORD Upon the Lord. I had no other refuge. I felt that I must perish unless he should interpose, and I pleaded with him for deliverance and life. Compare the notes at <sup><18></sup>Psalm 18:6.

O LORD, I beseech thee, deliver my soul My life. Save me from death. This was not a cry for salvation, but for life. It is an example for us, however, to call on God when we feel that the soul is in danger of perishing, for then, as in the case of the psalmist, we have no other refuge but God.

Psalm 116:5. Gracious is the LORD This fact was his encouragement when he called on God. He believed that God was a gracious Being, and he found him to be so. Compare the notes at Hebrews 11:6.

And righteous ... Just; true; faithful. This, too, is a proper foundation of appeal to God: not that we are righteous, and have a claim to his favor, but that he is a Being who will do what is right; that is, what is best to be done in the case. If he were an unjust Being; if he were one on whose stability of character, and whose regard for right, no reliance could be placed, we could never approach him with confidence or hope. In this sense we may rely on his justice — his justness of character — as a ground of hope. Compare the notes at 1 John 1:9: “If we confess our sins, he is faithful and just to forgive us Our sins.”

Psalm 116:6. The LORD preserveth the simple The Septuagint renders this “babes” — νηπια. The Hebrew word has reference to simplicity or folly, as in Proverbs 1:22. It then refers to those who are the opposite of cautious or cunning; to those who are open to persuasion; to those who are easily enticed or seduced. The verb from which the word is derived — hṭp — means to open, to expand; then, to be open, frank, ingenuous, easily persuaded or enticed. Thus it may express either the idea of being simple in the sense of being foolish, easily seduced and led astray; or, simple in the sense of being open, frank, ingenuous, trustful, sincere. The latter is evidently its meaning here. It refers to one of the characteristics of true piety — that of unsuspecting trust in God. It would describe one who yields readily to truth and duty; one who has singleness of aim in the desire to honor God; one who is without guile, trick, or cunning. Such a man was Nathanael (John 1:47): “Behold an Israelite indeed, in whom is no guile.” The Hebrew word used here is rendered simple, Psalm 19:7; 119:130; Proverbs 1:4,22,32; 7:7; 8:5; 9:4; 14:15,18; 19:25; 21:11; 22:3; 27:12; Ezekiel 45:20; and foolish, Proverbs 9:6. It does not elsewhere occur. The meaning here is, that the Lord preserves or keeps those who have simple and unwavering trust in him; those who are sincere in their professions; those who rely on his word.

I was brought low By affliction and trial. The Hebrew literally means to hang down, to be pendulous, to swing, to wave — as a bucket in a well, or as the slender branches of the palm, the willow, etc. Then it means to be slack, feeble, weak, as in sickness, etc. See the notes at <sup><4978></sup>Psalm 79:8. Here it probably refers to the prostration of strength by disease.

And he helped me He gave me strength; he restored me.

<sup><4887></sup>Psalm 116:7. Return unto thy rest, O my soul Luther, “Be thou again joyful, O my soul.” The meaning seems to be, “Return to thy former tranquility and calmness; thy former freedom from fear and anxiety.” He had passed through a season of great danger. His soul had been agitated and terrified. That danger was now over, and he calls upon his soul to resume its former tranquility, calmness, peace, and freedom from alarm. The word does not refer to God considered as the “rest” of the soul, but to what the mind of the psalmist had been, and might now be again.

For the LORD hath dealt bountifully with thee See the notes at <sup><4936></sup>Psalm 13:6.

<sup><4888></sup>Psalm 116:8. For thou hast delivered my soul from death My life. Thou hast saved me from death. This is such language as would be used by one who had been dangerously ill, and who had been restored again to health.

Mine eyes from tears Tears which he had shed in his sickness, and in the apprehension of dying. It may refer to tears shed on other occasions, but it is most natural to refer it to this. Compare the notes at <sup><4906></sup>Psalm 6:6.

And my feet from falling From stumbling. That is, he had not, as it were, fallen by the way, and been rendered unable to pursue the journey of life. All this seems to refer to one occasion — to a time of dangerous illness.

<sup><4889></sup>Psalm 116:9. I will walk before the LORD ... Compare the notes at <sup><4923></sup>Psalm 27:13; <sup><2380></sup>Isaiah 38:20. This expresses a full belief that he would live, and a purpose to live “before the Lord;” that is, as in his presence, in his service, and enjoying communion with him.

<sup><4890></sup>Psalm 116:10. I believed, therefore have I spoken This, in the Septuagint and Latin Vulgate, begins a new psalm, but without any good reason. This language is borrowed by the Apostle Paul to express his confidence in the truth of the gospel, and the effect which that confidence had on him in causing him to declare the truth. <sup><4703></sup>2 Corinthians 4:13. The meaning here is, that in the time of his affliction the psalmist had true faith in God; and, as a result of that, he was able now to speak as he did. At that time he trusted in God; he called on him; he sought his mercy, and God heard his prayer; and now, as the consequence of that, he was enabled to give utterance to these thoughts. Faith was at the foundation of his recovery, and he was now reaping the fruits of faith.

I was greatly afflicted In danger of death. The psalmist reviewed this now, and he saw that all that he had felt and dreaded was real. He was in imminent danger. There was occasion for the tears which he shed. There was reason for the earnestness of his cry to God.

~~1861~~ Psalm 116:11. I said in my haste The Hebrew word used here means to flee in haste; to be in alarm and trepidation; and the idea seems to be, that the assertion referred to was made under the influence of excitement — or that it was not the result of sober reflection, but of an agitated state of mind. It does not necessarily imply that that which was said was false, for many true statements may be made when the mind is agitated and excited; but the meaning is, that he was then in such a state of mind as to suggest the belief, and to cause the assertion that all people are liars. Whether calm reflection would, or would not, confirm this impression of the moment would be a fair question after the excitement was over.

All men are liars Are false; no one is to be relied on. This was said in the time of his affliction, and this added much to his affliction. The meaning is that, in those circumstances of distress, no one came to his aid; no one sympathized with him; there was no one to whom he could unbosom himself; no one seemed to feel any interest in him. There were relatives on whom he might have supposed that he could rely; there may have been those to whom he had shown kindness in similar circumstances; there may have been old friends whose sympathy he might have had reason to expect; but all failed. No one came to help him. No one shed a tear over his sorrows. No one showed himself true to friendship, to sympathy, to gratitude. All people seemed to be false; and he was shut up to God alone. A similar thing is referred to in ~~1940~~ Psalm 41:5-9; 88:18; compare also ~~1893~~ Job 19:13-17. This is not an unnatural feeling in affliction. The mind is then sensitive. We need friends then. We expect our friends to show their friendship then. If they do not do this, it seems to us that the entire world is false. It is evident from the whole course of remark here that the psalmist on reflection felt that he had said this without due thought, under the influence of excitement — and that he was disposed, when his mind was restored to calmness, to think better of mankind than he did in the day of affliction and trouble. This also is not uncommon. The world is much better than we think it is when our own minds are morbid and our nerves are unstrung; and bad as the world is, our opinion of it is not unfrequently the result rather of our own wrong feeling than of just reflection on the real character of mankind.

Psalm 116:12. What shall I render unto the LORD for all his benefits toward me? All his “recompences,” — the same word which in Psalm 116:7 is rendered “hath dealt bountifully.” The question here has reference to that. What return can be equal to his bounties; what will be a proper acknowledgment of them; with what can I repay him for them all? The question is a natural and a proper question. It is one which we naturally ask when we have received a favor from our fellowmortals; how much more proper is it in view of the favors which we receive from God — especially in view of the mercy of God in the gift of a Saviour; the love manifested in the redemption of the soul! What CAN be an adequate return for love like that — for mercies so great, so undeserved?

Psalm 116:13. I will take the cup of salvation Compare the notes at Psalm 11:6. The “cup of salvation” means the cup by which his sense of the greatness of the salvation might be expressed — the cup of thanksgiving. Compare the notes at 1 Corinthians 10:16. The reference seems to be to a custom in festivals of drinking a cup of wine as a special expression of thanks or of obligation. The act would be more solemn, and the truth more deeply impressed on the mind, when accompanied by some religious rite — some ceremonial, as in the Lord’s Supper, expressly designed to call the mercy of God to remembrance.

And call upon the name of the LORD Engage in a solemn act of devotion; make it a matter of special ceremony or observance to call the mercy of God to remembrance. This was one way of rendering to the Lord a return for the benefits received at his hands; as it is now. Christians do this at the table of the Lord — in the observance of the Lord’s Supper.

Psalm 116:14. I will pay my vows ... I will perform or execute. The word vows here refers probably to the solemn promise which he had made in his sickness — the promise to devote himself to God, should he be restored to health. Compare the notes at Isaiah 38:15,20. Such promises are commonly made in sickness, and, alas! almost as commonly disregarded and forgotten on a restoration to health. Yet such vows should be sacredly observed, for

- (a) They are right and proper;
- (b) they are made in most solemn circumstances;
- (c) they are usually sincere;
- (d) they are of the nature of a covenant with God;
- (e) they are made when we are in the best position to take just views of life — of this life, and of the life to come;
- (f) the subsequent life would be happier and better if they were faithfully carried out.

Compare the notes at <sup><19225></sup>Psalm 22:25; 66:13,14.

In the presence of all his people Publicly. The vows were made in private; on the sick bed; when alone; in the silence of the night-watches; when no eye was upon him who made them but the eye of God. There is a propriety, however, that the expression of thanksgiving should be public. Compare <sup><2380></sup>Isaiah 38:20. Indeed, nothing is more proper than public thanks for a restoration from sickness; and as in our public assemblies prayer is often specially offered for the sick at their own request, so it would be equally proper that, at their request, public thanks should be rendered for their recovery.

which will best secure those ends. The particular thought in the mind of the psalmist seems to have been that as he had been preserved when he was apparently so near to death, it must have been because God saw that the death of one of his friends was a matter of so much importance that it should occur only when the most good could be effected by it, and when the ends of life had been accomplished; that God would not decide on this hastily, or without the best reasons; and that, therefore, he had interposed to lengthen out his life still longer. Still, there is a general truth implied here, to wit, that the act of removing a good man from the world is, so to speak, an act of deep deliberation on the part of God; that good, and sometimes great, ends are to be accomplished by it; and that, therefore, God regards it with special interest. It is of value or importance in such respects as the following:

- (1) As it is the removal of another of the redeemed to glory — the addition of one more to the happy hosts above;
- (2) as it is a new triumph of the work of redemption — showing the power and the value of that work;
- (3) as it often furnishes a more direct proof of the reality of religion than any abstract argument could do.

How much has the cause of religion been promoted by the patient deaths of Ignatius, and Polycarp, and Latimer, and Ridley, and Huss, and Jerome of Prague, and the hosts of the martyrs! What does not the world owe, and the cause of religion owe, to such scenes as occurred on the death-beds of Baxter, and Thomas Scott, and Halyburton, and Payson! What an argument for the truth of religion — what an illustration of its sustaining power — what a source of comfort to us who are soon to die — to reflect that religion does not leave the believer when he most needs its support and consolations; that it can sustain us in the severest trial of our condition here; that it can illuminate what seems to us of all places most dark, cheerless, dismal, repulsive — “the valley of the shadow of death!”

Psalm 116:16. O LORD, truly I am thy servant In view of thy mercy in delivering me from death, I feel the obligation to give myself to thee. I see in the fact that thou hast thus delivered me, evidence that I am thy servant — that I am so regarded by thee; and I recognize the obligation to live as becomes one who has had this proof of favor and mercy.

The son of thine handmaid Of a pious mother. I see now the result of my training. I call to my recollection the piety of a mother. I remember how she served thee; how she trained me up for thee; I see now the evidence that her prayers were heard, and that her efforts were blessed in endeavoring to train me up for thee. The psalmist saw now that, under God, he owed all this to the pious efforts of a mother, and that God had been pleased to bless those efforts in making him his child, and in so guiding him that it was not improper for him to speak of himself as possessing and carrying out the principles of a sainted mother. It is not uncommon — and in such cases it is proper — that all the evidence which we may have that we are pious — that we are living as we ought to live, that we are receiving special favors from God — recalls to our minds the instructions of early years, the counsels and prayers of a holy father or mother.

Thou hast loosed my bonds The bonds of disease; the fetters which seemed to have made me a prisoner to Death. I am now free again. I walk at large. I am no longer the captive — the prisoner — of disease and pain.

Psalm 116:17. I will offer to thee the sacrifice of thanksgiving I will publicly thank and praise thee. See the notes at Psalm 107:22.

And will call upon the name of the LORD Will worship and praise the Lord.

Psalm 116:18. I will pay my vows ... See Psalm 116:14.

Psalm 116:19. In the courts of the LORD'S house See the notes at Psalm 65:4. Compare Psalm 84:2; 92:13; 96:8; 100:4; 135:2.

In the midst of thee, O Jerusalem Where the tabernacle, and afterward the temple, was reared.

Praise ye the LORD Hallelujah. A call on others to join in the praise of God. The psalmist felt his own heart drawn to the service of praise by all the mercies of God; he desired, as an expression of his own feelings, that others should unite with him in that sacred exercise. When our own hearts are filled with gratitude, we wish that all others may partake of the same feeling.

APPENDIX NOTES ON PSALM 116

Various opinions have been entertained regarding the date of this beautiful psalm. Some have assigned it to David, others to Hezekiah. The expression of feeling in the psalm, “the mingled joy and grief” (Alexander), answers well to the times immediately succeeding the return from the captivity; while the Chaldaic forms constantly occurring in the original seem to place the matter beyond a doubt. And to this date, and on these grounds, the psalm is assigned by Tholuck, Hengstenberg, Alexander, Thrupp, and Perowne.

Psalm 116:13. The cup of salvation ... This is doubtless an allusion to the drink-offering of strong wine poured out before the Lord in the holy place (<sup>DEUT.</sup> Numbers 28:7). But the Jews had also in their families a more private cup of thanksgiving, as well for the common benefits of life, as for the more marked instances of the Lord’s mercies and deliverances. The use of this was daily, at each meal, and more solemn at a festival. On the daily occasions the master took the cup, and thus “called upon the name of the Lord:” “Blessed be our God, the Lord of the world, who hath created the fruit of the vine;” and having first drunk of it himself, it was presented in order to all who were present. This observance was more marked at the celebration of the passover, and was followed by Christ at the last passover which he kept with his disciples. — Kitto’s Pictorial Bible.

NOTES ON PSALM 117

The occasion and the author of this psalm are alike unknown. DeWette regards it as a temple-psalm, and agrees with Rosenmuller in the supposition that it was sung either at the beginning or the end of the service in the temple. Knapp supposes that it was used as an intermediate service, sung during the progress of the general service to vary the devotion, and to awaken a new interest in the service, either sung by a choir or by the whole people.

In many manuscripts of Kennicott and De Rossi, and in several editions of the Scriptures, this psalm is united with the following. The psalm has no independent character or meaning of its own, and seems to have been designed, like the “Doxologies” in our Books of Psalms and Hymns, to be attached to other psalms as occasion might require. There is no psalm designed for public worship to which it might not thus properly be attached.

Psalm 117:1. O praise the LORD, all ye nations The idea is that God has a claim to universal worship, and that all the nations of the earth are under obligations to adore him as the true God. He is not the God of the Hebrew people only, but of all people; his praise should be celebrated not merely by one nation, but by all. This is one of the passages in the Old Testament, anticipating what is more fully disclosed in the New Testament, in which the sacred writer extends his vision beyond the narrow boundaries of Judea, and looks to the world, the whole world, as the theater on which the true religion was to be displayed, and for which it was designed. It is language such as would be indited by the Spirit of inspiration on the supposition that the time would come when the barrier between Jews and Gentiles would be broken down, and when all the nations of the earth would be in the possession of the true religion, and would unite in the worship of the same God. This doctrine, however, was not fully made known until the coming of the Redeemer. The announcement of this was made by the Redeemer himself (compare <sup>4181b</sup>Matthew 8:11; 12:21; 28:19); it was the occasion of no small part of the trouble which the Apostle Paul had with his countrymen (compare <sup>4136</sup>Acts 13:46; 18:6; 21:21; 22:21; 26:20,23); it was one of the doctrines which Paul especially endeavored to establish, as a great truth of Christianity, that all the barriers between the nations were to be broken down, and the Gospel proclaimed to all people alike, <sup><R3></sup>Romans 3:29; 9:24,30; 11:11; 15:9-11,16,18; <sup><R10></sup>Galatians 2:2; <sup><R11></sup>Ephesians 2:11-18; 3:1-9. It is under the gospel that this language becomes especially appropriate.

Praise him, all ye people People of all lands. The word here rendered “praise” — j bæ<sup><1762></sup> — means properly to soothe, to still, to restrain — as, for example, billows (<sup><R80></sup>Psalm 89:9); and then, to praise, as if to soothe with praises — mulcere laudibus, Pacuv. The idea of soothing or mitigating, however, is not necessarily in the word, but it may be understood in the general sense of praise. We may in fact often soothe or appease people — angry, jealous, suspicious people — by skillful flattery or praise — for there are few, even when under the influence of anger or hatred, who may not thus be approached, or who do not value praise and commendation more than they do the indulgence of passion; but we cannot hope thus to appease the anger of God. We approach him to utter our deep sense of his goodness, and our veneration for his character; we do not expect to turn him from anger to love — to make him forget his justice or our sins — by soothing flattery.

<sup><R70></sup>Psalm 117:2. For his merciful kindness is great toward us His kindness; his compassion; his love. All nations — all people — may say this, and therefore the psalm is adapted to universal praise. Especially may this be said in view of the love of God to mankind in the gift of a Saviour — a Saviour not for any one people especially or exclusively, but for the world, <sup><R16></sup>John 3:16.

And the truth of the LORD endureth for ever All that God has said: his declarations; his promises; his assurances of mercy. They are the same in all lands where they are made known, and they are the same in all ages of the world. Truth is a representation of things as they are; and truth, therefore, must be ever the same. What was true in the first ages of the world in regard to the relation of the sum of the squares on the two sides of a right-angled triangle to the square of the hypotenuse is true now, and will always be true; and so, what God has affirmed at any one time will always remain the same in all ages and in all lands. What was truth to Abraham is truth to us; what was truth to Paul is truth to us; what was truth to the martyrs is truth to us; what is truth to us will be truth to all generations of the world in all lands, and will be truth forever. This fact, too, is a just foundation for universal praise, and therefore the psalm is so adapted to be used in all lands and among all people. How often in our own language has this psalm been the medium of the utterances of praise in Christian sanctuaries:

*“From all that dwell below the skies,
Let the Creator’s praise arise;
Let the Redeemer’s name be sung,
Through every land, by every tongue.*

*Eternal are thy mercies, Lord;
Eternal truth attends thy word;
Thy praise shall sound from shore to shore,
Till suns shall rise and set no more.*

APPENDIX NOTES ON PSALM 117

Of the psalms written after the return, a large proportion were primarily designed for use in the temple service. So strongly marked is this design, that, if they were collected into one book, it might be entitled, “The Songs of the Second Temple.” Some of them are very short — Psalm 134 for example.

Psalm 117 belongs also to this time. It is the shortest of all the psalms; the shortest, but not the least weighty. It is cited in the Epistle to the Romans as celebrating beforehand the calling of the Gentiles, for it invites them to unite with God’s ancient people in worshipping him. Since the invitation is addressed to all the nations, we may look upon it as truly a millennial song. Overleaping the intervening centuries, it anticipates the happy time when the fullness of the Gentiles shall be brought in. — Binnie.

NOTES ON PSALM 118

Of the authorship of this psalm, and the occasion on which it was composed, nothing can now be ascertained with certainty. The common opinion has been that it is a psalm of David, and that it was composed when his troubles with Saul ceased, and when he was recognized as king. Some, however, have referred it to Hezekiah on the occasion of his restoration from sickness; others to the time of the return from the Babylonian exile; and others to the time of the Maccabees. It would be useless to examine these opinions, as they are all of them mere conjecture, and as no certainty can now be arrived at.

What is apparent on the face of the psalm is, that it was a psalm of thanksgiving, to be employed in the temple when an offering or sacrifice was led up to the altar (<sup><1807></sup>Psalm 118:27) to be presented as an acknowledgment of mercy from God, on some occasion of deliverance from danger, by someone whose claim to rule had been rejected, but who was now victorious over his enemies, and recognized as the rightful leader and ruler of the people. The psalm is in a measure dramatic. The author is the speaker in the first twenty-one verses; in the remainder of the psalm the priests and the people speak, and at the close, the psalmist again utters praise.

The psalm consists of the following parts:

I. The author of the psalm speaks, <sup><1801></sup>Psalm 118:1-21.

(1) He calls on all to praise the Lord, and to unite with him in the expression of thanks, because what had occurred was a matter of interest to all the people; to Israel, to the house of Aaron, to the priesthood to all that feared God, <sup><1814></sup>Psalm 118:14.

(2) A description of his peril and deliverance, <sup><1815></sup>Psalm 118:5-18. He had been in distress; he had called on the Lord; he had seen the benefit of trusting in the Lord rather than in man. All nations had compassed him about as bees; they had thrust sore at him; they had sought his life; but he had not been dismayed; he had felt, even in the midst of his dangers, that he would live to declare the works of the Lord, <sup><1817></sup>Psalm 118:17,18

(3) The speaker approaches the temple. He asks that the doors may be opened that he may enter and praise the Lord. He addresses those who have charge of the temple — the ministers of religion — and desires leave to come and present his offering, <sup><19819></sup>Psalm 118:19-21.

II. The priests and people speak, <sup><19822></sup>Psalm 118:22-27.

(1) They recognize him now as the Ruler — the cornerstone — the foundation of the nation's prosperity, and its hope. He had been rejected by those who were professedly laying the foundation of empire, but he had now established his claims to being regarded as the very cornerstone on which the whole edifice must rest, <sup><19822></sup>Psalm 118:22.

(2) They recognize this as a marvelous work of God, and as suited to excite the deepest admiration, <sup><19823></sup>Psalm 118:23.

(3) They recognize this as a joyful day, as if God had created a day for the very purpose of celebrating an event so joyous, <sup><19824></sup>Psalm 118:24.

(4) They pronounce him blessed who thus came in the name of the Lord; they bless him out of the house of the Lord, <sup><19825></sup>Psalm 118:25,26.

(5) They direct him to bring his offering, and to bind it to the horns of the altar preparatory to sacrifice. He is permitted freely to come. His offering is recognized as proper, so that he can approach with an assurance of acceptance, <sup><19827></sup>Psalm 118:27.

III. The author of the psalm again speaks, <sup><19828></sup>Psalm 118:28,29. He acknowledges God as his God, and calls on all to praise him.

Portions of the psalm are, in the New Testament, applied to Christ; and it has been made a question whether it had, or had not, an original reference to him. Thus in <sup><1214></sup>Matthew 21:42; <sup><1121></sup>Mark 12:11; <sup><1217></sup>Luke 20:17, it is quoted by the Saviour as illustrating a truth in regard to himself. In <sup><1411></sup>Acts 4:11, the twenty-second verse of the psalm is applied by Peter to the Saviour, as having been fulfilled in him — or, as meaning that the language of the psalm would properly describe the fact which had occurred in the treatment of Jesus of Nazareth. Many of the Jewish rabbins regarded the psalm as referring to the Messiah, and not a few Christian interpreters have supposed that it had such an original reference.

It seems clear, however, from the psalm itself that it could not have been composed primarily with reference to him. There are portions of it which cannot, without a very forced use of language, be applied to him, as for example, the allusion to the attack made by “all nations” on the person referred to in the psalm (<sup><HEB10></sup>Psalm 118:10), and in the allusion to the danger of death (<sup><HEB17></sup>Psalm 118:17,18). The person referred to in the psalm was in danger of death, but he was not given over to death. He had the assurance in the very midst of the danger that he would not die, but would continue to live (<sup><HEB17></sup>Psalm 118:17). The Redeemer, however, did die. His enemies accomplished their purpose in this respect. They put him to death, though he rose again from the dead.

It is clear, therefore, I think, that the psalm had not an original reference to the Messiah. Still, there is much in it which is applicable to him, and which might be used as expressive of what occurred to him. It contains principles also which may be as applicable to him as they were to the psalmist; and, therefore, it is used by the Saviour to enforce the moral of his own parable in reference to himself, as having had a counterpart in their own history, in a case which must have been familiar to them all. As such, it is right to use it now, as illustrating what occurred in the treatment of the Redeemer.

<sup><HEB1></sup>Psalm 118:1. O give thanks unto the LORD ... Let others unite with me in giving thanks to the Lord; let them see, from what has occurred in my case, what occasion there is for praise. Every instance of a particular favor shown to anyone is to others an occasion for praise, inasmuch as it is an illustration of the general character of God. On this verse compare the notes at <sup><HEB10></sup>Psalm 106:1. The language is nearly the same.

<sup><HEB2></sup>Psalm 118:2. Let Israel now say ... The Hebrew people; the people of God. They have now, in my case, a new illustration of the mercy of God which ought to animate them, and to encourage their hearts. Compare <sup><HEB9></sup>Psalm 115:9.

<sup><HEB3></sup>Psalm 118:3. Let the house of Aaron now say ... Compare <sup><HEB10></sup>Psalm 115:10. The ministers of religion. They are appointed to serve God; to lead in his worship; to defend his truth; to keep up faith in the truth of religion. They are, therefore, interested in my case, and may derive from it a new proof of the merciful character of God which they may employ, not only for their own encouragement in personal piety, but in the duties of their office. My case furnishes a new argument, of which they can make use in defending the truth, and in illustrating the power of religion.

Psalm 118:4. Let them now that fear the LORD say ... Compare Psalm 115:11. All that worship God are interested in what God has done for me. It is a manifestation of the divine character which should cheer them. They are called, therefore, to unite with the author of the psalm in praise and thanksgiving, not merely from sympathy with him, but because great truths of religion had been illustrated, in his case, which were of as much importance to them as to him.

Psalm 118:5. I called upon the LORD in distress Margin, as in Hebrew, “out of distress.” In the very midst of trouble he called upon the Lord; his voice was heard, as it were, coming from the depth of his sorrows. See the notes at Psalm 18:6.

The LORD answered me That is, he heard my prayers, and delivered me. See the notes at Psalm 18:6.

And set me in a large place I was before pressed on every side; sorrows compassed me around; I could not move; I had no liberty. Now he gave me space and freedom on every side, so that I could move without obstruction or pain. This is literally, “The LORD” — (not hwby<sup>h3068</sup> here, but Hy<sup>h3060</sup>) “answered me in a large place.” See the notes at Psalm 4:1; 18:19.

Psalm 118:6. The LORD is on my side Margin, as in Hebrew, “for me.” The Lord is with me. He is my helper. He defends my cause.

I will not fear I have nothing to be afraid of. God is more mighty than any or all of my foes, and he can deliver me from them all. Compare Psalm 56:4,9,11.

What can man do unto me? Any person; all people. They can do no more than God permits. They cannot destroy me when he means to save me; they cannot defeat his gracious designs toward me. I am safe if God is my Friend. Compare the notes at Romans 8:31.

Psalm 118:7. The LORD taketh my part with them that help me The psalmist had friends. There were those who stood by him. He relied, indeed, on their aid, but not on their aid without God. He felt that even their help was valuable to him only as God was with them. There was direct dependence on God in reference to himself; and there was the same sense of dependence in respect to all who were engaged in his defense. This might be rendered, however, simply “for my help,” and is so rendered by DeWette. The Septuagint and Latin Vulgate render it, “The Lord is my helper.”

Therefore shall I see my desire upon them that hate me literally, “I shall see upon those that hate me;” that is, I shall look upon them according to my wish; I shall see them overthrown and subdued. See the notes at <sup><950></sup>Psalm 54:7. Compare <sup><921></sup>Psalm 92:11; 112:8.

<sup><988></sup>Psalm 118:8. It is better to trust in the LORD than to put confidence in man This is stated apparently as the result of his own experience. He had found people weak and faithless; he had not so found God. Compare <sup><940></sup>Psalm 40:4; 62:8,9. Literally, “Good is it to trust in Yahweh more than to confide in man.” This is the Hebrew form of comparison, and is equivalent to what is stated in our version, “It is better,” etc. It is better,

- (1) because man is weak — but God is Almighty;
- (2) because man is selfish — but God is benevolent;
- (3) because man is often faithless and deceitful — God never;
- (4) because there are emergencies, as death, in which man cannot aid us, however faithful, kind, and friendly he may be — but there are no circumstances in this life, and none in death, where God cannot assist us; and
- (5) because the ability of man to help us pertains at best only to this present life — the power of God will be commensurate with eternity.

<sup><989></sup>Psalm 118:9. It is better ... than to put confidence in princes Even in the most mighty of the human race; in those who of all people may be supposed to have the most ability to aid us; in those whose favor is often sought more than the favor of God. Princes are only men; often as faithless and deceitful as other men; often less reliable in their character than those in more humble life. and in the great matters where we most need aid — in sickness, in danger, in death, in the eternal world — as absolutely powerless as men in the lowest condition of poverty, or in the most humble rank.

Psalm 118:10. All nations compassed me about They surrounded me; they hemmed me in on every side, so that I seemed to have no chance to escape. It would seem from this that the psalm was composed by someone who was at the head of the government, and whose government had been attacked by surrounding nations. This would accord well with many things that occurred in the life of David; but there were also other times in the Jewish history to which it would be applicable, and there is nothing that necessarily confines it to the time of David.

But in the name of the LORD will I destroy them Margin, as in Hebrew, “cut them off.” This is the language which he used at that time; the purpose which he then formed; an expression of the confidence which he then cherished. He meant to subdue them; he had no doubt that he would be able to do it.

Psalm 118:11. They compassed me about; yea, they compassed me about ... The sentiment and the language of the previous verse are here repeated, as if to give force to what he had said, or to deepen the impression. His own mind dwelt upon it, and the events to which he referred came so vividly to his recollection, and were so important, that he dwells upon them. The subject was worth more than a passing remark. The mind was full, and the language comes from an overflowing heart.

Psalm 118:12. They compassed me about like bees

(a) As thick or numerous as bees;

(b) armed as bees — or, their weapons might be compared to the stings of bees.

They are quenched as the fire of thorns The Septuagint and the Vulgate render this, “They burn as the fire of thorns.” The connection would seem to demand this, but the Hebrew will not bear it. The figure is changed in the Hebrew, as is not uncommon. The mind of the psalmist at first recalls the number and the malignity of his foes; it then instantly adverts to the rapid manner in which they were destroyed. The illustration from the “fire of thorns” is derived from the fact that they quickly kindle into a blaze, and then the flame soon dies away. In Eastern countries it was common to burn over their fields in the dry time of the year, and thus to clear them of thorns and briars and weeds. Of course, at such a time they would kindle quickly, and burn rapidly, and would soon be consumed. So the psalmist says it was with his enemies. He came upon them, numerous as they were, as the fire runs over a field in a dry time, burning everything before it. Compare the notes at <sup><2332></sup>Isaiah 33:12.

For in the name of the LORD I will destroy them That is, such was his purpose then; such was the reason why they so soon and suddenly disappeared.

<sup><4813></sup>Psalm 118:13. Thou hast thrust sore at me that I might fall literally, “Thrusting thou hast thrust at me.” This is the Hebrew mode of expressing intensity, repetition, or emphasis. The meaning is, that they had made a deadly thrust at him; that they had repeated the blows; that they had come with a fierce determination to crush and destroy him. The psalmist, as it were, sees the enemy again before him, and addresses him as if he were present. Everything is vivid to the mind; the whole scene appears again to pass before him.

<sup><4814></sup>Psalm 118:14. The LORD is my strength and song He is the source of strength to me; and he is the subject of my praise. There is no ground of praise in myself for anything that I have done, but all is due to him.

And is become my salvation He has saved me. I live because he preserved me. So we shall be saved in heaven solely because he saves us, and there, more than can be possible here, we shall say, “God is our strength and our song, and is become our salvation.”

Is in the tabernacles of the righteous The tents of the righteous; their dwellings. That is,

- (a) it is a fact that the voice of joy and rejoicing is there;
- (b) it is appropriate that it should be so, (or that a righteous family should be happy — the dwelling-place of praise;
- (c) God will add to the happiness of the righteous, or will make their habitation happy, peaceful, blessed.

There is nothing that diffuses so much happiness through a family as religion; there is no joy like that when a member of a family is converted;

there is no place on earth more happy than that where a family bows before God with the feeling that all are children of God and heirs of salvation.

The right hand of the LORD doeth valiantly Hebrew “Doeth strength.” That is, God does great things, laying the foundation for joy and praise.

Psalm 118:17. I shall not die, but live Evidently the psalmist had apprehended that he would die; or, he had felt that he was in imminent danger of dying. In this language he seems, as in Psalm 118:13, to go back again to the scenes referred to in the psalm. He lives them over again. He describes the feelings which he had then. He saw that he was in danger. His enemies were thick round about him, and sought his life. But he had then the assurance that they would not be victorious; that they would not accomplish their object; that he would be protected; that he would live to declare what God had done for him. He does not say how he had this assurance, but there is no impropriety in supposing that he had it, as Hezekiah had in similar circumstances (see Isaiah 38:5-8,21), by a direct divine intimation. Things like this are not uncommon now, when, in danger or in sickness, the mind is strongly impressed with the belief that there will be a restoration to health and safety, and when the mind is made calm and peaceful by that belief — the very calmness of the mind under such a belief contributing not a little to that result. Why should we hesitate to believe that such a faith and hope may come from the Lord? Compare Acts 27:22-25.

And declare the works of the LORD Declare what he has done.

Psalm 118:18. The LORD hath chastened me sore Hebrew, “The Lord has chastened — has chastened me.” See the notes at Psalm 118:13. The psalmist had been greatly afflicted, and he now looked upon his affliction in the light of a fatherly chastisement or correction. It had been a severe trial, and he was not insensible to its severity, though he regarded it as designed for his own good.

But he hath not given we over unto death He interposed when I was in danger; he rescued me when I was on the verge of the grave. This is the close of the psalmist’s statement in regard to the divine dealings with him. He had passed through great danger; he had been sorely afflicted; but he had been rescued and spared, and he came now to express his thanks to God for his recovery. In the following verse he addresses those who had the care of the sanctuary, and asks that he might be permitted to enter and offer his thanks to God.

Psalm 118:19. Open to me the gates of righteousness ... The gates of the house devoted to a righteous God; the gates of a house where the principles of righteousness are strengthened, and where the just emotions of the heart may be expressed in the language of praise. Compare the notes at Isaiah 26:2. The language here may be regarded as addressed to those who had charge of the house of the Lord — the priests — requesting that they would open the doors and permit him to enter to praise God for his mercy. Compare Isaiah 38:20.

Psalm 118:20. This gate of the LORD This gate dedicated to the service of the Lord; that belongs to the house of the Lord.

Into which the righteous shall enter Through which the righteous pass. That is, It is for such persons, and all who come with a purpose to serve and worship God should be permitted to pass through them; I claim the privilege, therefore, of so passing through these gates into the house of God, for I come to praise him. All who are truly righteous, all who desire to worship God, all who wish and purpose to be holy, have a right thus to enter the house of God — to be recognized as his friends — to be permitted to join in all the devotions of his people; all such will have a right to enter the temple above. None have a right to exclude them here; none in heaven will be disposed to exclude them there.

Psalm 118:21. I will praise thee Within thy courts.

For thou hast heard me, and art become my salvation See Psalm 118:14.

Psalm 118:22. The stone which the builders refused See the notes at Matthew 21:42,43. Compare Mark 12:10,11; Acts 4:11; 1 Peter 2:7. This is an allusion to a building, as if a stone should be cast away by workmen as unfit to be worked into the edifice. The figure would then be applicable to anyone who, for any purpose, was rejected. Thus it might have been applied many a time to David; so, doubtless, to others who urged claims to authority and power; and so, eminently, to the Lord Jesus Christ. We are not to suppose that this had original reference to the Messiah, but the language was applicable to him; and it is used in the passages above referred to, in addresses to the Jews, merely to show them how the principle was found in their own writings, that one who was rejected, like a stone regarded as unfit to be worked into any part of a building, might be in reality so important that it would be laid yet at the very corner, and become the most valuable stone in the edifice — that on which the whole superstructure would rest.

Is become the head stone of the corner The principal stone placed at the corner of the edifice. This is usually one of the largest, the most solid, and the most carefully constructed of any in the edifice. Of course one would be needed at each corner of the building to constitute a firm support, but usually there is one placed at one corner of an edifice larger and more carefully made than the others, often laid with imposing ceremonies, and prepared to contain whatever it may be thought necessary to deposit in the foundation of the building to be transmitted to future times as preserving the names of the builders, or expressing the design of the edifice. Such a position he who had been rejected was to occupy in the civil polity of his country; such a position eminently the Lord Jesus occupies in relation to the church. <sup><4121></sup>Ephesians 2:20.

<sup><4123></sup>Psalm 118:23. This is the LORD'S doing Margin, as in Hebrew, "This is from the Lord." That is, It is to be traced to the Lord alone. It is not the result of human wisdom or power. The deliverance from danger — the raising up from the low condition — the change by which he who was rejected was restored to his rightful place — all this was to be traced to God alone. So it was in the case of the psalmist; so it was in the case of the Redeemer. None but God could have made him who was rejected, despised, crucified, and laid in the grave, the Saviour of a world. The place which the once rejected Redeemer now bears in the church — the honors bestowed on him as the head of the church — the triumph of his gospel in the world — all prove that it is the work of God.

It is marvelous in our eyes It is suited to excite wonder. It is not one of those things which are to be ranked with the common and well-known events that are easily explained, and that excite no wonder; it is one of those things which cannot be explained by any known law; which belong to the "supernatural;" which bear the marks of a direct divine interposition; which are suited to excite the admiration of mankind. Thus it was in the case of the psalmist; thus, pre-eminently, it was in the case of the Redeemer. No operation of natural laws will constitute a sufficient explanation of the latter. It is a matter for wonder, for rejoicing, and for praise, that one, despised, rejected, crucified, has been raised from the grave; that his religion has spread so far over the world; that it influences mankind as it does; and that he himself is exalted to a rank “far above all principality, and power, and might, and dominion, and every name that is named, not only in this world, but also in that which is to come.” ~~4012~~ Ephesians 1:21.

~~4882~~ Psalm 118:24. This is the day which the LORD hath made As if it were a new day, made for this very occasion; a day which the writer of the psalm did not expect to see, and which seemed therefore to have been created out of the ordinary course, and added to the other days. He was in danger of death; his days were likely to be cut off and ended, so that he should see no more. But God had spared him, and added this joyous day to his life; and it was meet that for this he should be praised. It was so full of joy, so unexpected, so bright, so cheerful, that it appeared to be a new day coming fresh from the hand of the Almighty, unlike the other days of the year. So the Sabbath — the day that commemorates the resurrection of the Redeemer — is God’s day. He claims it. He seems to have made it anew for man. Amidst the other days of the week — in a world where the ordinary days are filled up with so much of earth, so much toil, trouble, care, vexation, vanity, wickedness — it seems like one of the days that God made when he first made the world; before sin and sorrow entered; when all was calm, serene, happy. The Sabbath is so calm, so bright, so cheerful, so benign in its influence; it is so full of pleasant and holy associations and reminiscences, that it seems to be a day fresh from the hand of God, unlike the other days of the week, and made especially, as if by a new act of creation, for the good of mankind. So when a man is raised up from sickness — from the borders of the grave — it seems to be a new life given to him. Each day, week, month, year that he may live, is so much added to his life, as if it were created anew for this very purpose. He should, therefore, regard it not as his own, but as so much given to him by the special mercy and providence of God — as if added on to his life. Compare ~~2385~~ Isaiah 38:5.

We will rejoice and be glad in it The psalmist, and all who united with him in his thanksgivings. So the Christian Sabbath. It is a day of joy — all joy, and no sorrow. It is a day to be happy in; a day of rest; a day, when the cares and toils of life are suspended; a day, when we are no longer harassed with those things which vex us in the worldliness of the week; a day, when we think of God, of redemption, of hope, of heaven. The Sabbath should be a day of joy, and not of gloom; it would be the happiest of all days to weary and jaded people everywhere, if they observed it aright. In a world of toil and sorrow, it is among the richest of God's blessings to people; it strengthens, refreshes, and cheers the heart of burdened and sorrowful man here; it lifts the soul to joyous contemplation of that eternal Sabbath where wearisome toll and sorrow shall be no more.

Psalm 118:25. Save now, I beseech thee, O LORD ... The word save here seems to be used in the general sense of imploring the divine interposition and mercy. It is a part of the word which in the New Testament is rendered "Hosanna" — save now (<sup>420</sup>Matthew 21:9) — and is the language which the multitudes employed when they followed the Saviour as he went from the Mount of Olives to Jerusalem. The language which they used on that occasion was borrowed from this psalm, and was eminently appropriate to the occasion — "Hosanna — blessed be he that cometh in the name of the Lord;" but the fact that it was thus employed does not prove that the psalm had original reference to the Messiah. The language was not improbably used on high festivals, and would be naturally employed when the Messiah came.

Send now prosperity Give success; be favorable. God had interposed, and now the prayer is, that there might be continued and uninterrupted prosperity; that as the tide had begun to turn in the psalmist's favor, it might recede no more; that the calamities and woes which he had experienced might not be repeated. This was omitted in the acclamations of the multitude that attended the Saviour (<sup>420</sup>Matthew 21:9); but it is eminently an appropriate prayer to be used in connection with his coming — since his coming, whether to the world, to an individual, to a church, or to a community, brings the highest kind of "prosperity" in its train.

Psalm 118:26. Blessed be he that cometh in the name of the LORD See the notes at <sup>420</sup>Matthew 21:9. This is the language of those who had charge of the sanctuary, addressing him who came in the name of the Lord to present his thank-offering. It is the language of welcome; the assurance that his offering would be acceptable to God. It was applicable to the Messiah, as coming in the name of the Lord, and was so used by the multitudes (<sup>420</sup>Matthew 21:9), and by the Saviour himself (<sup>423</sup>Matthew 23:39); but this use of the language does not prove that it had original reference to him. The Old Testament abounds in language which may thus be employed to express ideas under the Christian dispensation; but this does not prove that all such language was originally designed to refer to that dispensation.

We have blessed you out of the house of the LORD We, the priests, the ministers of religion, have pronounced and do pronounce you blessed. We welcome your approach. You may come freely with your thank-offering. It will be accepted of the Lord. You come under our benediction, and the benediction of God.

~~4887~~ Psalm 118:27. God is the LORD Still the language of the priests in their official capacity. The meaning here seems to be “God is Yahweh;” or, Jehovah is the true God. It is an utterance of the priesthood in regard to the great truth which they were appointed specifically to maintain — that Yahweh is the true God, and that he only is to be worshipped. This truth it was appropriate to enunciate on all occasions; and it was especially appropriate to be enunciated when a prince, who had been rescued from danger and death, came, as the restored leader of the people of God, to acknowledge his gracious intervention. On such an occasion — in view of the rank and character of him who came — and in view of what God had done for him — it was proper for the ministers of religion to announce in the most solemn manner, that Yahweh was the only true and living God.

Which hath showed us light Who has given us light in the days of our darkness and adversity; who has restored us to prosperity, and bestowed on us the blessings of safety and of peace.

Bind the sacrifice with cords Come freely with the sacrificial victim; with the offering which is to be presented to God in sacrifice. The word — gj <sup><1282></sup> æ — commonly means a festival or feast, <sup><2019></sup>Exodus 10:9; 12:14; and then it means a festival-sacrifice, a victim, <sup><0238></sup>Exodus 23:18; <sup><3018></sup>Malachi 2:3. The Septuagint and Vulgate render it, “Prepare a solemn feast.” Our translation probably expresses the true sense. The word rendered cords, means properly anything interwoven or interlaced. Then it means a cord, a braid, a wreath; and then a branch with thick foliage. Different interpretations have been given of the passage here, but probably the word is correctly rendered cords.

Unto the horns of the altar altars were often made with projections or “horns” on the four corners. <sup><0270></sup>Exodus 27:2; 30:2; 37:25; <sup><1028></sup>1 Kings 2:28. Whether the animal was actually bound to the altar when it was slain, is not certain; but there would seem to be an allusion to such a custom here. Lead up the victim; make it ready; bind it even to the altar, preparatory to the sacrifice. The language is that of welcome addressed to him who led up the victim — meaning that his sacrifice would be acceptable.

~~1838~~ Psalm 118:28. Thou art my God, and I will praise thee This is the language of the author of the psalm — his solemn profession before the sanctuary and the altar; his response to the priesthood. In ~~1837~~ Psalm 118:27, they had declared that “Jehovah alone was God;” to this he now replies, that he acknowledges, it; he recognizes him as the true God, and as his God; he comes to praise him; and he professes his purpose always to exalt him as his God.

Thou art my God, I will exalt thee Repeating the solemn declaration that Yahweh alone was the God whom he worshipped, and that it was his purpose always to magnify his name.

~~1839~~ Psalm 118:29. O give thanks unto the LORD ... The psalm closes, as it began, with an exhortation to praise God. In the beginning of the psalm, it was a general exhortation; here it is an exhortation founded on the course of thought in the psalm, or as a proper conclusion from what had been referred to in the psalm. Evidence had been given that the Lord was good; on the ground of that, all people are exhorted to give him thanks.

APPENDIX NOTES ON PSALM 118

These temple songs are not all short. Some of them are among the longest in the Psalter. Psalm 118 may be named as a beautiful example. It is evidently a temple song; and the critics, with great unanimity, ascribe it to the century after the return. The precise occasion on which it was written is a point on which opinions differ; some of the critics, like Ewald, holding that it was composed to be sung at the feast of tabernacles, when the remnant who returned commenced to offer again the daily sacrifice; others, with Hengstenberg, connecting it with the laying of the foundation of the house; while others again, with Delitzsch, connect it with the solemnity of the dedication. The truth seems to be that it is simply a festal psalm of the second temple, which may well have been sung on any or all of the occasions named by the critics, but is not to be restricted to anyone in particular. It breathes a spirit of jubilant trust in the Lord, in the midst of infinite difficulties and perils. Its trumpet tones made it one of Luther's favorites. In the midsummer of 1530, when Melancthon was deputed to present the Confession of the Protestant churches of Germany to the diet at Augsburg, Luther was advised to abstain from any public appearance. Looking out from his retirement on the perils of the time, "the sea and the waves roaring, and men's hearts failing them from fear," he found in Psalm 118. a word in season, and set his pen to work on an exposition of it. In the dedication, which is dated "ex Eremo, the first of July, MDXXX.," he gives characteristic expression to his love for this portion of the divine Word. "Since I am obliged to sit here idle in the desert, and, moreover, must sometimes spare my head, and give it a rest and holiday from my great task of translating all the prophets, I have gone back to my mine of wealth, my treasure. I have taken in hand my precious psalm, the Confitemini, and put on paper my meditations upon it. For it is my psalm that I delight in. For although the whole Psalter and the Holy Scripture is dear to me, my proper comfort and life, I have taken so to this psalm in particular that I must call it my own. Many a service has it done me; out of many great perils has it helped me, when help I had none, either from emperor, or king, or saint, or wise and prudent. I would not give it in exchange for the honor, wealth, and power of all the world, pope, Turk, and emperor. In calling the psalm mine own, I rob no man of it. Christ is mine, nevertheless he is the same Christ to all the saints that he is to me. Would God that all the world would challenge the psalm for their own as I do; it would be such friendly contention as scarce any unity or love could compare with. Alas! that there should be so few, even among those who might well do it, who will once say to the Holy Scriptures, or to some particular psalm, Thou art my book: thou shalt be mine own psalm." — Binnie.

~~VERSE~~ Psalm 118:12. They compassed me about like bees; they are quenched as the fire of thorns The reader has here in miniature two of the finest images in Homer; which, if his curiosity demands to be gratified, he will find illustrated and enlarged, Iliad, ii. ver. 86.

*The following host,
Poured forth by thousands, darkens all the coast.
As from some rocky cleft the shepherd sees,
Clustering, in heaps on heaps, the driving bees,*

*Rolling and blackening, swarms succeeding swarms,
With deeper murmurs and more hoarse alarms;
Dusky they spread, a close embodied crowd,
And o'er the veil descends the living cloud;*

*So from the tents and ships a lengthening train Spreads all the beach and wide o'ershades the plain,
Along the region runs a deafening sound;
Beneath their footsteps groans the trembling ground.
— Pope's Translation*

The other image, the fire consuming the thorns, we find in the same book, ver. 455:

*As on some mountain, through the lofty grove,
The crackling flames ascend and blaze above;
The fires expanding, as the winds arise,
Shoot their long beams, and kindle half the skies:
So, from the polished arms and brazen shields,
A gleaming splendor flashed along the fields.
— Pope's Translation*

The arms resembling a gleaming fire is common both to the psalmist and Homer; but the idea of that fire being quenched when the army was conquered is unique to the psalmist. — Adam Clarke.

Psalm 118:22. The stone which the builders refused is become the head stone of the corner It is to be regretted that the author should have maintained that the psalm in general, and this verse in particular, had no original or designed reference to the Messiah, but simply contained principles and statements which might be accommodated to him, or “might be used as expressive of what occurred to him.” There does not seem to be any serious difficulty in the way of Messianic reference either in <sup>4182</sup>Psalm 118:10 or <sup>41817</sup>Psalm 118:17, to both of which the author has made his appeal. (See his introduction to the psalm.) For if we understand the compassing nations (<sup>41810</sup>Psalm 118:10) of the Samaritans, Idumeans, and Ammonites, who sought to hinder the Jews in rebuilding the city and temple, it is not inconsistent with the usage of prophecy to carry the mind forward to the Redeemer and his church, against whom the nations rise in vain. Again, if we suppose the restored nation and church of Israel at this time to rejoice in the assurance that they should not be delivered over to death or extinction, have we not a foreshadowing of the grand assurance that Christ and his church shall endure forever, and discover and proclaim the works of God?

But it is not necessary to the Messianic sense of particular passages in a psalm that we should be able to interpret the entire psalm in all its parts of him. Whatever, therefore, may be thought of the above remarks, we maintain that the express and frequent applications of <sup><182></sup>Psalm 118:22 in the New Testament to Christ by himself and his apostles must be held as setting the matter at rest forever.

We subjoin Perowne's note, as it contains a just exposition of principles, and renders it unnecessary to remark on other prophetic parts of the psalm: "Under this figure, suggested, no doubt, by the building of the temple, and the poor aspect it presented as compared with the first temple, is denoted primarily the people of Israel. They had been despised by their pagan masters, but now, by the good hand of their God upon them, they had been lifted up into a place of honor. They, rejected by people, were chosen of God as the foundation-stone of that new spiritual building which Yahweh was about to erect; that temple of the world, the foundation of which was to be laid in Zion. In <sup><124></sup>Matthew 21:42-44; <sup><120></sup>Mark 12:10,11; <sup><107></sup>Luke 20:17, our Lord applies the words of this and the next verse to himself. The quotation was, it would seem, purposely taken from the same psalm from which the multitude had just before taken their words of salutation, as they went forth to meet him and conduct him in triumph into Jerusalem. But there is more than an application of the words. Israel is not only a figure of Christ, there is an organic unity between him and them. Whatever, therefore, is true of Israel in a lower sense, is true in its highest sense of Christ. Is Israel God's 'first-born son?' The name in its fulfillment belongs to Christ (<sup><125></sup>Matthew 2:15); if Israel is 'the servant of Jehovah,' he is so only as imperfectly representing him who said, 'My meat is to do the will of him who sent me, and to finish his work.' If Israel is the rejected stone made the head of the corner, this is far more true of him who was indeed rejected by people, but chosen of God and precious; the cornerstone of the one great living temple of the redeemed, whether Jews or Gentiles (compare <sup><121></sup>Ephesians 2:20). See the use of the same figure in its application to our Lord by Peter, <sup><101></sup>Acts 4:11; <sup><107></sup>1 Peter 2:7.

"The passage which forms the connecting link between this psalm and the New Testament quotations is <sup><236></sup>Isaiah 28:16, 'Behold it is I who have laid securely in Zion a stone, a tried precious cornerstone, most securely laid, he that believeth (that is, resteth thereon) shall not flee (through fear of any evil).’ In this passage the Messianic reference is still more direct, even if we suppose a primary reference to the house of David. (It is interpreted as Messianic both by the Targum and, among the rabbinical commentators, by Rashi.) In marked contrast with this, it is said of Babylon, <sup>2512</sup>Jeremiah 51:26, ‘They shall not take of thee a stone for a corner, nor a stone for a foundation.’”

NOTES ON PSALM 119

This is an Alphabetical Psalm — the longest, and most perfect in its kind, in the collection of Psalms. The peculiarity of the composition consists in this — that the first eight verses of the psalm begin with the first letter of the Hebrew alphabet — ‘Aleph (a); the next eight verses with the second letter — Beth (b); and so on, through the twenty-two letters of the alphabet. These parts are designated in our common version by the names of the Hebrew letters respectively indicating the parts — Aleph, Beth, Gimel, Daleth, etc.

The general subject of the psalm is THE LAW OF GOD considered as a rule of life; as sanctifying the soul; as a support in trial; as imparting happiness to the mind — in its contemplation, and in obedience to it. The psalm appears to have been intended to set forth the excellency of that law, and the happy effects of obeying it, in every variety of form, and with every variety of expression. In its great length, extending to one hundred and seventy-six verses, there was ample opportunity to illustrate this; and the purpose of the author of the psalm seems to have been to see how much could be said on this, and to say all that could be said on it. It is remarkable that a single subject could be pursued so far with so much variety, and with so little that can be regarded as repetition, for there are perhaps no two verses in the psalm so exactly similar that there cannot be seen, either in themselves, or in their connection, some new phase given to the subject, or some new shade of thought not expressed elsewhere. So marked is this design of the psalm, so constant is the reference to the law of God — the testimonies of God — the statutes of God — that, according to the Masora, there is “only one verse in the psalm which does not contain some title or description of the word of God.”

The psalm seems to be a record of the personal experience of the author, or the result of his meditations on the subject. It is not the Jewish people speaking, or the church, as many have supposed, but it is evidently an individual — not improbably a man of years — giving the result of his experience in regard to the influence of the law or the word of God in the various circumstances of life: in regard to what he had found that to be to himself personally. At the same time, the language is such as will express the experience of others, and is such as might be employed in public worship.

It is not probable, however, that a psalm so long was commonly used in public worship, as many of the shorter psalms were. It is a great storehouse of truths, most precious and valuable, on one of the most important subjects of religion — the word of God; and it may have been intended, as would seem not improbable from the alphabetical arrangement, to be committed to memory by the young, that their minds might be early stored with valuable precepts to be their guide in the journey of life. A young man could not have a better treasure laid up in his mind than he would possess by committing this psalm to memory.

Whether the psalm was the work of David or of some later writer cannot be ascertained. Many have ascribed it to David; and it has been supposed that he wrote it either when he was an exile among the Philistines (1 Samuel 27), or when he was young, and had not yet obtained the authority of the government. This last opinion is derived — Rosenmuller thinks correctly — from <sup><4830></sup>Psalm 119:9,23,46,141,161. Gurlitt supposed that its author was some youth who was made captive by the Assyrians, and who composed the psalm in his captivity, as expressive of his attachment to his religion: a youth who could not, though away from his country and home, and surrounded by temptations, be turned away from the religion of his fathers by threats or bribes; who rejected all the allurements and blandishments which could be presented to him to induce him to abandon that religion, and to conform to the customs of idolatry — or who resisted all temptations to sensual gratifications. This idea is derived from <sup><4832></sup>Psalm 119:22,23,25,28,29,36,39,42,43,46,50,51,53,56,67,72,74,78,83,84,95,109. Thus understood, it would be applicable to the condition of such a young Hebrew as Joseph or Daniel, and would express the feelings which such young men would have in the temptations by which they were surrounded, and the firmness of their attachment to the principles of the religion in which they had been trained. The idea is a beautiful one, and may properly be used for an illustration, but there is no certain evidence that the psalm was composed under those circumstances. Others have supposed that the psalm was written by Jaddo (<sup><4622></sup>Nehemiah 12:22), the high priest in the time of Alexander the Great — amidst the troubles which then existed in Judea, and amidst the opposition of the Samaritans — and that the design was to show his own firmness in the Jewish religion, and to excite the Hebrews to the same firmness by setting forth the authority and excellence of the word of God, and the authority of the law. Rudinger supposes that it was composed in the time of the persecutions under Antiochus — the times of the Maccabees — with the same design. All these are mere conjectures, and it is now impossible to ascertain the occasion on which the psalm was composed, or to determine who was its author. Nor is it necessary. The psalm is so applicable to the people of God at all times, so suited to strengthen the mind in trial, so adapted to guide, comfort, and support the soul, and so true in regard to the influence and value of the law of God, that it is not needful to know when it was composed, or who its author was. It is sufficient to know that it was composed under the guidance of the Holy Spirit, and is a repository of truths which will be of inestimable value in all ages of the world.

There is no grouping or arrangement of the subjects in the psalm, and little or no connection between the sentiments in the verses of it. Much in it has a proverbial cast, or is presented in the form of aphorisms; and the order of thought seems to have been suggested by the necessity of choosing a particular letter with which to commence each verse, and the succession of eight verses under each letter. It might be possible to make an arrangement of the psalm under particular heads — such as the following, under the general title of THE WORD OF GOD, or THE LAW OF GOD:

- I. In youth
- II. In trial
- III. In duty
- IV. In meditation
- V. At night
- VI. In public
- VII. In private
- VIII. In prosperity
- IX. In adversity, etc., etc.

but, in an exposition of the psalm, such an arrangement or classification, changing the structure of the psalm, might be of doubtful propriety, and it will be right to adhere to the order which the Spirit of Inspiration has seen fit to observe.

Psalm 119:1. Blessed are the undefiled in the way In the way or journey of life; in the path of religion; in the road which leads to heaven. As life — the religious life — is represented under the image of a journey, the expression here is equivalent to saying, “Blessed are those who in the journey of life — in their religious course — are pure, Sincere, uncontaminated.” On the word way, see the notes at <sup><BOOK6></sup>Psalm 1:6. The margin here on the word undefiled, is perfect, or sincere. So the Hebrew. The word is the same as in <sup><BOOK6></sup>Job 1:1, where it is rendered “perfect.” See the notes at that passage. The Greek translation is undefiled — <sup><BOOK6></sup>αμωμοι <sup><BOOK6></sup><299>. So the Latin, “immaculati.” Luther renders it, “Who live without blemish” or stain. The idea is, “Blessed are they who are upright, sincere, perfect, in their course.” The whole psalm is designed to illustrate this thought, by showing what the influence of a sincere and conscientious attachment to the principles of the law or word of God in the various circumstances of life must be.

Who walk in the law of the LORD Who habitually obey his law. This constitutes sincerity, uprightness, perfection in a man’s life, for the law of the Lord is the only just rule of human conduct.

<sup><BOOK6></sup>Psalm 119:2. Blessed are they that keep his testimonies His commandments or laws, considered as what he bears witness to concerning that which is just, wise, good. Every law of a parent is to his children a testimony on his part of what is wise and right and good; and so every law of God is his solemn testimony as to what is right and good for man. See the notes at <sup><BOOK6></sup>Psalm 19:7; 25:10.

And that seek him with the whole heart With a sincere desire to know his will and to do it; without hypocrisy or guile; with no selfish or sinister aims. As God knows the heart, all other modes of “seeking” him must be in vain. It is impossible for man to impose on him by appearances.

(1) That they are habitually and characteristically righteous;

(2) That they intend to do right — for a man who deliberately purposes to do wrong — to lead a life of sin and disobedience, cannot be a pious man.

(3) That when they do err, it is not the result of intention, or the design of their life, but because they are tempted; are overcome with passion; are led by the power of their native corruption of heart to act contrary to their better judgment and their true character.

See <sup><B174></sup>Romans 7:14-17. On the other hand, it is true that a man who is not characteristically righteous; who is not an upright man in his dealings; who is not true, and honest, and temperate, and just, and benevolent, cannot be a child of God and heir of heaven. No exactness of orthodoxy, and no fervour of emotion, and no zeal in the cause of religion, can constitute true piety without this.

They walk in his ways Habitually; constantly; characteristically. They are not merely honest, upright, and just in their dealings with men, but they walk in the ways of God; they are religious.

<sup><B104></sup>Psalm 119:4. Thou hast commanded All this is here traced to the command of God; to the fact that he has required it. It is not mere human prudence; it is not mere morality; it is not because it will be for our interest; it is because God requires it. This is the foundation of all true virtue; and until a man acts from this motive it cannot be said that he is in the proper sense a righteous man.

To keep thy precepts diligently Hebrew, “very much;” that is, to do it constantly; faithfully. Each one of his laws is to be observed, and to be observed always, and in all circumstances.

<sup><B105></sup>Psalm 119:5. O that my ways were directed ... Indicating the desire of the pious heart. That desire — a prevailing, constant, uniform desire — is to keep the law of God. It is the aim of the life; it is the supreme purpose of the soul; it is the ruling wish of the man, thus to keep the law of God. He in whose bosom this is not the constant wish cannot be a pious man. The Hebrew particle used here, and rendered “O that,” is a particle denoting a wish, or an earnest desire. The word “ways” denotes the course of life. The whole is expressive of an earnest desire to live in accordance with the law of God. It implies also a sense of dependence on God.

Psalm 119:6. Then shall I not be ashamed On the word ashamed, see the notes at Job 6:20; Psalm 25:2,3. The meaning here is, that he would not have occasion to be ashamed; he would not be disappointed; all his hopes would be realized. He would have full evidence of piety; he would enjoy the comforts which he sought in religion; he would feel assured of ultimately obtaining eternal life.

When I have respect unto all thy commandments literally, “In my looking at all thy commandments.” That is, in his regarding them; in his feeling that all were equally binding on him; and in his having the consciousness that he had not intentionally neglected, violated, or disregarded any of them. There can be no true piety except where a man intends to keep ALL the commands of God. If he makes a selection among them, keeping this one or that one, as may be most convenient for him, or as may be most for his interest, or as may be most popular, it is full proof that he knows nothing of the nature of true religion. A child has no proper respect for a parent if he obeys him only as shall suit his whim or his convenience; and no man can be a pious man who does not purpose, in all honesty, to keep All the commandments of God; to submit to his will in everything.

Psalm 119:7. I will praise thee with uprightness of heart With an upright and sincere heart.

When I shall have learned Hebrew, “In my learning.” In the practice or act of learning them. His own experience of their nature, influence, and value would lead him to sincere praise. He had no doubt of finding that they were worthy of his praises, and of seeing in them more and more occasion to glorify and honor God. The more we know of God, the more shall we see in him to praise. The larger our acquaintance and experience, the more our hearts will be disposed to magnify his name. This remark must extend to all that there is in God to be learned; and as that is infinite, so there will be occasion for renewed and more elevated praise to all eternity.

Thy righteous judgments Margin, as in Hebrew, “Judgments of thy righteousness.” The laws or statutes which God, as a righteous or just God, appoints to be the rule of conduct to his creatures.

Psalm 119:8. I will keep thy statutes Thy commands; thy laws. This expresses the firm purpose of the psalmist, He meant to keep the law of God; he could confidently say that he would do it — yet coupled with the prayer which follows, that God would not forsake him.

O forsake me not utterly Hebrew, “To very much;” so as to leave me to myself. His confidence that he would keep the commandments of God was based on the prayer that God would not leave him. There is no other ground of persuasion that we shall be able to keep the commandments of God than that which rests on the belief and the hope that He will not leave us.

Psalm 119:9. Wherewithal This begins the second portion of the psalm, extending to Psalm 119:16, in which all the verses begin with the second letter of the Hebrew alphabet, indicated in our translation by the word Beth. These names of the letters, inserted for convenience, are no part of the psalm, as it is not so marked in the original. This mode of indicating the divisions of the psalm is special to our version. It is not in the Septuagint, the Latin Vulgate, or the German versions. The word wherewithal means “by what” (Hebrew); that is, What means shall a young man adopt by which he may “cleanse his way?” it indicates a state of inquiry. The case supposed is that of a young man pondering the question how he may be saved from the corruptions of his own heart, and escape the temptations to which he is exposed in early years, and lead a pure and upright life. There can be no more important inquiry for one just entering on the journey of life; there can be found nowhere a more just and comprehensive answer than is contained in this single verse. All the precepts of ancient and modern wisdom, all the teachings of pagan morality and religion, and all the results of the experience of mankind, could furnish nothing in addition to what is here suggested. The world has no higher wisdom than this by which to guide a young man, so that he may lead a holy life.

Shall a young man The remark here might be applied also to those who are in middle life, or even to those who are in more advanced years, but it is applied here especially to the young, because it may be supposed that in the other cases the matter may be regarded as settled by experience; because to the young, as they commence life, the inquiry is so momentous; and because it is a question which it may be supposed will come up before the mind of every young man who has any right aspirations, and any proper conception of the dangers which encompass his path.

Cleanse his way? Make his course of life pure and upright. The language does not necessarily imply that there had been any previous impurity or vice, but it has particular reference to the future: not how he might cleanse himself from past offences, but how he might make the future pure. The inquiry is, how he might conduct himself — what principles he could adopt — under what influence he could bring himself — so that his future course would be honest, honorable, upright.

By taking heed thereto ... The word “thereto” is not in the original. The Hebrew is, “To keep according to thy word;” or, “in keeping according to thy word.” Prof. Alexander supposes that this means “to keep it (his way) according to thy word;” and that the whole is a question — “How may a young man so cleanse his way as to keep it according to thy word?” — and that the answer to the question is to be found in the general strain of the psalm, or in the general principles laid down in the psalm. But it is clear that the answer to the question must be found in the verse, or not found at all; and the most natural construction is that in our translation. So DeWette renders it: “How can a young man walk guiltless? If (or, when) he holds (or, keeps) himself according to thy word.” The meaning clearly is If he governs himself according to the law of God — if he makes that law the rule of his life and conduct, he would be enabled to do it. All other things might fail; this rule would never fail, in making and keeping a man pure. The more principles of common honesty, the principles of honor, the considerations of self-interest, the desire of reputation — valuable as they may be — would not constitute a security in regard to his conduct; the law of God would, for that is wholly pure.

Psalm 119:10. With my whole heart have I sought thee See the notes at Psalm 119:2. The psalmist in Psalm 119:2 speaks of the “blessedness of those who seek the Lord with the whole heart;” in this verse he says that this blessedness was his. He could affirm that he had thus sought God. He had such a consciousness that this was the aim and purpose of his life that he could say so without hesitation. Every man who claims to be a religious man ought to be able to say this. Alas, how few can do it!

O let me not wander ... Keep me in this steady purpose; this fixed design. This is the language of a heart where there is a consciousness of its weakness, and its liability to err, strong as may be its purpose to do right. Such an apprehension is one of the best means of security, for such an apprehension will lead a man to “pray,” and while a man prays he is safe.

Psalm 119:11. Thy word have I hid in mine heart Compare the notes at Psalm 37:31. The word rendered “hid” means properly to conceal, so that a thing may be secret, private, inaccessible; then, to lay up in private, to treasure up. to hoard — as money or jewels — commonly “hidden” from public view. Job 20:26; Psalm 17:14. Then it means to lay up in one’s heart, as a secret, inaccessible place; to hide one’s thoughts; purposes, designs; or to lay up knowledge or wisdom in the heart as a treasure, Job 10:13; Proverbs 2:1; 7:1. The meaning here is, that he had “treasured” up the word of God, as the most valuable thing, in his heart; it was “there,” though unseen; it constituted the secret power by which he was governed; it was permanently deposited there, as the most valuable of his treasures.

That I might not sin against thee That it might protect me from sinning against thee. That I might be continually guided by its precepts; that I might be admonished of duty; that I might be deterred from going astray.

Psalm 119:12. Blessed art thou, O LORD Blessed art thou as the author of such a law. This language of benediction or doxology is an outbreak of feeling or adoration in view of such a law — so good, so holy, so suited to direct and guide man. The mind is full of the subject; and the lips give vent to the feeling of gratitude and joy that such a law had been revealed to people.

Teach me thy statutes Make me more and more acquainted with a law so pure, so rich, so valuable.

Psalm 119:13. With my lips have I declared That is, I have openly and publicly made thy words known to others; I have defended and vindicated them.

All the judgments The word judgments here means the same as statutes or laws: and the idea is, that he had been on the side of those laws, and had endeavored by argument and persuasion to bring others under their influence. How he had done it we are not informed; but we have no reason to suppose that the author of the psalm was a minister of religion, and if not, then we have here an example of what a man who does not claim to be a public teacher may do, and should do, in making known and defending divine truth. Every man is as much bound to do this in his sphere as the minister of religion is in his; and private member’s of the church have often an opportunity of doing this to more advantage than the ministers of the gospel possess.

Of thy mouth With my mouth I speak those things which have proceeded from thine. I speak in thy name; I declare thy truth. It is not my own; it is thine.

Psalm 119:14. I have rejoiced ... I do rejoice; I exult in this; I find my happiness there. The word expresses a high degree of joy.

As much as in all riches Hebrew, “as upon all wealth.” As people rejoice who have great wealth. I find my happiness in religion, as if in the possession of real wealth. <sup><1002></sup>Proverbs 10:22.

Psalm 119:15. I will meditate in thy precepts I will think of them; I will find my happiness in them. See the notes at <sup><1002></sup>Psalm 1:2.

And have respect unto thy ways And look to thy ways — thy commands. I continually regard them, or refer to them in my mind as the guide of my life. See the notes at <sup><1006></sup>Psalm 119:6.

Psalm 119:16. I will delight myself in thy statutes I will find my happiness in thy laws. See the notes at <sup><1002></sup>Psalm 1:2; 112:1.

I will not forget thy word I will not allow the world to crowd it out of my mind.

Psalm 119:17. Deal bountifully ... This commences the next portion of the psalm, indicated by the letter “Gimel,” the “third” letter of the Hebrew alphabet, answering to our letter “g.” Each verse of this portion (<sup><1007></sup>Psalm 119:17-24) begins with this letter. There is a resemblance between the first word of this verse — I mæ<sup><1580></sup> — and the letter — “Gimel” — which commences the eight verses of this portion of the psalm. The noun (derived from the verb) — I mǧ<sup><1581></sup> — means a camel, and the letter gimel has been supposed to have derived its name from its having originally a resemblance to the camel’s neck. In some of the Phœnician inscriptions, and in the Ethiopic alphabet, it has this form (Gesenius, “Lex”). The verb used here means to do, or show, or cause good or evil to anyone; and then to reward, or to recompense, either good or evil. Here it seems to be used in a general sense of doing good, or showing favor, as in <sup><1006></sup>Psalm 13:6; 116:7; 142:7. Compare <sup><1017></sup>Proverbs 11:17. It does not necessarily imply that the author of the psalm had any claim, or demanded this on the ground of merit. He begged the favor, the friendship, the interposition of God in his behalf.

That I may live The continuance of life was dependent on the favor of God.

And keep thy word For grace to do this he was equally dependent on God; and he asked that life might be continued, in order that he might honor the word of God by obeying it.

Psalm 119:18. Open thou mine eyes Margin, “Reveal.” So the Septuagint and the Latin Vulgate. The Hebrew word means to be naked; then to make naked, to uncover, to disclose, to reveal. Here it is the same as “uncover;” that is, take away from the eyes what is before them to prevent clear vision. Compare <sup><HEB></sup>Numbers 22:31; 24:4,16.

That I may behold wondrous things Things which are suited to excite wonder and amazement: that is, things which are secret or hidden from the common view; the deep, spiritual meaning of the word of God. By natural vision he might see the surface — the letter; to see the deep, hidden, real, meaning, he needed the special influence of God. Compare <sup><HEB></sup>1 Corinthians 2:12,14,15. He believed that there were such things in the law of God; he desired to see them.

Out of thy law Out of the written word; out of the Scriptures. The word “law” here is used to denote “all” that God had revealed to mankind; all that is contained in the volume of inspiration. The truths taught here are

- (1) That there are deep, hidden, secret things in the word of God, which are not perceived by the natural man;
- (2) That those things, when understood, are suited to excite wonder, or to fill the mind with admiring views of God;
- (3) That a special illumination of God is necessary that man may perceive these things; and
- (4) That the proper understanding of these things is connected with prayer, and can be hoped for only in answer to prayer.

No one has a proper appreciation of divine truth — of the beauty, the spiritual meaning, the grandeur, the sublimity of the Bible — until he is a renewed — a praying — man. Compare the notes at <sup><4116></sup>1 Corinthians 2:6-15.

<sup><4399></sup>Psalm 119:19. I am a stranger in the earth A wayfaring man; a pilgrim; a so-journer; a man whose permanent home is not in this world. The word is applicable to one who belongs to another country, and who is now merely passing through a foreign land, or sojourning there for a time. Compare the notes at <sup><38113></sup>Hebrews 11:13. The home of the child of God is heaven. Here he is in a strange — a foreign — land. He is to abide here but for a little time, and then to pass on to his eternal habitation.

Hide not thy commandments from me Make me to know them; keep them continually before me. In this strange land, away from my home, let me have the comfort of feeling that thy commands are ever with me to guide me; thy promises to comfort me. The feeling is that of one in a strange land who would desire, if possible, to keep up constant communications with his home — his family, his friends, his kindred there. On earth, the place of our sojourning — of our pilgrimage — the friend of God desires to have constant contact with heaven, his final home; not to be left to the desolate feeling that he is cut off from all contact with that world where he is forever to dwell.

<sup><4320></sup>Psalm 119:20. My soul breaketh This word means to break; to crush; to break in pieces by scraping, rubbing, or grating. The idea would seem to be, not that he was crushed as by a single blow, but that his soul — his strength — was worn away by little and little. The desire to know more of the commands of God acted continually on him, exhausting his strength, and overcoming him. He so longed for God that, in our language, “it wore upon him” — as any ungratified desire does. It was not the possession of the knowledge of God that exhausted him; it was the intenseness of his desire that he might know more of God.

For the longing For the earnest desire.

That it hath unto thy judgments at all times Thy law; thy commands. This was a constant feeling. It was not fitful or spasmodic. It was the steady, habitual state of the soul on the subject. He had never seen enough of the beauty and glory of the law of God to feel that all the needs of his nature were satisfied, or that he could see and know no more; he had seen and felt enough to excite in him an ardent desire to be made fully acquainted with all that there is in the law of God. Compare the notes at <sup><49175></sup>Psalm 17:15.

Psalm 119:21. Thou hast rebuked the proud Compare Psalm 9:5.

The meaning is, that God had done this not by word but by deed. The proud were everywhere rebuked by God, alike in his law, and in his providence. The connection seems to be this: the psalmist is meditating on the benefit or advantage of keeping the law of God; of a humble, pious life. His mind naturally adverts to what would be the opposite of this — or to this in contrast with an opposite course of life; and he says, therefore, that God had in every way, and at all times, manifested his displeasure against that class of people. Such a course, therefore, must be attended with misery; but the course which he proposed to pursue must be attended with happiness.

That are cursed The accursed; those who are regarded and treated by God as accursed, or as objects of his disapprobation.

Which do err from thy commandments Who depart from thy law. The sense is, “I propose and intend to keep thy law. As a motive to this, I look at the consequences which must follow from disobeying it. I see it everywhere in the divine treatment of those who do disregard that law. They are subject to the displeasure — the solemn rebuke — of God. So all must be who disregard his law; and it is my purpose not to be found among their number.”

Psalm 119:22. Remove from me reproach and contempt Show me thy favor, and let me not suffer in the estimation of mankind on account of my religion. Let me not be exposed to malicious charges; to accusations of hypocrisy, insincerity, and unfaithfulness on account of my religion. This “reproach and contempt” might arise from two sources;

(1) On account of religion itself, or because he was a true friend of God; or

(2) he may have been charged with hypocrisy and insincerity; with doing things inconsistent with the profession of religion. These accusations he prays may be removed from him

(a) In order that the true religion might not be in itself a matter of reproach, but that God might honor his own religion, and make it esteemed among people;

(b) Because he was conscious that so far as he was concerned, the charges were unfounded. He did not deserve the “reproach and contempt” that properly belong to a life of hypocrisy and insincerity.

For I have kept thy testimonies My conscience assures me of this. I can appeal to thee, my God, in proof that I do not deserve the charge of insincerity and hypocrisy. Every professedly pious man ought to be able thus to appeal to conscience and to God, and to say, in the most solemn manner, that he does not deserve the reproach of hypocrisy and insincerity.

Psalm 119:23. Princes also did sit and speak against me This would have been applicable to David many times in his life, but it was also applicable to many others, and there is nothing in the language which would limit it to David. It is evident that the author of the psalm had been subject to reproach from those who were of exalted rank; it is clear also that he felt this keenly. It is natural, whether proper or not, that we should feel the reproach and contempt of those in elevated life — the rich, the honored, the learned — more than of those in humbler life. Their good opinion can be of value only as they may be better qualified than others to judge of what constitutes true excellence, or as they may have it in their power to do us more harm, or to do more to aid us in doing good, than others have; but truth and principle are never to be sacrificed that we may secure their favor; and if, in the faithful discharge of our duty, and the zealous adherence to the principles of our religion, we incur their frowns, we are to bear it — as the great Lord and Saviour of his people did.

Hebrews 13:13.

But thy servant did meditate in thy statutes I was engaged in this; I continued to do it; I was not deterred from it by their opposition; I found comfort in it, when they sat and talked against me. This would seem to have reference to some occasion when they were together — in public business, or in the social circle. They, the princes and nobles engaged in the ordinary topics of conversation, or in conversation connected with revelry, frivolity, or sin. Unwilling to participate in this — having different tastes — feeling that it was improper to be one of their companions in such a mode of spending time, or in such subjects of conversation, “he” withdrew, he turned his thoughts on the law of God, he sought comfort in meditation on that law and on God. He became, therefore, the subject of remark — perhaps of their jests — “because” he thus refused to mingle with them, or because he put on what seemed to be hypocritical seriousness, and was (what they deemed) stern, sour, unsocial, as if he thus publicly, though tacitly, meant to rebuke them. Nothing will be more “likely” to subject one to taunting remarks, to rebuke, to contempt, than to manifest a religious spirit, and to introduce religion in any way in the circles of the worldly and the frivolous.

Psalm 119:24. Thy testimonies also are my delight See the notes at Psalm 119:16. He found his main happiness in the word of God.

And my counselors Margin, as in Hebrew, “men of my counsel.” He sought direction and advice from them as from a friend who would give him counsel. He looked to the revealed law of God to ascertain what was right; to know how he should act in the emergencies of life.

Psalm 119:25. My soul cleaveth unto the dust This commences a new division of the psalm, in which each verse begins with the “fourth” letter of the Hebrew alphabet — “Daleth,” equivalent to the English “d.” There is nothing in the sense to separate it from the other parts of the psalm. The word rendered “cleaveth” means to be glued to; to stick fast. It has the sense of adhering firmly to anything, so that it cannot easily be separated from it. Compare the notes at Psalm 63:8. The word “dust” here may mean either the earth, and earthly things, considered as low, base, unworthy, worldly; or it may mean the grave, as if he were near to that, and in danger of dying. DeWette understands it in the latter sense. Compare Psalm 44:25; 22:29. Yet the word cleave would hardly suggest this idea; and the force of that word would be better represented by the idea that his soul, as it were, adhered to the things of earth; that it seemed to be so fastened to them — so glued to them — that it could not be detached from them; that his affections were low, earthly, grovelling, so as to give him deep distress, and to lead him to cry to God for life and strength that he might break away from them. This expresses what is often felt by good people, and thus presents one of the forms of religious experience. Compare Romans 7:14,15.

Quicken thou me Cause me to live; give me vigor and strength to break away from this which binds me fast, and to rise above these low propensities.

According to thy word That is, either according to thy promises made to thy people to aid them when they are in distress; or, according to the principles of thy word, that I may live as thy word requires. Who has not found his soul so cleaving to dust — to earth — to worldly things — as to feel himself degraded by it, and to lead him to cry out with earnestness that God would give him strength, life, vigor, that his soul might rise to better things?

Psalm 119:26. I have declared my ways That is, I have declared or recounted them to thee. I have made mention of my cares, troubles, anxieties, purposes. I have laid them all before thee, reserving or keeping back nothing.

And thou heardest me Thou didst answer me. It is only when we declare all our ways before God, that we can hope he “will” hear us. It is right and proper that we should go before God with all our cares and troubles. There is nothing that gives us anxiety, of which we may not speak to him, however trivial it may seem to be — even as a child speaks to a mother of the smallest matter that troubles him. When this is done, we may be assured that God will not turn away from us, or disregard our cry.

*“I told him all my secret grief;
My secret groaning reached his ears;
He gave my inward pains relief,
And calmed the tumult of my fears.”*

Teach me thy statutes Make known to me thy will. Acquaint me with what thou wouldst have me to do. See Psalm 119:12.

Psalm 119:27. Make me to understand ... See the notes at Psalm 119:18.

So shall I talk of thy wondrous works The things in thy works — thy providential dealings — that are wondrous. That is, with a heart full of the subject, he could not but speak of those things — for “out of the abundance of the heart the mouth speaketh.” See the notes at Psalm 39:2-4.

Psalm 119:28. My soul melteth Margin, “droppeth.” The Hebrew word here employed — āḏā <sup>hi811</sup> — means to drop, to drip, to distil, spoken of a house, as when the rain drops through the roof, Ecclesiastes 10:18; then, to shed tears, to weep, Job 16:20 — and this seems to be the meaning here. The idea of melting is not properly in the word, and the term weep would better express the meaning. His soul seemed to drop tears. It overflowed with tears. Yet there is an idea of abundant or constant weeping. It is not a gush of emotion, as when we say of one that he is “bathed in tears;” it is the idea of a steady flow or dropping of tears — slow, silent, but constant — as if the soul were dripping away or dissolving. Thus the idea is more striking and beautiful than that of melting. It is quiet but continuous grief that slowly wears away the soul. There are two kinds of sorrow:

(a) the one represented by floods of tears, like fierce torrents that sweep all away, and are soon passed;

(b) the other is the gentle dropping — the constant wearing — the slow attrition caused by inward grief, that secretly but certainly wears away the soul.

The latter is more common, and more difficult to be borne than the other. The Septuagint and the Latin Vulgate render this, “My soul slumbereth.”

For heaviness This word means grief, sorrow, vexation. Proverbs 45:13; 17:21. It is here silent grief; hidden sorrow. How many thus pine in secret, until life slowly wears away, and they sink to the grave.

Strengthen thou me Give me strength to meet this constant wearing away — this slow work of sorrow. We need strength to bear great and sudden sorrow; we need it not less to bear that which constantly wears upon us; which makes our sleep uneasy; which preys upon our nerves, and slowly eats away our life.

According unto thy word See ~~Psalm~~ Psalm 119:9,25.

~~Psalm~~ Psalm 119:29. Remove from me Take it from me; cause it to depart; let me not be under its influence or power.

The way of lying Every false, deceitful, hypocritical way. We are not to suppose that the psalmist was addicted to lying, but that he felt he was, like all people, in danger of acting from false views, from wrong motives, or under the influence of delusion and deceit. It is a prayer that he might always be sincere and truthful. No man who knows his own heart can doubt the propriety of this prayer. On nothing does a man need more to examine himself; in nothing does he more need the grace of God, than that he may be sincere.

And grant me thy law graciously The knowledge of thy law; grace to obey thy law. The single word rendered “grant graciously” is a word which implies the idea of mercy or favor. It was not a thing which he claimed as a right; it was that for which he was dependent on the mercy of God.

Psalm 119:30. I have chosen the way of truth Among all the paths of life I have selected this. I prefer this. I desire to walk in this. Religion is, wherever it exists, a matter of preference or choice; and the friend of God prefers his service to the service of the world.

Thy judgments Thy statutes; thy laws.

Have I laid before me I have set them before my mind as the guide of my conduct; I have made their observance the end and aim of my life.

Psalm 119:31. I have stuck unto thy testimonies The word here rendered “stuck” is the same which in Psalm 119:25 is rendered “cleave:” — “My soul cleaveth unto the dust.” It means here that he had adhered to the testimonies of God as if he had been glued to them, or as if he and they were firmly united together. He had so adhered to them that he could not be detached from them.

O LORD, put me not to shame Let me not be disappointed or confounded; let all my anticipations of the good effects of obeying thy law be realized; let me find all that I have hoped for; let me partake of thy friendship and favor as I desire. See the notes at Psalm 119:6.

Psalm 119:32. I will run the way of thy commandments That is, I will not merely keep them — which might be expressed by “I will walk in them,” but I will hasten to keep them; I will do it with alacrity, as when one runs to accomplish an object. I will devote to them all the energies of my life.

When thou shalt enlarge my heart Or, more literally, “For thou wilt enlarge my heart;” expressing confidence that God would do this, so that he would be thus inclined and enabled to keep his commandments. it is an acknowledgment of dependence, and at the same time the expression of a confident belief that God would grant him the grace needful for him. The phrase “to enlarge the heart” means to make it free; to deliver it from all hindrances to what is right; to fill it with noble and holy purposes; to stimulate and animate it. The heart is contracted or made narrow by selfishness, pride, vanity, ambition, covetousness; it is made large by charity, love, hope, benevolence. Sin narrows the soul; religion enlarges it.

Psalm 119:33. Teach me, O LORD, the way of thy statutes This begins a new division of the psalm, indicated by the letter “He” (or “h”).

The word rendered “teach” means properly to throw, to cast, to hurl; and then, to teach — as if truth were thrown and scattered abroad. The sentiment is the same as in <sup><B></sup>Psalm 119:12.

And I shall keep it unto the end Always. To the end of life. His keeping it depended on grace given to him continually to dispose and enable him to do it.

<sup><B></sup>Psalm 119:34. Give me understanding, and I shall keep thy law

Give me right views of it, of its nature and obligation. It is not a prayer that God would give him the faculty of understanding or intelligence; but that he would enable him to take just views of the law. The word is the same as in <sup><B></sup>Psalm 119:27, rendered there, “Make me to understand.”

Yea, I shall observe it with my whole heart See <sup><B></sup>Psalm 119:2. I will keep it with undivided affections; I will make it the sole guide of my life.

<sup><B></sup>Psalm 119:35. Make me to go in the path ... That is, Incline me to it; so direct me that I shall thus walk. It is an acknowledgment of his dependence on God, that he might be able to carry out the cherished purposes of his soul.

For therein do I delight See <sup><B></sup>Psalm 119:16. I am conscious of having pleasure in thy commandments; of having a strong desire to keep them, and I pray for grace that I may be able to do it. Real delight in the law of God is one of the best means of securing its observance; one of the best evidences that it will be kept.

<sup><B></sup>Psalm 119:36. Incline my heart unto thy testimonies Cause my heart to be inclined to them, or to be disposed to keep them. This, too, is a recognition of dependence, and a prayer for guidance.

And not to covetousness To gain; to the love of money. This seems to be referred to here as the principal thing which would turn away the heart from religion, or as that from which the most danger was to be feared. There are undoubtedly many other things which will do this — for all sin will do it; but this was the chief danger which the psalmist apprehended in his own case, and perhaps he meant to refer to this as the principal danger on this subject which besets the path of man. There are many more persons turned away from the service of God, and kept away from it, by covetousness than there are by any other one sin. When the psalmist prays that God would not “incline” his heart to covetousness, the language is similar to that in the Lord's prayer — "And lead us not into temptation." That is, Restrain us from it; let us not be put in circumstances where we shall be in danger of it. We are not to suppose that God exerts any positive influence either to make a man covetous, or to tempt him. See <sup><3013></sup>James 1:13,14.

<sup><4335></sup>Psalm 119:37. Turn away mine eyes from beholding vanity Vain things; wicked things; things which would be likely to lead me astray from what is real and true. Compare <sup><2315></sup>Isaiah 33:15; <sup><3501></sup>Job 31:1. Margin, here, as in Hebrew, "make to pass." Make my eyes to pass rapidly from such objects, that I may not look at them, may not contemplate them, may not dwell upon them. There is danger in looking on sin steadily; in surveying its features; in returning to contemplate it. An ugly object loses much of its deformity when we look often upon it; and this is a benevolent law, lest we should be miserable when we are under a necessity of looking on it. Sin follows this general law, and is to be avoided altogether, even in its contemplation, if we would be safe. A man should be thankful in this world that he has eyelids; and as he can close his eyes, so he should often do it.

And quicken thou me in thy way Endow me with life, energy, vigor, that I may walk in thy way.

<sup><4338></sup>Psalm 119:38. Stablish thy word unto thy servant Confirm it; make it seem firm and true; let not my mind be vacillating or skeptical in regard to thy truth. This seems to be a prayer against the influence of doubt and scepticism; a prayer that doubts might not be suffered to spring up in his mind, and that the objections and difficulties of scepticism might have no place there. There is a class of people whose minds are naturally skeptical and unbelieving, and for such people such a prayer is especially appropriate. For none can it be improper to pray that the word of God may always seem to them to be true; that their minds may never be left to the influence of doubt and unbelief.

Who is devoted to thy fear literally, "Who," or which, "to thy fear." This may refer either to the author of the psalm, or to the word of God. It may mean that he was among those who feared — that is, worshipped God; or, that the word of God had reference to the "fear," that is, to the worship of God, or was designed to secure that. The construction seems to demand the latter interpretation; and then the prayer is, that God would confirm his faith in that “word” — in that revealed truth — which was designed to secure the worship of God.

Psalm 119:39. Turn away my reproach The reproach which is likely to come upon me from being a professed worshipper of God. In all ages good men have been exposed to this reproach.

Which I fear Which I have reason to apprehend will come upon me. This may not mean that he was personally afraid of it, but merely that he had reason to apprehend that he was exposed to it. The prayer is proper, for there is nothing which our nature makes us shrink back from more than reproach. Compare <sup><132></sup>Psalm 119:22; <sup><133></sup>Psalm 69:9,20; <sup><157></sup>Romans 15:3; <sup><72></sup>2 Corinthians 12:10. The word reproach in the original is the same which denotes shame or dishonor.

For thy judgments are good Thy statutes; thy laws. I know they are good. I feel that I desire to obey them. I pray, therefore, that obedience on my part to that which is good may not subject me to shame; that people may see that thy laws are good, and that it is not a matter of reproach to obey them.

Psalm 119:40. Behold, I have longed after thy precepts I have earnestly desired them. See the notes at <sup><132></sup>Psalm 119:20.

Quicken me in thy righteousness Make me to live; to live in obedience to thy righteous laws. See the notes at <sup><132></sup>Psalm 119:25,37.

Psalm 119:41. Let thy mercies come also unto me, O LORD This commences a new portion of the psalm, in which each verse begins with the letter “Vau,” or “v.” There are almost no words in Hebrew that begin with this letter, which is properly a conjunction, and hence, in each of the verses in this section of the psalm (<sup><134></sup>Psalm 119:41-48) the beginning of the verse is in the original a conjunction — “vau.” This does not here indicate a connection, as with us the conjunction “and” would naturally do; but is a mere artificial arrangement in order that the verse may begin with that letter, and it in no manner affects the sense. The phrase “Let thy mercies come” is literally, “and thy mercies shall come,” or “and let thy mercies come.” That is, Let thy mercy be manifested to me; let me experience thy mercy and thy favor.

Even thy salvation mercy connected with salvation, or that leads to salvation.

According to thy word According to the promises of thy word; according to the arrangements which thou hast made, and hast revealed. The only hope of mercy is that which is held out in the word of God.

Psalm 119:42. So shall I have wherewith to answer him that reproacheth me I shall have something by which I may reply to those who calumniate me. So the Saviour replied to the suggestions of the tempter almost wholly by passages of Scripture (<sup>100</sup> Matthew 4:4,7,10); and so, in many cases, the best answer that can be given to reproaches on the subject of religion will be found in the very words of Scripture. A man of little learning, except that which he has derived from the Bible, may often thus silence the cavils and reproaches of the learned sceptic; a man of simplehearted, pure piety, with no weapon but the word of God, may often thus be better armed than if he had all the arguments of the schools at his command. Compare <sup>101</sup> Ephesians 6:17.

For I trust in thy word I believe it; I rely on it; I confide in that, as my only comfort and protection.

Psalm 119:43. And take not the word of truth utterly out of my mouth Do not take it entirely or altogether from me. Let me not be utterly hopeless; let me be at no time without some evidence that thy word dwells in me with sustaining and sanctifying power. The prayer seems to have been offered when the mind was troubled and in doubt, and when it seemed as if all hope and all trust in the truth of God would vanish. The words rendered “utterly” mean “to very much;” that is, altogether or entirely. Let it not be done until the extreme shall be reached.

For I have hoped in thy judgments I do trust in thy word, and it is my only trust. If that is gone, all is gone. As long as I can hold on to that, even in the slightest degree, I am safe. When all else fails, if that has not utterly failed me, I shall be secure.

Psalm 119:44. So shall I keep thy law continually forever and ever At all times and in all places; in this world and the world to come. This indicates a purpose to do it, and an assurance that he would do it, if God should enable him to retain even the slightest hold on the truth.

Psalm 119:45. And I will walk at liberty Margin, “at large.” Luther renders it, “freely.” The Septuagint, “in a broad place.” The Hebrew word means “wide, broad, large, spacious.” The reference is to that which is free and open; that in which there are no limits, checks, restraints; where a man does what he pleases. The meaning here is, that he would feel he was free. He would not be restrained by evil passions and corrupt desires. He would be delivered from those things which seemed to fetter his goings. This does not here refer so much to external troubles or hindrances, to being oppressed and straitened by external foes, as to internal enemies — to the servitude of sin — to the slavery of appetite and passion. Compare the notes at <sup><B70></sup>Romans 7:9-14. See also <sup><B36></sup>Job 36:16; <sup><B85></sup>Psalms 118:5. The margin well expresses the sense of the passage.

For I seek thy precepts I seek or endeavor to obey them. I seek them as the guide of my life. I ask nothing else to direct me.

<sup><B96></sup>Psalm 119:46. I will speak of thy testimonies also before kings ... In the presence of men of most elevated rank. I will not be ashamed to avow my belief in thy word before those in power — whether friendly or unfriendly to thee and to thy cause. I will not disguise my belief in thy truth with any desire to secure their favor; I will not be intimidated from expressing my faith by any dread of their frowns. Compare <sup><B08></sup>Matthew 10:18,19; <sup><B09></sup>Acts 4:19; 5:29; 26:2.

<sup><B98></sup>Psalm 119:48. My hands also will I lift up unto thy commandments ... As an expression of delight or rejoicing, as people lift up their hands with their voice when they give expression to joy. It denotes a high statue of joy, such as leads to an outward expression; not merely that which exists in calm contemplation, but where the heart is full, and when it finds outward expression.

And I will meditate in thy statutes See the notes at <sup><B02></sup>Psalm 1:2. I will indicate my joy — my happiness — in thy commandments in every way possible; by outward expressions, and by deep and calm contemplation when I am alone; in my daily employments, in solitude, in the night-watches. This is indicative always of true religion.

<sup><B99></sup>Psalm 119:49. Remember the word unto thy servant This commences a new division of the psalm, in which each verse begins with the Hebrew letter “Zayin” — answering to our “z.” There is nothing special in this portion of the psalm as indicated by the letter. The language here is a prayer that God would not forget what he had promised; that all that he had said might be fulfilled; that the expectations and hopes which he had raised in the mind might be realised. It is language which may be used with reverence, and without any implication that God would forget — as a child might with propriety and love ask a parent to remember a promise which he had made.

Upon which thou hast caused me to hope That is, All the hope which I have has been excited by thy word; thy promises. I have no other source of hope; I cherish no other hope. I pray now, since that hope has been thus excited in me, that I may realise all I have been led to desire and to expect. The word of God is the only foundation of hope for people; and when our hopes are fairly built on that, we have a right to appeal to God that he will make it good.

~~4886~~ Psalm 119:50. This is my comfort in my affliction Compare ~~4914~~ Romans 15:4. The word here rendered “comfort” occurs only here and in ~~4860~~ Job 6:10. The obvious meaning is, that his only consolation in his affliction was derived from the word of God; the word which had caused him to hope, and the word by which he had been quickened or made alive. The particular design of this is to show the value of the word of God as a source of comfort in trouble.

For thy word hath quickened me Has made me alive; or, caused me to live. That is, the word, the truth of God, had been the instrument of calling him from the death of sin, and of imparting to him new life, or had been the means of his regeneration. Compare ~~4908~~ James 1:18; ~~4905~~ 1 Corinthians 4:15; ~~4902~~ Hebrews 4:12; ~~4903~~ 1 Peter 1:23. As it was by this “word” that he had been made alive, so his only comfort was in that word, and it was to him a just ground of consolation that God had brought him from the death of sin, and had imparted to him spiritual life.

~~4885~~ Psalm 119:51. The proud have had me greatly in derision Those of rank; those in high life: perhaps, as we should say, the frivolous and fashionable world. They have ridiculed me; they have held me up to contempt for my scruples, my seriousness, my conscientiousness, my unwillingness to mingle with them in the pursuits, the pastimes, the frivolities of life. It is now no new thing to be held in contempt by the “proud” and the frivolous, on account of serious piety; to be thus held in contempt has been rather the rule than the exception in the treatment which the friends of religion have received from the world.

Yet have I not declined from thy law I have not been deterred from the avowal of my religious belief; I have not turned away from the duties of piety on account of the ridicule and scorn to which I have been exposed. Compare <sup><19417></sup>Psalm 44:17-19.

<sup><4885></sup>Psalm 119:52. I remembered In my troubles.

Thy judgments of old The word “judgments” here seems to refer to the divine dealings, whether expressed in the law of God, or in the actual administration of his government over the world. The words “of old” do not seem here to refer to the “eternity past,” as the phrase sometimes does now, but to the constancy and uniformity of the principles of the divine administration. The psalmist remembered that the principles of that administration had been always the same; that the law of God was always the same; and that, therefore, he might confide in God. What God had done formerly he would do now; the favor which he had shown in times past he would continue to show now. In the trials of life, in the changes which occur, in the apparent wreck of things, in the fearful prospect of disaster and ruin at any time, it is well for us to think of the unchanging principles which mark the divine dealings. Under such an administration, all who put their trust in God must be safe.

And have comforted myself I have found consolation in this. When all else seemed to fail, it was a comfort to reflect that an unchangeable God presided over the affairs of people. We could not put confidence in a God given to change.

<sup><4885></sup>Psalm 119:53. Horror hath taken hold upon me Has seized me; has overpowered and overwhelmed me. I shudder; I tremble; I am afraid; I am filled with distress. Luther, “I am burnt up.” The Hebrew word — hp[ ] <sup><42152></sup>ṭe — is from a verb meaning “to be hot; to glow”; and the idea in the word is that of violent heat; then, a glow or burning, as of a wind — the “simoom” of the desert. See <sup><19105></sup>Psalm 11:6, where the word is translated “horrible tempest,” in the margin, “burning.” The word occurs only in that passage, in the one before us, and in <sup><25150></sup>Lamentations 5:10, where it is rendered “terrible (famine),” in the margin, “terrors,” or “storms.” The state referred to here is that of one who sees the storm of burning wind and sand approaching; who expects every moment to be overcome and buried; whose soul trembles with consternation.

Because of the wicked ... Their conduct alarms me. Their danger appals me. Their condition overwhelms me. I see them rebelling against God. I see them exposed to his wrath. I see the grave just before them, and the awful scenes of judgment near. I see them about to be cast off, and to sink to endless woe, and my soul is transfixed with horror. The contemplation overwhelms me with uncontrollable anguish. Can such things be? Can people be thus in danger? And can they be calm and composed, when so near such awful horrors? No man can look on the world of despair without horror; no one can truly realize that his fellow-men are exposed to the horrors of that abode without having his soul filled with anguish. Strange that all people do not feel thus — that impenitent people can walk along on the verge of the grave and of hell “without” horror — that pious people, good people, praying people, can look upon their friends in that condition without having their souls filled with unutterable anguish. Compare ~~<BB13>~~ Psalm 119:136; ~~<BB11>~~ Romans 9:1-4; ~~<D941>~~ Luke 19:41.

~~<BB54>~~ Psalm 119:54. Thy statutes Thy law; thy commandments.

Have been my songs Have been to me a source of joy; have been my happiness, my consolation, my delight. I have found pleasure in meditating on them; I have had peace and joy in them in the day of loneliness and trouble. The psalmist rejoiced, doubtless, as the good now do,

(a) In law itself; law, as a rule of order; law, as a guide of conduct; law, as a security for safety;

(b) in such a law as that of God — so pure, so holy, so suited to promote “the happiness of man;

(c) in the stability of that law, as constituting his own personal security, the ground of his hope;

(d) in law in its influence on the universe, preserving order, and securing harmony.

In the house of my pilgrimage In my life considered as a journey to another world; in my pilgrimage through the desert of this world; amidst rocks, and sands, and desolation; among tribes of savage men, wanderers, robbers, freebooters; with no home, no place of shelter; exposed to cold, and rain, and sleet, and ice, and snow, as pilgrims are — for to all these is the “pilgrim” — the way-farer — exposed, and all these represent the condition of one passing through this world to a better (compare <sup><8113></sup>Hebrews 11:13). Here, says the psalmist, I sang. I found joy in these scenes by thinking on the pure law — the pure and holy truth of God. I comforted myself with the feeling that there “is” law; that there is just government; that there is a God; that I am under the protection of law; that I am not alone, but that there is one who guides me by his truth. Compare the notes at <sup><8510></sup>Job 35:10. See <sup><4465></sup>Acts 16:25; <sup><4341></sup>Psalms 34:1.

<sup><4376></sup>Psalm 119:55. I have remembered thy name, O LORD, in the night ... I have thought on thee in the night, when on my bed; I have done it in the night of calamity and sorrow. See the notes at <sup><4516></sup>Psalms 63:6.

<sup><4376></sup>Psalm 119:56. This I had, because I kept thy precepts literally, “This was to me;” that is, This has happened to me; this has occurred. This joyful remembrance of thy law in the night of affliction (<sup><4378></sup>Psalms 119:50); this stability and firmness on my part in keeping thy law when proud men have derided me (<sup><4375></sup>Psalms 119:51); this comfort which I have derived from meditating on thy statutes (<sup><4372></sup>Psalms 119:52); this solicitude for the welfare of others (<sup><4373></sup>Psalms 119:53); this peace which I have enjoyed in thy law in the house of my pilgrimage (<sup><4374></sup>Psalms 119:54); and this consolation which I have had in thee in the night-season (<sup><4375></sup>Psalms 119:55); — all this has been granted to me because I have kept thy statutes; because I have sought to be obedient — to serve thee — to find my happiness in thee. These are the proper fruits and effects of keeping the law of God. Such peace does it impart; so much does it do to sustain and comfort the soul.

<sup><4377></sup>Psalm 119:57. Thou art my portion, O LORD This begins a new division of the psalm, indicated by the Hebrew letter “Cheth,” which may be represented in English by “ch.” On the meaning of the language here, see the notes at <sup><4915></sup>Psalms 16:5. God was to him what other people seek in wealth, honor, pleasure, fame. To him, God was all and in all. He asked nothing else.

I have said I have formed the purpose, and have expressed it. It is the deliberate and settled design of my life.

That I would keep thy words That I would obey thee at all times; that I would keep all thy commandments.

Psalm 119:58. I entreated thy favor Margin, as in Hebrew, “face.” That is, he prayed that God would lift upon him the light of his countenance; that he would not avert his face from him in anger.

With my whole heart With sincere, undivided affections. See Psalm 119:2,10,34; 9:1.

Be merciful unto me according to thy word See the notes at Psalm 119:41.

Psalm 119:59. I thought on my ways This language most naturally refers to the time of conversion, and may be employed without impropriety to describe the process of a sinner’s turning to God. It would seem to be descriptive of the experience of the author of the psalm when he became personally interested in the subject of religion. The first step in such a work is reflection on the course of life which has been led; on the guilt of such a course; and on the consequences. It is a pause in the career of sin and folly — a pause for reflection and thought. Compare Luke 15:17,18. No one is converted without such reflection; and as soon as a sinner can be made to pause and reflect on his course, there is hope that he will be converted. Assuredly it is proper for all, whatever may be their circumstances in life, to pause from time to time; to reflect; to ask what will be the consequences of the course of life which is pursued.

And turned my feet Changed my course of life. He himself did this in fact; and he does not hesitate to say that it was he who thus turned. His own agency was employed. He does not say that he “waited” for God to turn him; or that he found he could not turn of himself, but that he turned; he paused; he reflected; he changed his course of life. This is true in conversion always. There is an actual turning from sin; an actual turning to God. The sinner turns. He leaves an old path, and treads a new one. He does this as the conscious result of reflection on the course which he was pursuing; and there is nothing in his actual turning, or in his whole future course, which is not the proper result of reflection, or which a proper reflection on the course of life would not lead to and justify. Man himself is always active in conversion. That is, he does something; he changes; he repents; he believes; he turns to God; it is not God that changes, that repents, that believes, that turns; it is the man himself. It is, indeed, by the grace and help of God; but the effect of that grace is not to make him idly wait; it is to rouse him to effort; to lead him to act.

Unto thy testimonies Thy law, considered as the divine testimony in regard to what is right.

Psalm 119:60. I made haste This language further describes the process of conversion. There was no delay; there was no excuse offered. He acted at once under his conviction of what was right. He did not ask permission to defer it to a future time; he did not attempt to avoid the duty; not plead inability; he did not give himself merely to the “use of means;” he did not rely on prayer, and reading, and reflection; but “he did the thing, and he did it at once.” This is conversion; and if all convicted sinners would follow this example, and do at once that which they are commanded to do, and which they know they ought to do, there would be in no case any difficulty about conversion, for the main difficulty in conversion lies in the fact that the sinner is not willing to obey God at once; that he will not break away from his sins; that he endeavors to excuse himself; that he pleads for delay; that he waits for God to do what he himself ought to do.

And delayed not to keep thy commandments I did not continue to go on in a course of sin, but I forsook my sin and obeyed.

Psalm 119:61. The bands of the wicked Margin, “companies.” The Hebrew word properly means a cord, a rope; then a snare, gin, net; then, a band or a company of men. The reference is to some time in the life of the psalmist when he was surrounded by wicked men.

Have robbed me Rather, have surrounded me; have environed me — for so the Hebrew word means.

But I have not forgotten thy law I have not been deterred from keeping it by the dangers to which I have been exposed.

Psalm 119:62. At midnight I will rise to give thanks unto thee In the usual times of repose; when men are commonly lying in unconscious slumber. My heart is so interested in thy law — my soul is so full — that I am kept wakeful by meditating upon it, and I arise from my bed and offer thee praise. The Hebrew here means, literally, “the half,” or “halving of the night,” the night considered as divided into two equal portions. The idea is, that his mind was so full of the subject that he would take this unusual time to give vent to his feelings. The mind may be so full of love to the law — the word — of God, that nothing will satisfy it but such unusual acts of devotion. The Saviour rose up a great while before day, and went out into a solitary place and there prayed (<sup><4015></sup>Mark 1:35); and on one occasion at least he continued all night in prayer to God (<sup><4162></sup>Luke 6:12).

Because of thy righteous judgments I do this on account of the interest which I have in those judgments or laws of righteousness. I love them as laws; I love them as righteous laws.

<sup><4366></sup>Psalm 119:63. I am a companion of all them that fear thee I find my associates and friends among those who worship thee; not with the profane and the wicked. “A man is known by the company that he keeps;” and it is an evidence of piety when we seek our companions and friends among the pious. It shows where the heart is; what the preferences are; what are the tastes; what is the real condition of the soul. We seek our friends in accordance with our tastes and preferences; our love to God is indicated by our love to his friends. Compare <sup><4421></sup>Psalm 139:21,22.

And of them that keep thy precepts That obey thy law. On the sentiment here, compare the notes at <sup><3900></sup>Psalm 1:1. A man may determine much in regard to his own character by asking himself what is the character of his chosen friends and companions. A member of a church should regard it as a dark sign against himself in regard to his piety, if his chosen friends are taken from the world, and not from the professed friends of God; if he finds more pleasure in their society, and in the scenes where they meet, than he does in the society of Christians however humble, or in places where they assemble for prayer and praise.

<sup><4364></sup>Psalm 119:64. The earth, O LORD, is full of thy mercy Full of the proofs of thy goodness and compassion. See the notes at <sup><4335></sup>Psalm 33:5. This is the expression of a heart full of love to God and to his word. In such a state of mind as the psalmist was in, the goodness of God is seen everywhere. The best preparation for seeing evidence that God is good is a heart full of love. Then the proofs of that love spring up on every side — as when we truly love a friend we find constant proofs of his excellency of character.

Teach me thy statutes I desire to see more and more of thy law. Thou art so gracious and merciful, the evidence of thy goodness is so widespread round about me, that it leads me to desire to see more and more of thyself and thy law.

Psalm 119:65. Thou hast dealt well with thy servant This begins a new division of the psalm, indicated by the Hebrew letter “Teth,” corresponding to our “t.” The use of this letter, however, does nothing to mark the sense. The literal meaning of the phrase here is, “Good hast thou done with thy servant;” and the idea is, that God had been good, and had done good to him. In the review of his own life he sees good, and good alone. Even in afflictions and trials this is all that he sees.

According unto thy word According to thy promises; or, according to the principles of thy word. That is, the whole effect of the revealed truth of God upon him had been good. It was designed for his good; it had produced good only. Truth and law do nothing but good, and the welfare of individuals, and of a community, is promoted just in proportion as truth and law prevail.

Psalm 119:66. Teach me good judgment The word here rendered “judgment” means, properly, “taste,” that power by which we determine the quality of things as sweet, bitter, sour, etc. Then it is applied to the mind or understanding, as that by which we determine the moral quality of things, or decide what is right or wrong; wise or foolish; good or evil. Here it means that he desired to have in full exercise the faculty of appreciating what is right, and of distinguishing it from what is wrong.

And knowledge Knowledge of the truth; knowledge of thy will; knowledge of duty.

For I have believed thy commandments I have confided in thy commandments. He believed that such a keeping of the law of God would be connected with a correct view of things. The keeping of the commands of God is one of the best means of growing in true knowledge, and of cultivating the understanding; of promoting a just taste or perception of what is true, and of developing the powers of the soul in the best proportions. Compare John 7:17.

Psalm 119:67. Before I was afflicted The Septuagint and the Latin Vulgate, “Before I was humbled.” The Hebrew word has the general sense of being afflicted, and may refer to any kind of trial.

I went astray The Hebrew word means to wander; to err; to do wrong; to transgress. Numbers 15:28; Job 12:16. It here means that he forgot his duty; that he fell into sin; that he departed from what was right; that he embraced erroneous views; that he lived in the neglect of his soul, the neglect of duty, and the neglect of God. Prosperity had not led him to fulfill duty; to seek salvation; to trust in God. This was, in his case, as it is in thousands of others, the experience of his life. Hence, affliction often becomes so necessary to check us when we are going astray, and so useful in recalling us to the ways of duty and of truth.

But now have I kept thy word Since I was afflicted. The effect has been to recall me from my wanderings, and to turn me to paths of duty and holiness. This is an effect often — very often — experienced; this is language which can be used by many a child of God. Of those who are the children of God it may be said that they are “always” benefited “sooner” or “later” by afflictions. It may not be at the time of the affliction (compare <sup><3821></sup>Hebrews 12:11), but the “ultimate” effect is in all cases to benefit them. Some error is corrected; some evil habit changed; some mode of life not consistent with religion is forsaken; pride is humbled; the heart is quickened in duty; habits of prayer are resumed or formed; the affections are fixed on a better world; the soul is made more gentle, calm, humble, spiritual, pure. Afflictions are among the most precious means of grace. They are entirely under the direction of God. They may be endlessly varied, and adapted to the case of every individual. God knows every heart, and the best way to reach any heart. By sickness; by disappointment; by loss of property; by bereavement; by blighted hopes; by the ingratitude of others; by the unkindness of professed friends, and the malice of enemies; by domestic troubles; by the misconduct of children — perhaps the most severe of all human ills, and the hardest to bear; in ten thousand ways God can reach the heart, and break and crush it, and make it ready for the entrance of truth — as the farmer breaks and pulverizes the soil by the plow and the harrow, so that it shall be prepared to receive the seed. Compare the notes at <sup><2324></sup>Isaiah 28:24-29. Among those things for which good men have most occasion for thankfulness are afflictions; and when we lie down on the bed of death, and look over life and the divine dealings with us through life, as the glories of heaven are about to open upon us, we shall feel that among the chiefest mercies of God are those dealings of his holy hand, trying at the time, which kept us from going astray, or which recalled us when we had wandered from him — and “that in our life, now closing, there has not been one trial too much.”

And doest good As the expression or manifestation of goodness. The goodness of God is not a mere sentiment; not mere feeling; not an inactive principle; not a mere wish: it finds expression in acts which tend to promote the happiness of his creatures everywhere.

Teach me thy statutes See the notes at <sup><B32></sup>Psalm 119:12,26. As one of the acts of the divine goodness, the psalmist prays that God will make him more and more acquainted with his law.

<sup><B39></sup>Psalm 119:69. The proud The psalmist had before referred to the “proud” as those from whom he had suffered injury, or as having been exposed to their derision. See the notes at <sup><B51></sup>Psalm 119:51. He here reverts to another form in which he had suffered from them.

Have forged a lie against me Compare <sup><B34></sup>Job 13:4. The word rendered “forged,” means to patch together; and then it is applied to charges or accusations against anyone, perhaps from their being made up (as they often are) of shreds and patches — hints, small matters, things having no necessary connection in themselves, but brought together as if they pertained to the same transaction — words dropped here and there in conversation, which, being artfully woven together, seem to make out a plausible case against a man. Most slanders are formed and sustained in this way, for it is rare that an absolutely forged slander is uttered against a man, or that a charge is brought which cannot be made to have plausibility from such circumstances as those referred to above. Even the most pure and circumspect cannot always avoid this, for there is something in every man’s life of which a malignant and cunning enemy may take advantage, and which he may weave into a story which some will believe, and which it may not be easy to confute. A malicious man may thus start a slander which may require years to correct, and which may even operate injuriously against a man all his life.

But I will keep thy precepts with my whole heart Notwithstanding their accusations, and their attempts to turn me away from thee, or to represent me as false and hypocritical. Whatever they may do; whatever reports they may start to my disadvantage, it is my fixed purpose to obey entirely and always thy law. See the notes at <sup><B51></sup>Psalm 119:51.

<sup><B70></sup>Psalm 119:70. Their heart is as fat as grease They are prospered. They have health, property, influence, comforts of all kinds. heaven appears to smile upon them, and it seems as if it were one effect of a wicked course of life to make people prosperous. See the notes at <sup><1970></sup>Psalm 17:10; 73:7, etc.

But I delight in thy law Though its observance should not be attended by any such results as seem to follow wickedness, though I am poor, emaciated, pale — disappointed, slandered, persecuted — though my lot in life is among the lowly and the despised — yet I will adhere to my purpose to keep thy law. It is, and it shall be, my delight, whatever may be the effects of so observing it. See <sup><1985></sup>Psalm 119:35.

<sup><1971></sup>Psalm 119:71. It is good for me that I have been afflicted See the notes at <sup><1967></sup>Psalm 119:67. Whatever may have been the form of the affliction, it was good for me. The design was benevolent; the result has been my own benefit. This will be the experience sooner or later resulting from all the afflictions of the righteous.

That I might learn thy statutes That I might be brought more fully to understand what they require; and that I might be led to conform to them. It is implied here

(a) that this is the tendency of affliction; and

(b) that this is an advantage — a good.

Anything that will lead a man to obey God is a blessing and a favor. Whatever leads a sinner to secure the salvation of his soul is a gain to him. No matter what it may cost; no matter what he may be required to give up; no matter to what persecutions and troubles it may expose him; no matter what he may suffer, or how long he may suffer; no matter though poverty, contempt, toil — even the rack or the stake — may be the consequence of his religion — yet it is again to him; and he will be thankful for it in the end — for nothing that can be endured in this life can be compared with the sufferings of the world of despair; nothing on earth can be “compared with the glory which shall be revealed in us in heaven.” See the notes at <sup><1988></sup>Romans 8:18.

<sup><1972></sup>Psalm 119:72. The law of thy mouth The law which proceeds out of thy mouth, or which thou hast spoken.

Is better unto me The Hebrew is, “Good to me is the law of thy mouth above thousands of gold and silver.”

Than thousands of gold and silver Than any amount of wealth. It is to me the most valuable possession; that which I prize above all other things. Compare the notes at <sup><1910></sup>Psalm 19:10.

<sup><1873></sup>Psalm 119:73. Thy hands have made me This commences a new division of the psalm, in which each verse begins with the Hebrew letter “Jod” — or “i” — the smallest letter in the Hebrew alphabet, called in <sup><1858></sup>Matthew 5:18, “jot;” “one jot or tittle shall in no wise pass from the law.” The words “thy hands have made me” are expressive of the idea that he had been formed or moulded by God — as the “hands” are the instruments by which we do anything. See the notes at <sup><1818></sup>Job 10:8; compare <sup><1908></sup>Psalm 100:3.

And fashioned me Fitted me; shaped me, formed me as I am. He had received alike his existence and the particular form of his existence from God — as a man makes a statue or image. Compare <sup><1893></sup>Psalm 139:13-16.

Give me understanding ... As I have derived my being from thee, so I am wholly dependent on thee to carry out the purpose for which I have been made. My Maker alone can give me understanding. I have no resources in myself. See <sup><1884></sup>Psalm 119:34.

<sup><1874></sup>Psalm 119:74. They that fear thee Those who worship thee; thy friends; the pious and the good.

Will be glad when they see me They will welcome me to their society; they will regard and treat me as a friend and brother. It is implied here that he considered this to be an honor — a thing to be desired. He valued the friendship and affection of those who feared and served God, and he made it an object so to live as to be worthy of their affection. Wicked men — men of the world — do not value that. They are satisfied with the friendship of those who, like themselves, have no fear of God. To a truly pious mind, the friendship of those who love God is of more value than that of any others; though in the one case they are poor and despised, and though in the other they are rich and of exalted rank. See the notes at <sup><1873></sup>Psalm 119:63. “Because I have hoped in thy word.” See the notes at <sup><1894></sup>Psalm 119:49.

<sup><1875></sup>Psalm 119:75. I know, O LORD I feel assured; I entertain no doubt on the subject. This was the conviction of the mind of the psalmist in affliction. Mysterious as the trial may have been, hard as it may have been to bear, long as it may have been continued, and varied as may have been the forms of the trial, yet he had no doubt that it was all right; that it was for the best purposes; and that it was in strict accordance with what was best.

That thy judgments This does not here refer to the laws of God, but to the divine dealings; to those afflictions which came in the way of judgments, or which might be regarded as expressive of the divine view of his conduct and life.

Are right Margin, as in Hebrew, “righteousness.” They were in accordance with what was right; they were so strictly just, that they might be called righteousness itself. This implied the utmost confidence in God, the most absolute submission to his will.

And that thou in faithfulness hast afflicted me In faithfulness to my soul; in faithfulness to my own best interest. It was not arbitrary; it was not from malice; it was not that the affliction had come by chance; it was because God loved his soul, and sought his welfare. It was because God saw that there was some good reason why it should be done; that there was some evil to be checked; some improper conduct to be corrected; some lesson which he would be the better for learning; some happy influence on his life here, and on his happiness in heaven, which would be more than a compensation for all that he would suffer.

~~4897~~ Psalm 119:76. Let, I pray thee, thy merciful kindness be for my comfort Margin, as in Hebrew, “to comfort me.” The word rendered merciful-kindness means mercy, favor, grace, kindness; and the idea is, that all his consolation — all that he expected or desired — must be derived from mere favor; from the goodness of God. He had no source of comfort in himself, and he had no claim on God for comfort. It was through mercy alone that he could have happiness of any kind.

According to thy word ... See the notes at ~~4825~~ Psalm 119:25.

~~4897~~ Psalm 119:77. Let thy tender mercies come unto me See the notes at ~~4894~~ Psalm 119:41.

That I may live It is evident that this was uttered in view of some great calamity by which his life was threatened. He was dependent for life — for recovery from sickness, or for deliverance from danger — wholly on the compassion of God.

For thy law is my delight See the notes at <sup><B316></sup>Psalm 119:16; compare <sup><B324></sup>Psalm 119:24,47. This is urged here as a reason for the divine interposition. The meaning is, that he was a friend of God; that he had pleasure in his service and in his commandments; and that he might, therefore, with propriety, appeal to God to interpose in his behalf. This is a proper ground of appeal to God in our prayers, not on the ground of merit or claim, but because we may reasonably suppose that God will be disposed to protect his friends, and to deliver them in the day of trouble.

For they dealt perversely with me They were not honest; they deceived me; they took advantage of me; they were not true to their professions of friendship. Compare the notes at <sup><B308></sup>Isaiah 59:3; <sup><B308></sup>Job 8:3; 34:12.

Without a cause Hebrew, “by a lie.” That is, They have been guilty of falsehood in their charges or accusations against me. I have given them no occasion for such treatment, and their conduct is based on an entire misrepresentation. See the notes at <sup><B325></sup>John 15:25.

But I will meditate in thy precepts See the notes at <sup><B302></sup>Psalm 1:2. I will not be diverted from thee, from thy law, from thy service, by all that man can do to me; by all the false charges which the enemies of religion may bring against me; by all the contempt or persecution that I may suffer for my attachment to thee. See the notes at <sup><B323></sup>Psalm 119:23,69.

<sup><B379></sup>Psalm 119:79. Let those that fear thee turn unto me Let thy friends be my friends. Let them show me favor, and count me among their companions. If the great and the powerful turn away from me; if they persecute me, and do me wrong; if they cast out my name as evil, and are unwilling to associate with me, yet let thy friends, however poor and humble, regard me with kindness, and reckon me among their number, and I shall be satisfied.

And those that have known thy testimonies Thy law. Those who can see and appreciate the beauty of thy commandments. This is the ground of true friendship in religion — the common love of God, of his law, and of his service. This is a permanent ground of affection. All friendship founded on earthly distinctions; all derived from titled birth — from rank — from affluence — from civil, military, or naval renown — from beauty, strength, or nobleness of form — must be temporary; but that which is founded on attachment to God, to his law, and to the Saviour, will abide forever.

Psalm 119:80. Let my heart be sound ... Hebrew, “Be perfect.” See the notes at Job 1:1. The Septuagint here is “immaculate,” αμωμος. So the Latin Vulgate. It is the expression of a desire that the heart might be pure; that there might be no improper attachment for other objects; that there might be no defect of love to God.

That I be not ashamed See the notes at Psalm 119:6. A man has no occasion to be ashamed of a pure heart; and that which can alone keep us from being ultimately ashamed is sincerity, uprightness, and purity in the service of God.

Psalm 119:81. My soul fainteth for thy salvation The new division of the psalm, which begins here, is indicated by the Hebrew letter “Kaph,” equivalent to “k” or “c” (hard). The word here rendered “fainteth” is the same that in Psalm 73:26 is translated “faileth”: “My flesh and my heart faileth.” The idea is, that his strength gave way; he had such an intense desire for salvation that he became weak and powerless. Any strong emotion may thus prostrate us; and the love of God — the desire of his favor — the longing for heaven — may be so intense as to produce this result.

I hope in thy word I trust in thy promises, and am sustained. My powers, which would otherwise wholly fail, are upheld by thy word, and on that I rely. See Psalm 119:74.

Psalm 119:82. Mine eyes fail for thy word The same word in Hebrew as in the previous verse and in Psalm 73:26. The idea here is that of looking out for a thing — of “straining the eyes” — so that their power becomes exhausted. The language expresses a longing desire — a waiting — an intense wish — for a thing, as when we look for a ship long expected, or for a friend long absent, or for help when in danger. Such a desire the psalmist had for the word of God, for divine truth.

Saying, When wilt thou comfort me? How long shall I be compelled to wait for comfort? How often in the Psalms do the expressions occur, “When,” and “How long!” How often in the life of the believer now are similar expressions appropriate! God often seems greatly to try the faith and patience of his people by mere delay; and the strength of faith and the power of religion are shown in such circumstances by persevering faith in the divine promises, even when there seems to be no evidence that he will interpose.

Psalm 119:83. For I am become like a bottle in the smoke Bottles in the East were commonly made of skins. See the notes at Matthew 9:17. Such “bottles,” hanging in tents where the smoke had little opportunity to escape, would, of course, become dark and dingy, and would thus be emblems of distress, discomfort, and sorrow. The meaning here is, that, by affliction and sorrow, the psalmist had been reduced to a state which would be well represented by such a bottle. A somewhat similar idea occurs in Psalm 22:15: “My strength is dried up like a potsherd.” See the notes at that place.

Yet do I not forget thy statutes Compare the notes at Psalm 119:51. Though thus deeply afflicted, though without comfort or peace, yet I do, I will, maintain allegiance to thee and thy law. The doctrine is that distress, poverty, sorrow, penury, and rags — the most abject circumstances of life — will not turn away a true child of God from obeying and serving him. True religion will abide all these tests. Lazarus from the deepest poverty — from beggary — from undressed sores — went up to Abraham’s bosom.

Psalm 119:84. How many are the days of thy servant? I cannot hope to live long. I am sinking under my burdens. If I am, therefore, to see the accomplishment of my desires — my deliverance from my enemies and my troubles — it must be soon. This is not a desire to be told how long he was to live, as if it were an object of desire to know this, but it is a method of saying that he could not live long under these circumstances, and therefore he offered this earnest prayer that God would interpose and save him soon.

When wilt thou execute judgment on them that persecute me? How long shall this be delayed? I look for this; I expect it; I rely on thy promise that it shall be done; but if done so that I shall see it, it must soon be done, for I shall soon sink into the grave. It is a prayer that God would come and do quickly what he felt assured he would do, in delivering him from his foes.

Psalm 119:85. The proud Those in high life, or of exalted rank. See the notes at Psalm 119:51.

Have digged pits for me See the notes at Psalm 7:15. Compare Psalm 35:7; 57:6; 94:13.

Which are not after thy law The word which here refers not to the pits, but to the proud. They who have done this are people who do not regard thy commands; people who are open and public offenders. It is that class of people with whom I have to contend — inert who set at defiance all the laws of God; men high in rank, who wield great power, and who have no regard to the law of God in their conduct. Even they have sought my destruction in the meanest way possible — by covert arts, by underhanded means, by digging pits, as they would for wild beasts.

Psalm 119:86. All thy commandments are faithful Margin, “faithfulness.” The idea in the Hebrew is that they are worthy to be relied on. They are founded in truth, and they should secure our confidence.

They persecute me wrongfully ... Hebrew, a “lie, “or “falsehood.” That is, There is a “lie” or “falsehood” at the foundation of their persecutions. Those persecutions are not based on any just views of what I am, or of the treatment which I ought to receive at the hand of my fellow-men. They charge on me things which are not true, and they act accordingly. See the notes at Psalm 119:78.

Psalm 119:87. They had almost consumed me upon earth The word which is here translated “consumed” is the same which is used in Psalm 119:81, and there rendered “fainteth.” See the notes at that verse. The idea is, that their persecutions had been so severe, and so long continued, that his strength was almost exhausted; he was ready to faint and to die.

But I forsook not thy precepts I still adhered to thee, even in the extremity of my suffering. The effect of persecution was not to drive me from thee, or to lead me to abandon thee. See the notes at Psalm 119:61,69.

Psalm 119:88. Quicken me Cause me to live; revive me. See the notes at Psalm 71:20; Ephesians 2:1. Compare Psalm 80:18; Romans 8:11; 1 Peter 3:18; John 6:63.

After thy loving-kindness Thy mercy; thy grace; thy compassion. That is, Let the measure of the grace given to me be thine own benevolent nature, and not my deserts. That is all I ask; that is all I could desire.

So shall I keep the testimony of thy mouth Which proceeds out of thy mouth. His hope of being able to keep it was founded on the grace and mercy which he besought God to bestow upon him.

Psalm 119:89. Forever, O LORD, thy word is settled in heaven This commences a new division of the psalm, indicated by the Hebrew letter “Lamed,” or “l.” On the meaning of the passage, see the notes at Psalm 89:2. The word rendered “settled” means properly “to set, to put, to place;” and then, to stand, to cause to stand, to set up, as a column, Genesis 35:20; an altar, Genesis 33:20; a monument, 1 Samuel 15:12. The meaning here is, that the word — the law — the promise — of God was made firm, established, stable, in heaven; and would be so forever and ever. What God had ordained as law would always remain law; what he had affirmed would always remain true; what he had promised would be sure forever.

Psalm 119:90. Thy faithfulness The accomplishment of thy promises.

Is unto all generations Margin, “to generation and generation.” From one generation to another. The generations of people change and pass away, but thy promises do not change. They are as applicable to one generation as to another; they meet every generation alike. The people of no one age can lay any exclusive claim to them, or feel that they were made only for them. They are as universal — as much adapted to the new generations that come upon the earth — as the light of the sun, ever-enduring, is; or as the fountains and streams, which flow from age to age.

Thou hast established the earth, and it abideth Margin, “Standeth.” It is firm. The earth thus established or made firm, is an illustration of thy faithfulness, and of the stability and permanence of thy promises. It is the same from generation to generation, with its rivers, streams, and fountains; with its fruits and flowers; with its balmy air and its sweet prospects; with its riches of gold and silver; with its pearls and diamonds; with its treasures of land and ocean. So is the word of God — so are the gracious promises which he has addressed to people — the same in every age.

Psalm 119:91. They continue this day according to thine ordinances

According to thy judgments (Hebrew); that is, thy commands. They “stand” (Hebrew) as thou hast appointed; they are what thou didst design them to be. The original purpose in their creation is carried out, and they thus furnish an illustration of the stability of thy government and the permanency of thy law.

For all are thy servants All worlds obey thy commands; all are under thy control. They show that they are thy servants by the conformity of their movements to the laws which thou hast impressed on them.

Psalm 119:92. Unless thy law had been my delights See the notes at Psalm 119:16,24. Unless I had had pleasure in thy law, thy word, thy truth; unless I had derived support and consolation in that.

I should then have perished in mine affliction I should have sunk under my burden. I should not have been able to hold up under the weight of sorrow and trial. How often the people of God can say. this! How often may each one in the course of his life say this! “I should have sunk a thousand times,” said a most excellent, but much afflicted, man to me, “if it had not been for one declaration in the word of God — ‘The Eternal God is thy refuge, and underneath are the everlasting arms.’”

Psalm 119:93. I will never forget thy precepts Thy laws; thy truth. I will bear them in mind forever. To all eternity they shall be the object of my meditation.

For with them thou hast quickened me By them thou hast given me life, spiritual life. Compare the notes at James 1:18. This is stated as a reason why he would never suffer the truth of God to pass out of his mind. By that truth he had been made really to live. He had been brought from spiritual death to spiritual life. He saw before him now, as the result of that, an endless career of blessedness. How could he ever forget what had worked such a change in his character and condition; which had inspired such hopes; which had opened before him such an immortal career of glory!

Psalm 119:94. I am thine All that he had, and was, belonged to God. This is an expression of a fact, and of a purpose: a fact about which he had no doubt; a purpose ever to be the Lord’s. This is indicative of the real state of feeling in the heart of a pious man. He feels that he is the Lord's; he has no other desire than to be his forever.

Save me Deliver me from my enemies; from sin; from hell. As he belonged to God, he prayed that God would save and preserve his own.

For I have sought thy precepts I feel assured or confident that this has been the aim and purpose of my life. On this ground I plead that thou wilt keep and preserve me. A man who feels assured that he is a friend of God has a right to appeal to him for protection, and he will not appeal to him in vain.

Psalm 119:95. The wicked have waited for me to destroy me That is, they have lain in wait; or, they have laid a plan. They are watching the opportunity to do it.

But I will consider thy testimonies I will think of them; I will adhere to them; I will find my support in them; I will not be driven from my adhesion to them by an apprehension of what man can do to me.

Psalm 119:96. I have seen an end of all perfection The word which is here rendered “perfection” — hl kTj<sup>†8502</sup> — occurs only in this place; but a similar word from the same root — tyl kTjæ<sup>†8503</sup> — occurs in the following places: in <sup>†8191</sup>Nehemiah 3:21, and <sup>†8390</sup>Job 26:10, rendered “end;” in <sup>†8107</sup>Job 11:7; 28:3, rendered “perfection;” and in <sup>†8392</sup>Psalm 139:22, rendered “perfect.” It means properly “completion, perfection;” or, as others suppose, “hope, confidence.” It is rendered, in the Septuagint and Latin Vulgate, “consummation.” Luther renders it, “of all things.” It is proper here to apply it to character; to perfect virtue, or to claims to perfect virtue — either in one's-self or in others. The word rendered “end” here refers not to the fact of its existence, or to its duration, but to a limit or boundary as to its extent. To all claims to perfection made by man, he had seen an end or limit. He had examined all which claimed to be perfect; he had found it defective; he had so surveyed and examined the matter, as to be able to say that there could be no claim to perfection which would prove good. All claim to perfection on the part of man must be abandoned forever.

But thy commandment is exceeding broad The word but is not in the original, and enfeebles the sense. The idea is, that the law of God, as he now saw it, was of such a nature — was so “broad” — as to demonstrate that there could be no just claim to perfection among people. All claims to perfection had arisen from the fact that the law was not properly understood, that its true nature was not seen. People thought that they were perfect, but it was because they had no just view of the extent and the spirituality of the law of God. They set up an imperfect standard; and when they became conformed to that standard, as they might do, they imagined themselves to be perfect; but when their conduct was compared with a higher and more just standard — the law of God — it could not but be seen that they were imperfect people. That law had claims which they had not met, and never would meet, in this life. It is very easy to flatter ourselves that we are perfect, if we make our own standard of character; it is not possible for man to set up a claim to perfection, if he measures himself by the standard of God's word; and all the claims of people to perfection are made simply because they do not properly understand what the law of God requires. Compare the notes at ~~1810~~ Job 9:20.

~~1837~~ Psalm 119:97. O how love I thy law! This commences a new division of the Psalm, indicated by the Hebrew letter "Mem" (m). The expression here, "O how love I thy law," implies intense love — as if a man were astonished at the fervour of his own emotion. His love was so ardent that it was amazing and wonderful to himself — perhaps wonderful that he, a sinner, should love the law of God at all; wonderful that he should ever have been brought so to love a law which condemned himself. Any man who reflects on what his feelings are by nature in regard to religion, will be filled with wonder that he loves it at all; all who are truly religious ought to be so filled with love to it, that it will be difficult for them to find words to express the intensity of their affection.

Hast made me wiser than mine enemies I have a better understanding of thee, of thy law, of the duties of this life, and in regard to the life to come, than my enemies have — not because I am naturally better, or because I have higher endowments by nature, but because thou hast made me wiser than they are. The rendering of this first clause of the verse now most approved by interpreters is, "Thy commandments make me more wise than my enemies are," though this requires a singular verb to be construed with a plural noun (Professor Alexander). So DeWette renders it.

For they are ever with me Margin, as in Hebrew, “it is ever with me.” The reference is to the law or commandments of God. The meaning is, that that law was never out of his mind; that he was constantly thinking about it; and that it unfolded such wisdom to him as to make him superior to all his foes; to give him a better understanding of life, its design, its duties, and its obligations, than his enemies had. The best instructor in true wisdom is the revealed word of God — the Bible.

Psalm 119:99. I have more understanding than all my teachers

Referring perhaps to those who had given him instruction in early life. By constant meditation on the law of God, he had, in the progress of years, advanced to a point beyond that to which they had arrived. He had improved upon their suggestions and instructions, until he had surpassed them in knowledge. His “design” in saying this was to set forth the excellency and the fullness of the law of God, and to show how the study of it was suited to enlarge the understanding. In early life the wisdom of teachers seems to be far beyond anything that we can hope to reach; yet a few years of study and meditation may place us far beyond them. What those teachers seemed to be to us, however, when we were young, may serve ever onward as a means of comparison when we wish to speak of the greatness of human attainments. So the psalmist says that he had now reached a point which seemed to him in early life to be wonderful, and to be beyond what he had then hoped ever to attain. He had now reached that point; he had gone beyond it.

For thy testimonies are my meditation Compare Psalm 1:2;

Timothy 3:15. All this knowledge he had obtained by meditation on the law of God; by the study of divine truth. The effect of that constant study was seen in the knowledge which he now possessed, and which seemed to surprise even himself as compared with the brightest anticipations of his early years.

Psalm 119:100. I understand more than the ancients Hebrew, The old men. It does not refer, as the word “ancients” does with us, to the people of former times, but to aged men. They have treasured up wisdom. They have had the advantage of experience, of study, and of observation. They, therefore, like teachers, become a standard by which we measure our own attainments, as the boy hardly hopes to gain that amount of knowledge which he observes in people who are venerable in years, and who are remarkable for their acquirements. Compare Job 12:12: “With the ancient is wisdom, and in length of days understanding.” <sup><830></sup>Job 32:7: “I said, Days should speak, and multitude of years should teach wisdom.” Compare <sup><1040></sup>1 Kings 4:30,31. Yet the psalmist says that he “had” reached this point, and had even gone beyond what he had once thought he could never attain.

Because I keep thy precepts It is all the result of an honest endeavor to do right; to observe law; to keep the commands of God. Obedience to the law of God will do more than any mere human teaching to make a man truly wise.

<sup><8900></sup>Psalm 119:101. I have refrained my feet from every evil way I have walked in the path which thy law marks out. I have avoided the way of wickedness, and have not yielded to the seductions of a sinful life.

That I might keep thy word I have avoided all those allurements which would turn me from obedience, and which would prevent a right observance of thy commands. This indicates a purpose and a desire to keep the law of God, and shows the method which he adopted in order to do this. That method was to guard against everything which would turn him from obedience; it was, to make obedience to the law of God the great aim of the life.

<sup><8900></sup>Psalm 119:102. I have not departed from thy judgments Thy law; thy commands. This cannot mean that he had never done this, but that as a great rule of life he had not done it. The character and aim of his life had been obedience, not disobedience. A man may honestly say this, though he may be conscious of much imperfection, and may feel that he has not perfectly carried out such an aim and purpose. No one can be a truly pious man, or have evidence of personal religion, who cannot say in sincerity that he has “not departed in this sense, “from the judgments” (the commands) of God; who cannot look back on his life and say that his course — his aim — his character — since he became a professor of religion — has been, one of obedience to God. Compare <sup><9100></sup>1 John 3:7-9.

For thou hast taught me Not to himself was this to be traced, but to God; not to any wisdom of his own, but to that which was given him from on high.

<sup><8900></sup>Psalm 119:103. How sweet are thy words unto my taste ... Margin, as in Hebrew, “palate.” The reference is to the taste, perhaps because the sense of taste was supposed to reside in the palate. The Hebrew word “may” include also the whole of the inside of the mouth. The word rendered “sweet” does not occur elsewhere. It properly means “to be smooth,” and hence, is applied to kind or agreeable words. On the sentiment here, see the notes at <sup><9910></sup>Psalm 19:10.

<sup><9910></sup>Psalm 119:104. Through thy precepts I get understanding A true understanding; a correct view of things; a knowledge of thee, of myself, of the human character, of the destiny of man, of the way of salvation — the best, and the only essential knowledge for man. This knowledge the psalmist obtained from the “precepts” of God; that is, all that God had communicated by revelation. This passage expresses in few words what had been said more at length in <sup><9918></sup>Psalm 119:98-100.

Therefore I hate every false way I see that which is right and true, and I pursue it. In proportion as I have a just knowledge of truth and duty, I hate that which is false and evil.

<sup><9915></sup>Psalm 119:105. Thy word is a lamp unto my feet This begins a new portion of the psalm, indicated by the Hebrew letter “Nun,” equivalent to our “n.” The margin here is “candle.” The Hebrew word means a light, lamp, candle. The idea is, that the word of God is like a torch or lamp to man in a dark night. It shows him the way; it prevents his stumbling over obstacles, or failing down precipices, or wandering off into paths which would lead into danger, or would turn him away altogether from the path to life. Compare the notes at <sup><6019></sup>2 Peter 1:19.

And a light unto my path The same idea substantially is presented here. It is a light which shines on the road that a man treads, so that he may see the path, and that he may see any danger which may be in his path. The expression is very beautiful, and is full of instruction. He who makes the word of God his guide, and marks its teachings, is in the right way. He will clearly see the path. He will be able to mark the road in which he ought to go, and to avoid all those by-paths which would lead him astray. He will see where those by-roads turn off from the main path — often at a very small angle, and so that there seems to be no divergence. He will see any obstruction which may lie in his path; any declivity or precipice which may be near, and down which, in a dark night, one might fall. Man needs such a guide, and the Bible is such a guide. Compare the notes at <sup><9919></sup>Psalm 119:9.

Psalm 119:106. I have sworn I have solemnly purposed; I have given to this purpose the solemnity and sanction of an oath. That is, I have called God to witness; I have formed the purpose in his presence, and with the consciousness that his eye is upon me. So all who make a profession of religion solemnly vow or swear. They do it in the house of God; they do it in the presence of the Discerner of hearts; they do it at the communion table; they do it at the family altar; they do it in the closet, when alone with God.

And I will perform it Hebrew, I will establish it, or make it to stand. It shall not be a mere purpose. It shall be accomplished. This also is the resolution of all who make a true profession of religion. It is their intention — their solemn determination — to carry out that vow to its full accomplishment, always, and in every place, while life lasts, and forever. A man who makes a profession of religion, intending “not” to carry out what is fairly implied in such a profession, is a hypocrite. Unless there is a solemn purpose to keep the law of God, and always to keep it — to do what is fairly implied in a profession of religion, and always to do it — to defend the truth according to his best means of knowing it, and always to defend it — he cannot possibly be a sincere friend of God; he cannot be truly a religious man. He cannot be loyal to his country who designs to violate any one of its just laws; he cannot be an obedient child who intends to disobey the laws of a parent.

That I will keep thy righteous judgments Not implying that there are any of the judgments of God which are not righteous, but meaning to characterize all his judgments or laws as righteous.

Psalm 119:107. I am afflicted very much The form of the affliction is not mentioned. There are frequent allusions in the psalm to the fact that the author was and had been afflicted — as, in fact, must be the case in the life of every good man. Compare Psalm 119:71,75. If David was the author of the psalm, we know that there were numerous occasions in his life when this language would be appropriate. As designed for the people of God at all times, it was important that there should be these allusions to affliction.

Quicken me ... Make me live; give me life and vigor, that I may bear up under my trials. See the notes at Psalm 119:25.

Psalm 119:108. Accept, I beseech thee, the free-will offerings of my mouth Or, the meaning of the word here rendered “free-will,” see the notes at Psalm 110:3. It conveys the idea that there is no constraint or compulsion; that the offering is a prompting of the heart. The offering might be that of flour, or grain, or fruits, or property of any kind, as devoted to God; or it might be, as here, an offering of the lips, expressed in prayer and praise. Either of them might be acceptable to God; their being accepted in either case would depend on the good pleasure of God, and hence, the psalmist prays that his offering might be thus acceptable. Compare Hebrews 13:15.

And teach me thy judgments Thy commands; thy laws. See the notes at Psalm 119:12.

Psalm 119:109. My soul is continually in my hand The Septuagint renders this, “My soul is always in thy hands,” but the Hebrew will not admit of this construction. The idea in the original is that his soul — his life — was always in jeopardy. The expression seems to be proverbial. Anything taken in the hand is liable to be rudely snatched away. Thus a casket of jewels, or a purse of gold in the hand, may at any moment be seized by robbers. See the notes at Job 13:14. Compare 1 Samuel 19:5; Judges 12:3. The meaning here is, that his life was constantly in danger.

Yet do I not forget thy law Notwithstanding the danger to which I am exposed, and the care necessary to defend my life, I do not allow my mind to be turned from meditating on thy law, nor do I suffer any danger to deter me from obeying it. Compare the notes at Psalm 119:61.

Psalm 119:110. The wicked have laid a snare for me As men do to take wild beasts or birds. See the notes at Psalm 119:85. Compare the notes at Job 18:8,10; Psalm 9:15; 69:22. See also Psalm 119:61,69.

Yet I erred not from thy precepts Notwithstanding the danger to which I was exposed, I maintained a steadfast adherence to thy commandments. I was not deterred from obeying them by any peril which beset me.

Psalm 119:111. Thy testimonies Thy law; thy revealed will; the revelation which thou hast given considered as thy solemn “testimony” as to what is true and right.

Have I taken as an heritage for ever As my inheritance; as my property; as that which I consider to be of real and permanent value. The Hebrew word used here — l j æe <sup><45158></sup> — means to receive as a possession; to acquire; to possess as wealth; and then, to inherit. It is usually applied to the possession of the promised land as an inheritance. Here it means that the law of God was to him as such a possession. He regarded it as one does a rich inheritance. He chose it as his portion above all things else.

For they are the rejoicing of my heart My happiness is in them. I find constant comfort in them. See <sup><43377></sup>Psalm 119:77,92. Compare the notes at <sup><49002></sup>Psalm 1:2.

<sup><48912></sup>Psalm 119:112. I have inclined mine heart The Hebrew word means properly “to stretch out”; “to extend” — as the hand. <sup><48816></sup>Exodus 8:6,17. Then it means to incline, to bow, to depress. Here the idea is, that he had “given” that “direction” to the inclinations of his heart; he had resolved or purposed. He refers to an act of choice on his part, meaning that he had preferred this course, or that he had made this a solemn intention. Though every right inclination of the human heart is to be traced to the divine agency, yet it is also true that man is active in religion — or that his own mind resolves, chooses, and prefers — and that true religion is the actual choice or preference of all who serve God aright. See the notes at <sup><43359></sup>Psalm 119:59.

To perform thy statutes always Margin, as in Hebrew, “to do.” He meant to do the will of God. He intended to do this constantly; even forever. No man can be a truly pious man who has any disposition, or any purpose, “ever” to turn away from the service of God.

<sup><48913></sup>Psalm 119:113. I hate vain thoughts This commences a new portion of the psalm, distinguished by the Hebrew letter “Camech,” answering to our “s” or the French cedilla “ç”. The word rendered “vain thoughts” occurs only in this place. It is rendered by the Septuagint, παρανομους <sup><43891></sup> — transgressors. So the Latin Vulgate. Luther renders it “die Flattergeister,” the frivolous-minded. The word means divided; a man of a divided mind; a man who has no sure faith in regard to divine things, but is driven here and there; a sceptic; a doubter. Compare <sup><43008></sup>James 1:8. Thus it refers not to his own thoughts primarily, as being “vain” or worthless, but to a state of mind or heart in general, where there is no firmness, no stability, no settled view: a state of mind wavering, doubtful, skeptical, in regard to religion. What is implied here in reference to what he loved — by stating (in the way of contrast) what he “hated,” — would be a mind which was settled in its convictions of truth, and firm in its adherence to truth; a mind which was steadfast in religion, and not vacillating, skeptical, or uncertain on the subject. This denotes that the psalmist sought such a state of mind for himself, and that he valued it in others.

But thy law do I love I have no “divided” or unsettled feelings in regard to that. I am conscious of a firm attachment to it. This thought he has repeatedly expressed in the psalm.

I hope in thy word See <sup><119:74></sup> Psalm 119:74,81.

<sup><119:15></sup> Psalm 119:115. Depart from me, ye evil-doers Workers of iniquity; bad men. See the notes at <sup><119:8></sup> Psalm 6:8. This indicates a determined purpose that nothing should deter or allure him from the service of God. A man who wishes to serve God, and lead a religious life, must separate himself from the society, as such, of unprincipled people.

For I will keep the commandments of my God This is my fixed resolution. It may be remarked here

- (1) that bad people will turn away from the society of one who has formed such a resolution, and who carries it out;
- (2) the resolution is a necessary one to be formed and executed, if a man will serve God;
- (3) the formation and execution of such a purpose, is the best way to get rid of the society of bad people.

<sup><119:16></sup> Psalm 119:116. Uphold me Sustain me in the trials and the temptations of life. Help me to bear afflictions without sinking under them; to meet temptations without yielding to them; to encounter opposition from the enemies of religion without being overcome.

According unto thy word

(1) According to the requirements of thy word — that I may be conformed to them;

(2) according to the promises of thy word — that they may be verified in me.

That I may live That my life may not be cut off by my foes, and that I may not sink under my burdens.

And let me not be ashamed of my hope The meaning of this is, Let not my hope prove to be delusive and vain; let it not be seen at last that it is worthless, or that religion has no power to accomplish what it promises. See the notes at <sup><B960></sup>Psalm 6:10; 25:2,3; 31:1. The phrase does not mean, as it would seem to signify, Let me not blush, or be unwilling to acknowledge my hope, or to profess that I am a friend of God. That “would be,” indeed, a proper prayer, but it is not the prayer here.

<sup><B917></sup>Psalm 119:117. Hold thou me up Keep me from falling in the trials and temptations of life. The Hebrew word means to prop, uphold, support. The Septuagint is, “Aid me.”

And I shall be safe And I shall be saved; or, that I may be saved. It is an acknowledgment of entire dependence on God for salvation — temporal and eternal.

And I will have respect ... I will look to thy statutes; I will have them always in my eye. Compare the notes at <sup><B916></sup>Psalm 119:6.

<sup><B918></sup>Psalm 119:118. Thou hast trodden down all them that err from thy statutes Compare the notes at <sup><B921></sup>Psalm 119:21. Rather, “Thou hast made light of,” or “thou despisest.” The Hebrew word means properly to suspend in a balance; to weigh. Then it means to lift up lightly or easily; and then, to make light of; to contemn; to regard anything as “light.” The Septuagint and Latin Vulgate render it, “Thou dost despise.” That is, God regards them as of no account; as a light substance of no value; as chaff which the wind carries away. Compare <sup><B918></sup>Job 21:18; <sup><B904></sup>Psalm 1:4; 35:5; <sup><B713></sup>Isaiah 17:13.

For their deceit is falsehood This seems to be a truism — for deceit must imply falsehood. In the original this is an emphatic way of declaring the whole thing to be false, as the Hebrew language often expresses emphasis by mere repetition — thus “pits, pits,” meaning many pits. The psalmist first characterizes their conduct as deceitful — as that which cannot be relied on — as that which must fail in the end; he then speaks of this system on which they acted as altogether a “lie” — as that which is utterly “false;” thus giving, as it were, a double emphasis to the statement, and showing how utterly delusive and vain it must be.

Psalm 119:119. Thou puttest away all the wicked of the earth Margin, “causest to cease.” Literally: “Dross ... thou makest all the wicked of the earth to cease.” They are seen by the psalmist as dross, and then he says that God had treated them as such.

Like dross The “scoriae” of metals, or of a furnace. This dross is cast out as of no value. So the wicked are regarded by God.

Therefore I love thy testimonies I love a law which condemns sin. I love a government which ferrets out and punishes the guilty. This is a leading object with all just governments; and this we approve in all governments. As the divine government makes this an object, and as it will accomplish this more perfectly than any other administration so it is more worthy of confidence than any other. As it is the only government that does this perfectly, so it is the only one that is worthy of unlimited confidence.

Psalm 119:120. My flesh trembleth for fear of thee I stand in awe of thee. I shudder at the consciousness of thy presence. See Habakkuk 3:16; Hebrews 12:21; Joel 2:10; Nahum 1:5. There is nothing unaccountable in this. Any man would tremble, should God manifest himself to him as he might do; and it is possible that the mind may have such an overpowering sense of the presence and majesty of God, that the body shall be agitated, lose its strength, and with the deepest alarm fall to the earth. Compare Daniel 10:8; Revelation 1:17. No man could meet one of the departed dead, or a good angel, without this fear; how much less could he meet God!

And I am afraid of thy judgments Of thy laws or commands. My mind is filled with awe at the strictness, the spirituality, the severity of thy law. Reverence — awe — is one of the essential elements of all true religion.

Psalm 119:121. I have done judgment and justice This commences a new division of the psalm, indicated by the Hebrew letter “‘Ayin” (‘) — a letter which cannot well be represented in the English alphabet, as there is, in fact, no letter in our language exactly corresponding with it. It would be best represented probably by what are called “breathings” in Greek. The meaning of the first part of this verse is, “I have led a righteous and upright life.” It is equivalent to saying that he had kept the law of God, or had made that the rule of his conduct.

Leave me not to mine oppressors To the people who would do me wrong; who seek my hurt. He urged this on the ground that he had been obedient to the divine law, and might, therefore, with propriety, make this request, or might claim the divine protection. Man has no merit of his own, and no claim on God; but when he is his true friend, it is not improper to expect that he will interpose in his behalf; nor is it improper to present this in the form of a prayer. Our loving God, and serving him, though it is done imperfectly, is, in fact, a reason why he should and will interpose in our behalf.

Psalm 119:122. Be surety for thy servant for good On the meaning of the word here rendered “be surety,” see the notes at <sup><1878></sup>Job 17:3, and <sup><2384></sup>Isaiah 38:14, in both which places the same Hebrew word occurs: In Isaiah it is rendered “undertake for me.” The word means, properly, “to mix, to mingle;” hence, to braid, to interweave; then, to exchange, to barter. Then it means to mix or intermingle interests; to unite ourselves with others so that their interests come to be our own; and hence, to take one under our protection, to become answerable for, to be a surety for: as, when one endorses a note for another, he mingles his own interest, reputation, and means with his. So Christ becomes the security or surety — <sup><1450></sup>εὐρύος — of his people, <sup><872></sup>Hebrews 7:22. The prayer here is, that God would, so to speak, mix or mingle his cause and that of the psalmist together, and that he would then protect the common cause as his own; or, that he would become a “pledge” or “surety” for the safety of the psalmist. This now, through the Mediator, we have a right to ask at the hand of God; and when God makes our cause his own, we must be safe.

Let not the proud oppress me See the notes at <sup><1351></sup>Psalm 119:51. Let them not triumph over me, and crush me.

Psalm 119:123. Mine eyes fail for thy salvation See the notes at <sup><1381></sup>Psalm 119:81,82.

And for the word of thy righteousness Thy righteous word — that it may be made known to me, and that I may see its beauty and enjoy it.

Psalm 119:124. Deal with thy servant according unto thy mercy

Not according to justice — for, sinners as we are, we can never urge that as a plea before God. No man who knows himself could ask of God to deal with him according to the strict and stern principles of justice. But we may ask him to deal with us according to mercy — for mercy is our only plea, and the mercy of God — vast and boundless — constitutes such a ground of appeal as we need. No man can have any other; no man need desire any other.

And teach me thy statutes See the notes at Psalm 119:12. Show thy mercy to me in teaching me thy law.

Psalm 119:125. I am thy servant See the notes at Psalm 116:16.

Give me understanding, that I may know thy testimonies Since I am thy servant, instruct me in the knowledge of thy will. As I desire to obey thee, show me what will be acceptable obedience, or what thou dost require in order to acceptable service. This is a prayer of piety. A man who sincerely desires to obey God will make it a first point to ascertain what is his will, or what will constitute true obedience.

Psalm 119:126. It is time for thee, LORD, to work literally, “Time to do for Yahweh;” and the construction might be either that it is time to do (something) for Yahweh; or, that it is time for Yahweh himself to do (something). The direct address to the Lord in the latter part of the sentence would seem, however, to show that the latter is the true interpretation: to wit, that since people make void the law of God, it is time for him to work, that is, to interpose by his power and restrain them; to bring them to repentance; to assert his own authority; to vindicate his cause. Thus understood, it is an appropriate prayer to be used when iniquity abounds, and when some special form of sin has an ascendancy among a people. The other interpretation, however, “It is time (for us) to do (something), since people make void thy law,” suggests a truth of great importance. Then is the time when the people of God should arouse themselves to efforts to stay the tide of wickedness, and to secure the ascendancy of religion, of virtue, and of law.

For they have made void thy law They have broken it. They have set it at defiance. They regard and treat it as if it had no claim to obedience; as if it were a thing of nought. This the psalmist urges as a reason for the putting forth of power to arrest the evil; to bring people to repentance; to secure the salvation of souls. By all the evil done when the law of God is set at nought, by all the desirableness that the law should be obeyed, by all the danger to the souls of people from its violation, this prayer may now and at all times be offered, and that with earnestness. Compare <sup><B>136</sup>Psalm 119:136.

<sup><B>128</sup>Psalm 119:128. Therefore I esteem all thy precepts concerning all things to be right literally, “Therefore all the commandments of all I regard as right.” The idea seems to be, that he regarded as right and just all the commandments of God pertaining to “every” thing and “every” person; all, considered in every way; all, wherever the law extended, and whomsoever it embraced; all the law pertaining to duty toward God and toward man. He saw in the “violation” of the laws of God (<sup><B>126</sup>Psalm 119:126) a reason for approving “all” law; all that would restrain people from sin, and that would bind them to duty and to virtue. The effect had been to lead him to reflect on the worth of law as law, and he had come to the conclusion that all the laws of God were to be approved and loved, inasmuch as they would, in their observance, prevent the wrongs and sorrows which he saw to be consequent on their violation.

And I hate every false way Every course of life not based on truth, or on a right view of things. All just law is based on a perception of what is true; on the reality of things; on what is required in the nature of the case; on what will tend to promote the best interests of society. Compare the notes at <sup><B>104</sup>Psalm 119:104.

<sup><B>129</sup>Psalm 119:129. Thy testimonies are wonderful This commences a new division of the psalm, indicated by the Hebrew letter “Pe,” corresponding to our “p.” The meaning of the expression here is, that the laws of God — the revelations of his will — are adapted to fill the mind with wonder. The mind is awed by their wisdom; their comprehensiveness; their extent; their spirituality; their benevolence: by the fact that laws are framed, so perfectly adapted to the end; so well suited to secure order, and to promote happiness.

Therefore doth my soul keep them Because they are so surpassingly wise and benevolent; because they are so manifestly the work of wisdom and goodness.

Psalm 119:130. The entrance of thy words giveth light The Septuagint translates this, “the manifestation (or declaration) — ἡ <sup><13588></sup> δηλωσις <sup><1213></sup> — of thy words enlightens.” So the Vulgate. Luther renders it, “When thy word is revealed, so it delivers us, and makes the simple wise.” DeWette, “The opening (revelation) of thy word,” etc. The Hebrew word — j tæ <sup><6607></sup> — means an “opening” or “entrance” — as of a gate, <sup><6104></sup> Joshua 20:4; <sup><0085></sup> Judges 9:35; and then “a door,” as of a tent or the temple, <sup><0180></sup> Genesis 18:1; <sup><1008></sup> 1 Kings 6:8; or the gate of a city, <sup><2385></sup> Isaiah 3:26; and then it means opening, insight, instruction. The word as used here seems to denote the opening or unfolding of the word of God; the revelation of that word to the mind. A door is open so that we enter into a house; a gate, so that we enter into a city; and thus the meaning of the word of God is “opened” to us, so that we may, as it were, enter in and see its beauty. The language does not, therefore, denote the entrance of that word into the mind, but, its being made open to us so that we may perceive its beauty, or may ourselves “enter” into its meaning, its mysteries, and its beauties.

It giveth understanding unto the simple The word rendered “simple” literally means “those who are open to persuasion,” or who are easily enticed or seduced. Then it refers to the credulous, <sup><0145></sup> Proverbs 14:15, and then to the “inexperienced.” See the notes at <sup><0907></sup> Psalm 19:7; 116:6.

Psalm 119:131. I opened my mouth and panted All this is the language of deep emotion. We breathe hard under the influence of such emotion; we open the mouth wide, and pant, as the ordinary passage for the air through the nostrils is not sufficient to meet the needs of the lungs in their increased action. The idea is, that his heart was full; that he had such an intense desire as to produce deep and rapid breathing; that he was like one who was exhausted, and who “panted” for breath. Compare the notes at <sup><1911></sup>Psalm 42:1.

<sup><1813></sup>Psalm 119:132. Look thou upon me Turn not away from me. Regard me with thy favor.

And be merciful unto me, as thou usest to do unto those that love thy name Margin, “According to the custom toward those,” etc. The Hebrew word is “judgment:” “according to the judgment to the lovers of thy name.” The word seems here to be used in the sense of “right;” of what is due; or, of what is usually determined: that is, as God usually determines, judges, acts toward those who love him. The idea is, Treat me according to the rules which regulate the treatment of thy people. Let me be regarded as one of them, and be dealt with accordingly. On the sentiment in this passage, see the notes at <sup><1914></sup>Psalm 106:4.

<sup><1813></sup>Psalm 119:133. Order my steps in thy word My goings, or, my conduct and life — by thy word; according to thy requirements. Let me be wholly obedient to thy will.

And let not any iniquity have dominion over me See the notes at <sup><1913></sup>Psalm 19:13. The prayer is, that no form of sin, that no wicked passion or propensity, might be allowed to rule over him. He who is willing that any one sin should rule in his heart, though he should be free from all other forms of sin, cannot be a pious man. See the notes at <sup><3120></sup>James 2:10.

<sup><1813></sup>Psalm 119:134. Deliver me from the oppression of man From constraint on the part of man, so that I may be free to act as I please. Give me true religious liberty, and let me not be under any compulsion or constraint. The word rendered “deliver” is that which is usually rendered “redeem.” It is used here in the large sense of deliverance; and the prayer is an expression of what the true friends of religion have always sought, desired, and demanded — “freedom” of opinion — the richest blessing which man can enjoy.

So will I keep thy precepts My heart inclines to that; I desire it; and, if suffered to act without constraint, I will do it. As it is the purpose and the wish of my soul, I pray that all hindrances to the free exercise of my religion may be removed. How often has this prayer been offered in times of persecution! By how many million of the dwellers on the earth might it even now be offered! What a blessing it is to those who are free from oppressive laws, that they are permitted to carry out the wishes of their hearts, and to worship God according to the dictates of their conscience, with none to molest them or make them afraid.

Psalm 119:135. Make thy face to shine upon thy servant Hebrew, “Let thy face give light to thy servant.” See the notes at Psalm 4:6.

And teach me thy statutes See the notes at Psalm 119:12.

Psalm 119:136. Rivers of waters run down mine eyes My heart is sad, and my eyes pour forth floods of tears. It is not a gentle weeping, but my eyes are like a fountain which pours out full-flowing streams. See Jeremiah 9:1. “Oh that my head were waters, and mine eyes a fountain of tears,” etc. Compare Jeremiah 14:17; Lamentations 1:16; 2:18.

Because they keep not thy law On account of the sins, the follies, the stupidity, and the transgressions of people. So the Saviour wept over Jerusalem (Luke 19:41); and so the apostle said that he had “great heaviness and continual sorrow” in his heart, on account of his “brethren,” his “kinsmen according to the flesh.” Romans 9:2,3. Such a feeling is right. There is nothing for which we should be excited to deeper emotion in respect to our fellow-men than for the fact that they are violators of the law of God, and exposed to its fearful penalty. There is nothing which more certainly indicates true piety in the soul than such deep compassion for people as sinners, or because they are sinners. There is nothing which is more certainly connected with a work of grace in a community, or revival of true religion, than when such a feeling pervades a church. Then Christians will pray; then they will labor to save sinners; then they will feel their dependence on God; and then the Spirit of God will descend and bless the efforts put forth for the salvation of people. It may be added, nothing is more remarkable than that pious people ordinarily feel so little on account of the danger of their friends and fellow-sinners — that the occasions are so rare on which they imitate the example of the psalmist and of the Saviour in weeping over the condition of a perishing world!

Psalm 119:137. Righteous art thou, O LORD ... This commences a new division of the psalm, indicated by the Hebrew letter “Tsaddiy” — corresponding with “ts.” The thought in this verse is, that God is right, or righteous, in his judgments, that is, in his law; or, in other words, that his law is founded on principles of equity.

Psalm 119:138. Thy testimonies that thou hast commanded Thy law, considered as a testimony as to what is right and best.

Are righteous and very faithful Margin, as in Hebrew, “righteousness and faithfulness.” They are “so” righteous, and so deserving of confidence — so certain to be accomplished, and so worthy to be trusted in — that they may be spoken of as “righteousness” and “fidelity” of the most perfect kind; the very essence of that which is right.

Psalm 119:139. My zeal hath consumed me Margin, “cut me off.” The word which is here translated “consumed” is rendered “cut off” in Lamentations 3:53; Job 23:17; Psalm 54:5; 88:16; 94:23; 101:5; 143:12; “vanish,” Job 6:17; “destroyed,” Psalm 73:27; 2 Samuel 22:41; Psalm 18:40; 101:8; 69:4. It means here, that he pined away; that his strength was exhausted; that he was sinking under the efforts which he had put forth as expressive of his deep interest in the cause of God and of truth. On the sentiment here expressed, see the notes at Psalm 69:9.

Because mine enemies have forgotten thy words Thy law; thy commands. It was not because they were his foes — not because he was endeavoring to destroy them, or to take vengeance on them — but because they were unmindful of God, and of the claims of his law. It is a great triumph which religion gains over a man’s soul, when, in looking on the conduct of persecutors, calumniators, and slanderers — of those who are constantly doing us wrong — we are more grieved because they violate the law of God than because they injure us; when our solicitude is turned from ourselves, and terminates on our regard for the honor of God and his law. Yet that is the nature of true religion; and that we should be able to find in ourselves in such circumstances. A man should doubt the evidence of his personal religion, if all his feelings terminate on the wrong done to himself by the wicked conduct of others; if he has no feeling of solicitude because the law of God has been violated, and God has been dishonored. Compare the notes at Psalm 119:136.

Psalm 119:140. Thy word is very pure Margin, “tried or refined.” See the word explained in the notes at Psalm 18:30.

Therefore thy servant loveth it Therefore I love it. I love it because it is pure, holy, true; not merely because it will save me. Apart from all reference to myself. I love thy truth as truth; I love purity as purity; I love law as law; I love holiness as holiness. This is true religion.

Psalm 119:141. I am small and despised The word here rendered “small” may mean “small” in respect to number — that is, “few,” <sup><3182></sup>Micah 5:2; <sup><3182></sup>Isaiah 60:22; or in respect to age — “young,” <sup><0181></sup>Genesis 19:31; or in respect to dignity — “low;” least in rank or esteem. The language here may be applied to the church as comparatively few; to one who is young; or to one in humble life. Either of these may be a reason why one is regarded as of little consequence, or may be subject to reproach and ridicule. It is not possible to determine in which of these senses the word is used here, or in which sense it was applicable to the psalmist. The word “despised” means treated as unworthy of notice; passed by; looked upon with contempt. This might be on account of age, or poverty, or ignorance, or humble rank: or it might be simply on account of his religion, for the friends of God have been, and often are, despised simply because they are religious. The Saviour was despised by people; the apostles were; the most excellent of the earth in all ages have been. Compare <sup><3116></sup>Hebrews 11:36-38; <sup><4013></sup>1 Corinthians 4:13.

Yet do not I forget thy precepts I am not ashamed of them. I am not deterred from keeping them, and from avowing my purpose to obey them, because I am despised for it. This is often one of the severest tests of religion, and to be faithful in such circumstances is one of the clearest proofs of true attachment to God. There are few things which we are less able to bear than contempt, and one of the best evidences of attachment to principle is when we adhere to what we regard as right and true, though we are despised for it by the frivolous, the worldly, the rich — by those who claim to be “wise.” He who can bear contempt on account of his opinions, can usually bear anything.

Psalm 119:142. Thy righteousness is an everlasting righteousness It never changes. The principles of thy law, of thy government, and of thy method of saving people, are the same under all dispensations, in every land, in all worlds; and they will remain the same forever. Human governments change. Old dynasties pass away. New laws are enacted under new administrations. Customs change. Opinions change. People change. The world changes. But as God himself never changes, so it is with his law. That law is founded on eternal truth, and can never change.

And thy law is the truth It is founded on “truth;” on the reality of things. It is so essentially founded on truth, it springs so certainly out of truth, or out of the reality of things, that it may be said to be the truth itself. He who understands the law of God understands what truth is, for it is the expression and the exponent of that which is true.

Psalm 119:143. Trouble and anguish The word rendered “trouble” means affliction of any kind; the word rendered “anguish” would probably express that which results from being pressed, compressed, straitened. It properly refers to a situation where there is no room to move, and where we are pent up in a narrow place. The two words denote deep affliction.

Have taken hold on me Margin, as in Hebrew, “found me.” That is, they were in pursuit of me, and have at last apprehended me. Trouble, anguish, death, are in pursuit of us all our lives, and are never very far in the rear of us. Often, when we least expect them, they come suddenly up to us, and make us their victims.

Yet thy commandments are my delights Notwithstanding this trouble, and in this trouble — no matter what comes — I have the same unflinching source of comfort, the truth of God; and notwithstanding what may occur, I still make God and his law the source of my happiness. See the notes at Psalm 119:24.

Psalm 119:144. The righteousness of thy testimonies The principles of righteousness on which they are founded. Those testimonies — those laws — are not arbitrary, or the mere expressions of will. They are founded on right and justice as seen by God, and his laws are his testimony as to what truth and justice are.

Is everlasting See the notes at Psalm 119:142.

Give me understanding, and I shall live Give me a right view of thy law, and thy truth, and I shall have real life. See the notes at Psalm 119:34.

Psalm 119:145. I cried with my whole heart ... This commences a new division of the psalm, indicated by the Hebrew letter “Koph,” answering to our letter “k.” The expression “I cried with my whole heart” means that he did it earnestly, fervently. He had no divided wishes when he prayed. Not always is this so, even with good people. They sometimes offer a form of prayer, that they may be spiritually-minded, when their hearts are intensely worldly, and they would be unwilling to be otherwise; or that religion may be revived, when their hearts have no lively interest in it, and no wish for it; or that they may live wholly to God, when they are making all their arrangements to live for the world, and when they would be greatly disappointed if God should take means to make them live entirely to him; or that they may be humble, childlike, sincere, when they have no wish to be any otherwise than they are now, and when they would regard it as an affront if it should be assumed by any that they are not so now, and if they were exhorted to change their course of life. Often it would be a great surprise — perhaps grief — even to professedly religious persons, if God should answer their prayers, and should make them what they professedly desire to be, and what they pray that they may be. See the notes at <sup><9901></sup>Psalm 9:1; compare <sup><9901></sup>Psalm 111:1; 138:1; 119:2,10,34,58,69; <sup><2407></sup>Jeremiah 24:7.

I will keep thy statutes It is my purpose and desire to keep thy law perfectly.

<sup><99146></sup>Psalm 119:146. I cried unto thee I called upon thee in trouble.

Save me, and I shall keep thy testimonies Margin, “That I may keep.” The correct rendering is, “I will keep.” The idea is, that if God would interpose and save him, he “would” henceforward faithfully keep the law of God: It is one of the designs of affliction to lead people to make such vows as this. They are commonly made on beds of sickness, alike by the religious and the irreligious; the saint and the sinner. How often, alas, are they forgotten even by the friends of God! How seldom are they remembered at all by the sinner when he is raised up from the verge of the grave, and restored again to health!

<sup><99147></sup>Psalm 119:147. I prevented the dawning of the morning, and cried I anticipated it; I rose up to pray before the morning dawned. On the word “prevent,” see the notes at <sup><5045></sup>1 Thessalonians 4:15; <sup><99106></sup>Psalm 21:3; 59:10; 79:8. The meaning here is, that he rose up before the dawn, to pray. Thus the Saviour did, <sup><4005></sup>Mark 1:35.

(a) It is proper thus to pray, for our earliest thoughts should be those of devotion; our earliest acts should be in acknowledgment of God.

(b) Such a time is eminently favorable to devotion. Calm, still, quiet; before the thoughts are engaged in the world, and before the cares of life press upon us when the thoughts are clear, and the mind tranquil, the soul is in the best state for devotion.

(c) All people, if they will, can secure this time, before the “dawning of the morning,” to pray. Compare the notes at <sup><400B></sup>Psalm 5:3; 88:13; see also <sup><400B></sup>Psalm 130:6. The word rendered “dawning of the morning,” is from a verb which means to blow; to blow gently; and is usually applied to the evening, when the breezes blow gently. It may be applied, however, as it clearly is here, also to the morning.

I hoped in thy word I prayed because I had hope in thy word; I exercised hope in thy word then. Alone with thee in the morning, I found consolation by trusting in thy gracious promises.

<sup><400B></sup>Psalm 119:149. Hear my voice, according unto thy loving-kindness According to thy mercy; thy goodness. Let that be the rule in answering me; not my deserts, or even the fervour of my prayers. We can desire no better rule in answer to our prayers.

O LORD, quicken me Give me life; cause me truly to live. See the notes at ~~EB90~~ Psalm 119:40.

According to thy judgment Thy law as a rule of judgment; thy revealed truth, with all its gracious promises.

~~EB95~~ Psalm 119:150. They draw nigh They follow me; they press hard upon me.

That follow after mischief That seek to do me wrong.

They are far from thy law They yield no obedience to it; they are not influenced by it in their conduct toward me.

~~EB95~~ Psalm 119:151. Thou art near, O LORD God was present with him; he was ready to hear his cry; he was at hand to save him. Compare ~~EB98~~ Psalm 145:18. The psalmist had the assurance, springing from deep feeling, and the conscious presence of God, which the people of God often have, that God is very near to them; that he is ready to hear them; that their prayers are answered; that they are in the presence of a heavenly Friend. Such are among the precious experiences of the life of a religious man.

And all thy commandments are truth All that thou hast ordained; all that thou hast promised. The psalmist felt this. He was experiencing the truth of what God had assured him of. Not a doubt came into his mind — for God was near him. This conviction that God is “near” us — this manifestation of God to the soul as a present God — is one of the most certain assurances to our own minds of the truth of religion, and of our acceptance with him.

~~EB95~~ Psalm 119:152. Concerning thy testimonies In regard to all that thou hast testified to as true and best. Every command of God is in fact a testimony of his as to what is right; every promise is a testimony of his own purpose in regard to mankind.

I have known of old The word used here is a noun, and means properly, “the front,” what is “before;” then, the East; then, what pertains to olden time or ancient days — “before” the present. The meaning here is, that he had known this “before” what had now occurred; it was not a new thing — a new experience. It was deeply impressed on his mind as the result of all his reflection and observation.

That thou hast founded them for ever “From” eternity, and “for” eternity. They were laid in the eternity past; they will continue in the eternity to come. They are based on eternal principles of right; they will never be changed. Such a conviction will do much to keep the soul steady and firm in the trials and uncertainties of life. Whatever may change, God’s law does not change; whatever is new, that is not new; whatever will vanish away, that will remain.

~~4915~~ Psalm 119:153. Consider mine affliction ... This commences a new division of the psalm, indicated by the Hebrew letter “Resh,” corresponding to our “r.” The prayer here is, that God would look upon his trial; that he would regard it as it really was; that he would not turn away from it, or pass it by, as if it were a trifle — a thing not worthy to claim his attention. See the notes at ~~4913~~ Psalm 9:13.

For I do not forget thy law I endeavor to be obedient, submissive, patient. As a suffering child of thine, I come to thee, and beseech thee to interpose and save me.

~~4915~~ Psalm 119:154. Plead my cause ... Undertake my cause, as an advocate does. See the notes at ~~4910~~ Psalm 35:1.

Quicken me ... Give me life. See the notes at ~~4925~~ Psalm 119:25.

~~4915~~ Psalm 119:155. Salvation is far from the wicked That is,

- (a) in their present course: they are very far from being safe, or from having a prospect of salvation;
- (b) They are constantly going farther and farther off — making their salvation less probable — not going toward heaven, but from it.
- (c) Destruction is very near to them, and they are constantly making it nearer and nearer.
- (d) In their present course it may be said that salvation is far — is infinitely remote — from them, so that they can never come to it.
- (e) If they would be saved, they must change their course altogether, and go “toward” salvation and not from it.

For they seek not thy statutes They do not regard thy law; they do not make it a principle to obey thy commandments.

Psalm 119:156. Great are thy tender mercies, O LORD They are many, or multiplied. The word rendered “tender mercies” is the same which occurs in Psalm 40:11; 51:1; 69:16; 79:8; 103:4. See the notes at Psalm 25:6.

Quicken me ... See Psalm 119:149.

Psalm 119:157. Many are my persecutors and mine enemies The thought here turns on the number of his enemies, and on the effect which numbers might have in turning one from the way of truth. We might meet one such enemy, and overcome him; we might resist the influence of one in endeavoring to turn us away from the truth, but the danger of falling is much increased when numbers are combined in persecuting us, or in seeking to turn us away from our religion — when it becomes unpopular to be a professed friend of God.

Yet do I not decline from thy testimonies I still adhere to thee; I still maintain my integrity, notwithstanding all this. See the notes at Psalm 119:51.

Psalm 119:158. I beheld the transgressors Those who wronged me; those who violated the law of God.

And was grieved Or, “sickened.” The word used here means commonly to loathe, to nauseate, to sicken. Ezekiel 16:47; Psalm 95:10. I was made sad, sorry, sick at heart. I did not look on them with anger; I did not desire to take revenge upon them; I did not return evil for evil. My heart was sad that people would do wrong; that they would expose themselves to such danger. See the notes at Psalm 119:136.

Because they kept not thy word Because they violated thy law; because they were sinners.

Psalm 119:159. Consider how I love thy precepts Search me. Behold the evidence of my attachment to thy law. This is the confident appeal of one who was conscious that he was truly attached to God; that he really loved his law. It is similar to the appeal of Peter to the Saviour (John 21:17), “Lord, thou knowest all things; thou knowest that I love thee.” A man who truly loves God may make this appeal without impropriety. He may be so confident — so certain — that he has true love for the character of God, that he may make a solemn appeal to him on the subject — as he might appeal to a friend, to his wife, to his son, to his daughter, with the utmost confidence that he loved them. A man “ought” to have such love for “them,” that he could affirm this without hesitation or doubt; a man “ought” to have such love for God, that he could affirm this with equal confidence and propriety.

<sup><BB16></sup>Psalm 119:160. Thy word is true from the beginning literally, “The head of thy word is truth.” Probably the meaning is, that the “principles” of God’s word were truth, or were based on truth. The main thing — that on which all relied — was truth, absolute truth. It was not “made” truth by the mere will of God, but it was “founded on” essential truth. Compare the notes at <sup><BB14></sup>Psalm 119:142,144. Margin, “The beginning of thy word is true.” Its origin is truth; its foundation is truth; its essential nature is truth. See <sup><BB9></sup>Psalm 19:9.

And every one of thy righteous judgments endureth for ever Since any one of thy laws is as certainly founded in truth as any other, it must be that all alike are eternal and unchanging. It must be so with all the essential principles of morality. Mere regulations in regard to rites and ceremonies may be altered, as local and municipal laws among men may be; but essential principles of justice cannot be. A civil corporation — the government of a city or borough — may change its regulations about streets, and culverts, and taxes; but they can never enact laws authorizing murder or theft; nor can they alter the essential nature of honesty and dishonesty; of truth and falsehood.

<sup><BB16></sup>Psalm 119:161. Princes have persecuted me without a cause This commences a new division of the psalm, indicated by the Hebrew letter “Schin” — corresponding to our “s,” or “sh.” On the meaning of the expression here, see the notes at <sup><BB23></sup>Psalm 119:23,78.

But my heart standeth in awe of thy word I still reverence thy word. I am not deterred from keeping thy law by any threats or intimidations. This is in accordance with the uniform statements in the psalm, that nothing deterred him from manifesting his adherence to the law of God.

<sup><BB16></sup>Psalm 119:162. I rejoice at thy word, as one that findeth great spoil Plunder in a camp; prey; booty: as the hunter or the warrior, when he lights on great and unexpected success.

Psalm 119:163. I hate and abhor lying The mention of lying here particularly seems to have been suggested by the necessity, from the structure of the psalm, of finding some word at the beginning of the verse which commenced with the letter Schin. At the same time, it is an illustration of the nature of piety, and doubtless there had been numerous occasions in the life of the psalmist when he had seen and experienced the effects of falsehood. This sin, therefore, might occur to him as readily as any other. It is unnecessary to say that religion “forbids” this sin in all its forms.

But thy law do I love Particularly here the law which forbids lying. The psalmist was conscious, as every good man must be, that he truly loved that pure law which forbids falsehood in all its forms.

Psalm 119:164. Seven times a day The word seven may be used here, as it is often in the Scriptures, indefinitely to denote many, or often. There is, however, nothing which makes it necessary to understand it in this sense. The number of times in which it is proper and profitable to engage in secret or public devotion is nowhere specified in the Scriptures, but it is left, under a general direction, to be determined by each one as he shall find it desirable and convenient; as his feelings or his circumstances shall suggest. On another occasion (<sup>(19517)</sup>Psalm 55:17) David mentions that he prayed “evening, and morning, and at noon;” at other times, perhaps, he might have found it in accordance with his feelings, or with his circumstances, to engage in devotion seven times in a day. There are circumstances in the lives of all good men when they are prompted to do this: times of trouble, of sickness, of bereavement, of danger, or of religious interest. There are states of mind which prompt to this, and when secret devotion becomes frequent, and almost constant; when nothing will satisfy the mind but prayer. No one would be injured by making it a rule, unless unavoidably prevented, to engage seven times each day in secret prayer, though, at the same time, no one could maintain that this is required as a rule by the Scriptures. The times, the circumstances, the manner, the place of secret devotion are wisely and properly left to each individual to be determined by himself. Religion is essentially voluntary, and the times of secret devotion must be voluntary, and therefore a man can easily determine, by his own secret devotions, whether he has any special interest at any particular time in religion, or whether he has any religion at all.

Do I praise thee Do I engage in devotion.

Because of thy righteous judgments Thy law, considered as righteous. I love that law, as such, and I praise thee for it.

Psalm 119:165. Great peace have they See the notes at <sup><B></sup>Isaiah 26:3; compare the notes at <sup><B></sup>Philippians 4:6,7. They have great calmness of mind. They are not troubled and anxious. They believe and feel that all things are well-ordered by thee, and will be conducted to the best result. They, therefore, calmly leave all with thee. As a matter of fact, the friends of God have peace and calmness in their minds, even amidst the troubles, the disappointments, and the reverses of life. The love of God is the best — the only — way to secure permanent peace in the soul.

Which love thy law It is the love of law, and the belief that the law of God is in accordance with justice, that gives peace to their minds. God's government is a government of law, and therefore it is loved.

And nothing shall offend them Margin, "They shall have no stumbling-block." "Hebrew, "And to them no stumbling," or stumbling-block. See the notes at <sup><B></sup>Matthew 5:29,30; 18:6; 16:23; <sup><B></sup>1 Peter 2:8; <sup><B></sup>James 2:10. The meaning here is, that they would not fall into sin; they would be kept safe; they would be preserved from the power of temptation. The meaning is not, as it would seem to be in our version, that nothing would pain, grieve, or irritate them; but, as above, that as long as they were obedient to the law, and disposed to obey it, they would be safe from the power of temptation.

Psalm 119:166. LORD, I have hoped for thy salvation As a prevailing habit or principle in my life. I have looked to thee for deliverance in the time of danger; I have looked to thee for salvation in the world to come.

And done thy commandments That is, habitually. This is not, necessarily, a claim to absolute perfection.

Psalm 119:167. My soul hath kept thy testimonies, and I love them exceedingly I am conscious of loving them; I feel an inward assurance that I do love them.

Psalm 119:168. I have kept thy precepts and thy testimonies This is an appeal which is several times made in the psalm; not with boasting, but as indicating the tenor and purpose of his life. Every man ought to be able to make such an appeal.

For all my ways are before thee Thou hast seen my manner of life, and I may appeal to thee in proof that I have thus kept thy law. No one can lay claim to entire perfection, but there is many a man who, while conscious of much imperfection, and many shortcomings, can appeal to God for the truth of the statement that his great aim of life has been to keep his commandments.

Psalm 119:169. Let my cry come near before thee, O LORD This commences a new division of the psalm, indicated by the last letter of the Hebrew alphabet, the letter “Tau,” corresponding to our “t,” or “th.” The petition here is, that his prayer might be heard; that it might come into the very presence of God; that there might be no obstructions to its reaching where God was. Let nothing from my unworthiness, from my past sins, from my ignorance, prevent its coming before thee. Something often apparently hinders our prayers so that they do not reach the ear of God. The psalmist prays here that there may be no such hindrance in the prayer which he now offers.

Give me understanding according to thy word According to the promises of thy word; or, give me the same views of truth which are set forth in thy word. This prayer had been several times offered before, and it shows how earnest was his desire to know the truth. See Psalm 119:34,73,144.

Psalm 119:170. Let my supplication come before thee The word here rendered “supplication” properly means “favor, mercy, pity,” Joshua 11:20; Ezra 9:8; then, that by which favor or mercy is sought — prayer or petition, Psalm 6:9; 55:1.

Deliver me according to thy word From my enemies, my sins, my dangers. According to thy promises; according to the arrangements in thy word.

Psalm 119:171. My lips shall utter praise, when thou hast taught me thy statutes The sentiment here is the same as in Psalm 119:7. The language is varied, but the meaning here, as in that verse, is, I will praise thee in proportion as I learn thy precepts or thy law. The more I learn of thy will, the more I will praise thee. I shall see more for which to offer praise and adoration, and I shall be more and more inclined to praise and adore thee. Each new degree of knowledge will excite a corresponding desire to praise thee. This will be true of all who love God, while this life lasts, and forever. The ever-increasing knowledge of God will excite ever-increasing praise; and as God is infinite and eternal, it follows that the increase of knowledge and of happiness, in those who are saved, will be eternal. These things will go hand in hand forever and ever.

Psalm 119:172. My tongue shall speak of thy word It shall speak of it in the language of praise; it shall speak of it in making it known to others.

For all thy commandments are righteousness I see this; I feel it; and, therefore, I will speak of it. My impression that thy commandments are all righteous is so deep, that I cannot but speak of them. I must vindicate them; I must praise thee for them.

Psalm 119:173. Let thine hand help me Do thou help me — the hand being that by which we accomplish anything.

For I have chosen that precepts I have chosen them as my comforters and my guide. I have resolved to obey them, and I pray that thou wilt help me to accomplish the purpose of my heart.

Psalm 119:174. I have longed for thy salvation, O LORD See the notes at Psalm 119:166. The word rendered “I have longed” denotes an earnest desire or wish. Compare the notes at Psalm 42:1, and at Psalm 119:20.

And thy law is my delight It is so much the object of my delight that I earnestly long or desire to see more and more of its richness and fullness.

Psalm 119:175. Let my soul live, and it shall praise thee I desire life that I may praise thee; if I do live, I will praise thee. My life is consecrated to thy service; if lengthened out, and as far as it shall be lengthened out, it shall be devoted to thee.

And let thy judgments help me The dealings of thy hand; the interpositions of thy providence. Let them all be such as will be favorable to the great purpose of my soul — the service of my God.

Psalm 119:176. I have gone astray like a lost sheep A sheep that has wandered away from its fold, and is without a protector. Compare Isaiah 53:6; Matthew 10:6; 15:24; 18:12; Luke 15:6; 1 Peter 2:25. I am a wanderer. I have lost the path to true happiness. I have strayed away from my God. I see this; I confess it; I desire to return. It is remarkable that this is almost the only confession of sin in the psalm. This psalm, more than any other, abounds in confident statements respecting the life of the author, his attachment to the law of God, the obedience which he rendered to that law, and his love for it — as well as with appeals to God, founded on the fact that he did love that law, and that his life was one of obedience. This is not, indeed, spoken in a spirit of self-righteousness, or as constituting a claim on the ground of merit; but it is remarkable that there is so frequent reference to it, and so little intermingling of a confession of sin, of error, of imperfection. The psalm would not have been complete as a record of religious experience, or as illustrating the real state of the human heart, without a distinct acknowledgment of sin, and hence, in its close, and in view of his whole life, upright as in the main it had been, the psalmist confesses that he had wandered; that he was a sinner; that his life had been far from perfection, and that he needed the gracious interposition of God to seek him out, and to bring him back.

Seek thy servant As the shepherd does the sheep that is lost, ~~(2191)~~ Luke 15:4-6. So the Saviour came to seek and to save that which was lost, ~~(2191)~~ Luke 19:10. So God seeks the wanderer by his word, by his providence, by his Spirit, to induce him to return and be saved.

For I do not forget thy commandments In all my wandering; with my consciousness of error; with my sense of guilt, I still do feel that I love thy law — thy service — thy commandments. They are the joy of my heart, and I desire to be recalled from all my wanderings, that I may find perfect happiness in thee and in thy service evermore. Such is the earnest wish of every regenerated heart. Far as such an one may have wandered from God, yet he is conscious of true attachment to him and his service; he desires and earnestly prays that he may be “sought out,” brought back, and kept from wandering anymore.

There is no psalm in the whole collection which has more the appearance of having been exclusively designed for practical and personal improvement, without any reference to national, or even to ecclesiastical relations, than the one before us, which is wholly occupied with praises of God’s Word or written revelation, as the only source of spiritual strength and comfort, and with prayers for grace to make a profitable use of it. The prominence of this one theme is sufficiently apparent from the fact to which the Masora directs attention, that there is only one verse which does not contain some title or description of the Word of God. But notwithstanding this special character, the position of the psalm in the collection, and especially its juxtaposition with respect to Psalm 108—118, its kindred tone of mingled gratitude and sadness, and a great variety of minor verbal correspondences, have led some of the best interpreters to look upon it as the conclusion of the whole series or system of psalms, supposed to have been written for the use of the returned Jews, at or near the time of the founding of the second temple. The opinion, held by some of the same writers, that the ideal speaker, throughout this psalm, is Israel, considered as the church or chosen people, will never commend itself as natural or likely to the mass of readers, and is scarcely consistent with such passages as ~~Psalm~~ Psalm 119:63,74,79, and others, where the speaker expressly distinguishes himself as an individual from the body of the people. The same difficulty, in a less degree, attends the national interpretation of the psalms immediately preceding. Perhaps the best mode of reconciling the two views is by supposing that this psalm was intended as a manual of pious and instructive thoughts, designed for popular improvement, and especially for that of the younger generation after the return from exile, and that the person speaking is the individual believer, not as an isolated personality, but as a member of the general body, with which he identifies himself so far, that many expressions of the psalm are appropriate only to certain persons or to certain classes in the ancient Israel. To this design of popular instruction, and especially to that of constant repetition and reflection, the psalm is admirably suited by its form and structure: The alphabetical arrangement, of which it is at once the most extended and most perfect specimen, and the aphoristic character, common to all alphabetic psalms, are both adapted to assist the memory as well as to give point to the immediate impression. It follows, of course, that the psalm was rather meant to be a storehouse of materials for pious meditation than a discourse for continuous perusal. At the same time, the fact of its existence in the Psalter is presumptive proof that it was used in public worship either as a whole, or in one or more of the twenty-two stanzas into which it is divided, corresponding to the letters of the Hebrew alphabet, all the eight verses of each paragraph beginning with the same Hebrew letter. — Alexander.

Of the Bible acrostics, the most noteworthy, in every respect, is Psalm 119. Its structure is exceedingly simple. The 176 verses of which it consists are alphabetical couplets, being 8 for every letter; so that there are 22 alphabetical stanzas, each containing 8 couplets. Here also it is easy to discover the reason that led to the adoption of the alphabetical arrangement. The psalm is a meditation on God's law — the meditation of a soul in the presence of the Lord and in communion with him. In such a psalm it is sententious wisdom rather than high poetry that we look for: and a better vehicle for the aphorisms of sententious wisdom could hardly be imagined than that which is furnished by this acrostic. If, as we believe, it dates from the age of Ezra, it affords a welcome corroboration to the conclusion we reached on other grounds, that Ezra and his contemporary scribes were people of a very different stamp from those who bore the same title at a later period. We discern in them, no doubt, the familiar features of the scribe. The jots and tittles of the law were not despicable in their eyes. Raised up to edit the Old Testament Scriptures, they did the work well. But they had an eye and a heart that could appreciate the weightier matters of the law. They could look up from their studies about the letter of the divine word, and ejaculate to God such prayers as these, "Open thou mine eyes that I may behold wondrous things out of thy law;" "My soul breaketh for the longing that it hath unto thy judgments at all times;" "Let my heart be sound in thy statutes, that I be not ashamed?"

It is curious and not uninstructive to mark the opinions expressed regarding this psalm by the modern critics. Most of them have remarked, and very justly, that, like the rest of the sacred acrostics, it seldom rises into the region of poetry; being rather a versified meditation than a poem in the strict sense of the word. But some have gone further. Dr. Hupfeld, for example, whose Commentary on the Psalms, the fruit of the studies of a lifetime, is in many respects invaluable, ventures to charge it with "monotony and poverty of thought," and to contrast it disparagingly with the other psalms of the sententious or aphoristic order. An opinion like this is worthy of being put on record, as illustrating an observation which in these days it is very important that people should lay to heart and remember. A very able man, learned, painstaking, of excellent literary taste, and honest enough in his way, may nevertheless be utterly incompetent in matters lying within the domain of spiritual religion. The criticism of the learned commentator reminds one of a remark in Augustine's preface to his homilies on the same psalm. After mentioning that a sense of the difficulty attaching to a just exposition of this particular psalm had long deterred him from publishing anything on it, as he had done upon all the rest, he goes on to say, "Doubtless there are other psalms reputed difficult, the sense of which really is wrapped in obscurity. But then, whatever else may be difficult about them, this at least is plain, that they are obscure. Not so here. This psalm has an air of simplicity that might lead one to suppose that what it requires is a hearer or reader, not an expositor." Our Rationalistic critics, it is plain, have not mastered the difficulty so wittily pointed out by Augustine. They have not discovered that the psalm is deep. Its scope and probable history have been admirably explained by Matthew Henry. "It seems to me," he observes, "to be a collection of (the psalmist's) pious and devout ejaculations, the short and sudden breathings and elevations of his soul to God, which he wrote down as they occurred, and, toward the latter end of his life, gathered out of his day-book where they lay scattered, added to them many like words, and digested them into this psalm, in which there is seldom any coherence between the verses, but, like Solomon's Proverbs, it is a chest of gold rings, not a chain of gold links. And we may not only learn," he adds, "by the psalmist's example, to accustom ourselves to such pious ejaculations, which are an excellent means of maintaining communion with God and keeping the heart in frame for the most solemn exercises of religion, but we must make use of the Psalmist's words, both for the exciting a d for the expressing of our devout affections. What some have said of this psalm is true. He that shall read it considerately, it will either warm him or shame him." Those who have visited much among the godly in affliction will not hesitate to prefer this estimate of Psalm 119 to Dr. Hupfeld's. So far from being monotonous and jejune, it possesses quite a singular aptitude to refresh the souls of the weary; its two-and-twenty clusters yield the wine of the kingdom as copiously as any to be found in all the Bible. The remark applies, although in a somewhat lower degree, to several other alphabetical psalms — Psalm 25; 34; 37. If inferior to many others in poetical embellishment, they are inferior to none in the variety and richness of the aliment they minister to devout meditation. — Binnie.

Hengstenberg calls the psalm "A Children's Sermon." But it suits all classes. From its alphabetical character the Masora entitle it "The Great Alphabet;" but from its peculiar excellence many style it "The saints' Alphabet." Dr. Cowper calls it

“A Holy Alphabet, so plain that children may understand it — so rich and instructive that the wisest and most experienced may learn something from it.”

Clarke:

“Like all other portions of divine revelation, it is elegant, important, and useful.”

Jebb:

“It is well known that upon no portion of holy Scripture have so many practical commentaries been written ... It has been justly considered in all ages of the church as a storehouse of religious wisdom.”

One of its highest excellencies is its varied instruction on the nature of true, experimental religion. In this psalm, says Venn,

“the whole inner man is delineated, and the several changing frames of our poor hearts, and the several blessed motions and inspirations of the Holy Spirit, are touched in a very affecting manner. This is the psalm I have often had recourse to when I could find no spirit of prayer in my own heart, and at length the fire was kindled and I could pray.”

President Edwards, in his work on Religious Affections, says:

“I know of no other part of the Holy Scriptures where the nature and evidences of true and sincere godliness are so fully and largely insisted on and delineated.” — Plumer.

NOTES ON PSALM 120

This is the first of fifteen psalms (Psalm 120—134) to each of which is prefixed the title “A Song of Degrees.” Four of these psalms are ascribed to David, one of them to Solomon, and the rest are by unknown authors.

There has been a great diversity of opinion as to the meaning of the title, and the reason why it was prefixed to these psalms. Some have supposed that the title, “Song of Degrees,” or “Ascents,” was applied to them as being Psalms which were sung during the periodical journeys or pilgrimages to Jerusalem at the times of the great yearly festivals — the “going up” to Jerusalem. Others have supposed that they were psalms which were composed or sung during the return from the exile — the “going up” again to Jerusalem after their long captivity in Babylon. Some of the Jewish rabbins supposed that they were psalms which were sung as the people ascended the fifteen steps — going up to the temple represented by Ezekiel, seven on one side and eight on the other, <sup>3412</sup>Ezekiel 40:22,37. Others have supposed that the title refers to some uniqueness of structure in the psalms — a gradation or elevation of thought — approaching to a climax. Michaelis (Notes on Lowth’s Lectures on Hebrew Poetry, xxv., p. 512) supposes that the title is a musical term, and that the reference is to something special in the rhythm, or what is called by us, “feet” of the psalm, but which in the East would be called “steps” or “ascents.” See DeWette, Einleitung, p. 35.

In this variety of conjecture — for it can be regarded as little more than conjecture — it is impossible now to determine with any degree of certainty what is the true meaning of the title, or why it was given to these psalms. It is evident that, from some cause, there was such a unity in them, either from the nature of the composition, or from the occasion on which they were used, that they could properly have a general title given to them, as indicating what would be well understood among the Hebrews in regard to their design. But I apprehend that the reason for that title cannot now be positively ascertained. Something negative, however, may be determined in regard to this.

(1) It is quite clear that the opinion of the rabbis that they were 15 in number, and named Songs of Degrees, because they were sung on ascending the steps to the temple, is purely fanciful. In the real temple there was no such ascent; and it is only in the visions of Ezekiel that there is any such allusion.

(2) It seems equally clear that they were not so called because they were composed and used for the “going up” from the captivity in Babylon, or to be sung during the march through the desert. Several of them — those of David and Solomon — were composed long before that event, and could have had no allusion to it. Besides, there are but two of them (Psalm 122; 126) that have any reference to the return from Babylon, or that would have any applicability to that journey. Moreover, it is extremely improbable that any such selection of psalms should have been used on such a journey, or that any arrangement should have been made for such a purpose.

(3) It seems to me equally improbable that they were called “Songs of Degrees or Ascents,” because they were used by the people when “going up” to Jerusalem to attend on the great festivals. As in the previous specification, it may be remarked that the psalms here referred to had no special applicability to such a use; that there is no evidence that any such practice prevailed; that it is wholly improbable that there would be any such set and fixed arrangement, or that the people in going up to Jerusalem on those occasions would move along to measured music.

The word rendered “degrees” in the title — hl [ <sup><15927></sup> ], in the singular — and hl [ <sup><1469></sup> mæ ], in the plural, the form used here — means properly an “ascent, a going up,” as from a lower to a higher region, <sup><1379></sup> Ezra 7:9 (margin); or of the thoughts that ascend in the mind, <sup><1316></sup> Ezekiel 11:5. Then it means a “step,” by which one ascends, <sup><1109></sup> 1 Kings 10:19; <sup><1316></sup> Ezekiel 40:26,31,34. Then it means a degree of a dial, or a dial as divided into degrees, where there is an “ascent” on the dial, <sup><1219></sup> 2 Kings 20:9-11. See the notes at <sup><2388></sup> Isaiah 38:8. After what has been said above, there seem to be but two suppositions which have probability in regard to its meaning here:

(a) The one is the opinion of Gesenius, that these psalms are called Songs of Degrees, or Ascents, because of a certain “ascent” in the mode of composition, as when the first or last words of a preceding line are repeated at the beginning of a succeeding line, and then some new increase in the sense or idea — or some “ascent” in the meaning — follows by such an addition. The following instances may be referred to as illustrating this view. <sup><1301></sup> Psalm 121:1,2:

“I will lift up mine eyes unto the hills, from whence cometh my help: My help cometh from the Lord,” etc, <sup><BC1B></sup>Psalm 121:3,4:

He that keepeth thee will not slumber: Behold, he that “keepeth” Israel shall neither slumber nor sleep.” <sup><BC1B></sup>Psalm 121:7,8: “The Lord shall “preserve” thee from all evil; he shall “preserve” thy soul: The Lord shall “preserve” thy going out, and thy coming in,” etc. So also <sup><BC1B></sup>Psalm 124:1,2: “If it had not been the Lord who was “on our side,” now may Israel say: If it had not been the Lord who was “on our side;” when people rose up against us — “then” (<sup><BC1B></sup>Psalm 124:3) they had swallowed us up quick; “then” (<sup><BC1B></sup>Psalm 124:4) the waters had overwhelmed us; “then” (<sup><BC1B></sup>Psalm 124:5) the proud waters had gone over our soul.” See also <sup><BC1B></sup>Psalm 122:2,3,4; 123:3,4; 126:2,3; and 129:1,2. There is doubtless some foundation for this supposition, but, after all, it seems far-fetched, and though the remark may be true of some of these fifteen psalms, yet it can by no means be made applicable to all of them, nor could it be shown to be so special to them that no others could have been for the same reason included in the number.

(b) The remaining supposition seems to have much more plausibility than anyone here suggested. It is that the term is a musical expression; that there was something special in the “scale” of the music to which these psalms were sung, though that is now lost to us. This is akin to the opinion of John D. Michaelis, as alluded to above. This is, also, referred to by Asseman (Biblioth. Orient., t. i., p. 62), and by Castell (Lex. Syr.) It is impossible, however, now to ascertain “what” there is that would make this appellation especially appropriate to these psalms. All that can be known is, that there was some reason why these psalms were, so to speak, bound up together, and designated by a common title. This does not prevent a special title being prefixed to some of them in regard to their author and design.

The psalm now before us has no other title, and nothing to designate its author. it pertains to a sufferer who calls earnestly upon the Lord for deliverance. The particular form of trial is that caused by the tongue — slander. The author was suffering from some unjust aspersions cast upon him; from some effort to destroy his reputation; from some charge in regard to his character, which made him miserable, as if he sojourned in Mesech and dwelt in the tents of Kedar, <sup><BC1B></sup>Psalm 120:5. He says that it was in vain for him to attempt to live in peace with the men who calumniated him. He was himself disposed to peace. He earnestly desired it. But they were for war, and they kept up the war, <sup><BCT06></sup>Psalm 120:6,7. Among the forms of suffering to which the people of God are exposed, this is not uncommon; and it was proper that it should be referred to in a book designed, as the Book of Psalms was, to be useful in all ages, and in all lands, as a record of religious experience.

“Whose edge is sharper than the sword; whose tongue
Outvenoms all the worms of Nile; whose breath
Rides on the posting winds, and doth belie
All corners of the world: kings, queens, and states,
Maids, matrons, nay, the secrets of the grave
This viperous slander enters.” — Cymbeline, iii. 4.

It is one of those things which a man cannot guard against; which he cannot repel by force; whose origin he cannot always trace; which will go where a vindication will not follow; whose effects will live long after the slander is refuted; which will adhere to a man, or leave a trait of suspicion, even after the most successful vindication, for the effect will be to make a second slander more easily credited than the first was.

I cried unto the LORD, and he heard me I had no other resource. I could not meet the slander. I could not refute it. I could not prevent its effects on my reputation, and all that I could do was to commit the case to the Lord. See the notes at <sup><BCT06></sup>Psalm 37:5,6.

<sup><BCT06></sup>Psalm 120:2. Deliver my soul, O LORD My soul is harassed and distressed. Perhaps the meaning also may be, My life is in danger. Or, if it refers to the soul as such, then it means that everything pertaining to his soul was deeply affected by the course which was pursued. He was maligned, slandered, misrepresented, deceived, and he had no comfort or peace.

And from a deceitful tongue From a tongue whose statements cannot be relied on; whose words are deceptive; whose promises are false. David was often called to experience troubles of this sort; and this is a kind of trial which may come upon anyone in a form which he can no more anticipate or prevent than he can the coming of a “mist from the ocean.” No man can certainly guard against the influence of falsehood; no man can be sure that all that will be said to him is true; no man can be certain that all the promises made to him — save those made to him by God — will be performed.

Psalm 120:3. What shall be given unto thee? Margin, “What shall the deceitful tongue give unto thee;” or, “what shall it profit thee?” Luther, “What can the false tongue do?” Others render this, “How will God punish thee?” Others, “What will he (God) give to thee?” That is, What recompence can you expect from God for these malignant calumnies? A literal translation of this verse would be, “What shall the tongue of deceit give to thee, and what shall it add to thee?” — referring to the offender himself. The essential idea is, What will be the result of such conduct? What must be expected to follow from it? That is, either

- (a) from the unprofitableness of such a course; or
- (b) from the natural consequences to one’s reputation and happiness; or
- (c) from the judgment of God.

The answer to these questions is found in Psalm 120:4.

Or what shall be done unto thee? Margin, as in Hebrew, “added.” What must be the consequence of this? what will follow?

Thou false tongue This may be either an address to the tongue itself, or, as above, the word “tongue” may be used as the nominative to the verbs in the sentence. The sense is not materially affected either way.

Psalm 120:4. Sharp arrows of the mighty This is an answer to the question in Psalm 120:3. The consequence — the effect — of such a use of the tongue must be like sharp and piercing arrows, or like intensely burning coals. The “sharp arrows of the mighty” are the arrows of the warrior — as war was conducted mainly by bows and arrows. Those arrows were, of course, sharpened to make them piercing, penetrating, more deadly.

With coals of juniper On the word here rendered “juniper,” see the notes at Job 30:4. The idea here is, that coals made from that would be intensely hot, and would cause severer pain than if made from other wood. The word refers to a species of broom or shrub growing in the deserts of Arabia, with yellowish flowers and a bitter root. See “Robinson’s Biblical Researches,” vol. i., p. 299. Burchardt says that he found the Bedouin of Sinai burning the roots into coal, and says that they make the best charcoal, and throw out the most intense heat. The shrub sometimes grows so large as to furnish a shade to those exposed to the heat of the sun in the desert, <sup><1190></sup>1 Kings 19:4; “Land and the Book” (Thomson), vol. ii., pp. 438, 439. The cut given below will give an idea of this plant.

<sup><800></sup>Psalm 120:5. Woe is me My lot is a sad and pitiable one, that I am compelled to live in this manner, and to be exposed thus to malignant reproaches. It is like living in Mesech or in Kedar.

That I sojourn The word used here does not denote a permanent abode, but it usually refers to a temporary lodging, as when one is a traveler, a pilgrim, a stranger, and is under a necessity of passing a night in a strange land on his way to the place of his destination. The trouble or discomfort here referred to is not that which would result from having his home there, or abiding there permanently, but of feeling that he was a stranger, and would be exposed to all the evils and inconveniences of a stranger among such a people. A man who resided in a place permanently might be subject to fewer inconveniences than if he were merely a temporary lodger among strangers.

In Mesech The Septuagint and Vulgate render this, “that my sojourning is protracted.” The Hebrew word — Ēvm,<sup><1490></sup> — means, properly “drawing,” as of seed “scattered regularly along the furrows” (<sup><1000></sup>Psalm 126:6); and then possession, <sup><1000></sup>Job 28:18. The people of Meshech or the Moschi, were a barbarous race inhabiting the Moschian regions between Iberia, Armenia, and Colchis. Meshech was a son of Japheth, <sup><1000></sup>Genesis 10:2; <sup><1000></sup>1 Chronicles 1:5. The name is connected commonly with “Tubal,” <sup><1000></sup>Ezekiel 27:13: “Tubal and Meshech they were thy merchants.” <sup><1000></sup>Ezekiel 39:1: “I am against ... the chief prince of Meshech and Tubal,” Herodotus (iii. 94; vii. 78) connects them with the Tibarenes. The idea here is, that they were a barbarous, savage, uncivilized people. They dwelt outside of Palestine, beyond what were regarded as the borders of civilization; and the word seems to have had a signification similar to the names Goths, Vandals, Turks, Tartars, Cossacks, in later times. It is not known that they were particularly remarkable for slander or calumny; but the meaning is that they were barbarous and savage — and to dwell among slanderers and revilers seemed to the psalmist to be like dwelling among a people who were strangers to all the rules and principles of civilized society.

That I dwell in the tents of Kedar The word Kedar means properly dark skin, a darkskinned man. Kedar was a son of Ishmael (<sup>402B</sup>Genesis 25:13), and hence, the name was given to an Arabian tribe descended from him, <sup>2321</sup>Isaiah 42:11; 60:7; <sup>244B</sup>Jeremiah 49:28. The idea here also is, that to dwell among slanderers was like dwelling among barbarians and savages.

This trouble is no new thing. It has been long continued, and has become intolerable. Who this was that thus gave him trouble is, of course, now unknown. It is only necessary to remark that there can scarcely be any source of trouble more bitter than that of sustaining such relations to others either in business, or in office, or by family-ties — whether by marriage or by blood — in school, in college, or in corporate bodies — as to expose us always to a quarrel: to be compelled to have constant contact with people of sour, perverse, crooked tempers, who are satisfied with nothing; who are suspicious or envious; who pervert our motives and our conduct; who misrepresent our words; who demand more than is due to them; who refuse to perform what may reasonably be expected of them; and who make use of every opportunity to involve us in difficulties with others. There are many trials in human life, but there are few which are more galling, or more hard to bear than this. The literal rendering of the passage would be, “Long for her has my soul dwelt,” etc. That is, long (or too long) for her good — for the welfare of my soul. It has been an injury to me; to my piety, to my comfort, to my salvation. It has vexed me, tried me, hindered me in my progress in the divine life. Nothing would have a greater tendency of this kind than to be compelled to live in the manner indicated above.

~~EXCISE~~ Psalm 120:7. I am for peace Margin, “A man of peace.” Literally, “I (am) peace.” It is my nature. I desire to live in peace. I strive to do so. I do nothing to provoke a quarrel. I would do anything which would be right to pacify others. I would make any sacrifices, yield to any demands, consent to any arrangements which would promise peace.

But when I speak When I say anything on the subject, when I propose any new arrangements, when I suggest any changes, when I give utterance to my painful feelings, and express a desire to live differently — they will listen to nothing; they will be satisfied with nothing.

They are for war For discord, variance, strife. All my efforts to live in peace are vain. They are determined to quarrel, and I cannot prevent it.

(a) A man in such a case should separate from such a person, if possible, as the only way of peace.

(b) If his position and relations are such that that cannot be done, then he should be careful that he does nothing himself to irritate and to keep up the strife.

(c) If all that he does or can do for peace is vain, and if his relations and position are such that he cannot separate, then he should bear it patiently — as coming from God, and as the discipline of his life. God has many ways of testing the patience and faith of his people, and there are few things which will do so more effectually than this; few situations where piety will shine more beautifully than in such a trial;

(d) He who is thus tried should look with the more earnestness of desire to another world. There is a world of peace; and the peace of heaven will be all the more grateful and blessed when we go up to it from such a scene of conflict and war.

General Notes on Psalm 120 to Psalm 124

“Songs of Degrees.” A considerable variety of opinion exists with regard to the meaning of this title, as may be seen from the author’s introduction to the first in the series. The opinion that the “songs of degrees” or “ascents” were used in connection with the periodical going up of the tribes to Jerusalem, seems to be gaining ground, Mudge, Hengstenberg, Alexander, and Oehler (article “Psalms” in Imperial Bible-Dictionary) adopt and defend this view. It is the view adopted in a very admirable little volume on the Pilgrim Psalms, by Dr. M'Michael of Dunfermline, professor of ecclesiastical history to the United Presbyterian Church. We design to draw on the materials furnished by the professor in his exposition of these songs.

The objections alleged by Mr. Barnes against this view will be found ably and satisfactorily, if not conclusively, met in the following extracts from Hengstenberg and Oehler:

Other expositors seek the origin of the appellation in the fact that these songs were sung by the pilgrims who went up yearly to Jerusalem at the great festivals. This explanation is undoubtedly the correct one. The hl [mæ] is the usual expression for these festival-journeys; compare Psalm 122:4; Exodus 34:24; 1 Kings 12:27,28. The hl [mæ], the journeys to Jerusalem, by way of preeminence, can only be those ordinary journeys which were yearly repeated and prescribed in the law; compare Psalm 122:4. All other journeys to Jerusalem would have needed some expression added to define them. Further, the oldest to all appearance of these pilgrim-songs, that, namely, which was composed by David soon after the elevation of Zion to the sanctuary, and at the commencement of the pilgrimages to it, Psalm 122, contains two clauses explanatory of the hl [mæ], corresponding to the explanation of the lykicjæ in Psalm 32, namely, "we will go to the house of the Lord," in Psalm 122:1, and "to which the tribes go up," hl [mæ] in Psalm 122:4. The circumstance, moreover, that some of these psalms have, in accordance with the most manifest internal marks, been used for this purpose, is quite decisive. This is the case with Psalm 121, which, according to Psalm 121:1, was designed to be sung in view of the mountains of Jerusalem, and is manifestly an evening song for the sacred band of pilgrims, to be sung in the last night-watch, the figures of which are also especially suitable for a pilgrim-song; and with Psalm 122, which, according to the express announcement in the introduction, was sung when the sacred pilgrim trains had reached the gates of Jerusalem, and halted for the purpose of forming in order for the solemn procession into the sanctuary, Psalm 134. Besides this, we may add finally, that according to this interpretation, all the common peculiarities of these psalms are easily accounted for. The simplicity, the want of the parallelism, the artless way of forming a transition by a word retained from the preceding verse, the brevity, all these are peculiarities of sacred popular and pilgrim song.

The objections which have been urged against this interpretation are insignificant. Thus it has been said that it is scarcely possible to conceive that such mournful songs as are these psalms to some extent, could have been sung in the course of the joyful journeys to Jerusalem. Just as if the tone of these festival journeys would not be entirely dependent upon the then existing condition of the people! No one will deny that the nameless psalms truly emanated from the innermost feelings of the people at the time when they were originally composed; and the people could at that time find in them only a representation of their own state. Next, it is objected that several of these psalms contain no reference to such a special occasion. But such a reference was not in every case necessary; the contents might be general, and the indicating of the purpose of the psalms might be attended to only in the form and appearance which they were made to assume; and this is really the case.

The practice of traveling to Jerusalem at the festivals had already taken deep root even in the days of David and Solomon. We see this clearly from the conduct of Jeroboam in ~~1128~~ 1 Kings 12:28, compare also at Psalm 122. It was hence, very natural that David, who employed his gift of sacred song in ministering to all the needs of the people of God, should attend to this matter also, and that Solomon should continue the work. The pilgrimages suffered grievous interruption from the separation of the ten tribes; and it was only in the days of the new colony that they regained their ancient importance. In these days a third pilgrim poet arose to take his place alongside of the two ancient ones, who worked up his own productions along with those of his predecessors into one well-arranged whole, a pilgrim-book.

The whole is grouped around Ps 127, which was composed by Solomon, who stands in middle between the first and the last of the pilgrim-poets. On both sides there stands a heptade of pilgrim-songs, consisting of two psalms composed by David, and five new ones, which have no name. The seven is divided both times by the four and the three. Each heptade contains the name of Jehovah twenty-four times; each of the connected groups, Psalm 120—123; 124—126; 128—131; 132—134; twelve times; this cannot be accidental, and it renders it evident that the collector of the whole must be identical with the author of the nameless psalms. — Hengstenberg.

Ewald sees in the foresaid fifteen psalms, songs which were sung on the return journey of the Israelites from Babylon. The plural ma'aloth would have to be explained in this way, that there were several journeys of the exiles. Against this explanation it cannot be objected that Psalm 122; Psalm 124; Psalm 131 bear the name of David; and Psalm 127 bears the name of Solomon. For certainly older songs also might be assigned for the object named. But perhaps it is against Ewald's hypothesis, that the contents of the psalms are not suitable for that purpose — least of all the contents of Psalm 122, where Jerusalem is presupposed as a city again built with palaces. The correct view will be, that "ma'aloth" signifies the "regular pilgrimages" to Jerusalem; and we accordingly have here a collection of songs for the pilgrims of Zion. To this view several things point in these psalms. For example, Psalm 121 is evidently a journey-song. Psalm 122 begins: "I was glad when they said unto me, Let us go into the house of the Lord. Our feet shall stand within thy gates, O Jerusalem," etc. It is true some of these psalms have a more general import, inasmuch as they have for their subject Israel's distress, the consolation which Israel draws from the divine promise, and the like. But to sing of these things suited right well for those who were on their pilgrimage to Jerusalem to worship the Lord. — Oehler.

APPENDIX NOTES ON PSALM 120

Psalm 120:3,4. What shall be given unto thee? or what shall be done unto thee, thou false tongue? ... This passage admits of two interpretations. Some scholars read the whole as an address to the slanderer: "What shall a deceitful tongue give to thee, and what shall it profit thee? No doubt your calumnies are sharp as arrows of the mighty warrior, and they burn as long as coals of juniper. Well, but what benefit do they confer upon you?" This is an excellent meaning. It is a fair question to a person who carries on such a vile trade. What will you gain by attacking the righteous? Will you increase your own happiness by cherishing malice? Will it promote your pecuniary interests? Will it make you more loved and honored in the relations of social life? Will it prepare you for acceptance with the Judge, when all nations shall assemble before his tribunal, to give an account of their doings? Can you ever succeed in carrying out your nefarious designs against the man who is clothed from head to foot in armor of heavenly temper? No. Sharp and burning may be the arrows, strong may be the arm, and true may be the eye; but the fiery darts fall back harmless from the shield of faith, and lie cold upon the ground. The enemies of David could not deprive him of the high honors bestowed upon him by God; and humiliated and defeated, the question might be applied to them with marvelous point: What good had you from your lip of falsehood and your tongue of deceit?

We prefer, however, reading the passage as it stands in the authorized version. In this case the third verse inquires of the calumniator what penalty shall be inflicted upon him. "What shall be given unto thee? or what shall be done unto thee, false tongue?" The fourth verse supplies the answer: "Sharp arrows of the mighty, with coals of juniper. The world's sin is the world's punishment. A correspondence is frequently observed between the transgression and the retribution. The evil we had prepared for others is afterward applied to our own lips. He who sows serpents' teeth need not look for a joyous harvest. "The pagan are, sunk down in the pit that they made: in the net which they hid is their own foot taken." — McMichael.

NOTES ON PSALM 121

This psalm is entitled simply, “A Song of Degrees.” See the notes on the title to Psalm 120. Nothing is known, or can be known, of the author or of the occasion on which it was composed. DeWette and Rosenmuller suppose that it was composed in the exile; Rosenmuller regarding it as a psalm to be sung on the return to Palestine after the captivity — DeWette, as the psalm of a pensive exile looking toward the hills of Palestine, his native land, as the source from where all his help must come — and expressing confidence in God that he would bring him out of his exile and his trouble. There is no proof, however, that either of these suppositions is correct. The language is such, indeed, as might then be employed, but it is also such as might be used on many other occasions. It might be the language of the leader of an army, endangered, and looking to the “hills” where he expected reinforcements; it might be that of a pious man encompassed with dangers, anal using this expression as illustrative of his looking up to God; or it might be the language of one looking directly to heaven, represented as the heights, or the exalted place where God dwells; or it might be the language of one looking to the hills of Jerusalem — the seat of the worship of God — the place of His abode — as his refuge, and as the place from where only help could come. This last seems to me to be the most probable supposition; and thus the psalm represents the confidence and hope of a pious man (in respect to duty, danger, or trial) as derived from the God whom he worships — and the place where God has fixed his abode — the church where he manifests himself to people.

Psalm 121:1. I will lift up mine eyes Margin, “Shall I lift up mine eyes to the hills? Whence should my help come?” The expression would properly denote a condition where there was danger; when no help or aid was visible; and when the eyes were turned to the quarter from which help might be expected to come. What the danger was cannot now be ascertained.

Unto the hills Hebrew, the mountains. To the quarter from where I look for assistance. This (as has been shown in the Introduction) may refer

- (1) to the mountains from where one in danger expected help; or
- (2) to heaven, considered as high, and as the abode of God; or

(3) to the hills on which Jerusalem was built, as the place where God dwelt, and from where aid was expected.

The third of these is the most probable. The first would be applicable to a state of war only, and the second is forced and unnatural. Adopting the third interpretation, the language is natural, and makes it proper to be used at all times, since it indicates a proper looking to God as he manifests himself to people, particularly in the church.

From whence cometh my help A more literal rendering would be, “Whence cometh my help?” This accords best with the usage of the Hebrew word, and agrees well with the connection. It indicates a troubled and anxious state of mind — a mind that asks, Where shall I look for help? The answer is found in the following verse.

Psalm 121:2. My help cometh from the LORD From Yahweh. This is the answer to the anxious inquiry in Psalm 121:1. It indicates

- (a) a consciousness that help could come only from God;
- (b) a belief that it would come from him; and a confident yet humble reliance on him.

Which made heaven and earth The great Creator of the universe. He must, therefore, be able to protect me. The Creator of all can defend all.

Psalm 121:3. He will not suffer thy foot to be moved He will enable you to stand firm. You are safe in his protection. Compare the notes at Psalm 38:16. This, with the remainder of the psalm, seems to be of the nature of an answer to the anxious question in Psalm 121:1 — an answer which the author of the psalm, in danger and trouble, makes to his own soul, imparting confidence to himself.

He that keepeth thee will not slumber He will be ever watchful and wakeful. Compare Isaiah 27:3. All creatures, as far as we know, sleep; God never sleeps. Compare Psalm 139:11,12. His eyes are upon us by day, and in the darkness of the night — the night literally; and also the night of calamity, woe, and sorrow.

Psalm 121:4. Behold, he that keepeth Israel The Keeper — the Guardian — of his people. The psalmist here passes from his own particular case to a general truth — a truth to him full of consolation. It is, that the people of God must always be safe; that their great Guardian never slumbers; and that he, as one of his people, might, therefore, confidently look for his protecting care.

Shall neither slumber nor sleep Never slumbers, never ceases to be watchful. Man sleeps; a sentinel may slumber on his post, by inattention, by long-continued wakefulness, or by weariness; a pilot may slumber at the helm; even a mother may fall asleep by the side of the sick child; but God is never exhausted, is never weary, is never inattentive. He never closes his eyes on the condition of his people, on the needs of the world.

<sup><1015></sup>Psalm 121:5. The LORD is thy keeper Thy Preserver; thy Defender. He will keep thee from danger; he will keep thee from sin; he will keep thee unto salvation.

The LORD is thy shade The Lord is as a shadow: as the shadow of a rock, a house, or a tree, in the intense rays of the burning sun. See the notes at <sup><374></sup>Isaiah 25:4.

Upon thy right hand See <sup><918></sup>Psalm 16:8; 109:31. Perhaps the particular allusion to the right hand here may be that that was the place of a protector. He would thus be at hand, or would be ready to interpose in defense of him whom he was to guard. It is possible, however, that the idea here may be derived from the fact that in Scripture the geographer is represented as looking to the east, and not toward the north, as with us. Hence, the south is always spoken of as the right, or at the right hand (compare the notes at <sup><1812></sup>Psalm 89:12); and as the intense rays of the sun are from the south, the idea may be, that God would be as a shade in the direction from which those burning rays came.

<sup><1016></sup>Psalm 121:6. The sun shall not smite thee by day The Septuagint renders this, “shall not BURN thee” — συνγκάψει. So the Latin Vulgate. The Hebrew word means to smite, to strike, as with a rod or staff, or with the plague or pestilence; and then, to kill, to slay. The allusion here is to what is now called a “sun-stroke” — the effect of the burning sun on the brain. Such effects of the sun are often fatal now, as doubtless they were in the time of the psalmist.

Nor the moon by night The psalmist here refers to some prevalent opinion about the influence of the moon, as endangering life or health. Some have supposed that he refers to the sudden cold which follows the intense heat of the day in Oriental countries, and which, because the moon rules the night, as the sun does the day, is either poetically or literally attributed to the moon. Lackmann and Michaelis suppose that there is some allusion to the influence of the moon in producing various kinds of disease, and especially lunacy — an idea which gave origin to that name. Compare the notes at <sup><4024></sup>Matthew 4:24. See <sup><4075></sup>Matthew 17:15; <sup><4097></sup>Mark 9:17; <sup><4099></sup>Luke 9:39. Knapp supposes the idea is, that from the moon's not giving a clear and full light like the sun, travelers trusting to its guidance may be led into rivers or quagmires. Macrobius refers to a custom among the Orientals of covering the faces of children when asleep, from some imagined effect of the moon on the health of the child. Andersen (Orient. Reise-Beschreib. i. 8) refers to an effect, which he says is common, and which he had often seen, of sleeping in the moon-beams, of making the neck stiff, so that it could not be turned from side to side as before. See Rosenmuller, Morgenland, in loc. Others have supposed that the allusion is to the effect of the moon, and of sleeping under the open air, in producing ophthalmia — a disease very common in the East — an effect guarded against by covering the face. The influence of the moon, in producing madness or disease — the general influence of it on health — is often referred to. Thus Shakespeare says:

*“The moon, the governess of floods,
Pale in her anger, washes all the air,
That rheumatic diseases do abound.”

*“It is the very error of the moon;
She comes more near the earth than she was wont,
And makes men mad.” — Othello, v. 2.*

Some of these things are evidently purely imaginary. The true idea seems to be that there were effects to be dreaded from the sudden changes from the heat of day to the cold of night, and that these effects were attributed to the moon. See <sup><4344></sup>Genesis 31:40. The meaning is, that God would be a Protector alike in the dangers of the day and of the night.

<sup><4307></sup>Psalm 121:7. The LORD shall preserve thee from all evil This is an advance of the thought. The psalmist had in the previous verses specified some particular evils from which he says God would keep those who put their trust in him. He now makes the remark general, and says that God would not only preserve from these particular evils, but would keep those who trusted in him from all evil: he would be their Protector in all the perils of life.

<sup><19C18></sup>Psalm 121:8. The LORD shall preserve thou going out and thy coming in Preserve thee in going out and coming in; in going from thy dwelling, and returning to it; in going from home and coming back; that is, everywhere, and at all times. Compare <sup><19316></sup>Deuteronomy 28:6. See the notes also at <sup><18752></sup>Job 5:24. “From this time forth, and even forevermore.” Through this life and for ever. This is the gracious assurance which is made to all who put their trust in God. At home and abroad; in the house, in the field, and by the way; on the land and on the ocean; in their native country and in climes remote; on earth, in the grave, and in the eternal world, they are always safe. No evil that will endanger their salvation can befall them; nothing can happen to them here but what God shall see to be conducive to their ultimate good; and in the heavenly world they shall be safe forever from every kind of evil, for in that world there will be no sin, and consequently no need of discipline to prepare them for the future.

*“In foreign realms, and lands remote,
Supported by thy care,
Through burning climes they pass unhurt,
And breathe in tainted air.*

*When by the dreadful tempest borne,
High on the broken wave,
They know thou art not slow to hear,
Nor impotent to save.*

*The storm is laid — the winds retire,
Obedient to thy will;
The sea that roars at thy command,
At thy command is still.*

*In midst of dangers, fears, and death,
Thy goodness we’ll adore;
We’ll praise thee for thy mercies past,
And humbly hope for more.*

*Our life, while thou preserv'st that life,
Thy sacrifice shall be;
And death, when death shall be our lot,
Shall join our souls to thee.* — Addison's Spec.

APPENDIX NOTES ON PSALM 121

The idea is a very probable one, that the psalm was the evening song of the sacred pilgrim band, sung on retiring to rest upon the last evening, when the long wished-for termination of their wandering, the mountains of Jerusalem, had come into view in the distance. In this case we obtain a suitable connection with the following psalm, which would be sung one station further on, when the pilgrims were at the gates of Jerusalem. In this case we find an explanation of the fact, that in the middle point of the psalm there stands the Lord as the keeper of Israel, with reference to the declaration, "I keep thee," which was addressed to the patriarch as he slept on his pilgrimage; and in this case also "he neither slumbereth nor sleepeth," is seen in its true light. — Hengstenberg.

In reading this psalm one has a feeling that it is the evening song of the pilgrims as they go up to Jerusalem from their various districts, "to give thanks unto the name of the Lord." The day's journey is over, and they have reached that high land where the Holy City first bursts upon their view, with that glorious temple in the midst, its pure marble shining like a huge mountain of snow. Before the wearied pilgrims compose themselves to rest, they unite in declaring their trust in the Keeper of Israel, who neither slumbers nor sleeps. The psalm is sung, and it rises upward and upward, until it enters the ear of Him who is the hearer of prayer, and who, of all temples, prefers the humble and contrite heart. They lie down in the open air, the stars rush out one by one, as if to keep sentry over them, and soon all is still. — McMichael.

Psalm 121:3. He that keepeth thee will not slumber That great eye never closes. That great eye is as bright and piercing as ever, and not for a single instant is the vigilance relaxed. A poor woman, as the eastern story has it, came to the sultan one day and asked compensation for the loss of some property. "How did you lose it?" said the monarch. "I fell asleep," was the reply, "and a robber entered my dwelling." "Why did you fall asleep?" "I fell asleep because I believed that you were awake." The sultan was so much delighted with the answer of the woman, that he ordered her loss to be made up. But what is true, only by a legal fiction, of human governments, that they never sleep, is true in the most absolute sense with reference to the divine government. We can sleep in safety because our God is ever awake. We are safe, because he never slumbers. Jacob had a beautiful picture of the ceaseless care of divine providence on the night when he fled from his father's house. The lonely traveler slept on the ground, with the stones for his pillow and the sky for his canopy. He had a wondrous vision of a ladder stretching from earth to heaven, on which angels were seen ascending and descending. And he heard Yahweh saying to him, "Behold I am with thee, and will keep thee in all places whither thou goest." — McMichael.

NOTES ON PSALM 122

This psalm is expressly ascribed to David, though it is not known why it should be classed among the “Songs of Degrees.” On the supposition that these were used by the pilgrims in “going up” to Jerusalem to worship, and that they were sung by the way, this psalm would be particularly appropriate, and is one of the very few, in the entire collection of fifteen, that would be appropriate. This psalm evidently was used on some such occasion, and is beautifully suited to such a design. There is no reason to doubt that it is a composition of David, but it is not now possible to ascertain at what period of his life, or on what particular occasion, it was composed. DeWette has endeavored to show that the psalm must have been composed at a later period in the Jewish history than the time of David. His arguments are:

- (1) That these “Psalms of Degrees” mostly pertain to a later period, and yet that they are closely connected together in sense;
- (2) that the language indicates a later period than the time of David;
- (3) that the pilgrimage to Jerusalem was not instituted until a later age than that of David;
- (4) that the mention of the “thrones of the house of David” (~~13C15~~ Psalm 122:5) indicates a later age; and
- (5) that Jerusalem is represented (~~13C15~~ Psalm 122:3) as a city already built — probably, as DeWette thinks, referring to Jerusalem as rebuilt after the captivity.

It will be found, however, in the exposition of the psalm, that there is no part of it which is not applicable to David and his times.

~~13C15~~ Psalm 122:1. I was glad It was a subject; of joy to me. The return of the happy season when we were to go up to worship filled me with joy. The language is expressive of the, happiness which is felt by those who love God and his sanctuary, when the stated season of worship returns. The heart is drawn to the house of prayer; the soul is filled with peace at the prospect of being again permitted to worship God. Who the speaker here is, is not known. It may have been David himself; more probably, however, it was designed by him to be used by those who should go up to worship, as expressive of their individual joy.

When they said unto me When it was said unto me. When the time arrived. When I was invited by others to go. The announcement was joyful; the invitation was welcome. It met the desires of my heart, and I embraced the invitation cheerfully and joyfully.

Let us go into the house of the LORD Up to the place where God dwells; the house which he has made his abode. If the psalm was composed in the time of David, this would refer to the tabernacle as fixed by him on Mount Zion; if at a later period, to the temple. The language will admit of either interpretation. Compare the notes at <sup><21B></sup>Isaiah 2:3.

<sup><4C2></sup>Psalm 122:2. Our feet shall stand within thy gates, O Jerusalem We shall enter the sacred city. It appears now in full view before us — its walls, its palaces, its sacred places. We shall not stand and gaze upon it at a distance; we shall not merely be charmed with its beauty as we approach it; we shall accomplish the object of our desire, and enter within its walls and gates. So the believer approaches heaven — the New Jerusalem above. he will not merely admire its exterior, and look upon it at a distance; but he will enter in. He draws nearer and nearer to it, and as he approaches it when he is dying, its beauty becomes the more charming to his view, and the joy of his heart increases as he now feels the assurance that he will “stand within its gates:” that he will enter there, and dwell there forever. So said Dr. Payson, when approaching the end of life:

“The celestial city is full in my view. Its glories beam upon me, its breezes fan me, its odors are wafted to me, its sounds strike upon my ears, and its spirit is breathed into my heart. Nothing separates me from it but the river of death, which now appears but as an insignificant rill, that may be crossed at a single step, whenever God shall give permission. The Sun of Righteousness has been gradually drawing nearer and nearer, appearing larger and brighter as he approached, and now he fills the whole hemisphere — pouring forth a flood of glory, in which I seem to float like an insect in the beams of the sun; exulting, yet almost trembling, while I gaze on this excessive brightness, and wondering with unutterable wonder why God should deign thus to shine upon a sinful worm.” Works, i. 407.

See also the exquisite description of the glories of heaven, familiar to all, as described by Bunyan, as the Christian pilgrims were about to cross the river of death.

Psalm 122:3. Jerusalem is builded as a city that is compact together literally, “joined to itself together;” that is, when one part is, as it were, bound closely to another part; not scattered or separate. The walls are all joined together; and the houses are all united to one another so as to make a compact place. The ground occupied by Jerusalem never could be large, as it was surrounded with valleys, except on the north, and hemmed in with hills, so that, from the necessity of the case, when it became the capital of the nation, it was densely crowded. This, moreover, was usual in ancient cities, when they were made compact for the sake of defense and protection.

Psalm 122:4. Whither the tribes The twelve tribes of the children of Israel.

Go up To the great feasts and festivals of the nation. See <sup>102317</sup>Exodus 23:17. This language of going up is such as would be used anywhere respecting the capital of a nation — as it is now of London; but it was literally true of Jerusalem, since it was elevated far above most parts of the land.

The tribes of the LORD, unto the testimony of Israel The “ark of testimony;” the ark within which were the tables of stone, containing the law considered as God’s testimony or witnessing as to justice, right, equity, duty, truth. See <sup>121634</sup>Exodus 16:34; 25:16,21; 40:3,20; 30:6,36; 31:18.

To give thanks unto the name of the LORD To worship Yahweh — the name often being put for the Being himself. A main part of Hebrew worship was praise, and hence, this is often put for the whole of worship.

Psalm 122:5. For there are set Margin, Do sit. The Hebrew is, “For there sit thrones for judgment.” They are established there; or, That is the appointed place for administering justice.

Thrones of judgment Seats for dispensing justice. The word throne is now commonly appropriated to the seat or chair of a king, but this is not necessarily the meaning here. The word may denote a seat or bench occupied by a judge. The meaning here is, that Jerusalem was the supreme seat of justice; the place where justice was dispensed for the nation. It was at once the religious and the civil capital of the nation.

The thrones of the house of David Of the family of David, who performed the office of magistrates, or who administered justice. The family of David would naturally be employed in such a service as this. This office, Absalom — who had not been appointed to it — earnestly desired, in order that he might secure popularity in his contemplated rebellion. “Oh that I were made a judge in the land, that every man which hath any suit or cause might come unto me, and I would do him justice!” <1053>2 Samuel 15:4.

<1026>Psalm 122:6. Pray for the peace of Jerusalem The prosperity, the welfare of Jerusalem — for peace is everywhere the image of prosperity and happiness. Compare <10518>Psalm 51:18. This is the language which those who were going up to the city — to the house of the Lord — addressed to each other, expressing the joyful feelings of their hearts at their own near approach to the city. It breathes the desire that all would pray for the peace and prosperity of a city so dear to their own souls; where the worship of God was celebrated; where God himself dwelt; where justice was administered: a city of so much importance and so much influence in the land. To us now it inculcates the duty of praying for the church: its peace; its unity; its prosperity; its increase; its influence on our country and on the world at large. It is a prayer that the church may not be divided by schism or heresy; that its members may cherish for each other right feelings; that there may be no jealousies, no envyings, and no jars; that the different branches of the church may regard and treat each other with kindness, with respect, and with mutual recognition; that prosperity may attend them all.

The shall prosper that love thee Or rather, They shall have peace that love thee; or, May they have peace that love thee. The word prosper conveys an idea which is not in the original. The Hebrew word means to be “secure,” “tranquil,” “at rest,” spoken especially of one who enjoys quiet prosperity, <10526>Job 3:26; 12:6. The essential idea is that of quietness or rest; and the meaning here is, that those who love Zion will have peace; or, that the tendency of that love is to produce peace. See <10511>Romans 5:1. The prayer was for “peace;” the thought in connection with that was naturally that those who loved Zion would have peace. It is indeed true, in general, that they who love Zion, or who serve God, will “prosper” (compare the notes at 1 Timothy 9:8), but that is not the truth taught here. The idea is that they will have peace: peace with God; peace in their own consciences; peace in the prospect of death and of the future world; peace amidst the storms and tempests of life; peace in death, in the grave, and forever.

Psalm 122:7. Peace be within thy walls The word here rendered walls, means properly an host, an army; then a fortification, an entrenchment, especially the ditch or trench with the low wall or breastwork which surrounds it. Gesenius, Lexicon. It refers here to the fortifications or defenses around Jerusalem.

And prosperity Peace; the same word which is used in the previous verse, and expressing the same idea — that of tranquility.

Within thy palaces This word properly means a “fortress,” “castle;” then, a palace, a residence of a king or a prince, <sup><1168></sup>1 Kings 16:18; <sup><2155></sup>2 Kings 15:25; <sup><2210></sup>Isaiah 25:2. The idea is, that such places abounded in Jerusalem; and the prayer is, that in those abodes of power, where the rulers of the land resided, there might be peace. The particular reason for this prayer is suggested in the following verse.

Psalm 122:8. For my brethren and companions’ sakes Because they dwell there; or, because they go up there to worship; or, because they love thee, and find their happiness in thee; or, because they are unconverted, and all my hope of their salvation is to be derived from thee — from the church, from the influence of religion.

I will now say, Peace be within thee I will pray for thy peace, for thy prosperity, for the blessing of God upon thee — because their good, their comfort, their hope of salvation, depends on thee — on the influence which shall go out from thee. So the Christian prays that the church may prosper — that the divine blessing may rest upon it — that there may be in it harmony, peace, love, and zeal — that a blessing may attend the preaching of the gospel — not only because he loves it, and seeks his own comfort and edification in it, but that his friends and kindred — his wife, his parents, his children, his neighbors — those whom he loves, and whose salvation he desires, may be saved. This expresses the true feelings of piety all over the world; this is one of the grounds of the strong love which the friends of God have for the church — because they hope and desire that through the church those most dear to their hearts will find salvation.

Psalm 122:9. Because of the house of the LORD our God I will seek thy good Because of the sanctuary within thee; because that is the place where God is worshipped. The principal attraction in thee is the fact that in thee is the place where the worship of God is celebrated. It is this which gives its main importance in my view to the place; it is for this, and because I desire its influence to be perpetuated and extended, that I seek thy prosperity. This expresses a deep feeling in the mind of a pious man. To him the church of God is the most important of all objects, gives the principal interest to a place, and is everywhere to him the chief attraction. The church does more to adorn a place than anything else; it is that which exerts the best influence on a place, and sends the best influence abroad; it is that which to him is the source of chief comfort and delight. His heart is there; his main delight is there; his arrangements will be made so as best to enjoy the privileges of the sanctuary; and his plans of life will all contemplate the welfare, the extension, and the influence of the church of God. It is religion which in his view is the chief ornament of a place; religion which in any community is the principal fountain of its happiness and prosperity; religion which is the central and controlling influence on the private dwellings, and the public institutions, of a nation.

APPENDIX NOTES ON PSALM 122

An introduction of two verses stands instead of a title, announcing the object of the psalm. The preceding psalm was intended to be sung in sight of Jerusalem, and this one at the gates of the city, where the pilgrim train had halted for the purpose of arranging the solemn procession to the sanctuary ... The title attributes the psalm to David as its author; and internal evidence confirms it. The design of the psalm can only be explained in connection with the times of David. Its design is to conciliate the affections of the people for the new capital; to procure for it that place in their feelings which it occupied externally. <sup><BCTE></sup>Psalm 122:3 takes for granted that Jerusalem had recently, for the first time, become a beautifully built city; and this was the case in David's time. At all events, the description of Jerusalem, as a city beautifully built, well compacted, adorned with palaces, and fortified, here and in <sup><BCTE></sup>Psalm 122:7, points to a time before the captivity, etc.

The reasons which have been adduced against the Davidic origin of the psalm are of no force. The assertion that <sup><BCTE></sup>Psalm 122:2 is not applicable to David, but only to the pilgrims who approached the city from without, is set aside by the remark, that David here, as he frequently did (for example Psalm 20; 21), sung from the soul of the people. The mention of the house of the Lord, in <sup><BCTE></sup>Psalm 122:1,9, does not lead to the time after the building of Solomon's temple, for it is undeniable that even the early sanctuary was known by this name; compare <sup><BCTE></sup>Psalm 5:7; 27:4; 55:14; and at <sup><19518></sup>Psalm 52:8. The assertion that pilgrimages to Jerusalem did not come into general use until some time after the reign of David, when uniformity of public worship had been completely established, depends upon the idea. Which is not at all borne out by history, that the directions contained in the Pentateuch, as to there being only one sanctuary, were not observed until a later age. It has been proved in the treatise on the Pentateuch and the time of the judges, in vol. iii. of the Beitr., that, during the whole period of the judges, the people had only one sanctuary, and that to it were brought the sacrifices of the whole nation, and that the great festivals, especially the passover, were celebrated in accordance with the directions of the law, <sup><12215></sup>Exodus 23:15-17; 34:23; <sup><19166></sup>Deuteronomy 16:16. That the sanctuary in Jerusalem, under David, did in reality come exactly into the place of the earlier one at Shiloh, is clear from the fact, that the ark of the covenant was there, “the heart of the Israelite religion,” and, indeed, the ark of the covenant rising from its grave (compare Beitr. pp. 48ff), as intimated by the circumstance, that, as soon as it was consecrated, sacrifices were offered before it (2 Sam, 6:5,13). The matter finally is put beyond a doubt by the psalms of David’s age, for they speak only of one sanctuary, the sanctuary at Jerusalem (compare at <sup><19176></sup>Psalm 15:1). The old tabernacle, indeed, at Gibeon, still continued to exist, but only as a ruin. David did not act like the breakers of images; he respected externally the attachments of the people, but with happy effect he did everything he could to turn the regard of the people more and more toward Jerusalem: and the psalm before us, along with others, served this object — its design being to awaken love, devout love, for Jerusalem and its sanctuary. There are, besides, distinct. traces of solemn processions to the sanctuary in the time of David, <sup><19174></sup>Psalm 42:4; 55:14. The mention of the house of David cannot seem strange. David had founded a new house instead of the house of Saul, <sup><1011></sup>2 Samuel 3:1. Even before the promise which he received through Nathan, he hoped and wished that he would continue to reign in his posterity (compare at <sup><19204></sup>Psalm 21:4; 138:3), and after that promise he always looked upon himself as the founder of a family which was to last for ever, for example, <sup><19180></sup>Psalm 18:20. — Finally, the assertion that the language is that of a later age has no further foundation to rest on than the Hebrew letter shin (v) occurring twice instead of rva <sup><h334></sup>. This form, however, occurs in a much older song, that of Deborah; and in the present instance it need occasion very little difficulty, occurring, as it does, in a popular song, which consists of the language of ordinary life, and may be expected to contain forms which would afterward appear in written language.

As far as concerns the time of composition, the psalm takes for granted that Jerusalem had already become the ecclesiastical and civil capital. It cannot, therefore, have been composed before 2 Samuel 6; but it must have been composed shortly after that period, as its design is to render popular the new institution, to endear to the affections of the people the city "which was the bond of sacred union." — Hengstenberg.

Psalm 122:4. Whither the tribes go up The church is still the center of union. To this sacred place the tribes of God are ever going up, in accordance with the divine statute, "to give thanks unto the name of the Lord." All local peculiarities, all national distinctions, vanish in the house of God. The Asiatic and the Esquimaux, the Red Indian and the islander of the Southern Ocean, the African and the European, assemble here as one family; and throwing aside all sectional feuds and rivalries, they worship on the same holy mountain. The great bond of union is Christ, and, joined to Him who is our living Head, we are members of one another. All one in Christ. There is one Father, one Redeemer, one Holy Spirit. There is one condemnation, and there is one redemption; one cross of atonement, one throne of grace, one home in heaven. Wherever believers meet, they can sing the same psalms, and repeat the same prayers. The house of God disowns all the distinctions of earth: "The rich and poor meet together; the Lord is the maker of them all." Religion forms the great uniting principle, while sin is the source of all disorder. Love to man has its deepest roots in love to God; and we anticipate that bright millennial period when "the mountain of the house of the Lord shall be established in the top of the mountains," and all nations shall flow into it, and meet there as friends and brothers, members of the Holy Catholic Church. Pray and labor; and urge forward the chariot-wheels of the Redeemer. — Pilgrim, Psalms.

Psalm 122:6. They shall prosper that love thee A consuming zeal for the house of God is common to all the psalms. So many of them are either lamentations over the reverses of Zion or songs of thanksgiving because of her prosperity, and so distinctly do they thus reflect her contemporary fortunes, that the careful student of the national history finds little difficulty in affixing to many of them the date at which they were composed and first sung. One consequence is, that God has thus provided songs adapted to every variety of condition in which the church can be placed. Another scarcely less important is, that the faithful are admonished to raise themselves out of that selfish isolation — that entire absorption in the concerns of their own personal wellbeing — into which even good people are apt to fall. I believe that the lesson just named is one which very many God-fearing people have sadly failed to lay to heart. They can sing that half of the Psalter which expresses the various exercises of personal piety; but the other half, which summons them to remember Zion, calls forth little of warm sympathy from their hearts. Even in the interest of personal piety itself, this is to be lamented. Job's captivity was turned when he prayed for his friends: and it has many a time been found that believers who before were troubled with weakness and perpetual fears, have been lifted up into a higher and brighter and serener region, when, looking no more on their own things only, they have become absorbed in labors and prayers in behalf of some grand Christian enterprise. The Lord will not fail to "remember his Davids and all their afflictions," their anxious labors for his house and kingdom. David's own faith in this matter was strong; and here he encourages God's people to pray for the peace of Jerusalem, by reminding them that "they shall prosper that love her." — Binnie.

A reason is here assigned why we should pray for the peace and prosperity of the church. Our own interest has an inseparable connection with it. Worldly prosperity cannot indeed be affirmed of all the true Israel; though our Saviour's declaration still preserves its value: 'But seek ye first the kingdom of God, and his righteousness; and all these things shall be added unto you.' But one thing can be promised with infallible certainty, that the friends of Zion shall enjoy much spiritual prosperity. To a certain extent the benefit is theirs already. It is an excellent evidence of advancement in the divine life, when we love the house of God, pray for its peace, and labor for its welfare. And the more ardent our aspirations, and the more unremitting our exertions, the greater happiness we shall experience, and the more clearly shall we read our title to an inheritance in heaven. The best and speediest mode of promoting our own spiritual prosperity, is just to engage with heart and hand in every cause which is identified with the glory of the eternal God, and the eternal welfare of man. Indolent Christians have very little joy in the Lord. They are melancholy, moping, and discontented; and it is proper they should remain in darkness until they find out what is wrong, and take an active part in schemes of benevolence. The happy Christians are the working Christians. Make the experiment if you have not done so before; and you will soon learn how true it is, They shall prosper that love Zion. — Pilgrim Psalms.

NOTES ON PSALM 123

This psalm is entitled simply “Song of Degrees.” See the notes at the title of Psalm 120. Nothing is intimated in regard to the authorship of the psalm, or to the occasion on which it was composed. The only circumstance which throws any light on its origin is the statement in <sup><B></sup>Psalm 123:4, that the author and his friends — the people of God referred to in the psalm — were exposed to derision and contempt for their attachment to religion, especially the contempt and reproach of those who were in circumstances of ease and affluence, or who were in the more elevated ranks of life. This might accord well with the condition of the exiles returning from Babylon, or with the condition of the returned captives when rebuilding the walls of the city, and when they met with scorn and contempt from the Samaritans and the Ammonites; from Sanballat and Tobiah; from the Arabians and the Ashdodites (<sup><B></sup>Nehemiah 4:1-8); but there is no certain evidence that the psalm was composed on that occasion. The pious Hebrews of antiquity — David and others — and the people of God at all times have been too much exposed to this kind of treatment to make the mere applicability of the psalm to that particular time a reason for concluding that it must have been composed then; and it is now impossible to determine by whom, or on what occasion it was composed. It refers to what may occur in any age of the world; and it expresses the proper feelings of piety at all times when we are, on account of our religion, exposed to “the scorning of those that are at ease, and to the contempt of the proud.”

Lift I up mine eyes In supplication and prayer. Nature prompts us to look up when we address God, as if he dwelt above us. It is the natural prompting of the heart that he must be the most exalted of all beings, dwelling above all. See <sup><B></sup>Psalm 121:1.

O thou that dwellest in the heavens Whose home — whose special home — is in heaven — above the sky. This is in accordance with the common feelings of people, and the common description of God in the Bible, though it is true also that God is everywhere. Compare <sup><B></sup>Psalm 2:4; 11:4.

ⲀⲚⲔⲔ Psalm 123:2. Behold, as the eyes of servants look unto the hand of their masters ... Or, are to the hands of their masters; or, regard the hands of their masters. That is, we look to God with the same spirit of deference, dependence, and readiness to mark the will of God, which is evinced by servants in regard to their masters, and by maidens in regard to the will of a mistress. There has been some difference of view in regard to the meaning of this comparison. Some have supposed that the allusion is to the fact that servants, when in danger, look to their masters for protection; others, that they look to them for the supply of their needs; others, that when they have been guilty of an offence they look to them alone for pardon. See Rosenmuller, in loc. The true idea, however, seems to be, that they look to them with deference and respect; that they attentively mark every expression of their will; that they are ready to obey their commands on the slightest intimation of their wishes — standing in a waiting posture, with no will of their own — their own wills absorbed in the will of the master or the mistress. The following extracts from Oriental travelers may illustrate the idea here: Maundrell (Reise von Aleppo nach Jerusalem, s. 13), speaking of an interview with the Pasha at Tripoli, says, “The servants all stood in great numbers with the utmost respect, and in profoundest silence, and served the guests with the utmost attention and respect.” Pococke remarks that in Egypt the slaves stand in the profoundest silence at the end of the table, their hands laid cross-wise over one another, and that they mark with the deepest attention the slightest movement of their master, who conveys his wishes to them through signs and winks. Savary, in his Letters from Egypt (p. 135), says,

“The slaves stand with their hands laid cross-wise over their breasts, silent, at the end of the hall. “Their eyes are directed to the master,” and they are attentive to the slightest indication of his will.”

See other illustrations in Rosenmuller, Morgenland, ii. 109, 110. It is to such a custom as this that the psalmist refers; and the idea is, that his eyes were directed to God, in his troubles, in profound silence, and with deep attention, resembling that of servants waiting in stillness on their master, and catching the slightest intimation of his will — a movement of the head or hand — or anything which would indicate his pleasure.

Until that he have mercy upon us We have nothing to do but wait. We have no other resource. We can do nothing if we turn away from him. Our only hope and expectation is there, and if we ever find relief, it must be there. The surest — the only — hope of relief is to wait on God; and it is the purpose of our souls to do this until we find help and deliverance. This is the attitude in which the earnest prayer in the next verse is offered.

Psalm 123:3. Have mercy upon us, O LORD, have mercy upon us

The language of earnest pleading, repeating with emphasis the object of the prayer. The supplicants are represented as standing and urging this petition, feeling that help could come only from God; looking only to him; and watching his countenance, as servants do their master's.

For we are exceedingly filled The Hebrew word used here means to be saturated; to have the appetite fully satisfied — as applied to one who is hungry or thirsty. Then it comes to mean to be entirely full, and the idea here is, that as much contempt had been thrown upon them as could be; they could experience no more.

With contempt Contempt has been shown us in every possible way. We are thoroughly despised.

Psalm 123:4. Our soul is exceedingly filled Thoroughly sated. This verse states the nature and the source of the contempt which they were called to bear.

With the scorning of those that are at ease According to one view of these “Psalms of Degrees” (see the Introduction to Psalm 120) this would be an instance of an “ascent” in the sense, or of the going up of the thought, where in Psalm 123:3 there was mention made in general of “contempt,” and in this verse the thought is carried onward and upward, or there is an additional idea which gives intensity to it. It is the scorn proceeding from those who are at ease; that is, the frivolous, the affluent, the proud. The word scorning means derision, mockery. The idea in the Hebrew is derived from stammering, which the word properly means; and then, mockery, as repeating over the words of another, or imitating the voice of one in derision. Compare Psalm 2:4; Job 22:19. The phrase “those that are at ease” properly refers to those who are tranquil or quiet, Job 12:5; Isaiah 32:18; 33:20; and then it is used of those who are living at ease; those who are living in self-indulgence and luxury, Amos 6:1; Isaiah 32:9,11. Here it would seem to refer to those who, in our language, are “in easy circumstances;” the affluent; those who are not compelled to toil: then, the frivolous, the fashionable, those in the upper walks of life. The contempt was aggravated by the fact that it came from that quarter; not from the low, the ignorant, the common, but from those who claimed to be refined, and who were distinguished in the world of gaiety, of rank, and of fashion. This, even for good people (such is human nature), is much more hard to bear than contempt is when it comes from those who are in the lower walks of life. In the latter case, perhaps, we feel that we can meet contempt with contempt; in the former we cannot. We disregard the opinions of those who are beneath us; there are few who are not affected by the opinions entertained of them by those who are above them.

And with the contempt of the proud Those who are lifted up; either in rank, in condition, or in feeling. The essential idea is, that it was the contempt of those to whom mankind look up. Religious people have always had much of this to encounter, and often it is in fact a more severe test of the reality and power of religion than the loss of goods, or than bodily pains and penalties. We can bear much if we have the respect — the praise — of those above us; it is a very certain test of the reality and the power of our religion when we can bear the scorn of the great, the noble, the scientific, the frivolous, and the fashionable. Piety is more frequently checked and obscured by this than it is by persecution. It is more rare that piety shines brightly when the frivolous and the fashionable flown upon it than when princes attempt to crush it by power. The church has performed its duty better in the furnace of persecution than it has in the “happy” scenes of the world.

APPENDIX NOTES ON PSALM 123

This psalm is either the sigh of the exile, toward the close of the captivity, looking in faith and patience for the deliverance which he had reason to hope was now near at hand; or it is the sigh of those who, having already returned to their native land, were still exposed to the “scorn and contempt” of the Samaritans and others, who, favored by the Persian government, took every opportunity of harassing and insulting the Jews. Compare <sup><1229></sup>Nehemiah 2:19, “They laughed us to scorn, and despised us,” with <sup><1234></sup>Psalm 123:4 of the psalm, “The scorn of them that are at ease, the contempt of the proud.” — Perowne.

<sup><1234></sup>Psalm 123:4. Our soul is exceedingly filled with the scorning of those that are at ease Be thankful that they can use no other weapons than calumny and contempt. The Jews had to contend at the same time with open violence. Were their power equal to their will, they would confiscate your property, they would confine you in dungeons, they would burn you at the stake. In Athens they would have condemned Socrates, the greatest and best philosopher of antiquity, to drink the cup of hemlock; and they would have banished Aristides, because they were tired of hearing every one call him Aristides the Just. In Jerusalem they would have goaded on the senseless rabble, and swelled the ferocious shout, Not this man, but Barabbas! In Andrews they would have sat at the castle windows, and feasted their eyes when good Patrick Hamilton was consuming in the flames; and they would have gone in afterward and dined with an unimpeachable appetite. In slave countries they would tar and feather the missionaries who proclaim to the degraded negroes the unsearchable riches of Christ. The same Satanic spirit still reigns; and can we be too grateful that these enemies of the cross are kept in chains! We live in a land of civil and religious freedom; and they cannot go beyond the boundaries of misrepresentation and scorn. They may show their teeth and growl, but they cannot bite. They may curse you, but they cannot lay a finger upon you. They may hiss at you, but what is that compared with the rattlesnake springing upon you, embracing you with his slimy folds, fastening this fangs in your flesh, and changing you in a few hours into a hideous and bloated corpse! How can we value enough the privileges of Christians in this dear land of our fathers, where freedom has built her home! "They shall sit every man under his vine and under his fig-tree; and none shall make them afraid: for the mouth of the Lord of hosts hath spoken it." — Pilgrim Psalms.

NOTES ON PSALM 124

This psalm, one of the “Songs of Degrees,” is, like Psalm 122, ascribed to David. See the Introductory Notes to that psalm. There is nothing in the one before us to render it improbable that it was composed by him, but it is now impossible to ascertain on what occasion it was written. It would be appropriate to be sung on the return from Babylon, and there is no improbability in the supposition that it may have been used on that occasion. But there is nothing in it to prove that it was composed then, or to make it applicable to that occasion alone. Very many were the occasions in the Jewish history when such a psalm was applicable; very many have been the occasions in the history of the Christian church; very many, also, in the lives of individual believers.

The idea in the psalm is, that deliverance from trouble and danger is to be ascribed wholly to God; that the people of God are often in such circumstances that there is no human help for them, and that the praise of theft deliverance is due to God alone.

Psalm 124:1. If it had not been the LORD who was on our side

Unless it was Yahweh who was with us. The idea is, that someone had been with them, and had delivered them, and that such was the nature of the interposition that it could be ascribed to no one but Yahweh. It bore unmistakable evidence that it was his work. The deliverance was of such a kind that it could have been accomplished by him only. Such things often occur in life, when the intervention in our behalf is so remarkable that we can ascribe it to no one else but God.

Now may Israel say May well and truly say. The danger was so great, their helplessness was so manifest, and the deliverance was so clearly the work of God, that it was proper to say that if this had not occurred, ruin would have been inevitable and entire.

Psalm 124:2. If it had not been the LORD who was on our side

Repeating the idea, since the mind was full of it, and carrying the thought forward. This is one of the instances of an ascent of thought in these psalms, from which it has been supposed that the title “Songs of Degrees” was given to this collection. See, however, Introduction to Psalm 120.

When men rose up against us When we were assailed by our enemies. On what occasion this occurred, it is now impossible to determine.

Psalm 124:3. Then they had swallowed us up quick There was no other help, and ruin — utter ruin — would have soon come upon us. The word quick here means alive; and the idea is derived from persons swallowed up in an earthquake, or by the opening of the earth, as in the case of Korah, Dathan, and Abiram. <sup><B162></sup>Numbers 16:32,33. Compare <sup><B167></sup>Psalm 106:17. The meaning here is, that they would have been destroyed as if they were swallowed up by the opening of the earth; that is, there would have been complete destruction.

When their wrath was kindled against us Hebrew, In the kindling of their wrath against us. Wrath is often represented in the Scriptures as burning or heated — as that which consumes all before it.

Psalm 124:4. Then the waters had overwhelmed us Our destruction would have been as if the waves of the ocean had overwhelmed us.

The stream had gone over our soul The torrent would have swept us away. Compare <sup><B184></sup>Psalm 18:4,16.

Psalm 124:5. Then the proud waters had gone over our soul Over us. The word proud here is applied to the waters as if raging, swelling, rolling, tumultuous; as if they were self-confident, arrogant, haughty. Such raging billows, as they break and dash upon the shore, are a striking emblem of human passions, whether in an individual, or in a gathering of men — as an army, or a mob. Compare <sup><B177></sup>Psalm 65:7. This is again an amplification, or an ascent of thought. See the notes at <sup><B142></sup>Psalm 124:2. It is, however, nothing more than a poetical embellishment, adding intensity to the expression.

Psalm 124:6. Blessed be the LORD The Lord be praised; or, We have reason to praise the Lord because we have been delivered from these calamities.

Who hath not given us as a prey to their teeth The figure is here changed, though the same idea is retained. The imago is now that of destruction by wild beasts — a form of destruction not less fearful than that which comes from overflowing waters. Such changes of imagery constantly occur in the Book of Psalms, and in impassioned poetry everywhere. The mind is full of a subject; numerous illustrations occur in the rapidity of thought; and the mind seizes upon one and then upon another as best suited to express the emotions of the soul. The next verse furnishes another instance of this sudden transition.

Psalm 124:7. Our soul is escaped We have escaped; our life has been preserved.

As a bird out of the snare of the fowlers By the breaking of the snare, or the gin. The bird is entangled, but the net breaks, and the bird escapes. See the notes at Psalm 91:3.

The snare is broken ... It was not strong enough to retain the struggling bird, and the captive broke away. So we seemed to be caught. The enemy appeared to have us entirely in his power, but escape came to us as it does to the bird when it finds the net suddenly break, and itself again at large.

Psalm 124:8. Our help is in the name of the LORD In the Lord; in the great Yahweh. See Psalm 121:2.

Who made heaven and earth The great Creator; the true God. Our deliverances have led us up to him. They are such as can be ascribed to him alone. They could not have come from ourselves; from our fellow-men; from angels; from any or all created beings. Often in life, when delivered from danger, we may feel this; we always may feel this, and should feel this, when we think of the redemption of our souls. That is a work which we of ourselves could never have performed; which could not have been done for us by our fellow-men; which no angel could have accomplished; which all creation combined could not have worked out; which could have been effected by no one but by him who “made heaven and earth;” by him who created all things. See Colossians 1:13-17.

APPENDIX NOTES ON PSALM 124

It is impossible for us to realize the circumstances of these persons. We know not the danger. We know not the deliverance. We know not the gratitude. Ours is indeed a blessed ignorance; but one effect of this ignorance is, that we have not a sufficient sympathy with the victims of persecution. Enjoying the blessings of religious freedom, worshipping God in our churches without distraction of spirit, how can we appreciate the condition of those pious people who were hunted as partridges on the mountains, and whose lives were placed in perpetual peril, on account of their attachment to truth! Our ancestors understood these things much better than we do. And a few months' persecution would give us a much more accurate and vivid idea of the hardships which they endured than a whole volume of eloquent description. What true men, with all their failings, were those covenanting fathers of ours! They sacrificed all that was dear to flesh and blood rather than renounce that liberty of public worship which is the inalienable birthright of the church, and which is independent of human laws, because superior to them all. Conceive them seated on a hillside in the midst of a wild moor, and just escaped from the soldiers of Claverhouse, a man ferocious as any beast of prey, and merciless as any flood of waters; and with what thrilling emotions would this psalm be sung!

May Israel now say;
Had not the Lord been on our side,
When men rose us to slay.” — Pilgrim Psalms*

NOTES ON PSALM 125

This psalm is entitled merely "A Song of Degrees." Its author, and the occasion on which it was composed, are unknown. The contents of the psalm accord well with the supposition that it may have been written after the return from the Babylonian captivity, and may have been designed to strengthen and comfort those who were engaged in rebuilding the city, and restoring the ancient worship, either against the Samaritans and those who opposed them (<sup><K&B2></sup>Nehemiah 6:12,13), or against the lukewarmness of a part of the people themselves. There is nothing, however, so exclusively applicable to that time as to make it necessary to suppose that it was composed on that occasion. There is, indeed, evidence in the psalm (<sup><K&B5></sup>Psalm 125:5), that there were some among the people who were disposed to turn away from the service of Yahweh, or who were perverse and rebellious; but such a state of things was not special to the time of the return from the captivity, nor was it special to the Jews, for it has occurred often; it exists still. The psalm is designed to encourage those who were disposed to trust in the Lord, by the assurance that they would be safe; that the blessing of God would be upon them; and that the church was firm and secure.

<sup><K&B1></sup>Psalm 125:1. They that trust in the LORD His people; his friends. It is, and has been always, a characteristic of the people of God that they trust or confide in him.

Shall be as mount Zion The mountain which David fortified, and on which the city was at first built, <sup><K&B6></sup>2 Samuel 5:6-9. The name Zion became also the name by which the entire city was known.

Which cannot be removed, but abideth for ever A mountain is an emblem of firmness and stability; and it is natural to speak of it as that which could not be removed. There is something more than this, however, intended here, as there is some ground of comparison especially in regard to Mount Zion. This must have been either the idea that Zion was particularly strong by position, or that it was under the divine protection, and was therefore safe. Most probably it refers to Zion as a place secure by nature, and rendered more so by art.

Psalm 125:2. As the mountains are round about Jerusalem Hebrew, “Jerusalem — the mountains are round about her.” Jerusalem, except on the north, is encompassed with hills or mountains, so that although the city was built on hills — Zion, Moriah, Bezethah, Acra — it was itself surrounded by hills higher than any of these, and was, in a certain sense, in a valley. See the notes at Matthew 2:1. Compare the notes at Psalm 48.

So the LORD is round about his people ... As Jerusalem is thus protected by the hills around, so the people of God are protected by Yahweh. He surrounds the church; he is exalted far above the church; he guards the approaches to the church; he can defend it from all its foes. Under his protection it is safe. Jerusalem, as surrounded by hills and mountains, has thus become an emblem of the church at all times; its security was an emblem of the security of all who trust in the Lord.

Psalm 125:3. For the rod of the wicked Margin, as in Hebrew, “wickedness.” The word “rod” — the staff, the scepter, the instrument of inflicting punishment — here means dominion, power, that condition in which the wicked are commonly found, as one of prosperity or power. God will not deal with the righteous as the wicked are often dealt with: that is, God will not give his people prosperity as he does them. The righteous will be afflicted, and will be placed in circumstances to keep them from putting forth their hands to iniquity; that is, from indulging in iniquity. They will be afflicted; they will be kept in the ways of virtue and religion by trial; they will not be left to act out the depravity of the heart as the wicked are.

Shall not rest upon Permanently abide; or, be the constant condition of the righteous. They may be prospered, but they must expect that there will be changes, and that God will so deal with them as to keep them from putting forth their hands to iniquity.

The lot of the righteous The righteous, considered as the “lot” or portion of the Lord. The language is derived from dividing a land by lot (compare Psalm 105:11; 74:2); and the idea is, that the “lot” pertaining to the Lord, or his “portion” among people, is the righteous.

Lest the righteous put forth their hands unto iniquity Lest the effect of prosperity should be to lead them away from God — like the wicked. Hence, they are dealt with in a different manner. They are afflicted; they are thus kept under proper discipline, and their hearts and lives are made what they should be. The statement in this verse, therefore, accords with the uniform statements in the Scriptures, that prosperity is dangerous to the spiritual interests of people, and that, therefore, people are often afflicted in order that they may be led to seek higher interests than those which pertain to this life. The connection here seems to be, that God will defend his people, even as Jerusalem was defended by hills and mountains; but that the real welfare and prosperity of his people was not what the wicked seek — wealth and honor — but the favor of the Lord. Another meaning may, however, be suggested in regard to this verse, which to some may appear more probable than the one above. It is this: that the “rod” — the dominion of the wicked — of bad rulers — of a harsh and oppressive government — will not always be upon the people of God, lest, being crushed, they should be led to acts of iniquity; or lest, being kept from the free service of God, they should abandon themselves to sin.

Psalm 125:4. Do good, O LORD, unto those that be good ... To the good; to the pious. Let them be under the divine protection. Possibly this is not merely a prayer, but is expressive of the belief of the psalmist as to what would occur under the divine administration — that the favor of God would rest upon his people.

Psalm 125:5. As for such as turn aside unto their crooked ways The wicked. Those who leave the right or straight path, and wander in forbidden ways. The word here rendered “crooked ways” occurs nowhere else except in Judges 5:6, where it is rendered “by-ways,” meaning unfrequented paths or roads; narrow and crooked paths, remote from the highways, or the ways commonly traversed. Hence, the word means also paths of sin — as deviations from the straight road which man should travel.

The Lord shall lead them forth with the workers of iniquity They shall be dealt with as sinners. They shall be punished. The allusion is to backsliders; to those who forsake the worship of God; who cease to do “good;” who, though among the professed people of God, wander from him in by-paths and forbidden ways. The idea is, that their profession of religion will not save them; that they will not obtain the divine blessing merely because they are avowedly the people of God, or are numbered among them, but that they will be treated as all other sinners are: they will be led forth with all the wicked, and will be treated like them. Compare Ezekiel 33:12,13; Matthew 7:22,23; 25:11,12.

But peace shall be upon Israel Upon the real Israel; upon the true people of God. <sup><R166></sup>Galatians 6:16; <sup><2543></sup>Isaiah 54:13; 55:12; 57:2; 66:12; <sup><4147></sup>John 14:27; 16:33; <sup><4027></sup>Ephesians 2:17; <sup><1047></sup>Philippians 4:7.

APPENDIX NOTES ON PSALM 125

This psalm was composed after the Babylonian captivity. It refers to the troublous times of Nehemiah. The rebuilding of the wall of Jerusalem had commenced, but the work was carried on under most discouraging circumstances. The inveterate opposition of the Samaritans has been frequently noticed. They maligned the Jewish builders at the Persian court; and, in concert with their pagan neighbors, they had recourse to open violence. The builders were under the necessity of working with a sword at their side, so that when the trumpet sounded they might at once repair to the place where an attack was made, and with flashing weapons repel their adversaries. But with all these precautions, the poor and persecuted Hebrew colony, endeavoring to build the temple of their God and the city of their fathers, would assuredly have been destroyed had there been no gracious interposition of heaven. Their condition may be described with singular fidelity and power in the words of the preceding psalm. If the Lord had not been on their side, their enemies would have swallowed them up alive.

The church here declares her trust in God in all time of tribulation. He would prove her friend, and that too at no distant period. And to make the divine promises visible, as it were, to the eye of sense, the illustrations are selected from the mountain scenery of Jerusalem. One may readily imagine with what thrilling sensations this sacred ode would be sung by the pious Jews. Hope fires their bosom, the blood rushes in rapid tides through their veins, fresh strength is acquired for endurance and labor, and their voices become louder and more jubilant, as, with eyes fixed upon the guardian mountains of the holy city, they sing: "They that trust in the Lord shall be as Mount Zion, which cannot be removed, but abideth forever. As the mountains are round about Jerusalem, so the Lord is round about his people from henceforth, even forever." — Pilgrim Psalms.

NOTES ON PSALM 126

This psalm is entitled simply “A Song of Degrees.” See the Introduction to Psalm 120. There can be no reasonable doubt as to the occasion on which it was composed, for it bears internal evidence of having been composed with reference to the return from Babylon. It may have been designed to be sung as the returning captives went up to Jerusalem, but was more probably composed subsequently to that event, as designed to keep it in remembrance. It was evidently, however, written not long after the return, and by someone who had been personally interested in it, for the author manifestly, in describing the feelings of the people (~~SC05~~ Psalm 126:1,2), speaks of himself as one of them, or as participating in those feelings which they had when the exile was closed, and when they returned to their own land. Who the author was, it is in vain now to conjecture.

It is evident from the psalm (~~SC05~~ Psalm 126:5), that, when it was composed, there was still some trouble — something that might be called a “captivity,” from which the psalmist prays that they might be delivered; and the object of the psalm would seem to be in part, in that trial to find encouragement from the former interposition of God in their case. As he had “turned the captivity of Zion,” as he had filled their “mouth with laughter,” so the psalmist prays that he would again interpose in similar circumstances, and renew his goodness. It is, of course, now impossible to determine precisely to what this refers. It may be, as Rosenmuller supposes, to a portion of the people who remained in exile; or it may be to some other captivity or danger to which they were exposed after their return. The psalmist, however, expresses entire confidence that there would be such interposition, and that, though then in trouble, they would have joy, such as the farmer has who goes forth sowing his seed with weeping, and who comes with joy in the harvest, bearing his sheaves with him, ~~SC05~~ Psalm 126:5,6.

~~SC05~~ Psalm 126:1. When the LORD turned again the captivity of Zion Margin, as in Hebrew, “returned the returning of Zion.” The Hebrew word which is rendered in the text captivity means properly return; and then, those returning. The ancient versions render it captivity. The reference clearly is to those who were returning to Zion, and the psalmist fixes his eye on them as returning, and immediately says that it was the Lord who had thus restored them. The whole was to be traced to God.

We were like them that dream The Latin Vulgate and the Septuagint render this, “we were comforted.” The meaning is, “It seemed like a dream; we could hardly realize that it was so; it was so marvelous, so good, so full of joy, that we could scarcely believe it was real.” This state of mind is not uncommon, when, in sudden and overpowering joy, we ask whether it can be real; whether it is not all a dream. We fear that it is; we apprehend that it will all vanish away like a dream.

Psalm 126:2. Then was our mouth filled with laughter Then were we happy; completely happy. See Job 8:21.

And our tongue with singing We expressed our joy in songs — the natural expression of joy. Young converts — those “turned” from sin to God — sing. Their feelings find expression in the songs of Zion. This is natural; this is proper; this will occur when sinners are converted. An assemblage of young converts is always a happy assemblage; a place where there is a “revival” of religion is always a happy place — full of songs and singing.

Then said they among the heathen The nations; the people among whom they dwelt.

The LORD hath done great things for them In causing their return to their own land; in ordering the arrangements for it; in bringing their captivity to an end; in securing such interposition from the civil rulers as to facilitate their return. This would indicate that the surrounding people had not an unfriendly feeling toward them, but that they pitied them in exile, and were disposed to acknowledge the hand of God in what was done. Their deliverance, in the circumstances, was such as evidently to have been the work of God. This will agree well with the account of the return of the exiles from Babylon, and with all that had been done for them by Cyrus. Compare Ezra 1:1-4.

Psalm 126:3. The LORD hath done great things for us All that the people around us say is true. We see it; we feel it; we acknowledge it. Those to whom this pertained would see it more clearly than those who had merely observed it. A surrounding world may see in the conversion of a man, in his being turned from sin, in the influence of religion upon him, in his comfort, calmness, and peace, that “the Lord has done great things” for him; but he himself, while he responds most fully to what they say, will see this more clearly than they do. There is more in his redemption, his conversion, his peace and joy, than they do or can perceive, and with emphasis he himself will say, "The Lord has done great things for me."

Whereof we are glad It fills our souls with joy. If this is understood of the returning Hebrews — coming back from the captivity in Babylon — all must see how appropriate is the language; if it be applied to a sinner returning to God, it is no less suitable, for there is nothing that so fills the mind with joy as a true conversion to God.

Psalm 126:4. Turn again our captivity, O LORD literally, "Turn our captivity." The word "again" is inserted by the translators, and conveys an idea which is not necessarily in the original. It is simply a prayer that God would "turn" their captivity; that is, looking upon the captivity as not wholly ended, or as, in some sense, still continuing, that it might please him wholly to turn it, or to end it. The language would be applicable, if there was a new "captivity" similar to the one from which they had been delivered, or if the one mainly referred to was not complete; that is, if a part of the people still remained in bondage. The latter is probably the idea, that while a considerable part of the nation had been restored, and while an order had been issued for the restoration of all the captives to their native land, it was still true that a portion of them remained in exile; and the prayer is, that God would interfere in their behalf, and complete the work. A portion of the exiles, in fact, returned under Cyrus; a part under Darius; a part under Xerxes and his successors. The return was by no means accomplished at once, but occupied a succession of years.

As the streams in the south In the southern parts of Palestine, or in the regions bordering it on the south — Idumea and Arabia. That is, As those streams when dried up by the summer heat are swelled by autumnal and winter rains, so let the streams of the returning people, which seem now to be diminished, be swelled by augmenting numbers coming again to their own land. Let the companies of returning emigrants be kept full, like swollen streams, until all shall have been brought back.

Psalm 126:5. They that sow in tears shall reap in joy Though the sowing of seed is a work of labor and sorrow — often a work so burdening the farmer that he weeps — yet the return — the harvest — is accompanied with rejoicing. The truth is expressed in a general form, as illustrating the idea that enterprises which are begun under many difficulties, and which require much labor, will be crowned with success, and that the joy is more than an equivalent for all the weariness and sorrow. Thus it is in respect to the toil of the farmer; the cares and anxieties of the student; the work of conversion and repentance; the labors of the Christian pastor; the efforts of the Sabbath-school teacher; the faithfulness of the Christian parent; the endeavors of a church for a revival of religion; the zeal and sacrifice of the Christian missionary. The particular allusion here is to the exiles, in their long and weary march to their native land. It was a work of toil and tears, but there would be joy, like that of the harvest, when, their long journey over they should again come to their native land. Compare <sup><3906></sup>Isaiah 9:3.

<sup><3906></sup>Psalm 126:6. He that goeth forth and weepeth He that goes forth weeping — still an allusion to the farmer. He is seen moving slowly and sadly over the plowed ground, burdened with his task, an in tears.

Bearing precious seed Margin, “seed-basket.” Literally, “bearing the drawing out of seed;” perhaps the seed as drawn out of his bag; or, as scattered or sown regularly in furrows, so that it seems to be drawn out in regular lines over the fields.

Shall doubtless come again Shall come to this sown field again in the time of harvest. He will visit it with other feelings than those which he now has.

With rejoicing ... Then his tears will be turned to joy. Then the rich harvest will wave before him. Then he will thrust in his sickle and reap. Then he will gather the golden grain, and the wain will groan under the burden, and the sheaves will be carried forth with songs of joy. He will be abundantly rewarded for all his toil; he will see the fruit of his labors; he will be filled with joy. The design of this illustration was, undoubtedly, to cheer the hearts of the exiles in their long and dangerous journey to their native land; it has, however, a wider and more universal application, as being suited to encourage all in their endeavors to secure their own salvation, and to do good in the world — for the effort is often attended with sacrifice, toil, and tears. The joy of heaven will be more than a compensation for all this. The following remarks by Dr. Thomson (Land and the Book, vol. i., pp. 118, 119) will furnish an illustration of the meaning of this passage: “I never saw people sowing in tears exactly, but have often known them to do it in fear and distress sufficient to draw them from any eye. In seasons of great scarcity, the poor peasants part in sorrow with every measure of precious seed cast into the ground. It is like taking bread out of the mouths of their children; and in such times many bitter tears are actually shed over it. The distress is frequently so great that government is obliged to furnish seed, or none would be sown. Ibrahim Pasha did this more than once within my remembrance, copying the example, perhaps, of his great predecessor in Egypt when the seven years' famine was ended. The thoughts of this psalm may likewise have been suggested by the extreme danger which frequently attends the farmer in his plowing and sowing. The calamity which fell upon the farmers of Job when the oxen were plowing, and the donkeys feeding beside them, and the Sabeans fell upon them and took them away, and slew the servants with the edge of the sword (<sup>K&O14</sup>Job 1:14,15), is often repeated in our day. To understand this, you must remember what I just told you about the situation of the arable lands in the open country; and here again we meet that verbal accuracy: the sower goes forth — that is, from the village. The people of Ibel and Khiem, in Merj 'Aiyun, for example, have their best grain-growing fields down in the 'Ard Huleh, six or eight miles from their homes, and just that much nearer the lawless border of the desert. When the country is disturbed, or the government weak, they cannot sow these lands except at the risk of their lives. Indeed, they always go forth in large companies, and completely armed, ready to drop the plow and seize the musket at a moment's warning; and yet, with all this care, many sad and fatal calamities overtake the people who must thus sow in tears. And still another origin may be found for the thoughts of the psalm in the extreme difficulty of the work itself in many places. The soil is rocky, impracticable, overgrown with sharp thorns; and it costs much painful toil to break up and gather out the rocks, cut and burn the briars, and to subdue the stubborn soil, especially with their feeble oxen and insignificant plows. Join all these together, and the sentiment is very forcibly brought out, that he who labors hard, in cold and in rain, in fear and danger, in poverty and in want, casting his precious seed in the ground, will surely come again, at harvest-time, with rejoicing, and bearing his sheaves with him."

APPENDIX NOTES ON PSALM 126

The first colony of exiles had returned to Palestine. The permission to return had been so unexpected, the circumstances which had led to it so wonderful and so unforeseen, that when it came it could hardly be believed. To those who found themselves actually restored to the land of their fathers it seemed like a dream. It was a joy beyond all words to utter. God, their fathers' God, had indeed performed for them, and even the pagan had recognized his hand.

It is with these thoughts that this beautiful psalm opens. But, after all, what was that little band of settlers which formed the first caravan? It was but as the trickling of a tiny rill in some desert waste. Hence, the prayer bursts from the lip of the psalmist, Bring back our captives like mighty streams, which, swollen by the wintry rains, descend to fertilize the parched and desolate wilderness. Then comes the thought of the many discouragements and opposition which the first settlers had to encounter; it was a time of sowing in tears (<sup><5041></sup>Ezra 4:11-24). Still faith could expect a joyful harvest. He who had restored them to the land would assuredly crown his work with blessing. — Perowne.

NOTES ON PSALM 127

This psalm is entitled “A Song of Degrees for Solomon;” in the margin, “Of Solomon.” In the Syriac Version the title is, “From the Psalms of the Ascent; spoken by David concerning Solomon; it was spoken also of Haggai and Zechariah, who urged the rebuilding of the Temple.” The meaning of the title may be either “for Solomon,” or of Solomon; that is, it may have been either composed by him, or with reference to him. Many have supposed that it was written by David near the close of his life, and was designed to be a guide to Solomon, his successor, in regard to the principles which should govern him in his reign. There is nothing, however, in the title in the Hebrew which would indicate that it was composed by David; and there is nothing in the psalm which would seem to be especially appropriate to address to a young monarch just entering on his reign, unless it was the mere file of dependence on God. The allusion to children (<sup><BCTB></sup>Psalm 127:3-5), beautiful and proper as it is, would seem to have no particular pertinency to an entrance on the administration of a government, and would not be the topic which would most naturally be suggested in such circumstances. The probability, therefore, is, that the psalm was composed by Solomon. On what occasion, however, it was written, it is now impossible to determine. The sentiments and style are such as agree well with the idea that Solomon was the author, and the whole psalm might have been introduced into the Book of Proverbs without any manifest discrepancy with the general character and style of that book. From the psalm itself it would seem that it was composed mainly with reference to one who was entering on domestic life, and that it was intended to set before such a one the views which ought to guide him, or the thoughts which ought to occur to him. Nothing could be more appropriate in such circumstances than the sentiments of the psalm:

- I. The entire dependence on God for success, <sup><BCTB></sup>Psalm 127:1.
- II. The vanity of all efforts — rising early, and sitting up late — without the divine blessing, <sup><BCTB></sup>Psalm 127:2.
- III. The fact that children belong to God, and are to be regarded as his, <sup><BCTB></sup>Psalm 127:3.

IV. The aid which children might be expected to render to a father in supporting or defending him, <sup><BCT0></sup>Psalm 127:4.

V. The comfort which he might expect to derive from them, and the honor which, being properly trained, they would reflect on him and on the family, <sup><BCT0></sup>Psalm 127:5.

<sup><BCT0></sup>Psalm 127:1. Except the LORD build the house Or rather, “a house.” The word “house” may refer either to an ordinary dwelling; to the temple, as a place of worship; or to a family, with reference to its success and prosperity, as the word house is often used now. The statement is universal, and is designed to indicate a universal dependence on God in human undertakings, though it is not improbable that there may have been an allusion, when the psalm was composed, to some building which was contemplated or commenced. If the psalm was a composition of David or Solomon, the allusion may have been to the temple about to be erected. The language, however, is so general as to be applicable to any enterprise of that kind.

They labor in vain that build it literally, “In vain toil its builders in it.” The idea is, that they are entirely dependent on God. No matter what their skill, their strength, their industry may be — all will be in vain unless God shall assist them. They are dependent on Him for life, for health, for strength, for practical wisdom, for a disposition to continue their work, and for success in it. Their work might be destroyed by fire, by a tempest, by an earthquake, or by an irruption of enemies; and for the result, therefore, they are entirely dependent on God.

Except the LORD keep the city The same idea of dependence is here repeated in another form. The preservation of a city depends wholly on God, whatever care or precaution may be used.

The watchman waketh but in vain literally, “In vain waketh the keeper.” The word rendered waketh means to be sleepless; and then, to watch. The allusion is to the watch or guard appointed to keep a city, and the idea is, that, whatever may be the diligence, the care, the fidelity of one thus appointed to guard a city, its safe-keeping must depend on God alone. Fires may break out in spite of the watchmen; a tempest may sweep over it; bands of armed people may assail it; or the pestilence may suddenly come into it, and spread desolation through its dwellings. There may have been an allusion in this to some immediate arrangement for guarding Jerusalem when the psalm was composed; but the remark is so general that it is not necessary to confine it to that. It is universally true that, after all the care for their own preservation which people can employ, their safety depends wholly on God.

Psalm 127:2. It is vain for you to rise up early The psalmist does not here say that it is improper to rise early; or that there could be no advantage in it; or that people would be more likely to be successful in their undertakings if they did not rise early; but that, although this was done, they would be still altogether dependent on God. Mere early rising, without his blessing, would not secure what they hoped to accomplish, for everything is still in the hand of God. Health, strength, clearness of mind, and success, are all under his control; and though early rising may tend to produce all these — as it does in fact — yet still people are not the less dependent on God for success.

To sit up late That you may labor or study. As in the former case the psalmist does not express any opinion about the propriety or impropriety of early rising, so it is in respect to this. He merely says that if it is done, this, of itself, will not accomplish the object; people are still dependent on God for success though they do it. As a matter of fact, however, sitting up late has less tendency to promote success in life than early rising; but in either case there is the same dependence on God.

To eat the bread of sorrows Bread of care, anxiety, or trouble; that is, bread earned or procured by the severity of toil. There may be an allusion here to the original sentence pronounced on man, <sup><ORIG></sup>Genesis 3:17. The meaning is, that it is in vain that you labor hard, that you exhaust your strength, in order to get bread to eat, unless God shall bless you. After all your toil the result is with him.

For so he giveth his beloved sleep The word “for” is not in the original. The sentence is very obscure in the connection in which it stands. The Septuagint and Latin Vulgate render it, “Ye who eat the bread of care — rise when you have rested — when he hath given his beloved sleep.” Some have supposed it to mean that God gives his people rest without toil, or that, while others labor, his “beloved” — his friends — sleep; but this interpretation is not necessarily demanded by the Hebrew, and is inconsistent with the general doctrine of the Bible. Others have supposed the idea to be, that God gives his beloved rest after labor; but though this is true, it is not true of them especially or exclusively. Some suppose, with as little probability, that the meaning is, that what others hope (but hope in vain) to get by labor, the Lord bestows upon his people in sleep, they know not how. The meaning evidently is, that God bestows “sleep” upon his people in some sense in which it is not bestowed on others, or that there is, in regard to their case, something in which they differ from those who are so anxious and troubled — who rise so early for the sake of gain — who toil so late — who eat the bread of care. The idea seems to be that there would be calmness, repose, freedom from anxiety or solicitude. God makes the mind of his people — his beloved — calm and tranquil, while the world around is filled with anxiety and restlessness — busy, bustling, worried. As a consequence of this calmness of mind, and of their confidence in him, they enjoy undisturbed repose at night. They are not kept wakeful and anxious about their worldly affairs as other men are, for they leave all with God, and thus he “giveth his beloved sleep.” The particle “so” — <sup>43651</sup>Ke — or “thus,” I apprehend, refers to the general sense of what had been said, rather than to what immediately precedes it; to the fact that all success depends on God (<sup>43708</sup>Psalm 127:1), and that it is always by his interposition, and not as the result of human skill, toil, or fatigue, that people find calmness, success, repose. It is only by the favor of God, and by their recognizing their dependence on him, that they find repose, success, and freedom from care.

<sup>43708</sup>Psalm 127:3. Lo, children are an heritage of the LORD They are an inheritance derived from the Lord. They are bestowed by him as really as success is in building a house, or in guarding a city. The idea is, that everything which we value, or which we desire, is a gift from God, and is to be received as from him, and to be acknowledged as his gift. The general idea here, as in the previous verses, is that of entire dependence on God.

And the fruit of the womb is his reward Or rather, “a reward;” that is, they are of the nature of a reward for a life of devotion to God; they are among the blessings which God promises, and are evidences of his favor. Our translation by inserting the words “is his” obscures the sense, as if the meaning were that they belong to God as his “reward” for what he does for us. The reverse of this is the true idea — that they are a blessing with which he rewards or favors his people. Of course, this is not universally true, but the promise is a general one, in accordance with the usual promises in the Bible in regard to the result of piety. Children are to be reckoned among the divine favors bestowed on us, and for their lives, their health, their virtues, and the happiness derived from them, we are, as in other things, dependent on him — as in building a house, in guarding a city, or in the rest and comfort derived from toil.

Psalm 127:4. As arrows are in the hand of a mighty man They are what a parent may rely on for defense in danger, or for help in securing provision for himself and family — as the warrior or the hunter relies on his arrows.

So are children of the youth Sons in their youth; in their prime and vigor. The comparison of sons with arrows or spears is common in Arabic poetry. See Rosenmuller, Com. in loc. Also Morgenland, in loc.

Psalm 127:5. Happy is the man Hebrew, The happiness of the man. See the notes at Psalm 1:1.

That hath his quiver full of them The quiver is a case in which arrows are carried; and as a man — a hunter or warrior — feels secure when he has his quiver full of arrows, so a man is blessed in proportion to the number of his sons. This is in accordance with the idea often presented in the Bible, and the promise often made there of a numerous posterity as a proof of the divine favor.

They shall not be ashamed They shall not turn back discomfited, hanging their heads with shame and confusion. See the notes at Job 6:20.

But they shall speak with the enemies in the gate Margin, “shall subdue, or destroy.” The Hebrew word, however, means “to speak;” and the meaning is, that they would “speak” to their foes in the place of conflict — for a battle occurred often in the gate of a city, as the possession of a gate, or an entrance to a city was of so much importance to those who attacked, and those who defended it. The idea is, that they would speak with effect; they would distinguish themselves; they would let their presence be known. The connection does not allow us to understand this of forensic controversy, or of transactions in business, though these were usually performed at the gates of cities. The meaning is, that they would do honor to the family, and gratify the heart of the parent, by their valor in defending their city and home, or in attacking the cities of the enemies of their country. The psalm is designed to inculcate the lesson of dependence on God for success in everything.

APPENDIX NOTES ON PSALM 127

Two psalms bear Solomon's name. One of these is the hundred and twenty-seventh ... Some recent critics throw doubt on the trustworthiness of the superscription. But most people will judge that this must be in virtue of some foregone conclusion, and will agree with Luther, Calvin, and the generality of the older commentators, in thinking that the psalm is so exactly in the manner of the wise author of the Proverbs, that we need not hesitate to attribute it to his pen. It is the lyrical expression of thoughts which run through the "dark sayings" of that book. The first part of it, for instance, is a beautiful reproduction of ~~2002~~ Proverbs 10:22:

"The blessing of the Lord, it maketh rich, and he addeth no sorrow with it;"

and the correspondence is still closer if we translate the latter clause, as many do, "And sorrowful toil addeth nothing to it." Familiar as the proverb has become in the speech of every Christian nation, the psalm is yet more familiar. From it the pious builders of a former generation borrowed the NISI DOMINUS FRUSTRA, which may be read on the lintels of houses in our older streets. An admirable confession of faith to be made by any man who is called to be a builder in church or commonwealth! It is the Lord's blessing that builds the house and keeps the town; that fills the house with the stir of children, and peoples the town with valiant sons, who, with unabashed brow, will speak with the enemies in the gate. — Binnie.

~~1870~~ Psalm 127:2. For so he giveth his beloved sleep Even so he giveth (it) to his beloved in sleep. EVEN (so), nearly equivalent to "the very self-same thing." He giveth (it), that is, bread, the necessaries of life, in sleep. What others obtain only with such wearing toil, such constant effort, with so much disappointment and so much sorrow, God gives to the mart whom he loves, as it were while he sleeps, that is, without all this anxiety and exertion. This is the interpretation now perhaps commonly adopted, but it seems to me very questionable (though I accepted it in the first edition), for the following reasons:

(1), It is necessary to supply "bread," not "bread of sorrows," in this clause; and

(2), I am not satisfied that the rendering of the accusative "in sleep" is justifiable. ... I am inclined, therefore, to prefer the rendering, "So he giveth his beloved sleep," though it is no doubt difficult to explain the reference of the particle "so." I suppose it refers to the principle laid down in the previous verses, there being a tacit comparison, "as all labor is vain without God's providence, so he gives the man who loves him and leaves all in his hands, calm refreshing sleep."

There is no discouragement here, it is needless to say, to honest labor. It is undue anxiety, a feverish straining, a toiling, as if toil of itself could command success, the folly of which is condemned. Compare for a similar sentiment ~~<1002>~~ Proverbs 10:22, "The blessing of Jehovah maketh rich, and toil can add nothing thereto." The teaching is that of our Lord in the Sermon on the Mount, ~~<1065>~~ Matthew 6:25-34; see ~~<2001>~~ Luke 10:41; ~~<1087>~~ 1 Peter 5:7. God's beloved are not exempted from the great law of labor which lies upon all, but the sting is taken from it when they can leave all results in a Father's hand, with absolute trust in his wisdom and goodness. — Perowne.

The last clause of the verse may be thus rendered: He giveth his beloved in sleep. What other men are anxiously toiling for, day and night, the pious receive from God while they are sleeping. We prefer this translation. It is more in harmony with the leading principle of the psalm. And there seems, moreover, a marked allusion to Solomon himself. Solomon was called Jedidiah, which signifies the beloved of the Lord; and it was during sleep that the divine blessing was conferred. He had asked for wisdom alone, and God said,

"And I have also given thee that which thou hast not asked, both riches and honor; so that there shall not be any among the kings like unto thee all thy days"

The thought thus modified is extremely beautiful. God is working for his people even when they are asleep. The people of the world are toiling and struggling, laboring night and day, as if they were slaves, and with what pitiable results! But Yahweh showers rich benedictions on his beloved ones in sleep. They act to the best of their judgment; they labor without distraction of spirit; and they leave the issues in the hands of Him from whom comes down every good and every perfect gift. They lie down with a feeling of security; and while their senses are steeped in forgetfulness, and the calm slumbers are recruiting their strength for the duties of another day, God is working for them all the time, and is blessing the fruits of their honest industry. A general of Athens was uncommonly successful in several engagements. A painter who supposed that these successes were more owing to good fortune than to his abilities, represented him as sound asleep under a tree, while the goddess of liberty was twining the laurels around his brow. And so the good man sleeps: but the Shepherd of Israel sleeps not. His eye is upon him every moment; his hand is working for him all the night long as well as during the day, and crowning his efforts with success. Beyond all contradiction, he giveth his beloved in sleep. — Pilgrim Psalms.

Psalm 127:3. Lo, children are an heritage of the Lord ... The psalmist's description is a very bright one (in Psalm 128 namely). But there is another side to the picture. Domestic life has its share of the sorrows and anxieties that belong to this sin-stricken world. The birth of children not seldom is itself the occasion of anxiety: for how are they to be fed and clothed? Another family song has been provided to meet this case. Psalm 127 is the complement of Psalm 128 ... Children are the Lord's gift; and parents may trust in him that, if they do their duty, he who sends mouths will send meat to fill them. Prudent industry ought not to be suffered to degenerate into unbelieving anxiety about the future.

These domestic psalms caused sore perplexity to the early fathers. For the notion already referred to, that conjugal life is essentially earthly in its spirit and incompatible with a high style of godliness, early came to prevail, and engendered that false and dangerous estimation of celibacy which ultimately brought forth its fruit in the monastic institutions of the Greek and Latin churches. Even Chrysostom and Augustine were not superior to this weakness. The latter divine, in expounding the psalms before us, explains away the obvious and natural sense of the words, and turns them into an allegory. The wife is the church; for is not the spouse of Christ a vine from Egypt — a fruitful vine? The olive plants are the children of Zion: and so forth. Much can be said, no doubt, in extenuation of the error of these great men. It was an error, nevertheless, and has done much mischief. Of the many services which the world owes to the reformers, not the least valuable was their reinstating of the family in its long-forgotten honors. Luther, in particular, vindicated the truth of God on this subject with incomparable power. His marriage was intended to be a protest against the doctrine which attributed a special sanctity to single life, and a solemn declaration of his belief that the wedded life of Christians is holy; and the testimony was not thrown away. Of the four bass-reliefs that adorn the great Luther Monument just erected at Worms, one perpetuates the memory of the day on which the reformer gave his hand to Catherine Von Bora, and expresses the sense entertained by the German nation of the value of the example which he then set to his countrymen and to all Christendom. It deserves to be mentioned that Luther's high estimate of the dignity of the family was mightily fortified by the psalms, especially by the two which we have quoted. He wrote separate commentaries on them, in which he did ample justice to their natural and obvious sense. Thus, people's minds were opened to perceive that the monastic idea of a religious life is a very different one indeed from that of the holy prophets and psalmists. — Binnie.

NOTES ON PSALM 128

The author of this psalm is unknown, as is also the occasion on which it was composed. It is not known, either, why this psalm was placed among those which are called “Songs of Degrees.” The scope and design of it, however, cannot be misunderstood. It is intended to show the advantage of religion on the affairs of this life, and especially on the domestic relations; in a numerous family, in the character of children, and in being permitted to see numerous descendants. In connection with this, the possessor of true religion would be permitted to see the prosperity of Zion — the good of Jerusalem, and peace upon Israel. Of course this is to be regarded as a general statement, or as indicating what will commonly be true as the result of religion. See the notes at <sup><B30></sup>Psalm 37:9,33; 112:2,3. Thus industry, temperance, prudence, tend to promote health and long life, so that health and a long life are the general result; but it would be unfair to regard one who should assert this as meaning to say that it is universally true, or that people who are industrious, temperate, and prudent, are never sick, and never die.

The psalm states, in general (<sup><B30></sup>Psalm 128:1), the blessedness of those who fear the Lord. This blessedness is seen

- (1) in their success in life, <sup><B30></sup>Psalm 128:2;
- (2) in a numerous and happy family, <sup><B30></sup>Psalm 128:3;
- (3) in being permitted to see children’s children, <sup><B30></sup>Psalm 128:6;
- (4) in being permitted to see the prosperity of religion — the “good of Jerusalem,” and “peace upon Israel,” <sup><B30></sup>Psalm 128:5,6.

That walketh in his ways The ways which God commands or directs. On the word “walketh,” see the notes at <sup><B30></sup>Psalm 1:1.

<sup><B30></sup>Psalm 128:2. For thou shalt eat the labor of thine hands Thou shalt enjoy the avails of thy labor; thou shalt be secure in thy rights. See the notes at <sup><B30></sup>Isaiah 3:10. This is a general promise respecting the prosperity which religion affords. If all people were truly religious, this would be universal, so far as man is concerned. Property would be secure; and, except so far as abundant harvests might be prevented by the direct providence of God — by blight, and mildew, and storms, and drought — all people would enjoy undisturbed the avails of their labor. Slavery, whereby one man is compelled to labor for another, would come to an end; every one who is now a slave would “eat the labor of his own hands;” and property would no more be swept away by war, or become the prey of robbers and freebooters. Religion, if it prevailed universally, would produce universal security in our rights.

AGED TREE SKETCHED BY XONG OEN.

Happy shalt thou be, and it shall be well with thee literally, “Happy thou, and well with thee.” That is, happiness and security would be the consequence of true religion.

Psalm 128:3. Thy wife shall be as a fruitful vine by the sides of thine house It is not uncommon in the East, as elsewhere, to train a vine along the sides of a house — partly to save ground; partly because it is a good exposure for fruit; partly as an ornament; and partly to protect it from thieves. Such a vine, in its beauty, and in the abundant clusters upon it, becomes a beautiful emblem of the mother of a numerous household. One of the blessings most desired and most valued in the East was a numerous posterity, and this, in the case of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, was among the chief blessings which God promised to them — a posterity that should resemble in number the sands of the sea or the stars of heaven. Compare Genesis 15:5; 22:17; 32:12. These two things — the right to the avails of one’s labor (Psalm 128:2), and a numerous family — are the blessings which are first specified as constituting the happiness of a pious household.

Thy children like olive plants round about thy table Compare the notes at Psalm 52:8. Beautiful; producing abundance; sending up young plants to take the place of the old when they decay and die. The following extract and preceding cut from “The land and Book,” vol. i., pp. 76, 77, will furnish a good illustration of this passage:

“To what particular circumstance does David refer in the 128th Psalm, where he says, Thy children shall be like oliveplants round about thy table? Follow me into the grove, and I will show you what may have suggested the comparison. Here we have lilt upon a beautiful illustration. This aged and decayed tree is surrounded, as you see, by several young and thrifty shoots, which spring from the root of the venerable parent. They seem to uphold, protect, and embrace it. We may even fancy that they now bear that load of fruit which would otherwise be demanded of the feeble parent. Thus do good and affectionate children gather round the table of the righteous. Each contributes something to the common wealth and welfare of the whole — a beautiful sight, with which may God refresh the eyes of every friend of mine.”

Psalm 128:4. Behold, that thus shall the man be blessed ... As if he had said, “Look upon this picture. See the farmer cultivating his fields; see him gathering in the grain; see him at his own table calmly, quietly, and gratefully enjoying the fruit of his toil. Look upon that picture of a happy family — numerous, cheerful, beloved — giving promise of upholding the name of the family in future years — and see all this as coming from the Lord — and you have an illustration of the blessedness which follows a religious life.”

Psalm 128:5. The LORD shall bless thee out of Zion Will not merely bless thee in the field and in the house, but will add blessings that seem to come more directly out of Zion, or that seem to be more directly connected with religion: shall bless thee with religious influences in thine own family; shall bless thee by permitting thee to see the growth of the church and the conversion of souls.

And thou shalt see the good of Jerusalem The prosperity, the happiness of Jerusalem: that is, the good of the church; the advancement of pure religion. The Hebrew might be rendered, “And look thou upon the good of Jerusalem” -in the imperative; and, thus rendered, it would be a command to regard, in these circumstances, the welfare of Jerusalem, or the prosperity of the church; but the language will also admit of the other construction, and the connection seems to require it. Thus understood, it is a promise that he who is referred to would be permitted to enjoy a view of the continual prosperity of religion in the world.

All the days of thy life To the very close of life. No higher blessing could be promised to a pious man than that he should see religion always prospering; that the last view which he would have of the world should be the rapid advances of religion; that he should die in a revival of religion.

Psalm 128:6. Yea, thou shalt see thy children's children This is a continuation of the idea of blessedness as connected with a numerous posterity — an object of so much interest to the Hebrews (see the notes at Psalm 128:3), and having its foundation in our nature.

And peace upon Israel See Psalm 125:5. As the crowning blessing; a blessing above that of success in worldly affairs; above that of seeing a numerous and happy posterity. The love of God is the supreme affection in the mind of a pious man; the desire that his cause may prosper and triumph is to him a supreme desire. Man is truly and completely blessed only in religion.

NOTES ON PSALM 129

This psalm is entitled merely "A Song of Degrees." Its author is unknown; and the occasion on which it was written cannot now be ascertained. It is a psalm which would be applicable to many periods of the Jewish history, and it is not of such a nature that it can with certainty be referred to any one of them. There is nothing in it which would forbid us to suppose that it was composed on the return from the Babylonian exile, but there is nothing to fix it definitely to that event. Why it was made one of the "Songs of Degrees" is equally unknown. It merely refers to the fact that Israel had often been roughly and severely treated; and it contains a prayer that those who were the enemies of Zion might be punished in a proper manner. It would seem probable that it was composed during a time of trouble, of war, or of persecution, and that the main purpose of the writer was to refer to the fact that the same thing had often occurred before, and to find consolation and support in that fact. The principle on which it is founded is, that there is nothing to be dreaded as the result of trial, if we have passed through the same form of trial before, and if we have not sunk but have been sustained under it. This furnishes an assurance that the same thing may occur again.

Psalm 129:1. Many a time Margin, as in Hebrew, "much." Probably, however, the idea is, as expressed in our translation, "many a time;" "often." So it is in the Latin Vulgate and the Septuagint; and this accords better with the connection.

Have they afflicted me from my youth Have I been afflicted; have others dealt unjustly by me. The youth here is the beginning. of the history of that people: since we began to be a people; since the nation was founded.

May Israel now say May the nation now say. It is clear from this that the psalm was not written at an early period of their history.

Psalm 129:2. Many a time ... This repetition is designed to fix the thoughts on the fact, and to impress it on the mind. The mind dwells on the fact as important in its bearing on the present occasion or emergency. The idea is, that it is no new thing to be thus afflicted. It has often occurred. It is a matter of long and almost constant experience. Our enemies have often attempted to destroy us, but in vain. What we experience now we have often experienced, and when thus tried we have been as often delivered, and have nothing now therefore to fear. We are not to regard it as a strange thing that we are now afflicted; and we are not to be discouraged or disheartened as if our enemies could overcome us, for they have often tried it in vain. He who has protected us heretofore can protect us still. He who defended us before can defend us now, and the past furnishes an assurance that he will defend us if it is best that we should be protected. It does much to support us in affliction if we can recall to mind the consolations which we had in former trials, and can avail ourselves of the result of past experience in supporting us now.

Yet they have not prevailed against me They have never been able to overcome us. We were safe then in the divine hands; we shall be safe in the same hands now.

Psalm 129:3. The plowers plowed upon my back The comparison here is undoubtedly taken from the “plowing” of land, and the idea is that the sufferings which they had endured were such as would be well represented by a plow passing over a field, tearing up the sod; piercing deep; and producing long rows or furrows. The direct allusion would seem to be to stripes inflicted on the back, as if a plow had been made to pass over it; and the meaning is, that they had been subjected to sufferings as slaves or criminals were when the lash cut deep into the flesh. Probably the immediate thing in the mind of the psalmist was the hard bondage of the children of Israel in Egypt, when they were subjected to all the evils of servitude.

They made long their furrows On my back. The word used here, and rendered “made long” — Ēraē<sup><h748></sup>, means to make long, to prolong, to extend in a right line, and it may be used either in the sense of making long as to extent or space, or making long in regard to time, prolonging. The latter would seem to be the meaning here, as it is difficult to see in what sense it could be said that stripes inflicted on the back could be made long. They might, however, be continued and repeated; the sufferings might be prolonged sufferings as well as deep. It was a work of long-continued oppression and wrong.

Psalm 129:4. The LORD is righteous Righteous in permitting this; righteous in what he has done, and will do, in the treatment of those who inflict such wrongs. We may now safely commit our cause to him in view of what he has done in the past. He was not indifferent then to our sufferings, or deaf to the cries of his people; he interposed and punished the oppressors of his people, and we may trust him still.

He hath cut asunder the cords of the wicked By which they bound us. He did this in our “youth;” when we were oppressed and beaten in Egypt. Then he interposed, and set us free.

Psalm 129:5. Let them all be confounded and turned back ... This might be rendered in the indicative, “they are ashamed,” but the connection seems to require the rendering in our version. It is a prayer that God would now interpose as he had done in former times, and that he would cause all the haters of Zion to be put to shame as formerly.

Psalm 129:6. Let them be as the grass upon the housetops The housetops, or roofs of houses, covered with sand or earth, in which seeds of grass may germinate and begin to grow, but where, as there is no depth of earth, and as the heat of the sun there would be intense, it would soon wither away. See the notes at Isaiah 37:27.

Which withereth afore it groweth up This, even if it has any meaning, is not the meaning of the original. The idea in the Hebrew is — and it is so rendered in the Septuagint, the Latin Vulgate, and by Luther — “which before (one) pulls it, withers.” Grass would wither or dry up, of course, if it were pulled up or cut down, but the grass here spoken of withers even before this is done. It has no depth of earth to sustain it; having sprouted, and begun to grow, it soon dies — a perfect image of feebleness and desolation; of hopes begun only to be disappointed. “This morning” (says Dr. Thomson, “Land and the Book,” vol. ii., p. 574)

“I saw a striking illustration of this most expressive figure. To obtain a good view of the Tyropean, my guide took me to the top of a house on the brow of Zion, and the grass which had grown over the roof during the rainy season was now entirely withered and perfectly dry.”

Psalm 129:7. Wherewith the mower filleth not his hand It cannot be gathered and laid up for the use of cattle, as grass can that grows in the field. It is valueless for any such purpose; or, is utterly worthless. The phrase “filleth not his hand” seems to be derived from the idea of reaping, where the reaper with one hand takes hold of the grain which he reaps, and cuts it off with the sickle in the other.

Nor he that bindeth sheaves The man who gathers in the harvest. This was commonly performed by a different person from the reaper.

His bosom This word would commonly refer to the bosom of the garment, in which tilings were carried; or that part above the girdle. It may be used here, however, in a larger sense — since it is incongruous to suppose that sheaves of grain would be carried thus — as meaning simply that one who gathered the sheaves would usually convey them in his arms, folding them to his bosom.

<sup><1908></sup>Psalm 129:8. Neither do they which go by say, The blessing of the LORD, ... As in a harvest-field, where persons passing by express their joy and gratitude that their neighbors are reaping an abundant harvest. The phrase “The blessing of the Lord be upon you,” was expressive of good wishes; of pious congratulation; of a hope of success and prosperity; as when we say, “God be with you;” or, “God bless you.” The meaning here is, that such language would never be used in reference to the grass or grain growing on the house-top, since it would never justify a wish of that kind: it would be ridiculous and absurd to apply such language to anyone who should be found gathering up that dry; and withered, and worthless grass. So the psalmist prays that it may be in regard to all who hate Zion (<sup><1905></sup>Psalm 129:5), that they may have no such prosperity as would be represented by a growth of luxuriant and abundant grain; no such prosperity as would be denoted by the reaper and the binder of sheaves gathering in such a harvest; no such prosperity as would be indicated by the cheerful greeting and congratulation of neighbors who express their gratification and their joy at the rich and abundant harvest which has crowned the labors of their friend, by the prayer that God would bless him.

We bless you in the name of the LORD Still the language of pious joy and gratification addressed by his neighbors to him who was reaping his harvest. All this is simply language drawn from common life, uttering a prayer that the enemies of Zion might be “confounded and turned back” (<sup><1905></sup>Psalm 129:5); a prayer that they might not be successful in their endeavors to destroy the Church. Such a prayer cannot but be regarded as proper and right.

APPENDIX NOTES ON PSALM 129

The psalm suits perfectly well to the time to which all the nameless pilgrim-songs belong, the period after the return from the exile. At that time the experience related in ~~129~~ Psalm 129:1-4 was far richer than formerly; the youth of the people, according to ~~129~~ Psalm 129:1,2, was long past and gone; and the intermediate position between the deliverance already obtained and the still existing oppression corresponds exactly to the situation of Israel at the period in question. Still it were too much to affirm that the psalm, viewed merely by itself, must of necessity belong to this period. — Hengstenberg.

NOTES ON PSALM 130

This psalm also is entitled “A Song of Degrees.” See the notes at Introduction to Psalm 120. The author and the occasion on which it was composed are unknown, as is also the reason why it was included in this group of psalms.

The language of the psalm seems to be that of an individual; but most interpreters suppose that it is an individual speaking in the name of the nation, and representing its calamities and its penitence. Some have imagined that the person represented as speaking in <sup><13017></sup>Psalm 130:7,8, is a different individual from the one speaking in the other part of the psalm, but there seems to be no ground for this opinion. It is commonly supposed that the psalm had reference to the state of the Jews in the Babylonian captivity, but there is no necessity for limiting it to that period, if indeed it has any reference to the people of Israel. There were many occasions in their history when the language of the psalm would not be less appropriate than at that time. But there is no necessity at all for supposing that it refers to the nation as such. It may be the language of an individual, mourning over his sins, and pleading for mercy, expressing deep conviction of sin, and humble trust in God as the only hope for a convinced, condemned, and penitent sinner. As such, it would represent what has occurred in thousands of cases when sinners have been brought to conviction of sin, and have cried for mercy. Understood in this manner, it is one of the most instructive and touching of the psalms. I know of no reason why it may not be so regarded.

<sup><1301></sup>Psalm 130:1. Out of the depths The word rendered “depths” is from a verb — <sup><13009></sup> q̄mṭe — which means to be deep; then, to be unsearchable; then, to make deep; and it would apply to anything low, deep, or profound, as the ocean, a pit, or a valley. The word used here occurs elsewhere only in the following places: <sup><13012></sup>Psalm 69:2,14, where it is rendered “deep,” applied to waters; and <sup><25110></sup>Isaiah 51:10; <sup><26734></sup>Ezekiel 27:34, where it is rendered “depths.” The word, as used here, would be applicable to deep affliction, dejection, or distress. It would be applicable

(a) to affliction — the depths of sorrow from loss of friends, property, or bodily suffering;

(b) sin — the depths into which the soul is plunged under the consciousness of guilt;

(c) mental trouble — low spirits — melancholy — darkness of mind — loss of comfort in religion — powerful temptation — disappointment — the anguish caused by ingratitude — or sadness of heart in view of the crimes and the sorrows of people — or grief at the coldness, the hardness, the insensibility of our friends to their spiritual condition.

From all these depths of sorrow it is our privilege to call upon the Lord; in those depths of sorrow it is proper thus to implore his help. Often he brings us into these “depths” that we may be led to call upon him; always when we are brought there, we should call upon him.

Have I cried unto thee, O LORD Or rather, “do I now invoke thee,” or call earnestly upon thee. The language does not refer so much to the past as the present. I now cry for mercy; I now implore thy blessing. The condition is that of one who in deep sorrow, or under deep conviction for sin, pleads earnestly that God would have compassion on him.

◀BIB▶ Psalm 130:2. Lord, hear my voice This is the prayer; this is what he cried. It is the language of earnest pleading.

Let thine ears be attentive to the voice of my supplications Do not turn away from me; do not disregard my cry. See the notes at ▶BIB▶ Psalm 5:1.

◀BIB▶ Psalm 130:3. If thou, LORD, shouldest mark iniquities If thou shouldst observe, note, attend to, regard all the evil that I have done. The Hebrew word means properly to keep, to watch, to guard. The word, as used here, refers to that kind of vigilance or watchfulness which one is expected to manifest who is on guard; who keeps watch in a city or camp by night. The idea is, If God should thus look with a scrutinizing eye; if he should try to see all that he could see; if he should suffer nothing to escape his observation; if he should deal with us exactly as we are; if he should overlook nothing, forgive nothing, we could have no hope.

Who shall stand? Who shall stand upright? Who could stand before thee? Who could hope to be acquitted? This implies

(1) that the petitioner was conscious of guilt, or knew that he was a sinner;

(2) that he felt there was a depth of depravity in his heart which God could see, but which he did not — as every man must be certain that there is in his own soul;

(3) that God had the power of bringing that to light if he chose to do it, so that the guilty man would be entirely overwhelmed;

(4) that he who urged the prayer rested his only hope on the fact that God would not mark iniquity; would not develop what was in him; would not judge him by what he saw in his heart; but would deal with him otherwise, and show him mercy and compassion.

Every man must feel that if God should “mark iniquity” as it is — if he should judge us as we are — we could have no hope. It is only on the ground that we may be forgiven, that we can hope to come before him.

Psalm 130:4. But there is forgiveness with thee The Septuagint renders this ἰλασμος <sup><12434></sup>, propitiation, reconciliation; the Latin Vulgate “propitiatio,” propitiation. The Hebrew word means “pardon.” The idea is, that sin may be forgiven; or, that God is a Being who does pardon sin, and that this is the only ground of hope. When we come before God, the ground of our hope is not that we can justify ourselves; not that we can prove we have not sinned; not that we can explain our sins away; not that we can offer an apology for them; it is only in a frank and full confession, and in a hope that God will forgive them. He who does not come in this manner can have no hope of acceptance with God.

That thou mayest be feared That thou mayest be revered; or, that men may be brought to serve and worship thee — may be brought to a proper reverence for thy name. The idea is, not that pardon produces fear or terror — for the very reverse is true — but that God, by forgiving the sinner, brings him to reverence him, to worship him, to serve him: that is, the sinner is truly reconciled to God, and becomes a sincere worshipper. The offender is so pardoned that he is disposed to worship and honor God, for God has revealed himself as one who forgives sin, in order that the sinner may be encouraged to come to him, and be his true worshipper.

Psalm 130:5. I wait for the LORD That is, in this state of distress and trouble — from these “depths” of woe, and sorrow, and conviction of sin. This implies two things:

(1) that he had no other dependence;

(2) that his soul was actually in a waiting posture, or that he actually looked to the Lord for his interposition.

My soul doth wait I wait, with all my soul and heart.

And in his word do I hope In his promise. I believe that he will fulfill that promise, and that I shall find a gracious answer to my prayers. Under conviction for sin, under deep sorrow and distress of any kind, this is the only hope of man. If God does not interpose, there is no deliverer; that he will interpose we may feel assured, if we come to him with a humble, a believing, and a penitent heart.

◀1016 Psalm 130:6. My soul waiteth for the Lord more than they that watch for the morning More intently; more anxiously. The Septuagint and Latin Vulgate render this, “My soul hopeth in the Lord from the morning watch until night.” The idea is that of watchers — night guards — who look anxiously for the break of day that they may be relieved. It is not that of persons who simply look for the return of day, but of those who are on guard — or it may be who watch beside the sick or the dying — and who look out on the east to mark the first indications of returning light. To them the night seems long; they are weary, and want repose; all around is cheerless, gloomy, and still; and they long for the first signs that light will again visit the world. Thus in affliction — the long, dark, dreary, gloomy night of sorrow — the sufferer looks for the first indication, the first faint ray of comfort to the soul. Thus under deep conviction for sin, and deep apprehension of the wrath of God — that night, dark, dreary, gloomy, often long — the soul looks for some ray of comfort, some intimation that God will be merciful, and will speak peace and pardon.

I say, more than they that watch for the morning Margin, which watch unto the morning. The translation in the text best expresses the sense. There is something exceedingly beautiful and touching in this language of repetition, though it is much enfeebled by the words which our translators have inserted, “I say, more than.” The Hebrew is, “more than they that watch for the morning — watch for the morning,” as if the mind dwelt upon the words as better expressing its own anxious state than any other words could do. Everyone who has been afflicted will feel the force of this; every one who has been under conviction of sin, and who has felt himself in danger of suffering the wrath of God, will remember how anxiously he longed for mercy, for light, for peace, for some indication, even the most faint, like the first ray which breaks in the east, that his soul would find mercy and peace.

Psalm 130:7. Let Israel hope in the LORD In such circumstances of affliction and distress, let not the people of God despair. In the darkest night, in calamities deep and prolonged, let not those who love God despair. The morning will dawn; the light will break in the east; deliverance and joy will come. The Hebrew here is, “Trust, O Israel, in the Lord.” The design of the Psalmist seems to be, from his own experience, to persuade others — the afflicted people of God — to put their trust in Him in whom he had himself hoped. From the very depths of affliction, guilt, and almost despair, he had looked to the Lord: encouraged and persuaded by his example, he would now entreat the people of God everywhere and always, in like manner, to trust him.

For with the LORD there is mercy He is merciful, and in his mercy we may trust.

And with him is plenteous redemption It is ample; it is full; it abounds. It is not limited; it is not exhausted; it cannot be exhausted. So we may always feel when we come before God, that his mercy is ample for all the needs of all the sinful and the suffering; that the provisions of his grace are unexhausted and inexhaustible. Applying this, as we may, to the work of the Saviour, we may feel that the redemption which is in him is adequate to the needs of a world, and that although numberless million have been saved by it, yet that it is still as rich, as full, and as free as it was in the beginning; as the ocean, though from the beginning of the world it has supplied the materials for rain and dew to water the hills, the vales, the continents, and the islands, is still full; as the light of the sun, though for thousands of ages it has poured its light on the planets, and on all the vast space between itself and those orbs, and has sent out its light into the vast regions beyond, still shines with undiminished splendor, and pours its floods of day and of glory on all those worlds.

Psalm 130:8. And he shall redeem Israel from all his iniquities His people. He will completely deliver them from the power and the pollution of sin. This will ultimately be accomplished in reference to his whole church, and to every true member of that church. This was the highest object before the mind of the psalmist — that with which the psalm appropriately closes. And this is the highest object before the mind of every true child of God — that he may be completely and forever delivered from the power and the dominion of sin. This will be perfectly accomplished in heaven only; but there and then the bliss will be complete. The psalm begins with an earnest cry from the “depths;” it closes with the triumphant hope of complete and eternal deliverance. There is one world where there is no occasion to cry to God from the “depths” of sorrow and of sin.

APPENDIX NOTES ON PSALM 130

When Luther, in the year 1530, was in the fortress of Coburg, on four occasions during the night there seemed to pass before his eyes burning torches, and this was followed by a severe headache. One night he saw three blazing torches come in at the window of his room, and he swooned away. His servant, coming to his assistance, poured oil of almonds into his ear, and rubbed his feet with hot napkins. As soon as he recovered he bade him read to him a portion of the Epistle to the Galatians, and during the reading fell asleep. The danger was over, and when he awoke he cried out joyfully, “Come, to spite the devil, let us sing the psalm, De profundis, in four parts.”

Being asked on one occasion which were the best psalms, he replied, “The Pauline psalms,” and being pressed to say which they were, he answered: “Psalm 32; Psalm 51; Psalm 130; Psalm 143. For they teach us that the forgiveness of sins is vouchsafed to them that believe without the law and without works; therefore they are Pauline psalms; and when David sings, ‘With thee is forgiveness, that thou mayest be feared,’ so Paul likewise saith, ‘God hath concluded all under sin, that he may have mercy on all.’ Therefore none can boast of his own righteousness, but the words, ‘That thou mayest be feared,’ thrust away all self-merit, teach us to take off our hat before God and confess, “gratis est, non meritum, remissio non satisfactio” — it is all forgiveness, and no merit.” — Delitzsch in “Perowne.”

What is the great object to be accomplished by this remission of sin? It is the creation of piety. “That thou mayest be feared.” This fear, being the result of pardon, cannot be the fear of punishment ... It is the reverence which a loving child has to a kind father: it is the reverence which is formed in the soul of the pardoned sinner as he contemplates the holy character of that God who has forgiven him, and muses upon that tremendous sacrifice through which his redemption has been achieved ...

The principle here laid down is a simple one. There is no true piety, there is no sacred fear of God, there is no genuine worship, there is no loving obedience until the pardon has been granted. We must ever begin with the remission of sins. The idea of the divine justice, viewed apart from the divine mercy, inspires the criminal with terror, and fills him with still deeper hatred against God. It is only when the sinner views God in Christ, reconciling the world unto himself, not imputing their trespasses unto them, that he is attracted toward him, melts in submission, and acquires a sacred fear of offending him. How, indeed, can it be otherwise? You must first convince me that God loves me before I can love him. You must first convince me that he is willing to pardon me before, I can solicit his forgiveness. You must first convince me that he has removed from me this awful load of guilt, and will never place it on again, before I can serve him with a free and cheerful heart. You must first convince me that he has adopted me into his family before I can give him the affection and the obedience of a son ... First forgiveness, then fear: first pardon, then piety: first justification, then sanctification: first the heart, then the life: first make the tree good, and then you will get good fruit. This is the divine plan, and nothing can be conceived more rational. But sin has introduced such disorder into the mental faculties that people do not perceive the gospel to be the manifold wisdom of God; and they turn away from it with a kind of instinctive abhorrence. Hence, all perversions of the gospel reverse the divine order, and insist upon placing the effect before the cause ... It is just because people will not accept the simple, unencumbered, philosophical plan of God, that so many and such fatal mistakes are committed in religion. "We love him, because he first loved us."

"The love of Christ constraineth us; because we thus judge, that if one died for all, then were all dead: and that he died for all, that they who live should not henceforth live unto themselves but unto him who died for them, and rose again." — "Pilgrim Psalms."

NOTES ON PSALM 131

This brief psalm is entitled "A Song of Degrees of David." There is nothing in it to forbid the idea that it was composed by him, for it is wholly in his spirit and manner. It is not known, however, on what occasion it was written, nor why it has a place among the "Songs of Degrees." It would seem to have been prepared on some occasion when the author had been charged with being of a lofty and proud spirit; with meddling in matters that were above him, or above his condition in life; or with making such suggestions about public affairs as were considered to indicate a self-confident, or an aspiring mind. Without being able to determine this by any certain facts, the supposition which would seem most to accord with the contents of the psalm would be that it was written when he was a young man; when he had expressed, in the presence of others, some sentiments on public affairs which were interpreted by them as denoting a forward and self-confident spirit. If so, then this psalm was probably a private meditation on what he had done, and was of the nature of a personal examination of his spirit and motives. Knowing, as we do, what David was afterward — his great talents as a warrior and a king, and his ability to manage public affairs — it would not, in itself, be strange or improbable that, in early life, and even when a shepherdboy, he might have advanced opinions which would be regarded as beyond his age, as unbecoming his condition, and as manifesting a disposition to meddle with matters above him; and that he might have been rebuked for this. If it were so, we may suppose that a pious and a modest youth would give himself to self-examination, to determine whether that was the spirit which actuated him, and this psalm may have been the result of such an examination: a deep self-consciousness that such was not the spirit which influenced him; that these were not the motives which prompted him to do what he had done. The psalm, therefore, may, perhaps, without impropriety, be regarded as furnishing evidence of the early manifestation of a disposition on the part of David to study public affairs, and of an early manifestation of a knowledge on that subject which was regarded as above his years and his station; and, at the same time, of his readiness to profit by rebuke, and to examine his real motives; and of his consciousness that he was not actuated by self-confident and aspiring views. The psalm manifests a humble spirit, and a spirit of confident trust in God. If the interpretation thus suggested could be confirmed — or if it may be allowed — the psalm would be one of the most valuable records of the early life and character of David. It would add to the interest of this conjecture, if we might suppose that this psalm was left among the effusions of his early years — among, as we should say, his “private papers,” and was discovered after he was dead, and was then arranged and published among these “Songs of Degrees.”

~~◀~~Psalm 131:1. LORD, my heart is not haughty Though this is charged upon me; though I may have said things which seem to imply it; though this might appear a just inference from my conduct — yet I am conscious that this is not my real character. What I have said was not the result of ambition.

Nor mine eyes lofty I am conscious that I am not ambitious and aspiring — as I am accused of being. What I have said is not the result of such a feeling, nor should such a charge be brought against me.

Neither do I exercise myself Margin, as in Hebrew, walk. I do not walk about among such things; I do not pry into them; I do not meddle with them. What I have said or done is not, as has been said concerning me, the result of a meddlesome and interfering spirit. It may seem to be so; my own consciousness tells me it is not so. The interpretation put upon my conduct may be natural; but I am conscious to myself that it is not the right interpretation.

In great matters, or in things too high for me Margin, as in Hebrew, wonderful. The word wonderful would apply to matters suited to excite astonishment by their vastness, or their unusual nature — as prodigies or miracles; and then, great and lofty truths. It would apply also to things which might be regarded as far above the capacity of a child, or of one in obscure life, and with slight advantages of education; and, as above suggested, it may have been the accusation brought against him, that, in respect to public matters, matters of state — or to the more elevated doctrines of religion — he had manifested a spirit unbecoming one in early years, and of humble rank, and that this indicated a desire to meddle with matters which he could not understand, and which could not pertain to him. He was conscious, he says, that he was not actuated by that spirit.

~~◀~~Psalm 131:2. Surely I have behaved and quieted myself Margin, as in Hebrew, my soul. The Hebrew is, “If I have not soothed and quieted my soul.” This is a strong mode of affirming that he had done it. The negative form is often thus used to denote a strong affirmation. The full form would be, “God knows if I have not done this;” or, “If I have not done this, then let me bear the consequences; let me be punished.” The idea is that he was conscious he had done this. Instead of being arrogant, proud, and ambitious — instead of meddling with matters above him, and which did not belong to him, he had known his proper place. He had been gentle, calm, retiring. The word rendered behaved means properly to be even or level; then, in the form used here, to make even, smooth, or level; and it is used here in the sense of calming the mind; smoothing down its roughnesses; keeping it tranquil. Compare the notes at <sup>23813</sup> Isaiah 38:13, in our version, “I reckoned” (the same word as here) “till morning,” but where the correct translation would be, “I composed or calmed myself until morning.” So the meaning here is, that he had kept his mind calm, and even, and gentle.

As a child that is weaned of his mother See <sup>23819</sup> Isaiah 28:9. There have been very various interpretations of this passage. See Rosenmuller in loc. Perhaps the true idea is that of a child, when weaned, as leaning upon its mother, or as reclining upon her breast. As a weaned child leans upon its mother. That is, as a child, accustomed to the breast, and now deprived of it, lays its head gently where it had been accustomed to derive its nutriment, feeling its dependence, hoping to obtain nourishment again: not angry, but gently grieved and sad. A little child thus clinging to its mother — laying its head gently down on the bosom — languishing — looking for nourishment — would be a most tender image of meekness and gentleness.

My soul is even as a weaned child literally, “As a weaned child upon me my soul;” that is probably, My soul leans upon me as a weaned child. My powers, my nature, my desires, my passions, thus lean upon me, are gentle, unambitious, confiding. The Septuagint renders this in a different manner, and giving a different idea, “Had I not been humble, but exalted myself as a weaned child doth against its mother, how wouldst thou have retributed against my soul!” The Hebrew, however, requires that it should be otherwise interpreted. The idea is, that he had been gentle; that he had calmed down his feelings; that whatever aspirations he might have had, he had kept them under; that though he might have made inquiries, or offered suggestions that seemed to savor of pride or ambition, he had been conscious that this was not so, but that he had known his proper place, and had kept it. The sentiment here is, that religion produces a child-like spirit; that it disposes all to know and keep their right place; that to whatever inquiries or suggestions it may lead among the young, it will tend to keep them modest and humble; and that whatever suggestions one in early life may be disposed to make, they will be connected with a spirit that is humble, gentle, and retiring. Religion produces self-control, and is inconsistent with a proud, an arrogant, and an ambitious spirit.

Psalm 131:3. Let Israel hope in the LORD ... The connection would seem to require us to understand this as the assertion of him who had been accused of thoughts which seemed to be too lofty. As the result of all his reflections (of those reflections for which he was rebuked and charged with pride, but which were really conceived in a modest spirit) — as expressing what he saw that seemed to be in advance of what others saw, or to indicate a habit of thought beyond his years — he says that there were reasons why Israel should hope in the Lord; that there was a foundation for confident trust; that there was that in the divine character which was a just ground of reliance; that there was that in the course of events — in the tendencies of things — which made it proper for the people of God, for the church, to hope, to confide, to feel assured of its ultimate and permanent safety. This would indicate the nature of the suggestions which he had expressed, and which had exposed him to the charge of arrogance; and it would also indicate a ripe and mature habit of thinking, beyond what might be expected from one in very early life. All this was, probably, applicable to David in his early years, as to the reflections which might have foreshadowed what he would be in future; this was eminently applicable to David's Descendant — greater than he — who, at twelve years of age, astonished the Hebrew doctors in the temple with “his understanding and answers” (<sup>Q17</sup>Luke 2:47); this gives a beautiful view of modesty joined with uncommon gifts in early life; this shows what is always the nature of true religion — as producing modesty, and as prompting to hope.

APPENDIX NOTES ON PSALM 131

This very pleasant ode is in the title ascribed to David, and furnishes one of the instances in which the testimony of the titles is summarily rejected by many recent critics. Having, first of all, made up their minds that there are no psalms of David so far on in the Psalter, they either, like Dr. Hupfeld, set aside the testimony of the title as “unworthy of refutation,” or at best they explain it away as meaning no more than that this is a psalm written “after David's manner.” This latter explanation is adopted by Dr. Delitzsch, who, however, admits that the sentiments of the psalm agree perfectly with all we know of David. The truth is, that the grounds on which the testimony of the inscription has, in this instance, been set aside, are suited to confirm the impression that the scepticism with which these have come to be regarded cannot be justified. Dr. Delitzsch is undoubtedly in the right when he says that “David was a pattern of the sentiment expressed in this psalm,” and that “resignation to God’s guidance, submission to his dispensations, contentment with whatsoever he was pleased to mete out, were among the essential features of his noble character.” By some of his many critics the royal prophet has been accused of ambition, and it is by no means unlikely that his youth showed some blossomings of that proud flower — the “last infirmity of noble minds.” The sharpness with which his brothers accused him of pride, when they saw his valor roused by the disdainful challenge of the Philistine, would seem to indicate that the family at Bethlehem had observed in him aspirations and powers which looked beyond the tending of Jesse’s flocks. But if ambitious thoughts found entrance into his mind, they were not cherished, or permitted to betray him into the measures characteristic of ambitious men. In all the brilliant company of gifted men who have risen from a low rank to sit among the mighty — the princes, statesmen, warriors of the world, it would be hard to point out a single individual who could have sung Psalm 131 with such perfect truth and fitness as the son of Jesse. — Binnie.

Psalm 131:2. As a child that is weaned of his mother The child here introduced is a weaned child, but not one that is newly weaned. A child that has just been weaned is restless and impatient; and it still longs for its natural nourishment. But this child is quiet and contented; and it lies upon its mother’s lap without any pining regrets. Thus understood, the comparison is beautiful and appropriate. David had no desire for worldly distinctions. Girt as he was with pomp and power, they had lost their attractive influence. He was as much weaned from them as a child who has no longer any relish for its former food, and is entirely resigned to the maternal care. The man of sublime genius, the victor in many a battlefield, the crowned king of Israel was meek and lowly as a little child. “My soul is even as a weaned child.”

Surely this was a foreshadowing of the truth taught a thousand years afterward by the Great Teacher himself. The child is the highest type of the Christian. “Jesus called a little child unto him, and set him in the midst of them, and said, Verily I say unto you, Except ye be converted, and become as little children, ye shall not enter into the kingdom of heaven. Whosoever therefore shall humble himself as this little child, the same is the greatest in the kingdom of heaven.” It is as if he had said to the apostles: Your bosoms are panting after the high honors that await you when my kingdom is established on the earth. So eager is your craving for personal aggrandizement, that you are quarrelling even now among yourselves as to the superior places. But let me tell you, that unless this ambitious disposition be changed, and you become humble as little children, you will not get into the kingdom at all. Look at this child. Make him your pattern: be as he is: and you will be the greatest in my church. What an idea of true greatness! The child is the greatest among us all, and the greatest because unconscious of it. heaven lies around us in our infancy. That child has but lately come from God; and, in his innocent looks and words, there beams forth a divine glory, which may put us all to shame. Pride has no existence in the bosom of a child. If there, it has been put there by its parents, who should know better. He is ignorant of all the distinctions of earth, and cares nothing about them. He has also boundless trust in a parent’s love; and the thought of tomorrow leaves no dark unrest upon his soul. His is a contentment surpassing all wealth. And so, Christian parent, when that little child of yours is seated on your knees, filling your eyes with a joyous light; and when he looks up so lovingly in your face, and feels he has no want so long as he is beside you, do not be ashamed of taking from him a lesson of spiritual profit. Let the little prattler preach you a powerful sermon on the greatness of humility. May it be the chief wish of your heart to be strong in faith as he is, and to have the same confidence in your heavenly Father which he has in you. — “Pilgrim Psalms.”

NOTES ON PSALM 132

This psalm is simply entitled “A Song of Degrees.” The author of it is not known, nor can the occasion on which it was written be certainly ascertained. It would seem to have been composed in a time of public distress and disaster; when the affairs of the nation were in jeopardy, and especially when the line of the monarchy seemed about to fail, and the promises made to David seemed about to come to nought. It would have been a suitable occasion for such a psalm at the time immediately preceding the captivity in Babylon, or on the return from Babylon, when the throne was tottering or had fallen, and when God seemed to be about to forsake his house, the temple — or had forsaken it, and suffered it to fall to ruin.

At such a time of national disaster, when it appeared as if the house of God was to be permanently destroyed, and the government to be overturned forever, it was natural and proper thus to make mention of the zeal, the toil, and the sacrifice of him who had sought a “habitation” for God; who had planned and labored that there might be a permanent dwelling-place for the Most High, and who had received gracious promises from God himself in regard to the permanent establishment of his family on the throne. It would be appropriate, also, to recall this as a foundation for the prayer that God would again visit Zion, and would fulfill the promises which he had given to David.

The psalm therefore consists properly of two parts:

I. A statement of the zeal of David for the ark, in securing a permanent abode for it, ~~<111>~~Psalm 132:1-8; and

II. A reference to the promises made to David and his posterity, and a prayer that these promises might be carried out and accomplished, ~~<111>~~Psalm 132:9-18.

~~<111>~~Psalm 132:1. LORD, remember David Call to remembrance his zeal, his labor, his trials in order that there might be a permanent place for thy worship. Call this to remembrance in order that his purpose in thy cause may not be frustrated; in order that the promises made to him may be accomplished.

And all his afflictions The particular trial here referred to was his care and toil, that there might be a settled home for the ark. The word used would not refer merely to what is specified in the following verses (his bringing up the ark to Mount Zion), but to his purpose to build a house for God, and — since he was not permitted himself to build it because he was a man of war, and had been engaged in scenes of blood, (~~<111>~~1 Kings 5:3; ~~<111>~~1 Chronicles 22:8) — to his care and toil in collecting materials for the temple to be erected by his son and successor. It is not, therefore, his general afflictions which are here meant, but his anxiety, and his efforts to secure a lasting place for the worship of God.

~~<111>~~Psalm 132:2. How he sware unto the LORD The solemn oath which he took that he would make this the first object; that he would give himself no rest until this was done; that he would sacrifice his personal ease and comfort in order that he might thus honor God. This oath or purpose is not recorded in the history. The fair interpretation of this would be either

- (1) That these words properly expressed what was in the mind of David at the time — that is, his acts implied that this purpose was in his heart; or
- (2) that this vow was actually made by David, though not elsewhere recorded. Such a vow might have been made, and the remembrance of it kept up by tradition, or it might have been suggested to the author of the psalm by direct inspiration.

And vowed unto the mighty God of Jacob See <sup><442></sup>Genesis 49:24. The God whom Jacob worshipped, and who had manifested himself so signally to him as a God of might or power.

<sup><412></sup>Psalm 132:3. Surely I will not come into the tabernacle of my house The tent of my dwelling; the place where I abide. Nor go up into my bed The couch of my bed, or where I sleep. I will make it my first business to find a dwelling-place for the Lord; a place where the ark may repose.

<sup><412></sup>Psalm 132:4. I will not give sleep to mine eyes ... There is no difference here between the words sleep and slumber. The meaning is, that the house of the Lord should be his first care.

<sup><412></sup>Psalm 132:5. Until I find out a place for the LORD A place for the ark of God; a place where it may constantly and safely remain. The symbol of the divine presence rested on the mercy-seat, the cover of the ark, and hence, this was represented as the seat or the house of God.

An habitation for the mighty God of Jacob Hebrew, “For the mighty One of Jacob.” The reference is to a permanent dwelling-place for the ark. It had been moved from place to place. There was no house appropriated to it, or reared expressly for it, and David resolved to provide such a house — at first, a tent or tabernacle on Mount Zion — and then, a more spacious and magnificent structure, the temple. The latter he was not permitted to build, though the purpose was in his heart.

<sup><412></sup>Psalm 132:6. Lo, we heard of it at Ephratah Most probably this is the language of the contemporaries of David; or this is what they might be supposed to say; or this is what tradition reports that they did say. David’s purpose, as referred to in the previous verses, is not recorded in the history, and the memory of the whole transaction may have been handed down by tradition. Or, this may be merely poetic language, expressing the feelings of those who, when sent out by David, or accompanying him, found the ark. Much difficulty has been felt in regard to this verse. There is no mention in the history of the fact that the ark was “heard of” at Ephrata, or that it was ever there. The name Ephrata — trpā,<sup><h672></sup> — is applied

(1) to a region of country to which was subsequently given the name Bethlehem, <sup><03516></sup>Genesis 35:16-19; <sup><04011></sup>Ruth 4:11.

(2) Properly to Bethlehem, a city of Judah, the full name of which was Bethlehem-Ephratah, <sup><01437></sup>Genesis 48:7; Mic. 5:2.

(3) It is a proper name, <sup><1329></sup>1 Chronicles 2:19,50; 4:4.

(4) It may perhaps be the same as Ephraim.

Compare <sup><0725></sup>Judges 12:5; <sup><0001></sup>1 Samuel 1:1; <sup><11125></sup>1 Kings 11:26. Some have supposed the meaning to be, that they found it within the limits of the tribe of Ephraim, and that the word Ephratah is used here with reference to that; but this is a forced construction. It may have been indeed true that the ark was found within the limits of that tribe, but the word Ephratah would not naturally denote this; and, besides, the tribe of Ephraim was so large, and covered such an extent of territory, that this would convey no distinct information; and it cannot be supposed that the writer meant to say merely that they found it within the limits of a tribe. Nor can it mean that they actually found the ark at Ephrata, or Bethlehem, for this would not be true. A simple and natural interpretation of the passage has been suggested, which seems to make it plain: that, in their search for the ark, it was at Ephratah or Bethlehem that they first heard of it, but that they actually found it in the fields of the wood. It may seem strange that there should have been so much uncertainty about the ark as is here implied; that David did not know where it was; and that none of the priests knew. But, while it must be admitted that it seems to be strange, and that the fact is not of easy explanation, it is to be remembered that the ark was at one time in the possession of the Philistines; that when it was retaken it seems to have had no very permanent resting place; that it may have been removed from one spot to another as circumstances required; that it may have been committed now to one, and now to another, for safe keeping; and thus it might have occurred, in the unsettled and agitated state of affairs, that its exact situation might be unknown, and that a somewhat diligent search was necessary in order to find it We know too little of the times to enable us to pronounce upon the subject with much confidence.

We found it in the fields of the wood Continuing our search, we found it there. Perhaps Kirjath-jearim, <sup><000></sup>1 Samuel 7:1; <sup><335></sup>1 Chronicles 13:5. It was to Kirjath-jearim that the ark was carried after it had been taken by the Philistines (<sup><002></sup>1 Samuel 6:21). The literal meaning of the passage here is, “The fields of the wood” — or of Jear, where the word in Hebrew is the same as in Kirjath-jearim. The name Kirjath-jearim means Forest Town, or, city of the woods; and the allusion here is the same as in <sup><000></sup>1 Samuel 7:1. The interpretation, then, seems to be that they heard of the ark, or learned where it was, when they were at Ephrata or Bethlehem; but that they actually found it in the vicinity of Kirjath-jearim. The ignorance in the case may have been merely in regard to the exact place or house where it was at that time kept. Bethlehem was the home or city of David, and the idea is, that, when there, and when it was contemplated to remove the ark to Mount Zion, information or intelligence was brought there of its exact locality, and they went forth to bring it to its new abode or its permanent resting place.

<sup><400></sup>Psalm 132:7. We will go into his tabernacles His tents, or the fixed resting place prepared for the ark. This is evidently language supposed to have been used on bringing up the ark into its place in Jerusalem: language such as they may be supposed to have sung or recited on that occasion.

We will worship at his footstool See the notes at <sup><995></sup>Psalm 99:5. The meaning is, the footstool of God: let us bow humbly at his feet. The language denotes profound adoration. It expresses the feelings of those who bare the ark to its assigned place.

<sup><405></sup>Psalm 132:8. Arise, O LORD, into thy rest Into that which is appointed for its permanent place of repose, that it may no longer be removed from spot to spot. This is spoken of the ark, considered as the place where God, by an appropriate symbol, abode. That symbol — the Shechinah — rested on the cover of the ark. The same language was used by Solomon at the dedication of the temple:

“Now, therefore, arise, O Lord God, into thy resting place, thou and the ark of thy strength,” <sup><460></sup>2 Chronicles 6:41.

Thou, and the ark of thy strength The ark, the symbol of the divine power, as if the power of God resided there, or as if the Almighty had his abode there. Perhaps the language was derived from the fact that the ark, in the wars of the Hebrews against their foes, was a symbol of the divine presence and protection — that by which the divine power was put forth.

Psalm 132:9. Let thy priests be clothed with righteousness This is also substantially the same language that was used by Solomon at the dedication of the temple. See again <sup><4464></sup>2 Chronicles 6:41. The idea is, that in the service of such a God, the priests, the ministers of religion, should be holy. The honor of religion demanded it. It was the first qualification of those who “served the altar;” a qualification without which all other endowments would be valueless. On the word clothed, see the notes at <sup><4952></sup>Psalm 35:26; compare <sup><4953></sup>Psalm 65:13; 93:1; 104:1; <sup><2610></sup>Isaiah 61:10; <sup><4075></sup>1 Peter 5:5.

And let thy saints shout for joy Thy holy ones; all who truly worship and honor thee. Let them be happy in such a God; in thy presence; in thy service. The fact that there is a God, and such a God, and that this God is ours — that we may serve him, glorify him, enjoy him — is suited to fill the mind with joy.

Psalm 132:10. For thy servant David's sake Because of the promise made to him; because of the zeal which he has shown in securing a place for the ark. Let it not be in vain that he has shown such a regard to the honor of God; let not the promises made to him fail. Such a prayer is proper now. There is nothing wrong in our beseeching God to carry out and accomplish the purposes cherished by his church for promoting the honor of his name; or for a child to pray that the purposes of a pious parent in regard to himself may not fail. It is an expression of nature — a desire that the labor and sacrifices of those who have gone before us should not be lost. This is the language of the author of the psalm, and of those for whom the psalm was composed. See <sup><4921></sup>Psalm 132:1. In view of all that David has done, do thou now show favor and mercy.

Turn not away the face of thine anointed As if in displeasure, or in forgetfulness. The word anointed would refer to one who was set apart as a king, a priest, or a prophet. See the notes at <sup><4100></sup>Matthew 1:1. The word would be applicable to David himself, as the anointed king; in a higher sense it is applicable to the Messiah, the Christ. The reference here is probably to David himself, as if a failure to carry out his purposes in regard to the sanctuary, or to fulfill the promises made to him, would be a turning away the face from him; would be a mark of the divine displeasure against him. The prayer is, that God would carry out those purposes as if his face was continually turned with benignity and favor toward David.

Psalm 132:11. The LORD hath sworn in truth unto David He has made a gracious promise, confirmed by an oath, which we may plead in our present necessities. That promise was made “in truth,” that is, sincerely — so that it will certainly be carried out — so that we may appeal to God, on the ground of his faithfulness, to keep his word.

He will not turn from it We may be certain that he will carry it out. We may appeal to him on the basis of that promise with the utmost confidence.

Of the fruit of thy body will I set upon thy throne Margin, as in Hebrew, “of thy belly.” The throne would descend to his posterity, <sup><1072></sup>2 Samuel 7:12; see the notes at <sup><1080></sup>Psalm 89:3,4.

Psalm 132:12. If thy children will keep my covenant ... This was the condition implied in the promise — that they were to keep the law of God, and to serve and obey him. If they did not, they could not, of course, plead the promise. This principle is universal. We cannot plead any promise of God in our behalf, or in behalf of our children, unless we obey his commands, and are ourselves faithful to him. See the sentiment in this verse illustrated in the notes at <sup><1080></sup>Psalm 89:30-37.

Psalm 132:13. For the LORD hath chosen Zion He has selected it as the place where he will abide; the seat of his religion. This is a new plea or argument, and shows that the psalm had reference to Zion or Jerusalem, as then in danger, or as having been in danger. See the notes at <sup><1081></sup>Psalm 48:1,2.

He hath desired it for his habitation A place where to abide. Its had selected this as the permanent place of his worship.

Psalm 132:14. This is my rest for ever My home; my permanent abode. I will no more remove from place to place — as when the ark was carried in the wilderness, and as it has been since; but Zion shall now be the fixed seat of religion. See the notes at <sup><10816></sup>Psalm 68:16.

Here will I dwell ... Permanently; constantly.

Psalm 132:15. I will abundantly bless her provision Margin, surely. Hebrew, “Blessing I will bless,” a strong affirmation, meaning that he would certainly do it; that he would do it in every way; that every needed blessing would be imparted. The word rendered provision is a cognate form of the word in Psalm 78:25, translated meat: “He sent them meat to the full.” It properly refers to food for a journey, but it is applicable to any kind of food. The original idea is that of food obtained by hunting — as game, venison: Genesis 25:28; Job 38:41. The meaning here is, that God would provide abundantly for their support.

I will satisfy her poor with bread I will give them what they need. See the notes at Psalm 37:25.

Psalm 132:16. I will also clothe her priests with salvation See the notes at Psalm 132:9, where — instead of the word which in 2 Chronicles 6:41, as here, is “salvation,” we find the word “righteousness.” The promise here corresponds to the prayer in Psalm 132:9. It is a reason why God should interpose. What they prayed for (Psalm 132:9), had been expressly promised, and that promise is now urged as a plea why the prayer should be granted.

And her saints shall shout aloud for joy See Psalm 132:9. In 2 Chronicles 6:41 the prayer is, “And let thy saints rejoice in goodness.” The sense is not materially varied. The Hebrew is, “And let thy saints rejoicing rejoice;” that is, let them shout, shout; let them be full of joy.

Psalm 132:17. There will I make thy horn of David to bud The horn was an emblem of power; and then, of success or prosperity. See the notes at Luke 1:69. The word rendered “to bud” means to grow, or to shoot forth as a plant, or as grass grows; and then it may be applied to anything which shoots forth or grows. The allusion here would seem to be to a horn as it shoots forth on the head of an animal. So David would be endowed with growing strength; would have the means of defending himself against his enemies, and of securing victory. The language had no original reference to the Messiah, but it is not improperly applied to him (as springing from David) in Luke 1:69. On the word horn, see the notes at Psalm 75:4. Compare Psalm 89:17,24; 92:10; 112:9; Daniel 7:8; 8:5.

I have ordained a lamp for mine anointed Margin, a candle. I have appointed; that is, I have given him that which will always be as a lamp or guide to him; that by which he will see to walk. I have given him true and precious promises, which will be to him as a lamp, a candle, a lantern is to one walking in the night. See the notes at ~~1913~~ Psalm 18:28; 119:105.

~~1928~~ Psalm 132:18. His enemies will I clothe with shame They shall be so confounded that shame shall seem to cover them as a garment. See the notes at ~~1949~~ Psalm 109:29. That is, David would be triumphant.

But upon himself shall his crown flourish His crown shall be as a fresh, blooming garland. The Hebrew word used here may mean either to glitter, or to flower, to flourish or bloom. As applied to a crown, it may mean either that it would sparkle or glitter, as set with precious stones — or (under the idea of a garland) it may mean that it would appear to bloom or blossom. In either case it denotes success, joy, triumph — and is a promise of prosperity to David as a king. This was a part of the promise referred to by the psalmist, and a ground of the plea in the psalm. God had made these precious promises to David and his posterity; and now, in a time of sorrow and disaster, when the glory of the crown seemed about to pass away, the psalmist, in the name of the people, and in language to be used by the people, prays that those ancient promises might be remembered and fulfilled. So, in a time of general religious declension, we may plead the promises, so rich and so abundant, which God has made to his church, as a reason for his gracious interposition, for his coming to revive his work.

APPENDIX NOTES ON PSALM 132

As Psalm 24 was composed by David to be sung at the bringing up of the ark to the tabernacle on Mount Zion, so Psalm 132 was composed by Solomon, or by some Levitical psalmist in concert with him, to be sung when the ark was borne into its final resting place within the golden chamber of the temple. Solomon's prayer on the occasion, as it is reported in the Chronicles, concludes with petitions that constitute the burden of the psalm,

“Now therefore arise, O Lord God, into thy resting place, thou, and the ark of thy strength: let thy priests, O Lord God, be clothed with salvation, and let thy saints rejoice in goodness. O Lord God, turn not away the face of thine anointed: remember the mercies of David thy servant,” ~~1461~~ 2 Chronicles 6:41,42.

I do not forget that some, like our venerable translators, judge the psalm to have been written by David for a “prayer at the removing of the ark,” and suppose that it is he who here “commendeth unto God the religious care he had for the ark;” nor do I forget that other critics connect the psalm with the consecration of the second temple. But neither supposition corresponds perfectly to the tenor of the psalm. God did not say of David’s new tabernacle, “This is my rest forever; here will I dwell:” and as for the second temple, we know indeed that its builders might well have prayed, like Solomon, “Arise, O Lord, into thy rest,” but they could not have added, “Thou and the ark of thy strength;” for the ark never entered that second house. Moreover, is it not most natural to suppose that it was Solomon, and the Levites his contemporaries, the people who had been eye-witnesses of the late king’s solicitude about the erection of a fit dwelling-place for the God of Jacob, that gave utterance to the affectionate reminiscence with which the psalm opens? — Binnie.

Some suppose that this psalm was composed by David. The arguments in favor of Solomon have more weight.

“The whole tenor of this psalm,” says Jebb, “is an exact epitome of the dedication prayer of Solomon (2 Chronicles 6.) The topics are the same — the building the house of the Lord — the promise to David — the inhabitation of the Almighty; and the concluding sentences of the dedication are identical with the expressions of the psalm in ~~HEB~~ Psalm 132:8-10. There can therefore be little question that this psalm was composed by Solomon.”

If this opinion be correct, it is almost certain that it was sung by the congregated multitudes when the ark was removed from the tabernacle in Mount Zion to the magnificent temple on Mount Moriah. It was a season of solemn joy, the greatest that had ever occurred in their national history. There was a similar use of it beyond all question at the dedication of the second temple of Ezra. The psalm is thus rich in historical associations; and frequently has it been sung by the church, when the dark clouds rolled away, and the face of God beamed again with favor, as it did in the days of old. — Pilgrim Psalms.

NOTES ON PSALM 133

This psalm is entitled “A Song of Degrees of David.” It is one of the four in this collection ascribed to him, and there is no reason to doubt the correctness of the inscription. As to the occasion on which the psalm was composed, however, we have no information. Perhaps there was nothing special in the occasion which called it forth, since it may have been written at any time to set forth the beauty and the power of brotherly love. It may have been composed either for the service of the people when gathered in their annual festivals, or in view of the harmony — the beauty and order — evinced when they were thus gathered together.

The psalm is an illustration, in most beautiful language, of brotherly love, particularly in regard to its calm, and gentle, and sweet influence — like the ointment which flowed down from the head of the anointed priest, or like the gentle dew on Hermon or Zion. It is a psalm applicable alike to a church; to family; to a gathering of friends.

Psalm 133:1. Behold As if he looked upon such a gathering, and saw there the expressions of mutual love. This may have been uttered in the actual contemplation of such an assemblage; or it may have been a picture of the imagination.

How good How good in itself; how proper; how suited to promote happiness, and to diffuse good influences abroad.

And how pleasant The word used here means lovely, charming, attractive; that which fills the mind with delight, spoken of one beloved, Cant. 7:6; of a friend, <sup><1026></sup>2 Samuel 1:26; of a place, <sup><0495></sup>Genesis 49:15; of words, <sup><0126></sup>Proverbs 15:26; of beauty or glory, as of Yahweh, <sup><0270></sup>Psalm 27:4. It is descriptive of the pleasure which we derive from a picture, from a landscape, from sweet sounds and gentle voices, or from love.

For brethren to dwell together in unity Margin, even together. Hebrew, “The dwelling of brethren also together.” Perhaps the idea in the word “also” may be, that while the unity of brethren when separate, or as they were seen when scattered in their habitations, was beautiful, it was also pleasant to see them when actually assembled, or when they actually came together to worship God. As applicable to the church, it may be remarked

(1) that all the people of God — all the followers of the Redeemer — are brethren, members of the same family, fellow-heirs of the same inheritance, <sup><423></sup>Matthew 23:8.

(2) There is a special fitness that they should be united, or dwell in unity.

(3) There is much that is beautiful and lovely in their unity and harmony. They are redeemed by the same Saviour; they serve the same Master; they cherish the same hope; they are looking forward to the same heaven; they are subject to the same trials, temptations, and sorrows; they have the same precious consolations. There is, therefore, the beauty, the “goodness,” the “pleasantness” of obvious fitness and propriety in their dwelling together in unity.

(4) Their unity is adapted to produce an important influence on the world, <sup><472></sup>John 17:21. No small part of the obstructions to the progress of religion in the world has been caused by the strifes and contentions of the professed friends of God. A new impulse would be given at once to the cause of religion if all the followers of the Lord Jesus acted in harmony: if every Christian would properly recognize every other Christian as his brother; if every true church would recognize every other church as a church; if all ministers of the Gospel would recognize all other ministers as such; and if all who are Christians, and who walk worthy of the Christian name, were admitted freely to partake with all others in the solemn ordinance which commemorates the Saviour’s dying love. Until this is done, all that is said about Christian union in the church is a subject of just derision to the world — for how can there be union when one class of ministers refuse to recognize the Christian standing, and the validity of the acts, of other ministers of the Lord Jesus — when one part of the Christian church solemnly refuses to admit another portion to the privileges of the Lord’s table — when by their actions large portions of the professed followers of the Redeemer regard and treat others as having no claims to a recognition as belonging to the church of God, and as left for salvation to his “uncovenanted mercies.”

<sup><482></sup>Psalm 133:2. It is like the precious ointment upon the head That is, which was poured upon the head of the high priest, when consecrated to the holy office. The Hebrew is, “the good ointment.” For a description of the ointment which was used in the consecration of the high priest, and the holy things of the sanctuary, see <sup><492></sup>Exodus 30:22-30. Compare the notes at <sup><390B></sup>Isaiah 61:3, on the phrase “oil of joy.” Anointing with oil was common on festivals and joyous occasions (see the notes at <sup><392B></sup>Psalms 23:5), and hence, it became an emblem of anything joyous, happy, beautiful; and the idea seemed to be carried to the highest degree when it was connected with the anointing of a high priest to the sacred duties of his office. There is no other resemblance between the idea of anointing with oil and that of harmony among brethren than this which is derived from the gladness — the joyousness — connected with such an anointing. The psalmist wished to give the highest idea of the pleasantness of such harmony; and he, therefore, compared it with that which was most beautiful to a pious mind — the idea of a solemn consecration to the highest office of religion. The comparison is one which would not unnaturally occur to a Jew.

That ran down upon the beard Descending from the head upon the long, flowing beard. The idea here is that of copiousness, or abundance — as if so much ointment was poured forth as to descend on the whole person, consecrating the entire man.

Even Aaron’s beard The word “even” here, introduced by our translators, weakens the force and beauty of the comparison. The psalmist had the simple image of Aaron before his mind, without intending to compare him with any other.

That went down to the skirts of his garments literally, “to the mouth of his garment.” The idea is that the anointing oil was abundant enough to flow down so as to fall on his entire robe, diffusing a sweet fragrance all around. It is possible, though it may seem like a conceit, that the psalmist may have had an idea of unity in this, as if in the anointing of the high priest the whole man was consecrated, or was “united” in the consecration. It was not merely the head, but the beard, the raiment, the entire person, that partook of the fragrance of the anointing oil. Thus love in a Christian community is so abundant — so overflowing — that it spreads over all the spiritual body, the church; the same sweet and holy influence, represented by the oil of anointing, pervades all, and combines all in one.

<sup><392B></sup>Psalm 133:3. As the dew of Hermon ... On the situation of Mount Hermon, see the notes at <sup><391C></sup>Psalms 89:12. The literal rendering of this passage would be, “Like the dew of Hermon which descends on the mountains of Zion.” According to our version two things are referred to: the dew of Hermon, and the dew on the mountains of Zion, But this is not in the original. There no dew is referred to but that which belongs to Hermon. It has, of course, been made a question how the dew of Hermon, a remote mountain, could be said to descend on the mountains of Zion, and our translators have sought to solve the difficulty by inserting the words "and as the dew." Some have supposed that the proper interpretation is to refer the comparison in the passage to the dew of Hermon, and that all which follows is an application of the thought: "Like the dew of Hermon is the influence which comes down upon the mountains of Zion," etc. The most probable and plausible interpretation, however, it seems to me, is, that the mind of the poet was turned to the dew of Hermon — to the gentleness, and the copiousness, and the vivifying nature of that dew — diffusing beauty and abundance all around — and that he thought of that dew, or dew like that, as descending on the mountains of Zion. Not that the dew of Hermon actually descended there; but when changing the comparison, in illustration of brotherly love, from oil to dew, he most naturally thought (perhaps from some former observation) of the dew of Hermon, and immediately thought of Zion as if that dew descended there: that is, love, unity, and concord there would be as if the dew of Hermon should descend on the barren hills of Zion or Jerusalem, there diffusing beauty, abundance, fertility. The comparison of the influence of brotherly love, or unity, with dew is not a forced or unnatural one. So calm, so gentle, so refreshing on the tender grain, on the young plants, on the flowers, is dew, that it is a striking image of the influences which produce brotherly love and harmony.

For there the LORD commanded the blessing He appointed that as the place of worship; as the seat of his residence; the source of all holy influences. See the notes at ~~1956~~ Psalm 78:67-69; 87:2.

Even life for evermore literally, "Life to eternity." That is, such influences go from that place as to lead to eternal life, or as to secure eternal life. It is in Zion, in his church, that he has made known the way to eternal life, and the means by which it may be obtained. To the end of the world this beautiful psalm will be sung in the church alike as expressing the charm which there is in unity among brethren and in the church; and as tending to promote that unity whose beauty it is designed to commend. Happy will be that day when the church shall be so united that it may be sung everywhere, as expressing what is, and not merely what should be.

APPENDIX NOTES ON PSALM 133

When the whole house of Israel chose David for their king, and the throne was established at Jerusalem, the new capital, he lost no time in bringing up the ark from Kirjath-jearim, and restoring the tabernacle service with more than its ancient splendor. And these great events were accompanied with a gush of sacred melody. They constituted the most memorable epoch in the history of the Hebrew church, between the exodus from Egypt and the incarnation of Christ. Accordingly the songs belonging to this period are of an especially lofty and joyful character. How does the psalmist exult in the re-union of the whole house of Israel, in Psalm 133; a song which has, times without number, enabled God's people to give tuneful utterance to the grateful feelings of their hearts when "the Lord has built up Jerusalem, and gathered together the dispersed of Israel." — Binnie.

NOTES ON PSALM 134

This is the last psalm of the collection or group called “Songs of Degrees,” and it is of the nature of a doxology as now sung in our places of worship. Its author is unknown. From anything that appears in the psalm itself, it may have been composed originally to occupy the very place which it does occupy here. The psalm is a summons to praise, and it would seem not improbable that it was designed to be sung by alternate choirs — the first (<sup><AD01></sup>Psalm 134:1,2) representing the people approaching the sanctuary, calling on those who habitually serve God there — the ministers of religion — to lift up their hands in the sanctuary and to praise the Lord; the second (<sup><AD03></sup>Psalm 134:3), the response of the priests or the ministers of religion, pronouncing a blessing on the people — a blessing as proceeding out of Zion.

<sup><AD01></sup>Psalm 134:1. Behold As if calling attention to the fact that they were there, or had come.

Bless ye the LORD Praise Yahweh. Making known their desire that God should be praised, and calling on those who presided over the public worship of the sanctuary to engage now in that service as expressive of their feelings.

All ye servants of the LORD The priests or ministers of religion, appointed especially to this service.

Which by night stand in the house of the LORD There was a class of singers in the temple who devoted the night, or a part of the night, to praise; and it is possible that this service may have been, as it was subsequently in some of the monasteries, continued by succeeding choirs, during the entire night. Thus in <sup><AD03></sup>1 Chronicles 9:33, it is said, “And these are the singers, chief of the fathers of the Levites, who remaining in the chambers were free, for they were employed in that work day and night.” This class is particularly addressed in this psalm, as if they were especially favored, or as if they especially possessed the ear of God in the silence of the night, and when the world slumbered around them. There is something favorable to devotion in the silence of the night; when the world sleeps; when we are alone with God; when it seems as if God would more particularly attend to our cry since the rest of the world is still, and does not (as it were) need his care. All this may be fancy; but the effect may be to make the mind more solemn, and better suited for devotion.

Psalm 134:2. Lift up your hands in the sanctuary Margin, In holiness. The Hebrew word properly means holiness, but it may be applied to a holy place. See Psalm 20:2. The lifting up of the hands is properly expressive of prayer, but the phrase may be used to denote praise or worship in general.

And bless the LORD In the night-watches — while all around is still, — let there be one place where the voice of praise shall ascend on high.

Psalm 134:3. The LORD that made heaven and earth The great Creator of all things. This is probably the language of those who were thus employed in the service of the Lord at night; their response to the address in the first two verses.

Bless thee out of Zion That is, bless those who thus approached the sanctuary, and called on those within to praise the Lord. This is the answer. Let the blessing of God rest on you. It is language showing that they appreciated the kind and encouraging salutation, and that they reciprocated the feelings and the good wishes of those who came to worship. In the name of the Lord whom they served, therefore, and appealing to him, they pronounced a blessing on those who thus approached the sanctuary. People do not come near the house of God — the place of public worship — with kind and sympathizing feelings without a blessing from the sanctuary, without a response that welcomes them, and that meets all their aspirations. There is always in Zion — in the church — a voice, by day and night, which pronounces a blessing on those who wish it well, who seek its good, and who desire to partake of the favor of God.

Out of Zion That is, may God speak to you out of Zion; may he confer on you such blessings as properly go out of Zion; or such as Zion (or his church) can furnish. Go not away unblessed; go not without a token of divine favor — for God will bless you.

APPENDIX NOTES ON PSALM 134

The outline of the psalm may be given thus: the pilgrim-bands present themselves on the evening of their arrival at the temple, and call upon the servants of the Lord, who were there at the time of the evening sacrifice, to praise the Lord in their name and that of the people, and to pray to him. Coming with such a state of mind, they could not remain long without the blessing, therefore the priests answered them by pronouncing that. Such a psalm was most fitly appropriated as the close of the whole pilgrim-book; so that the collector of it, who was at the same time the author of all the nameless pilgrim-songs, undoubtedly placed this psalm purposely at the end, or composed it with a view to its forming the conclusion of the whole. So already Lampe: forte ille, qui fasciculum canticorum graduum collegit — hoc canticum tanquam apturn epilogum addidit. — Hengstenberg.

Psalm 134:3. The Lord ... bless thee out of Zion It is God, not as the Maker of heaven and earth, but as dwelling in Zion, that informs us how sin can be pardoned, and man be recovered from the wrecks and ruins of the fall. We honor God as the Creator and Preserver of all things: we admire the power, and the wisdom, and the benevolence which are everywhere conspicuous in the work of his hands: we see his glory, as it shines forth from every flower under our feet, and sparkles from every star over our heads. But in all these manifestations of divine grandeur something is still lacking. They cannot meet the necessities of the soul: they cannot warm into life the chilled heart, and exchange the moans of misery for the voices of joy: they cannot purge the conscience from dead works to serve the living God: they can throw no light into the darkness of the sepulchre: they cannot deliver us from the horrors of an unending perdition. In the church alone the grand problem is solved, the mighty secret is disclosed, how God can be just and the justifier of the ungodly! We turn to Calvary; and there, on that rugged cross, and amidst the rending rocks and the heaving earth, and under the blackened heavens and with these dying groans of the innocent Sufferer falling on our ears, we perceive a demonstration of divine love, and divine wisdom, and divine holiness, and divine power which transcends every illustration of the character of God that appears in the works of creation and providence.

“Herein is love” (as if divine love were seen nowhere else), “not that we loved God, but that he loved us, and sent his Son to be the propitiation for our sins.”

The gospel is the richest joy that ever came down from heaven to earth. The Lord who dwells in Zion reveals himself as a Father, whose children have wandered from him; but who desires, above all things, that they would return to his embrace, and possess his favor as in days of old before sin introduced discord and sorrow. We may thus approach him with perfect confidence, assured that, unworthy as we are, he will make us welcome for the sake of him whose blood cleanses from all sin. "Let us therefore come boldly unto the throne of grace, that we may obtain mercy, and find grace to help in time of need." My impenitent readers, will you not all put him to the proof and take him at his own word? He will bless you: he can bless you. And if he blesses you, who can curse you? If he justifies you, who can condemn? If he grants you grace, who can take it away? If he makes you rich, who can make you poor? If he promises you eternal life, and gives you a foretaste of it on earth, will he not redeem his pledge in heaven? Make immediate application for the bestowment of these blessings. Dream not of fitness. Talk not of preparation. They are all yours by a deed of gift, whenever you accept them for Christ's sake; and ascribe to him, as is most due, the entire merit of your redemption.

And having thus found God in Zion, and experienced the riches of his grace in Christ Jesus, then, when you walk abroad and survey the works of nature, it will seem as if they were invested with new splendor to your spiritual vision. "Acquaint thyself with God, if thou wouldst taste his works." The sun as he envelops creation in his mantle of light, and makes all things overflow with beauty, and music, and gladness, will remind you of the Sun of Righteousness, rising upon a benighted world and upon a benighted soul with healing under his wings. Each star, as it shoots out from the darkness, will remind you of the Star of Jacob, and of that fair star which directed the wise men of the East to the manger-cradle where the infant Jesus was laid. And when the deep blue heaven is studded with innumerable systems of glory, you can lift up your eyes and view them as the spirit's ladder, by which you may climb to the celestial city of our God; and you may exclaim with holy confidence, This is my home — my Father's house. I shall soon be there!

*As one who, long detained on foreign shores,
Pants to return, and when he sees afar
His country's weather bleach'd and batter'd rocks
From the green wave emerging, darts an eye*

*Radiant with joy toward the happy land;
So I with animated hopes behold,
And many an aching wish, your beamy fires,
That show like beacons in the blue abyss;*

1962

*Ordain'd to guide th' embodied spirit home
From toilsome life, to never-ending rest.
Love kindles as I gaze. I feel desires,
That give assurance of their own success,
And that, infused from heaven, must thither tend.*
— Pilgrim Psalms

NOTES ON PSALM 135

This psalm has no title in Hebrew; and the author, and the occasion on which it was written, are alike unknown. It is general in its character, though its imagery is taken mostly from Hebrew history.

The sole design of the psalm is to excite to the praise of God; or to show reasons for that praise. As grounds or reasons for this, the psalmist refers to the fact that God is good, <sup><BDB></sup>Psalm 134:3; to the fact that he had chosen Jacob for himself, Psalm 134:4; to the greatness of God as seen in the works of nature, Psalm 134:5-7; to the history of the Hebrew people, Psalm 134:8-12; to the inability of idols to aid, <sup><BDB></sup>Psalm 134:13-18; and, in view of all this, he calls on all classes of the people to praise the Lord, <sup><BDB></sup>Psalm 134:19-21.

Praise ye the name of the LORD The same as praising God himself.

Praise him, O ye servants of the LORD You who are especially designated or appointed to this service, <sup><BDB></sup>Psalm 134:1.

<sup><BDB></sup>Psalm 135:2. Ye that stand in the house of the LORD See the notes at <sup><BDB></sup>Psalm 134:1. That is, those who were appointed to conduct the services of religion, the priests and Levites.

In the courts of the house of our God The areas, or parts assigned for different classes of worshippers around the tabernacle and the temple. See the notes at <sup><BDB></sup>Matthew 21:12; <sup><BDB></sup>Psalm 92:13.

Sing praises unto his name, for it is pleasant See <sup><BDB></sup>Psalm 33:1; 92:1. The idea here is, that it is a source of happiness, and that it is proper in itself.

<sup><BDB></sup>Psalm 135:4. For the LORD hath chosen Jacob unto himself The descendants of Jacob. He has selected them from among all the inhabitants of the earth to be his special people.

And Israel for his peculiar treasure The word here rendered treasure, means that which is acquired; property; wealth. They were what God possessed, owned, or claimed among all the people of the earth as especially his own. He had chosen them; he had redeemed them; he had made them his own, and he regarded them with the interest with which anyone looks on his own property, the fruit of his own toil. See <sup><12915></sup>Exodus 19:5; <sup><13015></sup>Deuteronomy 7:6; 32:9; <sup><10853></sup>1 Kings 8:53.

<sup><1415></sup>Psalm 135:5. For I know I, as the representative of Israel, and speaking in the, name of the people. This is said as the foundation or the reason for praise. It was the thorough conviction of the psalmist that God was great above all who were claimed to be gods, and that he only was worthy of worship.

That the LORD is great See the notes at <sup><13915></sup>Psalm 95:3.

And that our Lord is above all gods All that are worshipped as gods.

<sup><1415></sup>Psalm 135:6. Whatsoever the LORD pleased God is an absolute sovereign. He has formed a plan, and has carried it out. He has made the world as he chose, and he has ordered all its arrangements according to his own pleasure. As a universal sovereign, he has a right to universal adoration. See the notes at <sup><14515></sup>Psalm 115:3.

In heaven, and in earth ... These are put for the universe; these are the universe. In these places — in all worlds — on the land and in the ocean — even in the profound depths of the sea, there is nothing which has not been placed there by his will, and which he has not arranged according to his eternal plan.

<sup><1415></sup>Psalm 135:7. He causeth the vapours to ascend from the ends of the earth The word rendered vapors means literally risings; things raised up; and it may be applied, therefore, to vapors or clouds. The Septuagint, the Latin Vulgate, and Luther render it clouds. It is among the proofs of the divine wisdom and power that he causes them to ascend contrary to the common law which drags all things down toward the earth. The arrangement by which this is done is among the most wise and wonderful of all the works of God. See the notes at <sup><13115></sup>Job 26:8; 38:25-28.

He bringeth the wind out of his treasures Where he has, as it were, treasured it up, to be used when there should be occasion for it. See the notes at <sup><1832></sup>Job 38:22.

<sup><4218></sup>Psalm 135:8. Who smote the firstborn of Egypt As the last and the greatest of the plagues brought upon the Egyptians; the chief and crowning judgment under which they were made willing that the children of Israel should go, and which was in fact the judgment which secured their freedom. This is selected here evidently for this reason, instead of recounting all the plagues which were brought upon the Egyptians.

Both of man and beast <sup><4115></sup>Exodus 11:5. Margin, as in Hebrew, From man unto beast. That is, including both; smiting both.

<sup><4219></sup>Psalm 135:9. Who sent tokens and wonders Tokens: that is, signs or evidences of the divine power. Wonders: things suited to impress the mind with awe; things outside of the ordinary course of events; things not produced by natural laws, but by the direct power of God. The allusion here is, of course, to the plagues of Egypt, as recorded in Exodus. See the notes at <sup><4357></sup>Psalm 105:27-36.

<sup><4251></sup>Psalm 135:11. Sihon king of the Amorites ... These are specimens of what was done, or instances of the mighty kings who were subdued. It is not pretended that all were enumerated. The subjugation of these nations and kings showed the power of God, and laid the foundation for praise.

<sup><4253></sup>Psalm 135:13. Thy name, O LORD, endureth for ever Thou art the ever-living, the unchanging God. The generations of people pass away; the kingdoms of the earth change; the idols perish, but thou art the same. The object here seems to be to bring the image or the idea of God before the mind as he was when he performed these great works, as a God interposing in behalf of his people, and as worthy of praise. The idea is that he is the same now that he was then; and as he then impressed the world with a sense of his majesty and power, and as he then interposed in behalf of his people by mighty signs and wonders, we should feel that, being an unchangeable God, he can do it now, and is now equally worthy. of confidence, adoration, and praise.

And thy memorial Thy remembrance; the memory of thyself. That is, What thou hast done to secure a remembrance among people is of such a nature as to make the same impression to all coming time. The events were such that the memory of them should never pass away from mankind.

Throughout all generations Margin, as in Hebrew, To generation and generation. There never will be a generation on the earth, in the latest periods, to which the memory of these things should not be transmitted.

Psalm 135:14. For the LORD will judge his people He will interpose in their behalf by his judgments, or by directing the course of events in their favor. This language is copied literally from Deuteronomy 32:36: “For the Lord shall judge his people, and repent himself for his servants.” It is there a part of the song of Moses after the journey through the wilderness, after smiting the kings of the Amorites and of Bashan; and when, delivered from their enemies, the Israelites had come to the borders of the promised land, Deuteronomy 31. The language was, therefore, especially appropriate to the design of this psalm.

And he will repent himself concerning his servants In behalf of his people. That is, he will do as if he repented, or had changed his mind. He will stay his judgments. He will not suffer his people to be destroyed. He will not permit the judgments which seemed to threaten their entire ruin to be carried out to the full. They shall be arrested midway as if God had then changed his mind. Of course, all this is language accommodated to human weakness, and to the manner of speaking among people.

Psalm 135:15-18. The idols of the heathen are silver and gold ... To show more fully the propriety of praising God, and him alone as God, the psalmist instituted a comparison between him and idols, showing that the gods worshipped by the pagan lacked every ground of claim to divine worship and homage. They were, after all that could be done to fashion, to decorate, and to adorn them, nothing but silver and gold, and could have no better claim to worship than silver and gold as such. They had, indeed, mouths, eyes, ears, but they could neither speak, see, hear, nor breathe. The passage here is substantially the same as in Psalm 115:4-8; and the one was evidently copied from the other, though in the latter the description is in some respects amplified; but which was the original it is impossible to determine. See the notes at that passage.

Psalm 135:19-21. Bless the LORD, O house of Israel ... This passage, also, is evidently an imitation of the passage in Psalm 115:9-13. The form in Psalm 115, however, is rather an exhortation to trust in the Lord, and an assurance that God would bless the classes spoken of, than a call on them to bless the Lord. Still the same classes of persons are referred to; the house of Israel; the house of Aaron; and those who feared the Lord. The passage needs no further illustration than what is found in the notes at Psalm 115:9-13. It is an earnest call on all classes of the people to bless and praise the Lord. It is language expressive of overflowing joy; the utterance of a heart full of exalted conceptions of the majesty, the glory, and the mercy of God; of a heart which feels to the utmost the fitness of praise, and desires that all classes of people — priests and people — that all created things should unite in the praise of Yahweh. Who, in reading the psalm, can fail to catch the feelings of the psalmist, and to say AMEN AND AMEN!

General Notes on Psalm 135 and Psalm 136

The late date of these two psalms may be inferred from the manner in which they are compacted of passages from the earlier portion of the Psalter. In respect of the formal arrangement, the first consists of three strophes of seven verses each, of which the historical strophe, Psalm 135:8-14, stands out by its central position as the most important. The other psalm, although not divided into strophes, is marked by the occurrence in every verse of the well-known refrain "for his mercy endureth forever," itself borrowed, either immediately or mediately, from Psalm 106:1. The contents of the two psalms are, however, to a great extent the same; and they may therefore be conveniently treated of together. Both set forth the almighty power of God: both contain protests against idolatry: both recount the deliverance of Israel from Egypt: both make special mention of the divine overthrow of Sihon and Og, and of the assignment of their land as an heritage to Israel. A further comparison of both psalms with the solemn confession of sins contained in Nehemiah 9 will leave little doubt that it was in connection with the national fast therein recorded to have been observed that these psalms were composed ...

As the preceding fifteen psalms are historically connected with the rebuilding of the walls of Jerusalem, so do the two psalms now before us carry our thoughts back to the re-occupation of the Israelite territory. Their historical starting-point is not indeed the first return from captivity; but rather Nehemiah's assemblage of the whole people that they might be reckoned by genealogy (<sup>407B</sup>Nehemiah 7:5); that genealogy undoubtedly furnishing in many instances the key to the territorial inheritance to which each family was entitled ...

Their joy, however, was not unmingled with regret. They were indeed themselves settled again, according to the former allotment, in the land of their inheritance; but how contracted the limits of the district over which they were spread, when compared with those of the territory originally assigned to them! Samaria was occupied by a hostile race; Galilee too, for the present, was no longer theirs; and the fertile regions to the east of the Jordan, which had been so triumphantly won from Sihon the Amorite, conqueror of Moab, and from Og, the last of the old giant race, chieftains whose renown had made the story of their defeat one of the most attractive of the tales of olden Israelite history, were now, according to all human appearance, almost irretrievably lost.

Under these circumstances the celebration of the ancient conquest of Canaan, while it furnished an appropriate theme of praise to those who were resettled in the land, contained also a stirring appeal to the people's faith. Knowing as they did that the whole land had been promised to Abraham and his seed after him, they must still believe in the perpetuity of the promise; they must look forward to the time when the blessing should be renewed in no measure of diminution; they must still believe that God would yet plead the cause of his people, and repent him concerning his servants. Samaria and Galilee, Bashan and Gilead, must not be given up for lost; the day should yet come when they that sat in darkness should see a great light. Even in former days, God, although he had given all Canaan, with Bashan, for his people's inheritance, had yet at various times suffered the Israelites to fall into the hands of their enemies for their sins; and so at the present season he was permitting the land of their inheritance to yield increase to the kings whom, because of their sins, he had set over them. Yet he had, in the days of the judges, been merciful to them on their repentance; and so even now, if they would return to him and keep his law, he would doubtless again make good to them his promise in all its fullness.

We shall not need to dwell on the spiritual manner in which God is now at last vindicating his faithfulness. To the Church Catholic, the true antitype of the ancient Israel, he has assigned for an inheritance every pagan realm throughout the world; nor ought she to rest content until every one be subjugated to her sway. We celebrate with joy the first triumphs of the gospel through the different quarters of the globe; we may exult in the career of success which in far-off lands is still being granted to it; but meanwhile, along with the Jews in Nehemiah's day, we have to bewail the provinces that we have lost; and those the very provinces, alas! over which the dominion of Christ was earliest asserted. Must the scenes of the first apostolic conquests be forever abandoned to the darkness of superstition and the bane of misbelief? Must the regions of the East which Greece and Rome once subdued to civilize, and which Christianity in her turn subdued to enlighten, relapse into the semi-barbarism from which we hoped they had been rescued? Will God not yet repent himself concerning his servants and remember us in our low estate? — Thrupp.

NOTES ON PSALM 136

This psalm also has no title to indicate the author, or to explain the occasion on which it was composed. It is a psalm of very special construction, and stands alone in the form of its poetry. The peculiarity consists in repeating at the close of each verse the language “for his mercy endureth forever.” This is a kind of refrains, and may have been designed, in public worship, to be a response by a choir, or by the people. That it may have been intended to be so used cannot be disproved, nor can anyone show that such a response in public worship is, itself, improper or wrong. It is not certain, however, that it was meant to be so used; and it should not, therefore, be appealed to as proving that such responses are proper in public worship, whatever may be true on that point. It may have been merely a specimen of the poetic art among the Hebrews — one of the forms in which Hebrew poetry expressed itself. The subjects referred to as laying the foundation for the response in each verse — “for his mercy endureth forever,” are such as have been often introduced in the previous psalms, and will require but little additional illustration. The general idea is, that all these acts of the divine interposition — all that God has done, even though it seemed to be a display of power or of justice, of severity or of wrath — was, in fact, an illustration of the “mercy” of God, and laid a foundation for praise. That is, All this was connected with the good of his people, with favors to mankind, with the accomplishment of great and benevolent purposes, and, therefore, was expressive of mercy — a proof that the “mercy of God endures forever.”

~~<BDB>~~ Psalm 136:1. O give thanks unto the LORD, for he is good This whole verse is the same as ~~<BDB>~~ Psalm 106:1, except that that is introduced by a Hallelujah. See the notes at that verse.

For his mercy endureth for ever See also the notes at ~~<BDB>~~ Psalm 106:1; 107:1. Literally, “For unto eternity his mercy.” That is, It is ever the same; it never changes; it is never exhausted; it is found in all his dealings — in all his acts toward his creatures, and ever will be.

~~<BDB>~~ Psalm 136:2. O give thanks unto the God of gods See ~~<BDB>~~ Deuteronomy 10:17. The supreme God; the God superior to all that is called God, or that is adored by the nations of the earth; above all to whom the name God is ever applied.

For his mercy ... The ground of praise here is, that it is a characteristic of the supreme God that he is a merciful Being; that there is blended in his character eternal mercy with infinite power. Mere power might fill us with dread; power mingled with mercy, and able to carry out the purposes of mercy, must lay the foundation for praise.

Psalm 136:3. O give thanks to the Lord of lords The Lord or Ruler of all in authority — all kings, princes, rulers. He is supreme over all. This is an attribute of Divinity; yet this is ascribed to the Lord Jesus, thus proving that he is divine. See the notes at <sup><6696></sup>Revelation 19:16.

For his mercy ... The ground of praise here, as in the previous verse, is, that this God — the Supreme Ruler over all the potentates and magistrates of earth — is a merciful Being. He is kind and benignant toward those rulers, and through them to mankind.

Psalm 136:4. To him who alone doeth great wonders Miracles; marvelous things; things which spring from his direct and absolute power; things lying beyond the range of natural laws. See the notes at <sup><197218></sup>Psalm 72:18.

For his mercy ... For all these mighty wonders are performed in carrying out purposes of mercy. So the wonders which were done in Egypt were for the deliverance of an oppressed people; so the miracles performed by the Saviour and his apostles were to remove disease and pain, and to establish a religion of mercy; so the divine interpositions among the nations are to assert the principles of righteousness, to secure the reign of order and love, and to promote the welfare of mankind.

Psalm 136:5. To him that by wisdom made the heavens Made them in so wise a manner; where so much wisdom was manifested. See <sup><1018></sup>Proverbs 3:19; 8:24-31.

For his mercy ... The making of the heavens was a manifestation of mercy and goodness as furnishing an abode for unfallen and holy beings; as a dwelling-place for redeemed sinners when they shall be removed there from the earth; and as, by their order, their beauty, their harmony, and their happy influences, tending to promote the happiness of man on earth.

Psalm 136:6. To him that stretched out the earth above the waters

Genesis 1:1,9; see the notes at Psalm 24:2.

For his mercy ... As an illustration of his benignity and kindness in preparing an abode for man, and for other creatures in the world. Whatever there is of life or happiness, on the continents and islands, has resulted from that act of God when “he made the dry land appear.”

Psalm 136:7. To him that made great lights Genesis 1:14. The sun and the moon are here particularly referred to.

For his mercy ... As manifested in all that has followed from the creation and diffusion of light — (all the beauty in the universe as seen; all the life, beauty, and vigor in the vegetable and animal world; all that there is of life and happiness in the universe — for there could be neither if darkness reigned everywhere); light, the emblem of happiness; the source of joy; the producer, in a great measure, of the beauties of the universe, and the revealer of those beauties everywhere. How can a man think of light and not praise its Author?

Psalm 136:8. The sun to rule by day Genesis 1:16. Margin, as in Hebrew, for the ruling of the day. That is, to control, as it were, the day; to determine its length — its beginning — its ending — to make it what it is.

For his mercy ... By all the blessings of day as distinguished from night and darkness — by all that the sun in his daily course does to diffuse life, joy, peace, comfort, happiness on the earth — by all that are warmed by its beams, cheered by its light, guided in labor, guarded from dangers — do we derive an argument for the mercy of God; by all this there is laid a foundation for his praise.

Psalm 136:9. The moon and stars to rule by night Genesis 1:16.

For his mercy ... As a proof also of his benignity and mercy. By all the beauty of the moon and stars in their course through the heavens — by all that there is in the harmony and order of their movements — by all that there is to make night less hideous and fearful — by all that there is to reveal a countless number of worlds whose existence could not have been discovered but for the night — by all that there is to guide the mariner on the ocean, enabling him to determine his position and to mark his course when on the deep — and therefore by all the blessings of navigation and commerce, binding the different parts of the world together, by all that there is in the “North-star,” fixed and true in guiding those who flee from bondage — by all these and kindred things without number, do we see the benignity, the goodness, the mercy of God, in forming the moon and stars “to rule by night.”

Psalm 136:10. To him that smote Egypt in their first-born

<sup><0129></sup>Exodus 12:29. That is, he struck them down, or destroyed them, by his own direct power.

For his mercy ... It was in mercy to his people. It was the means of their deliverance from bondage, for the Egyptians would not otherwise have suffered them to depart. By all the results of their deliverance both to themselves and to mankind, the act was seen to be an act of mercy to the world. It was better for mankind that the Hebrews should be delivered even at this sacrifice than it would have been that they should not be brought into the promised land.

<sup><0131></sup>Psalm 136:11. And brought Israel out from among them From the land of Egypt. By all the wonders manifested in their deliverance, and in conducting them out of the land so that they should escape from their pursuers.

For his mercy ... His mercy in this respect was to be measured by all that there was of power in conducting them forth in safety, and by the results of it.

<sup><0132></sup>Psalm 136:12. With a strong hand A powerful hand; as by a hand that could grasp and subdue all that opposed.

And with a stretched-out arm As if the arm were stretched out to strike with the utmost force, or to exert its utmost power. See <sup><0116></sup>Exodus 6:6; <sup><0134></sup>Deuteronomy 4:34; 5:15; 7:19; 26:8; <sup><0132></sup>Jeremiah 32:21.

For his mercy ... The exertion of his power in delivering his people was the expression of a mercy, the consequences of which are to endure forever, for the results of that deliverance will never cease in the history of the world; will never cease in heaven.

<sup><0133></sup>Psalm 136:13. To him which divided the Red sea into parts More literally, “Parted it into parts;” made parts of that which before was unbroken and a whole. It was actually divided into two parts, so that the Hebrews passed between them: <sup><12></sup>Exodus 14:21,22.

For his mercy ... This, too, was an exercise of mercy, or a manifestation of benevolence toward them and toward the world, to be measured by all the good which would result from it in itself, and by all the power which was put forth to effect it.

Margin, as in Hebrew, shaken off. The word is applicable to a tree shaking off its foliage. <sup><16></sup>Isaiah 33:9. The same word is used in <sup><17></sup>Exodus 14:27: "And the Lord overthrew (Margin, shook off) the Egyptians in the midst of the sea," He shook them off as if he would no longer protect them. He left them to perish.

For his mercy ... Their destruction was done in mercy to his people and to the world, for it was the means of deliverance to Israel. The death of a wicked man is a benefit to the world, and the act of removing him may be really an act of the highest benevolence to mankind. No wrong is done to such people, for they deserve to die; and the only service which can be rendered to the world through them is by their removal from the earth.

For all the manifestations of his care during a period of forty years.

For his mercy ... That is, his mercy was to be measured by all the protection extended over them; by all the provision made for their needs; by all that God did to defend them; by all his interposition when attacked by their enemies; by safely bringing them to the land to which he had promised to conduct them.

<sup><19></sup>Psalm 136:17-22. To him which smote great kings On this passage see the notes at <sup><20></sup>Psalm 135:10-12. There is little difference in the two places, except that here the statement is divided by the refrain, "For his mercy endureth forever." The idea in the whole passage, in view of the divine interposition in slaying the mighty kings, and in giving their land for a possession to the Hebrew people, is, that it was a proof of mercy and benevolence. It is benevolence to mankind and to the church of God — it is in the interests of humanity, of domestic peace, and of the charities of life, to remove wicked people from the world. This mercy may be manifested further, not merely in removing the wicked, but in transferring their possessions to those who will make a better use of them. Thus the possessions of these mighty kings, Sihon and Og, were transferred to the people of God, and lands which had been devoted to the service of blood, ambition, crime, pollution, and idolatry, became devoted to the service of religion and righteousness. In like manner, through the removal of a wicked man from the world by death, God may cause his wealth, accumulated by avarice and dishonesty, to be transferred to the hands of children who will make a good use of it — children converted as if in anticipation of this, and with a view to this. Among the highest expressions of mercy to the world may be, therefore, the removal of wicked princes in war — or the removal of wicked people, in other ranks of life, by death in any form.

Psalm 136:23. Who remembered us in our low estate When we were few in number; when we were a feeble people; when we were a people unable to contend with such mighty foes.

For his mercy ... By all that he did for us when thus feeble; by all his power put forth to defend us from our enemies, he has showed his mercy and kindness to us and to the world.

Psalm 136:24. And hath redeemed us from our enemies Has rescued or delivered us from all our foes; has given to us freedom and peace.

For his mercy ... By all that he has done in order to redeem us; and by all the prosperity, happiness, and peace which have followed as the result of that, he has showed his mercy. So it is in the greater work of the redemption of the soul. By all the love manifested in the gift of a Saviour — by all the sufferings and toils of his life — by his “agony and bloody sweat” in the garden of Gethsemane — by his “cross and passion,” by all the blessings of salvation here, all our peace, all our purity, all our consolations, all our hopes, and by all the glories of heaven hereafter — the mercy of God in our redemption is to be estimated and measured. Who can take the full account of it?

Psalm 136:25. Who giveth food to all flesh To all living things: all in the air, on the earth, in the waters. See the notes at Psalm 104:27,28; compare Psalm 115:16.

For his mercy ... All this is a proof of his benignity and kindness. To see this, it would be necessary to have a view of what is done every day in the providence of God to meet the needs of the countless multitudes thus dependent on him. Let it be remembered, also, that the needs of each insect, fowl, animal; fish, is to be provided for as an individual — and who can take in a full view of the care, the wisdom, the benevolence of what is done every day by the Father of all in providing for their needs? Let it be remembered, also, that this has been continued without ceasing from the foundation of the world, and will be demanded until its close, and then let us try to imagine what is necessary to be done to provide for the needs of all the dwellers in distant worlds — and who, in this view, can form any proper estimate of the wisdom and the goodness of God?

Psalm 136:26. O give thanks unto the God of heaven The God who reigns in heaven; whose home is heaven.

For his mercy ... In view of all this — of all that he does in heaven and on earth — let praise be ascribed to him. To know the measure of the praise due to him; to see how great is his “mercy,” it would be necessary to know all that he does in heaven and on earth. That will not be known here. It will constitute the theme of contemplation and praise forever and ever. Enough, however, is known here to show the propriety of repeating again, again, and again, as in this psalm, the language, “For his mercy endureth forever;” “For his mercy endureth forever;” “For his mercy endureth forever.”

NOTES ON PSALM 137

Though there is no title prefixed to this beautiful psalm, and no direct intimation as to the occasion on which it was composed, yet there can be no doubt as to the circumstances in which it was written. There is, indeed, no mention of the name of the author, and no possibility of recovering that name now, but there can be no doubt that it was composed by one of the exiles in Babylon — one who had witnessed and shared the sufferings of the exiles there, and who had also a lively recollection of the wrongs done to Jerusalem when it was attacked and destroyed by its foes. The writer was a Jew to the heart's core; an "Hebrew of the Hebrews;" embodying and expressing in this short psalm all that there was which was special in Hebrew feeling, patriotism, devotion. Nowhere else in a short compass is so much Judaism — so much Jewish piety — to be found concentrated as in this psalm. There is grief at their lonely and desolate condition in Babylon; profound and submissive silence in the midst of their troubles; indignation that they should be taunted and derided by their captors; a strong — earnest — supreme love for their native land; deep resentment at the remembrance of the many wrongs done to Jerusalem when it was destroyed; and an earliest invocation to God that he would remember those wrongs alike in relation to Edom and Babylon, and treat those wrongdoers as they deserved. It would seem most probable that the psalm was composed soon after the return from Babylon, and before the temple was finished — while the ruins of the city caused by the Edomites and Babylonians were visible everywhere. The combined remembrance of the insults in Babylon, and of the wrong done to the city at its capture, animates the poet, and fills his mind with this deep and burning indignation.

~~4201~~ Psalm 137:1. By the rivers of Babylon The streams, the water-courses, the rivulets. There was properly only one river flowing through Babylon — the Euphrates; but the city was watered, as Damascus now is, by means of canals or water-courses cut from the main river, and conveying the water to different parts of the city. For a description of Babylon, see the introductory notes to Isaiah 13. If the reference here is to Babylon proper, or the city, the allusion would be to the Euphrates flowing through it; if to Babylonia, the allusion would be to the Euphrates, and the other rivers which watered the country, as the Tigris, the Chaboras, and the Ulai. As it is most probable that the captive Hebrews were not scattered through the empire, but were concentrated in one or a few places, it is, perhaps, not improper to understand this of Babylon itself.

There we sat down There we were sitting. Perhaps a little company of friends; perhaps those assembled for worship; perhaps those who happened to come together on some special occasion; or, perhaps, a poetic representation of the general condition of the Hebrew captives, as sitting and meditating on the desolations of their native land.

Yea, we wept We sat there; we meditated; we wept. Our emotions overpowered us, and we poured forth tears. So now, there is a place in Jerusalem, at the southwest corner of the area on which the temple was built, where the Jews resort on set occasions to weep over the ruins of their city and nation.

When we remembered Zion When we thought on our native land; its former glory; the wrongs done to it; the desolations there; when we thought of the temple in ruins, and our homes as devastated; when we thought of the happy days which we had spent there, and when we contrasted them with our condition now.

Psalm 137:2. We hanged our harps upon the willows The harps once used to accompany the songs of praise and the service of God in the temple; the harps with which they had sought to beguile their weary hours, and to console their sad spirits in their captivity. The word rendered “willows” — br̄ <sup><h6155></sup> — used only in the plural, denotes the willow or osier, so called from its white, silvery leaves. Gesenius, Lexicon. Compare <sup><2157></sup>Isaiah 15:7. It is probable that the weeping willow — the willow with long pendulous branches — is here referred to. Trees in desert lands spring up along the courses of the streams, and appear, in the wide desolation, as long and waving lines of green wherever the rivers wind along. The course of a stream can thus be marked by the prolonged line of meandering green in the desert as far as the eye can reach. It has been objected to the statement here that the willow is not now found in the neighborhood of ancient Babylon, but that the palm is the only tree which grows there. I saw, however, in 1852, in James’ Park in London, a willow-tree with a label on it, stating that it was taken from the site of ancient Babylon; and there seems no reason to doubt the correctness of the account. The willow may be less abundant there now than it was in former times, as is true of the palm. tree in Palestine, but there is no reason to doubt that it grew there. All that the psalm, however, would necessarily demand in a fair interpretation would be that there should have been even a single clump of these trees planted there, under which a little band of exiles may have seated themselves when they gave utterance to the plaintive language of this psalm.

In the midst thereof In the midst of Babylon; showing that this referred to the city proper. They could not sing, such was their grief, though they had their harps with them; and they hung them up, therefore, on the branches of the trees around them; or, poetically, they were as dumb as if they had hung up their harps there.

Psalm 137:3. For there they that carried us away captive The Babylonians.

Required of us a song Asked of us a song. The word does not express the idea of compulsion or force. Margin, as in Hebrew, words of a song. Perhaps the idea is that they did not merely ask music, but they wished to hear the words — the songs themselves — in which they were accustomed to praise God. This may have been a taunt, and the request may have been in derision; or it may have been seriously, and with no desire to reproach them, or to add to their sorrows. We are not to impute bad motives to others where there is no evidence that there are any, and where the supposition of good motives will answer just as well; and the expression here may have been a kind and natural wish to hear the songs of these foreigners — songs of which they might have heard much by report; perhaps songs which they had overheard them singing when they were in a less desponding state of mind, and when they sought to comfort themselves by these ancient national melodies. As the only reason assigned for not complying with this request was that they could not “sing the Lord’s song in a strange land” (Psalm 137:3), we are rather led to infer that there was no bad motive — no disposition to taunt and ridicule them by the request that was made.

And they that wasted us Margin, laid us on heaps. The Hebrew word means a tormentor; properly, one who extorts lamentation from others, or who causes them to howl — to wit, under oppression or wrong. The Septuagint and Latin Vulgate render it, “They who led us away.” The general idea is, those under whom they were then suffering; or, who had caused these trials to come upon them.

Required of us mirth literally, “Our tormentors, joy.” The Hebrew word means joy; and the sense is, that they asked them to give the usual indications of joy and happiness — to wit, a song. The language means, “Cheer up; be happy; give us one of the beautiful songs which you were accustomed to sing in your own land.” It may, indeed, have been in derision; but there is no proof that it was.

Saying, Sing us one of the songs of Zion The songs — the sacred hymns — which you were accustomed to sing in worship in your own land.

~~4204~~ Psalm 137:4. How shall we sing the LORD’S song The song designed to celebrate his praise; that is, appropriate to the worship of Yahweh.

In a strange land Far from our home; far from the temple; exiles; captives: how can we find spirit in such circumstances to sing? How can we do that which would be indicative of what we do not feel, and cannot feel — joy and happiness! The idea is not that those psalms or songs would be profaned by being sung there, or that there would be anything improper in itself in singing them, but that it would be misplaced and incongruous to sing them in their circumstances. It would be doing violence to their own feelings; their feelings would not allow them to do it. There are states of mind when the language of joy is appropriate and natural; there are states where the heart is so sad that it cannot sing.

~~4205~~ Psalm 137:5. If I forget thee, O Jerusalem The meaning here is, that to sing in such circumstances would seem to imply that they had forgotten Jerusalem; that they were unmindful of its sorrows, and cared not that it was desolate. The remembrance of its calamities pressed hard upon them, and they could not do anything which would seem to imply that they had become unmindful of the sufferings that had come upon their nation. One will not make merry when a wife or child lies dying — or on the day of the funeral — or over the grave of a mother. A joyous and brilliant party, accompanied with music, feasting, dancing, when a friend has been just laid in the grave, when the calamities of war are abroad, when the pestilence is raging in a city, we feel to be untimely, unseemly, and incongruous. So these captives said it would be if they should make merry while their temple was in ruins; while their city was desolate; while their people were captives in a foreign land.

Let my right hand forget her cunning Let my right hand forget its skill in music — all its skill. If I should now play on the harp — as indicative of joy — let the hand which would be employed in sweeping over its strings become paralyzed and powerless. Let the punishment come where it would seem to be deserved — on the hand which could play at such a time. So Cranmer held the hand which had been employed in signing a recantation of his faith in the fire, until it was burned off, and dropped in the flames.

◀106 Psalm 137:6. If I do not remember thee Equivalent to, “If I forget thee.” If I ever fail to remember thee; if I shall ever act as if I had forgotten thee. Singing in a strange land, among those who had perpetrated such wrongs in thee — appearing to be happy, cheerful, joyous, happy, merry there — would be understood to imply that I had ceased to remember thee, and cared nothing for thee.

Let my tongue cleave to the roof of my mouth Compare ▶103 Ezekiel 3:26. Let me be unable to speak; let my tongue be as it were attached to the upper part of the mouth, so that it could not be used. If I employ it in an unworthy purpose — in any way whereby it can be inferred that I have ceased to remember my native land, and the city of our solemnities, let my tongue be ever after useless. This language is often employed by Virgil: Vox faucibus haesit.

If I prefer not Jerusalem literally, “If I do not cause to ascend.” That is, If I do not exalt Jerusalem in my estimation above everything that gives me pleasure; if I do not find my supreme happiness in that.

Above my chief joy Margin, as in Hebrew, the head of my joy. The chief thing which gives me joy; as the head is the chief, or is supreme over the body. This is expressive of a great truth in regard to religion. Anything else — everything else — is to be sooner sacrificed than that. The happiness which is found in religion is superior to that found in every other source of enjoyment, and is preferred to every other. If either is to be sacrificed — the joy of religion, or the pleasure derived from society, from the frivolous world, from literature, from music, from dancing, from works of art — it will be the latter and not the former. There are other sources of joy which are not in any way inconsistent with religion: the joy of friendship; of domestic life; of honorable pursuits of the esteem of people. So of music, the arts, gardens, literature, science. But when one interferes with the other, or is inconsistent with the other, the joy of the world is to be sacrificed to the joy of religion. When the joy of religion is sacrificed for the joy of the world, it proves that there is no true piety in the soul. Religion, if it exists at all, will always be supreme.

~~4870~~ Psalm 137:7. Remember, O LORD, the children of Edom The Edomites; the people of Idumea. On the situation of Edom or Idumea, see introductory notes to Isaiah 34.

In the day of Jerusalem In the day when Jerusalem shall be restored; in the day when punishment shall be inflicted on the nations that destroyed it; then, do not forget the Edomites, who took so large and so active a part in its overthrow. This is to be understood as a continued “remembrance” of Zion; as a purpose not to “forget” Jerusalem. The psalmist, representing the feelings of the captives in Babylon, says, that so far from doing anything which would imply a forgetfulness of their native land — as singing cheerful songs there might be understood to be, they would do everything to call Jerusalem to remembrance. They would remember her former splendor; they would remember her desolations; they would go further — they would not forget those who had brought these calamities upon her; those who had done most for her overthrow. As among the most prominent, they would remember particularly the ancient; enemies of their nation — the Edomites — who had been among the most active in its destruction, and who had united with the Babylonians in the work of ruin. They would remember all this; and they prayed God that he also would remember the desolation itself, and all the actors in that work of desolation.

Who said Implying that they had been associated with the Babylonians in the destruction of the city. On the hostility of that people to the Hebrews, and the grounds of their hostility — and on their agency as united with the Babylonians in destroying Jerusalem, and the divine vengeance threatened them on that account — see, as above, the introduction to Isaiah 34.

Rase it, rase it Margin, as in Hebrew, make bare. That is, Strip it of everything — temple, houses, ornaments, fountains — and leave it a bare and naked rock. Let nothing remain but the rocks — the foundations — on which it is built. In the history of the Edomites, as stated in the introduction to Isaiah 34, there were abundant facts to show that they were particularly zealous and active in seeking the destruction of the hated city. This verse and the one following constitute a portion of the “imprecatory” Psalms; of those which seem to cry for vengeance, and to manifest a revengeful and unforgiving spirit; the portion of the Psalms which has been regarded as so difficult to be reconciled with the forgiving spirit enjoined in the gospel. On this subject, see the General Introduction, Section 6.

Psalm 137:8. O daughter of Babylon That is, Babylon itself; the city of Babylon. On the word “daughter” as thus used, see the notes at Isaiah 1:8.

Who art to be destroyed Certainly to be destroyed; of whose destruction there are fixed and absolute prophecies. See the notes at Isaiah 13:19-22.

Happy shall he be that rewardeth thee as thou hast served us Margin, that recompenseth unto thee thy deed which thou didst to us. Literally, “Happy shall he be who shall repay to thee the recompence which thou hast recompensed unto us.” The idea is, who shall repay thee for thy treatment of us; or, as we should say in common language, “Who shall pay thee back?” That is, he will be esteemed a fortunate man who is made the instrument of inflicting deserved punishment on a city so guilty and so cruel. He will acquire fame and honor by doing it; his name will be made known abroad and perpetuated among people. In fact, the name of Cyrus, who conquered Babylon, is among the names of the most celebrated of conquerors; and the manner in which he took Babylon and overthrew the government and kingdom, has given him a most eminent place among successful princes and conquerors.

Psalm 137:9. Happy shall he be that taketh ... Margin, as in Hebrew, rock. This refers to what was not uncommon in ancient warfare, as it is now among savage tribes — the indiscriminate slaughter of those of all ages, and of both sexes, in war. It was expressly foretold of Babylon that this would occur (see Isaiah 13:16, and the notes at that place), and there may be a reference here to that prediction, and the psalmist may mean to say that the man would be accounted happy, or would be happy, who wreaked vengeance on Babylon in carrying out that prophecy. The idea is, “This will certainly occur, for it is foretold, and happy or fortunate will he be who is the instrument in fulfilling it.” Compare 2 Kings 8:12; Nahum 3:10; Hosea 13:16. See also Homer, II xxii. 63, 373, following It is impossible to reconcile such barbarous customs with the idea of “honorable war,” or with the principles of war as carried on among “civilized” nations now. It should be added, however, that there is much — very much — that is practiced in war by “civilized” nations still, which it is equally impossible to reconcile with any just notions of morality or humanity, and which in coming ages, and when people shall come to view things aright, will seem to the people of those times to be not less monstrous, strange, and barbarous. In regard to this passage, we are not necessarily to suppose that the author of the psalm approved of this, or desired it, or prayed for it. He looked forward to the fulfillment of a prediction; he saw that a just and terrible judgment would certainly come upon Babylon; he expressed that in the common language of the times, and states the manner in which it would occur; he described the feelings — the gratification — of those who would execute the divine purpose in the overthrow of Babylon; he referred to the estimate in which the conqueror would be held by people, and the glory of the achievement as giving him fame among people. It must be admitted that the feelings of the author of the psalm appear to accord with this; that he considers it proper that the city should be destroyed; and that he regards its overthrow as a righteous judgment, and as a thing to be desired in the divine administration. It is true that he might approve of such an overthrow, and see it to be right — he might describe the feelings of those by whom it would be done, their joy, their exultation, and even their barbarity, without himself approving of their barbarity, or sympathizing with their feelings, or partaking of their spirit; but still it cannot in fairness be denied that there is an apparent approval of the act here referred to, which savors more of imprecation than forgiveness, and which is apparently prompted more by the spirit of revenge than by a desire of just punishment. On this subject, however, see the General Introduction, Section 6 (4); and the notes at ~~Psalm~~ Psalm 109:10. A correct record may be made, whether of facts or of feelings, without any design of expressing either approbation or disapprobation on the part of the historian, the prophet, or the poet.

APPENDIX NOTES ON PSALM 137

~~Psalm~~ Psalm 137:8,9. Happy shall he be that rewardeth thee See the Appendix on Psalm 69; 109.

Examination shows that the imprecations are not the utterance of resentment for private injuries, or of a base desire to see personal enemies laid low. Sometimes, as in the wish expressed for the destruction of Edom and Babylon in Psalm 137, the objects of the imprecation are the nations which have cruelly wronged the people of God. — Binnie.

The principles so ably laid down by the author himself in his introduction and elsewhere, form a sufficient answer to the remark or concession he makes under these verses, to the effect, namely, that the language here savors more of imprecation than forgiveness, and is apparently prompted more by the spirit of revenge than by a desire of just punishment.

Calvin's view of this passage is characterized by his wonted penetration and judgment. We present the reader with it:

“The psalmist discerns the coming judgment of God, though not yet apparent, by the eye of faith, as the apostle well calls faith ‘the beholding of things not seen.’ Incredible as it might appear that any calamity should overtake so mighty an empire as Babylon then was, and impregnable as it was generally considered to be, he sees in the glass of the Word its destruction and overthrow. He calls upon all God's people to do the same, and by faith from the elevation of heaven's oracles, to despise the pride of that abandoned city. If the divine promises inspire us with hope and confidence, and God's Spirit attemper our afflictions to the rule of his own uprightness, we shall lift up our hands in the lowest depths of affliction to which we may be cast down, and glory in the fact that it is well with us in our worst distresses, and that our enemies are devoted to destruction. In declaring those to be happy who should pay back vengeance upon the Babylonians, he does not mean that the service done by the Medes and Persians, in itself, met with the approbation of God, for they were actuated in the war by ambition, insatiable covetousness, and unprincipled rivalry; but he declares that a war which was carried on in a manner under God's auspices, should be crowned with success. As God had determined to punish Babylon, he pronounced a blessing upon Cyrus and Darius, while on the other hand Jeremiah (<sup>3880</sup>Jeremiah 48:10) declares those cursed who should do the work of the Lord negligently, that is, fail in strenuously carrying out the work of desolation and destruction to which God had called them as his hired executioners. It may seem to savor of cruelty, that he should wish the tender and innocent infants to be dashed and mangled upon the stones, But he does not speak under the impulse of personal feeling, and only employs words which God had himself authorized, so that this is but the declaration of a just judgment, as when our Lord says, ‘With what measure ye mete, it shall be measured to you again’ (<sup>4000</sup>Matthew

7:2). Isaiah (<sup>2316</sup>Isaiah 13:16) had issued a special prediction in reference to Babylon, which the psalmist has doubtless here in his eye — ‘Behold God has sharpened the iron, and bent the bows; he sends forth the Medes and Persians, which shall not regard silver and gold; they shall thirst for blood only,’ etc.”

NOTES ON PSALM 138

This is the first of a series of eight psalms (Psalm 138—145), placed together in this part of the book, and ascribed to David. They appear to be of the nature of a supplement to the Book of Psalms, composed of psalms unknown to the original collector and arranger of the book, and subsequently discovered and ascertained to be the works of David. It is not to be regarded as strange that there should be psalms of this nature David at different periods which might have been preserved in different branches of his family, and which might not have been generally known to exist. It is rare that the works of an author, especially a poet, are collected and published, and that things of this kind — fugitive and occasional pieces — are not subsequently found; nor is it very unusual that such pieces may, after all, be among the most tender, touching, and beautiful of his compositions. Burns' Highland Mary," so much admired, and his "When wild War's deadly blast was blown," a poem which no one can read without tears — with not a few others of his, are of this description. They are said, in his Biography, to have been "extracted from the correspondence of Burns." (Works of Robert Burns, Philad., 1834, pp. 76,85,89.)

The occasion on which this psalm was composed cannot now be determined. It was evidently written in view of trouble (~~138B~~ Psalm 138:3,7), and it expresses confidence that God would interpose in the future in behalf of the author, as he had done in the past; and it is, therefore, adapted to inspire confidence and hope in all who are called to pass through scenes of trial. The psalm does not admit of any particular analysis.

~~138C~~ Psalm 138:1. I will praise thee with my whole heart Reserving nothing in my heart to give to idols or to other gods. All that constitutes praise to God as God, he would address to him alone. He would use no language, and cherish no feeling, which implied a belief that there was any other God; he would indulge in no attachment which would be inconsistent with supreme attachment to God, or which would tend to draw away his affections from him. See the notes at ~~138D~~ Psalm 9:1.

Before the gods will I sing praise unto thee The idols; all idols; in preference to them all. This does not mean that he would do this in the presence of other gods; but that Yahweh should be acknowledged to be God in preference to any or all of them.

~~4882~~ Psalm 138:2. I will worship I will bow down and adore.

Toward thy holy temple See the notes at ~~4882~~ Psalm 5:7. The word temple here undoubtedly refers to the tabernacle.

And praise thy name for thy loving-kindness Praise thee for thy benignity; thy mercy; thy benevolence.

And for thy truth Thy truthfulness; thy faithfulness to thy promises.

For thou hast magnified thy word Thou hast made it great. Compare ~~3921~~ Isaiah 42:21. The reference here is to the promises of God, and especially to the promise which God had made to David that the Messiah would descend from him. Compare 2 Samuel 7.

Above all thy name Above all else that thou hast done; above all the other manifestations of thyself to me or to the world. The word name here would refer properly to all that God had done to make himself known — since it is by the name that we designate or distinguish anyone; and, thus understood, the meaning would be, that the word of God — the revelation which he has made of himself and of his gracious purposes to mankind — is superior in clearness, and in importance, to all the other manifestations which he has made of himself; all that can be known of him in his works. Beyond all question there are higher and clearer manifestations of himself, of his being, of his perfection, of his purposes, in the volume of revelation, than any which his works have disclosed or can disclose. Compare Psalm 19. There are very many points in relation to God, of the highest interest to mankind, on which the disclosures of science shed no light; there are many things which it is desirable for man to know, which can never be learned in the schools of philosophy; there are consolations which man needs in a world of trouble which cannot be found in nature; there is especially a knowledge of the method by which sin may be pardoned, and the soul saved, which can never be disclosed by the blow-pipe, the telescope, or the microscope. These things, if learned at all must be learned from revelation, and these are of more importance to man as a traveler to another world than all the learning which can be acquired in the schools of philosophy — valuable as that learning is.

Psalm 138:3. In the day when I cried Referring to some former period of his life when he was in trouble.

Thou answeredst me In the very day when I called, thou gavest me the answer: that is, immediately.

And strengthenedst me with strength in my soul literally, “Thou didst embolden — or, didst make me courageous with strength.” Thou didst enable me to meet danger, and to overcome fear. It would seem probable that this was on some occasion when he was in danger from his enemies.

Psalm 138:4. All the kings of the earth shall praise thee ... That is, kings, princes, and rulers shall learn the words of promise; shall be made acquainted with the words which thou hast graciously spoken, and with their fulfillment, and shall be led to praise thee. This refers to a time, of which frequent prophetic mention is made in the Scriptures, when kings and rulers shall be converted to the true religion, and when they shall act an important part, by their example and influence, in maintaining and diffusing it. Compare Psalm 68:31,32; Isaiah 49:23.

Psalm 138:5. Yea, they shall sing in the ways of the LORD In the ways which God has appointed. They shall join with all that love him — with the humblest of the people — in acknowledging God. Kings and people shall thus bow before God in common acts of praise, and as being on the same level before him. As people, as sinners, as redeemed, as traveling to the grave, they are all alike before God.

For great is the glory of the LORD Great is his character; great his dignity; great his honor; and all this will be seen to be so when those of most exalted rank thus worship and adore him. The most lofty on earth shall acknowledge that there is one who is more exalted than they are, and their own dignity and splendor shall thus contribute to deepen the impression of the honor and glory of God.

Psalm 138:6. Though the LORD be high This might be rendered “For lofty is Yahweh — and the humble he sees — and the proud he knows from afar.” The idea is, that God — so high and exalted — sees and knows all of every rank among people. The mind of the psalmist had been impressed with a sense of the greatness and majesty of God, but (as if it might be said that one so great could not regard man, so humble and insignificant) he adds, that the fact of God’s exaltation does not prevent his noticing the affairs of people: that the lowly in life need not fear lest they should be overlooked; the proud need not hope that they will escape the notice of his eye.

Yet hath he respect unto the lowly Those in humble life; the obscure; the unknown. It does not mean here that he has any special favor toward them, but merely that he sees them. Their low and obscure condition does not prevent his observing them, and they need have no fear that he will overlook them, or that they will be forgotten. Compare the notes at <sup><3006></sup>James 4:6; <sup><4085></sup>1 Peter 5:5.

But the proud Those of lofty rank, and of lofty feelings; the haughty.

He knoweth afar off From afar. Though he is exalted — though he is in heaven — yet he is not so far removed but that he sees them, and knows them altogether. Distance from him is no protection for them; nor can the wicked hope to escape notice from the fact that God reigns over distant worlds.

<sup><8007></sup>Psalm 138:7. Though I walk in the midst of trouble Though I am in the low vale of sorrow, I shall not be overlooked or forgotten. This implies that the writer was then in trouble, and it expresses the conviction that whenever he should be in trouble God would remember him, and give him life and strength.

Thou wilt revive me Thou wilt cause me to live; thou wilt give me life. <sup><4085></sup>Psalm 30:3. Compare the notes at <sup><47120></sup>Psalm 71:20. The meaning is, Thou wilt give me life — vigor — strength — to bear the trouble.

Thou shalt stretch forth thine hand As one does when he is about to inflict a blow.

Against the wrath of mine enemies ... In reference to all their attempts to destroy me. Thou wilt meet their wrath by thy power, and I shall be safe.

<sup><8008></sup>Psalm 138:8. The LORD will perfect that which concerneth me He will complete what he has begun. He will not begin to interpose in my behalf, and then abandon me. He will not promise to save me, and then fail to fulfill his promise. He will not encourage me, and then cast me off. So of us. He will complete what he begins. He will not convert a soul, and then leave it to perish. “Grace will complete what grace begins.” See the notes at Phil 1:6.

Thy mercy, O LORD, endureth for ever See the notes at ~~Psalm~~ Psalm 136:1.

Forsake not the works of thine own hands What thou hast made; what thou hast begun to do. Do not leave me to perish. Prayer is one of the means — and an essential means — by which the saints are to be kept unto salvation. The doctrine of the “perseverance of the saints.” is not inconsistent with prayer, but rather prompts to it; and he who professes to rely on that doctrine, and feels so safe that he does not need to pray, and does not pray, gives certain evidence that he has never been converted, and has no true religion.

General Notes on Psalm 138 to Psalm 145

These eight psalms form a series of Davidic psalms; and the reason assigned by our author for their insertion so near the close of the book, and far apart from the other psalms of the same author, is as probable as any other.

The titles assign the series to David; and Hengstenberg and Alexander do not hesitate to accept them as authoritative. They suppose the Psalms to have been among the last composed by David, and to have special reference to the promise in 2 Samuel 7.

We have now in Psalm 138—145 a cycle of Davidic psalms, called forth by David’s reflection upon the promise in 2 Samuel 7, and by the anxiety which filled him regarding his posterity. In them he accompanies his offspring through their future history, and presents to them the anchor of safety in the storms, which he knew from his own experience certainly awaited them. We have here a prophetic legacy of David corresponding to his last words in 2 Samuel 23. That these psalms close the series of Davidic psalms is certainly not accidental, but is in unison with their internal character, and the time of their composition.

In Psalm 138 David sets the promise before the eyes of his family. In Psalm 139 he presents to their view, for their consolation and incitement, the all-present God. In Psalm 140 he brings still more closely to them the circumstances of danger that lay before them. In Psalm 141 he strengthens them against the internal dangers with which the external necessity threatened them. In Psalm 142; 143 he shows them how they were to sustain themselves if matters came to an extremity with them. Psalm 144 forms the transition from the prayer-songs to the song of praise with which in Psalm 145 the whole is concluded. There manifestly exists a correspondence between Psalm 138, the rejoicing on account of the promise of the Lord, and Psalm 145, the rejoicing on account of its fulfillment; the lamentations and prayers are enclosed by praise and thanksgivings.

The appropriateness and connection of these psalms is acknowledged to some extent even by those who have deprived themselves of the vantage-ground of the superscriptions. Thus Ewald says of Psalm 140—143: “A series of songs so similar in matter, and so much of one stamp, that one can hardly doubt that they were the production of the same poet.” Koster agrees and adds: “I take them for a supplement of the old Davidic songs. For in place of the liturgical expansive character of the preceding psalms, we are here at once brought back to the lively alternation of feelings which prevailed in Psalm 3 ss.” Hitzig remarks on Psalm 140: “The three following psalms are of a quite similar kind, and appear to have been composed by one author much about the same time.”

Seventy-two psalms of David have gone before. These 8 bring up the entire number to 80. We may perhaps regard Psalm 138 as the governing castle, and the remaining heptad as divided into three and four. The section would then be denoted by the extended superscription of Psalm 142. — Hengstenberg.

THE APPENDIX NOTES ON PSALM 138

Psalm 138. This psalm belongs to that chain of Davidic psalms which were called forth by the promise in 2 Samuel 7, and which rest upon it, Psalm 18; Psalm 21; Psalm 61; Psalm 101—103; Psalm 110, compare Psalm 72; Psalm 139 and Psalm 132. That the promise here celebrated is no other than that is clear as day. Here, as well as there, the subject handled has respect to a promise of blessing of surpassing greatness — the idols, which could exhibit nothing similar, must retreat before it ashamed, ~~138:1~~ Psalm 138:1; the Lord has glorified himself more by it than by all his earlier wonders, ~~138:2~~ Psalm 138:2; all kings of the earth will one day praise the Lord on account of it. Further, here, as well as there, we have to do, not with a particular blessing, but with a chain of blessings, which reaches even into eternity, ~~138:8~~ Psalm 138:8. Finally, the promise has here the same subject as there. This is described more pointedly here in ~~138:6,7~~ Psalm 138:6,7: God elevates the oppressed David above all height, revives him in the midst of trouble, brings down all his enemies.

If the psalm refers to the promise in 2 Samuel 7, there can be no doubt of the correctness of the superscription which ascribes it to David. For he, on whom the promise has been conferred, himself stands forth as the speaker. It is a proof also of David's authorship, the union, so characteristic of him, of bold courage (see especially ~~Psalm~~ Psalm 138:3) and deep humility (~~Psalm~~ Psalm 138:6). And in proof of the same comes, finally, the near relationship in which it stands with the other psalms of David, especially those which likewise refer to the promise of the everlasting kingdom, and with David's thanksgiving in 2 Samuel 7, the conclusion of which, "And now, Lord God, the word which thou hast spoken upon thy servant and upon his house, that fulfil even to eternity, and do as thou hast spoken," remarkably. agrees with the conclusion of our psalm. — Hengstenberg.

NOTES ON PSALM 139

This psalm purports to be a psalm of David, and there is no reason to doubt that it is properly attributed to him. See introduction to Psalm 138. At what time it was composed is, however, unknown. It contains reflections which might have occurred at any period of his life; yet it would seem most probable that it was not written in his early years, but that it is a record of his most mature thoughts on a great and very important subject.

The psalm relates to the omnipresence of God, and contains such reflections as would occur to one meditating on that attribute of the Deity. It is the most distinct and full statement of that doctrine which is to be found in the Hebrew Scriptures, and the doctrine is presented in language which has never been surpassed for sublimity and beauty. The leading idea in the psalm seems to be that of comfort from the fact that God is everywhere; that he knows all that pertains to us; that we can never be hidden from his view; that he has known us from the beginning; that as he fashioned and formed us — making us what we are — he knows all our necessities, and can supply them. The psalm consists of three parts:

I. A celebration of the Omniscience and Omnipresence of God, as a ground of confidence and hope, <sup><B00></sup>Psalm 139:1-18.

(a) The fact that he knows all that there is in the heart, <sup><B01></sup>Psalm 139:1-6.

(b) The fact that he is everywhere present, <sup><B02></sup>Psalm 139:7-12.

(c) The fact that all in our past life has been known to God; that he has created us, and that his eye has been upon us from the beginning of our existence, <sup><B03></sup>Psalm 139:13-16.

(d) The fact that his thoughts toward us are precious, and numberless as the sand, <sup><B04></sup>Psalm 139:17,18.

II. The feelings of the psalmist in relation to the acts of the wicked as a proof that he loved God, <sup><B05></sup>Psalm 139:19-22. These reflections seem to have sprung from his contemplation of the divine character and perfections, as leading him to hate all that was opposed to a Being so pure, so benevolent, so holy. On looking into his own heart, in view of what God was, he was conscious that he had no sympathy with the enemies of God as such; that such was his love for the character of God, and such his confidence in him, that he could have nothing in common with them in their feelings toward God, but wished to be dissociated from them forever.

III. The expression of a desire that, as God saw all the recesses of the human soul, he would search his heart, and would detect any evil he might see there, and deliver him from the evil, and lead him in the way which conducted to life eternal, <sup><K023></sup>Psalm 139:23,24. Anyone may feel, and must feel, that after all which he knows of himself — after all the effort which he makes to ascertain what is within his heart — there are depths there which his eye cannot penetrate, and that there may be sins of thought and feeling there which he has not detected; but it is only from the consciousness of sincerity, and a true desire to honor God, that one can pray that God would search him, and that he would detect and bring out every form of sin which he may see concealed and lurking in the soul. He who can sincerely offer this prayer is a pious man.

<sup><K001></sup>Psalm 139:1. O LORD, thou hast searched me The word rendered searched, has a primary reference to searching the earth by boring or digging, as for water or metals. See <sup><K003></sup>Job 28:3. Then it means to search accurately or closely.

And known me As the result of that search, or that close investigation. Thou seest all that is in my heart. Nothing is, or can be, concealed from thee. It is with this deep consciousness that the psalm begins; and all that follows is but an expansion and application of this idea. It is of much advantage in suggesting right reflections on our own character, to have this full consciousness that God knows us altogether; that he sees all that there is in our heart; that he has been fully acquainted with our past life.

<sup><K001></sup>Psalm 139:2. Thou knowest my downsitting ... In the various circumstances of life, thou knowest me. Thou knowest me in one place as well as in another. I cannot so change my position that thou wilt not see me, and that thou wilt not be perfectly acquainted with all that I say, and all that I do. In every posture, in every movement, in every occupation, thou hast a full knowledge of me. I cannot go out of thy sight; I cannot put myself into such a position that thou wilt not see me.

Thou understandest my thought Hebrew, “As to my thought.” That is, Thou seest what my plans are; what I design to do; “what I am thinking about.” A most solemn reflection! How unwilling would bad people be — would even good people be — to have those round about them know always “what they are thinking about.”

Afar off Not when the “thought” is far off; but “thou,” being far off, seest us as clearly as if thou wert near. I cannot go to such a distance from thee that thou wilt not see perfectly all that I am thinking about.

Psalm 139:3. Thou compassest my path ... Margin, “winnowest.” The Hebrew word — hrz,<sup><h2219></sup> — means properly “to scatter,” to cast loosely about — as the wind does dust; and then, to winnow — to wit, by throwing grain, when it is thrashed, up to the wind: <sup><h334></sup>Isaiah 30:24; <sup><h401></sup>Jeremiah 4:11; <sup><h408></sup>Ruth 3:2. Then it means “to winnow out;” that is, to winnow out all the chaff, and to leave all the grain — to save all that is valuable. So here it means that God, as it were, “sifted” him. Compare <sup><h338></sup>Isaiah 30:28; <sup><h309></sup>Amos 9:9; <sup><h223></sup>Luke 22:31. He scattered all that was chaff, or all that was valueless, and saw what there was that was real and substantial. When it is said that he did this in his “path and his lying down,” it is meant that he did it in every way; altogether; entirely.

And art acquainted with all my ways All the paths that I tread; the whole course of my life. All that I do, in all places and at all times, is fully known to thee.

Psalm 139:4. For there is not a word in my tongue All that I say; all that I have power to say; all that I am disposed at any time to say.

But lo, O LORD, thou knowest it altogether All that pertains to it. What is “said,” and what is “meant.” Merely to “hear” what is spoken does not imply necessarily a full knowledge of what is said — for it may be false, insincere, hypocritical. God knows exactly what is said and what is “meant.”

Psalm 139:5. Thou hast beset me behind and before The word rendered “beset” — rwx,<sup><h6697></sup> — means properly to press; to press upon; to compress. It has reference commonly to the siege of a city, or to the pressing on of troops in war; and then it comes to mean to besiege, hem in, closely surround, so that there is no way of escape. This is the idea here — that God was on every side of him; that he could not escape in any direction. He was like a garrison besieged in a city so that there was no means of escape. There is a transition here (not an unnatural one), from the idea of the Omniscience of God to that of His Omnipresence, and the remarks which follow have a main reference to the latter.

And laid thine hand upon me That is, If I try to escape in any direction I find thine band laid upon me there. Escape is impossible.

Psalm 139:6. Such knowledge is too wonderful for me literally, “Wonderful knowledge away from me,” or, more than I can comprehend. It is beyond my reach; it surpasses all my powers to comprehend it.

It is high, I cannot attain unto it It is so exalted that I cannot grasp it; I cannot understand how it can be.

Psalm 139:7. Whither shall I go from thy spirit? Where shall I go where thy spirit is not; that is, where thou art not; where there is no God. The word “spirit” here does not refer particularly to the Holy Spirit, but to God “as” a spirit. “Whither shall I go from the all-pervading Spirit — from God, considered as a spirit?” This is a clear statement that God is a “Spirit” (compare John 4:24); and that, as a spirit, he is Omnipresent.

Or whither shall I flee from thy presence? Hebrew, From his face; that is, where he will not be, and will not see me. I cannot find a place — a spot in the universe, where there is not a God, and the same God. Fearful thought to those that hate him — that, much as they may wish or desire it, they can never find a place where there is not a holy God! Comforting to those that love him — that they will never be where they may not find a God — their God; that nowhere, at home or abroad, on land or on the ocean, on earth or above the stars, they will ever reach a world where they will not be in the presence of that God — that gracious Father — who can defend, comfort, guide, and sustain them.

Psalm 139:8. If I ascend up into heaven The word “heaven” here, in the original is in the plural number — “heavens,” — and includes all that there is above the earth — the highest worlds.

If I make my bed Properly, “If I strew or spread my couch.” If I should seek that as the place where to lie down.

In hell Hebrew, “Sheol.” See the notes at Isaiah 14:9, where the word is fully explained. The word here refers to the under-world — the abodes of the dead; and, in the apprehension of the psalmist, corresponds in depth with the word “heaven” in height. The two represent all worlds, above and below; and the idea is, that in neither direction, above or below, could he go where God would not be.

Thou art there Or, more emphatically and impressively in the original, “Thou!” That is, the psalmist imagines himself in the highest heaven, or in the deepest abodes of the dead — and lo! God is there also! he has not gone from “him”! he is still in the presence of the same God!

◀▶▶ Psalm 139:9. If I take the wings of the morning literally, “I will take the wings of the morning.” That is, I will take this as a supposable case; I will imagine what would occur, should I be able to take to myself the wings of the morning, and endeavor to escape “by flight” from the presence of God, or go where he could not pursue me, or where he would not be. The “wings of the morning” evidently mean that by which the light of the morning “seems to fly” — the most rapid object known to us. It is not to be supposed that the psalmist had an idea of the exact velocity of light, but to him that was the most rapid object known; and his language is not the “less” striking because the laws of its flight have become accurately known. The word rendered “morning” refers to the dawn — the daybreak — the Aurora — the “first” beams of the morning light. The beams of light are in fact no swifter than at any other time of the day, but they seem to be swifter, as they so quickly penetrate the darkness.

And dwell in the uttermost parts of the sea The end of the sea; that is, the “west,” as the sea referred to undoubtedly is the Mediterranean, which was west of Palestine, and which became another name for the west. The idea is, that if he could fly with the rapidity of light, and could be in an instant over the sea, even beyond its remotest border, still God would be there before him. He could not escape from the divine presence.

◀▶▶ Psalm 139:10. Even there shall thy hand lead me I shall find thee there; thy hand would be upon me; I should not have gone from thy presence.

And thy right hand shall hold me Still hold me; still be laid upon me. I should find myself there, as certainly as here, in thy hand; and in the same sense — either to seize upon me if I went astray, or to protect me, if obedient, supported by thee in all the perils of the flight. God, still the same — the same in all respects — would be with me there as he is here.

Psalm 139:11. If I say, Surely the darkness shall cover me If I seek to find refuge in the darkness of the night so that God would not see me. The word rendered “cover” — ālv<sup><אָלַף></sup> — means properly to snap, to gape after; then, to lie in wait for; and then, to attack, or fall upon anyone, unexpectedly. It is rendered “bruise” (twice) in <sup><אָרַבַּס></sup>Genesis 3:15, “He shall “bruise” thy head, and thou shalt “bruise” his heel;” “breaketh” in <sup><אָרַבַּת></sup>Job 9:17, “He “breaketh” me with a tempest;” and in this place “cover.” It does not occur elsewhere. Here it means to fall upon; to overpower; to cover. The idea is, If it should come suddenly upon me; if I should be involved in sudden darkness — “as if” the darkness should come and attempt to “snatch” me away from God. All this would be in vain, for it would be, so far as God is concerned, bright day around me.

Even the night shall be light about me In respect to me. It shall be as if I stood in the full blaze of light. God can see me still; he can mark my goings; he can perceive all that I do as plainly then as at mid-day. This “is” so: and what a thought this is for a wicked man who seeks to escape detection in his crimes by perpetrating them in the night! What a thought for a good man, that in the darkest night of sorrow, when there seems to be nothing but deep midnight, when there appears to be not a ray of light in his dwelling, or on his path that all to the eye of God is as clear as noon-day! For in that night of sorrow God sees him as plainly as in the brightest days of prosperity and joy.

Psalm 139:12. Yea, the darkness hideth not from thee Margin, as in Hebrew, “darkeneth not.” Darkness does not make darkness to thee. It makes things dark to us; not to him. So it is in natural darkness; so in moral darkness. It seems dark to us; it is not so to him. Things appear dark to us — disappointment, bereavement, trouble, care, losses; but all is light to God. The existence of sin and suffering on the earth seems dark to us; not to him, for he sees the reasons and the end of all.

But the night shineth as the day One is as bright and clear to him as the other.

The darkness and the light are both alike to thee Margin, as in Hebrew, “As is the darkness so is the light.” To thee there is no difference. All is light.

Psalm 139:13. For thou hast possessed my reins The word here rendered “possessed” means properly to “set upright,” to “erect,” and hence, the derivative of the verb is applied to a cane or reed, as being erect. Then the word means to found, to create, <sup><0149></sup>Genesis 14:19,22 — as the heavens and the earth; and then, to get, to gain, to purchase, etc. Here the word seems to be used in its original sense, to make, create, etc. The idea is, not as in our translation, that God “possessed” or “owned” them but that he had “made” them, and that, “therefore,” he knew all about them. The word “reins” means literally the “kidneys;” and then, it comes to denote the inward part, the mind, the soul, the seat of the desires, affections, and passions. <sup><2112></sup>Jeremiah 11:20. See the notes at <sup><1970></sup>Psalm 7:9; <sup><1827></sup>Job 19:27. The meaning here is, that God had made him; that the innermost recesses of his being had been constituted as they are by God; and that, “therefore,” he must be able to see all that there is in the very depths of the soul, however it may be hidden from the eye of man.

Thou hast covered me in my mother’s womb The word here rendered “cover” means properly to interweave; to weave; to knit together, and the literal translation would be, “Thou hast “woven” me in my mother’s womb, meaning that God had put his parts together, as one who weaves cloth, or who makes a basket. So it is rendered by DeWette and by Gesenius (Lexicon). The original word has, however, also the idea of protecting, as in a booth or hut, woven or knit together — to wit, of boughs and branches. The former signification best suits the connection; and then the sense would be, that as God had made him — as he had formed his members, and united them in a bodily frame and form before he was born — he must be able to understand all his thoughts and feelings. As he was not concealed from God before he saw the light, so he could not be anywhere.

Psalm 139:14. I will praise thee I will not merely admire what is so great and marvelous, but I will acknowledge thee in a public manner as wise, and holy, and good: as entitled to honor, love, and gratitude.

For I am fearfully and wonderfully made The word rendered “fearfully” means properly “fearful things;” things suited to produce fear or reverence. The word rendered “wonderfully made” means properly to distinguish; to separate. The literal translation of this — as near as can be given — would be, “I am distinguished by fearful things;” that is, by things in my creation which are suited to inspire awe. I am distinguished among thy works by things which tend to exalt my ideas of God, and to fill my soul with reverent and devout feelings. The idea is, that he was “distinguished” among the works of creation, or so “separated” from other things in his endowments as to work in the mind a sense of awe. He was made different from inanimate objects, and from the brute creation; he was “so” made, in the entire structure of his frame, as to fill the mind with wonder. The more anyone contemplates his own bodily formation, and becomes acquainted with the anatomy of the human frame, and the more he understands of his mental organization, the more he will see the force and propriety of the language used by the psalmist.

Marvellous are thy works Fitted are they to excite wonder and admiration. The particular reference here is to his own formation; but the same remark may be made of the works of God in general.

And that my soul knoweth right well Margin, as in Hebrew, “greatly.” I am fully convinced of it. I am deeply impressed by it. We can see clearly that the works of God are “wonderful,” even if we can understand nothing else about them.

Psalm 139:15. My substance was not hid from thee Thou didst see it; thou didst understand it altogether, when it was hidden from the eyes of man. The word “substance” is rendered in the margin, “strength” or “body.” The Septuagint, the Latin Vulgate, the Syriac, the Arabic, and Luther render it, “my bone,” or “my bones.” The word properly means strength, and then anything strong. Another form of the word, with different pointing in the Hebrew, means a bone, so called from its strength. The allusion here is to the bodily frame, considered as strong, or as that which has strength. Whatever there was that entered into and constituted the vigor of his frame, the psalmist says, was seen and known by God, even in its commencement, and when most feeble. Its capability to become strong — feeble as it then was — could not even at that time be concealed or hidden from the view of God.

When I was made in secret In the womb; or, hidden from the eye of man. Even then thine eye saw me, and saw the wondrous process by which my members were formed. “And curiously wrought.” Literally, “embroidered.” The Hebrew word — מְקַעֵ<sup>h7551</sup> — means to deck with color, to variegate. Hence, it means to variegate a garment; to weave with threads of various colors. With us the idea of embroidering is that of working various colors on a cloth by a needle. The Hebrew word, however, properly refers to the act of “weaving in” various threads — as now in weaving carpets. The reference here is to the various and complicated tissues of the human frame — the tendons, nerves, veins, arteries, muscles, “as if” they had been woven, or as they appear to be curiously interweaved. No work of tapestry can be compared with this; no art of man could “weave” together such a variety of most tender and delicate fibres and tissues as those which go to make up the human frame, even if they were made ready to his hand: and who but God could “make” them? The comparison is a most beautiful one; and it will be admired the more, the more man understands the structure of his own frame.

In the lowest parts of the earth Wrought in a place as dark, as obscure, and as much beyond the power of human observation as though it had been done low down beneath the ground where no eye of man can penetrate. Compare the notes at <sup><K3X7></sup> Job 28:7,8.

<sup><H916></sup> Psalm 139:16. Thine eyes did see my substance, yet being unperfect

This whole verse is very obscure, but the “idea” in this expression clearly is, “Before I had shape or form thou didst see what I was to be.” The single word in the original translated “my substance, yet being unperfect,” is <sup><H1564></sup> מִלְּבָרָא . It occurs only in this place, though the verb — <sup><H1563></sup> מִלְּבָרָא — is found in <sup><H118></sup> 2 Kings 2:8, where it is used in reference to the mantle of Elijah: And Elijah took his mantle, and “wrapped it together,” etc. That is, he rolled it up, or he folded it. The noun, then, means that which “is” rolled or wrapped together; that which is folded up, and hence, is applicable to anything folded up or undeveloped; and would thus most aptly denote the embryo, or the foetus, where all the members of the body are as yet folded up, or undeveloped; that is, before they have assumed their distinct form and proportions. This is undoubtedly the idea here. Before the embryo had any such form that its future size, shape, or proportions could be marked by the eye of man, it was clearly and distinctly known by God.

And in thy book Where thou recordest all things. Perhaps the allusion here would be to the book of an architect or draftsman, who, before his work is begun, draws his plan, or sketches it for the direction of the workmen.

All my members were written The words “my members” are not in the original. The Hebrew is, as in the margin, “all of them.” The reference may be, not to the members of his body, but to his “days” (see the margin on the succeeding phrase) — and then the sense would be, all my “days,” or all the periods of my life, were delineated in thy book. That is, When my substance — my form — was not yet developed, when yet an embryo, and when nothing could be determined from that by the eye of man as to what I was to be, all the future was known to God, and was written down — just what should be my form and vigor; how long I should live; what I should be; what would be the events of my life.

Which in continuance were fashioned Margin, “What days they should be fashioned.” Literally, “Days should be formed.” DeWette renders this, “The days were determined before any one of them was.” There is nothing in the Hebrew to correspond with the phrase “in continuance.” The simple idea is, The days of my life were determined on, the whole matter was fixed and settled, not by anything seen in the embryo, but “before” there was any form — before there were any means of judging from what I then was to what I would be — all was seen and arranged in the divine mind.

When as yet there was none of them literally, “And not one among them.” Before there was one of them in actual existence. Not one development had yet occurred from which it could be inferred what the rest would be. The entire knowledge on the subject must have been based on Omniscience.

Psalm 139:17. How precious also are thy thoughts unto me, O God!

On the word “thoughts,” see the notes at <sup>AD17</sup>Psalm 139:2. Compare <sup>AD23</sup>Psalm 139:23. The remark is made here doubtless in view of the numberless “thoughts” involved in planning and forming a frame so wondrous, and in the care necessary to bring it to perfection; to develop it; to provide for it; to guard and defend it. How many “thoughts” of a parent are employed in behalf of his children, in providing for them; teaching them; counseling them; anticipating their needs. How many more thoughts are needful on the part of God in reference to each one of us: for there are numberless things necessary for us which cannot occupy the mind of a parent, since he cannot accomplish these things for us; they do not lie within his province, or in his power.

How great is the sum of them literally, “How strong are the heads of them.” That is, The heading of them, or the summing of them up, would be a task beyond the power of man. And who “could” estimate the number of the “thoughts” necessarily bestowed on himself by his Maker in all the care exercised over him; all the arrangements for his development and growth; all that is done to defend him from danger; all that is indispensable in providing for his needs; all that was necessary to secure the salvation of his soul! See the notes at <sup><39416></sup>Psalm 40:5.

<sup><40918></sup>Psalm 139:18. If I should count them If I could count them.

They are more in number than the sand Numberless as the sand on the sea-shore.

When I awake, I am still with thee When I am lost in deep and profound meditation on this subject, and am aroused again to consciousness, I find the same thing still true. The fact of “my” being forgetful, or lost in profound meditation, has made no difference with thee. Thou art still the same; and the same unceasing care, the same thoughtfulness, still exists in regard to me. Or, the meaning may be, sleeping or waking with me, it is still the same in regard to thee. Thine eyes never close. When mine are closed in sleep, thou art round about me; when I awake from that unconscious state, I find the same thing existing still. I have been lost in forgetfulness of thee in my slumbers; but thou hast not forgotten me. There has been no change — no slumbering — with thee.

<sup><40919></sup>Psalm 139:19. Surely thou wilt slay the wicked, O God Compare the notes at <sup><23104></sup>Isaiah 11:4. The literal translation of this would be, “If thou wilt slay the wicked.” It is not easy to account for the sudden and remarkable transition or diversion of the train of thought from the main subject of the psalm, in these verses (<sup><40919></sup>Psalm 139:19-22), in which the psalmist gives vent to his feelings toward the wicked, and prays that they may depart from him. Perhaps the explanation of it may be, that as the psalmist was reflecting on the fact that God is everywhere present, that he searches the hearts of people, that he must know all their conduct, he was suddenly struck with the idea of the condition of wicked people in the presence, and under the eye, of such a Being. As God knows all things, he must know them; and this instantaneously suggested the idea of their guilt and danger. People of such characters could not deceive such a God. They could not but be known to him, and could not but be objects of his aversion. They could not, therefore, but be in danger.

Depart from me, therefore, ye bloody men See <sup><40915></sup>Psalm 119:115. The Hebrew is, “Men of bloods;” that is, men who shed blood. The language is used to denote wicked men in general. The idea here is not that the psalmist was in danger from them at that time, but that he desired to be separate from that class of people; he did not wish to be ranked with them, to partake of their conduct, or to share in their fate. He had no sympathy with them, and he desired to be separate from them altogether.

Psalm 139:20. For they speak against thee wickedly This is one form or manifestation of their character as wicked people, that they speak maliciously against God. The psalmist, therefore, desired to have nothing to do with them. It is always a sufficient reason for avoiding the society, the friendship, and the fellowship of others, when they profane, blaspheme, or calumniate the name of God. From such men we should at once withdraw. Piety shrinks from the society of such men, whatever may be their rank, or their social qualities, and turns away in pain, in sorrow, in abhorrence. See the notes at Psalm 26:9.

And thine enemies take thy name in vain It is proof that they are thine enemies that they take thy name in vain, or that they are profane men; it is a sufficient reason for desiring to be separated from them.

Psalm 139:21. Do not I hate them, O LORD, that hate thee? This is in the consciousness of the psalmist a proof of his own real piety, as derived from his feelings toward those who were the enemies of God. The word hate here, as applied to them, must be understood in the sense that he disapproved of their conduct; that he did not desire to be associated with them; that he wished to avoid their society, and to find his friends among men of a different character. See the notes at Psalm 1:1. Compare Isaiah 5:5.

And am not I grieved with those that rise up against thee? The expression here — “grieved” — explains the meaning of the word “hate” in the former member of the verse. It is not that hatred which is followed by malignity or ill-will; it is that which is accompanied with grief — pain of heart — pity — sorrow. So the Saviour looked on people: Mark 3:5: “And when he had looked round about on them with “anger,” being “grieved” for the hardness of their hearts.” The Hebrew word used here, however, contains “also” the idea of being disgusted with; of loathing; of nauseating. See the notes at Psalm 119:158. The feeling referred to is anger — conscious disgust — at such conduct; and grief, pain, sorrow, that people should evince such feelings toward their Maker.

Psalm 139:22. I hate them with perfect hatred With no approval whatever of their conduct; with no sympathy for the evil they do; with no words of apology for their sinful acts; with entire disapprobation.

I count them mine enemies As they are the enemies of God, so I regard them as my enemies. I do not wish to be associated with them, or to be regarded as one of them.

Psalm 139:23. Search me, O God The word “search” here is the same as in Psalm 139:1. See the notes at that verse. The psalmist had stated the fact that it is a characteristic of God that he “does” search the heart; and he here prays that God “would” exercise that power in relation to himself; that as God could know all that there is within the heart, he would examine him with the closest scrutiny, so that he might be under no delusion or self-deception; that he might not indulge in any false hopes; that he might not cherish any improper feelings or desires. The prayer denotes great “sincerity” on the part of the psalmist. It indicates also self-distrust. It is an expression of what all must feel who have any just views of themselves — that the heart is very corrupt; that we are liable to deceive ourselves; and that the most thorough search “should” be made that we be “not” deceived and lost.

And know my heart Know or see all that is within it.

Try me As metal is tried or proved that is put to a “test” to learn what it is. The trial here is that which would result from the divine inspection of his heart.

And know my thoughts See what they are. The word rendered “thoughts” occurs only in one other place, Psalm 94:19. The idea is, Search me thoroughly; examine not merely my outward conduct, but what I think about; what are my purposes; what passes through my mind; what occupies my imagination and my memory; what secures my affections and controls my will. He must be a very sincere man who prays that God will search his thoughts, for there are few who would be willing that their fellow-men, even their best friends, should know all that they are thinking about.

Psalm 139:24. And see if there be any wicked way in me Margin, “way of pain,” or “grief.” The Hebrew word properly means an image, an idol (Isaiah 48:5), but it also means pain, 1 Chronicles 4:9; Isaiah 14:3. The word in the form used here does not occur elsewhere. Gesenius (Lexicon) renders it here idol-worship. DeWette, “way of idols.” Prof. Alexander, “way of pain.” The Septuagint and Vulgate, “way of iniquity.” So Luther. The Syriac, “way of falsehood.” Rosenmuller, “way of an idol.” According to this, the prayer is that God would search him and see if there was anything in him that partook of the nature of idolatry, or of defection from the true religion; any tendency to go back from God, to worship other gods, to leave the worship of the true God. As idolatry comprehends the sum of all that is evil, as being alienation from the true God, the prayer is that there might be nothing found in his heart which tended to alienate him from God — would indicate unfaithfulness or want of attachment to him.

And lead me in the way everlasting The way which leads to eternal life; the path which I may tread forever. In any other way than in the service of God his steps must be arrested. He must encounter his Maker in judgment, and be cut off, and consigned to woe. The path to heaven is one which man may steadily pursue; one, in reference to which death itself is really no interruption — for the journey commenced here will be continued through the dark valley, and continued forevermore. Death does not interrupt the journey of the righteous for a moment. It is the same journey continued — as when we cross a narrow stream, and are on the same path still.

APPENDIX NOTES ON PSALM 139

This psalm has often been admired for the grandeur of its sentiments, the elevation of its style, as well as the variety and beauty of its imagery. Dr. Lowth, in his 29th Prelection, classes it among the Hebrew idyls, as next to Psalm 104 in respect both to the conduct of the poem and the beauty of the style. “If it be excelled,” says he, “(as perhaps it is) by the former in the plan, disposition, and arrangement of the matter, it is not in the least inferior in the dignity and elegance of its sentiments, images, and figures.” “Among its other excellencies,” says Dr. Mant, “it is for nothing more admirable than for the exquisite skill with which it descants on the perfections of deity. The psalmist’s faith in the omnipresence and omniscience of Yahweh is in the commencement depicted with a singular and beautiful variety of the most lively expressions; nor can anything be more sublime than that accumulation of the noblest and loftiest images, in the seventh and following verses, commensurate with the limits of created nature, whereby the psalmist labors to impress upon the mind some notion of the infinity of God.” If we compare this sacred poem with any hymn of Classical antiquity in honor of the pagan deities, the immense superiority of the sentiments it contains must convince any reasonable person that David and the Israelites, though inferior in other respects to some other nations, surpassed them in religious knowledge. No philosopher of ancient times ever attained to such sublime views of the perfections and moral government of God as the Hebrew prophets. How are we to account for this difference but on the supposition of the divine origin of the religion of the Hebrews? On any other supposition these psalms are a greater miracle than any of those recorded by Moses.

Dr. Horsley refers the composition of this psalm to a later age than that of David. “The frequent Chaldaisms,” says he, “of the diction, argue no very high antiquity.” Dr. Adam Clarke, on the same ground, argues that it was not written by the sweet singer of Israel, but during or after the time of the captivity. Other critics, however, maintain that the several Chaldaisms to be found in it afford no foundation for such an opinion. “How any critic,” says Jebb, “can assign this psalm to other than David, I cannot understand. Every line, every thought, every turn of expression and transition is his and his only. As for the arguments drawn from the two Chaldaisms which occur [bæ<sup><#47252></sup> for yxb, and r [,<sup><#6145></sup> for Ëyrx, this is really nugatory. These Chaldaisms consist merely in the substitution of one letter for another very like it in shape, and easily to be mistaken by a transcriber, particularly by one who had been used to the Chaldee idiom: but the moral arguments for David’s authorship are so strong as to overwhelm any such verbal or rather literal criticism, were even the objections more formidable than they actually are.” — Translator’s Note in the Calvin Translation Society’s Edition.

As a proper pendant to Psalm 8, we name next Psalm 139. Here the poet inverts his gaze from the blaze of suns to the strange atoms composing his own frame. He stands shuddering over the precipice of himself. Above is the All-encompassing Spirit, from whom the morning wings cannot save; and below, at a deep distance, appears amid the branching forest of his animal frame, so fearfully and wonderfully made, the abyss of his spiritual existence, lying like a dark lake in the midst. How between mystery and mystery his mind, his wonder, his very reason, seem to rock like a little boat between the sea and the sky. But speedily does he regain his serenity, when he throws himself, with childlike haste and confidence, into the arms of that Fatherly Spirit, and murmurs in his bosom, “How precious also are thy thoughts unto me, O God; how great is the sum of them;” and looking up at last in his face, cries — “Search me, O Lord. I cannot search thee; I cannot search myself; I am overwhelmed by those dreadful depths; but search me as thou only canst; see if there be any wicked way in me, and lead me in the way everlasting.” — Gilfillan: Bards of the Bible.

~~139~~ Psalm 139:7. Whither shall I go from thy spirit There are in Amos certain brief and bold sublimities which class his genius with that of the best of the lesser prophets. Such, in Amos 9, is the vision of the Lord standing upon the altar, and proclaiming the inextricable dilemmas into which Israel’s crimes had led them. In all Scripture occur no more powerful antitheses than the following: “He that fleeth of them shall not flee away; and he that escapeth of them shall not escape (into safety). If they dig down into Sheol, thence shall mine hand take them. If they climb up into heaven, thence shall I bring them down. If they hide themselves in the top of Carmel, I will search for, and thence will I take them out. And if they hide themselves from mine eyes, in the bottom of the sea, thence will I command the serpent, and he shall bite them. If they go into captivity before their enemies, there will I command the sword, and it shall slay them, and I will set mine eyes upon them for evil, and not for good.” How the divine omnipresence here rolls itself around the victims of the divine anger! In Psalm 139 the poet wishes to escape from the Spirit of God as from a thought too strange and overwhelming for him; but here Israel would seek escape from him as he might from the center of a forest of fire, but is doomed forever to seek it in vain. An historian has given an animated description of the impossibility of escape which beset the steps of the fugitive from the power of the Roman emperor. If he crossed the Alps, that power was before him; if he crossed the ocean, it was waiting for him on the shore; and the tropic or the frigid zone was equally unable to hide him from its Briarian grasp. Still, there remained for him an avenue of deliverance. He might plunge into the sea, or turn his sword against his own bowels, or pledge his oppressor in poison. But for the object of the just vengeance of Yahweh there lay no such way of escape; he could not thus set his foe at defiance. The sea would say, “It is not in me;” Sheol (or Hades) would re-echo the cry; if he dropped into the arms of death, they would but hand him into those of the king of terrors; and if he sought to mount to heaven, this were to flee into the metropolis of his foe. Other worlds were barred against him; or even were their barriers broken, this were only to take down the palisades which blocked the way of his perdition. The universe was transfigured into a menacing shape, fronting the criminal with a face of fire, and stretching out on all sides its myriad starry hands to arrest his retreat, or to shed down dismay upon his guilty soul. — Gilfillan: Bards of the Bible.

Psalm 139:9. If I take the wings of the morning ... Light has been proved by many experiments to travel at the astonishing rate of 194,188 miles in one second of time! and comes from the sun to the earth, a distance of 93,513,794 miles, in 8 minutes and nearly 12 seconds! But, could I even fly upon the wings or rays of the morning light, which diffuses itself with such velocity over the globe from east to west, instead of being beyond thy reach, or by this sudden transition be able to escape thy notice, thy arm could still at pleasure prevent or arrest my progress, and I should still be encircled with the immensity of thy essence. The sentiment in this noble passage is remarkably striking, and the description truly sublime. — the Bagsters Bible.

Psalm 139:14. I am fearfully and wonderfully made The human frame is so admirably constructed, so delicately combined, and so much in danger of being dissolved by innumerable causes, that the more we think of it the more we tremble, and wonder at our own continued existence.

*“How poor, how rich, how abject, how august,
How complicate, how wonderful is man!
How passing wonder He who made him such,*

*Who mingled in our make such strange extremes
Of different natures marvelously mixed!
Helpless immortal, insect infinite,
A worm, a god — I tremble at myself!”*

To do justice to the subject it would be necessary to be well acquainted with anatomy. I have no doubt that a thorough examination of that “substance which God hath curiously wrought” would furnish abundant evidence of the justness of the psalmist’s words; and even those things which are manifest to common observation may be sufficient for this purpose. In general, it is observable that the human frame abounds with avenues at which enter everything conducive to preservation and comfort, and everything that can excite alarm. Perhaps there is not one of these avenues but what may become an inlet to death, nor one of the blessings of life but what may be the means of accomplishing it. We live by inhalation, but we also die by it. Diseases and death, in innumerable forms, are conveyed by the very air we breathe. God hath given us a relish for divers ailments, and rendered them necessary to our subsistence; yet, from the abuse of them, what a train of disorders and premature deaths are found among people! And where there is no abuse, a single delicious morsel may, by the evil design of another, or even by mere accident, convey poison through all our veins, and in one hour reduce the most athletic frame to a corpse.

The elements of fire and water, without which we could not subsist, contain properties which in a few moments would be able to destroy us; nor can the utmost circumspection at all times preserve us from their destructive power. A single stroke on the head may divest us of reason or of life. A wound or a bruise of the spine may instantly deprive the lower extremities of all sensation. If the vital parts be injured so as to suspend the performance of their mysterious functions, how soon is the constitution broken up! By means of the circulation of the blood how easily and suddenly are deadly substances diffused throughout the frame! Through this fearful medium not only the taint of vice rankles in the veins of the debauchee, but virtue itself may destroy us. The putridity of a morbid subject has been imparted to the very hand stretched out to save it. The poisoned arrow, the envenomed dart, the hydrophobic saliva, derive from hence, their fearful efficacy. Even the pores of the skin, necessary as they are to life, may be the means of death. Not only are poisonous substances hereby admitted, but, when obstructed by surrounding damps, the noxious humors of the body, instead of being emitted, are retained in the system, and become productive of numerous diseases, always afflictive, and often fatal to life.

From these few instances we may learn our absolute dependence upon divine preservation. So numerous are the avenues at which death may enter, that no human foresight can possibly render us secure for a single moment: and even those dangers which may in a measure be avoided require for this purpose the regular exercise of reason; but reason itself depends upon a variety of minute causes over which we have no control. Instead of wondering at the number of premature deaths that are constantly witnessed, there is far greater reason to wonder that there are no more, and that any of us survive to seventy or eighty years of age.

*“Our life contains a thousand springs,
And dies if one be gone;
Strange that a harp of thousand strings
Should keep in tune so long”*

Assuredly it can be ascribed to nothing short of the mighty power and all-pervading providence of God. A proper sense of this truth, while it would prevent us from presumptuously exposing ourselves to unnecessary injury, would induce us to commit ourselves to the divine protection in every danger which duty calls us to encounter. — Fuller.

Psalm 139:16. Thine eyes did see my substance yet being unperfect, and in thy book all my members were written which in continuance were fashioned when as yet there were none of them This is one of the most obscure and doubtful verses in the Book of Psalms. Its difficulty to our own translators may be gathered from the fact, that “substance being yet imperfect” answers to a single Hebrew word, and that my members is a gratuitous addition to the text. The first word in Hebrew occurs only here, but is clearly derived from a verb which means to “roll” or “roll up” (<sup>4118</sup>2 Kings 2:8), and may therefore be supposed itself to signify something rolled up or rolled together, and from this may be deduced the sense of something shapeless or unformed, or more specifically that of an embryo or fetus. The next difficulty lies in the expression “all of them,” evaded in the English Bible by changing it to “all my members,” and then making this the subject of the plurals following. The best interpreters are now disposed to construe “all of them” with days by a grammatical prolepsis. In thy book all of them are written — namely, all my days, as they were planned, projected, or decreed, before as yet one of them had really existed. “Written” and “formed” are then parallel expressions. “All of them are written,” days are delineated or depicted. By “days” (translated in our Bible “in continuance”) we are then to understand not merely the length but the events and vicissitudes of life. See <sup>4845</sup>Job 14:5; <sup>4508</sup>Psalm 56:8. This is one of those cases in which the difficulty lies in the particular expressions, while the general import of the passage is clearly determined by the context. Instead of <sup>43808</sup>al o “not,” the Qere’ (marginal reading) in the Hebrew Bible has “to him,” a variation to which no one has succeeded in attaching a coherent sense. Precisely the same difference of text exists in <sup>49408</sup>Psalm 100:3. — Alexander.

Psalm 139:23,24. Search me, O God ... The truly religious man is anxious to know the real state of his heart. This anxiety is very visible in the prayer before us. David had evidently been searching and trying his own heart, and it was his desire to be thoroughly acquainted with it, which led him so earnestly to beseech God to search and try it also. But the heart is a book which few of us like to study. It is one which requires close and serious thought, and thought is one of those things which our careless minds most hate. Besides, it is a book which teaches many humbling and mortifying lessons, and we do not wish to be mortified and humbled. We love the falsehood which exalts, better than we love the truth which abases us. True religion, however, begins with thoughtfulness. It turns the eyes of a man inward upon himself. It causes him to commune with his own heart, and to make “diligent search” into his own spirit. True, he may find this self-examination painful and humiliating, but this makes no matter to him. He feels that he has the salvation of an immortal soul at stake, and he is not to lose that soul for the sake of being kept easy in his follies, and proud in his sins ...

The sincere Christian is not conscious of having within his heart one cherished sin. This is strongly intimated in the psalmist’s prayer. His words imply that if there were any wicked way in him, any evil disposition habitually indulged, he could not be walking in the way everlasting. Not that he meant to speak of himself or of any other man as wholly free from sinful thoughts and desires, for on other occasions we hear him confessing that there was much sin within him, and bitterly lamenting it. But it is one thing to have iniquity entering the breast, and another thing to harbor it and have it reigning there. Paul felt a sinful “law in his members,” but he felt it as a “warring against the law of his mind,” as opposed to the habitual frame of his soul, to that holy and heavenly principle which made him “delight in the law of God after the inward man,” and enabled him to “walk not after the flesh, but after the Spirit.” Every Christian also feels the same warfare within. Sin tempts and harasses him, and sometimes brings him into captivity, but it cannot hold him in bondage; it cannot make him quietly submit to its hated laws. It overcomes and degrades him for an hour, but we soon see the prisoner struggling with his vile oppressor, and bursting the bonds. Trampling his lusts underneath his feet, we hear him exclaim, “I thank God, through Jesus Christ my Lord.” — Bradley’s Sermons.

NOTES ON PSALM 140

This, also, is a psalm of David. The occasion on which it was composed is not indicated in the title, but the contents of the psalm leave no room to doubt that it was written at an early period of his life, in the time when he was subjected to persecution — most probably in the time of Saul. The psalm bears every mark of David's style and spirit; and there can be no doubt that he was the author of it. For the reasons why it may have had a place "here" in the Book of Psalms, see the Introduction to Psalm 138. On the phrase, "To the chief Musician," see the Introduction to Psalm 4.

Psalm 140:1. Deliver me, O LORD, from the evil man That is, evidently from some particular man who was endeavoring to injure him; some personal enemy. All the circumstances mentioned agree well with the supposition that Saul is intended.

Preserve me from the violent man Margin, as in Hebrew, "man of violences." That is, one who has committed violence so often, who has so frequently done wrong, that this may be considered a characteristic of the man. This would apply well to the repeated acts of Saul in persecuting David, and endeavoring to do him injury.

Psalm 140:2. Which imagine mischiefs in their heart Here the language is changed to the plural number in the Hebrew, implying that while there was one man who was eminent in his wickedness and his wrong-doing, there were many others associated with him, acting under his direction. The word "mischiefs" in the Hebrew means "evils; wickednesses." It was not a single purpose; the plan embraced many forms of evil — doing him wrong in every way possible.

Continually are they gathered together for war They are organized for this purpose; they are constantly prepared for it. The word rendered "gathered together" properly means to sojourn, to dwell for a time; and it has been proposed by some to render this, "All the day they dwell with wars;" that is, they are constantly involved in them. But the word may mean also "to gather together," as in <sup><9616></sup>Psalm 56:6.

Psalm 140:3. They have sharpened their tongues like a serpent Compare the notes at <sup><9616></sup>Psalm 64:3. The idea here is, that since the tongue of the serpent “seems” to be sharp, pointed, adapted to penetrate (and probably the original reference in the image was derived from that idea), the wound inflicted is by the serpent’s tongue — “as if” with a hard, penetrating point. It is now known, however, that it is by a tooth — a single tooth, made flexible for the purpose — at the root of which a small bag containing the poison is located, which is injected through an orifice in the tooth into the wound. The meaning here is, that the words spoken by such persons — by their tongues — were like the poison produced by the bite of a serpent.

Adders’ poison is under their lips The asp or adder is among the most poisonous of serpents. Thus, Cleopatra of Egypt is said to have destroyed her own life by an asp, which she had concealed for that purpose. This passage is quoted in <sup><B13></sup>Romans 3:13, as a proof of human depravity. See the notes at that verse.

See the notes at <sup><B704></sup>Psalm 71:4. This is a repetition of the prayer in <sup><B10></sup>Psalm 140:1.

Who have purposed to overthrow my goings To thrust me down as I go; to defeat my plans; to destroy me. They endeavor to prevent my accomplishing what I had designed to do.

And cords Strings; twine; as those do who lay a net to catch birds, and who design to spring it upon them unawares.

They have spread a net by the wayside Where I may be expected to walk, and where it may be suddenly sprung upon me.

They have set gins for me Snares, toils — such as are set for wild beasts. The meaning is, that they had not only made open war upon him, but they had sought to bring him into an ambush — to rush upon him suddenly when he was not on his guard, and did not know that, danger was near.

<sup><B10></sup>Psalm 140:6. I said unto the LORD, Thou art my God ... In all these dangers from open war, in all these perils from a crafty enemy lying in ambush, my only refuge was God; my hope was in him alone. From all these dangers, seen and unseen, I knew that he could defend me, and I confidently believed that he would.

Psalm 140:7. O GOD the Lord ... literally, “Yahweh, Lord, the strength of my salvation” The word rendered “God,” in the original, is hwy]<sup>h3068</sup>. The address is to Yahweh as the Lord; that is, as the supreme Ruler — who presides over all things. Him the psalmist acknowledged as “his” Lord and Ruler. The phrase “the strength of my salvation” means the strength or power on which my safety depends. I have no other hope of deliverance but in thee.

Thou hast covered my head in the day of battle Thou hast been a shield unto me. Literally, “In the day of arms,” or of armor, 1Kings 10:25; Ezekiel 39:9,10.

Psalm 140:8. Grant not, O LORD, the desires of the wicked That is, in the matter under consideration. Let them not accomplish their desire in my destruction. Let them not succeed in their designs against me. The prayer, however, “may” be used more generally. It is proper to pray that the desires of the wicked, as wicked people, may not be granted to them; that they may “not” be successful in their purposes. Success in such desires would be only an injury to themselves and to the world. It is proper to pray that the purposes of the wicked may be defeated, and that they may be led to abandon their designs and to seek better ends. For this, in fact, we always pray when we pray for their conversion.

Further not his wicked device His purpose against me.

Lest they exalt themselves Lest they attribute it to their own skill, wisdom, or valor, and lest they pride themselves on their success. To succeed in a righteous cause makes a man humble and grateful; in a bad cause, proud, and forgetful of God. The margin here is, “Let them not be exalted.” The meaning is, that success would at the same time elate them in their own estimation, and increase their bad influence in the world. It is, on every account, a benevolent prayer that wicked people may “not” be successful in their plans of iniquity.

Psalm 140:9. As for the head of those that compass me about Luther renders this, “The calamity which my enemies design against me must fall upon their own heads.” The passage stands in contrast with Psalm 140:7: “Thou hast covered my head,” etc. As for his own head, it had been protected in the day of battle. In reference now to the heads of his enemies — of those that compassed him about — he prays that what they had designed for “his” head might come by a just retribution on their own. The phrase “compass me about” refers to his enemies as being numerous, and as surrounding him on every side. See <sup><9402></sup>Psalm 40:12; 88:17; 109:3; 118:10-12.

Let the mischief of their own lips cover them Come upon them. The mischief which they have designed against me; that which they have conspired to bring on me. The reference is to a combination against him, or to some agreement which they had made to destroy him.

<sup><9400></sup>Psalm 140:10. Let burning coals fall upon them Let them be punished, “as if” burning coals were poured upon them. See the notes at <sup><9406></sup>Psalm 11:6; 18:12,13; 120:4.

Let them be cast into the fire Punished as if they were cast into the fire and consumed.

Into deep pits, that they rise not up again That they may utterly perish. This was one mode of punishing, by casting a man into a deep pit from which he could not escape, and leaving him to die, <sup><0524></sup>Genesis 37:20,24; <sup><9405></sup>Psalm 9:15; 35:7; <sup><3407></sup>Jeremiah 41:7.

<sup><9401></sup>Psalm 140:11. Let not an evil speaker literally, “A man of tongue.” That is, a man whom the tongue rules; a man of an unbridled tongue; a man who does not control his tongue. See the notes at <sup><3002></sup>James 3:2-12.

Be established in the earth Be successful or prosperous; let him not carry out his designs. It is not desirable that a man should prosper in such purposes; and therefore, this is not a prayer of malignity, but of benevolence.

Evil shall hunt the violent man ... More literally, “A man of violence — a bad man — they shall hunt him down speedily;” or, “let him be hunted down speedily. Let him who forms a project of violence and wrong — a bad man — be hunted as the beasts of prey are, and let his destruction come quickly.” Margin, “Let him be hunted to his overthrow.” But the explanation now given suits the connection, and is a literal expression of the sense of the original.

Psalm 140:12. I know that the LORD will maintain the cause of the afflicted See the notes at Psalm 9:4. The psalmist here doubtless refers primarily to himself, as having a confident belief that the Lord would maintain “his” cause, or would defend “him.” At the same time he makes the statement general, implying that what would be done to him would be done to all in similar circumstances. The idea is that God, in all his attributes, in all his providential arrangements, in all his interpositions on earth, would be found to be on the side of the oppressed, the afflicted, and the wronged. He has no attribute that can take part with an oppressor or a wrong doer. The wicked cannot come to him with the belief that he will be on their side: the righteous — the oppressed — the afflicted — can.

And the right of the poor He will defend the right of the poor. Literally, “The judgment of the poor.” That which will be just and right in their case.

Psalm 140:13. Surely the righteous shall give thanks unto thy name Unto thee.

- (1) They will have occasion to do it;
- (2) they will be disposed to do it.

They will not be unmindful of the favors conferred upon them; it will be a characteristic of them that they “will” be thankful.

The upright shall dwell in thy presence They shall be under thy protection; they shall be admitted to thy favor; they shall dwell in thy dwelling-place.

- (1) On earth they shall enjoy his favor — “as if” they abode with God.
- (2) In heaven they will be permitted to dwell with him forever.

The general idea of the psalm is, that the poor, the persecuted, the afflicted, if righteous, shall enjoy the favor and protection of God. God is on their side, and not on the side of the wicked who oppress them. But then, people “should be righteous” in order that they may find the favor of God and dwell with him. There is no reason why a “poor” wicked man should enjoy the favor of God anymore than why a “rich” wicked man should. It is not poverty or riches that commend us to God; it is faith, and holiness, and love, and obedience, in the condition of life in which we are placed, be it in a cottage or a palace.

APPENDIX NOTES ON PSALM 140

To the chief musician. A psalm. By David We find ourselves in this psalm carried back not only to the times of David but to those of the Sauline persecution, from which the images are evidently borrowed. Besides the warlike tone, the vigorous conciseness, the verbal agreements with Davidic psalms, combined with eminent originality, the very structure is Davidic, and exhibits the familiar sequence of complaint (~~Psalm~~ Psalm 140:1-5), prayer (~~Psalm~~ Psalm 140:6-8), and confident anticipation (~~Psalm~~ Psalm 140:9-13). So clearly do these features of the composition mark its origin, even independently of the inscription, that nothing can account for its position here but the hypothesis already stated, that these ancient psalms were incorporated into a series of later date and placed in the collection, not according to their individual antiquity, but according to the date of the whole set or system into which they had been made to enter. Like the psalms immediately preceding, this was probably composed by David after the reception of the great Messianic promise, and with immediate reference to it. — Alexander.

The old opinion, that the psalm refers to the relation between David and Saul, has a certain measure of truth for its foundation. David has here, as also in Psalm 109, borrowed the colors from this relation: in Saul, the most powerful and malignant enemy of the past, he beholds the type of the future enemies of his seed. We find, in particular, also here a strong emphasis upon calumny and false accusations, which is characteristic of the Sauline psalms. Besides, it is precisely from these psalms that this psalm more especially borrows. — Hengstenberg.

~~Psalm~~ Psalm 140:10. Let burning coals fall upon them ... The expressions of wrath and imprecation against the enemies of God and of his people which occur in some of the psalms ... seem to exhibit a vindictiveness which is apt to distress the feelings of many Christian readers. In order to obviate this offence, many of our pious commentators assure us that these expressions are not maledictions or imprecations, but simply declarations of what will or may take place. But this is utterly inadmissible, for in many of the most startling passages the language of the original is plainly imperative and not indicative (see ~~Psalm~~ Psalm 59:14; 69:25,28; 79:6).

“The truth is,” says the writer of an able article on the subject in the Bibliotheca Sacra for 1844, “that only a morbid benevolence, a mistaken philanthropy, takes offence at these psalms, for in reality they are not opposed to the spirit of the gospel, or to that love of enemies which Christ enjoined. Resentment against evil-doers is so far from being sinful, that we find it exemplified in the meek and spotless Redeemer himself (see ~~<1005>~~ Mark 3:5). If the emotion and its utterance were essentially sinful, how could Paul (~~<4562>~~ 1 Corinthians 16:22) wish the enemy of Christ to be accursed ( αναθημα )~~<1334>~~, or say of his own enemy, Alexander the coppersmith, ‘The Lord reward him according to his works’ (~~<5044>~~ 2 Timothy 4:14); and, especially, how could the spirits of the just in heaven call on God for vengeance?” ~~<1610>~~ Revelation 6:10. — Pictorial Bible.

NOTES ON PSALM 141

This, also, is a psalm of David, and apparently composed under circumstances similar to the former. It is impossible, however, to determine the precise time at which it was written, or the exact circumstances of the psalmist at the time.

The circumstances, as far as they can be gathered from the psalm, are these:

(1) He was in a situation of peril; so much so as to have almost no hope for himself or his followers. Snares and gins were laid for him (~~HEB~~ Psalm 141:9), and his followers and friends were scattered and dispirited, as if their bones were scattered at the grave's mouth, ~~HEB~~ Psalm 141:7. Everything looked dark and discouraging.

(2) In these circumstances it occurred to his mind, or was suggested to him, to say or do something which, not honorable or right in itself, might have brought relief, or which might have rescued him from his peril, and secured the favor of his enemies; some trick — some artful scheme — some concession of principle — which would have delivered him from his danger, and which would have secured for him a position of safety, plenty, and honor, ~~HEB~~ Psalm 141:3,4. Many considerations, derived from his danger, might have been suggested for this, even by those who were not bad people, but who might have been timid men, and who might have felt that their cause was hopeless, and that it would be proper to avail themselves of this opportunity to escape from their peril in any way.

(3) David knew that to resist this — to abstain from following this apparently wise and prudent counsel — to refuse to do what the circumstances might seem to others to justify — would expose him to the rebukes of sincere and honest people who thought that this would be right. Yet knowing all this, he resolved to hear their reproach rather than to follow such advice by doing a wrong thing. He says (~~HEB~~ Psalm 141:5), that though they should smite him, it would (he knew) be in kindness, with the best intention; though they should reprove him, it would be like a “gentle oil” — it would not break his head or crush him. He would cherish no resentment; he would still pray for them as usual in the time of their calamities, ~~HEB~~ Psalm 141:5. Even when the “judges,” the rulers — his enemies — should be overthrown, as they might be, he would take no advantage of that circumstance; he would not seek for revenge; his words should be “sweet” kind words still, <sup><9E06></sup>Psalm 141:6.

(4) David prays, therefore, in view of this temptation, and of the counsel suggested to him, that he might be able to set a watchful guard over his own lips, and to keep his heart, that he might not be betrayed into anything which would be dishonorable or wicked; that he might not be allured to that which was wrong by any prospect of temporal advantage which might follow. <sup><9E01></sup>Psalm 141:1-4.

(5) As the result of all, he put his trust in God, that he might be enabled to pursue an upright course; and that, in such a course, he might be preserved from the snares which had been laid for him, <sup><9E08></sup>Psalm 141:8-10.

Perhaps what is here said in illustration of the design of the psalm will best agree with the supposition that it refers to the time mentioned in <sup><9201></sup>1 Samuel 24:1-7. Saul was then in his power. He could easily have put him to death. His friends advised it. The “suggestion” was a natural one; it would seem to many to be a justifiable measure. But he resisted the temptation, trusting in the Lord to deliver him, without his resorting to a measure which could not but have been regretted ever afterward.

The practical truth which would be illustrated by this view of the psalm would be, “that we are not to say or do anything that is wrong, though good people, our friends, advise it; though it should subject us to their reproaches if we do it not; though to do it would be followed by great personal advantages; and though not to do it would leave us still in danger — a danger from which the course advised would have delivered us. It is better to act nobly, honorably, and in a high-minded manner, and to leave the result with God, still trusting in him.”

<sup><9E01></sup>Psalm 141:1. LORD, I cry unto thee In view of my perils; in view of the suggestions of my friends; in view of my temptation to do a wrong thing at their advice, and with the prospect of the advantage which it might seem to be to me.

Make haste unto me To save me from all this danger: the danger from my enemies; the danger from the counsels of my friends. See the notes at <sup><9219></sup>Psalm 22:19; compare <sup><9403></sup>Psalm 40:13; 70:1,5; 71:12. The meaning is, that there is need of immediate interposition. There is danger that I shall be overcome; that I may be tempted to do a wrong thing; that I may be ruined if there is any delay.

<sup><HEB></sup>Psalm 141:2. Let my prayer be set forth before thee Margin, “directed.” The Hebrew word means to fit; to establish; to make firm. The psalmist desires that his prayer should not be like that which is feeble, languishing, easily dissipated, but that it should be like that which is firm and secure.

As incense See the notes and illustrations at <sup><HEB></sup>Luke 1:9,10. Let my prayer come before thee in such a manner as incense does when it is offered in worship; in a manner of which the ascending of incense is a suitable emblem. See the notes at <sup><HEB></sup>Revelation 5:8; 8:3.

And the lifting up of my hands In prayer; a natural posture in that act of worship.

As the evening sacrifice The sacrifice offered on the altar at evening. Let my prayer be as acceptable as that is when it is offered in a proper manner.

<sup><HEB></sup>Psalm 141:3. Set a watch, O LORD, before my mouth That I may not say anything rashly, unadvisedly, improperly. Compare <sup><HEB></sup>Psalm 39:1. The prayer here is, that God would guard him from the temptation to say something wrong. To this he seems to have been prompted by the circumstances of the case, and by the advice of those who were with him. See introduction to the psalm. Compare the notes at <sup><HEB></sup>Psalm 11:1.

Keep the door of my lips That my lips or mouth may not open except when it is proper and right; when something good and true is to be said. Nothing can be more proper than “this” prayer; nothing more desirable than that God should keep us from saying what we ought not to say.

<sup><HEB></sup>Psalm 141:4. Incline not my heart to any evil thing Hebrew, to a word that is evil; that is, wrong. The connection seems to demand that the term should be thus explained. The expression “Incline not” is not designed to mean that God exerts any “positive” influence in leading the heart to that which is wrong; but it may mean “Do not place me in circumstances where I may be tempted; do not leave me to myself; do not allow any improper influence to come over me by which I shall be led astray.” The expression is similar to that in the Lord’s Prayer: “Lead us not into temptation.” The psalmist’s allusion here has been explained in the introduction to the psalm.

To practice wicked works with people that work iniquity To be united or associated with people who do wrong; to do the things which wicked and unprincipled people do. Let me not be permitted to do anything that will be regarded as identifying me with them. Let me not, in the circumstances in which I am placed, be left to act so that the fair interpretation of my conduct shall be that I am one of their number, or act on the same principles on which they act. Literally, “To practice practices in wickedness with people.”

And let me not eat of their dainties Let me not be tempted by any prospect of participating in their mode of living — in the luxuries and comforts which they enjoy — to do a wicked or wrong thing. Let not a prospect or desire of this overcome my better judgment, or the dictates of my conscience, or my settled principles of what is right. People often DO this. Good people are often tempted to do it. The prospect or the hope of being enabled to enjoy what the rich enjoy, to live in luxury and ease, to be “clothed in short linen and fare sumptuously every day,” to move in circles of splendor and fashion, often leads them to a course of action which their consciences condemn; to practices inconsistent with a life of godliness; to sinful indulgences which utterly ruin their character. Satan has few temptations for man more attractive and powerful than the “dainties” which wealth can give; and there are few of his devices more effectual in ruining people than those which are derived from these allurements. The word here rendered dainties properly refers to things which are pleasant, lovely, attractive; which give delight or pleasure. It may embrace “all” that the world has to offer as suited to give pleasure or enjoyment. It refers here to what those in more elevated life have to offer; what they themselves live for.

Psalm 141:5. Let the righteous smite me This verse is exceedingly difficult and obscure (compare the margin); and there have been almost as many different opinions in regard to its meaning as there have been commentators on the psalm. A large number of these opinions may be seen in Rosenmuller “in loc.” DeWette explains it,

“I gladly suffer anything that is unpleasant from my friends, that may be for my good; but the wickedness of my enemies I cannot endure.”

The Septuagint and Latin Vulgate render it,

“Let a righteous man correct me with mercy, and he will work convictions in me; but let not the oil of a sinner (for this shall still be my prayer) anoint my head at their pleasure.” “Thompson’s translation.”

According to this, the sense would be, “If the righteous smite me with severity of words I shall take it as an act of kindness and benevolence; on the other hand, the bland words of a sinner, smooth as oil, which wound more than sharp arrows, may God avert from me.” Or, in other words, “I had rather be slain by the severe words of the righteous than anointed by the oily and impious words of the wicked.” The sense proposed by Hengstenberg (Com. “in loc.”) is, “Even as I through the cloud of wrath can see the sunshine of divine goodness, I will not give myself over to doubt and despair, according to the course of the world, when the hand of the Almighty rests upon me; but I will, and can, and should, in the midst of trouble, be joyful, and that is the high privilege of which I will never be deprived.” According to this, the idea is, that the sufferings endured by good people, even at the hand of the wicked, are chastisements inflicted by a gracious God in justice and mercy, and as such may be likened to a festive ointment, which the head of the sufferer should not refuse, as he will still have occasion for consolation to invoke God in the midst of trials yet to be experienced. The word “righteous” is evidently employed in the usual sense of the term. It refers to those who love and serve God. The word translated “smite” —  $\mu\lambda\ \beta\epsilon$ <sup>12492</sup> — is rendered broken in <sup>10122</sup>Judges 5:22; <sup>23618</sup>Isaiah 16:8; 28:1 (“margin,” but rendered by our translators “overcome,” sc. with wine); “smote,” <sup>10125</sup>Judges 5:26; <sup>23407</sup>Isaiah 41:7; “beaten,” <sup>12135</sup>Proverbs 23:35; “beating down,” <sup>19416</sup>1 Samuel 14:16; “break down,” <sup>19716</sup>Psalm 74:6. It does not elsewhere occur, except in the verse before us. It would apply to any beating or smiting, with the fist, with a hammer, with a weapon of war, and then with “words” — words of reproof, or expressions of disapprobation. According to the view above taken (Introduction), it is used here with reference to an apprehended rebuke on the part of good people, for not following their advice.

It shall be a kindness literally, “A kindness;” that is, an act of kindness. The idea is, that it would be so intended on their part; it should be so received by him. Whatever might be the wisdom of the advice, or the propriety of yielding to it, or whatever they might say if it were not followed, yet he could regard it as on their part only well-intended. If a certain course which they had advised should be rejected, and if by refusing or declining to follow it one should incur their displeasure, yet that ought to be interpreted only as an act well-intended and meant in kindness.

And let him reprove me As I may anticipate that he will, if his advice is not taken. I must expect to meet this consequence.

It shall be an excellent oil literally, “Oil of the head.” That is — like oil which is poured on the head on festive occasions, or when one is crowned, as a priest, or a prophet, or a king. See the notes at <sup><4063></sup>Mark 6:13; <sup><4048></sup>Luke 4:18,19. Oil thus used for the head, the face, etc., was an indispensable article for the toilet among Orientals. The idea is here that the reproof of the righteous should be received as readily as that which contributed most to comely adorning and comfort; or that which diffused brightness, cheerfulness, joy.

Which shall not break my head Or rather, Which my head shall not (or, should not) refuse; which it should welcome. The word rendered break should not have been so translated. The Hebrew word — <sup><5106></sup>אֵלֶּן, is from <sup><5106></sup>אֵלֶּן — in Hiphil, to negative; to make naught; then to refuse, to decline, to deny. It is rendered “discourage” in <sup><0437></sup>Numbers 32:7,9 (Margin, “break”); “disallow,” <sup><0415></sup>Numbers 30:5 (“twice”), <sup><0418></sup>Numbers 30:8,11; “make of none effect,” <sup><19310></sup>Psalms 33:10; “break,” in the passage before us. It does not elsewhere occur. The idea is, “If such reproof comes on me for the faithful doing of what I regard as wise and best, I ought no more to reject it than the head would refuse the oil poured on it, to make the person healthful and comely.”

For yet my prayer also shall be in their calamities I will not be sullen, displeased, angry, revengeful. I will not refuse to pray for them when trials come upon them, because they have not approved of my course, because they have reproved me for not following their counsel, because they have used words that were like heavy blows. I will cherish no malice; I will not be angry; I will not seek to be revenged. I will not turn away from them when trouble comes on them. I will love them, cherish with gratitude the memory of the kindness they meant, and pray for them in the time when they especially need prayer. Should they now rebuke me rather than pray for me, yet I will not in turn “rebuke” them in similar trials, but “will pray for them,” as though nothing of this had happened. Noble spirit — indicative of what should always be the spirit of a good man. Our friends — even our pious friends — may not be always “wise” in their advice, and they may be severe in their reproofs if we do not follow their counsel; yet let us receive all as well-intended, and let us not in anger, in sullenness, or in revenge, refuse to aid them, and to pray for them in trouble, though they were “not” wise, and though they used words of severity toward us.

Psalm 141:6. When ... This passage is no less difficult than the preceding, and it seems almost impossible to determine its exact meaning. What is meant by “judges”? What judges are referred to by the word “their”? What is meant by their being “overthrown”? What is the sense of the words “in stony places”? Does the passage refer to some certain prospect that they “would be” overthrown, or is it a mere supposition which relates to something that “might” occur? Who are meant by “they,” in the phrase “they shall hear my words?” It seems to me that the most plausible interpretation of the passage is founded on that which has been assumed thus far in the explanation of the psalm, as referring to the state of things recorded in <sup><0241></sup>1 Samuel 24:1-7. David was in the wilderness of Engedi, in the midst of a rocky region. Saul, apprised of his being there, came with three thousand chosen men to apprehend him, and went into a cave to lie down to rest. Unknown, probably, to him, David and his men were in the “sides of the cave.” They now saw that Saul was completely in their power, and that it would be an easy thing to enter the cave, and kill him when off his guard. The men urgently advised David to do this. David entered the cave, and cut off the skirt of Saul’s robe, showing how completely Saul was in his power, but he proceeded no further; he did not follow the suggestions of his friends; he did not take the life of Saul, as he might have done; and he even regretted what he had done, as implying a want of due respect for the anointed of the Lord, <sup><0241></sup>1 Samuel 24:11. Yet he had the fullest confidence that the king and his forces would be overthrown, and that it would be done in a way consistent with open and manly war, and not in an underhanded and stealthful way, as it would have been if he had cut him off in the cave. With this in view, it seems to me that the difficult passage before us may be explained with, at least, some degree of plausibility.

Their judges By the judges, are to be understood the rulers of the people; the magistrates; those in office and power — referring to Saul and the officers of his government. “Their judges;” to wit, the judges or rulers of the hosts in opposition to me — of those against whom I war; Saul and the leaders of his forces.

Are overthrown Are discomfited, vanquished, subdued; as I am confident they will be, in the regular prosecution of the war, and not by treachery and stealth.

In stony places literally, “in the hands of the rock;” or, as the word “hands” may sometimes be used, “in the sides of the rock.” It might mean “by the power of the rock,” as thrown upon them; or, “against its sides.” The essential idea is, that the “rocks,” the rocky places, would be among the means by which they would be overthrown; and the sense is, that now that Saul was in the cave — or was in that rocky region, better known to David than to him — Saul was so completely in his power, that David felt that the victory, in a regular course of warfare, would be his.

They shall hear my words The followers of Saul; the people of the land; the nation. Saul being removed — subdued — slain — the people will become obedient to me who have been anointed by a prophet as their king, and designated as the successor of Saul. David did not doubt that he would himself reign when Saul was overcome, or that the people would hear his words, and submit to him as king.

For they are sweet They shall be pleasant; mild; gentle; equitable; just. After the harsh and severe enactments of Saul, after enduring his acts of tyranny, the people will be glad to welcome me, and to live under the laws of a just and equal administration. The passage, therefore, expresses confidence that Saul and his hosts would be overthrown, and that the people of the land would gladly hail the accession to the throne of one who had been anointed to reign over them.

~~⚠~~ Psalm 141:7. Our bones are scattered at the grave's mouth We are, indeed, now like bones scattered in the places of graves; we seem to be weak, feeble, disorganized. We are in a condition which of itself seems to be hopeless: as hopeless as it would be for dry bones scattered when they were buried to rise up and attack an enemy. The reference is to the condition of David and his followers as pursued by a mighty foe. His hope was not in his own forces, but in the power and interposition of God (~~⚠~~ Psalm 141:8).

As when one cutteth and cleaveth wood upon the earth Like chips, blocks, splinters, that have no strength; as when these lie scattered around — a fit emblem of our feeble and scattered forces.

Psalm 141:8. But mine eyes are unto thee, O GOD the Lord My hope is in thee. I do not rely on my own power. I do not trust in my armed forces. I know that they are weak, dispirited, scattered — like strewed bones — like the chips and splinters lying around the place where wood is chopped. I look, therefore, solely to God. I believe that he “will” interpose; and now that my enemy has placed himself in this position, I do not need to resort to stealthful arts — to dishonorable acts — to assassination — as my friends advise, but the object will be accomplished, and I shall be placed on the throne by the act of God, and in a manner that will not subject my name and memory to reproach by a base and treacherous deed.

In thee is my trust I rely on thee alone.

Leave not my soul destitute My life; my all. Do not now leave me without thy gracious interposition; do not suffer this juncture to pass by without such an interposition as will end the war, and restore peace to me and to a distracted land.

Psalm 141:9. Keep me from the snares ... See the notes at Psalm 11:6. Compare Psalm 38:12; 69:22; 91:3. The secret plans which they have laid against me.

And the gins of the workers of iniquity Wicked men; men who seek my destruction. On the word gins, see the notes at Isaiah 8:14. The gin is a trap or snare to catch birds or wild animals. The word used here is the same which occurs in Psalm 18:5, and which is there rendered “snare.” See the notes at that passage. Compare also Psalm 64:5; 69:22; 106:36; 140:5, where the same word occurs.

Psalm 141:10. Let the wicked fall into their own nets See the notes at Psalm 35:8. Compare Psalm 7:15,16.

While that I withal escape Margin, as in Hebrew, “pass over.” While I safely pass over the net or snare which has been secretly laid for me. The word “withal” means, in the Hebrew, “together, at the same time;” that is, At the same time that they fall into the net, let me pass over it in safety. See the notes at Job 5:13.

APPENDIX NOTES ON PSALM 141

The superscription which ascribes the psalm to David is confirmed by the close affinity it bears to the psalms of David in connection with undoubted originality. The pregnant brevity of the language extorts, even from DeWette, the confession: "I consider it, with Psalm 10, to be one of the oldest." That the psalm, like the whole cycle to which it belongs, refers to greater relations than those of a private individual, is evident from the expressions, "their judges," and "our bones," in <sup><HEB></sup>Psalm 141:6,7. It is also fitly assigned to this cycle on the ground, that <sup><HEB></sup>Psalm 141:9,10 connect themselves with the preceding psalm, while <sup><HEB></sup>Psalm 141:6 refers to <sup><HEB></sup>Psalm 138:4; and lastly, on account of the predilection special to this cycle for rare words and unusual forms. — Hengstenberg.

"Let a righteous man smite me, it shall be a kindness; and let him reprove me, it shall be as oil upon my head: let not my head refuse it;"

and adds, "According to the rendering I have preferred of this verse, the sense will be, "I will gladly welcome even the reproofs of the good (compare <sup><HEB></sup>Proverbs 27:6; <sup><HEB></sup>Ecclesiastes 7:5), and I will avail myself of prayer as the best defense against the wickedness of my persecutors." It is possible, however, that the last clause may refer not to his enemies but to the righteous, in which case it must be rendered, "For still my prayer shall be offered in their misfortunes" (so Ewald).

Again, the first two clauses have been rendered,

"Let a righteous man smite me in love (accuse) and reprove me.
Such oil upon the head let not my head refuse" (Delitzsch).

But nothing is gained by this, and the balance of the members is not so well preserved. Others again (as Maur., Hengstenberg) understand by the "righteous," God, appealing to <sup><HEB></sup>Isaiah 24:16 — where, however, the "righteous" means not God, but "the righteous nation."

In <sup><HEB></sup>Psalm 141:4 he had prayed that he might not be led astray by the evil he saw around him, nor allured by the blandishments and luxurious prosperity of the wicked. Now he says, on the contrary, "Let me ever be ready to welcome even reproof from the righteous," which, however harsh, is salutary. The wounds of a friend are faithful, and better than the kisses of an enemy.”

~~HEB~~ Psalm 141:7. Our bones are scattered at the grave's mouth ... These words present a strong contrast between David's treatment of his enemies and that which they adopted toward him and those who were associated with him. We are not sufficiently informed respecting the cruelties which were perpetrated against David and those who adhered to him, to enable us to point out the instances to which he here alludes; but the murder of Abimelech and of the priests who were with him furnishes a pregnant proof of the atrocities which Saul and his agents were capable of perpetrating. See 1 Samuel 22. It appears from the language of this verse that such enormities were not confined to a few cases, but must have been numerous, to give occasion to the image which is employed to describe them. As a man who plows or digs the earth, scatters it in abundance and without remorse, so were the bones scattered of those who dared to show any sympathy for the sufferings of this proscribed and devoted man. — Walford.

NOTES ON PSALM 142

This also is a psalm of David. It is entitled, like not a few others of the Psalms, “Maschil;” margin, “giving instruction:” a didactic hymn. See the word explained in the Introduction to Psalm 32. It is said, in the title, to be “A prayer when he was in the cave;” that is, either a prayer which he composed while there, or which he composed afterward, putting into a poetic form the substance of the prayer which he breathed forth there, or expressive of the feelings which he had when there. The reference may be either to the cave of Adullam (<sup><HEB></sup>1 Samuel 22:1), or to that in Engedi (<sup><HEB></sup>1 Samuel 24:3). In both cases the circumstances were substantially the same, for David had fled to the cave to escape from Saul. The prayer is such as would be appropriate to a condition of danger such as was that in which David then was. It is a cry of distress when there was no refuge — no hope — but in God; when there seemed to be no way of escape from his enemies; and when, forsaken by his friends, and pursued by an enemy who sought his life, he seemed now to be in the power of his foe. It may also be “used” to express the feelings of one now in danger — as of a sinner under condemnation, seeing no way of escape, exposed to ruin, and shut up entirely to the mercy of God. Such a one feels, as David did on this occasion, that there can be no escape but through the interposition of God.

<sup><HEB></sup>Psalm 142:1. I cried unto the LORD with my voice See the notes at <sup><HEB></sup>Psalm 3:4, where the language is the same. He uttered a loud and audible prayer, though he was alone. It was not a mental ejaculation, but he gave expression to his desires.

With my voice unto the LORD did I make my supplication See <sup><HEB></sup>Psalm 30:8. The Hebrew word rendered “did make my supplication,” means to implore favor or mercy. It denotes the language of petition and entreaty, not the language of claim.

<sup><HEB></sup>Psalm 142:2. I poured out my complaint before him literally, my meditation; that is, What so much occupied my thoughts at the time I expressed aloud. The word “complaint” does not express the idea. The meaning is, not that he “complained” of God or of man; but that his mind “meditated” on his condition. He was full of care and of anxiety; and he went and poured this out freely before God. The Septuagint and the Latin Vulgate render this, “my prayer.” See <sup><HEB></sup>Psalm 55:2, where the same Hebrew word is used.

I showed before him my trouble I made mention of it. I spoke of it.

<sup><HEB></sup>Psalm 142:3. When my spirit was overwhelmed within me Luther renders this, “When my spirit was in distress.” The Hebrew word rendered “overwhelmed” means, in Kal, to cover as with a garment; then, to be covered as with darkness, trouble, sorrow; and then, to languish, to faint, to be feeble: <sup><SYR></sup>Psalm 77:3; 107:5. The idea here is, that, in his troubles, he had no vigor, no life, no spirit. He did not see how he could escape from his troubles, and he had no heart to make an effort.

Then thou knewest my path Thou didst see all. Thou didst see the way that I was treading, and all its darkness and dangers, implying here that God had made it an object to mark his course; to see what egress there might be — what way to escape from the danger. It was in no sense concealed from God, and no danger of the way was hidden from him. It is much for us to feel when we are in danger or difficulty that God knows it all, and that nothing can be hidden from him.

In the way wherein I walked In my path; the path that I was treading.

Have they privily laid a snare for me They treated me as a man would treat his neighbor, who should spread a snare, or set a trap, for him in the path which he knew he must take. The word rendered “have privily laid” means to hide, to conceal. It was so concealed that I could not perceive it. They did it unknown to me. I neither knew that it was laid, nor where it was laid. They meant to spring it upon me at a moment when I was not aware, and when I should be taken by surprise. It was not open and manly warfare; it was stealth, cunning, trick, art.

<sup><HEB></sup>Psalm 142:4. I looked on my right hand, and beheld Margin, “Look on the right hand and see The words translated “looked” and “beheld” are in the imperative mood in the Hebrew. They are not, however, improperly rendered as to the sense. They refer to David’s state of mind at the time, and give vividness to the description. The psalmist seems to be in the presence of others. He calls upon them to look around; to see how he was encompassed with danger. Look, says he, in every direction; see who there is on whom I may rely; what there is to which I may trust as a refuge. I can find none; I see none; there is none. The “right hand” is referred to here as the direction where he might look for a protector: <sup><B></sup>Psalm 109:6,31.

But there was no man that would know me No man to be seen who would recognize me as his friend; who would stand up for me; on whom I could rely.

Refuge failed me Margin, as in Hebrew, “perished from me.” If there had been any hope of refuge, it has failed altogether. There is none now.

No man cared for my soul Margin, “No man sought after my soul.” Hebrew, after my “life.” That is, No one sought to save my life; no one regarded it as of sufficient importance to attempt to preserve me.

<sup><B></sup>Psalm 142:5. I cried unto thee, O LORD When there was no help; when I saw myself encompassed with dangers; when I looked on every hand and there was no “man” that would undertake for me.

I said, Thou art my refuge

(a) My “only” refuge. I can go nowhere else.

(b) Thou art “in fact” my refuge. I can and do put my trust in thee. See the notes at <sup><B></sup>Psalm 46:1.

And my portion See the notes at <sup><B></sup>Psalm 16:5.

In the land of the living Among all those that live — all living beings. There is no one else among the living to whom I can come but to thee, the living God. My hope is not in human beings, for they are against me; not in angels, for they have not the power to rescue me. It is God only, the living God, whom I make my confidence and the ground of my hope.

<sup><B></sup>Psalm 142:6. Attend unto my cry Give ear to me when I cry to thee. Do not turn away and refuse to hear me.

For I am brought very low I am reduced greatly; I am made very poor. The language would be applicable to one who had been in better circumstances, and who had been brought down to a condition of danger, of poverty, of want. It is language which is commonly applied to poverty.

Deliver me from my persecutors Saul and his followers.

For they are stronger than I More in number; better armed; better suited for battle.

Psalm 142:7. Bring my soul out of prison Bring me out of my present condition which is like a prison. I am as it were shut up; I am encompassed with foes; I do not know how to escape. Compare Psalm 25:17.

That I may praise thy name Not merely for my own sake, but that I may have occasion more abundantly to praise thee; that thus “thou” mayest be honored; an object at all times much more important than our own welfare — even than our salvation.

The righteous shall compass me about They shall come to me with congratulations and with expressions of rejoicing. They will desire my society, my friendship, my influence, and will regard it as a privilege and an honor to be associated with me. David looked to this as an object to be desired. He wished to be associated with the righteous; to enjoy their friendship; to have their good opinion; to be reckoned as one of them here and forever. Compare the notes at Psalm 26:9. It “is” an honor — a felicity to be desired — to be associated with good people, to possess their esteem; to have their sympathy, their prayers, and their affections; to share their joys here, and their triumphs in the world to come.

For thou shalt deal bountifully with me Or, when thou shalt deal bountifully with me. When thou dost show me this favor, then the righteous will come around me in this manner. They will see that I am a friend of God, and they will desire to be associated with me as his friend.

APPENDIX NOTES ON PSALM 142

Psalm 142:1,2. I cried unto the Lord ... It showed singular presence of mind in David that he was not paralyzed with fear, or that he did not in a paroxysm of fury take vengeance upon his enemy, as he easily might have done; and that he was not actuated by despair to take away his life, but composedly addressed himself to the exercise of prayer. There was good reason why the title should have been affixed to the psalm to note this circumstance, and David had good grounds for mentioning how he commended himself to God. Surrounded by the army of Saul, and hemmed in by destruction on every side, how was it possible for him to have spared so implacable an enemy, had he not been fortified against the strongest temptations by prayer? The repetition he makes use of indicates his having prayed with earnestness, so as to be impervious to every assault of temptation.

He tells us still more clearly in the next verse that he disburdened his cares unto God. To pour out one's thoughts and tell over his afflictions implies the reverse of those perplexing anxieties which people brood over inwardly to their own distress, and by which they torture themselves, and are chafed by their afflictions rather than led to God; or it implies the reverse of those frantic exclamations to which others give utterance who find no comfort in the superintending providence and care of God. In short, we are left to infer that while he did not give way before people to loud and senseless lamentations, neither did he suffer himself to be tormented with inward and suppressed cares, but made known his griefs with unsuspecting confidence to the Lord. — Calvin.

NOTES ON PSALM 143

This psalm also is entitled “A Psalm of David.” There is, however, no intimation in the title as to the time or the occasion on which it was composed. In the Septuagint version, and the Latin Vulgate, it is said to have been written “when Absalom his son persecuted him.” There is nothing in the psalm inconsistent with this supposition, nor is there anything which necessarily restricts the application to that period of life. It would seem most natural that it should refer to the same trials as the previous psalm; and the sentiments in it are as applicable to the persecutions under Saul as to the rebellion of Absalom. There can be no doubt that it was composed when he was in danger and in trouble on account of malignant and powerful enemies; and it is of the same general character as many in the collection that were composed on those occasions. It is a psalm written in trouble; and, in a world like this, there will be always many hearts that can fully sympathize with the sentiments which are expressed in it.

Psalm 143:1. Hear my prayer, O LORD, give ear ... See the notes at Psalm 4:1; 5:1.

In thy faithfulness answer me That is, Show thy faithfulness to thy promises. God had made gracious promises to David (compare Psalm 89:19-37), and he now pleads that he would remember those promises, and accomplish in his behalf what he had said he would. God has also made gracious promises to his people, and they may always plead those promises as a reason why they should be heard, and why their prayers should be answered.

And in thy righteousness Compare Psalm 31:1. In thy disposition to do right; to vindicate a righteous cause; to interpose when wrong is done. We, though sinners before God, may feel that our cause is a just one as toward our fellowmen, and, when wronged, we may ask God to interpose, as a righteous God, in our behalf. We cannot, however, ask him to save us on the ground of our righteousness toward him, for we have no such righteousness. See Psalm 143:2.

Psalm 143:2. And enter not into judgment with thy servant Do not deal with me on the ground of justice as toward “thee;” do not mark my own offences against thee, when I plead that justice may be done as between me and my fellow-men. While I plead that thou wouldst judge righteously between me and them, I am conscious that I could not claim thy needed interposition on the ground of any righteousness toward thee. There I must confess that I am a sinner; there I can rely only on mercy; there I could not hope to be justified.

For in thy sight As before thee; in thy presence; by thee.

Shall no man living No one of the race, no matter what his rank, his outward conduct, his gentleness, his amiableness, his kindness; no matter how just and upright he may be toward his fellow-men.

Be justified Be regarded as righteous; be acquitted from blame; be held to be innocent. The meaning is, “I do not come before thee and plead for thy favor on the ground of any claim on thee, for I am conscious that I am a sinner, and that my only hope is in thy mercy.” See the notes at <sup><413></sup>Romans 3:20. Compare <sup><1847></sup>Job 4:17; 9:2,20; 15:14-16; 25:4-6. This is a great and momentous truth in regard to man; it is the foundation of the necessity for a plan of salvation through an atonement — for some way in which man “may” properly be regarded and treated as righteous. Assuredly every man, conscious of what he is in himself, may and should fervently pray that God “would” not enter into judgment with him; that he would not mark his offences; that he would not judge him as strict justice would demand. Our hope is in the “mercy,” not in the “justice” of God.

<sup><413></sup>Psalm 143:3. For the enemy hath persecuted my soul Has persecuted me; has sought my life.

He hath smitten my life down to the ground He has, as it were, trampled me down to the earth. The word rendered “smitten” means to break in pieces, to beat small, to crush. See <sup><1973></sup>Psalm 72:4; 89:10; <sup><1819></sup>Job 6:9. His very life seemed to be crushed out as one that is trodden down to the ground.

He hath made me to dwell in darkness He has made my life like that of one who dwells in darkness; he has made it a life of sorrow, so that I have no comfort — no light.

As those that have been long dead A similar expression occurs in <sup><2316></sup>Lamentations 3:6: “He hath set me in dark places, as they that be dead of old.” The same Hebrew words are used. The word rendered “long” means, age, duration, eternity: <sup><1D24></sup>Psalm 139:24. The idea here is, that his condition was like that of those who had been long in their graves; who had long since ceased to see any light; whose abode was utter and absolute gloom.

<sup><HE6></sup>Psalm 143:4. Therefore is my spirit overwhelmed within me See the notes at <sup><197B></sup>Psalm 77:3. Compare <sup><194B></sup>Psalm 42:5-7. His spirit was broken and crushed. He was in a state of despair as to any human help.

My heart within me is desolate I have no comfort; no cheerfulness; no hope. My soul is like the waste desert where there is no water; where nothing grows; where there are only rocks and sands.

<sup><HE6></sup>Psalm 143:5. I remember the days of old Former times.

- (1) As contrasted with my present condition.
- (2) As times when I called upon thee, and thou didst interpose.
- (3) As encouraging me now to come to thee, and spread out my case before thee. See the notes at <sup><197B></sup>Psalm 77:5-11; 42:4.

I meditate on all thy works ... On what thou hast done; on thy gracious interpositions in the time of trial; on the manifestations of thy power in my behalf, and in behalf of thy people. I call all this to mind, remembering that thou art an unchangeable God; that thou hast the same power still; that thou canst interpose now as thou didst then; and that, as an unchangeable God, thou wilt do it in the same circumstances. I, therefore, come to thee, and pray that thou wilt interpose in my behalf.

<sup><HE6></sup>Psalm 143:6. I stretch forth my hands unto thee In prayer. I have nowhere else to go. See <sup><188B></sup>Psalm 88:9.

My soul thirsteth after thee, as a thirsty land As land in a time of drought “seems” to thirst for rain. See the notes at <sup><160B></sup>Psalm 63:1. Compare <sup><194B></sup>Psalm 42:1. The word rendered “thirsty” here means properly “weary.” The idea is that of a land which seems to be weary; which has no vigor of growth; and where everything seems to be exhausted. The same word occurs in <sup><231B></sup>Isaiah 32:2: “As the shadow of a great rock in a weary land.”

<sup><HE6></sup>Psalm 143:7. “Hear me speedily, O LORD.” Hasten to hear me; do not delay. Literally, “Hasten; answer me.” I am in imminent danger. Do not delay to come to my relief.

My spirit faileth My strength is declining. I can hold out no longer. I am ready to give up and die.

Hide not thy face from me Do not refuse or delay to look favorably upon me; to lift up the light of thy countenance upon me.

Lest I be like unto them that go down into the pit Margin, “For I am become like.” The idea is, Unless thou shalt lift up the light of thy countenance — unless thou shalt interpose and help me, I shall die. The “pit” here refers to the grave. See the notes at <sup><1381></sup>Psalm 28:1.

<sup><1478></sup>Psalm 143:8. Cause me to hear thy lovingkindness The voice of thy lovingkindness, or thy mercy and favor. Permit me to hear thee addressing me in the language of kindness, and with the assurances of mercy.

In the morning Early; speedily; with the first rays of the morning. Let it be, as it were, the first thing in the day; the first thing that is done. The idea is not that he would wait for another day, but that he would interpose as the very first act — as when one enters on a day. See the notes at <sup><1475></sup>Psalm 46:5, where the margin is, when the morning appeareth; Hebrew, In the faces of the morning.

For in thee do I trust I have no other confidence or ground of reliance; but I have confidence in thee.

Cause me to know the way wherein I should walk ... The safe way; the way in which I may find safety. See the notes at <sup><1478></sup>Psalm 5:8.

I flee unto thee to hide me Margin, “Hide me with thee.” The Hebrew is, I hide myself with thee; that is, I take refuge with thee; I put myself under thy protection; I make myself thus secure, as thou art secure. See the notes at <sup><1478></sup>Psalm 17:8. Compare <sup><1475></sup>Psalm 27:5; 31:20.

<sup><1480></sup>Psalm 143:10. Teach me to do thy will ... To do that which will be agreeable or pleasing to thee; which will meet with thy approbation. That is, Teach me in the present emergency to do that which thou wilt approve; which will be wise; which will be best adapted to secure my deliverance and my safety.

Thy spirit is good The spirit which guides those who trust in thee; the spirit with which “thou” dost guide people. That spirit is wise, prudent, judicious, reliable. It will not lead astray. Grant me “that” spirit, and I shall be certain that I am going in the right path. There is no certain evidence that the psalmist here refers distinctively to the Holy Spirit, considered as the Third Person of the Trinity; but the prayer is one for guidance from on high in the day of darkness and trouble. It is an acknowledgment of dependence on God for direction, and the expression of confidence that under the divine guidance he would not go astray.

Lead me into the land of uprightness Or rather here, “land of evenness;” level ground; ground where I may walk without the dangers to which I am exposed where I am now, in a place of ambushes, caverns, rocks, where I may be assailed at any moment without the power of seeing my enemy, or of defending myself. See this use of the word in the following places where it is rendered “plain,” meaning a level country, <sup><B881></sup>Deuteronomy 3:10; 4:43; <sup><A839></sup>Joshua 13:9,16,17,21; <sup><I123></sup>1 Kings 20:23,25; <sup><A971></sup>Psalm 27:11; <sup><A213></sup>Jeremiah 21:13; 48:8,21; <sup><B047></sup>Zechariah 4:7. He desired to be led, as it were, into a “level” country where he might be safe. It is not a prayer, as would seem from our translation, to be so guided that he might lead an upright life. Such a prayer is proper, but it is not the prayer offered here.

<sup><B812></sup>Psalm 143:11. Quicken me, O LORD Give me life. Compare the notes at <sup><A881></sup>Ephesians 2:1. Make me equal to my circumstances, for I am ready to sink and to yield.

For thy name’s sake For thine honor. Compare the notes at <sup><A917></sup>Daniel 9:17,18. It is in thy cause. Thou wilt thus show thy power, thy faithfulness, thy goodness. Thou wilt thus get honor to thyself. This is the highest motive which can influence us — that God may be glorified.

For thy righteousness’ sake Thy justice; thy truth; thy faithfulness in performing thy promises and pledges.

Bring my soul out of trouble Out of this trouble and distress. See the notes at <sup><A957></sup>Psalm 25:17.

<sup><B812></sup>Psalm 143:12. And of thy mercy ... Thy mercy to me; thy mercy to the world. The destruction of the wicked is a favor to the universe; just as the arrest and punishment of a robber or a pirate is a mercy to society, to mankind; just as every prison is a display of “mercy” as well as of “justice” — mercy to society at large; justice to the offenders.

And destroy all them that afflict my soul Cut them off; render them powerless to do mischief.

For I am thy servant Not as a matter of private feeling — not for personal revenge — but because I am in thy service, and it is only by being delivered from these dangers that I can honor thee as I would. It is thine own cause, and I ask that they may be cut off “in order” that the service which I might render thee may be unembarrassed.

APPENDIX NOTES ON PSALM 143

In unison with the superscription, the psalm bears evidence throughout of David’s spirit and David’s mode of expression. It is almost wholly composed of the sounds of complaint, supplication, and hope, which had already been uttered in the earlier Davidic Psalms (only in such), and had sunk deep into the heart. These clear brooks were drawn from all sides into the channel of this smooth-flowing psalm, which was designed to provide quickening for the fainting souls of David’s race during future times of oppression. With so much of dependence the psalm still bears throughout the character of originality, not merely where the dependence ceases, as in ~~HEB~~ Psalm 143:2, which has become of such importance for the church, and to which the psalm owes its place among those of the penitential class, though, from its predominant tendency, it does not belong to that class, but also in the dependent passages themselves, in the thoughtful and artificial manner of their collection, which could only have proceeded from the person out of whose breast the utterances originally welled forth. There is nowhere any trace of “a flat compilation;” all is feeling and life. Along with this there is the repose and self-possession of one who does not find himself immediately involved in the distress, but looks down upon it as from a high tower, and prays and intercedes for the afflicted of his seed, as Moses of old did upon the mount.

That the psalm must not be viewed apart from those that surround it, is clear already from the connection with Psalm 142, compare ~~HEB~~ Psalm 143:4 here with ~~HEB~~ Psalm 142:3; ~~HEB~~ Psalm 143:8 with ~~HEB~~ Psalm 142:3, and ~~HEB~~ Psalm 143:11 with ~~HEB~~ Psalm 142:7. That David calls himself so expressly at the beginning and the end the servant of God, establishes a connection with 2 Samuel 7, where, in David's thanksgiving, this appellation occurs almost in every verse. — Hengstenberg.

The Septuagint ascribes this psalm to the period when David was in great distress, arising from Absalom's misconduct; which is as likely an opinion as any we can form. There is probably, in <sup><HEB></sup>Psalm 143:2, a tacit reference to the great transgression, the consequences of which followed David all his days. As he would not fail to be reminded of it by the sorrows which had now come upon him, and as his purpose was, notwithstanding, to implore divine support and deliverance, he deprecates God's righteous judgment, since if no man could be just with God, certainly he, who had so greatly transgressed, could have no claim to such a state. The consciousness of his guilt, though he had reason to believe it was forgiven, induced him thus to abase himself before God, when he was about to offer earnest entreaties for deliverance from dangers which threatened his dignity and life; while he still maintained his hope that God looked upon him as his servant, whom he had pledged himself to protect. — Walford.

This is the last of the seven Penitential Psalms, as they are called. In the Hebrew it is styled a Psalm of David; in some copies of the Septuagint it is further said to have been written when he had to flee from his son Absalom. It is probable that the deep tone of sorrow and anguish which pervades the psalm, and the deep sense of sin, led to the belief that it must be referred to that occasion. The spirit and the language, it is true, are not unworthy of David; yet the many passages borrowed from earlier psalms make it more probable that this psalm is the work of some later poet. Delitzsch says very truly, that if David himself did not write it — and he admits that the many expressions derived from other sources are against such a supposition — still the psalm is “an extract of the most precious balsam from the old Davidic songs.” — Perowne.

<sup><HEB></sup>Psalm 143:10. Teach me to do thy will He now rises to something higher, praying not merely for deliverance from outward troubles, but, what is of still greater importance, for the guidance of God's Spirit, that he might not decline to the right hand or to the left, but be kept in the path of rectitude. This is a request which should never be forgotten when temptations assail us with great severity, as it is especially difficult to submit to God without resorting to unwarrantable methods of relief. As anxiety, fear, disease, languor, or pain, often tempt persons to particular steps, David's example should lead us to pray for divine restraint, and that we may not be hurried, through impulses of feeling, into unjustifiable courses. We are to mark carefully his way of expressing himself, for what he asks is not simply to be taught what the will of God is, but to be taught and brought to the observance and doing of it. The former kind of teaching is of less avail, as upon God's showing us our duty we by no means necessarily follow it, and it is necessary that he should draw out our affections to himself. God therefore must be master and teacher to us not only in the dead letter, but by the inward motions of his Spirit; indeed there are three ways in which he acts the part of our teacher, instructing us by His Word, enlightening our minds by the Spirit, and engraving instruction upon our hearts so as to bring us to observe it with a true and cordial consent. The mere hearing of the Word would serve no purpose, nor is it enough that we understand it; there must be besides the willing obedience of the heart. Nor does he merely say, "Teach me that I may be capable of doing," as the deluded papists imagine that the grace of God does no more than make us flexible to what is good, but he seeks something to be actually and presently done.

He insists upon the same thing in the next clause, when he says, "Let thy good Spirit lead me, etc.," for he desires the guidance of the Spirit not merely as he enlightens our minds, but as he effectually influences the consent of our hearts, and, as it were, leads us by the hand. The passage in its connection warns us of the necessity of being sedulously on our guard against yielding to inordinate passions in any contests we may have with wicked persons, and as we have no sufficient wisdom or power of our own by which to check and restrain these passions, that we should always seek the guidance of God's Spirit, to keep them in moderation. — Calvin.

Psalm 143:12. And of thy mercy cut off ... In this verse he repeats for the fifth or sixth time that he looked for life only of God's free mercy. Whatever severity may appear on the part of God when he destroys the wicked, David affirms that the vengeance taken upon them would be a proof of fatherly mercy to him. Indeed these two things often meet together — the severity and the goodness of God, for in stretching out his hand to deliver his own people, he directs the thunder of his indignation against their enemies. In short, he comes forth armed for the deliverance of his people, as he says in Isaiah, "The day of vengeance is in mine heart, and this is the year of my redemption" (<sup>23504</sup> Isaiah 63:4). In calling himself "the servant of God," he by no means boasts of his services, but rather commends the grace of God, to whom he owed this privilege. This is not an honor to be got by our own struggles or exertions — to be reckoned among God’s servants; it depends upon his free choice, by which he condescends before we are born to take us into the number and rank of his followers, as David elsewhere declares still more explicitly — “I am thy servant, truly I am thy servant, and the son of thine handmaid” (~~136~~ Psalm 116:16). This is equivalent to making himself God’s client, and committing his life to his protection. — Calvin.

NOTES ON PSALM 144

This psalm is also ascribed to David. It is almost entirely a compilation of passages from other psalms — particularly Psalm 18 — newly arranged. Compare <sup><9834></sup>Psalm 18:34, with <sup><9801></sup>Psalm 144:1; 18:2,46, with <sup><9810></sup>Psalm 144:2; 18:9, with <sup><9815></sup>Psalm 144:5; 18:14, with <sup><9816></sup>Psalm 144:6; 18:16, with <sup><9817></sup>Psalm 144:7. Compare also <sup><9804></sup>Psalm 8:4, with <sup><9813></sup>Psalm 144:3; 104:32, with <sup><9815></sup>Psalm 144:5; 33:2,3, with <sup><9819></sup>Psalm 144:9; 33:12, with <sup><9815></sup>Psalm 144:15; 128:3, with <sup><9812></sup>Psalm 144:12. In itself considered there is nothing improbable in the supposition that David himself should have made such a selection, or should have employed language which he had used before, adapting it now to a new purpose, and making such additions as would fit it for the new occasion for which it was intended. It would not be possible now, however, to ascertain the occasion on which this arrangement was made, or its specific design. There is, evidently, a remembrance of former mercies; there was impending danger; there is an earnest prayer that God would interpose as he had done in former times; there is a promise of new songs of praise if God would interpose; there is a looking forward to the prosperity — the joy — which would result if God did thus interpose and save the nation. In regard to the occasion on which the psalm was written, perhaps the conjecture of Kimchi is the most probable, that it is a prayer against the attempts of foreign nations to overthrow the Hebrew people, in some of the numerous wars in which David was engaged after he had come to the possession of the crown. The different parts of the psalm can be better explained on this supposition than perhaps on any other. This would make proper all the expressions in regard to the past (<sup><9801></sup>Psalm 144:1,2); the uncertainty and instability of earthly things and the weakness of man (<sup><9813></sup>Psalm 144:3,4); the necessity of the divine interposition as in former times (<sup><9815></sup>Psalm 144:5-8); the reference to foreigners (<sup><9817></sup>Psalm 144:7,8,11); the purpose to praise God (<sup><9819></sup>Psalm 144:9,10); the allusion to the happiness of a people whose God is the Lord, and to the prosperity which would follow his interposition (<sup><9812></sup>Psalm 144:12-15).

<sup><9801></sup>Psalm 144:1. Blessed be the LORD my strength Margin, as in Hebrew, “my rock.” See the notes at <sup><9846></sup>Psalm 18:46, where the same expression occurs in the Hebrew.

Which teacheth my hands to war Hebrew, “To the war.” See the notes at <sup><91834></sup>Psalm 18:34. The Hebrew is not precisely alike, but the sense is the same.

And my fingers to fight Hebrew, my fingers to the fight. That is, he teaches my fingers so that I can skillfully use them in battle. Probably the immediate reference here is to the use of the bow — placing the arrow, and drawing the string.

<sup><91820></sup>Psalm 144:2. My goodness Margin, “my mercy.” That is, He shows me mercy or favor. All the favors that I receive come from him.

My shield The same word which in <sup><91820></sup>Psalm 18:2 is rendered “buckler.” See the notes at that passage.

Who subdueth my people under me See the notes at <sup><91847></sup>Psalm 18:47. The language is slightly different, but the idea is the same. It is to be remarked that David “here” refers to his people — “who subdueth my people,” meaning that those over whom God had placed him had been made submissive by the divine power.

<sup><91820></sup>Psalm 144:3. LORD, what is man, that thou takest knowledge of him? The sentiment here is the same as in <sup><91804></sup>Psalm 8:4, though the language is not precisely the same. See the notes at that passage. The word rendered “that thou takest knowledge of him,” means here to take notice of; to regard. The idea is, It is amazing that a being so insignificant as man should be an object of interest to God, or that One so great should pay any attention to him and to his affairs. In <sup><91804></sup>Psalm 8:4, the language is “that thou art mindful of him,” that is, that thou dost remember him — that thou dost not altogether pass him over. In Psalm 8 the remark is made in view of the heavens as being so exalted in comparison with man, and the wonder is, that in view of worlds so vast occupying the divine attention, and needing the divine care, “man,” so insignificant, does not pass out of his view altogether. Here the remark seems to be made in illustration of the idea that there is no strength in man; that he has no power to accomplish anything of himself; that he is entirely dependent on God.

Or the son of man Man — any of the race. See the notes at <sup><1904></sup>Psalm 8:4.

That thou makest account of him! <sup><1904></sup>Psalm 8:4, “that thou visitest him.” See the notes at that passage. The word here means “that thou shouldst “think” of him,” that he should ever come into thy thought at all.

<sup><1904></sup>Psalm 144:4. Man is like to vanity See the notes at <sup><1905></sup>Psalm 39:5,6; 62:9. The idea here is, that man can be compared only with that which is utterly vain — which is emptiness — which is nothing.

His days are as a shadow that passeth away See the notes at <sup><1921></sup>Psalm 102:11: “My days are like a shadow that declineth.” The idea is essentially the same. It is, that as a shadow has no substance, and that as it moves along constantly as the sun declines, until it vanishes altogether, so man has nothing substantial or permanent, and so he is constantly moving off and will soon wholly disappear.

<sup><1916></sup>Psalm 144:5. Bow thy heavens, O LORD ... Come to my aid “as if” the heavens were bent down; come down with all thy majesty and glory. See the notes at <sup><1919></sup>Psalm 18:9: “He bowed down the heavens also, and came down.” What it is there declared that the Lord “had” done, he is here implored to do again.

Touch the mountains, and they shall smoke See the notes at <sup><1942></sup>Psalm 104:32: “He toucheth the hills, and they smoke.” It is there affirmed as a characteristic of God that he “does” this; here the psalmist prays that, as this belonged to God, or was in his power, he “would” do it in his behalf. The prayer is, that God would come to his relief “as if” in smoke and tempest — in the fury of the storm.

<sup><1916></sup>Psalm 144:6. Cast forth lightnings, and scatter them See the notes at <sup><1914></sup>Psalm 18:14: “He sent out his arrows, and scattered them.” The allusion there is to lightning. The psalmist prays that; God would do now again what he had then done. The Hebrew here is, “Lighten lightning;” that is, Send forth lightning. The word is used as a verb nowhere else.

Shoot out thine arrows ... So in <sup><1914></sup>Psalm 18:14: “He shot out lightnings.” The words are the same here as in that psalm, only that they are arranged differently. See the notes at that place.

Rid me, and deliver me out of great waters Thus <sup><9816></sup>Psalm 18:16: “He took me, he drew me out of many waters.” As God had done it once, there was ground for the prayer that he would do it yet again.

From the hand of strange children Strangers: strangers to thee; strangers to thy people, foreigners. See <sup><5413></sup>Psalm 54:3: “For strangers are risen up against me.” The language would properly imply that at the time referred to in the psalm he was engaged in a warfare with foreign enemies. Who they were, we have no means now of ascertaining.

<sup><8818></sup>Psalm 144:8. Those mouth speaketh vanity Vain things; things not real and true; falsehood; lies. See the notes at <sup><1204></sup>Psalm 24:4. The idea is, that what they said had no foundation in truth — no reality. Truth is solid and reliable; falsehood is unreliable and vain.

And their right hand is a right hand of falsehood The meaning here seems to be that even under the solemnities of an oath, when they lifted up their hands to swear, when they solemnly appealed to God, there was no reliance to be placed on what they affirmed or promised. Oaths were taken by lifting up the right hand as toward God. See <sup><1142></sup>Genesis 14:22; <sup><1118></sup>Exodus 6:8 (Margin, and Hebrew); <sup><1520></sup>Deuteronomy 32:40.

<sup><8819></sup>Psalm 144:9. I will sing a new song unto thee, O God There will be occasion in such a deliverance, or manifestation of mercy, for a new expression of praise. On the phrase, “a new song,” see the notes at <sup><1118></sup>Psalm 33:3.

Upon a psaltery, and an instrument of ten strings The word “and” should not have been inserted here. The idea is, “Upon a lyre or harp (Nebel) of ten strings, will I sing praise.” See the notes at <sup><2312></sup>Isaiah 5:12; and <sup><1118></sup>Psalm 33:2.

<sup><8819></sup>Psalm 144:10. It is he that giveth salvation unto kings Margin, “Victory.” The Hebrew word means “salvation,” but it is used here in the sense of deliverance or rescue. Even “kings,” with all their armies, have no hope but in God. They seem to be the most powerful of men, but they are, like all other people, wholly dependent on him for deliverance from danger. David thus recognizes his own entire dependence. Though a king in the divine purpose and in fact, yet he had no power but as derived from God; he had no hope of deliverance but in him. It is implied further that God might as readily be supposed to be willing to interpose in behalf of kings as of other people when their cause was right, and when they looked to him for aid. See the notes at <sup><49316></sup>Psalm 33:16: “there is no king saved by the multitude of an host.” Compare <sup><49416></sup>Psalm 44:5,6.

Who delivereth David his servant from the hurtful sword Who has done it; who can do it again; on whom alone David is dependent as all other men are. David speaks of himself by name elsewhere. See <sup><49181></sup>Psalm 18:50; <sup><40723></sup>2 Samuel 7:26. He refers to himself also under the name of “the king,” <sup><4916></sup>Psalm 61:6; 63:11. Caesar, in his writings, often speaks of himself in the same way.

<sup><4911></sup>Psalm 144:11. Rid me, and deliver me ... See the notes at <sup><4917></sup>Psalm 144:7,8. The language is here repeated. The prayer had been interrupted by the thought that the answer to it would lay the foundation for praise, and by an acknowledgment of entire dependence on God. The psalmist now, after repeating the prayer, suggests what would result from the answer to it, and dwells on the happy consequences which must follow; the bright scenes in his own reign, in the prosperity of the people, in the happiness of the nation, in domestic comforts, and in the abundance which the land would produce when these dangers should pass away, when people now engaged in the conflict of arms might return to the peaceful pursuits of life, when families would be safe in their dwellings, and when the earth cultivated in time of peace would again produce abundance, <sup><4912></sup>Psalm 144:12-14.

<sup><4912></sup>Psalm 144:12. That our sons may be as plants grown up in their youth That our sons — not called forth to the hardships of the tent and the field, the perils and the exposures of war — may grow up under the culture of home, of the family, in quiet scenes, as plants carefully cultivated and flourishing. Compare <sup><4938></sup>Psalm 128:3. The Hebrew here is, “grown large in their youth;” not “grown up,” which has a paradoxical appearance. The meaning is, that they may be stout, strong, vigorous, well-formed, even in early life; that they may not be stunted in their growth, but be of full and manly proportions.

Polished Margin, “cut.” The idea is not that of “polishing” or “smoothing,” but of cutting or sculpturing. It is the stone carefully cut as an ornament.

After the similitude of a palace A more literal translation would be, “The likeness or model of a temple;” or, for the building of a temple. That is, that they may be such as may be properly compared with the ornamental columns of a temple or palace. The comparison is a very beautiful one, having the idea of grace, symmetry, fair proportions: that on which the skill of the sculptor is most abundantly lavished.

Psalm 144:13. That our garners may be full That our fields may yield abundance, so that our granaries may be always filled.

Affording all manner of store Margin, “From kind to kind.” Hebrew, “From sort to sort;” that is, every sort or kind of produce or grain; all, in variety, that is needful for the supply of man and beast.

That our sheep may bring forth thousands and ten thousands in our streets A great part of the wealth of Palestine always consisted in flocks of sheep; and, from the earliest periods, not a few of the inhabitants were shepherds. This language, therefore, is used to denote national prosperity.

In our streets The Hebrew word used here means properly whatever is outside; what is out of doors or abroad, as opposed to what is within, as the inside of a house; and then, what is outside of a town, as opposed to what is within. It may, therefore, mean a street (<sup><3871></sup>Jeremiah 37:21; <sup><18187></sup>Job 18:17; <sup><2165></sup>Isaiah 5:25); and then the country, the fields, pastures, etc.: <sup><8510></sup>Job 5:10; <sup><2183></sup>Proverbs 8:26. Here it refers to the pastures; the fields; the commons.

Psalm 144:14. That our oxen may be strong to labour Margin, “able to bear burdens;” or, “laden with flesh.” The Hebrew is simply loaded or laden: that is, with a burden; or, with flesh; or, as Gesenius renders it, with young. The latter idea would best suit the connection — that of cattle producing abundantly or multiplying.

That there be no breaking in, nor going out No breaking in of other cattle into enclosed grounds, and no escape of those which are shut up for pasture. That property may be safe everywhere. The image is that of security, peace, order, prosperity.

That there be no complaining in our streets literally, “outcry; clamor.” That the land may be at peace; that order and law may be observed; that the rights of all may be respected; that among neighbors there may be no strifes and contentions.

Psalm 144:15. Happy is that people that is in such a case In such a condition; or, where these things prevail.

Yea, happy is that people, whose God is the LORD Whose God is Yahweh; who worship and serve Him as their God. The worship of Yahweh — the religion of Yahweh — is “adapted” to make a people happy; peaceful; quiet; blessed. Prosperity and peace, such as are referred to in the previous verses, are, and must be, the result of pure religion. Peace, order, abundance, attend it everywhere, and the best security for a nation’s prosperity is the worship of God; that which is most certain to make a nation happy and blessed, is to acknowledge God and to keep his laws.

APPENDIX NOTES ON PSALM 144

In unison with the superscription, David comes forth speaking, compare especially Psalm 144:2, which alone suffices to dispose of the supposition, that Israel is the speaker here; and the declaration: who constrains my people under me, cannot, without great violence, be brought into accordance with that supposition. David, as the author, appropriates also from Psalm 18. It is an arbitrary supposition, that here a transference is made to Israel of what was then said originally of David. The confirmation which the superscription here derives from the contents comes also in support of the whole cycle to which the psalm belongs. An objection has been brought against the Davidic authorship from the “traces of reading” it contains. But one would require to consider more exactly what sort of reading is here to be thought of. It is only the psalms of David which form the groundwork of this. But that it is one of David’s peculiarities to derive from his earlier productions a foundation for new ones, is evident from a variety of facts (compare the Introduction to Psalm 108), which, if any doubt might still be entertained on the subject, would obtain a firm ground to stand upon in this psalm, which can only have been composed by David. Then the way and manner of the use made of such materials is to be kept in view. This is always of a spirited and feeling nature, and no trace anywhere exists of a lifeless borrowing. That we cannot think here of such a borrowing, that the appropriation of the earlier did not proceed from spiritual impotence, but rests upon deeper grounds, is manifest from the consideration of the second part, where the dependence entirely ceases, and where even the opponents of the Davidic authorship have not been able to overlook the strong poetical spirit of the time of David. They betake to the miserable shift of affirming, that the psalmist had borrowed this part from a much older poem now lost.

The situation is that of an oppression through mighty external enemies. As this psalm rests upon Psalm 18, which was composed by David toward the end of his life, after he had obtained deliverance from all the perils of war, it cannot be referred to the personal relations of David; David rather transports himself here, as in the whole of the cycle, into the future of his race.

This psalm forms the transition from the two prayer-psalms, Psalm 142; 143, to the song of praise, Psalm 145: The cloud of adversity begins already to disperse, and the sun of salvation is on the eve of breaking forth. <HEB>Psalm 144:9,10 show that the psalmist already stands on the threshold of praise and thanksgiving. The cry from the deep has ceased; at the very commencement, the exclamation, "Let the Lord be praised," etc., breathes the spirit of victory, and leads on to the: "I will praise thy name," in Psalm 145. — Hengstenberg.

This is a kind of supplement or counterpart to Psalm 18, in which the view there taken of David's personal experience is applied to the anticipated case of his successors. The design thus assumed accounts for the position of the psalm in the collection. That its being placed precisely here is not fortuitous, may be inferred from its furnishing a kind of link between the urgent entreaties of the preceding psalms, and the triumphant praise of those which follow. The Davidic origin of this psalm is as marked as that of any in the Psalter. The accumulation of Davidic phrases is confined to the first part, while the last is independent and original, a fact entirely inconsistent with the supposition of a later compilation. The psalmist thanks God for his protection of himself, and of mankind in general, <HEB>Psalm 144:1-4; prays for deliverance from present dangers, <HEB>Psalm 144:5-8; expresses his confident anticipation of a favorable answer, <HEB>Psalm 144:9,10; renews his prayer, not only for himself but for the chosen people, <sup><HEB></sup>Psalm 144:11-14; and felicitates them that they are such, <sup><HEB></sup>Psalm 144:15. — Alexander.

The Spirit of the Lord spake by David the words of this song when the king felt his need of the King of kings to subdue the turbulent and proud spirits who were ambitious of distinction (<sup><HEB></sup>Psalm 144:2), as well as to conquer the nations of idolaters who hated God's anointed (<sup><HEB></sup>Psalm 144:7-11). The Spirit leads him back to the day when he sang Psalm 18 (see <sup><HEB></sup>Psalm 144:1,2), the day when he was delivered from Saul and other foes; and still further back to the quiet night when the strains of Psalm 8 ascended to the ear of Yahweh (see <sup><HEB></sup>Psalm 144:3); but he does not fail also to lead him forward to a future day, when earth shall witness its millennial scenes, among which, not the least wonderful and refreshing shall be Israel in all the restored plenty of his last times, with the favor of Yahweh over all. In all this, David was the type of Christ. — A. A. Bonar.

<sup><HEB></sup>Psalm 144:1,2. Blessed be the Lord my strength which teacheth my hands to war ... Let poor and humble youths to whom the future seems dark, and who yet have noble aspirations to serve God and their generation, not be cast down, but hope in the Lord. He who took David from the crook and taught him the use of the sword and the sling, and lifted up his head above all his enemies round about, is still the patron of poor and pious boys and girls, who make him their refuge and their all. It matters not how unskillful one may now be, and how wholly unprepared for a given work, if God will but take him in hand. Even parents and instructors may sometimes bring great discouragements on their most promising children and pupils. More than one of Walter Scott's teachers complained of the thickness of his skull; a number of his teachers pronounced Barrow a blockhead; while Isaac Newton was declared to be fit for nothing but to drive the team. Jesse so slighted David, as not even to call him to the sacrifice, and his brothers declared that they knew the pride and naughtiness of his heart. But God raised him above all these obstacles and oppositions. Set your hope in God, struggling youth. Never cease prayer and effort. — Plumer.

<sup><HEB></sup>Psalm 144:3. Lord, what is man that thou takest knowledge of him! He amplifies the goodness shown by God by instituting a comparison. Having declared how singularly he had been dealt with, he turns his eye inward, and asks, "Who am I, that God should show me such condescension?" He speaks of man in general, only the circumstance is noticeable, that he commends the mercy of God, by considering his lowly and abject condition. In other places he mentions grounds of humiliation of a more personal or private nature — here he confines himself to what has reference to our common nature; and though even in discussing the nature of man, there are other reasons he might have specified why he is unworthy of the regard and love of God, he briefly adverts to his being like the smoke and as a shadow. We are left to infer that the riches of the divine goodness are extended to objects altogether unworthy in themselves. We are warned, when apt at any time to forget ourselves, and think we are something, when we are nothing, that the simple fact of the shortness of our life should put down all arrogance and pride. The Scriptures, in speaking of the frailty of man, comprehend whatever is necessarily connected with it. And, indeed, if our life vanish in a moment, what is there stable about us? We are taught this truth also — that we cannot properly estimate the divine goodness, unless we take into consideration what we are as to our condition, as we can only ascribe to God what is due unto him, by acknowledging that his goodness is bestowed upon undeserving creatures. The reader may seek for further information upon this point in Psalm 8, where nearly the same truth is insisted upon. — Calvin.

Psalm 144:7. Send thine hand from above, rid me from the hand of strange children David having celebrated his victories over some of his enemies, and extolled the mercy and goodness of God, to whom he ascribeth the achievement of them, now proceedeth to request a further manifestation of the omnipotent arm in his favor against other hostile forces, which still threatened his country upon his accession to the throne; such as the Philistines, Moabites, Ammonites, ..., see 2 Samuel 5; 8. These are called, metaphorically, “great waters,” threatening to overwhelm and destroy everything; and, in plainer terms, “strange children,” or aliens from the covenant of Yahweh, and the commonwealth of Israel; children who “speak lies, and work wickedness,” or, as Dr. Hammond interpreteth Psalm 144:8, “Whose mouth speaketh or maketh profession of vanity,” adv,<sup><17723></sup>, that is, idolatry; “and their right hand,” that on which they depend for support, the object of their confidence, “is a right hand of falsehood,” rqæ,<sup><18266></sup>, and one that will fail all who rely upon it for help. Yahweh, the God of Israel, is therefore entreated once more to appear in the cause of his anointed; to go forth, as of old, to the battle against the enemies of his people, with all the tokens of his displeasure and vengeance, dismaying and putting to flight these “armies of aliens.” In like manner, the church, or mystical body of Christ, is instant in prayer for the final completion of her hope. She wisheth for the glorious day when her God and Saviour shall bow the heavens and come down to judgment, causing the mountains to smoke, and flame, and dissolve, and flow down before him; when his lightnings, those arrows of his indignation, and ministers of his vengeance, shall scatter the hosts of darkness, and destroy the anti-Christian power; when we shall be delivered from every enemy, and from all that hate us, and David our king. — Horne.

Psalm 144:15. Happy is that people ... He thus concludes that the divine favor had been sufficiently shown and manifested to his people. Should any object that it breathed altogether a gross and worldly spirit to estimate man's happiness by benefits of a transitory description, I would say in reply that we must read the two things in connection, that those are happy who recognize the favor of God in the abundance they enjoy, and have such a sense of it from these transitory blessings as leads them through a persuasion of his fatherly love to aspire after the true inheritance. There is no impropriety in calling those happy whom God blesses in this world, provided they do not show themselves blinded in the improvement and use which they make of their mercies, or foolishly and supinely overlook the author of them. The kind providence of God in not suffering us to want any of the means of life is surely a striking illustration of his wonderful love. What more desirable than to be the objects of God's care, especially if we have sufficient understanding to conclude from the liberality with which he supports us that he is our Father? For everything is to be viewed with a reference to this point. Better it were at once to perish for want than have a mere brute satisfaction, and forget the main thing of all, that they and they only are happy whom God has chosen for his people. We are to observe this, that while God in giving us meat and drink admits us to the enjoyment of a certain measure of happiness, it does not follow that those believers are miserable who struggle through life in want and poverty, for this want, whatever it be, God can counterbalance by better consolations. — Calvin.

NOTES ON PSALM 145

This is also a Psalm of David, and the last of the series in this part of the collection. It is entitled simply, “Of Praise,” or, in the Hebrew, “Praise by David,” or “Praise of David;” that is, one of David’s songs of praise. It is an “alphabetical” psalm; that is, each verse begins with a letter of the Hebrew alphabet. The arrangement in this respect is complete, except that the Hebrew letter nun (n) is omitted, for which no reason can be assigned, unless it was from a desire that the psalm might consist of three equal parts of seven verses each. In the Septuagint, Syriac, Arabic, Latin Vulgate, and Aethiopic versions, this omission is attempted to be supplied by inserting between <sup><BES3></sup>Psalm 145:13,14 a verse which in Hebrew would begin with the Hebrew letter nun (n), <sup>ˆ</sup>man, etc.: “Faithful is the Lord in all his words, and holy in all his works.” This is taken from <sup><B517></sup>Psalm 145:17 of the psalm by the change of a word in the beginning — “faithful” for “righteous,” <sup>ˆ</sup>mæ<sup><h539></sup> for <sup>qydxæ</sup><sup><h662></sup>. There is no authority for this, however, in the MSS., and it is evidently an attempt to supply what seemed to be an omission or defect in the composition of the psalm. The verse is not in the Chaldee Paraphrase, or in the version of Aquila and Theodotion; and it is certain that as early as the time of Origen and Jerome it was not in the Hebrew text. The Masorites and the Jewish commentators reject it. The sense is in no way affected by the insertion or omission of this, since the verses of the psalm have no necessary connection in meaning — the composition, as in most of the alphabetical psalms, being made up of independent sentiments suggested in part at least by the necessity of commencing each verse with a particular letter.

The psalm does not admit of any particular analysis, and it is impossible now to ascertain the occasion on which it was written.

<sup><BET1></sup>Psalm 145:1. I will extol thee ... I will lift thee up; I will lift up thy name and praise, so that it may be heard afar.

And I will bless thy name forever and ever I will bless or praise thee. I will do it now; I will do it in all the future. I will do it in time; I will do it in eternity. See the notes at <sup><B801></sup>Psalm 30:1.

Psalm 145:2. Every day will I bless thee ... Compare Psalm 92:2; 55:17. As we receive blessings from God every day (compare Lamentations 3:23), it is proper that we should render to him daily thanks; as God is the same always — “yesterday, today, and forever” — it is proper that he should receive from day to day the tribute of praise; as we are daily dependent on him — one day as much as another — our recognition of that dependence should be daily; and as he will always be unchangeably the same, it will be proper that he should be praised forever and ever. Two things are apparent from this verse:

- (1) That a truly religious man “will” worship God every day;
- (2) that it is the fixed purpose of a truly religious man to continue this forever.

Psalm 145:3. Great is the LORD, and greatly to be praised See the notes at Psalm 96:4; 18:3.

And his greatness is unsearchable See the notes at Job 5:9; 9:10; 11:7,8.

Psalm 145:4. One generation shall praise thy works ... Shall praise thee on account of thy works or thy doings. That is, Thy praise shall be always kept up on the earth. See the notes at Isaiah 38:19; Psalm 19:2. One generation shall transmit the knowledge of thy works to another by praise — by hymns and psalms recording and celebrating thy praise. Successive generations of people shall take up the language of praise, and it shall thus be transmitted to the end of time.

And shall declare thy mighty acts Thy works of strength or power. God’s greatness — his infinity — is in itself a just ground of praise, for we should rejoice that there is One Infinite Eternal Being; and as all that greatness is employed in the cause of truth, of law, of good order, of justice, of kindness, of mercy, it should call forth continued praise in all parts of his dominions.

Psalm 145:5. I will speak That is, in my acts of praise. I will not be ashamed to be known as his worshipper; I will publicly declare my belief in his existence, his greatness, his goodness.

Of the glorious honor of thy majesty The glory of the honor of thy majesty. This accumulation of epithets shows that the heart of the psalmist was full of the subject, and that he labored to find language to express his emotions. It is beauty; it is glory; it is majesty: it is all that is great, sublime, wonderful — all combined — all concentrated — in one Being.

And of thy wondrous works Margin, “things,” or “words.” The reference is to wondrous deeds or acts considered as the subject of discourse or praise.

Psalm 145:6. And men shall speak of the might of thy terrible acts The force, the power of those things done by thee which are suited to inspire fear or reverence. The great power displayed in those acts shall be a ground or reason for celebrating thy praise. The manifestations of that power will so deeply impress the minds of people, that they will be led to speak of them.

And I will declare thy greatness Hebrew, “And thy greatness, I will declare it.” In respect to that, I will recount it, or I will make it known to others.

Psalm 145:7. They shall abundantly utter the memory of thy great goodness Hebrew, The memory of the greatness of thy goodness they will pour forth. The word rendered “abundantly utter” means to bud forth, to gush out, to flow, as a fountain. <sup>1804</sup>Proverbs 18:4; 1:23; 15:2,28. It is applied to words as poured forth in praise. The meaning is, that the heart is full, as a fountain is full of water, and that it naturally overflows, or seeks to discharge itself. The thought of the goodness of God fills the heart, and makes it overflow with gratitude.

Psalm 145:8. The LORD is gracious See the notes at <sup>1815</sup>Psalm 86:5,15.

Slow to anger See <sup>1848</sup>Psalm 103:8, where the same expression occurs.

And of great mercy Margin, great in mercy. His greatness is shown in his mercy; and the manifestation of that mercy is great: great, as on a large scale; great, as manifested toward great sinners; great, in the sacrifice made that it may be displayed; great, in the completeness with which sin is pardoned — pardoned so as to be remembered no more.

Psalm 145:9. The LORD is good to all To all his creatures. That is, he is kind and compassionate toward them; he is disposed and ready to do them good. There is not one of them whom he is not ready and willing to bless; not one whose happiness would not be agreeable to him, or whose welfare he is not ready to promote. Compare Psalm 100:5.

And his tender mercies are over all his works In all that he has made there is evidence that he is a kind and benevolent God. He has a heart to love, to bless, what he has made; everywhere arrangements are made for happiness; he is not disposed to cast off the feeble, the erring, and the suffering; he is willing to receive back again those who have wandered from him, to pardon the offending, to wipe away the tears of the sorrowful.

Psalm 145:10. All thy works shall praise thee Or, do praise thee; that is, all thy works show what thou art, and combine in setting forth thy perfections. See the notes at Psalm 19:1.

And thy saints shall bless thee Or, do bless thee. All those who are holy in heaven and on earth, the angels around thy throne, and thy people below, all combine to proclaim thy praise.

Psalm 145:11. They shall speak of the glory of thy kingdom Of thy reign; of the great principles of thy government and laws. They see in that reign evidence that thou art worthy of universal praise. Seeing this, it becomes to them a subject on which they talk or converse (compare Malachi 3:16) — a subject of interest to their hearts, and “out of the abundance of the heart the mouth speaks.” People talk about that which interests them; those things in which they have pleasure; those which they desire to understand; those in which they see difficulties that they would wish to have solved. It is one of the characteristics of the “saints” — of the people of God — that they do talk about God and his kingdom; that the subject is to them a pleasant theme of meditation and conversation; that they have the kind of pleasure in talking about God which other people have in conversing about their farms or their merchandise, their children and friends, the news of the day, politics, literature, or science.

And talk of thy power As put forth in the works of creation; as manifested in the dispensations of thy providence; as evinced in the conversion of sinners; as displayed in carrying thy truth around the world; as exhibited in sustaining the feeble sufferer, and in giving peace and support to the dying.

Psalm 145:12. To make known to the sons of men his mighty acts

To bring other people to understand and to appreciate the evidences of the power of God. A man who sees this himself will wish that others may see it also. This is the foundation of the desire which warms and animates the heart of the Christian missionary — the desire to make the great truths of redemption known as far as possible, even to the ends of the earth.

And the glorious majesty of his kingdom And the glory of the majesty of his reign. They wish to communicate the knowledge of this to those ignorant of it. They themselves see this to be glorious, and they wish that all others may see it also.

Psalm 145:13. Thy kingdom is an everlasting kingdom ... See the notes at <sup><1906></sup>Psalm 10:16; <sup><2084></sup>Daniel 4:34. The meaning is, that the reign of God will continue forever and ever. It will never pass away as other dominions do; it will not change as dynasties do among people; it will not be overthrown as they are; its great principles will stand firm forever and ever. Compare the notes at <sup><1927></sup>Psalm 72:17.

Psalm 145:14. The LORD upholdeth all that fall The word used here is a participle, literally, “The Lord sustaining;” that is, the Lord is a Sustainer or Upholder of all that fall. The allusion is to those who have no power to go of themselves; who would sink under the burdens of life if they were not supported. The idea is, that it is a characteristic of the Lord, that he does sustain such; that all such may confidently look to him to uphold them.

And raiseth up all those that be bowed down The word here also is a participle: “he is lifting up;” that is, he is a lifter up. The reference is to those who are bent and bowed under the duties, the cares, the trials of life; who go bowed down under those burdens. God is able to strengthen them so that they can bear those burdens without being crushed under them.

Psalm 145:15. The eyes of all wait upon thee Margin, Look unto thee. All creatures, on the land, in the air, in the waters; all in heaven; all throughout the universe. That is, It is as if all directed their eyes to thee imploringly for the supply of their needs. To no one else can they look for those things which are needful for them. A universe thus looks every day, every hour, every moment, to its God! How sublime the scene!

And satisfiest the desire of every living thing All kinds of creatures — people, fowls, beasts, fishes, insects — the innumerable multitudes that swarm on the earth, in the air, in the waters. In <sup><1948></sup>Psalm 104:28, it is, “They are filled with good.” The meaning is essentially the same. Of course this is to be taken in a general sense. It cannot mean that absolutely no one ever needs, or ever perishes from want, but the idea is that of the amazing beneficence and fullness of God in being able and willing to satisfy such multitudes; to keep them from perishing by cold, or hunger, or nakedness. And, in fact, how few birds perish by hunger; how few of the infinite number of the inhabitants of the sea; how few animals that roam over deserts, or in vast plains; how few people; how few even of the insect tribes — how few in the world revealed by the microscope — the world beneath us — the innumerable multitudes of living things too small even to be seen by the naked eye of man!

<sup><1957></sup>Psalm 145:17. The LORD is righteous in all his ways In his own character; in his laws; in his providential dealings; in his arrangements for the redemption and salvation of man. In his own character he is what it is desirable that a God should be; in all his laws he ordains that only which it is desirable should be enacted; in all his dealings with people he does that which it is desirable should be done. He violates no right; he wrongs no one; he demands of no one a service which would be unjust; he makes no arrangements for pardon and salvation which it is not best should be made. It is much for a man to be able to say in all that occurs to him under the divine administration, “It is right;” it is much for a man to have such confidence in God as to be able to feel that all he does in respect to nations is the best thing that could be done. Compare the notes at <sup><1994></sup>Psalm 89:14; 97:2.

And holy in all his works Margin, merciful, or bountiful. The Hebrew word is merciful. The idea seems to be that righteousness and mercy are equally consulted in his arrangements; that they meet together, and act harmoniously in the divine plans. Compare the notes at <sup><1950></sup>Psalm 85:10.

Psalm 145:18. The LORD is nigh unto all them that call upon him

There is a sense in which he is “nigh” to all, for he is everywhere present; but there is a special sense in which he seems to be near to us; in which he manifests himself to us; in which he gives us evidence of his presence. It is in prayer, in praise, in his ordinances — in his gracious interpositions in our behalf — in the peace and joy which we have in communion with him. Compare the notes at <sup><3918></sup>Psalm 34:18: “The Lord is nigh unto them that are of a broken heart.”

To all that call upon him in truth In sincerity; not hypocritically; worshipping him as the true God, and with a sincere desire to obtain his favor. Compare the notes at <sup><404></sup>John 4:24. We can have no hope that God will hear us unless we are sincere in our worship. He sees the heart, and he will act toward us as we are, and not as we profess to be.

Psalm 145:19. He will fulfil the desire of them that fear him Of those who worship him with reverence — those who are his true friends. See the notes at <sup><4007></sup>Matthew 7:7,8; <sup><3844></sup>John 14:14; <sup><6154></sup>1 John 5:14; <sup><3815></sup>Psalm 34:15.

He also will hear their cry, and will save them He will regard their expressed desire — their earnest prayer.

Psalm 145:20. The LORD preserveth all them that love him He keeps them; watches over them; defends them; makes them the object of his care. See the notes at <sup><3811></sup>Psalm 31:20,23; 97:10.

But all the wicked will he destroy All that are found ultimately to be wicked; all that on the final trial deserve to be classed with the wicked. See the notes at <sup><3997></sup>Psalm 9:17; 11:6; <sup><4256></sup>Matthew 25:46.

Psalm 145:21. My mouth shall speak the praise of the LORD That is, I will utter his praise. In view of all these things, in view of his character and doings, I will praise him. I will be found among those who honor him; who acknowledge him as the true God; who render homage for what he is, and thanks for what he has done.

And let all flesh bless his holy name forever and ever All people; all that dwell upon the earth. Let his praise be universal and eternal. This is the language of true piety; all in whose bosom there is any true religion will heartily say Amen. No desire of a pious heart is more constant and strong than that God should be praised, adored, honored by all intelligent creatures; that he should be known and acknowledged in all the earth as the true God; that his praise should ascend from all parts of the universe forever. See the notes at Psalm 100.

APPENDIX NOTES ON PSALM 145

The well-known Psalm 45 sang of the King in his beauty; this is a hymn of praise concerning the reign of Yahweh and his kingdom. It is a Davidic and an alphabetic psalm. In regard to its alphabetic structure, it has one peculiarity, namely, the nun (n) is omitted; the reason of which may be, that (as we have seen in some other psalms of this structure) by means of that, or some other such omission, we might be kept from putting stress on the mere form of the composition.

It is special, also, in its title; indeed, quite unique — “Of David: praise.” The word is hLhT̄T̄<sup>318416</sup>. Some render this “a hymn;” others, such as Hengstenberg, “a praise-song,” differing in this from the hLpT̄T̄<sup>318605</sup>, the “prayer-song.” It is prayer turned into praise. Patrick remarks that the term seemed so special and excellent, that it was given from this psalm to the whole book, which is entitled by the Jews the book of hLhT̄T̄<sup>318416</sup>. Bythner has this note on the word — “So called because it is throughout nothing but the celebration of God; so that the ancient Jews used to say, that the man was already enjoying the felicity of the age to come, who daily recited it three times with the mouth and heart.” We are getting now beyond the region of former themes; all in the remaining psalms is praise, praise; and this title is an appropriate introduction to the closing group of praise-psalms. Nor is its burden less appropriate, for, being a song of the kingdom, it ushers us into the region of eternal praise. — Bonar.

The design of this psalm, as its contents abundantly show, is to celebrate the power, righteousness, and goodness of God. It was probably written toward the conclusion of David’s reign, when the kingdom of Israel had attained its highest prosperity, and was blessed on every side with the enjoyment of perfect peace and security.

During the attention which the writer of these remarks has necessarily given to the work which is now approaching its close, he has, in several instances, felt so powerfully the excellence of these songs of Zion, as to think that that on which he had last been engaged surpassed, in interest and beauty, all that had preceded. He does not mean to pledge himself to the perfect correctness of this view; but, with regard to the psalm which is now the object of consideration, he may venture to say, that if others equal to it may be selected, none certainly can be found superior in the lucid simplicity and native grandeur of its diction, or in the affecting and engaging sentiments which it discloses. It places before us the omnipotence of the Deity, combined with such express assertions of his essential rectitude and goodness as we cannot contemplate without perceiving that, glorious as are his works, he himself is surpassing in glory and beauty; and that no object on which our thoughts can be fixed bears any comparison with him. There are, in the bosoms of all people, who are in some reacquainted with themselves, so many memorials of weakness and of guilt that the almightiness of God, when viewed apart from the unchangeable rectitude and benignity of his character, is far more likely to produce emotions of dread and horror than any sentiments of confidence and delight. But when we behold omnipotence united with infinite love, and with wisdom and rectitude so absolutely perfect that it is the most impossible of things for him to do wrong, then, if we desire his favor and friendship to forgive and sustain us, hope extends its consoling energies to our hearts, and we learn to rejoice in knowing that He in whose hands ourselves and all creatures are and must ever be, is invested with power to effect all the purposes of his beneficent will, and to feel that we are safer in his keeping than in our own, and that though we are frail, feeble, and unworthy, he is pledged by the necessary excellence of his nature to educe good from evil, and so to direct all events, temporal and eternal, as shall demonstrate him to be the only wise and good, and to be worthy of all glory and honor from the whole intelligent universe. — Walford.

This psalm is without a title, and it is impossible to ascertain by whom, or on what occasion, it was composed. In the Septuagint and the Latin Vulgate, the title is, “Hallelujah. Of Haggai and Zechariah.” But this is without authority, and it is not known how it came to be prefixed. The same title occurs in the Arabic Version. The Syriac Version has the title still more in full: “Spoken by Haggai and Zechariah the prophets, who ascended from the captivity at Babylon, concerning the morning ministrations of the priests;” that is, to be used in their morning services. The tradition, therefore, would seem to be that this is a composition of those prophets. That it may have belonged to the times of Haggai and Zechariah is certainly possible, nor is there anything in the psalm inconsistent with that supposition, though there is no positive evidence that it is so. In this portion of the Psalms (Psalm 146—150) all begin and end in the same manner, with a Hallelujah; they all belong to one group, and seem to pertain to the same occasion; and it is not improbable that they constitute a series of psalms intended to commemorate the completion of the walls of Jerusalem, and the finishing of the temple. They would be eminently appropriate to such an event.

This psalm is a general psalm of praise which might be used at any time, containing thoughts such as are appropriately suggested by a contemplation of the character of God, and his dealings with people. The idea is that of the blessedness of trusting in God; the security of those who do it; the superiority of this confidence and peace over any which is reposed in princes; and the evidence that it will be safe to trust in him, furnished by his merciful interpositions in behalf of the oppressed, the hungry, the prisoner, the blind, the bowed down, the righteous, the stranger, the fatherless, and the widow. The psalm, then, has these parts:

I. An expression of a purpose to praise God; or, God as an object of praise, ~~HEB~~ Psalm 146:1,2.

II. Reliance is not to be put in man, even in princes, since all are mortal, ~~HEB~~ Psalm 146:3,4.

III. God is the only Being on whom we can rely, ~~HEB~~ Psalm 146:5-9.

(1) The happiness of that reliance, <sup><HEB></sup>Psalm 146:5.

(2) Reasons for such reliance, <sup><HEB></sup>Psalm 146:6-9. He is the Creator of all things; he keeps truth; he executes judgment for the oppressed; he shows his kindness toward the hungry, the prisoner, the blind, the bowed down, the righteous, the stranger, the fatherless, and the widow.

IV. God will reign for ever, and he is the God of Zion. His people, therefore, should praise him, <sup><HEB></sup>Psalm 146:10.

Praise the LORD, O my soul See the notes at <sup><HAB></sup>Psalm 103:1; 104:1.

<sup><HEB></sup>Psalm 146:2. While I live will I praise the LORD ... See the notes at <sup><HAB></sup>Psalm 104:33, where the same language occurs substantially as in this verse: “I will sing unto the Lord as long as I live; I will sing praise to my God while I have my being.” The idea is, not merely that he would praise him during this life — short and fleeting as it is — but that as long as he had an existence — in the future world — forever he would praise him.

Thy goodness I'll pursue;
And after death, in distant worlds,
The glorious theme renew.*

*Through all eternity to Thee
A joyful song I'll raise;
But, oh! eternity's too short
To utter all thy praise.” — Addison*

<sup><HEB></sup>Psalm 146:3. Put not your trust in princes Rely on God rather than on man, however exalted he may be. There is a work of protection and salvation which no man, however exalted he may be, can perform for you; a work which God alone, who is the Maker of all things, and who never dies, can accomplish. See the notes at <sup><HEB></sup>Psalm 118:8,9. Compare also the notes at <sup><YD></sup>Isaiah 2:22: “Cease ye from man, whose breath is in his nostrils, for wherein is he to be accounted of?”

Nor in the son of man Any son of man; any human being, no matter what his rank or power. The phrase is often used to denote man. See the notes at <sup><HEB></sup>Psalm 8:4. The appellation “Son of man” was often applied by the Saviour to himself to express emphatically the idea that he was a man — that he had a human nature; that he was identified with the race; that he was a brother, a fellow-sufferer, a friend of man: that he was not a cold and abstract being so exalted that he could not feel or weep over the sins and woes of a fallen and suffering world. The language here, however, it is scarcely necessary to say, does not refer to him. It is right to put our trust in him; we have no other trust.

In whom there is no help Margin, salvation. So the Hebrew. The idea is, that man cannot save us. He cannot save himself; he cannot save others.

Psalm 146:4. His breath goeth forth He dies like other people, no matter how exalted he is. See the notes at <sup><2372></sup>Isaiah 2:22.

He returneth to his earth See the notes at <sup><491B></sup>Psalm 90:3. The earth — the dust — is “his” —

(a) It is his, as that from which he was made: he turns back to what he was. <sup><106B></sup>Genesis 3:19: “Dust thou art, and unto dust shalt thou return.”

(b) The earth — the dust — the grave is his, as it is his home — the place where he will abide.

(c) It is his, as it is the only property which he has in reversion. All that a man — a prince, a nobleman, a monarch, a millionaire — will soon have will be his grave — his few feet of earth. That will be his by right of possession; by the fact that, for the time being, he will occupy it, and not another man. But that, too, may soon become another man’s grave, so that even there he is a tenant only for a time; he has no permanent possession even of a grave. How poor is the richest man!

In that very day The very day — the moment — that he dies.

His thoughts perish His purposes; his schemes; his plans; his purposes of conquest and ambition; his schemes for becoming rich or great; his plans of building a house, and laying out his grounds, and enjoying life; his design of making a book, or taking a journey, or giving himself to ease and pleasure. <sup><1219></sup>Luke 12:19,20:

“And I will say to my soul, Soul, thou hast much goods laid up for many years; take thine ease, eat, drink, and be merry; but God said unto him, Thou fool! this night thy soul shall be required of time.”

Such are all the purposes of men!

<HR15> Psalm 146:5. Happy is he that hath the God of Jacob for his help Who may rely for protection on the God who defended Jacob in his travels and dangers. Or, perhaps the word Jacob is used here collectively to denote Israel — the Jewish people: the God whom they adore and worship, rather than the gods of the pagan. Compare the notes at <HR15> Psalm 144:15; 54:4.

Whose hope is in the LORD his God In Yahweh, worshipped as his God. That is, who truly worships Yahweh, or makes Yahweh his God.

<HR16> Psalm 146:6. Which made heaven and earth ... Who is the true God, the Creator of all things. Happy is he who can address the God who called all this wondrous universe into being, and who sustains all by his power, as his God.

Which keepeth truth for ever Who is always true to his promises. In this verse there are two reasons given why the lot of the people of God would be a happy one:

- (1) That Yahweh is the true God, the Creator of all things, and, therefore, able to protect and provide for them.
- (2) That he is faithful, and may always be relied on.

Idol-gods have no power, and every reliance placed on them is a vain reliance; people are often false and cannot be trusted, but Yahweh has infinite power, and every promise that he makes will be fulfilled; all that he says is eternally and unchangeably true. The reasons for trusting in him, or the reasons why they who trust in him are “happy,” are further stated in the following verses.

<HR17> Psalm 146:7. Which executeth judgment for the oppressed This is the third reason why the lot of those is a happy one who trust in God. It is because he has power to pronounce and execute a right judgment or sentence in regard to the oppressed and the wronged, and because it is characteristic of his nature that he does thus execute judgment. See the notes at <HR16> Psalm 103:6: “The Lord executeth right. eousness and judgment for all that are oppressed.”

Which giveth food to the hungry See the notes at <sup><1970></sup>Psalm 107:9: “For he satisfieth the longing soul, and filleth the hungry soul with goodness.” This is the fourth reason why they who confide in God are happy. Compare <sup><1015></sup>Luke 1:53: “He hath filled the hungry with good things.”

The LORD looseth the prisoners This is the fifth reason why they who trust in the Lord are “happy.” Compare the notes at <sup><19816></sup>Psalm 68:6: “He bringeth out those which are bound with chains.” See also the notes at <sup><19710></sup>Psalm 107:10: “Being bound in affliction and iron.” Compare <sup><1818></sup>Job 36:8,9.

<sup><1918></sup>Psalm 146:8. The LORD openeth the eyes of the blind This is the sixth reason for what is stated as to the blessedness of those who put their trust in the Lord. The language here would be applicable to bodily or to mental blindness. Compare the notes at <sup><19318></sup>Psalm 119:18: “Open thou mine eyes, that I may behold wondrous things out of thy law.” See also the notes at <sup><2815></sup>Isaiah 35:5: “Then the eyes of the blind shall be opened.”

The LORD raiseth them that are bowed down This is the seventh reason why they are happy who trust in the Lord. It is that those who are crushed and bowed down under the weight of care, trouble, and calamity, are raised up by him, or are sustained and comforted. See the notes at <sup><19514></sup>Psalm 145:14: “The Lord upholdeth all that fall, and raiseth up all those that be bowed down.”

The LORD loveth the righteous This is the eighth reason why those who trust in the Lord are happy. It is a characteristic of God, and a foundation for praise, that he loves those who obey law; who do that which is right.

<sup><1931></sup>Psalm 146:9. The LORD preserveth the strangers He regards them with interest; he defends and guides them. This is the ninth reason why those who trust in the Lord are happy. The stranger — away from home and friends; with no one to feel an interest in him or sympathy for him; with the feeling that he is forsaken; with no one on whom he can call for sympathy in distress — may find in God one who will regard his condition; who will sympathize with him; who is able to protect and befriend him. Compare <sup><12134></sup>Exodus 12:49; 22:21; 23:9; <sup><19633></sup>Leviticus 19:33; <sup><19116></sup>Deuteronomy 1:16; 10:18,19; <sup><2818></sup>Isaiah 56:3,6.

He relieveth the fatherless and widow He is their friend. This is the tenth reason why those who put their trust in the Lord are happy. It is that God is the Friend of those who have no earthly protector. See the notes at <sup><9875></sup>Psalm 68:5: “A father of the fatherless, and a judge of the widows, is God in his holy habitation.”

But the way of the wicked he turneth upside down He overturns their plans; defeats their schemes; makes their purposes accomplish what they did not intend they should accomplish. The Hebrew word here means to bend, to curve, to make crooked, to distort; then, to overturn, to turn upside down. The same word is applied to the conduct of the wicked, in <sup><9378></sup>Psalm 119:78: “They dealt perversely with me.” The idea here is, that their path is not a straight path; that God makes it a crooked way; that they are diverted from their design; that through them he accomplishes purposes which they did not intend; that he prevents their accomplishing their own designs; and that he will make their plans subservient to a higher and better purpose than their own. This is the eleventh reason why those who put their trust in God are happy. It is that God is worthy of confidence and love, because he has all the plans of wicked men entirely under his control.

Even thy God, O Zion, unto all generations As long as the world shall endure. There shall be no change of dynasty as there is in human governments; but the same King shall reign from age to age.

Praise ye the LORD Hallelu-jah. The psalm closes as it commences. It is a call on all persons to unite in the praise of Yahweh.

General Notes on Psalm 146 to Psalm 150

These are the Hallelujah psalms, so called because they begin and end with “Hallelujah.” They form a fitting close to the Book of Psalms. We subjoin the eloquent words of Mr. Gilfillan:

“Perhaps finer than all are those little bursts of irrepressible praise which we find at the close. During the course of the book you had been conducted along very diversified scenes; now beside green pastures, now through dark glens, now by still waters, now by floods, and now by dismal swamps, now through the silent wilderness, where the sun himself was sleeping on his watch-tower — in sympathy with the sterile idleness below; and now through the bustle and blood of battlefields, where the elements seemed to become parties in the all-absorbing fury of the fray; but, at last, you stand beside the psalmists, upon a clear, commanding eminence, whence, looking back on the way they had been led, forward to the future, and up to their God, now no longer hiding himself from his anointed ones, they break into pecans of praise; and, not satisfied with their own orisons, call on all objects, above, around, and below, to join the hymn, become, and are worthy of becoming, the organs of a universal devotion. The last six or seven psalms are the Beulah of the book; there the sun shineth night and day, and the voice of the turtle is heard in the land. From a reflection of their fire have sprung the hymn which Milton ascribes to our first parents, the hymn which closes the 'Seasons,' and the great psalm which swelled from the harp of Coleridge, as he struck it to the music of the Arveiron, and in the light of the morning-star. And surely those bright gushes of song occurring at the close, unconsciously typify the time when man, saved from all his wanderings, strengthened by all his wrestlings, anti recovered from his falls, shall, clothed in white robes, and standing in a regenerated earth, as in a temple, pour out floods of praise harmonizing with the old songs of heaven — when the nations, as with one voice, shall sing:

*“Praise ye the Lord, God’s praise within His sanctuary raise;
And to him in the firmament
Of his power give ye praise.*

*Because of all his mighty acts,
With praise him magnify:
O praise him, as he doth excel
In glorious majesty.*

*“Praise him with trumpet’s sound; his praise
With psaltery advance:
With timbrel, harp, string’d instruments,
And organs, in the dance.*

*Praise him on cymbals loud: him praise
On cymbals sounding high,
Let each thing breathing praise the Lord,
Praise to the Lord give ye.” — Bards of the Bible*

APPENDIX NOTES ON PSALM 146

This psalm may be divided into two equal parts, the first of which describes the happiness of those who trust in God and not in man, <sup><HR1></sup>Psalm 146:1-5; while the second gives the reason, drawn from the divine perfections, <sup><HR6></sup>Psalm 146:6-10. The psalm is distinguished from the Davidic series which precedes it (Psalm 138—145) by its whole internal character. At the same time, its coincidences of expression with the one immediately before it, show that it was meant to be used in connection with it, and may therefore be regarded as the closing psalm of the whole series, beginning with Psalm 135, and belonging to the time of Haggai and Zechariah, to which the psalm before us is expressly referred in the Septuagint version. — Alexander.

NOTES ON PSALM 147

The author of this psalm is unknown; nor can the occasion on which it was composed be ascertained with any degree of certainty. In the Septuagint, the Arabic, and the Syriac versions, it is ascribed, like the previous psalm, to the prophets Haggai and Zechariah. The Syriac has this title: “A Psalm of Haggai and Zechariah, when they urged the completion of the temple of Jerusalem.” It is quite manifest, from <sup><HEB></sup>Psalm 147:2,13,14, that the psalm was written after the return from the Babylonian captivity, and that probably on the completion of the temple after that return, with a view to be employed at its dedication. See Introduction to Psalm 146.

This psalm comprises two themes: praise to God for his goodness to his creatures generally; and special praise for his goodness to his people. These topics are intermingled in the psalm, but the former is more prominent in the first part of the psalm; the latter in the close. Both were proper themes at the rebuilding of the temple and the walls of the city, after the return from the exile. Both are proper now, and will be so always.

For it is pleasant See the notes at <sup><HEB></sup>Psalm 135:3: “Sing praises unto his name, for it is pleasant.” The Hebrew word is the same.

And praise is comely Becoming; proper. See the notes at <sup><HEB></sup>Psalm 33:1: “praise is comely for the upright.” The Hebrew word is the same. If these psalms were composed for the rededication of the temple, it would not be unnatural that much of the language employed should be borrowed from earlier psalms with which the people were familiar.

<sup><HEB></sup>Psalm 147:2. The LORD doth build up Jerusalem He builds up the walls; he restores the city; he has caused the temple to be reconstructed. This language would be applicable to a return from the captivity. There may be an allusion here to the language in <sup><9A26></sup>Psalm 102:16: “When the Lord shall build up Zion, he shall appear in his glory.” See the notes at that passage. What is there spoken of as what would be in the future is here spoken of as accomplished, and as a ground of praise.

He gathereth together the outcasts of Israel Those who have been exiled from their native land, and who have been scattered as outcasts in a foreign country. This is appropriate language to use on the supposition that the psalm was composed after the return from the exile, for it is in such language that that return was predicted by the prophets. <sup><29112></sup>Isaiah 11:12:

“The Lord God which gathereth the outcasts of Israel,” etc.

<sup><4970></sup>Psalm 147:3. He healeth the broken in heart Referring primarily to the fact that he had healed those who were crushed and broken in their long captivity, and that he had given them comfort by returning them to their native land. At the same time, however, the language is made general, as describing a characteristic of God that he does this; that it is his character to do this. See the notes at <sup><49418></sup>Psalm 34:18. See also <sup><45617></sup>Psalm 51:17. Compare <sup><23608></sup>Isaiah 61:1; <sup><40418></sup>Luke 4:18.

And bindeth up their wounds See the notes at <sup><29006></sup>Isaiah 1:6. Margin, griefs. The word refers to those who are afflicted with griefs and troubles. The reference is to mental sorrows; to a troubled spirit; to a heart made sad in any way. God has provided healing for such; on such he bestows peace.

<sup><4970></sup>Psalm 147:4. He telleth the number of the stars He counts them all. God only can do this. The stars are so numerous that no astronomer can count them; they lie so far in the depths of space, and are so remote from each other, that no man can be so presumptuous as to suppose that he has even seen any considerable part of them, even by the aid of the most powerful telescopes.

He calleth them all by their names As if each one had a name, and God could call them forth one by one by their names, like the muster-roll of an army. This language seems to be taken from <sup><29416></sup>Isaiah 40:26: “Lift up your eyes on high, and behold who hath created these things, that bringeth out their host by numbers; he calleth them all by names, by the greatness of his might, for that he is strong in power; not one faileth.” See the notes at that passage.

And of great power This seems to be added, as in <sup><2418></sup>Isaiah 40:28, in view of the power required in making the heavens, and in guiding and numbering the stars: “Hast thou not known? Hast thou not heard, that the everlasting God, the Lord, the Creator of the ends of the earth, fainteth not, neither is weary?”

His understanding is infinite Margin, Of his understanding there is no number. That is, This corresponds with his power to number the stars. There is no limit to it. It is not bounded; there is no point reached where it can be said that there is no more; that it is exhausted. See the notes at <sup><2418></sup>Isaiah 40:28: “There is no searching of his understanding.”

He casteth the wicked down to the ground See the notes at <sup><4179></sup>Psalm 146:9: “The way of the wicked he turneth upside down.”

<sup><4177></sup>Psalm 147:7. Sing unto the LORD with thanksgiving Accompany the praise of God — the expression of worship — with a grateful remembrance of the past. The one will aid the other, and the two will constitute acceptable and proper worship. The first word here means properly to answer, or respond; and the idea would seem to be, that we are to make a suitable response or answer to the manifold layouts which we have received at the hand of God.

Sing praise upon the harp unto our God On the word harp, see the notes at <sup><2352></sup>Isaiah 5:12. The harp was an instrument commonly employed in divine worship. See the notes at <sup><4179></sup>Psalm 33:2: “Praise the Lord with harp.” Compare <sup><4174></sup>Psalm 43:4; 49:4; 57:8; 71:22.

<sup><4178></sup>Psalm 147:8. Who covereth the heaven with clouds Clouds that are designed to convey refreshing rain to the earth. The reasons for praise here stated (<sup><4178></sup>Psalm 147:8,9) are derived from the goodness of God as exhibited in his providential arrangements for the good of man.

Who prepareth rain for the earth By causing it to be taken from the sea, carried by the clouds, and conveyed through the air to the places where it is needed, and then gently sprinkled on the earth. Compare the notes at <sup><4173></sup>Psalm 104:13: “He watereth the hills from his chambers.” See also the notes at <sup><4150></sup>Job 5:10; 28:26; 36:27,28; 38:28,37.

Who maketh grass to grow upon the mountains Which would be barren but for the rain. Who conveys the water thus to the very tops of the mountains, and causes it to descend on their sides, so that even the mountains are clothed with verdure and beauty. Compare the notes at <sup><19414></sup>Psalm 104:14: “He causeth the grass to grow for the cattle.”

<sup><19710></sup>Psalm 147:10. He delighteth not in the strength of the horse The horse is among the noblest works of God — perhaps the noblest of all the animals that he has made. See the notes at <sup><18399></sup>Job 39:19-25. Yet God regards with more interest and pleasure humble piety than he does any mere power, however great and wonderful it may be.

He taketh not pleasure in the legs of a man Not the same pleasure as in piety; he prefers the humble heart to this. The reference is to man as capable of rapid marches, of quick movements in assaulting an enemy; the allusion being, perhaps, to an army prepared for war — cavalry and infantry — the horse moving on with resistless force — the foot-soldiers with rapid motion.

<sup><19711></sup>Psalm 147:11. The LORD taketh pleasure in them that fear him In those who truly worship him, however humble, poor, and unknown to people they may be; however unostentatious, retired, unnoticed may be their worship. Not in the “pride, pomp, and circumstance of war” is his pleasure; not in the march of armies; not in the valor of the battlefield; not in scenes where “the garments of the warrior are rolled in blood,” but in the closet, when the devout child of God prays; in the family, when the group bend before Him in solemn devotion; in the assembly — quiet, serious, calm — when his friends are gathered together for prayer and praise; in the heart that truly loves, reverences, adores Him.

In those that hope in his mercy It is a pleasure to him to have the guilty, the feeble, the undeserving hope in Him — trust in Him — seek Him.

Psalm 147:12. Praise the LORD, O Jerusalem ... In addition to this general praise in which all may unite, there are special reasons why Jerusalem and its inhabitants should praise God: just as now, in addition to the general reasons pertaining to all people why they should praise God, there are special reasons why Christians — why his redeemed people — should do it. What those reasons, as pertaining to the inhabitants of Jerusalem, were, is specified in the following verses.

Psalm 147:13. For he hath strengthened the bars of thy gates He has made thee safe and secure — as if he had given additional strength to the fastenings of the gates of the city. Cities were surrounded by walls. They were entered through gates. Those gates were fastened by bars passed across them, to which the gates were secured. The language here might be applicable to any period, but it is probable that there is particular reference to Jerusalem as made strong in rebuilding it after the return from Babylon.

He hath blessed thy children within thee The inhabitants, by giving them safety and peace.

Psalm 147:14. He maketh peace in thy borders Margin, he maketh thy border peace. The word border here refers to a boundary, and stands for all the domain or territory included within the boundaries of a country. The idea is that peace prevailed throughout the land.

And filleth thee with the finest of the wheat Margin, as in Hebrew, fat of wheat. Literally, “He satisfies thee with the fat of wheat.” There is no want of wheat, and that of the best kind. Compare the notes at Psalm 132:15: “I will satisfy her poor with bread.”

Psalm 147:15. He sendeth forth his commandment upon earth That is, with reference to the productions of the earth; to the changes which occur; to the seasons; to snow, frost, ice, cold, heat, wind; and he is universally and immediately obeyed. Nature everywhere yields a ready acquiescence to his will.

His word runneth very swiftly As if it hastened to obey him. There is no delay. Compare the notes at Psalm 33:9: “He spake, and it was done; he commanded, and it stood fast.” Snow, and frost, and ice, and cold, and heat, and wind, are entirely obedient to him. There is no reluctance in obeying him; there is no delay.

<4E76>Psalm 147:16. He giveth snow like wool He covers the earth with snow, so that it seems to have a clothing of wool. Compare the notes at <4S76>Job 37:6: “For he saith to the snow, Be thou on the earth.”

He scattereth the hoarfrost like ashes As if ashes were strewed over the earth; or, as easily as one strews ashes.

<4E77>Psalm 147:17. He casteth forth his ice like morsels The word rendered morsels means properly a bit, a crumb, as of bread, <41R6>Genesis 18:5; <4795>Judges 19:5. The allusion here would seem to be to hail, which God sends upon the earth as easily as one scatters crumbs of bread from the hand.

Who can stand before his cold? Or, hail. The word is the same, except in pointing, as the preceding word rendered ice. The idea is that no one can stand before the peltings of the hail, when God sends it forth, or scatters it upon the earth.

And melteth them Melts the snow and the ice. Compare the notes at <4S70>Job 37:10-12: “By the breath of God frost is given,” etc. The idea is, that they are entirely under his control. They obey him when he speaks.

He causeth his wind to blow The warm south wind: “his” wind, because he directs it, and causes it to perform his will.

And the waters flow The snow and the ice melt.

<4E79>Psalm 147:19. He showeth his word unto Jacob Margin, words. His commands; his promises; his laws. The things which were before adverted to, pertain to the world in general. All people see his works; all enjoy the benefits of his arrangements in the seasons — in the changes which occur upon the earth; but he has especially favored his own people by giving them his laws — his revealed will. This distinguishes them above all other nations of the earth, and gives them special occasion for gratitude.

His statutes and his judgments unto Israel His laws; his written word. The word judgments here refers to the law of God as being that which he judges or determines to be right.

<HE7D>Psalm 147:20. He hath not dealt so with any nation He has favored Israel more than any other people by giving them his revealed truth. This was so. There was no nation in the ancient world so favored as the Hebrew people in this respect. There is no nation now so favored as the nation that has the revealed will of God — the Bible. The possession of that book gives a nation a vast superiority in all respects over all others. In laws, customs, morals, intelligence, social life, purity, charity, prosperity, that book elevates a nation at once, and scatters blessings which can be derived from nothing else. The highest benevolence that could be shown to any nation would be to put it in possession of the word of God in the language of the people.

And as for his judgments, they have not known them Other nations are ignorant of his laws, his statutes, his revealed will. They are consequently subjected to all the evils which arise from ignorance of those laws. The fact that the ancient people of God possessed them was a sufficient reason for the Hallelujah with which the psalm closes. The fact that we possess them is a sufficient reason why we should re-echo the shout of praise, and cry HALLELUJAH.

APPENDIX NOTES ON PSALM 147

Like the last psalm and those which follow it, this is evidently an anthem intended for the service of the second temple. It celebrates God's almighty and gracious rule over his people and over the world of nature, but mingles with this a special commemoration of his goodness in bringing back his people from their captivity and rebuilding the walls of Jerusalem. In the allusions to these events in <HE7D>Psalm 147:2,3, and <HE7B>Psalm 147:13,14, we shall probably be justified in seeing the occasion of the psalm. It may have been written for the dedication of the wall of Jerusalem, which, as we learn from <HE7D>Nehemiah 12:27, was kept "with gladness, both with thanksgivings and with singing, with cymbals, psalteries, and with harps." It is indeed not improbable, as Hengstenberg suggests, that not this psalm only, but the rest of the psalms to the end of the book, are all anthems, originally composed for the same occasion. The wall had been built under circumstances of no ordinary difficulty and discouragement (<HE7D>Nehemiah 2:17; 4:23); its completion was celebrated with no common joy and thankfulness; "for God had made them rejoice with great joy; the wives also and the children rejoiced: so that the joy of Jerusalem was heard even afar off." — Perowne.

The Old Testament history closes, in point of time, with the administration of Nehemiah. The great work accomplished by Nehemiah was the restoration of the walls of Jerusalem. It was by this that he was afterward remembered: “among the elect,” says the son of Sirach, “was Neemias, whose renown is great, who raised up for us the walls that were fallen, and set up the gates and the bars, and raised up our ruins again.” That a memorial of that work would be preserved in the closing strains of the Psalter is no more than we might expect to find; and we may reasonably conclude both from their language and place that it was for the occasion of the thanksgiving procession after the completion of the walls that Psalm 148—150 were written. It was evidently no ordinary assemblage. “At the dedication of the wall of Jerusalem,” we read, “they sought the Levites out of all their places to bring them to Jerusalem, to keep the dedication with gladness, both with thanksgivings and with singing, with cymbals, psalteries, and with harps. And the sons of the singers gathered themselves together, both out of the plain country round about Jerusalem, and from the villages ... for the singers had builded them villages round about Jerusalem.” The names of the priests’ sons who blew the trumpets are carefully recorded, as also those of the other Levite musicians who marched “with the musical instruments of David the man of God, and Ezra the scribe before them;” while, lastly, a sort of epilogue at the end of the chapter in which this account is contained seems to imply that every effort was on this occasion made to re-establish the sacred musical service on the basis of the rules of the original foundation of David as nearly as the circumstances of the time would permit. And in this there was an obvious fitness. The rebuilding of the walls of Jerusalem was looked upon as the return to the days of David, by whom that city had been first erected into the Israelite capital. The trials and humiliations of the captivity seemed at length to have passed away. All was once more new; and the Israel of the restored Jerusalem was the type of the church triumphant of the last days, the glorious company of victorious saints, ransomed from the captivity of an imperious world, into whose lips this very psalm is virtually put, and whose praises a yet struggling Christendom anticipates, looking forward with the certainty of divine assurance to the season of the final exaltation of the meek, and of the final casting of the wicked down to the ground.

The psalm has its points of resemblance to Psalm 33; 104; but almost every verse in it is marked by the restoration-character which belongs to the whole. Jerusalem built up after her desolation, the bars of her gates made fast; the children of God that were scattered abroad gathered together in one, and the denizens of Zion filled with the richest of blessings within her; the wounded bound up, the heart-broken healed; these are all images, the relation of which to the general theme of the psalm can hardly be mistaken. — Thrupp.

~~HEB~~ Psalm 147:4. He telleth the number of the stars ... The late celebrated astronomer, Dr. Herschel, has informed us that in the most crowded parts of the Milky Way, when exploring that region with his best glasses, he has had fields of view which contained no less than 588 stars, and these were continued for many minutes; so that “in one quarter of an hour’s time there passed no less than 116,000 stars through the field of view of his telescope.” It has been computed that nearly one hundred million of stars might be perceived by the most perfect instruments, were all the regions of the sky thoroughly explored. And yet, all this vast assemblage of suns and worlds, when compared with what lies beyond the utmost boundaries of human vision, in the immeasurable spaces of creation, may be no more than as the smallest particle of vapor to the immense ocean. Immeasurable regions of space lie beyond the utmost limits of mortal view, into which even imagination itself can scarcely penetrate, and which are, doubtless, replenished with the operations of divine wisdom and omnipotence ...

In consequence of recent discoveries, we have now the strongest reason to believe, that all the stars in the universe are arranged into clusters, or groups, which astronomers distinguish by the name of Nebulæ or Starry Systems, each nebula consisting of many thousands of stars. The nearest nebula is that whitish space or zone which is known by the name of the Milky Way, to which our sun is supposed to belong. It consists of many hundreds of thousands of stars. When Dr. Herschel examined this region with his powerful telescopes, he found a portion of it, only fifteen degrees long and two broad, which contained 50,000 stars, large enough to be distinctly counted: and he suspected twice as many more which, for want of sufficient light in his telescope, he saw only now and then. More than 2500 nebulae have already been observed; and if each of them contain as many stars as the Milky Way, several hundreds of million of stars must exist, even within that portion of the heavens which lies open to our observation. — Dick.

~~<BET>~~ Psalm 147:17. Who can stand before his cold? ... At particular times the cold in the East is so very intense as to kill man and beast. Jacobus de Vitriaco, one of the writers in the Gesta Dei per Francos, says, that in an expedition in which he was engaged against Mount Tabor, on the 24th of December, the cold was so intense that many of the poor people, and the beasts of burden, died by it. And Albertus Aquensis, another of these writers, speaking of the cold in Judea, says, that thirty of the people who attended Baldwin I in the mountainous districts near the Dead Sea, were killed by it; and that in that expedition they had to contend with horrible hail and ice, with unheard of snow and rain. From this we find that the winters are often very severe in Judea; and in such cases as the above, we may well call out, “Who can stand against his cold?” — Adam Clarke.

NOTES ON PSALM 148

The author of this psalm is unknown. The occasion on which it was composed was probably the same as that on which the two previous psalms and the two following were written — each commencing and closing with a Hallelujah. That occasion was, most probably, as before remarked, the rebuilding of Jerusalem after the captivity, and the dedication of the temple.

The psalm is, in general, a call on all parts of the universe to praise the Lord. It is properly divided into two portions. In the first (<sup><HERD></sup>Psalm 148:1-6), the call is addressed to the heavens — to all that is above the earth — to praise Yahweh; in the second (<sup><HERD></sup>Psalm 148:7-14), the call is addressed to all the dwellers on the earth to unite in that praise. The psalm is most animated and triumphant. The language accords with the sentiment. It is adapted to the most animating and spirit-stirring music; and these psalms — this and the two preceding and the two following — in style, in sentiment, in poetic beauty, in sublimity, in their adaptedness to fill the soul with lofty emotions — are eminently suited to close the whole collection — the entire Book of Psalms. Little can be needed, or can be added, in illustration of the sentiments of the psalm.

Praise ye the LORD from the heavens On the part of the heavens. Let those who dwell in heaven begin the song.

Praise ye him, all his hosts See the notes at <sup><HAKD></sup>Psalm 103:21 and at <sup><HERD></sup>Isaiah 1:9. All his armies — referring to the angels considered as marshalled into hosts, of which God is the Head and Leader.

<sup><HERD></sup>Psalm 148:3. Praise ye him, sun and moon The most conspicuous and glorious objects in the heavens, as apparent to the eyes of people.

Praise him, all ye stars of light A poetical expression to denote bright or shining stars. The phrase embraces all the stars as they strike the eyes of people. Each one has something special to it for which to praise God: and the entire groups — the immense multitudes, as such — should join in one chorus of praise.

Psalm 148:4. Praise him, ye heavens of heavens Referring to the idea that there is one heaven rising above another. See the notes at Psalm 68:33. See 1 Kings 8:27: “Behold, the heaven and heaven of heavens cannot contain thee.” Compare 2 Chronicles 2:6.

And ye waters that be above the heavens Genesis 1:7:

“And God made the firmament, and divided the waters which were under the firmament from the waters which were above the firmament.”

The allusion here is to the waters which seem to be above the lower heaven, that is, the air, and which seem to come from some higher region — some higher heaven. See the notes at Psalm 104:3: “Who layeth the beams of his chambers in the waters.”

Psalm 148:5. Let them praise the name of the LORD That is, Let them praise Yahweh himself — the name being often put for the person or thing referred to.

For he commanded, and they were created He showed his great power by merely speaking, and they came at once into being. Compare the notes at Psalm 33:6,9.

Psalm 148:6. He hath also stablished them forever and ever He has made them firm, stable, enduring. That they may be eternal is possible; that they will not be, no one can prove. Matter, when created, has no necessary tendency to decay or annihilation; and the universe — the stars, and suns, and systems — which have endured so many million of ages may continue to exist any number of million of ages to come. Of course, however, all this is dependent on the will of God. On the meaning of this passage, compare the notes at Psalm 119:90; 72:5; 89:2,36,37. See also the notes at 2 Peter 3:7,10,13.

He hath made a decree which shall not pass He has given a law or statute which they cannot pass. The word rendered decree here seems to be used in the sense of limit or bound; and the idea is, that he has bound them by a fixed law; he has established laws which they are compelled to observe. The fact is, in regard to them, that he has established great laws — as the law of gravitation — by which they are held from flying off; he has marked out orbits in which they move; he has so bound them that they perform their revolutions with unerring accuracy in the very path which he has prescribed. So accurate are their movements that they can be predicted with exact precision; and so uniform, that any succession of ages does not vary or affect them.

Psalm 148:7. Praise the LORD from the earth From among those who dwell on the earth. In respect to terrestrial objects, let these also unite in the praise of God.

Ye dragons On the meaning of this word, see the notes at <sup><1913></sup>Psalm 91:13; <sup><2322></sup>Isaiah 13:22. The word may mean a great fish, a whale, a sea monster, or a serpent. It would seem to refer here to whales and sea monsters. See the notes at <sup><6123></sup>Revelation 12:3.

And all deeps All that are in the depths of the sea. Not merely the “dragons” or sea monsters, but all that inhabit the oceans.

Psalm 148:8. Fire, and hail Fire, when accompanied by hail; that is, the lightning. See <sup><1912></sup>Psalm 18:12.

Snow, and vapors Snow and clouds. It was not unnatural that these should be combined, or suggested together to the mind.

Stormy wind The storm; the tempest.

Fulfilling his word Obeying his command; accomplishing his purpose. Let the storm-wind, which seems to be so little under any control, speak his praise by showing how obedient it is to his will, and how exactly it carries out his designs. Its perfect submission to his laws — the exactness with which, though apparently so fierce, raging, and lawless, it carries out his plans, and pauses when he commands it — is in fact an act of praise or homage, as it proclaims his majesty, his supremacy, and his power. On the sentiment here expressed, compare the notes at <sup><1972></sup>Psalm 107:29; <sup><1913></sup>Psalm 89:9.

Psalm 148:9. Mountains, and all hills As being among the loftiest objects of earth, raising their heads highest toward the heavens.

Fruitful trees, and all cedars Fruitful trees, not as distinguished from those which are barren, but as distinguished from forest-trees, those whose nature is that they do not bear fruit. Of the latter, the cedar was the most prominent, and, therefore, is made the representative of the whole.

Psalm 148:10. Beasts, and all cattle Wild beasts and tame; those which roam the forest, and those which have been domesticated for the service of man. As fruitful trees and cedars might include all the trees, so the “beasts and cattle” here might include the whole of those that were wild and tamed.

Creeping things, and flying fowl Margin, as in Hebrew, Birds of wing. These are grouped together for a reason similar to that for which fruitful trees and cedars, and beasts and cattle, are grouped together, to embrace the whole. The expression embraces the loftiest and lowest; those which ascend farthest above the earth, and those which creep upon its surface. The word rendered creeping things would properly embrace the smaller animals which creep along upon the ground; both those which have four feet or more, as mice, lizards, crabs, etc., and those without feet, which glide or drag themselves upon the ground, as worms and serpents. (Gesenius, Lexicon) These, in their lowly condition, and in their humble way, are called on to unite in the general chorus of praise. Accomplishing the purpose for which they are made, they will, with the most lofty of created beings, contribute to proclaim the wisdom, the power, and the goodness of God.

Psalm 148:11. Kings of the earth, and all people This would embrace all, as all are included in the idea of the rulers and the ruled.

Princes, and all judges of the earth Those of exalted rank; those high in authority. This is proper in itself considered, as they are people like other people; and proper as an example to the rest. None of any rank are exempt from the obligation to praise God; none are cut off from the privilege.

Psalm 148:12. Both young men, and maidens Those in the morning of life, just entering on their career; just forming their character: with ardor, elasticity, cheerfulness, hope; let them consecrate all this to God: let all that there is in the buoyancy of their feelings, in the melody of their voices, in their ardor and vigor, be employed in the praise and the service of God.

Old men, and children Old men, with what remains of life, and children, with all that there is of joyousness — let all unite in praising God. Life, as it closes — life, as it begins — let it all be devoted to God.

Psalm 148:13. Let them praise the name of the LORD Let them praise Yahweh — the name being often put for the person.

For his name alone is excellent Margin, as in Hebrew, exalted. He only is exalted as God. See the notes at Psalm 8:1: “O Lord, our Lord, how excellent is thy name in all the earth!”

His glory is above the earth and heaven Compare the notes at Psalm 113:4: “The Lord is high above all nations, and his glory above the heavens.” See also the notes at Psalm 8:1: “Who hast set thy glory above the heavens.”

Psalm 148:14. He also exalteth the horn of his people He gives them power and prosperity. See the notes at Psalm 89:17: “And in thy favor our horn shall be exalted.” Compare Psalm 92:10; 112:9.

The praise of all his saints That is, “he has raised up praise for all his saints;” or, has given them occasion for praise. He has so blessed them with special mercies as to make praise especially appropriate for them.

Even of the children of Israel, a people near unto him whom he admits to his presence as his friends; whom he regards as his own. See the notes at Ephesians 2:13; compare the notes at Acts 2:39.

Praise ye the LORD Hallelu-jah. Let all unite in his praise.

APPENDIX NOTES ON PSALM 148

It is not unlikely that this hymn of praise was composed for the great solemnity of the dedication of the second temple. It consists altogether of praise, calling upon all nature, heavenly and earthly, rational and irrational, to concur in praising him whose power, wisdom, and providence are displayed in all his works. The exhortation which is addressed to inanimate and irrational beings is the language of poetry, which indulges and delights itself in attributing to every part of nature the sentiments, emotions, and feelings by which it is itself actuated; and in the lively expression of such sentiments we behold the fervent piety of the writer, which, yielding itself up to the delightful musings of impassioned imagination, peoples the universe with intelligent natures only, on which it calls to engage with itself in celebrating the matchless excellence of the Father of all, and in whom all “live, move, and have their being.” — Walford.

Milton’s imitation of this magnificent ode in the morning hymn of Adam in Paradise Lost is well known (v. 153, etc.)

Isaac Taylor says: It is but faintly and afar off that the ancient liturgies (except so far as they merely copied their originals) come up to the majesty and the wide compass of the Hebrew worship, such as it is indicated in Psalm 148. Neither Ambrose, nor Gregory, nor the Greeks have reached or approached this level; and in tempering the boldness of their originals by admixtures of what is more Christian-like and spiritual, the added elements sustain an injury which is not compensated by what they bring forward of a purer or less earthly kind: feeble indeed is the tone of these anthems of the ancient church; sophisticated or artificial in their style. Nor would it be possible — it has never yet seemed so — to christianize the Hebrew anthems, retaining their power, their earth-like richness, and their manifold splendors — which are the very splendors, and the true riches, and the grandeur of God’s world — and withal attempered with expressions that touch to the quick the warmest human sympathies. And as the enhancement of all these, there is the nationality, there is that fire which is sure to kindle fire in true human hearts:

*“He showeth his word unto Jacob,
His statutes and his judgments unto Israel.
He hath not so dealt with any nation;
As for his judgments, they have not known them.”*
— Perowne

O what a hymn of praise is here! It is a universal chorus! All created nature have a share, and all perform their respective parts.

All intelligent beings are especially called to praise him who made them in his love, and sustains them by his beneficence. Man particularly, in all the stages of his being — infancy, youth, manhood, and old age: all human beings have their special interest in the great Father of the spirits of all flesh. He loves man, wheresoever found, of whatsoever color, in whatever circumstances, and in all the stages of his pilgrimage, from his cradle to his grace.

Let the lisp of the infant, the shout of the adult, and the sigh of the aged ascend to the universal parent, as a gratitude offering. He guards those who hang upon the breast; controls and directs the headstrong and giddy, and sustains old age in its infirmities; and sanctifies to it the sufferings that bring on the termination of life.

Reader, this is thy God! How great, how good, how merciful, how compassionate! Breathe thy soul up to him; breathe it into him and let it be preserved in his bosom until mortality be swallowed up of life, and all that is imperfect be done away.

Jesus is thy sacrificial offering; Jesus is thy mediator. He has taken thy humanity, and placed it on the throne! He creates all things new; and faith in his blood will bring thee to his glory! Amen! Hallelujah!

The beautiful morning hymn of Adam and Eve (Paradise Lost, book v. line 153, etc.):

“These are thy glorious works, Parent of good Almighty, thine this universal frame,” etc.,

This hymn has been universally admired. How many have spoken loud in its praises who have never attempted to express their feelings in a stanza of Psalm 148. But to the rapturous adorers of Milton’s poetry what is the song of David, or this grand music of the spheres! Know this, O forgetful man, that Milton’s morning Hymn is a paraphrase of this psalm, and is indebted to it for every excellency it possesses. It is little else than the psalmist speaking in English instead of Hebrew verse. — Adam Clarke.

~~HEB~~ Psalm 148:14. He also exalteth the horn ... a people near unto him

While all the creatures before mentioned have abundant cause to praise God for his infinite perfection and his goodness to themselves, a special obligation is incumbent on his people: first, for his distinguishing favor through all periods of their history; and then, for a special mercy recently experienced, namely, the restoration from captivity, now completed by the renewal of the temple and the reconstruction of the city walls. This restoration is described, by a favorite Davidic figure, as exalting or lifting up the horn of Israel. The previous condition of the chosen people might be well represented by the opposite figure used in ~~JOB~~ Job 16:15. Raised a horn for his people seems to be only another way of saying raised the horn of his people. The first form of expression may have been used here for the purpose of assimilating this clause to the next, where praise is still dependent on the verb at the beginning, and to raise up praise for his people is to give them fresh occasion of still higher praise than they had ever yet been called to utter. The ancient church is here described in a fourfold manner: first, simply as his people: then, as his saints, or gracious ones, the objects of his mercy and the subjects of his grace; then, by their national title, as the sons (or descendants) of Israel; and lastly, as the people near him, that is, nearer to him than all others, sustaining a more intimate relation to him. The same expression which is elsewhere applied to the priests (<sup><B10B></sup>Leviticus 10:3; <sup><B213></sup>Ezekiel 42:13) is here applied to Israel as “a kingdom of priests and a holy nation” (<sup><D916></sup>Exodus 19:6). — Alexander.

NOTES ON PSALM 149

This belongs to the group of psalms already referred to (Psalm 146—150), each beginning and ending with a “Hallelujah,” and probably composed after the return from the captivity, and the rebuilding of the walls of the city and the second temple. This psalm would be eminently appropriate to such an occasion — first, as expressing the joy of the nation; and secondly, as indicative of what the nation was to do in those circumstances in carrying out the purposes of God, and accomplishing his will. The people are considered as restored to their land; as safe, peaceful, happy; their city is securely fortified, and they are armed to defend themselves, and are now in a position to carry their conquests over the pagan and hostile powers around them. The psalm, therefore, consists of two parts:

I. The exhortation to praise, to joy, to rejoicing — as appropriate to their deliverance; to their safe return; to their re-establishment in their own land, <sup><BR></sup>Psalm 149:1-5.

II. The exhortation to carry out the purposes of God in regard to the people who had them, and who wronged were still hostile to them: to inflict on them the punishment which was due to them, and which God designed to bring upon them — regarding themselves as called of God to be his instruments in executing that punishment, in token of the divine displeasure at the conduct of those who had oppressed and wronged them, <sup><BR></sup>Psalm 149:6-9.

Sing unto the LORD a new song As if there was a new and a special occasion for praise. This would be so if the psalm was composed on the return from the exile; on the rebuilding of the city; and on the re-dedication of the temple. On the meaning of the language, see the notes at <sup><BR></sup>Psalm 33:3; <sup><BR></sup>Revelation 5:9; 14:3; see also <sup><BR></sup>Psalm 96:1; <sup><BR></sup>Isaiah 42:10.

And his praise in the congregation of saints In the assembly of the people of God. See the notes at <sup><BR></sup>Psalm 148:14; 111:1.

Psalm 149:2. Let Israel The people of Israel; the Hebrew people; the people of God.

Rejoice in him that made him Him, who has made the people what they are. All that they have and are is to be traced to him, as really as the universe of matter is to be traced to his power. Their condition is not one of development, or one which is the result of their own wisdom, grace, or power. See the notes at Psalm 100:3: “It is he that hath made us, and not we ourselves.” Compare Isaiah 54:5.

Let the children of Zion Those who dwell in Zion or Jerusalem.

Be joyful in their King In God as their king.

- (a) That they have a king, or that there is one to rule over them;
- (b) That they have such a king; one so wise, so powerful, so good;
- (c) That he administers his government with so much efficiency, impartiality, equity, wisdom, goodness. Compare Psalm 100:3-5.

Psalm 149:3. Let them praise his name in the dance Margin, with the pipe. The Hebrew word here — לְרַמְסוּ, <sup>4235</sup> — is rendered dancing in Psalm 30:11; dance, as here, Psalm 150:4 (where also the margin has pipe); Jeremiah 31:13; Lamentations 5:15; dances, Jeremiah 31:4. It does not elsewhere occur. On the verb לְרַמְסוּ, <sup>4234</sup>, see the notes at Psalm 10:5; 51:5. Here it cannot be improper to regard it as referring to that measured tread, or solemn movement which sometimes constituted a part of worship: 2 Samuel 6:14. Such a movement cannot be proved to be wrong in worship; whether it is wise or expedient is a different matter. Customs in worship change as the customs of a people change; and that might be very proper in one stage of society, or in one period of the world, which, though not in itself wrong, might be very inadvisable in another. There was much in the Hebrew mode of worship which cannot be transferred to the forms of Christian worship without an obvious incongruity and disadvantage; and because a thing has been done, and is not in itself wrong, we should not infer that it should always be done, or that it would be always best. If people like the Shakers dance in worship, they have an undoubted right to do so, and it may be the most edifying mode of worship for them with their low notions of religion; let not others ridicule them; nor let others go to see them as they would any other “outr’e” performance from idle curiosity. Such absurdities might soon die away if they were not kept alive by the notice which they attract, and by the foolish curiosity of wiser people. There are some things which are more certain to come to an end by neglect than they could by sober argument; some things which live merely because they are ridiculed, and because they who practice them are exalted into conspicuity by their own folly, and by the idea that they are martyrs.

He will beautify the meek with salvation The word here rendered beautify means to adorn, to honor, as the sanctuary, <sup><2317></sup>Isaiah 60:7 (rendered glorify); and it here means that the salvation which God would bestow upon them would be of the nature of an ornament, as if they were clothed with costly or splendid raiment. Compare <sup><1926></sup>Psalm 132:16. The word meek here means humble or lowly, and may refer to those who are humble in rank or condition, or those who are humble in heart. Perhaps the two ideas are here combined. They have not external adorning, but God will give them an honor and beauty in salvation which no outward adorning could impart.

<sup><1915></sup>Psalm 149:5. Let the saints be joyful in glory In the glory of their condition; in the favor of God; in the honor which he bestows upon them. Let them rejoice in this; let them shout and triumph over this. Other men rejoice in honor; in wealth; in houses, lands, parks, libraries, works of art: let the saints rejoice in the glory of being the friends of God; in the hope of heaven. Compare <sup><1911></sup>Psalm 84:11.

Let them sing aloud upon their beds Compare the notes at <sup><1850></sup>Job 35:10; <sup><1425></sup>Acts 16:25; <sup><1910></sup>Psalm 34:1. The idea is, that in the meditations of the night, when darkness is around them, when alone with God, they may find occasion for exultation and praise. Their hearts may be full of joy, and alone they may give expression to their joy in songs of praise.

Psalm 149:6. Let the high praises of God be in their mouth Margin, as in Hebrew, in their throat. Literally, “Praises of God in their throat; and a sword of two edges in their hand.” That is, In the very work of executing the purposes of God on his enemies, there should be the feeling and the language of praise. Their hearts should be full of confidence in God; they should feel that they are engaged in his service; and while they defend themselves, or inflict punishment on the enemies of God, they should chant His praise. The idea is, that even in the work of war they might feel that they were engaged in the service of God, and that the passions usual in war should be subdued and kept under by the consciousness that they are mere instruments in the hand of God to accomplish His purposes. Perhaps the Hebrew word rendered “high praises” — hmmjw<sup><47319></sup> — may imply more than mere praise. It may embrace anything that is lofty and exalted, and may mean here that they would have the consciousness that they were engaged in high and lofty aims; that they were carrying out the great designs of God; that they were executing purposes more momentous than their own could be — even the eternal purposes of the Most High. This would give an importance, a dignity, an elevation to their conduct which could spring from no other source.

And a two-edged sword in their hand literally, a sword of edges; that is, a sword with an edge on both sides of the blade. Roman swords were often made in this manner. They were made for piercing as well as for striking. See the notes at <sup><8912></sup>Hebrews 4:12.

Psalm 149:7. To execute vengeance upon the heathen To inflict punishment upon them as a recompence for their sins. The word pagan here means nations. The allusion is, doubtless, to those who had oppressed and injured the Hebrew people — perhaps referring to those who had destroyed the city and the temple at the time of the Babylonian captivity. They were now to receive the punishment due for the wrongs which they had done to the nation; a just recompence at the hand of God, and by the instrumentality of those whom they had wronged. Compare the notes at <sup><4107></sup>Psalm 137:7-9.

And punishments upon the people The people of those lands. Those who had waged war with the Hebrew nation.

Psalm 149:8. To bind their kings with chains To make them prisoners and captives. This is but carrying out the idea in the previous verses, of inflicting punishment upon them for the wrongs which they had done to the people of God. There is no evidence that this refers to a spiritual conquest, or to a spiritual subjection of those nations to the true religion. The whole idea is in accordance with what is so often expressed in the Psalms — that of inflicting just punishment on the wicked. See the General Introduction, Section 6.

And their nobles with fetters of iron To make them prisoners. That is, to subdue them. Captives in war, even those of elevated rank, were often led in chains to grace the triumph of conquerors.

Psalm 149:9. To execute upon them the judgment written Either, that which is written in the law in general as what is threatened to wicked men; or, that which was written for their particular case, or which they were specifically commanded to do. Compare Deuteronomy 7:1,2; 32:41-43. Most probably the reference is to some particular command in this case.

This honor have all his saints

(a) It is an honor to engage in executing or carrying out the purposes of God. As it is an honor to be a magistrate, a judge, a sheriff, a constable, a commander of an army, an admiral in a navy, to execute the purposes of a government — an honor sought with great avidity among people as among the most valued distinctions of life — why should it be less honorable to execute the purposes of God? Are the objects which he seeks in his administration less important than those which are sought among people? Are his laws of less importance? Are his aims less pure? Is there less of justice, and equity, and benevolence in his plans?

(b) It is an honor which pertains to “all the saints” — to all who love and fear God — to be engaged in carrying out or executing his plans. In their own way, and in their own sphere — it may, indeed, be a very humble sphere — but each and all in their own sphere, are engaged in executing the purposes of God. In the duties of a family; in kindness to the poor; in the office of a teacher or a magistrate; in clearing a farm; in cultivating the land; in building a schoolhouse; in founding a church, a college, an asylum for the blind, the dumb, the lame, the insane; in contributing to send the gospel abroad over our own land, or among the pagan, or in going to carry that gospel to a benighted world — in some of these ways all who are truly the friends of God, or who are entitled to be enrolled among the “saints of the Lord” are, in fact, carrying out the purposes of the Lord — the “judgments written” to guide mankind; and man’s highest honor here, as it will be in heaven, is to carry out the purposes of the Lord.

Praise ye the LORD Hallelu-jah. It is a subject of praise and thanksgiving, it should lead us to shout Hallelujah, that we are permitted to be employed in any way, however humble, in carrying out the divine plans, or in accomplishing those great designs which he contemplates toward our race.

APPENDIX NOTES ON PSALM 149

~~149:7,8~~ Psalm 149:7,8. To execute vengeance upon the heathen ... This last phrase occurs also at the close of the preceding psalm. As written may mean written in the book of God’s decrees, there is no need of supposing a reference to any part of Scripture. If there be such reference, however, it is no doubt to the threatening in ~~15:24~~ Deuteronomy 32:41-43. To act as God’s instruments in this great judicial process, so far from being a disgrace or hardship, is an honor reserved for all the objects of his mercy and subjects Of his grace. The psalm ends as it began, with Hallelujah!

NOTES ON PSALM 150

This beautiful and animated psalm closes the series of the Hallelujah Psalms (Psalm 146—150), and appropriately also closes the entire volume. Its author is unknown, but in respect to the object for which it was composed there can be no uncertainty. It was manifestly designed, whoever wrote it, to occupy the very place which it does occupy — to complete the volume devoted to praise. Praise is the suitable ending of the book; praise is what the Spirit of inspiration meant to secure in the heart and on the lips. In the review of the whole there is occasion for praise. In view of all that has been disclosed about God, about his religion, about the manifestations of his mercy and grace to his people, there is occasion for praise. After all that has been experienced, observed, and recorded in this book — all of trial, sorrow, temptation, conflict, disappointment, sickness, bereavement, persecution, war, captivity, bondage, exile, tears, pain, darkness, trouble — there is, as the result of the whole, as there will be at the end of our own troubled and chequered lives, occasion for exultation, praise, triumph — songs, rejoicings, raptures, hallelujahs. This psalm, then, made up wholly of expressions of gratitude and praise, is an appropriate close to the entire Book of Psalms. So may our lives close, when its varied scenes are over, with thanksgivings and praises, as a proper expression in view of the past, and as emblematic of the uninterrupted employment that awaits us in the heavens.

Psalm 150:1. Praise ye the LORD See the notes at Psalm 146:1.

Praise God in his sanctuary His holy place; the place where he dwells. The allusion here is, probably, to the temple, the place of his abode on earth.

Praise him in the firmament of his power The whole expression is equivalent to earth and heaven; Praise him on earth; praise him in heaven. The word rendered firmament is the same which is used in Genesis 1:6. It properly means an expanse — a thing spread out. The verb from which the word is derived means to beat; then, to beat out — that is, to spread out by beating, as gold is; and then, simply to spread out, to expand. Compare Psalm 136:6; Isaiah 42:5; 44:24. In Syriac the word means to make firm; but this idea is not necessarily in the Hebrew word. The idea of a firmament as something firm is derived from the Septuagint — in Genesis 1:6, στερεωμα 4733 — in this place, εν 1722 στερεωματι 4733.

The Hebrew, however, merely means “an expanse” — something spread out, as the heavens SEEM to us to be “stretched out;” and the call here is on all that dwell above that expanse — in heaven — to unite with those on earth in his praise. It is called “the expanse of his power” because it is in the heavens — in the sun, the moon, the stars — that the power of God seems to be principally displayed.

Psalm 150:2. Praise him for his mighty acts See the notes at Psalm 145:4: “One generation shall praise thy works to another, and shall declare thy mighty acts.” The Hebrew word is the same. The reference is to that which displays the power of God; the things which manifest his omnipotence.

Praise him according to his excellent greatness Hebrew, the multitude of his greatness. Let the praise in elevation correspond with this; let it be such as shall properly express this; let all be employed that will contribute to make this known, or that will be appropriate to this. Hence, the psalmist proceeds to call on all to make use of everything, by instrument and voice, that would in any manner set forth the praise of God.

Psalm 150:3. Praise him with the sound of the trumpet Margin, cornet. In this verse and the verses following there is an allusion to the instruments of music which were commonly employed in Hebrew worship. The idea is, that all these — all that could properly express praise — should be used to celebrate the praises of God. Each one, with its own distinct note, and all combined in harmony, should be employed for this purpose. Most of these instruments, and many more, are now combined in the organ, where the instruments, instead of being played on by separate performers, are so united that they can be supplied with wind from one source — the bellows — and all played by one performer. Thus one mind directs the performance, securing, if skillfully done, perfect unity and harmony. This instrument was unknown to the Hebrews. Among them, each instrument had its own performer. The trumpet was principally used to call the people together, but it was also an important instrument among those used by the bands of musicians that performed in the temple, as its tones are now important ones in the organ.

here rendered psaltery is there rendered viol — “And the harp and the viol,” etc.

Psalm 150:4. Praise him with the timbrel Hebrew,  $\text{āTō}^{\text{A8596}}$ . See this described in the notes at  $\text{Isaiah 5:12}$ . It is rendered tabret and tabrets in  $\text{Genesis 31:27}$ ;  $\text{1 Samuel 10:5}$ ;  $\text{18:6}$ ;  $\text{Isaiah 5:12}$ ;  $\text{24:8}$ ;  $\text{30:32}$ ;  $\text{Jeremiah 31:4}$ ;  $\text{Ezekiel 28:13}$ ; timbrel and timbrels in  $\text{Exodus 15:20}$ ;  $\text{Judges 11:34}$ ;  $\text{2 Samuel 6:5}$ ;  $\text{1 Chronicles 13:8}$ ;  $\text{Job 21:12}$ ;  $\text{Psalm 81:2}$ ;  $\text{149:3}$ ; and in the margin in  $\text{Jeremiah 31:4}$ . The word does not occur elsewhere. It was an instrument that was struck with the hands.

And dance See this word explained in the notes at  $\text{Psalm 149:3}$ . Dancing among the Hebrews seems to have accompanied the timbrel or tabret. See  $\text{Exodus 15:20}$ .

Praise him with stringed instruments  $\text{me}^{\text{A4482}}$ . This word means strings, from a verb which means to divide; and the proper reference would be to slender threads, as if they were divided, or made small. It is nowhere else applied to instruments of music, but might be properly applied to a harp, a violin, a bass-viol, etc. The word strings is indeed applied elsewhere to instruments of music ( $\text{Psalm 33:2}$ ;  $\text{144:9}$ ;  $\text{1 Samuel 18:16}$ ;  $\text{Isaiah 38:20}$ ;  $\text{Habakkuk 3:19}$ ), but the Hebrew word is different. Such instruments were commonly used in the praise of God. See the notes at  $\text{Psalm 33:2}$ .

And organs Hebrew,  $\text{bgW}^{\text{A5748}}$ . See this word explained in the notes at  $\text{Job 21:12}$ . It occurs elsewhere only in  $\text{Genesis 4:21}$ ;  $\text{Job 21:12}$ ;  $\text{30:31}$ ; in all of which places it is rendered organ. The word is derived from a verb meaning to breathe, to blow; and would be applicable to any wind-instrument. It here represents the whole class of wind-instruments. The word organ is a Greek word, and is found in the Septuagint in this place; and hence, our word organ has been introduced into the translation. The Greek word properly denotes

- (a) something by which work is accomplished, as a machine;
- (b) a musical instrument;
- (c) the material from which anything is made;
- (d) the work itself. (Passow, Lexicon).

Our word organ, as used in music, suggests the idea of a combination of instruments or sounds. That idea is not found in the Hebrew word. It denotes merely a wind-instrument. Neither the Hebrews nor any of the ancient nations had an instrument that corresponded with the organ as we now use the term.

Psalm 150:5. Praise him upon the loud cymbals literally, “the cymbals of sound” or hearing. That is, Let there be audibly expressed joy. The allusion here is to an instrument of music that was most distinctly heard in union with other instruments. The sound of the cymbal would be most clearly audible in its accompaniment of the other instruments referred to, as the sound of cymbals, or as the “triangle” would be now. The Hebrew word rendered cymbal means a tinkling, clanging, ringing, as of metal, or of arms; then, a whirring, as of wings (compare the notes at Isaiah 18:1); then, any tinkling or clanging instrument, as a fish-spear or harpoon; then, cymbals, instruments of music. The cymbal, as now used, is an instrument of brass, in a circular form, like a dish, producing, when two are struck together, a sharp, ringing sound — Webster. An instrument of this kind is evidently referred to here. The word occurs in the Bible in the following places only: Deuteronomy 28:42, rendered locust; 2 Samuel 6:5, rendered, as here, cymbal; Job 41:7, rendered fish-spears; and Isaiah 18:1, rendered shadowing with.

Praise him upon the high-sounding cymbals The cymbals of joyful voice. On the word teruah, rendered high, see the notes at Psalm 89:16. A loud, lofty sound or shout, as on the reception of a conqueror, is the idea here; and the sense is, that the praise of God was to be celebrated with that which would in the highest sense express joy and triumph.

Psalm 150:6. Let everything that hath breath praise the LORD All living things in the air, the earth, the waters. Let there be one universal burst of praise. Let his praises be celebrated not only with instruments of music, but let all living beings unite in that praise; let a breathing universe combine in one solemn service of praise.

Praise ye the LORD Hallelu-jah. Thus, at the end of all the trials, the conflicts, the persecutions, the sorrows, the joys recorded in this book, the psalmist gives utterance to feelings of joy, triumph, transport, rejoicing; and thus at the end of all — when the affairs of this world shall be closed — when the church shall have passed through all its trials, shall have borne all its persecutions, shall have suffered all that it is appointed to suffer — when the work of redemption shall be complete, and all the ransomed of the Lord shall have been recovered from sin, and shall be saved — that church, all heaven, the whole universe, shall break forth in one loud, long, triumphant Hallelujah.

“The ransomed of the Lord shall return, and come to Zion with songs, and everlasting joy upon their heads: they shall obtain joy and gladness; and sorrow and sighing shall flee away,” <sup><23510></sup> Isaiah 35:10.

Here I close my exposition of this book, and with it all that I purpose or expect to prepare in attempting to furnish a commentary on the Holy Scriptures. The volumes which I have prepared have occupied me daily, almost without intermission, for nearly forty years of my life; and now, at 68 years of age, and with the diminished power of vision with which it has pleased God to afflict me, I can hope to attempt no more. More than a generation has passed away while I have been engaged in these labors; and the finishing of this work, and the reason why I cannot hope to do more, admonish me that I am soon to follow that generation to the grave, and that all my work must soon be ended.

A man who has written so much may he pardoned, perhaps, for this personal reflection at the end of so long a journey, and in view of the thought that his labor of life, in this respect, is ended. It has been remarked that “the close of a literary undertaking is always contemplated as an event of great interest to the feelings of an author. It is the termination of his labors, and the commencement of his hopes and fears.” (Life of Cowper, vol. iii. London, 1835.) Mr. Gibbon has thought proper to record the precise day and hour in which he concluded his “Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire.” “I have presumed,” he says, “to mark the moment of conception: I shall now commemorate the hour of my final deliverance. It was on the day, or rather night, of the 27th of June, 1787, between the hours of eleven and twelve, that I wrote the last lines of the last page, in a summer-house in my garden. After laying down my pen, I took several turns in a berceau or covered walk of acacias, which commands a prospect of the country, the lake, and the mountains. The air was temperate, the sky was serene, the silver orb of the moon was reflected from the waters, and all nature was silent. I will not dissemble the first emotions of joy on the recovery of my freedom, and, perhaps, the establishment of my fame. But my pride was soon humbled, and a sober melancholy was spread over my mind, by the idea that I had taken an everlasting leave of an old and agreeable companion, and that whatever might be the future date of my history, the life of the historian might be short and precarious.”

(Miscellaneous Works, vol. i., p. 170. Dublin, 1796.)

Nor is Pope’s reflection less affecting. “The morning after my exit,” he says, “the sun will rise as bright as ever, the flowers smell as sweet, the plants spring as green, the world will proceed in its old course, and people laugh and marry as they were used to do.”

I may not compare myself with these people; but I am conscious of similar emotions, as I bring to a close this long series of works, designed to illustrate the Bible. God has blessed me in this work far above all that I had any reason to anticipate; and while I have cause to believe that he has made it useful in some measure to the world, and venture to hope that he will make it useful when the fingers which now move this pen shall be stiff in the grave, he has made it, during nearly forty years, a source of constant blessing to my own soul. In the review of this part of my life I can now conceive of no way possible in which I could have more profitably spent the early hours of each day than in the study of the Bible. That it has required some sacrifice to do it — that it has demanded some resoluteness of purpose and steadiness of aim — that it has required some discipline of mind to keep me firm to the purpose, is indeed true; but the very discipline — the necessity of carrying out a fixed purpose — has been useful to me, and apart from any other results would in itself have been worth all which it has cost me. I cannot close this work without emotion. I cannot lay down my pen at the end of this long task without feeling that with me the work of life is nearly over. Yet I could close it at no better place than in finishing the exposition of this book; and the language with which the Book of Psalms itself closes seems to me to be eminently appropriate to all that I have experienced. All that is past — all in the prospect of what is to come — calls for a long, a joyful, a triumphant HALLELUJAH!!

APPENDIX NOTES ON PSALM 150

Composed probably by Ezra as a fitting conclusion to the Fifth Book of Psalms, and to the collection at large. This Fifth Book, unlike the preceding four books, has no formal doxology, which, as Dr. Binnie remarks,

“may be due in part to the circumstance that there was no need of anything to mark the end of the last book; but it is still more satisfactorily accounted for by the character of Psalm 150. It is, in effect, a doxology from beginning to end. For not only does it begin and end with Hallelujah, but every one of the intermediate lines is an exhortation to Praise the Lord.”

Hengstenberg’s beautiful remark is often quoted —

“As the life and the history of the church, so also the Psalter, with all its cries from the depths, runs out in a hallelujah.”

Psalm 150:3-6. Praise him with the sound of trumpet ... Let every thing that hath breath praise the Lord Wherewith? With every instrument — with trumpet, psaltery, harp, soft timbrel, pipe, stringed instruments, and wind-instruments; with cymbals, softly played [mæ<sup>48085</sup>], that do not overpower the voice of the singer); and with cymbals of jubilee (<sup>4085</sup>2 Samuel 6:5). Not merely an instrument of ten strings, as at other times, but ten distinct instruments are called for; and twelve times is the call uttered, “Praise ye!” twelve times; so that each tribe is summoned, and then all the universe besides, to use their voice.

Let everything that hath breath praise Jehovah! All creation is summoned to take part, and angels too, for they have interest in our redemption-scenes — since he is “to reconcile all things to himself, whether they be things on earth or things in heaven” (<sup>5002</sup>Colossians 1:20).

What magnificence and majesty in this close! Praise gathered in from every creature; every instrument of joy, and gladness, and triumph, and jubilee summoned to sound loud praise; and every heart and voice engaged to help the choir.

“Every voice teems with praise; every thought is about praise; every object awakens it; every power uses itself for his Service” (Meditat. on Psalms).

We close the book with something of the feeling with which we suppose John came away from hearing “the voice of much people in heaven saying Hallelujah!” We seem to have been brought within hearing of heavenly melody, from heavenly harps and voices. Is not the closing verse taken up in <sup><6613></sup> Revelation 5:13 — “And every creature which is in heaven, and on earth, and under the earth, and such as are in the sea, and all that are in them, heard I saying, Blessing, and honor, and glory, and power, be unto him that sitteth upon the throne, and unto the Lamb forever and ever!”

And again, in <sup><6616></sup> Revelation 19:6,7, when the great multitude, with voice “as the voice of many waters, and as the voice of many thunders,” cry

“Hallelujah! for the Lord God omnipotent reigneth. Let us be glad, and rejoice, and give honor to him, for the marriage of the Lamb is come!” — A. A. Bonar
