Psalm 46:4. There is a river There is no allusion here to any particular stream or river, but the image is designed to represent a state of peace and calm security in contrast with the rough and troubled ocean. While the ocean rages, and foams, and dashes against the mountains as if it would overturn them, the state of Jerusalem, the city of God, was well represented by a calm and gently-flowing river; a river of full banks, diffusing joy and fertility and beauty wherever it flowed. This image, to represent happiness, abundance, peace, joy, is one that is often employed in the Scriptures. Compare Isaiah 32:2; 33:21; 41:18; Psalm 1:3; Revelation 22:1; Psalm 36:8. The “idea” here is simply that Jerusalem would be calm and serene amidst all the external agitations in the world — calm as a gently-flowing stream. The streams — the canals — the water-courses of such a river flowing around each dwelling and along each garden, would diffuse happiness and beauty everywhere.

The streams whereof The allusion here is undoubtedly to the canals, watercourses, or rivulets that were led off from the main stream for the purpose of supplying fountains and watering gardens. Thus the city of Damascus is watered by streams or canals cut from the river Barrady, that flows down from the regions of Anti-Libanus. The greenness — the beauty — the fertility — of Damascus is owing wholly to the waters of the river thus conducted to every house and garden in the city. Compare introduction to Isaiah 17. So here, the flowing river of divine mercy and goodness is conveyed, as in smaller canals or streams, to each home and heart, producing peace, calmness, joy — while the world around is full of commotion and trouble.

Shall make glad the city of God Jerusalem, considered as the place where God was worshipped, and where he was supposed especially to dwell:

The holy place of the tabernacles of the Most High Of the “tent” where the Most High is supposed to abide. The word is applicable to any habitation or dwelling-place; but in the Scriptures it is applied especially to the sacred tent erected by Moses in the wilderness, and ultimately removed to Mount Zion by David, as the divine abode on earth. It is sometimes, also, applied to the temple; and if this psalm was written, as I have supposed, in the time of Hezekiah, it would be applicable to that. Compare <982>Psalm 84:2; 132:5. The tabernacle and the temple were alike divided into two parts — the holy and the most holy place — and hence the “plural” term is sometimes applied to them. Compare the notes at <983>Hebrews 9:2,3.

<985>Psalm 46:5. God is in the midst of her God is in the midst of the “city” referred to above — the “city of God.” That is,

- (a) he dwelt there by the visible symbol of his presence, the Shekinah;
- (b) he was there “actually” as a help and a protector.

It was his chosen abode, and as long as such a Being dwelt in the city, they had nothing to fear.

God shall help her That is, in her danger, he will interpose to save her. This is language such as would be used in reference to a place that was besieged, and would well apply to the state of things when Jerusalem was besieged by the armies of Assyria under Sennacherib. The language expresses the confidence of the people in the time of the impending danger.

And that right early Margin, “when the morning appeareth.” Literally, “in the faces of the morning,” as the word is commonly used; or, more literally, in the “turning” of the morning — for the verb from which the word is derived means properly “to turn,” and then “to turn to or from any one.” The noun is applied to the face or countenance, because the person is “turned” to us when we see his countenance. The poetic idea here seems to refer to the day as having turned away “from” us at night, and then as turning about “toward” us in the morning, after having gone, as it were, to the greatest distance from us. “Possibly” there may be an allusion here to what occurred in the camp of the Assyrians, when the discovery that the angel of the Lord had smitten them was made early in the morning, or when men arose in the morning: “The angel of the Lord went forth, and smote in the camp of the Assyrians an hundred and fourscore and five thousand: and when they arose in the morning” (that is, when men arose in the morning), “behold, they were all dead corpses,” <sup><2376></sup>Isaiah 37:36.

<sup><1946></sup>Psalm 46:6. The heathen raged The nations were in commotion, or were agitated like the waves of the sea. This language would well describe the consternation of the nations when the Assyrians went forth to conquest, and when, having subdued so many other kingdoms, they made war on Jerusalem. Compare <sup><2368></sup>Isaiah 36:18-20.

The kingdoms were moved That is, those who were invaded, as well as those that made the invasion. There was a general convulsion or shaking among the nations of the earth.

He uttered his voice God spoke; he gave command; he expressed his will. Compare <sup><0008></sup>Genesis 1:3; <sup><3186></sup>Habakkuk 3:6.

The earth melted The very earth seemed to melt or dissolve before him. Everything became still. The danger passed away at his command, and the raging world became calm. The Bible abounds in language of this kind, showing the absolute power of God, or his power to control all the raging elements on land and ocean by a word. Compare the notes at <sup><1839></sup>Psalm 33:9. See also <sup><19475></sup>Psalm 107:25,29; <sup><1085></sup>Matthew 8:26.

<sup><1947></sup>Psalm 46:7. The LORD of hosts The God commanding, ordering, marshalling the hosts of heaven — the angels, and the starry worlds. See the notes at <sup><2109></sup>Isaiah 1:9. Compare <sup><1240></sup>Psalm 24:10. The reference here is to God considered as having control over all “armies,” or all that can be regarded and described as a marshalled host, in earth and in heaven. Having such a Being, therefore, for a protector, they had nothing to fear. See <sup><19411></sup>Psalm 46:11.

Is with us Is on our side; is our defender. The Hebrew phrase used here is employed in <sup><2374></sup>Isaiah 7:14; 8:8, to describe the Messiah. See the notes at those passages.

The God of Jacob See the notes at <sup><1246></sup>Psalms 24:6. The meaning is, The God whom Jacob acknowledged, and whom he found to be his friend, is with us.

Is our refuge literally, a high place, as a tower, far above the reach of enemies. See the notes at <sup><4900></sup>Psalms 9:9; 18:2. So the margin, “an high place for us.”

<sup><1948></sup>Psalm 46:8. Come, behold the works of the LORD Go forth and see what the Lord has done. See, in what his hand has accomplished, how secure we are if we put our trust in him.

What desolations he hath made in the earth Or, in the land. The word “desolations” might refer to any “ruin” or “overthrow,” which he had brought upon the land of Israel, or on the nations abroad — the destruction of cities, towns, or armies, as proof of his power, and of his ability to save those who put their trust in him. But if this be supposed to refer to the invasion of the land of Israel by Sennacherib, it may point to what occurred to his armies when the angel of the Lord went forth and smote them in their camp (<sup><2373></sup>Isaiah 37:36), and to the consequent deliverance of Jerusalem from danger. Without impropriety, perhaps, this may be regarded as all appeal to the inhabitants of Jerusalem to go forth and see for themselves how complete was the deliverance; how utter the ruin of their foes; how abundant the proof that God was able to protect his people in times of danger. It adds great beauty to this psalm to suppose that it “was” composed on that occasion, or in view of that invasion, for every part of the psalm may receive a beautiful, and an ample illustration from what occurred at that memorable period. Nothing “could” furnish a clearer proof of the power of God to save, and of the propriety of putting confidence in him in times of national danger, than a survey of the camp of the Assyrians, where an hundred and eighty-five thousand men had been smitten down in one night by the angel of God. Compare <sup><1295></sup>2 Kings 19:35; <sup><4821></sup>2 Chronicles 32:21; <sup><2373></sup>Isaiah 37:36.

<sup><1949></sup>Psalm 46:9. He maketh wars to cease unto the end of the earth Either in all the land, or in all the world. The overthrow of the Assyrian army would probably put an end to all the wars then raging in the world.

The Assyrian empire was then the most mighty on the globe; it was engaged in wide schemes of conquest; it had already overrun many of the smaller kingdoms of the world (<sup><2378></sup>Isaiah 37:18-20); and it hoped to complete its conquests, and to secure the ascendancy over the entire earth, by the subjugation of India and Egypt. When the vast army of that empire, engaged in such a purpose, was overthrown, the consequence would be that the nations would be at rest, or that there would be universal peace. Compare the notes at <sup><2346></sup>Isaiah 14:6,7.

He breaketh the bow, and cutteth the spear in sunder That is, he makes them useless, as a bow that is broken is of no value, or a spear that is cut into parts.

He burneth the chariot in the fire The war-chariot, that which was employed in battle. See the notes at <sup><2317></sup>Isaiah 2:7; <sup><1917></sup>Psalms 20:7. The expression here may refer to a custom of collecting the spoils of war into a heap, and setting them on fire. This was particularly done when the victors were unable to remove them, or so to secure them as to preclude all danger of their being taken again and used against themselves. This custom is alluded to by Virgil, AEn. viii. 561, 562,

Stravi, scutorumque iucendi victor acervos.”*

The idea here is, that God had wholly overthrown the foe, and had prevented all danger of his returning again for purposes of conquest.

<sup><1960></sup>Psalm 46:10. Be still The word used here — from hpr,<sup><17503></sup> — means properly to cast down; to let fall; to let hang down; then, to be relaxed, slackened, especially the hands: It is also employed in the sense of not making an effort; not putting forth exertion; and then would express the idea of leaving matters with God, or of being without anxiety about the issue. Compare <sup><1243></sup>Exodus 14:13, “Stand still, and see the salvation of God.” In this place the word seems to be used as meaning that there was to be no anxiety; that there was to be a calm, confiding, trustful state of mind in view of the displays of the divine presence and power. The mind was to be calm, in view of the fact that God had interposed, and had shown that he was able to defend his people when surrounded by dangers. If this the divine interposition when Jerusalem was threatened by the armies of the Assyrians under Sennacherib, the force and beauty of the expression will be most clearly seen.

And know that I am God See, in what I have done, the evidence that I am God. See a work accomplished which none “but” God could effect. Compare <sup><2376></sup>Isaiah 37:36.

I will be exalted among the heathen That is, among the nations. The nations abroad that do not worship me, but worship idols, shall see in these deeds full proof that I am the true God, and that I am worthy of universal adoration. Compare the notes at <sup><2788></sup>Daniel 3:28,29; 4:1-3,37. See also <sup><1196></sup>Exodus 9:16; <sup><497></sup>Romans 9:17.

I will be exalted in the earth In the lands abroad; all over the world. The defeat and destruction of the armies of Sennacherib were eminently suited to make a deep impression on the world that the God of the Hebrew people was the true God.

<sup><941></sup>Psalm 46:11. The LORD of hosts is with us ... See <sup><947></sup>Psalm 46:7. This is the conclusion, or the result of the whole. As applied to the invasion of Sennacherib, this would be clearly seen, for all that occurred in that invasion was adapted to leave the impression that Jehovah, God of hosts, was with the Hebrew people. He had interposed in time of danger; he had saved his city and nation; he had overthrown one of the most mighty armies that had ever been assembled; he had caused the boasting conqueror himself to retrace his steps to his capital; he had wholly delivered the nation from all danger; and he had shown how easy it was, in ways which they could not have anticipated, to bring deliverance. The truth thus conveyed was adapted to the people of God in all lands and at all times, as showing that God has power to defend his people against the most formidable enemies, and that all their interests are safe in his hands.

APPENDIX NOTES ON PSALM 46

The historical occasion of the psalm cannot with certainty be determined. It was called forth by a catastrophe which befel the kingdom of Judah (compare in <sup><948></sup>Psalm 46:8: “come, behold the works of the Lord”), and has for its immediate object Judah’s deliverance. Otherwise the particular in the last strophe would not serve as a foundation for the general in the two first strophes; especially this: “God helps her at the break of morning,” would not be comprehensible, as it presupposes a heavy oppression on Judah. The admonition also in <sup><940></sup>Psalm 46:10: “Leave off and know that I am God,” has only then a motive laid for it, when the desolation effected upon the earth, <sup><948></sup>Psalm 46:8, and the cessation of war in <sup><949></sup>Psalm 46:9, could be recognized by all as done in behalf of Israel's salvation, for only then was the fact a dissuasive for the pagan against fighting with Israel, a demonstrative proof of the godhead of his God. In like manner it is then only that <sup><1941></sup>Psalm 46:11 appears as properly explained. But at the same time this catastrophe was an important event in the world's history, the annihilation of the power of a world-conqueror: with Judah the whole circle of the earth also is delivered, in so far as it could be surveyed from Palestine, <sup><1941></sup>Psalm 46:9, and the Lord has thereby glorified himself through all the earth, <sup><1941></sup>Psalm 46:10. By observing these distinctive marks, hypotheses, such as those of DeWette, who thinks the psalm refers to foreign wars, which God had silenced, and of Hitzig, who refers it to a sudden scaring of the Syrians and Ephraimites from the Jewish territory, are entirely set aside. In the whole Israelite history there is only one event, of which we can here think, the destruction of Sennacherib's army before the gates of Jerusalem, <sup><2376></sup>Isaiah 37:36. That whole chapter and Isaiah 36 must be read, if we would come to the full understanding and enjoyment of the psalm. After the exodus from Egypt there was no occasion more appropriate than this for bringing vividly out the leading idea in this psalm. The entire might of the world, which, as formerly in Egypt, so then was concentrated in Assyria, the most powerful of kingdoms, up until that time resistless in its march of conquest, came against Jerusalem. To the words:

“Let not Hezekiah deceive you, saying, The Lord will deliver us; hath any of the gods of the nations delivered his land out of the hand of the king of Assyria?”

There was an equally impressive answer given then, as formerly to the question of Pharaoh: Who is Yahweh? When all seemed already to be lost, the holy city was, by an immediate exercise of divine omnipotence, delivered, without any cooperation on the part of its feeble inhabitants, without even any interruption to the undertaking of the Assyrians from their chief enemies, the Egyptians. Then, when real greatness was great also in appearance, when the power of the world had assumed a dazzling splendor, at such a time it was, that it was said to the possessors thereof, as is done here in <sup><1941></sup>Psalm 46:10, “Cease and know that I am God.” ... It is self-evident that the subject of the psalm upon which Luther's “Ein' feste Burg ist unser Gott,” rests, is no Old Testament idea. There is only one church of God through all ages, and to it this idea belongs. When Christ supports his church, the gates of hell may rage: this is only the New Testament form for the general fundamental truth. — Hengstenberg.

There is sufficient evidence in the psalm now before us to show that it was composed in the reign of Hezekiah, on the occasion of the destruction of the Assyrian host of Sennacherib. For the mercy which it celebrates is evidently the preservation of the holy city, before the walls of which the Assyrian army perished: and the psalmist purposely avoids any allusion to the Jewish territory, through which, according to the prophecy of Isaiah, the king of Assyria had been permitted to pass, overflowing and going over, and reaching even to the neck, though discomfited before he could succeed in crushing the capital. In the mention, however vague, in mountains being carried into the midst of the sea, we have a manifest reference to the previous overthrow by the Assyrian power of the kingdoms of Syria and Israel, and of Hamath, Arphad, and other northern states; mountains being continually used in Scripture as the emblems of kingdoms, and the swelling waves of the sea representing the formidable advance of the great pagan empire. In contrast to the roaring and blustering of this Assyrian ocean, the divine grace by which Jerusalem was preserved is compared to the springing streams of the fountain of Gihon, which, by the formation of a new channel or conduit, Hezekiah had, in preparation for resisting the anticipated siege, lately introduced into the heart of the city. A similar contrast had been drawn in the reign of Ahaz by the prophet Isaiah, when he compared the divinely established dominion of the house of David, representing the kingdom of God, to the softly going waters of the fountain of Siloah, and the opposing might of the Assyrian monarchy, representing the tyranny of the world, to the overflowing stream of the Euphrates. In the words which form the refrain of the psalm, "The Lord of hosts is with us," there is a reminiscence of the name Immanuel, "With us God," on which the recent prophecies of Isaiah had dwelt.

Psalm 46:11, "Be still and know that I am God," is particularly appropriate in reference to the destruction of the Assyrian host, which was accomplished by the arm of the Lord, without the intervention of any associated human willing agency. Hardly less worthy of note are the concluding words of Psalm 46:5, "right early," or "at dawn of morning," in allusion to the same event, when, as has been justly observed, there intervened but one night between the highest pitch of distress and the most complete deliverance: "When they arose early in the morning, behold, they were all dead corpses." And in thorough keeping with what actually occurred is the mention also of the desolations which the Lord had made in the earth, of his breaking the bow, and cutting the spear in sunder, and burning the chariot in the fire. There is, in fact, hardly a psalm in the Psalter reflecting so manifestly as this the circumstances of the period at which it was written.

As the destruction of Sennacherib's host is the most signal historical instance of the issue of the outward conflict between God and the powers of the world, so in the present psalm, the basis of Luther's "Ein' feste Burg ist unser Gott," the Christian church has found the readiest expression of her confidence in God in the midst of surrounding dangers. That the psalmist avowedly spoke in the name of the universal church of all time may be gathered from the first clause of ~~Psalm~~ Psalm 46:9, "He maketh wars to cease unto the end of the earth;" words of essentially prophetic import, which must wait to the end for their full accomplishment. — Thrupp.

~~Psalm~~ Psalm 46:1. God is our refuge and our strength Not our armies, or our fortresses. Israel's boast is in Yahweh, the only living and true God. Others vaunt their impregnable castles, placed on inaccessible rocks and secured with gates of iron, but God is a far better refuge from distress than all these: and when the time comes to carry the war into the enemy's territories, the Lord stands his people in better stead than all the valor of legions or the boasted strength of chariot and horse. Soldiers of the cross, remember this, and count yourselves safe, and make yourselves strong in God. Forget not the personal possessive word "our;" make sure each one of your portion in God, that you may say, "He is my refuge and strength." Neither forget the fact that God is our refuge just now, in the immediate present, as truly as when David penned the word. God alone is our all in all. All other refuges are refuges of lies, all other strength is weakness, for power belongeth unto God: but as God is all-sufficient, our defense and might are equal to all emergencies. "A very present help in trouble," or in distresses, he has so been found, he has been tried and proved by his people. He never withdraws himself from his afflicted. He is their help, truly, effectually, constantly; he is present or near them, close at their side and ready for their succor, and this is emphasized by the word "very" in our version, he is more present than friend or relative can be, yea, more nearly present than even the trouble itself. To all this comfortable truth is added the consideration that his assistance comes at the headed time. He is not as the swallows that leave us in the winter; he is a friend in need and a friend indeed. When it is very dark with us, let brave spirits say, "Come, let us sing the forty-sixth Psalm."

Is God in time of danger;
A shield and sword in every shock,
From foe well known or stranger.” — Spurgeon*

Psalm 46:2. Though the earth be removed The sentiment of Horace on the just man: Si fractus illabatur orbis, impavidum ferient ruinae, appears excellent at first sight. But since such a person as he draws has never been found, he merely trifles. This greatness of soul, on the other hand, is based solely on the protection of God, and on the promises which he has made to his own people, and in this way easily overcomes the terror which threatens destruction to all creatures. — Calvin.

Psalm 46:6. The heathen raged The nations were in a furious uproar, they gathered against the city of the Lord like wolves ravenous for their prey; they foamed, and roared, and swelled like a tempestuous sea. “The kingdoms were moved.” A general confusion seized upon society; the fierce invaders convulsed their own dominions by draining the population to urge on the war, and they desolated other territories by their devastating march to Jerusalem. Crowns fell from royal heads, ancient thrones rocked like trees driven of the tempest, powerful empires fell like pines uprooted by the blast: everything was in disorder, and dismay seized on all who knew not the Lord. “He uttered his voice, the earth melted.” With no other instrumentality than a word the Lord ruled the storm. He gave forth a voice, and stout hearts were dissolved, proud armies were annihilated, conquering powers were enfeebled. At first the confusion appeared to be worse confounded, when the element of divine power came into view; the very earth seemed turned to wax, the most solid and substantial of human things melted like the fat of rams upon the altar; but anon peace followed, the rage of man subsided, hearts capable of repentance relented, and the implacable were silenced. How mighty is a word from God! How mighty the Incarnate Word! O that such a word would come from the excellent glory even now to melt all hearts in love to Jesus, and to end forever all the persecutions, wars, and rebellions of human beings! — Spurgeon.

NOTES ON PSALM 47

This psalm is entitled, “To the chief Musician, a psalm for (margin, of) the sons of Korah.” On the phrase “To the chief Musician,” see the notes at the title to Psalm 4. On the phrase “For the sons of Korah,” see the notes at the title to Psalm 42.

The occasion on which the psalm was composed, and the name of the author, are alike unknown. It is a triumphal psalm, and was composed apparently on some occasion of “victory” over enemies, with reference to a triumphal procession. Professor Alexander supposes that it was composed to commemorate the victory of Jehoshaphat over the Ammonites and Edomites, recorded in 2 Chronicles 20. It is, as he remarks, a coincidence of some importance, that there is express mention made of the presence of the “Kohattlites” on that occasion, as among those who “stood up to praise the Lord,” <sup><1409></sup>2 Chronicles 20:19. This is not, however, decisive, as they might have been present on other similar occasions, and as it is probable, in fact, that they usually took part in celebrations of this kind. All that can be expressed with any certainty in regard to the occasion on which the psalm was composed is, that it was on an occasion of victory.

The psalm consists of two parts, quite similar in structure and in design. Each part consists of an exhortation to praise God, followed by a statement of reasons why, it should be done.

I. The first part comprises the first five verses:

(1) An exhortation to praise God — to celebrate the joy of the soul by a clapping of hands, and by a shout of triumph, <sup><1401></sup>Psalm 47:1.

(2) Reasons for doing this, <sup><1402></sup>Psalm 47:2-5. These reasons are that he is terrible; that he is king over all the earth; that he will subdue the nations, and make them subject to his own people; and that, in anticipation of this, and in proof of this, he had now achieved a signal victory, and had gone up as from that victory to his own abode in heaven.

II. The second part embraces the Last four verses of the psalm:

(1) An exhortation, as before, to praise God, <sup><1406></sup>Psalm 47:6.

(2) Reasons for this, <sup><1947></sup>Psalm 47:7-9. These reasons are, as before, that God is king over all the earth; that he now sits upon the throne of his holiness, and that (<sup><1947></sup>Psalm 47:9) the princes of the nations — the subdued kings and rulers — are borne along in triumph to the people of the God of Abraham; and that in this victory it has been shown that the shields of the earth belong to God. See the notes at <sup><1947></sup>Psalm 47:9.

The psalm, therefore, is a triumphal ode, and was probably composed to be sung on occasion of some military triumph — some solemn procession on a return from battle, with captive princes marching in the procession, and with a display of the “shields” and other implements of war taken from the foe. All this is celebrated as indicative of the interposing power of God in victory, and as evidence of his purpose to protect his chosen people in time of peril. The psalm may yet be used in a higher sense by the church at large, when all the foes of God on earth shall be subdued, and when his kingdom shall be in fact set up over all the world.

Shout unto God Make a joyful noise in praise of God; that is, in acknowledgment that this victory has been gained by his interposition.

Is terrible literally, is to be feared; that is, revered and adored. There is an idea in the words “terrible” and “terror” which is not contained in the original, as if there were something harsh, severe, stern, in his character.

The word in the original does not go beyond the notion of inspiring reverence or awe, and is the common word by which the worship of God is designated in the Scriptures. The meaning is, that he is worthy of profound reverence or adoration.

He is a great king over all the earth He rules the world. He is a universal Sovereign. The immediate “occasion” of saying this, when the psalm was composed, was evidently some victory (which had been achieved over the enemies of the people of God) so decided, and so immediately by the divine power, as to prove that he has absolute control over all nations.

Psalm 47:3. He shall subdue the people under us Compare the notes at Psalm 18:39,47. The word rendered “subdue” is that which commonly means” to speak.” The idea in the use of this word here is that he has only to speak and it is done (compare Psalm 33:9), or that he could do it by a word. Compare, however, on the use of the word here, Gesenius (Lexicon), on the word — rbā<sup>h1696</sup>, 2, Hiphil.

And the nations under our feet That is, they shall be entirely or effectually subdued. See the notes at Psalm 7:5; 44:5. As God would enable them to do this, it was an occasion for thankfulness and triumph.

Psalm 47:4. He shall choose our inheritance for us He has chosen or selected the land which we inherit. Of all the countries which compose the world, he has chosen “this” to be the inheritance of his own people, or the place where they should dwell. The thought in this verse is based on the idea so common in the writings of the Hebrews, that their country was the glory of all lands — the place of all on earth most desirable to dwell in. It is in view of this fact that they are here called on to praise God, and to rejoice in him.

The excellency of Jacob literally, “the pride — wəg<sup>h1347</sup> — of Jacob.” Septuagint, “beauty” — καλλονη<sup><2570></sup>. So the Vulgate, “speciem.” The meaning is, that it was a land of which Jacob, the ancestor of the people, might be proud, or which he did boast of. It was ever regarded as an honor among the Jews that they dwelt in a land which had been the abode of the prophets; and especially was anything regarded as of value that could be traced to Jacob; that had been once in his possession; or that could be regarded as his gift. Compare John 4:12.

whom he loved As one of the patriarchs. Perhaps special allusion is here made to “Jacob” rather than to Abraham and Isaac, because the land came actually into the possession of the Hebrew people in the time of Jacob’s sons. It was divided among the descendants of his sons, the twelve tribes, bearing their names; and thus Jacob was most naturally referred to as having been in possession of the land. Abraham and Isaac dwelt in the land as strangers and pilgrims (<sup><8100></sup>Hebrews 11:9,10,13), having no possession there, not even of a burying-place except as they purchased it (compare <sup><1212></sup>Genesis 23:12-16); and the land actually came into the possession of the nation only in the family of Jacob.

<sup><9476></sup>Psalm 47:5. God is gone up with a shout That is, he has ascended to heaven, his home and throne, after having secured the victory. He is represented as having come down to aid his people in the war by the overthrow of their enemies, and (having accomplished this) as returning to heaven, accompanied by his hosts, and amidst the shouts of triumph. All this is, of course, poetical, and is not to be regarded as literal in any sense. Compare the notes at <sup><4900></sup>Psalm 7:7.

The LORD with the sound of a trumpet Yahweh, accompanied with the notes of victory. All this is designed to denote triumph, and to show that the victory was to be traced solely to God.

<sup><9476></sup>Psalm 47:6. Sing praises to God, sing praises This commences the “second” part of the psalm. The “repetition” shows that the heart was full, or was overflowing with joy. It is a call on all to celebrate the praises of God, especially as he had enabled his people to triumph over their enemies.

Sing praises unto our King Unto God, who has shown himself to be the King of his people — one who rules in their behalf, and who has interposed for their deliverance in danger.

<sup><9476></sup>Psalm 47:7. For God is the King of all the earth He has shown himself to be a universal sovereign. All nations are subject to him, and he has a claim to universal praise.

Sing ye praises with understanding Margin, Every one “that hath understanding.” Neither the text here, however, nor the margin, expresses the true idea of the original. The Hebrew is, “Sing a Maschil” — l kē<sup><7919></sup>; that is, Sing, or play, a didactic psalm or tune; that is, a song or ode adapted to convey valuable lessons of instruction. See the word explained in the notes at the title to Psalm 32. The idea is, that the occasion was one on which “such” a psalm or song would be especially appropriate; an occasion on which great lessons or truths had been taught by the dealings of God, which it became his people now to set forth in a becoming manner. Those lessons or truths pertained to the fact that God is the great King over all the earth, or that he is a sovereign among the nations: a truth of immense importance to mankind, and a truth which the occasion on which the psalm was composed was especially adapted to bring to view.

Psalm 47:8. God reigneth over the heathen Over the “nations;” not over the “heathen” in the sense in which that term is understood now. It does not mean that God reigns, or that he has set up his throne over the people that have not the true religion, but that he is exalted over the “nations” of the earth as such; or, that he has universal dominion. See the notes at Psalm 46:10.

God sitteth upon the throne of his holiness Upon his holy throne, The idea is, that his government is established in holiness or justice.

Psalm 47:9. The princes of the people are gathered together The marginal reading is, “The voluntary of the people are gathered unto the people of the God of Abraham.” The word rendered “princes” — bydh<sup>+5081</sup> — means properly, voluntary, ready, prompt; then, generous, liberal; then, those of noble birth, princes, nobles. It is evidently used here in this latter sense. The word “people” here may mean either the people of Israel, or the people of other lands; but in this place it seems evidently to denote the latter. The words “are gathered together” may refer either to a voluntary or an involuntary assembling; meaning either that they came in chains as prisoners of war, subdued by the arms of the people of God, and thus rendering an involuntary tribute to their power and their religion; or that they came in a voluntary manner, and submitted themselves, acknowledging the God of Israel to be the true God. It seems to me that the connection requires that we should understand this in the former sense, as referring to the subjugation of the enemies of of the people of God, and to their being led along as captives, assembled thus from distant parts of the world as proof that the God of Israel reigned.

Even the people of the God of Abraham The word “even” is not in the original. The meaning is, “to” the people of the God of Abraham; that is, they come and mingle with the people of the God of Abraham; or, they come as captives in war “to” that people, and confess in this manner that their God is the true God. The image is that of the assemblage of great numbers of foreign princes and nobles as furnishing either a voluntary or involuntary acknowledgment of the fact that the God of Abraham was the true God, and that the people of Israel were his people.

For the shields of the earth belong unto God Are of right his. This would seem to have been suggested by the marching in triumph of subdued and vanquished princes and warriors, their shields or weapons of war being borne along in the procession, demonstrating that Jehovah was King among the nations. It was seen in such a march that all those weapons of war “belonged” to him, or that he had a right to dispose of them, and to use them as he pleased.

He is greatly exalted That is, one who can thus subdue nations, and lead along captive princes and warriors, “must” be a Being greatly exalted; a Being that has dominion over the nations of the earth. This completes the imagery in the psalm, and gives occasion for the shouts and the joys of triumph. God had shown that he was a great King over the earth. Princes and armies were subdued to his will. They were led along as captives, and were gathered together to the people of God, as if to acknowledge their own inferiority; and in this solemn manner the nations thus subdued owned Yahweh to be the true God. In a higher sense this will be true when all the earth shall be subdued by the power of truth, and when kings, and princes, and people everywhere shall come and acknowledge God, reigning through the Messiah, to be the King of all nations. Compare Isaiah 60.

APPENDIX NOTES ON PSALM 47

The occasion of the psalm was, according to <sup><197B></sup>Psalm 47:3, an overthrow of several pagan peoples, accomplished by the visible interposition of God, who had leagued themselves against Israel, and who, according to <sup><197A></sup>Psalm 47:4, had set out with the purpose of expelling Israel from his land. The only thing that suggests itself as a fit reference is the victory of Jehoshaphat over the combined Moabites, Ammonites, Edomites, and Arabians, in 2 Chronicles 20. Several nations were then united against Israel; they were set upon nothing less than driving Israel wholly out of his land, compare <sup><197B></sup>2 Chronicles 20:11; the overthrow of the enemies followed under circumstances which caused the hand of God to be clearly discerned. Surprised by an attack in the rear from a host of freebooting sons of the wilderness, the enemies fled in a panic, and as the spirit of mistrust fell upon them, and each people thought itself betrayed by the other, they turned their arms one against another. So Israel obtained a victory without a battle. The reference to that event is favored by the circumstance that then, according to <sup><4409></sup>2 Chronicles 20:19, the Korahites are expressly mentioned as having been present in the army; that the immediately following psalm refers to the same event, as also Psalm 83 (these three psalms perfectly suffice for a defense of 2 Chronicles 20 against the attacks of modern criticism); finally, that on this supposition we obtain a suitable situation for <sup><4975></sup>Psalm 47:5, from <sup><4406></sup>2 Chronicles 20:26,

Before the people left the field of slaughter, to return back to Jerusalem, they held a solemn service in that valley of praise: from that valley God made, as it were, his ascent to heaven, after having achieved redemption for his people. As the army returned into the holy city, so the leader of the host returned to heaven. This psalm was sung in the valley of praise, as the following one in the service of the temple. So Hengstenberg. But whatever the occasion of the psalm, there can be no doubt that these carnal conquests were but shadows of the victories of the Messiah and the future triumphs of the church. “The psalm, says Calvin, “chiefly magnifies the favor which, according to the state of things at that time, God had graciously vouchsafed to the offspring of Abraham: and salvation to the whole world was to proceed from this source. It however, contains at the same time a prophecy of the future kingdom of Christ. It teaches that the glory which then shone under the figure of the material sanctuary will diffuse its splendor far and wide; when God himself will cause the beams of his grace to shine into distant lands, that kings and nations may be united into fellowship with the children of Abraham.”

<sup><4971></sup>Psalm 47:1. O clap your hands, all ye peoples As the psalmist requires the nations, in token of their joy and of their thanksgiving to God, to clap their hands, or rather exhorts them to a more than ordinary joy, the vehemence of which breaks forth, and manifests itself by external expressions, it is certain that he is here speaking of the deliverance which God had performed for them. Had God erected among the Gentiles some formidable kingdom, this would rather have deprived all of their courage, and overwhelmed them with despair, than given them matter to sing and leap for joy. Besides, the inspired writer does not here treat of some common or ordinary blessings of God; but of such blessings as will fill the whole world with incredible joy, and stir up the minds of all people to celebrate the praises of God. What he adds a little after, that all nations were brought into subjection to Israel, must therefore be necessarily understood not of slavish subjection, but of a subjection which is more excellent and more to be desired than all the kingdoms of the world. It would be unnatural for those who are subdued and brought to submit by force and fear to leap for joy. Many nations were tributary to David, and to his son Solomon; but while they were so, they ceased not at the same time to complain, and bore impatiently the yoke which was imposed upon them, so far were they from giving thanks to God with joyful and cheerful hearts. — Calvin.

☞ Psalm 47:5. God is gone up with a shout There is here an allusion to the ancient ceremony which was observed under the law. As the sound of trumpets was accustomed to be used in solemnizing the holy assemblies, the prophet says that God goes up, when the trumpets encourage and stir up the people to magnify and extol his power. When this ceremony was performed in old time, it was just as if a king, making his entrance among his subjects, presented himself to them in magnificent attire and great splendor, by which he gained their admiration and reverence. At the same time the sacred writer, under that shadowy ceremony, doubtless intended to lead us to consider another kind of going up more triumphant — that of Christ when he “ascended up far above all heavens,” and obtained the empire of the whole world, and armed with his celestial power, subdued all pride and loftiness. You must remember what I have adverted to before, that the name Yahweh is here applied to the ark, for although the essence or majesty of God was not shut up in it, nor his power and operation fixed to it, yet it was not a vain and idle symbol of his presence. God had promised that he would dwell in the midst of the people so long as the Jews worshipped him according to the rule which he had prescribed in the law; and he actually showed that he was truly present with them, and that it was not in vain that he was called upon among them. What is here stated, however, applies more properly to the manifestation of the glory which at length shone forth in the person of Christ. In short, the import of the psalmist’s language is, When the trumpets sounded among the Jews, according to the appointment of the law, that was not a mere empty sound which vanished away in air, for God, who intended the ark of the covenant to be a pledge and token of his presence, truly presided in that assembly. From this the prophet draws an argument for enforcing on the faithful the duty of “singing praises to God.” He argues that by engaging in this exercise they will not be acting blindly, or at random, as the superstitious, who, having no certainty in their false systems of religion, lament and howl in vain before their idols. He shows that the faithful have just ground for celebrating with their mouths and with a cheerful heart the praises of God; since they certainly know that he is as present with them as if he had visibly established his royal throne among them. — Calvin.

NOTES ON PSALM 48

The title of the psalm is, “A song and psalm for the sons of Korah.” The “two” appellations, “song” and “psalm,” would seem to imply that it was intended to “combine” what was implied in both these words; that is, that it embraced what was usually understood by the word “psalm,” and that it was intended also specifically to be “sung.” Compare the notes at the titles to Psalm 3; 18; 30: In Psalm 30 the two are combined as they are here. On the phrase “For the sons of Korah,” see the notes at the title to Psalm 42.

The “occasion” on which the psalm was composed cannot be ascertained. Prof. Alexander and some others suppose that it was composed on the same occasion, or with reference to the same event, as the previous psalm — the overthrow of the enemies of Judah, under Jehoshaphat, 2 Chronicles 20. Others, as DeWette, suppose that it was on occasion of the overthrow of the army of Sennacherib, <sup><1298></sup>2 Kings 19:35. The circumstances of the case best agree with the former of these suppositions, though it is not possible to ascertain this with absolute precision.

The contents of the psalm are as follows:

I. An ascription of praise to God, especially as dwelling in a city which was for its beauty and strength an appropriate dwelling-place of such a God, <sup><981></sup>Psalm 48:1-3. The psalmist “begins” with a statement that God is worthy to be praised, (<sup><981></sup>Psalm 48:1); he then, in the same verse, refers to the abode of God, the city where he dwelt, as a holy mountain; he describes the beauty of that city (<sup><981></sup>Psalm 48:2); and he then adverts to the fact that God is “known in her palaces,” or that he dwells in that city as its protector. Its beauty, and its security in having God as a dweller there, are the first things to which the attention is directed.

II. A reference to the danger of the city on the occasion referred to, and the fact and the manner of its deliverance, <sup><980></sup>Psalm 48:4-7. The psalmist represents the “kings” as assembling with a view to take it, but as being awe-struck with its appearance and as hastening away in consternation, — driven away as the ships of Tarshish are broken with an east wind.

III. The psalmist sees in these events a confirmation of what had been before affirmed of Jerusalem, that it would stand forever, or that God would be its protector, <sup><988></sup>Psalm 48:8-10. There were on this subject ancient records, the truth of which the present event confirmed (<sup><988></sup>Psalm 48:8), and the psalmist says (<sup><989></sup>Psalm 48:9) that those records were now called to remembrance, and (<sup><990></sup>Psalm 48:10) that the effect would be that the name of God would be made known to the ends of the earth.

IV. A call on Jerusalem to rejoice, and a call on all persons to walk around and see the matchless beauty and strength of the city thus favored by God, <sup><991></sup>Psalm 48:11-14. Its towers, its bulwarks, its palaces, were all such as to show its strength; the certainty of its permanence was such that one generation should proclaim it to another. God's interposition had been such as to furnish proof that he would be their God forever and ever, and that even unto death he would be the guide of those that trusted Him.

<sup><992></sup>Psalm 48:1. Great is the LORD That is, he is high and exalted; he is a Being of great power and glory. He is not weak and feeble, like the idols worshipped by other nations. He is able to defend his people; he has shown his great power in overthrowing the mighty forces that were gathered together against the city where he dwells.

And greatly to be praised Worthy to be praised. In his own nature, he is worthy of adoration; in interposing to save the city from its foes, he has shown that he is worthy of exalted praise.

In the city of our God Jerusalem. In the city which he has chosen for his abode, and where his worship is celebrated. See the notes at <sup><993></sup>Psalm 46:4. This praise was especially appropriate there:

(a) because it was a place set apart for his worship;

(b) because he had now interposed to save it from threatened ruin.

In the mountain of his holiness His holy mountain; either Mount Zion, if the psalm was composed before the building of the temple — or more probably here Mount Moriah, on which the temple was reared. The names Zion, and Mount Zion, however, were sometimes given to the entire city. Compare the notes at <sup><994></sup>Isaiah 2:2,3.

<sup><995></sup>Psalm 48:2. Beautiful for situation The word rendered "situation" — <sup><996></sup>āwō — means properly "elevation, height," (Ges. Lexicon); and the idea here is, that the mountain referred to is "beautiful for elevation;" that is, it rises gracefully. The allusion here is to Jerusalem as it would appear to one approaching it, and especially as it appeared to the “kings” (~~1981~~ Psalm 48:4) who came to invest it, and who were so impressed with its marvelous beauty and strength, that they were afraid to attack it, and turned away (~~1985~~ Psalm 48:5).

The joy of the whole earth Either the whole “land” of Palestine, or the whole world. Most probably the former is the meaning; and the idea is that, as a place of beauty and strength, and as a place where the worship of God was celebrated, and where the people of the land were accustomed to assemble, it was a source of national joy.

Is Mount Zion The term used here would seem to denote the whole city, Jerusalem, as it often does. Mount Zion was the most conspicuous object in the city, the residence of the king, and for a long time, until the temple was built, the place where the ark reposed, and where the worship of God was celebrated, and hence, the term came to be used to denote the whole city.

On the sides of the north That is, probably, the houses, the palaces, on the north sides of the Mount Zion. These were eminently beautiful; they struck one in approaching the city from that quarter, as impressive and grand. The natural and usual approach to the city was from the north, or the northwest. On the west was the valley of Gihon, on the south the valley of Hinnom; and on the east the valley of Jehoshaphat and of the brook Kidron; and it was only as the city was approached from the north that there would be a complete view of it; or, that was the only quarter from which it could be assailed. The “kings,” therefore (~~1988~~ Psalm 48:8), may be supposed to have approached it from that quarter; and thus approaching it, they would have a clear and impressive view of its beauty, and of the sources of its strength — of the walls, towers, and bulwarks which defended it, and of the magnificence of the buildings on Mount Zion. Dr. Thomson (Land and the Book, vol. ii., p. 476), says of the situation of Mount Zion, “What is there or was there about Zion to justify the high eulogium of David: “Beautiful for situation, the joy of the whole earth, is Mount Zion, on the sides of the north, the city of the great King?” The situation is indeed eminently adapted to be the platform of a magnificent citadel. Rising high above the deep valley of Gihon and Hinnom on the west and south, and the scarcely less deep one of the Cheesemongers on the east, it could only be assailed from the northwest; and then “on the sides of the north” it was magnificently beautiful, and fortified by walls, towers, and bulwarks, the wonder and terror of the nations:

“For the kings were assembled; they passed by together. They saw it, and so they marveled; they were troubled, and hasted away.”

At the thought of it the royal psalmist again bursts forth in triumph: “Walk about Zion, and go round about her; tell the towers thereof; mark ye well her bulwarks; consider her palaces, that ye may tell it to the generation following.” Alas! her towers have long since fallen to the ground, her bulwarks have been overthrown, her palaces have crumbled to dust, and we who now walk about Zion can tell no other story than this to the generation following.” It was actually on the northern side of Mount Zion that most of the edifices of the city were erected. (Reland, Pales., p. 847.)

The city of the great King That is, of God; the place where he has taken up his abode. Compare the notes at <sup><940></sup>Psalm 46:4.

<sup><983></sup>Psalm 48:3. God is known in her palaces The word rendered “palaces” here means properly a fortress, castle, or palace, so called from its height, from a verb, præ, meaning to elevate, to lift up. It may be applied to any fortified place, and would be particularly applicable to a royal residence, as a castle or stronghold. The word “known” here means that it was well understood, or that the point had been fully tested and determined that God had chosen those abodes as his special residence — as the place where he might be found.

For a refuge See the notes at <sup><940></sup>Psalm 46:1. That is, there was safety or security in the God who had chosen Jerusalem as his special abode.

<sup><983></sup>Psalm 48:4. For, lo, the kings were assembled There is evidently allusion here to some fact that had occurred; some gathering together of kings and their armies, with a view to besiege or attack Jerusalem. The kings referred to, if the allusion here is, as is supposed, to the time of Jehoshaphat, were the kings of Ammon and of Moab, and of Mount Seir, and perhaps others, not particularly mentioned, who came up against Jehoshaphat, <sup><410></sup>2 Chronicles 20:1,10.

They passed by together That is, they were smitten with consternation; they were so impressed with the beauty, the majesty, the strength of the city, that they passed along without venturing to attack it. Or, perhaps, the meaning may be, that they were discomfited and overthrown as suddenly “as if” the mere sight of the city had filled their minds with dread, and had made them desist from their intended assault. Compare <sup><402></sup>2 Chronicles 20:22-25.

<sup><485></sup>Psalm 48:5. They saw it That is, they looked on it; they contemplated it; they were struck with its beauty and strength, and fled.

And so they marveled It surpassed their expectations of its strength, and they saw with wonder that any attempt to conquer it was hopeless.

They were troubled They were filled with anxiety and confusion. They even began to have apprehensions about their own safety. They saw that their preparations had been made in vain, and that all hopes of success must be abandoned.

And hasted away They fled in confusion. The idea in the whole verse is that of a “panic,” leading to a disorderly flight. This “may” have occurred in the time of Jehoshaphat (2 Chronicles 20), when the kings of Moab, Edom, and others, came up to attack Jerusalem, though the immediate cause of their overthrow was a conflict among themselves (<sup><402></sup>2 Chronicles 20:22-25). It may have been, however, that they approached the city, and were dismayed by its strength, so that they turned away before the internal conflict occurred which ended in their ruin. But it is not “necessary” to adjust these accounts one to another, or even to suppose that this was the event referred to in the psalm, though the general ideas in it accord well with all which occurred on that occasion.

<sup><486></sup>Psalm 48:6. Fear took hold upon them there Trembling seized them; they were filled with sudden consternation. That is, as soon as they saw the city, or had a distinct view of it, they became alarmed.

And pain Distress; anguish. The distress arising from disappointed hopes, and perhaps from the apprehension of their own safety. They were filled with dismay.

As of a woman in travail This comparison is often used in the Scriptures to denote the severest kind of pain. Compare <sup><408></sup>Jeremiah 4:31; 6:24; 13:21; 22:23; 30:6; 49:24; <sup><3049></sup>Micah 4:9,10; <sup><2511></sup>Isaiah 53:11.

may have been to illustrate the power of God; the ease with which he destroys that which man has made. The ships so strong — the ships made to navigate distant seas, and to encounter waves and storms — are broken to pieces with infinite ease when God causes the wind to sweep over the ocean. With so much ease God overthrows the most mighty armies, and scatters them. His power in the one case is strikingly illustrated by the other. It is not necessary, therefore, to suppose that there was any actual occurrence of this kind particularly in the eye of the psalmist; but it is an interesting fact that such a disaster did befall the navy of Jehoshaphat himself, <sup><1238></sup>1 Kings 22:48: “Jehoshaphat made “ships of Tarshish” to go to Ophir for gold; but they went not: “for the ships were broken” at Ezion-geber.” Compare <sup><406></sup>2 Chronicles 20:36,37. This coincidence would seem to render it not improbable that the discomfiture of the enemies of Jehoshaphat was particularly referred to in this psalm, and that the overthrow of his enemies when Jerusalem was threatened called to remembrance an important event in his own history, when the power of God was illustrated in a manner not less unexpected and remarkable. If this was the allusion, may not the reference to the “breaking of the ships of Tarshish” have been designed to show to Jehoshaphat, and to the dwellers in Zion, that they should not be proud and self-confident, by reminding them of the ease with which God had scattered and broken their own mighty navy, and by showing them that what he had done to their enemies he could do to them also, notwithstanding the strength of their city, and that their “real” defense was not in walls and bulwarks reared by human hand, anymore than it could be in the natural strength of their position only, but in God.

<sup><988></sup>Psalm 48:8. As we have heard, so have we seen That is, What has been told us, or handed down by tradition, in regard to the strength and safety of the city — what our fathers have told us respecting its sacredness and its being under the protection of God — we have found to be true. It has been shown that God is its protector; that he dwells in the midst of it; that it is safe from the assaults of man; that it is permanent and abiding. All that had ever been said of the city in this respect had been found, in this trial when the kings assembled against it, to be true.

In the city of the LORD of hosts The city where the Lord of hosts has taken up his abode, or which he has chosen for his dwelling-place on earth. See the notes at <sup><3024></sup>Isaiah 1:24; <sup><4940></sup>Psalm 24:10.

In the city of our God Of Him who has shown himself to be our God; the God of our nation.

God will establish it for ever That is, this had been told them; this is what they had heard from their fathers; this they now saw to be verified in the divine interposition in the time of danger. They had seen that these combined armies could not take the city; that God had mercifully interposed to scatter their forces; and they inferred that it could be taken by no human power, and that God intended that it should be permanent and abiding. What is here said of Jerusalem is true in a sense more strict and absolute of the Church — that nothing can prevail against it, but that it will endure to the end of the world. See the notes at <sup><4168></sup>Matthew 16:18.

<sup><4980></sup>Psalm 48:9. We have thought of thy loving-kindness, O God We have reflected on, or meditated on. The word used here literally means “to compare, to liken;” and this idea is perhaps always implied when it is used in the sense of thinking on, or meditating on. Perhaps the meaning here is, that they had “compared” in their own minds what they had heard from their fathers with what they had now seen; they had called all these things up to their remembrance, and had compared the one with the other.

In the midst of thy temple See the notes at <sup><4970></sup>Psalm 5:7. The allusion here most probably is to the “temple,” properly so called, as these transactions are supposed to have occurred after the building of the temple by Solomon. The expression here also would make it probable that the psalm was composed after the defeat and overthrow of the armies referred to, in order that it might be used in the temple in celebrating the deliverance.

<sup><4980></sup>Psalm 48:10. According to thy name, O God, so is thy praise That is, as far as thy name is known, it will be praised; or, the effect of knowing it will be to inspire praise. A just view of thy character and doings will lead people to praise thee as far as thy name is known. This seems to have been said in view of what had occurred. Events so remarkable, and so suited to show that God was a just, a powerful, and a merciful Being, would claim universal praise and adoration.

Unto the ends of the earth In every part of the world. The earth is frequently represented in the Scriptures as an extended plain, having ends, corners, or limits. See the notes at <sup><29112></sup>Isaiah 11:12; <sup><6170></sup>Revelation 7:1.

Thy right hand is full of righteousness The right hand is the instrument by which we accomplish anything. The idea here is, that in what God had done it seemed as if his hand — the instrument by which this had been accomplished — had been “filled” with justice. All that had been manifested had been righteousness, and that had been in abundance.

Psalm 48:11. Let mount Zion rejoice Let Jerusalem, the holy city, rejoice or be glad. Mount Zion is evidently used here to designate the city; and the idea is, that the city of God — the holy city — had occasion for joy and gladness in view of the manifestation of the divine favor.

Let the daughters of Judah be glad The phrase “daughters of Judah” “may” denote the smaller cities in the tribe of Judah, that surrounded Jerusalem as the “mother” city — in accordance with an usage quite common in the Hebrew Scriptures. See the notes at <sup><2008></sup>Isaiah 1:8. Perhaps, however, the more obvious interpretation is the correct one, as meaning that the women of Judah had special occasion to rejoice on account of their deliverance from so great danger, and from the horrors which usually attended the siege or the conquest of the city — the atrocities which commonly befall the female sex when a city is captured in war. The “daughters of Judah” are those descended from Judah, or connected with the tribe of Judah. Jerusalem was in the bounds of that tribe, and the name Judah was given to all those that remained after the removal of the ten tribes.

Because of thy judgments Thy righteous interposition in delivering the city and people.

Psalm 48:12. Walk about Zion This is a call on all persons to go round the city; to take a survey of it; to see how beautiful and how strong it was — how it had escaped all danger, and was uninjured by the attempt to destroy it — how capable it was of resisting an attack. The word “walk” here means simply to go around or surround. The other word used has a more direct reference to a solemn procession.

And go round about her The word used here — from <sup><4536></sup>āqā — to fasten together, to join together, means to move round in a circle, as if persons joined together (see the notes at <sup><18005></sup>Job 1:5), and would refer here properly to a solemn procession moving round the city, and taking a deliberate survey of its entire circuit.

Tell the towers thereof That is, Take the number of the towers. See how numerous they are; how firm they remain; what a defense and protection they constitute. Cities, surrounded by walls, had always “towers” or elevated portions as posts of observation, or as places from which missiles might be discharged with advantage on those who should attempt to scale the walls. Compare <sup><1104></sup>Genesis 11:4,5; <sup><409></sup>2 Chronicles 26:9,10; <sup><2125></sup>Isaiah 2:15.

<sup><983></sup>Psalm 48:13. Mark ye well her bulwarks Margin, as in Hebrew, “Set your heart to her bulwarks.” That is, Pay close attention to them; make the investigation with care, not as one does whose heart is not in the thing, and who does it negligently. The word rendered “bulwarks” — lyj e <sup><42426></sup> — means, properly, a host or army, and then a fortification or entrenchment, especially the “ditch” or “trench,” with the low wall or breastwork which surrounds it: <sup><1005></sup>2 Samuel 20:15; <sup><2301></sup>Isaiah 26:1. (Gesenius, Lexicon) The Septuagint translates it here: δυναμις <sup><1411></sup>, power; the Vulgate, “virtus,” courage; Luther, “Mauern” — walls.

Consider her palaces The word “palaces” here refers to the royal residences; and, as these were usually fortified and guarded, the expression here is equivalent to this: “Consider the “strength” of the city; its power to defend itself; its safety from the danger of being taken.” The word rendered “consider” — gspē <sup><16448></sup> — is rendered in the margin “raise up.” The word occurs nowhere else in the Bible. According to Gesenius (Lexicon), it means to “divide up;” that is, to walk through and survey them; or, to consider them accurately, or in detail, one by one. The Vulgate renders it “distribute;” the Septuagint, “take a distinct view of (Thompson);” Luther, “lift up.” The idea is, “examine attentively” or “carefully.”

That ye may tell it to the generation following That you may be able to give a correct account of it to the next age. The “object” of this is to inspire the next generation with a belief that God is the protector of the city; that it is so strong that it cannot be vanquished; that there is safety in such a city as that. As applied to the church now, or at any time, it means that we are to take such views of its being a true church of God; of its being fixed on firm foundations; of its being so able to resist all the assaults of Satan, and of its being so directly under the divine protection, that it has nothing to fear. It will and must stand to all coming time, a place of absolute safety to all who seek protection and safety within it. The following remarks of Dr. Thomson (Land and the Book, vol. ii., 474, 475), may furnish an illustration of what the ancient defenses in the city may have been, and especially of the word “towers” in this passage in the Psalms: “The only castle of any particular importance is that at the Jaffa Gate, commonly called the Tower of David. The lower part of it is built of huge stones, roughly cut, and with a deep “bevel” round the edges. They are undoubtedly ancient, but the interspersed patch-work proves that they are not in their original positions. I have been within it, and carefully explored all parts of it that are now accessible, but found nothing which could cast any light upon its history. It is believed by many to be the Hippicus of Josephus, and to this idea it owes its chief importance, for the historian makes that the point of departure in laying down the line of the ancient walls of Jerusalem. Volumes have been written in our day for and against the correctness of this identification, and the contest is still undecided; but, interesting as may be the result, we may safely leave it with those who are now conducting the controversy, and turn to matters more in unison with our particular inquiries. Everything that can be said about this grand old tower will be found in the voluminous works of Williams, Robinson, Schultz, Wilson, Fergusson, and other able writers on the topography of the Holy City.”

TOWER OF DAVID.

Psalm 48:14. For this God is our God forever and ever The God who has thus made his abode in the city, and who has manifested himself as its prorektor. It is our comfort to reflect that such a God is “our” God; that he has manifested himself as our friend; that we may habitually feel that he is our own. And he is not only our God now, but he will be such for ever and ever. A feeling that the true God is “our” God — that he is ours and that we are his — always carries with it the idea that this is to be “forever;” that what is true now in this respect, will be true to all eternity. He is not a God for the present only, but for all time to come; not merely for this world, but for that unending duration which awaits us beyond the tomb.

He will be our guide even unto death The Septuagint and the Vulgate render this “he will rule or govern (ποιμᾶνει <sup><4165></sup> — reget) forever.” The more correct rendering, however, is that in our version, which is a literal translation of the Hebrew. Some have translated it UPON death, I [æ <sup><482></sup> tWm <sup><4192></sup>]; others, BEYOND death; but the true idea is that he will be our guide, or will conduct us all along through life; that he will never forsake us until the close has come; that he will accompany us faithfully to the end. The thought does not, of course, “exclude” the idea that he will be our guide — our protector — our friend — beyond death; but it is simply that as long as we live on the earth, we may have the assurance that he will lead and guide us. This he will do in behalf of those who put their trust in him

- (a) by the counsels of His word;
- (b) by the influences of His Spirit;
- (c) by His providential interpositions;
- (d) by special help in special trials;
- (e) by shedding light upon our path when in perplexity and doubt; and
- (f) by support and direction when we tread that dark and to us unknown way which conducts to the grave.

Man needs nothing more for this life than the confident assurance that he has the Eternal God for his guide, and that he will never be left or forsaken by Him in any possible situation in which he may be placed. If God, by His own hand, will conduct me through this world, and lead me safely through the dark valley — that valley which lies at the end of every traveler’s path — I have nothing to fear beyond.

APPENDIX NOTES ON PSALM 48

Expositors take as the historical occasion of the psalm, either the victory of Jehoshaphat, or the deliverance from the Assyrians under Hezekiah. To the latter hypothesis it is to be objected,

1. That the discourse here is of many independent kings, who had leagued themselves in a common undertaking against Jerusalem. It is nothing to allege, on the other hand, the saying of the king of Assyria, in <sup><308></sup>Isaiah 10:8, “Are not all my princes kings?” For that here the discourse is not of such as possibly once were called kings, appears from d[<sup>43259</sup>] in <P804> Psalm 48:4, as also from the fact, that here it is always kings that are spoken of, never a king of kings. We never find it thus in the numerous passages which refer to the Assyrians.

2. That here the discourse is of troubled flight, not of utter destruction. On the other hand, everything is in perfect accordance with the victory of Jehoshaphat. Then in reality several kings were gathered together against Jerusalem. They came into the immediate neighborhood of the city, into the wilderness of Tekoa, which is certainly not further than a journey of three hours from Jerusalem, which commands an extensive prospect, and in particular of the environs of Jerusalem — compare Robinson, P. ii. p. 407 (upon the march of the Moabites and Ammonites, compare ib. p. 426). Their anxious and troubled flight is described quite similarly in the Chronicles. With: “We think, O Lord, on thy loving-kindness in the midst of thy temple,” in <P804> Psalm 48:9 here, which bespeaks the psalm to have been sung as a song of praise in the temple, as the preceding one on the field of slaughter, compare <4477> 2 Chronicles 20:27,

“All Judah and Jerusalem returned, and Jehoshaphat in the forefront of them, back to Jerusalem with joy: and they came to Jerusalem with harps, and cytharas, and trumpets to the house of the Lord.”

A special reference to Jehoshaphat’s time is also found in <P807> Psalm 48:7. The omnipotence with which the Lord destroys the enemies, is there placed beside that with which he breaks the ships of Tarshish. The occasion that gave rise to this comparison is recorded in <11249> 1 Kings 22:49; <4475> 2 Chronicles 20:36,37. Jehoshaphat had united with Ahaziah in getting ships of merchandise, but the ships were wrecked, rbæ<sup>17665</sup>. The internal connection between the two events was the greater, as in that annihilation of the ships of Tarshish there was discerned, according to 2 Chronicles, a judgment of God. — Hengstenberg.

The psalms we owe to the reign of Jehoshaphat are not many. Of only two are we quite certain: there may be perhaps four or five. Some think Psalm 46; 47 — both of them Korahite psalms — belong to the period. Certainly we owe to it Psalm 48; 83 — the former a Korahite psalm, the latter “a song or psalm of Asaph.” The character of these odes reminds us that it was a storm of danger that at this epoch awoke for a short time the harps of the Levitical seers. They make mention of an invasion which, as we learn from the historical books, for a while threatened to sweep away Jehoshaphat's throne, and even annihilate the kingdom. The nations bordering on Judah to the east and south, Moab, Ammon, Edom, entered into a coalition against it, and secured the alliance of several more distant powers. They invaded the land from the south, and marched without check until they reached the wilderness of Tekoa, within ten miles of Jerusalem, from where, looking northward, they could descry the battlements of the city, and the glittering pinnacles of the temple. In this extremity of danger Jehoshaphat and the people betook themselves to prayer. Having received, through one of the prophets, the promise of deliverance, king and people sallied forth in a solemn procession, in the van of which there marched a band of Levites, singing and praising the Lord. When they came in sight of the enemy, they found that God had sown mutual suspicions in the motley host, so that they had turned their swords against each other, and were utterly discomfited. It deserves to be remarked in connection with our subject, that the prophet by whom God's comfortable message was delivered to the king, was Jahaziel, the son of Zechariah, "a Levite of the sons of Asaph;" and that among the Levites who sang praise to the Lord, mention is made of a band "of the children of the Korahites," ~~1404~~2 Chronicles 20:14-19. It is an interesting and significant coincidence, that of the two psalms known to date from this epoch, one is marked in the superscription as an Asaph-psalm, and the other is assigned to "the sons of Korah." The Asaph-psalm is Psalm 83, and is the prayer of the congregation when the danger was at its height. It speaks of a confederation of "the tabernacles of Edom and the Ishmaelites; of Moab and the Hagarenes; Gebal, and Ammon, and Amalek;" and, among the more distant allies, mention is made of Tyre, and of Assyria itself. Their cry is, "Come, let us cut them off from being a nation; that the name of Israel may be no more in remembrance." The cry of Judah in response is toward heaven: "O my God, make them like a wheel;" or, as Milton translates the prayer:

*“My God; oh make them as a wheel,
No quiet let them find;
Giddy and restless let them reel,
Like stubble from the wind.*

*“As when an aged wood takes fire,
Which on a sudden strays,
The greedy flame runs higher and higher,
Till all the mountains blaze;*

*“So with thy whirlwind them pursue,
And with thy tempest chase.”*

Such was the prayer. The answer which God gave, in the flame of discord that consumed the confederate host, is celebrated by the sons of Korah in Psalm 48. — Binnie.

The Mighty One is King, has entered on his dominion, is seated on his throne, is ruling in righteousness. But where is his capital? It is at Jerusalem. Here he manifests himself; and by the glory of his presence being shed over that “City of the great King,” brighter than the light of seven days, yet far more mellow and tranquillizing than the sweetest hues of evening, Jerusalem becomes

“The joy of the whole earth, (The joy) of the sides of the north.”

She has become the joy of the earth, far and near, the source of joy to earth’s remotest bounds. Now is fulfilled <sup>2323</sup>Isaiah 24:23. Now is Jerusalem made “beautiful for situation,” or, set aloft on its hills in beauty, in another sense than formerly. Now is Zion exalted above the mountains, and obtains established pre-eminence above the hills. And if associations are needed to make the place completely interesting, these are not missing here. Such deeds have been done here, that Sennacherib’s overthrow is in a manner cast into the shade. The gathered kings of earth came up, “they passed” in all the pomp of battle, and the Lord scattered them; and writes here his “Veni, vidi, vici,” to all nations: “They saw! They marveled! They were troubled! They hasted away!” It was as when an east wind hurls the ships of Tarshish on the rocks. It comprised in it all that is recorded as wonderful in the achievements of former days; present events now come fully up to the measure of former good deeds, “As we have heard, so have we seen, in the city of the Lord of hosts.” The solemn Selah-pause occurs here; and then we look out on a peaceful scene, God known in all the earth, <sup><9810></sup>Psalm 48:10. “Thou art praised wherever thy name is known,” or rather, now at last thou art getting praise worthy of thy glorious name. Zion is glad, Judah’s tears are wiped away, while a voice invites all men to come and survey the bulwarks of the city of the great King, that they may tell it from age to age. The bulwarks are strong, for the Lord’s presence, Jehovah Shammah, is the wall of fire, on whose battlements the happy citizens walk in security, singing,

“This God is our God forever and ever. He is our God even over death” (Tholuck: “even beyond death”).— A. A. Bonar

<sup><9810></sup>Psalm 48:4-6. Lo, the kings were assembled ... Neither the multitude nor the greatness of the church’s foes need alarm her friends. People can do nothing but play the fool and the coward, if God be against them. “As the east wind shatters the ships of Tarshish, so the divine power strikes terror and astonishment” into the hearts of sinners. All the imaginations that fill the minds of the foes of God and of truth will vanish like the mist of morning. Montgomery beautifully versifies a part of this ode:

*“At the sight of her splendor the kings of the earth
Grew pale with amazement and dread;
Fear seized them like pangs of a premature birth;
They came, they beheld her; and fled.*

*Thou breakest the ships from the sea-circled clime
When the storm of thy jealousy lowers:
As our fathers have told of thy deeds in their time,
So, Lord, have we witnessed in ours.”*

Dickson:

“Such as come to bring trouble to God’s church come to catch trouble to themselves.” — Plumer.

NOTES ON PSALM 49

The title to this psalm is the same essentially as the title to Psalm 42; 44; 45; 46; 47. On the meaning of the terms occurring in the title, see the notes at the title to Psalm 42.

The “author” of the psalm is unknown. There is no evidence that it was composed by David; and, in fact, the presumption is that he was not the author, as his name is not prefixed to it.

It is, of course, impossible to ascertain the “occasion” on which it was composed. It would seem from the psalm itself (see the notes at ~~1945~~ Psalm 49:5) that it was written in view of some evil or wrong which the author was suffering from rich oppressors, and that he sought consolation in his trials from the reflections which he makes in the psalm — to wit, from the fact that wealth constitutes no security — that it gives no permanence to the projects of its owners and that it really possesses no “power” in carrying out the plans of those who abuse it to purposes of oppression and wrong. The wealthy man, no matter how great his possessions may be, cannot redeem a brother from the grave; he cannot save himself from the tomb; he cannot make his possessions permanent in his family; he cannot take his riches with him when he dies. There is really, therefore, nothing to “fear” from the man of wealth, for whatever such a man can do must be temporary. The higher interests of the soul cannot be affected permanently by anything so uncertain and transitory as riches. It is not improbable that this train of thought was suggested by an actual occurrence in the life of the psalmist, whoever he was; but the reflections are of universal importance in regard to riches considered as a means of power, and to their real value as it respects the great interests of man.

The contents of the psalm are as follows:

I. An introduction, calling attention to the general subject as worthy of the consideration of all classes of persons, both low and high; as conveying lessons of wisdom; and as being the result of much reflection, ~~1941~~ Psalm 49:1-4.

II. The main subject in the psalm, or the point to be illustrated; to wit,

“that the righteous have no reason to be afraid when rich oppressors compass them around; or when the rich oppress and wrong them,” <sup><1905></sup>Psalm 49:5.

III. Reasons for this; or, reasons why those who are possessed of wealth, and who glory in the self-importance derived from wealth, should not be feared, <sup><1906></sup>Psalm 49:6-20.

(1) No one can by his riches save another — not even his own brother — from the grave, for all (whatever may be their condition) must die, and leave their wealth to others, <sup><1906></sup>Psalm 49:6-10.

(2) They cannot, by any wisdom or skill make their possessions “permanent,” or secure, <sup><1901></sup>Psalm 49:11,12.

(3) They will not learn wisdom on this subject from the experience of the past, but the coming generation is as foolish as the one that went before, <sup><1903></sup>Psalm 49:13.

(4) All must go down to the grave, however rich they may be, <sup><1904></sup>Psalm 49:14.

(5) There is a better hope for the righteous, and though he goes down to the grave, he will live hereafter, <sup><1905></sup>Psalm 49:15.

(6) The rich can carry none of their wealth with them when they go to the grave. All must be left behind, and pass into the hands of others, <sup><1906></sup>Psalm 49:16-20. The conclusion from the whole, therefore, is, that we should not be “afraid” when one is made rich — when the glory of his house is increased, for the possession of wealth by another, though an enemy, gives him no such permanent power as to make him an object of dread. In our real, our highest interests, we must be safe, whatever the rich oppressor may do.

Give ear Incline your ear; attend. Compare the notes at <sup><1976></sup>Psalm 17:6. See also <sup><2377></sup>Isaiah 37:17; 55:3; <sup><2108></sup>Daniel 9:18; <sup><2102></sup>Proverbs 2:2.

All ye inhabitants of the world The truth to be declared does not pertain exclusively to any one nation, or any one class of people. All are interested in it. The term here rendered “world” — dl j, <sup><h2465></sup>, — means properly “duration of life, lifetime;” then, “life, time, age;” and then it comes to denote the world, considered as made up of the living, or the passing generations.

<sup><948></sup>Psalm 49:2. Both low and high Those alike of humble and those of exalted rank, for it pertains equally to all. On the meaning of the “terms” employed here, see the notes at <sup><2319></sup>Isaiah 2:9. These truths pertained to the “low;” that is, to those of humble rank, as teaching them not to envy the rich, and not to fear their power; and they pertained to those of exalted rank, as teaching them not to trust in their riches, and not to suppose that they could permanently possess and enjoy them.

Rich and poor together As equally interested in these truths; that is, What the psalmist was about to say was adapted to impart useful lessons to both classes. Both needed instruction on the subject; and the same class of truths was adapted to furnish that instruction. The class of truths referred to was derived from the powerlessness of wealth in regard to the things of most importance to man, and from the fact that all which a man can gain must soon be left: teaching those of one class that they should not set their heart on wealth, and should not pride themselves on possessing it, and teaching the other class that they should not envy or fear the possessor of riches.

<sup><948></sup>Psalm 49:3. My mouth shall speak of wisdom That is, I will utter sentiments that are wise, or that are of importance to all; sentiments that will enable all to take a just view of the subject on which I speak. This indicates “confidence” in what he was about to utter, as being eminently deserving of attention.

And the meditation of my heart shall be of understanding What I reflect on, and what I give utterance to, in the matter under consideration. The idea is, that he had meditated on the subject, as to what was real wisdom in the matter, and that he would now give utterance to the result of his meditations. It was not wisdom in general, or intelligence or understanding as such on which he designed to express the results of his thoughts, but it was only in respect to the proper value to be attached to wealth, and as to the fact of its causing fear (<sup><948></sup>Psalm 49:5) in those who were not possessed of it, and who might be subjected to the oppressive acts of those who were rich.

Psalm 49:4. I will incline mine ear to a parable The phrase “I will incline mine ear” means that he would listen or attend to — as we incline our ear toward those whom we are anxious to hear, or in the direction from which a sound seems to come. Compare <sup><1911></sup>Psalm 5:1; 17:1; 39:12; <sup><2302></sup>Isaiah 1:2. On the word rendered “parable” here l vm,<sup><4912></sup> — see the notes at <sup><2344></sup>Isaiah 14:4. Compare the notes at <sup><1832></sup>Job 13:12; 27:1. The word properly means similitude; then, a sentence, sententious saying, apophthegm; then, a proverb; then, a song or poem. There is usually found in the word some idea of “comparison,” and hence, usually something that is to be illustrated “by” a comparison or a story. The reference here would seem to be to some dark or obscure subject which needed to be illustrated; which it was not easy to understand; which had given the writer, as well as others, perplexity and difficulty. He proposed now, with a view to understand and explain it, to place his ear, as it were, “close to the matter,” that he might clearly comprehend it. The matter was difficult, but he felt assured he could explain it — as when one unfolds the meaning of an enigma. The “problem” — the “parable” — the difficult point — related to the right use, or the proper value, of wealth, or the estimate in which it should be held by those who possessed it, and by those who did not. It was very evident to the author of the psalm that the views of people were not right on the subject; he therefore proposed to examine the matter carefully, and to state the exact truth.

I will open I will explain; I will communicate the result of my careful inquiries.

Upon the harp On the meaning of the word used here, see the notes at <sup><382></sup>Isaiah 5:12. The idea here is, that he would accompany the explanation with music, or would so express it that it might be accompanied with music; that is, he would give it a poetic form — a form such that the sentiment might be used in public worship, and might be impressed upon the mind by all the force and power which music would impart. Sentiments of purity and truth, and sentiments of pollution and falsehood also, are always most deeply imbedded in the minds of people, and are made most enduring and effective, when they are connected with music. Thus the sentiments of patriotism are perpetuated and impressed in song; and thus sentiments of sensuality and pollution owe much of their permanence and power to the fact that they are expressed in corrupt verse, and that they are perpetuated in exquisite poetry, and are accompanied with song. Scenes of revelry, as well as acts of devotion, are kept up by song. Religion proposes to take advantage of this principle in our nature by connecting the sentiments of piety with the sweetness of verse, and by impressing and perpetuating those sentiments through associating them with all that is tender, pure, and inspiring in music. Hence, music, both vocal and that which is produced by instruments, has always been found to be an invaluable auxiliary in securing the proper impression of truth on the minds of people, as well as in giving utterance to the sentiments of piety in devotion.

<sup><385></sup>Psalm 49:5. Wherefore should I fear in the days of evil This verse is designed evidently to state the main subject of the psalm; the result of the reflections of the author on what had been to him a source of perplexity; on what had seemed to him to be a dark problem. He “had” evidently felt that there was occasion to dread the power of wicked rich men; but he now felt that he had no ground for that fear and alarm. He saw that their power was short-lived; that all the ability to injure, arising from their station and wealth, must soon cease; that his own highest interests could not be affected by anything which they could do. The “days of evil” here spoken of are the times which are referred to in the following phrase, “when the iniquity of my heels,” etc.

When the iniquity of my heels shall compass me about It would be difficult to make any sense out of this expression, though it is substantially the same rendering which is found in the Vulgate and the Septuagint. Luther renders it “when the iniquity of my oppressors encompasses me.” The Chaldee Paraphrase renders it, “why should I fear in the days of evil, unless it be when the guilt of my sin compasses me about?" The Syriac renders it, "the iniquity of "my enemies." The Arabic, "when my enemies surround me." DeWette renders it as Luther does. Rosenmuller, "when the iniquity of those who lay snares against me shall compass me around." Prof. Alexander, "when the iniquity of my oppressors (or supplanters) shall surround me." The word rendered "heels" here — bqē,<sup><h6119></sup> — means properly "heel,"<sup><0085></sup> Genesis 3:15; <sup><889></sup> Job 18:9; <sup><0052></sup> Judges 5:22; then, the rear of an army, <sup><0683></sup> Joshua 8:13; then, in the plural, "footsteps," prints of the heel or foot, <sup><9779></sup> Psalm 77:19; and then, according to Gesenius (Lexicon) "a liar in wait, insidiator." Perhaps there is in the word the idea of craft; of lying in wait; of taking the advantages — from the verb bqē<sup><h6117></sup>, to be behind, to come from behind; and hence to supplant; to circumvent. So in <sup><8118></sup> Hosea 12:3, "in the womb he held his brother by the heel" (compare <sup><0236></sup> Genesis 25:26). Hence, the word is used as meaning to supplant; to circumvent, <sup><0276></sup> Genesis 27:36; <sup><2404></sup> Jeremiah 9:4 (Hebrew, 9:3) This is, undoubtedly, the meaning here. The true idea is, when I am exposed to the crafts, the cunning, the tricks, of those who lie in wait for me; I am liable to be attacked suddenly, or to be taken unawares; but what have I to fear? The psalmist refers to the evil conduct of his enemies, as having given him alarm. They were rich and powerful. They endeavored in some way to supplant him — perhaps, as we should say, to "trip him up" — to overcome him by art, by power, by trick, or by fraud. He "had" been afraid of these powerful foes; but on a calm review of the whole matter, he came to the conclusion that he had really no cause for fear. The reasons for this he proceeds to state in the following part of the psalm.

<sup><0406></sup>Psalm 49:6. They that trust in their wealth The first reason why there was no cause of alarm is drawn (<sup><0406></sup> Psalm 49:6-10) from the "powerlessness" of wealth, as illustrated by the fact that it can do nothing to save life or to prevent death. He refers to those who possess it as "trusting" in their wealth, or "relying on" that as the source of their power.

And boast themselves Pride themselves; or feel conscious of safety and strength because they are rich. It is the "power" which wealth is supposed to confer, that is alluded to here.

brother cannot by redeeming redeem; a man cannot give to God his own ransom.” The passage, therefore, may mean either, as in our version, that no one, however rich, can redeem a brother — his own brother — by his wealth; or, that a brother — one who sustains the relation of a brother — cannot rescue another from death. On the word “redeem,” see the notes at <sup><1922></sup>Psalm 25:22; <sup><2343B></sup>Isaiah 43:3. It means here that he could not rescue him, or save him from the grave; he could not by his wealth preserve him in life. The whole expression is emphatic: “redeeming he cannot redeem;” that is — according to Hebrew usage — he cannot “possibly” do it; it “cannot” be done. There is here no particular reference to the “means” to be employed, but only an emphatic statement of the fact that “it cannot by any possibility be done.” The object is to show how powerless and valueless is wealth in regard to the things that most pertain to a man’s welfare. It can do literally “nothing” in that which most deeply affects man, and in which he most needs help. There is no allusion here to the redemption of the soul, or to the great work of redemption, as that term is commonly understood; but it “is” true, in the highest sense, that if wealth cannot “redeem” life, or keep our best and nearest friend from the grave, much less can it avail in that which is so much more important, and so much more difficult, the redemption of the soul from eternal ruin. Here, also, as in the matter of saving from the grave, it is absolutely true that wealth can do “nothing” — literally, “nothing” — in saving the soul of its possessor, or in enabling its possessor to save his best friend. Nothing but the blood of the cross can avail then; and the wealth of the richest can do no more here than the poverty of the poorest.

Nor give to God a ransom for him This would be more literally rendered, “a man cannot give to God his ransom;” that is, he cannot, though in the possession of the most ample wealth, give to God that which would purchase his own release from the grave. On the word “ransom,” see as above, the notes at <sup><2343B></sup>Isaiah 43:3. Compare <sup><4163></sup>Matthew 16:26.

<sup><498></sup>Psalm 49:8. For the redemption of their soul is precious The word “soul” here means “life,” and not the immortal part. The only question which the psalmist here considers is the value of wealth in preserving “life,” or in saving man from the grave. The phrase, ““their” soul,” refers doubtless to the man and his brother, as alluded to in the previous verse. The idea is that neither can the man of wealth ransom his own life from the grave, nor the life of his brother. Wealth can save neither of them. The word “precious” means “costly,” “valuable.” The word is applied (<sup><110D></sup>1 Kings 10:2,10,11) to gems, and then to the costlier kinds of stones employed in building, as marble and hewn-stones, <sup><486></sup>2 Chronicles 3:6. Compare the notes at <sup><3817></sup>Psalm 36:7. The idea here is, that the rescue of the life, or the saving from the grave, would be too “costly;” it would be beyond the power of all wealth to purchase it; no amount of silver or gold, or raiment, or precious stones, could “constitute” a sufficient “price” to secure it.

And it ceaseth for ever That is, Wealth forever comes short of the power necessary to accomplish this. It has always been insufficient; it always “will” be. There is no hope that it “ever” will be sufficient; that by any increase in the amount — or by any change in the conditions of the bargain — property or riches can avail for this. The whole matter is perfectly “hopeless” as to the power of wealth in saving one human being from the grave. It must always “fail” in saving a man from death. The word rendered “ceaseth” — l djc<sup><h2308></sup> — means “to leave off, to desist, to fail,” <sup><1108></sup>Genesis 11:8; <sup><1084></sup>Exodus 9:34; <sup><2122></sup>Isaiah 2:22. As there is no allusion here to the redemption of the “soul” — the immortal part — this passage affirms nothing in regard to the fact that the work of redemption by the Saviour is completed or finished, and that an atonement cannot be made again, which is true; nor to the fact that when salvation through that atonement is rejected, all hope of redemption is at an end, which is also true. But though there is, originally, no such reference here, the “language” is such as is “adapted” to express that idea. In a much higher and more important sense than any which pertains to the power of wealth in saving from the grave, it is true tint the work of the atonement ceased for ever when the Redeemer expired on the cross, and that all hope of salvation ceases forever when the atonement is rejected, and when man refuses to be saved by his blood; nothing then can save the soul. No other sacrifice will be made, and when a man has finally rejected the Saviour, it may be said in the highest sense of the term, that the redemption of the soul is too costly to be effected by any other means, and that all hope of its salvation “has ceased” FOREVER.

<sup><949></sup>Psalm 49:9. That he should still live for ever That his brother whom he could not redeem — or that he himself — should not die, <sup><908></sup>Psalm 49:8. The idea is, that the price of life is so great that no wealth can rescue it so that a man shall not die.

And not see corruption Should not return to dust, or moulder away in the grave. See the notes at <sup><9160></sup>Psalm 16:10.

<sup><9900></sup>Psalm 49:10. For he seeth that wise men die He must see this; he does see it. He perceives that no one can be saved from death. It comes on all alike — the wise and the unwise. Nothing saves from it. The allusion is here especially to the “rich,” whether “they” are wise or whether they are fools and “brutish.” The simple fact, as stated, is that no matter what may be the character of the man of wealth, whether wise or foolish, he must certainly die His wealth cannot save him from the grave. The possessor of wealth himself “sees” this. It cannot be concealed from him.

Likewise the fool The rich man who is a fool, or who is destitute of wisdom. He who is rich and who is wise — wise in the things of this life and wise unto salvation — (or who is gifted with a high degree of intelligence and who evinces wisdom in respect to the higher matters of existence) — and the rich man who is a fool — (who is regardless of his highest interests, and who evinces no special intelligence, though possessed of wealth) — all, all die alike.

And the brutish person The rich man who is stupid and dull; who lives like a brute; who lives to eat and drink; who lives for gross sensuality — “he” dies as well as he who is wise. Wealth cannot in either case save from death. Whether connected with wisdom or folly — whether carefully husbanded or lavishly spent — whether a man employs it in the highest and noblest manner in which it can be devoted, or in the indulgence of the most low and debasing enjoyments — it is alike powerless in saving people from the grave.

And leave their wealth to others It all passes into other hands. It “must” be so left. It cannot be carried away by its possessor when he goes into the eternal world. It not only cannot save him from the grave, but he cannot even take it with him. All his houses, his lands, his title-deeds, his silver, his gold, his parks, gardens, horses, hounds — all that he had accumulated with so much care, and worshipped with so idolatrous an affection, is not even his own in the sense that he can take it with him. The title passes absolutely into other hands, and even if he could come back to earth again, he could no longer claim it, for when he dies it ceases to be his forever. How powerless, then, is wealth in reference to the great purposes of human existence!

Psalm 49:11. Their inward thought is Their secret expectation and feeling is that they have secured permanency for their wealth in their own families, though they themselves may pass away. The essential thought in this verse is, that the rich people referred to in the foregoing verses imagine that their possessions will be perpetuated in their own families. The word rendered “inward thought” — brq,<sup><47130></sup> — means properly “the midst, the middle, inner part;” and hence it comes to mean the heart, or the mind, as the seat of thought and affection: <sup><4989></sup>Psalm 5:9; 64:6. It means here, their hope, their calculation, their secret expectation; and the whole verse is designed to show the value or importance which they attach to wealth as being, in their apprehension, suited to build up their families forever.

That their houses shall continue “for ever Either the dwellings which they rear, or — more probably — their families.

And their dwelling-places to all generations Margin, as in Hebrew, “to generation and generation.” That is, forever. They expect that their possessions will always remain in the family, and be transmitted from one generation to another.

They call their lands after their own names They give their own names to the farms or grounds which they own, in the hope that, though they must themselves pass away, their “names” may be handed down to future times. This practice, which is not uncommon in the world, shows how intense is the desire of people not to be forgotten; and at the same time illustrates the main thought in the psalm — the importance attached to wealth by its possessor, as if it could carry his “name” down to future times, when he shall have passed away. In this respect, too, wealth is commonly as powerless as it is in saving its possessor from the grave. It is not very far into future times that mere wealth can carry the name of a man after he is dead. lands and tenements pass into other hands, and the future owner soon ceases to have any concern about the “name” of the former occupier, and the world cares nothing about it. A man must have some other claim to be remembered than the mere fact of his having been rich, or he will be soon forgotten. Compare the notes at <sup><2925></sup>Isaiah 22:15-19.

Psalm 49:12. Nevertheless, man being in honor abideth not No matter to what rank he may rise, no matter how much wealth he may accumulate, no matter how fixed and secure he may seem to make his possessions, he cannot make them permanent and enduring. He must pass away and leave all this to others. The word rendered “abideth” — <sup>WI</sup> <sup><1388></sup> — means properly to pass the night; to remain over night; to lodge, as one does for a night; and the idea is, that he is not to lodge or remain permanently in that condition; or, more strictly, he will not lodge there even for a night; that is, he will soon pass away. It is possible that the Saviour had his eye on this passage in the parable of the rich fool, and especially in the declaration, “This night thy soul shall be required of thee,” <sup><171></sup> Luke 12:20.

He is like the beasts that perish He is like the beasts; they perish. This does not mean that in all respects he is like them, but only in this respect, that he must die as they do; that he cannot by his wealth make himself immortal. He must pass away just as if he were an animal of the inferior creation, and had no power of accumulating wealth, or of laying plans that stretch into the future. The squirrel and the beaver — animals that “lay up” something, or that, like people, have the power of “accumulating,” die just like other animals. So the rich “man.” His intelligence, his high hopes, his far-reaching schemes, make no difference between him and his fellow-men and the brute in regard to death. They all die alike.

<sup><993></sup> Psalm 49:13. This their way is their folly This might be rendered, “This is their way or course of life. It is their folly;” or, such is their folly. On the word “way,” see the notes at <sup><906></sup> Psalm 1:6. The idea is, that it is folly for a man to cherish these hopes; to feel that wealth is of so much importance; to imagine that it can deliver from the grave; to suppose that he can perpetuate his own name, and secure his possessions in his own family upon the earth. And yet the world is still full of people as foolish as were those in the time of the psalmist; people who will not be admonished by the suggestions of reason, or by the experience of 6,000 years in the past. This is one thing in which the world makes no progress — in which it learns nothing from the experience of the past; and as the beaver under the influence of instinct builds his house and his home now in the same way that the first beaver did his, and as the brutes all act in the same manner from generation to generation, accumulating no knowledge, and making no advances from the experience of the past, so it is with people in their desire to grow rich. On other points the world accumulates knowledge, and profits from experience, garnering up the lessons taught by past experiment and observation, and thus becoming wiser in all other respects; but in regard to the desire of wealth, it makes no progress, gains no knowledge, derives no advantage, from the generations of fools that have lived and died in past ages. They now engage in the pursuit of gold with the same zeal, and the same expectation and hope which were evinced in the first ages of the world, and “as if” their own superior skill and wisdom could set at nought all the lessons taught by the past.

Approve their sayings Margin, “delight in their mouth.” That is, they delight or take pleasure in what proceeds from their mouth; in what they say; in their views of things. They adopt “their” principles, and act on “their” maxims; and, attaching the same importance to wealth which “they” did, seek as “they” sought to perpetuate their names upon the earth.

<sup><1904></sup>Psalm 49:14. Like sheep they are laid in the grave The allusion here is to a flock as “driven” forward by the shepherd; and the meaning is that they are driven forward to the grave, as it were, in flocks, or as a flock of sheep is driven by a shepherd. The word rendered “are laid” — ttæ<sup><18371></sup> — is probably not derived from the verb flw<sup><17751></sup>, or tyvi<sup><17897></sup>, as our translators seem to have supposed, but from ttæ<sup><18371></sup>, to set, or place; and the meaning is, “Like sheep they put them in Sheol, or the grave;” that is, they thrust or drive them down there. In other words, this is “done,” without intimating by whom it is done. They are urged forward; they are driven toward the tomb as a flock of sheep is driven forward to the slaughter. Some influence or power is pressing them in masses down to the grave. The word rendered “grave” is “Sheol.” It is sometimes used in the sense of the grave, and sometimes as referring to the abode of departed spirits. See the notes at <sup><18021></sup>Job 10:21,22; <sup><19015></sup>Psalm 6:5. It seems here to be used in the former sense.

Death shall feed on them The word rendered “feed” here — [ræ<sup><17451></sup> — means properly to feed a flock; to pasture; then, to perform the office of a shepherd. The idea here is not, as in our translation, “death shall feed on them;” but, death shall rule over them as the shepherd rules his flock. The allusion to the “flock” suggested this. They are driven down to the grave, or to Sheol. The shepherd, the ruler, he who does this, is “death;” and the idea is not that death is a hungry monster, devouring them “in” the grave, but that the shepherd over that “flock,” instead of being a kind and gentle friend and protector (as the word “shepherd” naturally suggests), is

And the upright The just; the righteous. The meaning of this part of the verse undoubtedly is, that the just or pious would have some kind of ascendancy or superiority over them at the period here referred to as the “morning.”

Shall have dominion over them Or rather, as DeWette renders it, shall “triumph” over them. That is, will be exalted over them; or shall have a more favored lot. Though depressed now, and though crushed by the rich, yet they will soon have a more exalted rank, and a higher honor than those who, though once rich, are laid in the grave under the dominion of death.

In the morning That is, very soon; tomorrow; when the morning dawns after the darkness of the present. See the notes at <sup><3015></sup>Psalm 30:5. There is a time coming — a brighter time — when the relative condition of the two classes shall be changed, and when the upright — the pious — though poor and oppressed now, shall be exalted to higher honors than “they” will be. There is no certain evidence that this refers to the “morning” of the resurrection; but it is language which well expresses the idea when connected with that doctrine, and which can be best explained on the supposition that that doctrine was referred to, and that the hope of such a resurrection was cherished by the writer. Indeed, when we remember that the psalmist expressly refers to the “grave” in regard to the rich, it is difficult to explain the language on any other supposition than that he refers here to the resurrection — certainly not as well as on this supposition — and especially when it is remembered that death makes no distinction in cutting down people, whether they are righteous or wicked. Both are laid in the grave alike, and “any” prospect of distinction or triumph in the case must be derived from scenes beyond the grave. This verse, therefore, may belong to that class of passages in the Old Testament which are founded on the belief of the resurrection of the dead without always expressly affirming it, and which are best explained on the supposition that the writers of the Old Testament were acquainted with that doctrine, and drew their hopes as well as their illustrations from it. Compare <sup><2712></sup>Daniel 12:2; <sup><2309></sup>Isaiah 26:19; <sup><910></sup>Psalm 16:9,10.

And their beauty Margin, “strength.” The Hebrew word means “form, shape, image;” and the idea here is, that their form or figure will be changed, or disappear, to wit, by consuming away. The idea of “beauty,” or “strength,” is not necessarily in the passage, but the meaning is, that the form or figure which was so familiar among people will be dissolved, and disappear in the grave.

Shall consume in the grave Hebrew, “in Sheol.” The word probably means here “the grave.” The original word rendered “consume,” means literally to make old; to wear out; to waste away. The entire form of the man will disappear.

From their dwelling Margin, “the grave being a habitation to every one of them.” Septuagint, “and their help shall grow old in the grave from their glory.” So the Latin Vulgate. The whole expression is obscure. The most probable meaning is, “they shall consume in the grave, “from its being a dwelling to him;”” that is, to each of them. Sheol, or the grave, becomes a dwelling to the rich man, and in that gloomy abode — that which is now his dwelling — he consumes away. It pertains to that dwelling, or it is one of the conditions of residing there, that all consume away and disappear. Others render it, “so that there is no dwelling or habitation for them.” Others, and this is the more common interpretation, “their form passes away, the underworld is their habitation.” See DeWette “in loc.” This last rendering requires a slight change in the punctuation of the original. DeWette, Note, p. 339. The “general” idea in the passage is plain, that the possessors of wealth are soon to find their home in the grave, and that their forms, with all on which they valued themselves, are soon to disappear.

⌘Psalm 49:15. But God will redeem my soul from the power of the grave literally, “from the hand of Sheol;” that is, from the dominion of death. The hand is an emblem of power, and it here means that death or Sheol holds the dominion over all those who are in the grave. The control is absolute and unlimited. The grave or Sheol is here personified as if reigning there, or setting up an empire there. Compare the notes at ⌘Isaiah 14:9. On the word “redeem,” see the references in the notes at ⌘Psalm 49:7.

For he shall receive me literally, “he shall take me.” That is, either, He will take me from the grave; or, He will take me “to” himself. The general idea is, that God would take hold of him, and save him from the dominion of the grave; from that power which death exercises over the dead. This would either mean that he would be preserved from going down to the grave and returning to corruption there; or, that he would hereafter be rescued from the power of the grave in a sense which would not apply in respect to the rich man. The former evidently cannot be the idea, since the psalmist could not hope to escape death; yet there might be a hope that the dominion of death would not be permanent and enduring, or that there would be a future life, a resurrection from the grave. It seems to me, therefore, that this passage, like the expression in ~~1914~~ Psalm 49:14, “in the morning,” and the passages referred to in the notes at that verse, is founded on the belief that death is not the end of a good man, but that he will rise again, and live in a higher and better state. It was this consideration which gave such comfort to the psalmist in contemplating the whole subject; and the idea, thus illustrated, is substantially the same as that stated by the Saviour in ~~1018~~ Matthew 10:28,

~~1916~~ Psalm 49:16. Be not thou afraid when one is made rich Do not dread the power derived from wealth; do not fear anything which a man can do merely because he is rich. The original is, “when a “man” becomes rich.” The allusion is not necessarily to a bad man, though that is implied in the whole passage, since there is no reason for fearing a “good” man, whether he is rich or poor. The only thing that seems to have been apprehended in the mind of the psalmist was that power of doing injury to others, or of employing means to injure others, which wealth confers on a bad man. The psalmist here changes the form of the expression, no longer referring to himself, and to his own feelings, as in the former part of the psalm, but making an application of the whole course of thought to others, showing them, as the result of his own reflection and observation, that no man had any real cause for dread and alarm when riches increased in the hands of the wicked. The reasons why this power should not be feared are stated in the following verses.

When the glory of his house is increased Rich people often lavish much of their wealth on their dwellings; on the dwelling itself; on the furniture; on the grounds and appendages of their habitation. This is evidently referred to here as “the “glory” of their house;” as that which would be adapted to make an impression of the power and rank of its possessor.

Psalm 49:17. For when he dieth He must die. His wealth cannot save him from the grave. It is always to be “assumed” of rich people, as of all other men, that they “will” have to die. The point is not one which is to be argued; not one about which there can be any doubt. Of all people, whatever else may be said of them, it may always be affirmed that they must die, and important inferences may be always drawn from that fact.

He shall carry nothing away It is not improbable that the apostle Paul had this passage in his eye in what he says in <sup><5407></sup>1 Timothy 6:7, “For we brought nothing into this world, and it is certain that we can carry nothing out.” See the notes at that passage. Compare <sup><8276></sup>Job 27:16-19.

His glory shall not descend after him His wealth, and those things which have been procured by wealth, as indicating station and rank, cannot accompany him to the other world. This is said to show that he is not to be “feared” on account of his wealth. The argument is, that whatever there is in wealth that seems to give power, and to afford the means of doing injury, must soon be separated from him. In respect to wealth, and to all the power derived from wealth, he will be like the most poor and penniless of mortals. All that he possesses will pass into other hands, and whether for good or for evil, it will no longer be in his power to use it. As this “must” occur soon — as it “may” occur in a moment — there is no reason to “fear” such a man, or to suppose that he can do permanent injury by any power derived from wealth. Compare the notes at <sup><2346></sup>Isaiah 14:6,7,10,11.

Psalm 49:18. Though while he lived Margin, as in Hebrew, “in his life.” More literally, “in his lives.” The idea is, as long as he lived.

He blessed his soul That is, he blessed himself; he congratulated himself; he regarded his condition as desirable and enviable. He “took airs” upon himself; he felt that his was a happy lot; he expected and demanded respect and honor from others on account of his wealth. He commended himself as having evinced sagacity in the means by which he acquired wealth — thus imparting honor to himself; and he congratulated himself on the result, as placing him in a condition above want, and in a condition that entitled him to honor. A striking illustration of this feeling is found in the parable of the rich fool, <sup><0229></sup>Luke 12:19,

And men will praise thee Others will praise thee. He not only blessed or commended himself, but he might expect that others would praise and congratulate him also. They would regard him as a happy man; happy, because he had been thus successful; happy, because he had accumulated that which was the object of so universal desire among people. Success, though founded on that which is entitled to no praise, and which is even the result of unprincipled conduct, often secures the temporary praise of men, while a want of success, though connected with the strictest, sternest virtue, is often followed by neglect, or is even regarded as proof that he who fails has no claim to honor.

When thou doest well to thyself Well, in reference to success in life, or in the sense that thou art prospered. Your industry, your sagacity, your prosperity will be the theme of commendation. To a certain extent, where this does not lead to self flattery and pride, it is proper and right. The virtues which ordinarily contribute to prosperity “are” worthy of commendation, and should be held up to the example of the young. But what is evil and wrong in the matter here referred to is that the man’s commendation of himself, and the commendation by others, all tends to foster a spirit of pride and self-confidence; to make the soul easy and satisfied with the condition; to produce the feeling that all is gained which needs to be gained; to make the possessor of wealth arrogant and haughty; and to lead him to neglect the higher interests of the soul.

Psalm 49:19. He shall go to the generation of his fathers To be gathered to one’s own people, or to his fathers, is a common expression in the Old Testament in speaking of death. See <sup><01238></sup>Genesis 25:8,17; 35:29; 49:29,33, <sup><01214></sup>Numbers 20:24,26; 27:13; 31:2; <sup><01320></sup>Deuteronomy 32:50; <sup><01010></sup>Judges 2:10. It means that they were united again with those who had gone before them, in the regions of the dead. Death had indeed separated them, but by death they were again united.

They shall never see light He and the “generation” to which he has gone to be united, would no more see the light of this world; no more walk among the living: <sup><01330></sup>Job 33:30. Compare the notes at <sup><01381></sup>Isaiah 38:11; <sup><012713></sup>Psalm 27:13. The meaning is, that the rich sinner will die as others have done before him, leaving all his earthly possessions, and will no more be permitted to revisit the world where his forsaken possessions are, and will not even be permitted to “look” on what before had been to him such a source of self-confidence, self-gratulation, and pride.

Psalm 49:20. Man that is in honor Man that is in possession of wealth, or that occupies an exalted rank. See the notes at <sup><49:12></sup>Psalm 49:12.

And understandeth not That is, who has no proper appreciation of what it is to be a man; of what is his true rank “as” a man; of his relations to God; of his condition as an immortal being — man that values himself only on the fact that he is rich; that lives for this world alone; that regards it as a sufficient distinction that he “is” rich; that degrades his nobler nature in the mere enjoyment of the pleasures of sense — is like the beasts — is in no way elevated above them.

Is like the beasts that perish They live only for this life. They have no higher nature than that which pertains to the senses, and they live accordingly. The man who, though of exalted rank, lives for this life alone, herein resembles them. See the notes at <sup><49:12></sup>Psalm 49:12. Alas! what multitudes there are who thus live — whose only aim is to secure the wealth and the honors of this life — who have no more thought of a future state, and who form no more plans in regard to a future world, than do the brutes! For many there are in exalted stations, who are surrounded by all that wealth can give, yet who no more admit the thought of a future world into their hopes and plans than if they had no other endowment than the camel or the ox, and whose conduct in this respect would not be changed if all the higher endowments which constitute the nature of man were withdrawn, and they were at once reduced to the condition of a brute. While, therefore, the main purpose of this psalm is to show that wealth confers no “power” which is to be dreaded — that its possessor, though wicked, cannot permanently injure us, since he must soon pass away by death — the course of thought at the same time teaches us that we should not “desire” wealth as our portion; that we should not live for this, as the main object of life. The possessor of the most ample fortune must soon be laid in the grave. All that he has acquired will pass into other hands, and will be his no more. But he “has” a higher nature. He “may” live in a manner different from the brute that perishes. He “may” act with reference to a higher — an eternal — state of existence; and, when he dies, he “may” leave his earthly inheritance, whether great or small, only to enter on an inheritance that shall be permanent and eternal. “What shall it profit a man, if he shall gain the whole world, and lose his own soul?” <sup><10:36></sup>Mark 8:36.

APPENDIX NOTES ON PSALM 49

Among the psalms which assert the hope of eternal life, an eminent place belongs to the forty-ninth ... The psalms which are introduced with a formal preface are very few in number, and they are all psalms of principal note in their several kinds ... And this ... instead of being addressed to the Hebrew church ... is expressly and emphatically addressed to the church catholic, to “all peoples,” even “all the inhabitants of the world.” ... Although indited by a Hebrew pen, it is a Christian psalm, and was from the first inscribed to the Christian church ... The theme (like that of Psalm 17; 73) is the mystery of God’s providence toward the righteous and the wicked; and the aim of the psalmist is the same, namely, to encourage God’s people to take “for an helmet the hope of salvation,” when they are shaken in mind at the sight of prosperous ungodliness. The grand lesson intended to be inculcated is worked out in each of the two stanzas of which the body of the psalm consists. In the first it is worked out partially, in the second more perfectly. The psalmist has been himself perplexed by the problem to which he summons the attention of the world. Like Asaph, in Psalm 73, he has been shaken in mind by seeing vile people rich, powerful, prosperous. Reflecting on that sight, the first consideration impressed on his mind is the vanity of riches. These people trust in their wealth ... Yet, after all, how helpless, are they! ... Death prevails over all ... The redemption of a man’s life is too precious to be accomplished with silver and gold. The attempt is vain. It must be let alone, and cease forever. Thus, the psalmist is conducted to the sentence with which the first stanza is wound up: “Man that is in honor hath no continuance; he is become like to the beasts that are destroyed.” The reflection is a salutary one; ... but, after all, it is not a bright or consolatory one. There is no glory of heavenly hope upon it. Pagan moralists were as familiar with it as the psalmist ... The verses that follow lift us up beyond these clouds into a serener air. The sentence into which the argument of the first stanza was gathered up is set down a second time at the close of the psalm. But this time with an important variation. Here it is the man “that hath no understanding” who is compared to the beasts that are destroyed. We are thus reminded that there are some who, by God’s grace, have understanding: people who “fear the Lord, which is wisdom, and depart from evil, which is understanding.” ... They do not perish like the beasts, but are taken up into God’s presence, to dwell there like angels. What is thus taught by implication in the refrain is set forth explicitly in the body of the stanza. Two declarations claim special attention. After describing the death of the ungodly as their being “driven by the stern shepherd, Death, into the unseen world,” as sheep are driven unwillingly into a pen, he declares his belief that a day is coming — a bright morning — in which the saints shall have dominion (<sup><994></sup>Psalm 49:14); an announcement which carries forward the mind to the morning of the resurrection, when “the saints shall judge the world,” <sup><402></sup>1 Corinthians 6:2. Then, coming home to his own case, he makes profession of his hope in words of strong assurance: “God will redeem my soul from the power of the unseen world, for he shall take me.” The former part of this profession of the psalmist’s faith is best illustrated by the parallel text in Hosea: “I will ransom them from the power of the grave” (that is, “I will redeem them from the power of the unseen world:” the words in the original are the same as in the psalm);

“I will redeem them from death. O death, I will be thy plagues! O grave, I will be thy destruction!” <sup><314></sup>Hosea 13:14.

The believer has faith in God that, when he dies, he shall not be shut up in darkness, but shall be received into the presence of God, and be raised up in glory at the last day. That victory over death, which the worldling’s wealth cannot purchase for his dearest friend, is made sure to every one who puts his trust in God. The words that follow, “for he shall take me,” correspond to those of Asaph, “Thou shalt guide me with thy counsel, and afterward take me to glory;” and, in both places, there is an allusion to the language of the sacred history in relating the translation of Enoch: “He was not, for God took him,” <sup><054></sup>Genesis 5:24. Not that Asaph or the writer of Psalm 49 expected to be translated like Enoch; but the “taking up” of the antediluvian saint suggested to their minds a world of precious truth respecting the future life, and strengthened in their hearts the hope of eternal glory in the presence of God. We have before us, therefore, a clear and strong declaration of hope, for, after all, what more can the believer say even now? The highest attainment our faith can reach, in the prospect of dissolution, is to lay hold on the promise of Christ and say, “Thou wilt come and receive me to thyself, so that where thou art, there I shall be also;” and what is this but to repeat the profession of hope that is embedded in Psalm 49? — Binnie.

<sup><998></sup>Psalm 49:8. The redemption of their soul is precious If riches are capable of many good uses, as the Bible admits, so in a multitude of cases they are utterly powerless. They cannot buy talent, or any excellence of mind or heart. They cannot give a good constitution, nor prolong life for a day. They rather increase than diminish fears. "The abundance of the rich will not suffer him to sleep." They cannot quiet an uneasy conscience. They cannot cool a fever or drive away a chill. They cannot soothe a pain in the head or an ache in the heart. Toward one's salvation they can contribute nothing whatever. Nor can they aid our kin or our friends more than they can ourselves. Tholuck:

"A rich man may buy much with his money — goods of every kind, pleasures, honors; but he cannot Buy eternal life." — Plumer.

Psalm 49:15. He shall receive me He shall take me. This short half-verse is, as Bottcher remarks, the more weighty, from its very shortness. The same expression occurs again, <sup><9734></sup>Psalm 73:24: "Thou shalt take me," the original of both being, <sup><10624></sup>Genesis 5:24, where it is used of the translation of Enoch, "He was not for God took him." We have, then, in this passage again (compare <sup><9161></sup>Psalm 16:11; 17:15) the strong hope of eternal life with God, if not the hope of a resurrection. In the preceding verse, in the very midst of the gloomy picture which he draws of the end of the ungodly, there breaks forth one morning-ray of light, the bright anticipation of the final triumph of the good over the evil. This is the inextinguishable hope which animates the church of the Old Testament as well as that of the New. Righteousness shall eventually, must in its very nature, reign upon the earth. The wicked shall find their end in Sheol (see <sup><9917></sup>Psalm 9:17), and the righteous shall trample on their graves. This, and not more than this, seems to have been the meaning originally of the psalmist in the words, "And the righteous have dominion over them in the morning." But now that he comes to speak of himself, and his own personal relation to God, he rises into a higher strain. He who knows and loves God has the life of God, and can never perish. That life must survive even the shock of death. "God," says the psalmist, "shall redeem my soul from the hand of Hades, for he shall take me," as he took Enoch, and as he took Elijah, to himself. We are not, of course, to suppose that the sacred poet himself expected to be taken up alive to heaven; but those great facts of former ages were God's witnesses to man of his immortality, and of the reality of a life with him beyond this world. It is a hope based on facts like these which here shines forth. It is a hope, not a revealed certainty. It rests on no distinct promise; it has not assumed the definite form of a doctrine. But it was enough to raise, to cheer, to encourage those who saw ungodliness prospering in this world. The end of the wicked, after all, was a thick darkness which had never been penetrated; the end of the righteous, life with God. — Perowne.

<sup><1918></sup>Psalm 49:18. While he lived he blessed his soul The death which, according to <sup><1917></sup>Psalm 49:17, deprives the ungodly of all his glorious privileges, is to be thought of, according to the preceding context, as near at hand. In 49:18 the reason is given why God does not permit the glory of the wicked to follow him, why it comes to so sudden and complete an end. His whole life was set on enjoyment; he has already enjoyed enough, already has he treated himself luxuriously enough, and he cannot complain if he should now come to want. We may compare <sup><165></sup>Luke 16:25, a passage resting upon ours, and serving as a commentary to it: But Abraham said, Son, remember that thou in thy lifetime receivedst thy good things, and likewise Lazarus evil things; but now he is comforted, and thou art tormented.” On this, for he blesses his soul in his life, is to be compared the address of the rich man to his soul, <sup><179></sup>Luke 12:19. — Hengstenberg.

NOTES ON PSALM 50

This psalm purports to be a “psalm of Asaph.” This is the first of the psalms ascribed to him. twelve in all are attributed to him, namely, Psalm 50; 73—83. Asaph was a Levite, a son of Berachiah, <sup><1159></sup>1 Chronicles 6:39; 15:17. He was eminent as a musician, <sup><1124></sup>Nehemiah 12:46; 1 Chronicles 16:7, and was appointed by “the chief of the Levites,” at the command of David, with two others, Heman and Ethan, to preside over a part of the sacred choral services of public worship, <sup><1156></sup>1 Chronicles 15:16-19. They had charge particularly of the worship as conducted with “cymbals of brass,” <sup><1159></sup>1 Chronicles 15:19. The “sons of Asaph” are afterward mentioned among the choristers of the temple (<sup><1320></sup>1 Chronicles 25:1,2; <sup><1014></sup>2 Chronicles 20:14; 29:13; <sup><1124></sup>Ezra 2:41; 3:10; <sup><1124></sup>Nehemiah 7:44; 11:22); and this office appears to have been hereditary in his family, <sup><1320></sup>1 Chronicles 25:1,2. Asaph was celebrated in after times as a prophet and a poet, <sup><1280></sup>2 Chronicles 29:30; <sup><1124></sup>Nehemiah 12:46. The title, rendered in the margin, “for Asaph,” “may” mean either that the psalm was composed “by” Asaph himself, or that it was composed especially “for” him, by David or by someone else, and that it was committed to him to be set to music, or to be sung by that band of musicians over which he was appointed to preside. Compare the notes at the title to Psalm 42. The presumption is, that it was composed “by” Asaph, as this is the most natural explanation of the title, and as there is nothing in the circumstances of the case to render this improbable.

Of the “occasion” on which the psalm was composed we have no information. There is nothing in the title to indicate this, nor is there anything in the psalm itself which would connect it with any known events in the Jewish history. There are no local allusions, there are no names mentioned, there are no circumstances referred to, which enable us to determine the time of its composition.

The “object” of the psalm seems to be to set forth “the value and importance of spiritual religion as compared with a mere religion of forms.” It is one among numerous portions of the Old Testament which show that the Jewish religion “contemplated” and “required” spirituality in its worshippers, and that it was not designed to be merely formal. There was, indeed, great tendency among the Jewish people to rely on the forms of religion, and it must be admitted that there was not a little in their modes of worship which went to foster this unless there was constant vigilance on the part of the worshipper, and on the part of the public teachers of religion. At the time when this psalm was composed, it would seem that there was a general reliance on the mere ceremonies of public worship; that much of the spirituality of religion had vanished; and that under the forms of religion, and connected with a decent and even scrupulous attention to them, there was a great, if not general, prevalence, of moral corruption among the people. See <sup><B016></sup>Psalm 50:16-21.

In the composition of the psalm, therefore, the author represents a scene of solemn judgment; describes God as coming with pomp, and amidst fire and tempests, to pronounce a sentence on man; and then, as in his presence, and as amidst these solemn scenes, shows what will be found to be true piety; what will meet with the approbation, and what will incur the disapprobation, of God.

The psalm may be regarded as composed of the following parts.

I. A solemn representation of the scenes of judgment; of God as coming to judge his professed people, assembling together those who had avowed themselves to be his friends, and who had pledged themselves to be his amidst the solemn scenes of sacrifice, <sup><B011></sup>Psalm 50:1-6.

In this part of the psalm there are the following things:

(a) A general summons to the world, from the rising to the setting sun, <sup><B011></sup>Psalm 50:1.

(b) The statement that the great principles on which all would be determined would proceed out of Zion, or would be such as were inculcated there in the worship of God, <sup><B012></sup>Psalm 50:2.

(c) A description of God as coming to judgment amidst fire and tempest, <sup><B013></sup>Psalm 50:3.

(d) A general call to the heavens and the earth, that His people might be summoned from all quarters with reference to the final sentence, <sup><B014></sup>Psalm 50:4,5.

(e) A statement that perfect justice would be done, which the very heavens would reveal, for that God was himself the judge, <sup><B015></sup>Psalm 50:6.

II. A declaration of the great principles on which the judgment would proceed, and by which the issue would be determined. It would not be by an observance of the mere external forms of devotion, but by spiritual religion; by a sincere worship of God; by a holy life, <sup><1507></sup>Psalm 50:7-23.

This portion of the psalm is divided into two parts: the “first,” showing that it is not by mere outward forms that acceptance can be found with God, but that there must be, under these forms, pure and spiritual religion, <sup><1507></sup>Psalm 50:7-15; and the “second,” that the wicked cannot hope to meet with the favor of God, though they do observe these forms, <sup><1506></sup>Psalm 50:16-23.

First. It is not by mere external forms that acceptance can be found with God, <sup><1507></sup>Psalm 50:7-15.

(a) A statement of the fact, and of the grounds of the fact, that God will testify against them, <sup><1507></sup>Psalm 50:7,8.

(b) The mere offering of sacrifices cannot be acceptable to Him. He does not “need” their sacrifices, as all the beasts of the world are His, <sup><1509></sup>Psalm 50:9-13.

(c) Only praise — spiritual worship — humble trust in him — can be admitted as true righteousness; as that which will be acceptable to him, <sup><1514></sup>Psalm 50:14,15.

Second. The wicked cannot be accepted and approved though they do observe the forms of religion, <sup><1506></sup>Psalm 50:16-23.

(a) Such men, though in the priestly office, cannot be regarded as appointed by God to declare his will, or to represent him on earth, <sup><1506></sup>Psalm 50:16,17.

(b) A description of the actual conduct of many of those who professed to be His friend; who were rigid in their observances of the external forms of religion, and who were even in the priestly office, <sup><1508></sup>Psalm 50:18-21.

(c) As before (<sup><1504></sup>Psalm 50:14,15); only the righteous — the spiritually minded — the upright — can in such a solemn trial meet with the approbation of God, <sup><1502></sup>Psalm 50:22,23.

This psalm, therefore, is one of the most instructive portions of the Old Testament, as setting forth the necessity of spiritual religion, and the fact that a mere observance of forms can never constitute that righteousness which will make people acceptable to God.

Psalm 50:1. The mighty God, even the LORD Even “Yahweh,” for this is the original word. The Septuagint and Vulgate render this “The God of gods, the Lord.” DeWette renders it, “God, God Jehovah, speaks.” Prof. Alexander, “The Almighty, God, Jehovah, speaks;” and remarks that the word “mighty” is not an adjective agreeing with the next word (“the mighty God”), but a substantive in apposition with it. The idea is, that he who speaks is the true God; the Supreme Ruler of the universe. It is “that” God who has a right to call the world to judgment, and who has power to execute his will.

Hath spoken Or rather, “speaks.” That is, the psalmist represents him as now speaking, and as calling the world to judgment.

And called the earth Addressed all the inhabitants of the world; all dwellers on the earth.

From the rising of the sun unto the going down thereof From the place where the sun seems to rise, to the place where it seems to set; that is, all the world. Compare the notes at <sup><239></sup>Isaiah 59:19. See also <sup><3011></sup>Malachi 1:11; <sup><433></sup>Psalm 113:3. The call is made to all the earth; to all the human race. The scene is imaginary as represented by the psalmist, but it is founded on a true representation of what will occur — of the universal judgment, when all nations shall be summoned to appear before the final Judge. See <sup><423></sup>Matthew 25:32; <sup><611></sup>Revelation 20:11-14.

Psalm 50:2. Out of Zion The place where God was worshipped, and where he dwelt. Compare the notes at <sup><218></sup>Isaiah 2:3.

God hath shined Has shined forth, or has caused light and splendor to appear. Compare <sup><632></sup>Deuteronomy 33:2; <sup><812></sup>Psalm 80:2; 94:1 (see the margin) The meaning here is, that the great principles which are to determine the destiny of mankind in the final judgment are those which proceed from Zion; or, those which are taught in the religion of Zion; they are those which are inculcated through the church of God. God has there made known his law; he has stated the principles on which he governs, and on which he will judge the world.

Psalm 50:3. Our God shall come That is, he will come to judgment. This language is derived from the supposition that God “will” judge the world, and it shows that this doctrine was understood and believed by the Hebrews. The New Testament has stated the fact that this will be done by the coming of his Son Jesus Christ to gather the nations before him, and to pronounce the final sentence on mankind: <sup><4251></sup>Matthew 25:31; <sup><4473></sup>Acts 17:31; 10:42; <sup><4352></sup>John 5:22.

And shall not keep silence That is, he will come forth and “express” his judgment on the conduct of mankind. See the notes at <sup><4920></sup>Psalm 28:1. He “seems” now to be silent. No voice is heard. No sentence is pronounced. But this will not always be the case. The time is coming when he will manifest himself, and will no longer be silent as to the conduct and character of people, but will pronounce a sentence, fixing their destiny according to their character.

A fire shall devour before him Compare the notes at <sup><5008></sup>2 Thessalonians 1:8; <sup><5802></sup>Hebrews 10:27. The “language” here is undoubtedly taken from the representation of God as he manifested himself at Mount Sinai. Thus, in <sup><1916></sup>Exodus 19:16,18, it is said, “And it came to pass on the third day in the morning, that there were thunders and lightnings, and a thick cloud upon the mount, and the voice of a trumpet exceeding loud; and Mount Sinai was altogether on a smoke, because the Lord descended upon it in fire: and the smoke thereof ascended as the smoke of a furnace, and the whole mount quaked greatly.

And it shall be very tempestuous round about him The word used here — <sup><48178></sup>r [æe] — means properly to shudder; to shiver; and then it is employed to denote the commotion and raging of a tempest. The allusion is doubtless to the descent on Mount Sinai (<sup><1916></sup>Exodus 19:16), and to the storm accompanied by thunder and lightning which beat upon the mountain when God descended on it to give his law. The whole is designed to represent God as clothed with appropriate majesty when judgment is to be pronounced upon the world.

Psalm 50:4. He shall call to the heavens from above He will call on all the universe; he will summon all worlds. The meaning here is, not that he will gather those who are in heaven to be judged, but that he will call on the inhabitants of all worlds to be his witnesses; to bear their attestation to the justice of his sentence. See <sup><4516></sup>Psalm 50:6. The phrase “from above”

And to the earth To all the dwellers upon the earth; “to the whole universe.” He makes this universal appeal with the confident assurance that his final sentence will be approved; that the universe will see and admit that it is just. See <sup><B></sup>Revelation 15:3; 19:1-3. There can be no doubt that the universe, as such, will approve the ultimate sentence that will be pronounced on mankind.

That he may judge his people That is, all these arrangements — this coming with fire and tempest, and this universal appeal — will be preparatory to the judging of his people, or in order that the judgment may be conducted with due solemnity and propriety. The idea is, that an event so momentous should be conducted in a way suited to produce an appropriate impression; so conducted, that there would be a universal conviction of the justice and impartiality of the sentence. The reference here is particularly to his professed “people,” that is, to determine whether they were truly his, for that is the main subject of the psalm, though the “language” is derived from the solemnities appropriate to the universal judgment.

The idea is, that God will bring them, or assemble them together. All this is language derived from the notion of a universal judgment, “as if” the scattered people of God were thus gathered together by special messengers sent out for this purpose. The word “saints” here refers to those who are truly his people. The object — the purpose — of the judgment is to assemble in heaven those who are sincerely his friends; or, as the Saviour expresses it (<sup><B></sup>Matthew 24:31), his “elect.” Yet in order to this, or in order to determine who “are” his true people, there will be a larger gathering — an assembling of all the dwellers on the earth.

Those that have made a covenant with me by sacrifice <sup><0206></sup>Exodus 24:6,7. Compare the notes at <sup><809></sup>Hebrews 9:19-22. The idea here is, that they are the professed people of God; that they have entered into a solemn covenant-relation to him, or have bound themselves in the most solemn manner to be his; that they have done this in connection with the sacrifices which accompany their worship; that they have brought their sacrifices or bloody offerings as a pledge that they mean to be his, and will be his. Over these solemn sacrifices made to him, they have bound themselves to be the Lord's; and the purpose of the judgment now is, to determine whether this was sincere, and whether they have been faithful to their vows. As applied to professed believers under the Christian system, the "idea" here presented would be, that the vow to be the Lord's has been made over the body and blood of the Redeemer once offered as a sacrifice, and that by partaking of the memorials of that sacrifice they have entered into a solemn "covenant" to be his. Nothing more solemn can be conceived than a "covenant" or pledge entered into in such a manner; and yet nothing is more painfully certain than that the process of a judgment will be necessary to determine in what cases it is genuine, for the mere outward act, no matter how solemn, does not of necessity decide the question whether he who performs it will enter into heaven.

<sup><806></sup>Psalm 50:6. And the heavens shall declare his righteousness Shall make it known, or announce it. That is, the heavens — the heavenly inhabitants — will bear witness to the justness of the sentence, or will approve the sentence. See the notes at <sup><804></sup>Psalm 50:4. Compare <sup><976></sup>Psalm 97:6.

For God is judge himself The judgment is not committed to mortal men, or even to angels. Creatures, even the most exalted and pure, might err in such a work as that of judging the world. That judgment, to be correct, must be founded on a perfect knowledge of the heart, and on a clear and complete understanding of all the thoughts, the motives, the words, the deeds of all people. It cannot be supposed that any created being, however exalted, could possess all this knowledge, and it cannot be supposed that any created being, however pure, could be so endowed as to be secure against error in pronouncing a judgment on the countless millions of people. But God combines all these in himself; a perfect knowledge of all that has ever occurred on earth, and of the motives and feelings of every creature — and, at the same time, absolute purity and impartiality; therefore his judgment must be such that the universe will see that it is just.

It may be added here that as the New Testament has stated (see the notes at <sup><B1B></sup>Psalm 50:3) that the judgment of the world in the last day will be committed to the Lord Jesus Christ, the considerations just suggested prove that he is Divine. The immediate point in the passage before us is, that the fact that “God” will preside in the judgment, demonstrates that the acts of judgment will be “right,” and will be such as the “heavens” — the universe — will approve; such, that all worlds will proclaim them to be right. There is no higher evidence that a thing is right, and that it ought to be done, than the fact that God has done it. Compare <sup><O1B2></sup>Genesis 18:25; <sup><B1D></sup>Psalm 39:9.

<sup><B1E></sup>Psalm 50:7. Hear, O my people, and I will speak God himself is now introduced as speaking, and as stating the principles on which the judgment will proceed. The previous verses are introductory, or are designed to bring the scene of the judgment before the mind. The solemn scene now opens, and God himself speaks, especially as rebuking the disposition to rely on the mere forms of religion, while its spirituality and its power are denied. The purpose of the whole is, by asking how these things will appear in the judgment, to imply the vanity of “mere” forms of religion now. The particular address is made to the “people” of God, or to “Israel,” because the purpose of the psalmist was to rebuke the prevailing tendency to rely on outward forms.

O Israel, and I will testify against thee In the judgment. In view of those scenes, and as “at” that time, I will “now” bear this solemn testimony against the views which you entertain on the subject of religion, and the practices which prevail in your worship.

I am God, even thy God I am the true God, and therefore I have a right to speak; I am “thy” God — the God who has been the Protector of thy people — acknowledged as the God of the nation — and therefore I claim the right to declare the great principles which pertain to true worship, and which constitute true religion.

<sup><B1F></sup>Psalm 50:8. I will not reprove thee for thy sacrifices or thy burnt-offerings On the words “sacrifices” and “burnt-offerings” here used, see the notes at <sup><B1H></sup>Isaiah 1:11. The meaning is, “I do not reprove or rebuke you in respect to the withholding of sacrifices. I do not charge you with neglecting the offering of such sacrifices. I do not accuse the nation of indifference in regard to the external rites or duties of religion. It is not on this ground that you are to be blamed or condemned, for that duty is outwardly and publicly performed. I do not say that such offerings are wrong; I do not say that there has been any failure in the external duties of worship. The charge — the reproof — relates to other matters; to the want of a proper spirit, to the withholding of the heart, in connection with such offerings.”

To have been continually before me The words “to have been” are inserted by the translators, and weaken the sense. The simple idea is, that their offerings “were” continually before him; that is, they were constantly made. He had no charge of neglect in this respect to bring against them. The insertion of the words “to have been” would seem to imply that though they had neglected this external rite, it was a matter of no consequence; whereas the simple meaning is, that they were “not” chargeable with this neglect, or that there was “no” cause of complaint on this point. It was on other grounds altogether that a charge was brought against them. It was, as the following verses show, because they supposed there was special “merit” in such offerings; because they supposed that they laid God under obligation by so constant and so expensive offerings, as if they did not already belong to him, or as if he needed them; and because, while they did this, they withheld the very offering which he required, and without which all other sacrifices would be vain and worthless — a sincere, humble, thankful heart.

~~1810~~ Psalm 50:9. I will take no bullock out of thy house Bullocks were offered regularly in the Hebrew service and sacrifice (~~1021~~ Exodus 29:11,36; ~~1804~~ Leviticus 4:4; ~~11823~~ 1 Kings 18:23,33); and it is with reference to this that the language is used here. In obedience to the law it was right and proper to offer such sacrifices; and the design here is not to express disapprobation of these offerings in themselves considered. On this subject — on the external compliance with the law in this respect — God says (~~1810~~ Psalm 50:8) that he had no cause to complain against them. It was only with respect to the design and the spirit with which they did this, that the language in this verse and the following verses is used. The idea which it is the purpose of these verses to suggest is, that God did not “need” such offerings; that they were not to be made “as if” he needed them; and that if he needed such he was not “dependent” on them, for all the beasts of the earth and all the fowls of the mountains were his, and could be taken for that purpose; and that if he took what was claimed to be theirs — the bullocks and the goats — he did not wrong them, for all were his, and he claimed only his own.

Nor he-goats out of thy folds Goats were also offered in sacrifice.

<RB2>Leviticus 3:12; 4:24; 10:16: <HSZ>Numbers 15:27.

<R00>Psalm 50:10. For every beast of the forest is mine All the beasts that roam at large in the wilderness; all that are untamed and unclaimed by man. The idea is, that even if God “needed” such offerings, he was not dependent on them — for the numberless beasts that roamed at large as his own would yield an ample supply.

And the cattle upon a thousand hills This may mean either the cattle that roamed by thousands on the hills, or the cattle on numberless hills. The Hebrew will bear either construction. The former is most likely to be the meaning. The allusion is probably to the animals that were pastured in great numbers on the hills, and that were claimed by men. The idea is, that all — whether wild or tame — belonged to God, and he had a right to them, to dispose of them as he pleased. He was not, therefore, in any way dependent on sacrifices. It is a beautiful and impressive thought, that the “property” in all these animals — in all living things on the earth — is in God, and that he has a right to dispose of them as he pleases. What man owns, he owns under God, and has no right to complain when God comes and asserts his superior claim to dispose of it at his pleasure. God has never given to man the absolute proprietorship in “any” thing; nor does he invade our rights when he comes and claims what we possess, or when in any way he removes what is most valuable to us. Compare <R02>Job 1:21.

<R01>Psalm 50:11. I know all the fowls of the mountains That is, I am fully acquainted with their numbers; their nature; their habits; their residence. I have such a knowledge of them that I could appropriate them to my own use if I were in need of them. I am not, therefore, dependent on people to offer them, for I can use them as I please.

And the wild beasts of the field are mine Margin, “with me.” That is, they are before me. They are never out of my presence. At any time, therefore, I could use them as I might need them. The word rendered “wild beasts” — zyi<sup>H2123</sup> — means any moving thing; and the idea here is, whatever moves in the field, or roams abroad. Everything is his — whether on the mountains, in the forest, or in the cultivated field.

Psalm 50:12. If I were hungry, I would not tell thee I should not have occasion to apply to you; I should not be dependent on you.

For the world is mine The earth; all that has been created.

And the fulness thereof All that fills the world; all that exists upon it. The whole is at his disposal; to all that the earth produces he has a right. This language is used to show the absurdity of the supposition that he was in any way dependent on man, or that the offering of sacrifice could be supposed in any way to lay him under obligation.

Psalm 50:13. Will I eat the flesh of bulls, or drink the blood of goats? This is said to show still further the absurdity of the views which seem to have prevailed among those who offered sacrifices. They offered them “as if” they were needed by God; “as if” they laid him under obligation; “as if” in some way they contributed to his happiness, or were essential to his welfare. The only supposition on which this could be true was, that he needed the flesh of the one for food, and the blood of the other for drink; or that he was sustained as creatures are. Yet this was a supposition, which, when it was stated in a formal manner, must be at once seen to be absurd; and hence the emphatic question in this verse. It may serve to illustrate this, also, to remark, that, among the pagan, the opinion did undoubtedly prevail that the gods ate and drank what was offered to them in sacrifice; whereas the truth was, that these things were consumed by the priests who attended on pagan altars, and conducted the devotions of pagan temples, and who found that it contributed much to their own support, and did much to secure the liberality of the people, to keep up the impression that what was thus offered was consumed by the gods. God appeals here to his own people in this earnest manner because it was to be presumed that “they” had higher conceptions of him than the pagan had; and that, enlightened as they were, they could not for a moment suppose these offerings necessary for him. This is one of the passages in the Old Testament which imply that God is a Spirit, and that, as such, he is to be worshipped in spirit and in truth. Compare ~~John~~ John 4:24.

Psalm 50:14. Offer unto God thanksgiving The word rendered “offer” in this place — j bʾæ<sup><2076></sup> — means properly “sacrifice.” So it is rendered by the Septuagint, θυσσον<sup><2380></sup> — and by the Vulgate, “immola.” The word is used, doubtless, with design — to show what was the “kind” of sacrifice with which God would be pleased, and which he would approve. It was not the mere “sacrifice” of animals, as they commonly understood the term; it was not the mere presentation of the bodies and the blood of slain beasts; it was an offering which proceeded from the heart, and which was expressive of gratitude and praise. This is not to be understood as implying that God did not require or approve of the offering of bloody sacrifices, but as implying that a higher sacrifice was necessary; that these would be vain and worthless unless they were accompanied with the offerings of the heart; and that his worship, even amidst outward forms, was to be a spiritual worship.

And pay thy vows unto the Most High To the true God, the most exalted Being in the universe. The word “vows” here — רדן<sup><15088></sup> — means properly a vow or promise; and then, a thing vowed; a votive offering, a sacrifice. The idea seems to be, that the true notion to be attached to the sacrifices which were prescribed and required was, that they were to be regarded as expressions of internal feelings and purposes; of penitence; of a deep sense of sin; of gratitude and love; and that the design of such sacrifices was not fulfilled unless the “vows” or pious purposes implied in the very nature of sacrifices and offerings were carried out in the life and conduct. They were not, therefore, to come merely with these offerings, and then feel that all the purpose of worship was accomplished. They were to carry out the true design of them by lives corresponding with the idea intended by such sacrifices — lives full of penitence, gratitude, love, obedience, submission, devotion. This only could be acceptable worship. Compare the notes at <sup><2311></sup> Isaiah 1:11-17. See also <sup><1971></sup> Psalm 76:11; <sup><2105></sup> Ecclesiastes 5:5.

<sup><1815></sup> Psalm 50:15. And call upon me in the day of trouble This is a part of real religion as truly as praise is, <sup><1814></sup> Psalm 50:14. This is also the duty and the privilege of all the true worshippers of God. To do this shows where the heart is, as really as direct acts of praise and thanksgiving. The purpose of all that is said here is to show that true religion — the proper service of God — does not consist in the mere offering of sacrifice, but that it is of a spiritual nature, and that the offering of sacrifice is of no value unless it is accompanied by corresponding acts of spiritual religion, showing that the heart has a proper appreciation of the mercies of God, and that it truly confides in him. Such spirituality in religion is expressed by acts of praise (<sup><1814></sup> Psalm 50:14); but it is also as clearly expressed (<sup><1815></sup> Psalm 50:15) by going to God in times of trouble, and rolling the burdens of life on his arm, and seeking consolation in him.

I will deliver thee I will deliver thee from trouble. This will occur

(a) either in this life, in accordance with the frequent promises of his word (compare the notes at <sup>4816</sup>Psalm 46:1); or

(b) wholly in the future world, where all who love God will be completely and forever delivered from all forms of sorrow.

And thou shalt glorify me That is, Thou wilt honor me, or do me honor, by thus coming to me with confidence in the day of calamity. There is no way in which we can honor God more, or show more clearly that we truly confide in him, than by going to him when everything seems to be dark; when his own ways and dealings are wholly incomprehensible to us, and committing all into his hands.

<sup>4816</sup>Psalm 50:16. But unto the wicked God saith This commences a second part of the subject. See the introduction. Thus far the psalm had reference to those who were merely external worshippers, or mere formalists, as showing that such could not be approved and accepted in the day of judgment; that spiritual religion — the offering of the “heart” — was necessary in order to acceptance with God. In this part of the psalm the same principles are applied to those who actually “violate” the law which they profess to receive as prescribing the rules of true religion, and which they profess to teach to others. The design of the psalm is not merely to reprove the mass of the people as mere formalists in religion, but especially to reprove the leaders and teachers of the people, who, under the form of religion, gave themselves up to a course of life wholly inconsistent with the true service of God. The address here, therefore, is to those who, while they professed to be teachers of religion, and to lead the devotions of others, gave themselves up to abandoned lives.

What hast thou to do What right hast thou to do this? How can people, who lead such lives, consistently and properly do this? The idea is, that they who profess to declare the law of a holy God should be themselves holy; that they who profess to teach the principles and doctrines of true religion should themselves be examples of purity and holiness.

To declare my statutes My laws. This evidently refers rather to the teaching of others than to the profession of their own faith. The language would be applicable to the priests under the Jewish system, who were expected not only to conduct the outward services of religion, but also to instruct the people; to explain the principles of religion; to be the guides and teachers of others. Compare <sup><4017></sup>Malachi 2:7. There is a striking resemblance between the language used in this part of the psalm (<sup><4316></sup>Psalm 50:16-20) and the language of the apostle Paul in <sup><4127></sup>Romans 2:17-23; and it would seem probable that the apostle in that passage had this portion of the psalm in his eye. See the notes at that passage.

Or that thou shouldest take my covenant in thy mouth Either as professing faith in it, and a purpose to be governed by it — or, more probably, as explaining it to others. The “covenant” here is equivalent to the “law” of God, or the principles of his religion; and the idea is, that he who undertakes to explain that to others, should himself be a holy man. He can have no “right” to attempt to explain it, if he is otherwise; he cannot hope to be “able” to explain it, unless he himself sees and appreciates its truth and beauty. This is as true now of the Gospel as it was of the law. A wicked man can have no right to undertake the work of the Christian ministry, nor can he be able to explain to others what he himself does not understand.

<sup><4317></sup>Psalm 50:17. Seeing thou hatest instruction That is, He is unwilling himself to be taught. He will not learn the true nature of religion, and yet he presumes to instruct others. Compare the notes at <sup><4121></sup>Romans 2:21.

And castest my words behind thee He treated them with contempt, or as unworthy of attention. He did not regard them as worthy of being “retained,” but threw them contemptuously away.

<sup><4318></sup>Psalm 50:18. When thou sawest a thief When you have seen or found one who was intending to commit theft, then (instead of rebuking or exposing him) you have been willing to act with him, and to divide the profits. The words “when thou “sawest”” would seem to imply readiness and willingness to engage with them, as “at first sight.” Whenever there was an opportunity to share in the results of theft, they were ready to engage in it. The main “point” in this is, that they were willing to do so even when observing the outward duties of religion, and when professing to be the true worshippers of God. A similar sentiment occurs in <sup><4121></sup>Romans 2:21. See the notes at that passage.

Then thou consentedst with him literally, Thou didst delight in him, or hadst pleasure in him. He was a man after thine own heart. Thou wast at once on good terms with him.

And hast been partaker with adulterers Margin, as in Hebrew, “thy portion was with adulterers.” This was a common vice among the Jewish people. See the notes at ~~8122~~Romans 2:22. The idea here is, that they were associated in practice with adulterers; they were guilty of that crime as others were. The point of the remark here is, that they did this under the cloak of piety, and when they were scrupulous and faithful in offering sacrifices, and in performing all the external rites of religion.

~~8123~~Psalm 50:19. Thou givest thy mouth to evil Margin, as in Hebrew, “thou sendest.” That is, they gave it up to evil; they employed it in evil: in falsehood, malice, deceit, slander, deception, detraction.

And thy tongue frameth deceit The word rendered “frameth” means properly to bind, to fasten; and then, to contrive, to frame. The meaning is, that it was employed in the work of deceit; that is, it was employed in devising and executing purposes of fraud and falsehood.

~~8124~~Psalm 50:20. Thou sittest and speakest against thy brother To the general character of falsehood and slander there is now added the fact that they were guilty of this in the most aggravated manner conceivable — against their nearest relations, the members of their own families. They were not only guilty of the crime against neighbors — against strangers — against persons to whom they sustained no near relationship; but against those of their own households — those whose characters, on that account, ought to have been especially dear to them. The words ““thou sittest”” probably refer to the fact that they would do this when enjoying social contact with them; in confidential conversation; when words of peace, and not of slander, might be properly expected. The word “brother” “might” be used as denoting any other man, or any one of the same nation; but the phrase which is added, “thine own mother’s son,” shows that it is here to be taken in the strictest sense.

Thou slanderest literally, “Thou givest to ruin.” Prof. Alexander renders it, “Thou wilt aim a blow.” The Septuagint, the Vulgate, Luther, and DeWette understand it of slander.

Thine own mother's son It is to be remembered that where polygamy prevailed there would be many children in the same family who had the same father, but not the same mother. The nearest relationship, therefore, was where there was the same mother as well as the same father. To speak of a brother, in the strictest sense, and as implying the nearest relationship, it would be natural to speak of one as having the same mother. The idea here is, that while professing religion, and performing its external rites with the most scrupulous care, they were guilty of the basest crimes, and showed an entire want of moral principle and of natural affection. External worship, however zealously performed, could not be acceptable in such circumstances to a holy God.

Compare the notes at <sup><2380></sup>Isaiah 18:4. The meaning is, that while they did these things — while they committed these abominations — he did not interfere. He did not come forth in his anger to destroy them. He had borne all this with patience. He had borne this until it was now time that he should interpose (<sup><2380></sup>Isaiah 18:3), and state the true principles of his government, and warn then of the consequences of such a course of sin and hypocrisy. Compare the notes at <sup><4473></sup>Acts 17:30.

Thou thoughtest that I was altogether such an one as thyself The idea here is, that they thought or imagined that God was just like themselves in the matter under consideration, and they acted under this impression; or, in other words, the fair interpretation of their conduct was that they thus regarded God. That is, they supposed that “God” would be satisfied with the “forms” of religion, as “they” were; that all he required was the proper offering of sacrifice, according to “their” views of the nature of religion; that he did not regard principle, justice, pure morality, sincerity, even as they themselves did not; and that he would not be strict to punish sin, or to reprove them for it, if these forms were kept up, even as “they” were not disposed to be rigid on the subject of sin.

But I will reprove thee I will rebuke thee alike for thy sins, and for this view of the nature of religion.

And set them in order literally, I will “array” them; that is, I will draw them out to view in their appropriate ranks and orders, as soldiers are drawn up in martial array. They shall be so arranged and classified that they may be seen distinctly.

Before thine eyes So that they may be plainly seen. The meaning is, that they would have a clear and impressive view of them: they would be made to see them as they were. This might be done then, as it is done now, either

(a) by their being set before their minds and hearts, so that they would see and feel the enormity of sin, to wit, by conviction for it; or

(b) by sending such punishment on them for their sins that they might “measure” the guilt and the number of their transgressions by the penalties which would be inflicted.

In some way all sinners will yet be made to see the nature and the extent of their guilt before God.

Psalm 50:22. Now consider this Understand this; give attention to this. The word “now” does not well express the force of the original. The Hebrew word is not an adverb of “time,” but a particle denoting “entreaty,” and would be better rendered by, “Oh, consider this;” or, “Consider this, I beseech you.” The matter is presented to them as that which deserved their most solemn attention.

Ye that forget God Who really forget him though you are professedly engaged in his worship; who, amidst the forms of religion, are actually living in entire forgetfulness of the just claims and of the true character of God.

Lest I tear you in pieces Language derived from the fury of a ravenous beast tearing his victim from limb to limb.

And there be none to deliver As none can do when God rises up in his wrath to inflict vengeance. None would “venture” to Interpose; none “could” rescue from his hand. There “is” a point of time in relation to all sinners when no one, not even the Redeemer — the great and merciful Mediator — will interpose to save; when the sinner will be left to be dealt with by simple, pure, unmixed and unmitigated “justice;” when mercy and kindness will have done their work in regard to them in vain; and when they will be left to the “mere desert” of their sins. At that point there is no power that can deliver them.

Psalm 50:23. Whoso offereth praise glorifieth me That is, he truly honors me; he is a true worshipper; he meets with my approbation. The word here rendered “offereth” is the same which is used in Psalm 50:14, and means “he that sacrifices:” here meaning, he that presents the sacrifice of praise. So the Septuagint: “the sacrifice of praise glorifies me.” So the Vulgate. The idea is, that the worship which God requires is “praise;” it is not the mere external act of homage; it is not the presentation of a bloody sacrifice; it is not the mere bending of the knee; it is not a mere outward form: it is that which proceeds from the heart, and which shows that there is there a spirit of true thankfulness, adoration, and love.

And to him that ordereth his conversation aright Margin, as in Hebrew, “that disposeth his way.” Or, more literally, “To him that “prepares” or “plans” his way;” that is, to him who is attentive to his going; who seeks to walk in the right path; who is anxious to go in the road that leads to a happier world; who is careful that all his conduct shall be in accordance with the rules which God has prescribed.

Will I show the salvation of God This may mean either, “I, the author of the psalm as a teacher” (compare <sup><4918></sup>Psalm 32:8); or, “I” as referring to God — as a promise that “He” would instruct such an one. The latter is the probable meaning, as it is God that has been speaking in the previous verse. The “salvation of God” is the salvation of which God is the author; or, which he alone can give. The “idea” here is, that where there is a true desire to find the way of truth and salvation, God will impart needful instruction. He will not suffer such an one to wander away and be lost. See the notes at <sup><4251></sup>Psalm 25:9.

The general ideas in the psalm, therefore, are

- (1) That there is to be a solemn judgment of mankind;
- (2) that the issues of that judgment will not be determined by the observance of the external forms of religion;
- (3) that God will judge people impartially for their sins, though they observe those forms of religion; and
- (4) that no worship of God can be acceptable which does not spring from the heart.

APPENDIX NOTES ON PSALM 50

Title. The prepositional prefix rendered “of” in the present superscription is the same (L) that is given as “for” in that of the preceding psalm. The same considerations are therefore here applicable, and incline us to conclude that the psalms which bear the name of Asaph were written by him. Asaph is frequently mentioned in the historical books as the chief, or one of the chiefs, of the choirs of Israel in the time of David. The psalms ascribed to him are twelve (Psalm 50; 73—83). Two of these, however (Psalm 74; 79), could not have been written by him or in his time, as their contents evidently assign them to the period of the captivity. The subject of Asaph's psalms are doctrinal or preceptive: their style, though less sweet than that of David, is much more vehement, and little inferior to the grandest parts of the prophecies of Isaiah and Habakkuk. The present psalm in particular is characterized by a very deep strain of thought and lofty tone of sentiment. — Kitto.

If David is, without controversy, the prince of the psalmists, Asaph stands next to him in honor. The psalms in which the Levites sang praise to the Lord in the days of Hezekiah are called “the words of David and of Asaph the seer,” <sup><4031></sup>2 Chronicles 29:31. The emphatic manner in which the prophetic title is here annexed to Asaph's name, suggests that he was favored with a larger measure of the prophetic spirit than any of the Levitical prophets who were his contemporaries. The facts known respecting him are briefly told. He was a Levite, of the family of Gershon. He was one of the three presidents of the Levitical singers, standing at Heman's right hand, as Ethan-Jeduthun did at his left. His four sons presided, under him, over four companies. Their descendants continued to minister in the service of song as long as the first temple stood, and are mentioned in this connection in the histories of Jehoshaphat and Hezekiah, <sup><4014></sup>2 Chronicles 20:14; 29:13. They mustered, to the number of 128, among the exiles who returned to Jerusalem with Zerubbabel, and are found ministering in the second temple before the cessation of prophecy. When Zerubbabel and Jeshua laid the foundation of the house, amidst the tears and shoutings of the remnant who had returned, it was the sons of Asaph who “praised the Lord with cymbals, after the ordinance of David king of Israel. And they sang together by course in praising and giving thanks unto the Lord; because he is good, for his mercy endureth forever toward Israel,” <sup><1510></sup>Ezra 3:10; <sup><6122></sup>Nehemiah 11:22.

There must have been several members of this family who inherited at once their father's name and his gift of minstrelsy, for of the twelve Asaphpsalms, several are of a date long subsequent to David's reign. It deserves to be noticed, however, as confirmatory of the testimony of the superscriptions in prefixing the name to all the twelve, that they constitute a class by themselves. They are the following: Psalm 50, and Psalm 73—83 inclusive. Dr. Delitzsch of Erlangen, who was the first to call attention to the peculiarities which characterize these Asaph-psalms, remarks, among other things, that "they are distinguished from the Korahite psalms by their prophetic and judicial character. Like the prophetic books, they frequently introduce God as the speaker. After the manner of the prophets, they contain lengthened representations of God as the Judge of all, as well as somewhat lengthened discourses spoken by him in that character, Psalm 50; 75; 82. Besides their predictive aspect, the Asaph-psalms present a historical aspect also, frequently commemorating facts pertaining to the ancient times; and one of them, the seventy-eighth, is altogether devoted to holding forth the ancient history of the nation as a mirror for the present generation to look into. The consecutive perusal of the twelve Asaph-psalms brings to light this other curious peculiarity, that Joseph, and the tribes descended from him, are mentioned more frequently in them than in any other." The reader may easily verify this last remark by turning to ~~19715~~ Psalm 77:15; 78:9,67; 80:1,2; 81:5.

Of the Asaph-psalms which we have reason to suppose were written by David's illustrious contemporary himself, three may be named as worthy of special notice. The seventy-eighth claims notice as one of the earliest of the great historical odes. It recapitulates the history of the chosen people from the exodus until the reign of David; and it comes behind no psalm of its class for depth of insight into the treasures of instruction which the Spirit of God has stored up in the sacred history for the edification of all generations. Psalm 73 is another of Asaph's; and it is one for which God's people will never cease to cherish his memory. It is a kind of lyrical epitome of the book of Job. It delineates the trial and triumph of grace in a believer, whose faith, after staggering at the sight of prosperous wickedness, recovers on observing the sudden destruction of the ungodly, and especially on recollecting (what he feels he ought never to have forgotten) that the chief end and felicity of man is, after all, to be found in God — not in worldly prosperity, but in the participation of God's favor.

Psalm 50 is from the same pen. It is remarkable for this, that although written at the time when the Levitical ritual was celebrated with its utmost splendor, and by a Levite, whose office called him to act a principal part in some of its most splendid services, it contains as energetic a protest as the apostle Paul ever uttered, against the imagination that ceremonies are in themselves well-pleasing to God. It preaches, from the midst of the ritual magnificence of the age of David and Solomon, the very doctrine which our blessed Lord unfolded to the astonished woman of Samaria at Jacob's well, that God is a Spirit, and they that worship him must worship him in spirit and in truth. What could be plainer or bolder than these words (<sup><3507></sup>Psalm 50:7-12)? These last (<sup><3504></sup>Psalm 50:14,15) are golden sentences! The hecatombs that Solomon and the congregation offered at the dedication of the house were, doubtless, acceptable in God's sight; but they owed their acceptance to the joyful faith and thankfulness that animated the offerers — to their humble reverence and unreserved devotion to the God of Israel. And there is not a poor troubled one on earth this day, there is not a soul crushed beneath a load of sorrow, in whom, if he will but importunately call on God, "making known to him his requests with thanksgiving," <sup><3006></sup>Philippians 4:6, God will not take a higher delight than he did in the costly and magnificent offering of the king. — Binnie.

<sup><3508></sup>Psalm 50:8. Not because of thy sacrifices ... The reason for this act of judgment is given. First, negatively (positively, <sup><3504></sup>Psalm 50:14,15). It is not because the people had neglected the externals of the law, or had forgotten to offer the sacrifices appointed by the law. They had brought them; but they had brought them as if the act were everything, and as if the meaning of the act, and the spirit in which it was done, were nothing. But God demands no service for its own sake, but only as the expression of an obedient will. A thankful heart is more than all burnt-offerings. The prophets are full of the like sentiments (<sup><2312></sup>Isaiah 1:12; 58; 66:3; <sup><3306></sup>Micah 6:6-8; <sup><3006></sup>Hosea 6:6). And so deep-rooted was this tendency in the people to exaggerate the importance of the dead work, to bring the sacrifice of the dumb animal instead of the sacrifice of the heart, that Jeremiah carries the opposition between sacrifices and obedience even to the extreme of a paradox (<sup><2472></sup>Jeremiah 7:22,23). — Perowne.

<sup><3523></sup>Psalm 50:23. Whoso offereth praise ... The English version, with its rendering, "offereth praise," loses sight of the distinct reference to the Mosaic sacrifices, which are not indeed absolutely superseded — the time had not yet come for this — but are put in their true place. The very great prominence again given to thanksgiving is worthy of our careful notice.

There is no duty so commonly forgotten. God showers down his benefits upon us with both hands, large and free, and we receive them as a matter of course, and never consider whose love has bestowed them; and thus in our unthankfulness we rob God of his honor.

Further, as thanksgiving is thus dwelt upon because it is so commonly forgotten, so it is also put as the sum of religion, because it, in fact, includes all else. Faith, and prayer, and self-denial, and the endurance of the cross, and all holy exercises are, as Calvin observes, comprised in this one grace. For it is by faith only that we are sensible of God's goodness; therefore he who is truly of a thankful spirit has faith; he who is thankful triumphs over his earthly trials; he who is thankful is accomplishing man's highest end, inasmuch as in all things he gives glory to God. The instruction of the psalm abides: it has not lost its force. The sacraments and ordinances of the Christian church may become to us what sacrifice and offering were to the Jews, a mere opus operatum; a man may give all his goods to feed the poor, and yet have no love; a man may be punctual in his attendance at all holy ordinances, and yet cherish iniquity in his heart, and upon occasion secretly practice it. Hence, the psalm is truly prophetic, that is, universal in its character. It deals with "the sinners and the hypocrites in Zion;" but it reaches to all people in all places to the end of time. — Perowne.

This is the third time that the psalmist has inculcated the truth, that the most acceptable sacrifice in God's sight is praise, by which we express to him the gratitude of our hearts for his blessings. The repetition is not a needless one, and that on two accounts. In the first place there is nothing with which we are more frequently chargeable than forgetfulness of the benefits of the Lord. Scarcely one out of a thousand attracts our notice; and if it does it is only slightly, and, as it were, in passing. And, secondly, we do not assign that importance to the duty of praise which it deserves. We are apt to neglect it as something trivial, and altogether commonplace; whereas it constitutes the chief exercise of godliness, in which God would have us to be engaged during the whole of our life. In the words before us the sacrifice of praise is asserted to form the true and proper worship of God. The words, will glorify me, imply that God is then truly and properly worshipped, and the glory which he requires yielded to him, when his goodness is celebrated with a sincere and grateful heart; but that all the other sacrifices to which hypocrites attach such importance are worthless in his estimation, and no part whatsoever of his worship. Under the word praise, however, is comprehended, as I have already noticed, both faith and prayer. There must be an experience of the goodness of the Lord before our mouths can be opened to praise him for it, and this goodness can only be experienced by faith. Hence, it follows that the whole of spiritual worship is comprehended under what is either presupposed in the exercise of faith, or flows from it. — Calvin.

NOTES ON PSALM 51

This psalm purports to be a psalm of David, and the contents of it accord with this supposition, and with the statement in the title in regard to the occasion on which it was composed. There would be no difficulty on the subject, and no ground for hesitation, in regard to the author and the occasion on which it was composed, if it were not for the prayer in ~~Psalm~~ Psalm 51:18, "Do good in thy good pleasure unto Zion; build thou the walls of Jerusalem," which, it has been maintained by DeWette, Rosenmuller, Venema, and others, must have been written in the time of the Babylonian exile. Except this, it is admitted on all hands that the psalm in its composition accords entirely with the statement in the title, that it was composed by David. It has, in fact, been generally admitted that the psalm "was" composed by David, though it is the opinion of Rosenmuller, Venema, and Doederlein, that the last two verses were added by a later hand.

According to the title, the psalm was composed on occasion of the great fault and crime in the life of David, and as an expression of his penitence in view of his sin. On the phrase "To the chief Musician," see the notes at the title to Psalm 4. We are not to suppose that this title was prefixed to the psalm by David himself, but the use to be made of it by committing it to the "chief Musician," or to the overseer of the music in the public worship of God shows that the psalm was considered as designed to be used in public, and was not a mere expression of the private feelings of the author. It was, doubtless, commonly understood (and was probably so intended by David himself) that it was to be used as a "public" expression of his penitence in view of his crime; and both the fact of its composition, and the manner in which it was to be used, were to be interpreted as indicating his willingness that the widest publicity should be given to his confession, and that the memory of the crime and of his penitence should be perpetuated in all ages of the world. The phrase in the title, "A "Psalm" of David," denotes that it was to be used for public worship, or as connected with praise. It was designed not merely to express his private feelings, but was intended to be employed in the solemn services of public devotion. See introduction to Psalm 3.

The phrase “when Nathan the prophet came unto him,” refers to the fact recorded in ~~<000>~~2 Samuel 12:1-13. It means that the psalm was the “result” of the visit of Nathan to him; or that it records the feelings of the author, when the sense of his sin had been brought to his mind by the faithful message of the prophet. We may suppose that the record of his feelings was made without delay, for the psalm bears all the marks of having been composed under the deepest feeling, and not of being the result of calm reflection. On the phrase “after he had gone in to Bath-sheba,” see the sad record in ~~<000>~~2 Samuel 11:1-5.

DeWette, however, maintains that psalm could not have been composed David, but that it must have been in the time of the Babylonian exile. The only argument which he adduces in favor of this opinion is the prayer in ~~<518>~~Psalm 51:18, “Build thou the walls of Jerusalem,” which, he says, could not have been a prayer offered by David, as there was in his time nothing which would make this prayer proper. Jerusalem was not then in ruins. It had been strongly fortified by David himself, and required no particular interposition of God as if to “restore” walls that had been thrown down; whereas, in the time of the exile, such a prayer would have been eminently proper, and would be a natural petition for one who loved his country, and who, as an expression of his own penitence, was desirous of doing all he could for the cause of religion. The difficulty will be more appropriately met in the notes at those verses. It may be observed here, however, that possibly the expression “Build thou the walls of Jerusalem,” “may” be used in a figurative or spiritual sense, expressive of a desire that God would bless his people; that he would interpose in their behalf; that he would be their protector and friend; that he would do for them what would be well expressed by building strong and secure walls around a city. But it may be asked, also, Is it absolutely certain that when the psalm was composed the work of enclosing the city of Jerusalem with walls had been completed? May it not have been, in fact, that at that very time David was engaged in “carrying out” his design of rendering the city impregnable by walls and towers, and that in the midst of his intense sorrow for his own sin, though so heinous and aggravated, his heart may have turned to that which was so dear to him as an object to be accomplished, and that even then, in connection with his bitter repentance for his sin, he may have prayed that God would favor that great design? It is no evidence that our sorrow for sin is not deep and genuine, that, even in our expressions of penitence, our heart turns to Zion — to the Church — to the great work which the Church is accomplishing — and that, though our prayers “began” with a reference to our own sin, they should “close” with a petition that God would bless his people, and fulfill the great purposes so near to the heart of piety in reference to the progress of true religion in the world. Indeed, from the very narrative in 2 Samuel 6—12. it would seem probable that the work of fortifying the city of Jerusalem, contemplated by David, was not yet completed, when he committed the crime for which this psalm is the expression of penitence. It was a work of years to do this: and it is not improbable that the guilty transaction to which this psalm refers occurred in the very midst of his design for the defense and protection of the capital of his kingdom.

The psalm consists of two parts:

I. In the first (<sup><9510></sup>Psalm 51:1-12), the psalmist confesses his guilt, and prays for pardon. He begins with an earnest plea for mercy (<sup><9510></sup>Psalm 51:1-2); he humbly acknowledges his offence, without any attempt to vindicate himself, or to apologise for it (<sup><9510></sup>Psalm 51:3-6); he pleads with God to cleanse him, to pardon him, to create in him a new heart, and not to cast him off or to take his Holy Spirit from him (<sup><9510></sup>Psalm 51:7-12).

II. In the second part (<sup><9513></sup>Psalm 51:13-19) he shows how he would manifest his sense of the divine mercy if he was forgiven: expressing the purpose to lead a new life; to devote himself to the duties of religion; to do all in his power to repair the evils of his conduct, and especially to induce others to avoid the way of sin, warning them by his example. He says that he would teach transgressors the true ways of God, and that sinners would be converted to Him, <sup><9513></sup>Psalm 51:13; that he would sing aloud the praise of God, <sup><9514></sup>Psalm 51:14,15; that he would offer to God the sacrifice of a broken heart and a contrite spirit, <sup><9516></sup>Psalm 51:16,17; and he then pleads (<sup><9518></sup>Psalm 51:18,19), that God would interpose and bless Zion, that the great work might be completed in which he had been engaged in defending the city, and in preparing a place which would be secure, where God might be worshipped, and where sacrifices and offerings might perpetually ascend on his altar.

<sup><9501></sup>Psalm 51:1. Have mercy upon me, O God This is the utterance of a full heart; a heart crushed and broken by the consciousness of sin. The psalmist had been made to see his great guilt; and his first act is to cry out for mercy. There is no attempt to excuse his sin, or to apologise for it; there is no effort to vindicate his conduct; there is no complaint of the righteousness of that holy law which condemned him. It was “guilt” that was before his mind; guilt only; deep and dreadful guilt. The appeal properly expresses the state of a mind that is overwhelmed at the remembrance of crime, and that comes with earnestness to God to plead for pardon. The only hope of a sinner when crushed with the consciousness of sin is the mercy of God; and the plea for that mercy will be urged in the most earnest and impassioned language that the mind can employ. “Accordingly to thy Iovingkindness.” On the meaning of the word used here, see the notes at <sup><1017></sup>Psalm 36:7.

(a) The “ground” of his hope was the compassion of God:

(b) the “measure” of that hope was His boundless beneficence; or, in other words, he felt that there was need of “all” the compassion of a God.

His sin was so great, his offence was so aggravated, that he could have no hope but in a Being of infinite compassion, and he felt that the need of mercy in his case could be measured and covered “only” by that infinite compassion.

According unto the multitude of thy tender mercies The same idea occurs here also. The psalmist fixed his eye on the “vastness” of the divine mercy; on the numberless “acts” of that mercy toward the guilty; here he found his hope, and here alone. Every instance of extraordinary mercy which had occurred in the world furnished him now with an argument in his appeal to God; was an encouragement to him “in” that appeal; was a ground of hope that his appeal would not be rejected. So to us: every instance in which a great sinner has been forgiven is evidence that we may be forgiven also, and is an encouragement to us to come to God for pardon. See the notes at <sup><1016></sup>1 Timothy 1:16.

Blot out my transgressions In allusion to an account that is kept, or a charge made, when such an account is wiped away, erased, or blotted out. Compare <sup><1022></sup>Exodus 32:32,33; see the notes at <sup><1025></sup>Isaiah 43:25; 44:22; <sup><1024></sup>Colossians 2:14. Never was a more earnest appeal made by a sinner than that which is made in this verse; never was there a more sincere cry for mercy. It shows us where we should “begin” in our prayers when we are pressed down with the consciousness of sin — with a cry for “mercy,” and not an appeal to “justice;” it shows us what is to be the “ground” and the “measure” of our hope — the mere compassion of an infinitely benevolent God; it shows us the place which we must take, and the argument on which we must rely — a place among sinners, and an argument that God has been merciful to great sinners, and that therefore he may be merciful to us.

Psalm 51:2. Wash me thoroughly from mine iniquity literally, ““Multiply” to wash me.” The word rendered “thoroughly” is a verb, either in the infinitive or imperative mood, and suggests the idea of “multiplying” or “increasing.” The reference is to that which might need constant or repeated washings in order to remove a stain adverbially to denote intensity, or thoroughness. On the word wash as applicable to sin, see the notes at <sup><3016></sup>Isaiah 1:16.

And cleanse me from my sin Remove it entirely. Make me wholly pure. See the notes at <sup><3016></sup>Isaiah 1:16. In what manner he hoped that this would be done is shown in the following portions of the psalm. It was —

(a) by forgiveness of the past, <sup><510></sup>Psalm 51:9; and

(b) by making the heart pure and holy through the renewing and sanctifying influences of the Holy Spirit, <sup><510></sup>Psalm 51:10,11.

Psalm 51:3. For I acknowledge my transgressions literally, I know, or make known. That is, he knew that he was a sinner, and he did not seek to cloak or conceal that fact. He came with the knowledge of it himself; he was willing to make acknowledgment of it before God. There was no attempt to conceal it; to excuse it. Compare the notes at <sup><510></sup>Psalm 32:5. The word ““for”” does not imply that he referred to his willingness to confess his sins as an act of merit, but it indicates a state of mind which was necessary to forgiveness, and without which he could not hope for pardon.

And my sin is ever before me That is, It is now constantly before my mind. It had not been so until Nathan brought it vividly to his recollection (<sup><3021></sup>2 Samuel 12:1ff); but after that it was continually in his view. He could not turn his mind from it. The memory of his guilt followed him; it pressed upon him; it haunted him. It was no wonder that this was so. The only ground of wonder in the case is that it did not occur “before” Nathan made that solemn appeal to him, or that he could have been for a moment insensible to the greatness of his crime. The whole transaction, however, shows that people “may” be guilty of enormous sins, and have for a long time no sense of their criminality; but that “when” the consciousness of guilt is made to come home to the soul, nothing will calm it down. Everything reminds the soul of it; and nothing will drive away its recollection. In such a state the sinner has no refuge — no hope of permanent peace — but in the mercy of God.

Psalm 51:4. Against thee, thee only, have I sinned That is, the sin, considered as an offence against God, now appeared to him so enormous and so aggravated, that, for the moment, he lost sight of it considered in any other of its bearings. It “was” a sin, as all other sins are, primarily and mainly against God; it derived its chief enormity from that fact. We are not to suppose that David did not believe and notice that he had done wrong to people, or that he had offended against human laws, and against the well-being of society. His crime against Uriah and his family was of the deepest and most aggravated character, but still the offence derived its chief heinousness from the fact that it was a violation of the law of God. The state of mind here illustrated is that which occurs in every case of true penitence. It is not merely because that which has been done is a violation of human law; it is not that it brings us to poverty or disgrace; it is not that it exposes us to punishment on earth from a parent, a teacher, or civil ruler; it is not that it exposes us to punishment in the world to come: it is that it is of itself, and apart from all other relations and consequences, “an offence against God;” a violation of his pure and holy law; a wrong done against him, and in his sight. Unless there is this feeling there can be no true penitence; and unless there is this feeling there can be no hope of pardon, for God forgives offences only as committed against himself; not as involving us in dangerous consequences, or as committed against our fellow-men.

And done this evil in thy sight Or, When thine eye was fixed on me. Compare the notes at Isaiah 65:3. God saw what he had done; and David knew, or might have known, that the eye of God was upon him in his wickedness. It was to him then a great aggravation of his sin that he had “dared” to commit it when he “knew” that God saw everything. The presence of a child — or even of an idiot — would restrain people from many acts of sin which they would venture to commit if alone; how much more should the fact that God is always present, and always sees all that is done, restrain us from open and from secret transgression.

That thou mightest be justified when thou speakest That thy character might be vindicated in all that thou hast said; in the law which thou hast revealed; in the condemnation of the sin in that law; and in the punishment which thou mayest appoint. That is, he acknowledged his guilt. He did not seek to apologise for it, or to vindicate it. God was right, and he was wrong. The sin deserved all that God in his law “had” declared it to deserve; it deserved all that God by any sentence which he might pass upon him “would” declare it to deserve. The sin was so aggravated that “any” sentence which God might pronounce would not be beyond the measure of its ill-desert.

And be clear when thou judgest Be regarded as right, holy, pure, in the judgment which thou mayest appoint. See this more fully explained in the notes at ~~4510~~ Romans 3:4.

~~4515~~ Psalm 51:5. Behold, I was shapen in iniquity The object of this important verse is to express the deep sense which David had of his depravity. That sense was derived from the fact that this was not a sudden thought, or a mere outward act, or an offence committed under the influence of strong temptation, but that it was the result of an entire corruption of his nature — of a deep depravity of heart, running back to the very commencement of his being. The idea is, that he could not have committed this offence unless he had been thoroughly corrupt, and always corrupt. The sin was as heinous and aggravated “as if” in his very conception and birth there had been nothing but depravity. He looked at his sin, and he looked back to his own origin, and he inferred that the one demonstrated that in the other there was no good thing, no tendency to goodness, no germ of goodness, but that there was evil, and only evil; as when one looks at a tree, and sees that it bears sour or poisonous fruit, he infers that it is in the very nature of the tree, and that there is nothing else in the tree, from its origin, but a tendency to produce just such fruit. Of course, the idea here is not to cast reflections on the character of his mother, or to refer to her feelings in regard to his conception and birth, but the design is to express his deep sense of his own depravity; a depravity so deep as to demonstrate that it must have had its origin in the very beginning of his existence. The word rendered “I was shapen” — Wj ~~42342~~ — is from a word — Wj ~~42342~~ — which means properly, “to turn around, to twist, to whirl;” and then it comes to mean “to twist oneself with pain, to writhe;” and then it is used especially with reference to the pains of childbirth. <sup><2338></sup>Isaiah 13:8; 23:4; 26:18; 66:7,8; <sup><3040></sup>Micah 4:10. That is the meaning here. The idea is simply that he was “born” in iniquity; or that he was a sinner when he was born; or that his sin could be traced back to his very birth — as one might say that he was born with a love of music, or with a love of nature, or with a sanguine, a phlegmatic, or a melancholy temperament. There is not in the Hebrew word any idea corresponding to the word “shapen,” as if he had been “formed” or “moulded” in that manner by divine power; but the entire meaning of the word is exhausted by saying that his sin could be traced back to his “very birth;” that it was so deep and aggravated, that it could be accounted for — or that he could express his sense of it — in no other way, than by saying that he was “born a sinner.” How that occurred, or how it was connected with the first apostasy in Adam, or how the fact that he was thus born could be vindicated, is not intimated, nor is it alluded to. There is no statement that the sin of another was “imputed” to him; or that he was “responsible” for the sin of Adam; or that he was guilty “on account of” Adam’s sin, for on these points the psalmist makes no assertion. It is worthy of remark, further, that the psalmist did not endeavor to “excuse” his guilt on the ground that he was ““born”” in iniquity; nor did he allude to that fact with any purpose of “exculpating” himself. The fact that he was thus born only deepened his sense of his own guilt, or showed the enormity of the offence which was the regular result or outbreak of that early depravity. The points, therefore, which are established by this expression of the psalmist, so far as the language is designed to illustrate how human nature is conceived, are

(1) that people are born with a propensity to sin; and

(2) that this fact does not excuse us in sin, but rather tends to aggravate and deepen our guilt.

The language goes no further than this in regard to the question of original sin or native depravity. The Septuagint agrees with this interpretation — <sup><2400></sup>ιδου <sup><1063></sup>γαρ <sup><1722></sup>εν <sup><458></sup>ανομιας <sup><458></sup>συνεληφθην . So the Vulgate: in iniquitatibus conceptus sum.

And in sin did my mother conceive me Margin, as in Hebrew, “warm me.” This language simply traces his sin back to the time when he began to exist. The previous expression traced it to “his birth;” this expression goes back to the very beginning of “life;” when there were the first indications of life. The idea is, “as soon as I began to exist I was a sinner; or, I had then a propensity to sin — a propensity, the sad proof and result of which is that enormous act of guilt which I have committed.”

Psalm 51:6. Behold, thou desirest truth in the inward parts The word rendered “desirest,” means to have pleasure in; to delight in; and the idea is that this only is agreeable to God, or this only accords with his own nature. The word rendered “inward parts,” means properly the reins, and is usually employed to denote the seat of the mind, the feelings, the intellect. Compare the notes at <sup><1838></sup>Job 38:36. The allusion is to the “soul;” and the idea is, that God could be satisfied with nothing “but” purity in the soul. The “connection” is this: David was deeply conscious of his own pollution; his deep, early, native depravity. This, in his own mind, he contrasted strongly with the nature of God, and with what God must require, and be pleased with. He “felt” that God could not approve of or love such a heart as his, so vile, so polluted, so corrupt; and he felt that it was necessary that he should have a pure heart in order to meet with the favor of a God so holy. But how was that to be obtained? His mind at once adverted to the fact that it could come only from God; and hence, the psalm now turns from confession to prayer. The psalmist pleads earnestly (<sup><1850></sup>Psalm 51:7-10) that God “would” thus cleanse and purify his soul.

And in the hidden part In the secret part; the heart; the depths of the soul. The cleansing was to begin in that which was hidden from the eye of man; in the soul itself. Wisdom, heavenly, saving wisdom, was to have its seat there; the cleansing needed was not any mere outward purification, it was the purification of the soul itself.

Thou shalt make me to know wisdom Thou only canst enable me to understand what is truly wise. This wisdom, this cleansing, this knowledge of the way in which a guilty man can be restored to favor, can be imparted only by thee; and “thou wilt do it.” There is here, therefore, at the same time a recognition of the truth that this “must” come from God, and an act of faith, or a strong assurance that he “would” impart this.

Psalm 51:7. Purge me with hyssop, and I shall be clean On the word hyssop, see the notes at <sup><1859></sup>John 19:29; <sup><1899></sup>Hebrews 9:19. The plant or herb was much used by the Hebrews in their sacred purifications and sprinklings: <sup><1922></sup>Exodus 12:22; <sup><1840></sup>Leviticus 14:4,6,49,51; <sup><1043></sup>1 Kings 4:33. Under this name the Hebrews seem to have comprised not only the common “hyssop” of the shops, but also other aromatic plants, as mint, wild marjoram, etc. — Gesenius, “Lexicon” The idea of the psalmist here evidently is not that the mere sprinkling with hyssop would make him clean; but he prays for that cleansing of which the sprinkling with hyssop was an emblem, or which was designed to be represented by that. The whole structure of the psalm implies that he was seeking an “internal” change, and that he did not depend on any mere outward ordinance or rite. The word rendered “purge” is from the word afj, <sup><H2398></sup> — which means “to sin.” In the Piel form it means to bear the blame (or “loss”) for anything; and then to “atone for, to make atonement, to expiate:” <sup><01313></sup>Genesis 31:39; <sup><01625></sup>Leviticus 6:26; <sup><04919></sup>Numbers 19:19. Here it conveys the notion of cleansing from sin “by” a sacred rite, or by that which was signified by a sacred rite. The idea was that the sin was to be removed or taken away, so that he might be free from it, or that “that” might be accomplished which was represented by the sprinkling with hyssop, and that the soul might be made pure. Luther has rendered it with great force — Entsundige mich mit Ysop — “Unsin me with hyssop.”

Wash me That is, cleanse me. Sin is represented as “defiling,” and the idea of “washing” it away is often employed in the Scriptures. See the notes at <sup><2016></sup>Isaiah 1:16.

And I shall be whiter than snow See the notes at <sup><2018></sup>Isaiah 1:18. The prayer is, that he might be made “entirely” clean; that there might be no remaining pollution in his soul.

<sup><0518></sup>Psalm 51:8. Make me to hear joy and gladness That is, the voice of forgiveness, causing joy and rejoicing. What he wished to hear was the kind voice of God in pronouncing his pardon; not the voice of anger and condemnation. God now condemned him. The law condemned him. His own conscience condemned him. The result was anguish and sorrow. The burden was great and overpowering — such as to crush him; to break all his “bones.” He longed to hear the sweet voice of forgiveness, by which he might have peace, and by which his soul might be made to rejoice. Compare the notes at <sup><0511E></sup>Psalm 32:1,2.

That the bones which thou hast broken may rejoice That is, which have been crushed or broken by the weight of sin. Compare the notes at <sup><0511B></sup>Psalm 32:3. See also <sup><0511D></sup>Psalm 6:2; 22:14; 31:10; 38:3. The word “rejoice” means here, be free from suffering; the prayer is that the burden which had crushed him might be removed.

Psalm 51:9. Hide thy face from my sins That is, Do not look on them; avert thy face from them; do not regard them. Compare the notes at Ps: 13:1.

And blot out all mine iniquities Take them entirely away. Let the account be erased, cancelled, destroyed. See the notes at Psalm 51:1.

Psalm 51:10. Create in me a clean heart, O God The word rendered “create,” arB<sup>ch1254</sup> — is a word which is properly employed to denote an act of “creation;” that is, of causing something to exist where there was nothing before. It is the word which is used in Genesis 1:1: “In the beginning God “created” the heaven and the earth,” and which is commonly used to express the act of creation. It is used “here” evidently in the sense of causing that to exist which did not exist before; and there is clearly a recognition of the divine “power,” or a feeling on the part of David that this could be done by God alone. The idea is, however, not that a new “substance” might be brought into being to which the name “a clean heart” might be given, but that he might “have” a clean heart; that his heart might be made pure; that his affections and feelings might be made right; that he might have what he was conscious that he did “not” now possess — a clean or a pure heart. This, he felt, could be produced only by the power of God; and the passage, therefore, proves that it is a doctrine of the Old Testament, as it is of the New, that the human heart is changed only by a divine agency.

And renew a right spirit within me Margin, “a constant spirit.” The Hebrew word — WK<sup>ch3559</sup> — means properly, that which is “erect,” or that which is made to stand up, or which is firm or established. It is used to denote

(a) that which is upright, right, proper: Exodus 8:26; Job 42:8; Psalm 5:9;

(b) that which is right, true, sincere, Psalm 78:37;

(c) that which is firm, constant, fixed.

This would seem to be the meaning here. He prays for a heart that would be firm in the purposes of virtue; that would not yield to temptation; that would carry out holy resolutions; that would be steadfast in the service of God. The word “renew” here means to be or to make new; to produce something new. It is also used in the sense of making anew, as applied to buildings or cities in the sense of “rebuilding” or “repairing” them:

<3511> Isaiah 61:4; <4458> 2 Chronicles 15:8; 24:4. The word here would naturally convey the idea that there had been formerly a right and proper spirit in him, which he prayed might now be restored. The language is that of one who had done right formerly, but who had fallen into sin, and who desired that he might be brought back into his former condition.

<3511> Psalm 51:11. Cast me not away from thy presence That is, Do not reject me, or cast me off entirely; do not abandon me; do not leave me in my sin and sorrow. The language is derived from the idea that true happiness is to be found in the “presence” of God, and that to be exiled from him is misery. Compare the notes at <3911> Psalm 16:11; 31:20. See also <3913> Psalm 140:13.

And take not thy holy Spirit from me It is not certain that David understood by the phrase “thy Holy Spirit” precisely what is now denoted by it as referring to the third person of the Trinity. The language, as used by him, would denote some influence coming from God producing holiness, “as if” God breathed his own spirit, or his own self, into the soul. The language, however, is appropriate to be used in the higher and more definite sense in which it is now employed, as denoting that sacred Spirit — the Holy Spirit — by whom the heart is renewed, and by whom comfort is imparted to the soul. It is not necessary to suppose that the inspired writers of the Old Testament had a full and complete comprehension of the meaning of the words which they employed, or that they appreciated all that their words might properly convey, or the fullness of signification in which they might be properly used in the times of the Gospel. Compare the notes at <4011> 1 Peter 1:10-12. The language used here by David — “take not” — implies that he had been formerly in possession of that which he now sought. There was still in his heart that which might be regarded as the work of the Spirit of God; and he earnestly prayed that that might not be wholly taken away on account of his sin, or that he might not be entirely abandoned to despair.

<3512> Psalm 51:12. Restore unto me the joy of thy salvation literally, “Cause the joy of thy salvation to return.” This implies that he had formerly known what was the happiness of being a friend of God, and of having a hope of salvation. That joy had been taken from him by his sin. He had lost his peace of mind. His soul was sad and cheerless. Sin always produces this effect. The only way to enjoy religion is to do that which is right; the only way to secure the favor of God is to obey his commands; the only way in which we can have comforting evidence that we are his children is by doing that which shall be pleasing to him: <sup><6172></sup>1 John 2:29; 3:7,10. The path of sin is a dark path, and in that path neither hope nor comfort can be found.

And uphold me with thy free spirit That is, Sustain me; keep me from falling. The words ““with thy”” are not in the original, and there is nothing there to indicate that by the word “spirit” the psalmist refers to the Spirit of God, though it should be observed that there is nothing “against” such a supposition. The word rendered “free” — bydñ,<sup><15081></sup> — means properly “willing, voluntary, ready, prompt,” <sup><1382></sup>1 Chronicles 28:21; <sup><13816></sup>Exodus 35:5. Then the word means liberal, generous, noble-minded; <sup><2316></sup>Isaiah 32:5,8; <sup><11707></sup>Proverbs 17:7,26. It would seem here to mean “a “willing” spirit,” referring to David’s own mind or spirit; and the prayer is, that God would uphold or sustain him “in” a “willing” spirit or state of mind; that is, a state of mind in which he would be “willing” and “ready” to obey all the commands of God, and to serve him faithfully. What he prayed for was grace and strength that he might be “kept” in a state of mind which would be constant and firm (<sup><15110></sup>Psalm 51:10), and a state in which he would always be found “willing” and ready to keep the commandments of God. It is a proper object of prayer by all that they may be always kept in a state of mind in which they will be willing to do all that God requires of them, and to bear all that may be laid on them.

<sup><45113></sup>Psalm 51:13. Then will I teach transgressors thy ways As an expression of gratitude, and as the result of his own painful experience. He would show them, from that experience, the evil and the bitterness of sin in itself; he would show them with what dreadful consequences sin must always be followed; he would show them the nature of true repentance; he would show them what was required in order that sin might be forgiven; he would encourage them to come to that God who had forgiven him. So the Saviour charged Peter, from his own bitter experience in having fallen under the power of temptation, to strengthen and encourage those who were struggling with the depravity of their own hearts, and who were in danger of falling:

And sinners shall be converted unto thee They would see from his case the evil of transgression; they would learn from his example that mercy might be found; they would be persuaded to flee from the wrath to come. The best preparation for success in winning souls to God, and turning them from the error of their ways, is a deep personal experience of the guilt and the danger of sin, and of the great mercy of God in its forgiveness. No man can hope to be successful who has not experienced this in his own soul; no one who has, will labor wholly in vain in such a work.

Psalm 51:14. Deliver me from blood-guiltiness, O God Margin, as in Hebrew, “bloods.” So it is rendered by the Septuagint and the Latin Vulgate. Luther renders it “blood-guilt.” DeWette, “from blood.” Compare Isaiah 4:4. The “plural” form — “bloods” — is used probably to mark “intensity,” or to denote “great” guilt. The allusion is to the guilt of shedding blood, or taking life (compare Genesis 9:5,6), and the reference is undoubtedly to his guilt in causing Uriah, the husband of Bathsheba, to be slain. 2 Samuel 11:14-17. It was this which weighed upon his conscience, and filled him with alarm. The guilt of this he prayed might be taken away, that he might have peace. The “fact” of the shedding of that blood could never be changed; the real “criminality” of that fact would always remain the same; the “crime” itself could never be declared to be innocence; his own personal “ill desert” for having caused the shedding of that blood would always remain; but the sin might be pardoned, and his soul could thus find peace. The penalty might be remitted, and, though guilty, he might be assured of the divine favor. He could not, indeed, repair the evil to Uriah — for “he” had gone beyond the power of David for good or for evil — but he could do much to express his sense of the wrong; he could do much to save others from a similar course; he could do much to benefit society by keeping others from the like guilt. He could not, indeed, recall Uriah from the grave, and repair the evil which he had done to “him,” but he might save others from such a crime, and thus preserve many a useful life from the effects of unrestrained guilty passions. We cannot, indeed, by penitence recall those whom we have murdered; we cannot restore purity to those whom we have seduced; we cannot restore faith to the young man whom we may have made a sceptic; but we may do much to restrain others from sin, and much to benefit the world even when we have been guilty of wrongs that cannot be repaired.

Thou God of my salvation On whom I am dependent for salvation; who art alone the source of salvation to me.

And my tongue shall sing aloud of thy righteousness Compare the notes at <sup><3158></sup>Psalm 35:28.

<sup><3515></sup>Psalm 51:15. O Lord, open thou my lips That is, by taking away my guilt; by giving me evidence that my sins are forgiven; by taking this burden from me, and filling my heart with the joy of pardon. The original word is in the future tense, but the meaning is well expressed in our common translation. There was, in fact, at the same time a confident expectation that God “would” thus open his lips, and a desire that he should do it.

And my mouth shall show forth thy praise Or, I will praise thee. Praise is the natural expression of the feelings when the sense of sin is removed.

<sup><3516></sup>Psalm 51:16. For thou desirest not sacrifice ... On the words rendered in this verse “sacrifice” and “burnt-offering,” see the notes at <sup><3111></sup>Isaiah 1:11. On the main sentiment here expressed — that God did not “desire” such sacrifices — see the notes at <sup><3416></sup>Psalm 40:6-8. The idea here is, that any mere external offering, however precious or costly it might be, was not what God required in such cases. He demanded the expression of deep and sincere repentance; the sacrifices of a contrite heart and of a broken spirit: <sup><3517></sup>Psalm 51:17. No offering without this could be acceptable; nothing without this could secure pardon. In mere outward sacrifices — in bloody offerings themselves, unaccompanied with the expression of genuine penitence, God could have no pleasure. This is one of the numerous passages in the Old Testament which show that the external offerings of the law were valueless unless accompanied by the religion of the heart; or that the Jewish religion, much as it abounded in forms, yet required the offerings of pure hearts in order that man might be acceptable to God. Under all dispensations the real nature of religion is the same. Compare the notes at <sup><3109></sup>Hebrews 9:9,10. The phrase “else would I give it,” in the margin, “that I should give it,” expresses a willingness to make such an offering, if it was required, while, at the same time, there is the implied statement that it would be valueless without the heart.

<sup><3517></sup>Psalm 51:17. The sacrifices of God The sacrifices which God desires and approves; the sacrifices without which no other offering would be acceptable. David felt that that which he here specified was what was demanded in his case. He had grievously sinned; and the blood of animals offered in sacrifice could not put away his sin, nor could anything remove it unless the heart were itself penitent and contrite. The same thing is true now. Though a most perfect sacrifice, every way acceptable to God, has been made for human guilt by the Redeemer, yet it is as true as it was under the old dispensation in regard to the sacrifices there required, that even that will not avail for us unless we are truly penitent; unless we come before God with a contrite and humble heart.

Are a broken spirit A mind broken or crushed under the weight of conscious guilt. The idea is that of a burden laid on the Soul until it is crushed and subdued.

A broken and a contrite heart The word rendered contrite means to be broken or crushed, as when the bones are broken, <sup><1941></sup>Psalm 44:19; 51:8; and then it is applied to the mind or heart as that which is crushed or broken by the weight of guilt. The word does not differ materially from the term "broken." The two together constitute intensity of expression.

Thou wilt not despise Thou wilt not treat with contempt or disregard. That is, God would look upon them with favor, and to such a heart he would grant his blessing. See the notes at <sup><2575></sup>Isaiah 57:15; 66:2.

<sup><4518></sup>Psalm 51:18. Do good in thy good pleasure unto Zion From himself — his deep sorrow, his conscious guilt, his earnest prayer for pardon and salvation — the psalmist turns to Zion, to the city of God, to the people of the Lord. These, after all, lay nearer to his heart than his own personal salvation; and to these his thoughts naturally turned even in connection with his own deep distress. Such a prayer as is here offered he would also be more naturally led to offer from the remembrance of the dishonor which he had brought on the cause of religion, and it was natural for him to pray that his own misconduct might not have the effect of hindering the cause of God in the world. The psalms often take this turn. Where they commence with a personal reference to the author himself, the thoughts often terminate in a reference to Zion, and to the promotion of the cause of religion in the world.

Build thou the walls of Jerusalem It is this expression on which De Wette, Doederlein, and Rosenmuller rely in proof that this psalm, or this portion of it, was composed at a later period than the time of David, and that it must have been written in the time of the captivity, when Jerusalem was in ruins. See the introduction to the psalm. But, as was remarked there, it is not necessary to adopt this supposition. There are two other solutions of the difficulty, either of which would meet all that is implied in the language.

(a) One is, that the walls of Jerusalem, which David had undertaken to build, were not as yet complete, or that the public works commenced by him for the protection of the city had not been finished at the time of the fatal affair of Uriah. There is nothing in the history which forbids this supposition, and the language is such as would be used by David on the occasion, if he had been actually engaged in completing the walls of the city, and rendering it impregnable, and if his heart was intensely fixed on the completion of the work.

(b) The other supposition is, that this is figurative language — a prayer that God would favor and bless his people as if the city was to be protected by walls, and thus rendered safe from an attack by the enemy. Such language is, in fact, often used in cases where it could not be pretended that it was designed to be literal. See <sup><610></sup>Jude 1:20; <sup><615></sup>Romans 15:20; <sup><612></sup>1 Corinthians 3:12; <sup><618></sup>Galatians 2:18; <sup><617></sup>Ephesians 2:22; <sup><607></sup>Colossians 2:7.

<sup><619></sup>Psalm 51:19. Then shalt thou be pleased with the sacrifices of righteousness “Then,” that is, when God should have thus showed favor to Zion; when he should have poured out his blessing on Jerusalem; when religion should prosper and prevail; when there should be an increase of the pure worship of God. In such offerings as would “then” be made — in sacrifices presented not in mere form, but with sincerity, humility, and penitence — in the outward offering of blood presented with a corresponding sincerity of feeling, and with true contrition, and a proper acknowledgment of the guilt designed to be represented by the shedding of blood in sacrifice — God would be pleased, and would approve the worship thus rendered to him. Sacrifice would then be acceptable, for it would not be presented as a mere form, but would be so offered, that it might be called a “sacrifice of righteousness” — a sacrifice offered with a right spirit; in a manner which God would deem right.

And whole burnt-offering The word here means that which is wholly consumed, no part of which was reserved to be eaten by the priests, as was the case in many of the sacrifices. See <sup><6310></sup>Deuteronomy 33:10. Compare <sup><609></sup>Leviticus 6:9; 1:3-17.

Then shall they offer bullocks upon thine altar That is, then shall bullocks be offered. The meaning is, that all the offerings prescribed in the law would then be brought, and that those sacrifices would be made with a right spirit — a spirit of true devotion — the offering of the heart accompanying the outward form. In other words, there would be manifested the spirit of humble worship; of pure religion.

APPENDIX NOTES ON PSALM 51

The psalms which David wrote on occasion of his great fall have gone home to the hearts of the best and holiest people that ever walked the earth. No sermon of Augustine's betrays more tender emotion, more deep and thrilling sympathy with his subject, than the one he preached to the people of Carthage on Psalm 51. Nothing can well be plainer than that psalms which for ages have thus found their way to people's hearts, must have come from the heart.

One who would appreciate the character of the psalmist must remember that he was a man of prodigious energy. What he did, he did with his might. It is to be remembered, moreover, that he was a king, an oriental king, to whom law and universal custom permitted polygamy, and who was thus put in the way of being tempted by the foul sin which was the death of his domestic peace. Nor ought it to be forgotten that the sacred history has narrated David's fall with a judicial severity full of the terror of the Lord. The chapter which records his offence sets down every hateful feature in it with an unextenuating, inexorable circumstantiality, unparalleled in all biography, and, to a thoughtful reader, suggestive of the indictment that might be preferred against a criminal at the bar of the Most High. These considerations are not adduced to cloak David's transgression. Its enormity is undeniable, and is denied by none. He sank to a depth of guilt into which few of God's children have ever been suffered to fall. It is to be remarked, however, that this very fact contributed to fit him to be the psalmist of God's Israel. It was not in spite of his fall, but because of it, that God made choice of him to be the spokesman of the church in penitential song. The church is not a company of angels, but of ransomed people; of people who were sinners, who are often sinning still. David well knew that the record of his fall and his forgiveness would furnish to sin-stricken souls in after-times a strength of encouragement which nothing else could yield. In crying for mercy, this was the plea he urged, “Restore unto me the joy of thy salvation; then will I teach transgressors thy ways; and sinners shall be converted unto thee” (~~PS12~~Psalm 51:12,13).

Being forgiven, he felt, like the converted persecutor of the church, that his God had furnished in him “a pattern to them which should hereafter believe in him to life everlasting.” How wonderfully has this anticipation been realized! It is a merciful provision that, however profound may be the depths into which a man may be cast by his sins, he finds that the psalmist has been there before him, and has furnished him with words in which “out of the depths” he may cry to the Lord. There is not a poor publican in all God’s temple who, as he smites on his breast and cries, “God be merciful to me a sinner,” does not find, on turning to the book of Psalms, that the mercy of God has there provided for him songs that express every feeling of his convicted soul — songs, too, originally written by as great a sinner as himself, in the agony of his repentance. Until the judgment-day it will never be known how many souls, who would otherwise have cast themselves down in despair, have been encouraged by David’s example, and assisted by his psalms, to embrace the promise and to hope in the mercy of God. — Binnie.

~~PS15~~Psalm 51:5. Behold, I was shapen in iniquity ... See the supplementary note under ~~RS12~~Romans 5:12-19, where the author’s views on the imputation of sin are canvassed. Hengstenberg in his notes on this verse justly remarks — “Allusions to the doctrine of a hereditary corruption are to be found even in the oldest portions of revelation. The account of Adam’s fall can be understood in its full compass only if in it the whole human race fell, which can no otherwise be conceived than on the supposition of the propagation of sin by generation. That Adam’s fall is the fall of the human family, is implied in the punishment, which affects not the individual, but the entire race. Everything which stands immediately connected with the account of the fall, the narrative of Cain’s fratricide, etc., is inexplicable, if we limit the fall merely to the individual Adam, and there is a breaking down of the bridge formed in the generation between him and his posterity, to which express allusion is made in ~~GEN3~~Genesis 5:3, ‘And Adam begot like him and after his image’ (in every respect, and hence, also in reference to sin, which had now become a property of his nature). The whole subsequent relation is designed to show how fruitfully the principle of sin implanted in nature through Adam developed itself.

According to ~~Genesis 8:21~~ Genesis 8:21, the thoughts and imaginations of the heart of man are only evil from his youth.”

NOTES ON PSALM 52

This psalm purports to be “a psalm of David,” and there is no reason to doubt that he was the author. The occasion on which it was composed is stated in the title. The correctness of this title has been called in question by DeWette and Rudinger, on the ground that the contents of the psalm do not seem to them to be so well suited to that occasion as to the times of Absalom or Ahithophel. There does not, however, appear to be any just reason for doubting the correctness of the title, as all the circumstances referred to in the psalm are susceptible of application to the act of Doeg the Edomite, on the occasion referred to, namely, that mentioned in <sup>(0219)</sup>1 Samuel 22:9ff. David had fled to Ahimelech the priest at Nob, <sup>(0210)</sup>1 Samuel 21:1. By Ahimelech he had been supplied with bread, and furnished with the sword with which he himself had slain Goliath. On this occasion, an Edomite was present, named Doeg, whose character was, from some cause well known; and David felt that he would not hesitate to betray anyone, or do any act of wickedness or meanness, if it would subserve his own purposes (<sup>(0222)</sup>1 Samuel 22:22). Apprehensive of danger, therefore, even in the presence and under the protection of Ahimelech, and supposing that his place of retreat could not be concealed from Saul, he fled to Achish, king of Gath (<sup>(0210)</sup>1 Samuel 21:10), until in the fear of danger there, he feigned madness, and was driven away as a madman (<sup>(0214)</sup>1 Samuel 21:14,15). he found refuge for a time in the cave of Adullam, where he supposed he would be safe, <sup>(0221)</sup>1 Samuel 22:1,2. From that cave he went to Mizpeh, in Moab (<sup>(0213)</sup>1 Samuel 22:3,4), and thence, at the suggestion of the prophet Gad, he went into the forest of Hareth, <sup>(0215)</sup>1 Samuel 22:5.

At this time, Doeg the Edomite, in order to secure the favor of Saul, and to show that there was one at least who was friendly to him, and was willing to deliver up to punishment those who had encouraged David in his rebellion, informed Saul of the fact that David had been seen with Ahimelech at Nob, and that Ahimelech had given him food and the sword of Goliath the Philistine. The result was, that Ahimelech and the priests who were with him were summoned before Saul; that they were accused by him of the crime; that Saul commanded those who were around him to fall on Ahimelech and the priests and to put them to death; and when they all hesitated, Doeg himself fell upon them and executed the barbarous order. Eighty-five priests thus perished by the sword, and the city of Nob was destroyed, <sup><1921></sup>1 Samuel 22:9-19. It was the conduct of Doeg in this matter that is the subject of this psalm. Doeg is called “the Edomite.” He was probably a native of Idumea, who had connected himself with Saul, and who hoped to secure his special favor by thus informing him of those who were in league with his enemy David. Some have supposed that he was a native-born Jew, and that he is called an Edomite because he may have had his residence in Idumea; but the more obvious supposition is that he was a native of that land. On Idumea, see the notes at <sup><2314></sup>Isaiah 11:14; 34:5,6; 63:1.

On the phrase in the title, “To the chief Musician,” see the notes at the introduction to Psalm 4. The fact that it is thus addressed to the overseer of the public music shows that, though it originally had a private reference, and was designed to record an event which occurred in the life of David, it yet had so much of public interest, and contained truth of so general a nature, that it might properly be employed in the public devotions of the sanctuary.

On the word “Maschil,” see introduction to Psalm 32. The psalm is divided, in the original, apparently for musical purposes, or to adapt it in some way to the music of the sanctuary, into three parts, which are indicated by the word “Selah,” at the close of <sup><1518></sup>Psalm 52:3,5. These, however, have no reference to the sense, or to the natural divisions of the psalm.

As respects the sense or the contents of the psalm, it is divided into three parts, which are not indicated by this musical mark.

I. The first refers to the character of the calumniator and informer, <sup><1518></sup>Psalm 52:1-4. He was a man who was confident in himself, and who did not regard the goodness of God, <sup><1518></sup>Psalm 52:1; a man whose tongue devised mischiefs like a sharp razor, <sup><1518></sup>Psalm 52:2; a man who loved evil more than good, and a lie more than the truth, <sup><1518></sup>Psalm 52:3; and a man who loved to utter words that would destroy the character and the happiness of others, <sup><1518></sup>Psalm 52:4.

II. The judgment, or punishment that would come upon such a man, <sup><1518></sup>Psalm 52:5-7.

(a) God would destroy and root him out of the land, <sup><1518></sup>Psalm 52:5;

(b) the righteous would see this, and would triumph over him as one who was brought to a proper end — the proper end of one who did not make God his strength; who trusted in his riches; who strengthened himself in the purposes of wickedness, <sup><1516></sup>Psalm 52:6,7.

III. The security — the preservation — the joy, of the author of the psalm, <sup><1518></sup>Psalm 52:8,9. The aim — the purpose — of the informer referred to in the psalm, namely Doeg, had been really to disclose the place of David's retreat, and to have him delivered into the hands of Saul. This he hoped to accomplish through Ahimelech the priest. He supposed, evidently, that when Saul was informed that David had been with "him," Ahimelech would be brought before Saul and required to give information as to the place where David might be found, and that thus David would be delivered into the hands of Saul. But in this he had been disappointed. David had fled, and was secure.

Ahimelech was summoned to meet Saul (<sup><1921></sup>1 Samuel 22:11), and with him were summoned also all "his father's house, the priests that were in Nob." In reply to the charge that he had conspired against Saul; that he had befriended David; that he had "given him," in modern language, "aid and comfort;" that he had assisted him so that he could "rise against Saul," and that he had so befriended him that he could "lie in wait for him" at that time — he boldly declared his conviction that Saul had not a more faithful subject in his realm than David was; "And who is so faithful among all thy servants as David, which is the king's son-in-law, and goeth at thy bidding, and is honorable in thine house?" There Ahimelech stood — an example of a bold, firm, independent, honorable, honest man. He maintained the innocence of David, as well as his own. He sought no favor by joining in the clamor against David. He did not seek to avert the blow which he could not but see was impending over himself, by any mean compliance with the prejudices of the king. He did nothing to flatter the offended monarch, or to gratify him in his purpose to arrest David, the fugitive. He made no offer to disclose to him the place of his concealment. Any one of these things — any act in the line of that which Doeg had performed — might have saved his life. That he knew the place of David's retreat, is apparent from a circumstance incidentally referred to in the ultimate account of the affair, for, after Ahimelech had been put to death, it is said that one of his sons — Abiathar — fled at once to David (<sup><1922></sup>1 Samuel 22:20,21), and disclosed to him the dreadful manner of his father's death; thus showing that the knowledge of the place of his retreat was in the possession of the family, and could easily have been disclosed to Saul, and yet it was not done. Neither Ahimelech, nor anyone of his family, even intimated to Saul that they knew where David then was, and that they could put him in possession of the means of securing him. That the fact that they did not and would not betray the place of his retreat was one cause of the wrath of Saul, is apparent from the reason assigned why the “footmen” were commanded to put them to death;

“And the king said unto the footmen that stood about him, Turn, and slay the priests of the Lord, because their hand also is with David, and because they knew when he fled, and did not show it to me,” <sup><1927></sup>1 Samuel 22:17.

It cannot be doubted, therefore, that if there had been an offer of furnishing the information; if there had been a tender of their services in the case; if there had been evinced a spirit of ready compliance with the prejudices and passions of Saul; if there had been among them the same spirit of mean sycophancy which characterized Doeg — Ahimelech and the whole family would have been safe. But no such thing was done; no such offer was made; no such spirit was evinced. There they stood — noble-minded people — father, son, all the family, true to honor, to virtue, to religion; true to God, to Saul, to David, and to themselves. They hid the secret in their own bosoms; they neither proffered nor submitted to any mean or dishonorable compliances that they might save their lives. There was, on the one hand, Doeg, “the “mighty” man,” but “the mean informer;” on the other, a noble-minded man standing up in the conscious integrity of what he had done, and maintaining it even at the hazard of life.

The result is well known, and was that which, so far as the fate of Ahimelech was concerned, could easily have been anticipated. Saul, maddened against David, was now equally infuriated against the honest man who had befriended him. He commanded him to be put to death at once. And here, in this remarkable transaction, where so much of meanness and honor, of fidelity and falsehood, of integrity and corruption, of soberness and passion, come so near together, we have another striking instance of firmness and virtue. Saul commanded the “footman,” (margin, the “runners,”) who were about him, to “turn and slay” Ahimelech and his sons. Yet the “footmen” declined to do the bloody work. Noble men, themselves, they saw here an instance of true nobleness of character and of deed in the priests of the Lord; and they refused, even at the peril of the wrath of Saul, to execute an unrighteous sentence on men so noble, so honorable, so true. There was one, however, that would do it. There stood the mean, the sycophantic, the base man, Doeg, who had ‘informed’ against the priests, and he was ready to do the work. The command was given, and he consummated the work of betrayal and of meanness, by putting at once to the sword, fourscore and five priests of the Lord, and by carrying desolation and death through the city of their habitation, smiting “with the edge of the sword, both men and women, children and sucklings, and oxen, and asses, and sheep;” <sup><10218></sup>1 Samuel 22:18,19.

In the meantime David was safe, and it is this fact which he celebrates when he says in this psalm, “I am like a green olive tree in the house of God,” <sup><10518></sup>Psalm 52:8; and it is for this that he gives praise, <sup><10519></sup>Psalm 52:9.

The psalm refers, therefore, to the character and the conduct of an “informer,” one of the most odious characters among men. In a book claiming to be a revelation from God, as the Bible does — a book designed for all mankind, and intended to be adapted to all ages, and in a world where such people would be found in all lands and times, it was proper that the character of such should be at least once held up in its true light, that men may see what it really is. Any bad man may make himself more odious by becoming an “informer;” any good man may suffer, as David did, from the acts of such a one; and hence, the case in the psalm may suggest useful lessons in every age of the world.

<sup><10511></sup>Psalm 52:1. Why boastest thou thyself in Mischief? Why dost thou “exult” in that which is wrong? Why dost thou find pleasure in evil rather than in good? Why dost thou seek to triumph in the injury done to others? The reference is to one who prided himself on schemes and projects which tended to injure others; or who congratulated himself on the success which attended his efforts to wrong other people.

O mighty man DeWette and Luther render this, “tyrant.” The original word would be properly applied to one of rank or distinction; a man of “power” — power derived either from office, from talent, or from wealth. It is a word which is often applied to a hero or warrior: <sup><2312></sup>Isaiah 3:2; <sup><2730></sup>Ezekiel 39:20; <sup><10710></sup>2 Samuel 17:10; <sup><10316></sup>Psalm 33:16; 120:4; 127:4; <sup><27108></sup>Daniel 11:3; <sup><10014></sup>Genesis 6:4; <sup><25131></sup>Jeremiah 51:30. So far as the “word” is concerned, it might be applied either to Saul or to any other warrior or man of rank; and Professor Alexander supposes that it refers to Saul himself. The connection, however, seems to require us to understand it of Doeg, and not of Saul, This appears to be clear

(a) from the general character here given to the person referred to, a character not particularly applicable to Saul, but applicable to an informer like Doeg (<sup><451D></sup>Psalm 52:2-4); and

(b) from the fact that he derived his power, not from his rank and office, as Saul did, but mainly from his wealth (<sup><451D></sup>Psalm 52:7). This would seem to imply that some other was referred to than Saul.

The goodness of God endureth continually literally, “all the day.” That is, the wicked man could not hope to prevent the exercise of the divine goodness toward him whom he persecuted, and whom he sought to injure. David means to say that the goodness of God was so great and so constant, that he would protect his true friends from such machinations; or that it, was so unceasing and watchful, that the informer and accuser could not hope to find an interval of time when God would intermit his care, and when, therefore, he might hope for success. Against the goodness of God, the devices of a wicked man to injure the righteous could not ultimately prevail.

(b) fall, ruin, destruction, wickedness: <sup><498D></sup>Psalm 5:9; 38:12.

The meaning here is, that he made use of his tongue to ruin others. Compare <sup><451D></sup>Psalm 50:19. The particular thing referred to here is the fact that Doeg sought the ruin of others by giving “information” in regard to them. He “informed” Saul of what Ahimelech had done; he informed him where David had been, thus giving him, also, information in what way he might be found and apprehended. All this was “designed” to bring ruin upon David and his followers. It “actually” brought ruin on Ahimelech and those associated with him, <sup><1927></sup>1 Samuel 22:17-19.

Like a sharp razor See the notes at <sup><237D></sup>Isaiah 7:20. His slanders were like a sharp knife with which one stabs another. So we stay of a slanderer that he “stabs” another in the dark.

Working deceitfully literally, making deceit. That is, it was by deceit that he accomplished his purpose. There was no open and fair dealing in what he did.

Psalm 52:3. Thou lovest evil more than good Thou dost prefer to do injury to others, rather than to do them good. In the case referred to, instead of aiding the innocent, the persecuted, and the wronged, he had attempted to reveal the place where he might be found, and where an enraged enemy might have an opportunity of wreaking his vengeance upon him.

And lying rather than to speak righteousness He preferred a lie to the truth; and, when he supposed that his own interest would be subserved by it, he preferred a falsehood that would promote that interest, rather than a simple statement of the truth. The “lying” in this case was that which was “implied” in his being desirous of giving up David, or betraying him to Saul — as if David was a bad man, and as if the suspicions of Saul were wellfounded. He preferred to give his countenance to a falsehood in regard to him, rather than to state the exact truth in reference to his character. His conduct in this was strongly in contrast with that of Ahimelech, who, when arraigned before Saul, declared his belief that David was innocent; his firm conviction that David was true and loyal. “For” that fidelity he lost his life, <sup>1</sup> Samuel 22:14. Doeg was willing to lend countenance to the suspicions of Saul, and practically to represent David as a traitor to the king. The word “Selah” here is doubtless a mere musical pause. See the notes at <sup>1</sup> Psalm 3:2. It determines nothing in regard to the sense of the passage.

Psalm 52:4. Thou lovest all devouring words All words that tend to devour or “swallow up” reputation and happiness. Luther, “Thou speakest gladly all things (anything) that will serve to destruction.” Anything, everything, that will serve to ruin people. The word rendered “devouring” — [ <sup>1</sup> <sup>h1106</sup> ] — occurs only here and in <sup>2514</sup> Jeremiah 51:44, though the verb from which it is derived occurs frequently: <sup>2304</sup> Isaiah 28:4; <sup>1172</sup> Exodus 7:12; <sup>3111</sup> Jonah 2:1 ( <sup>3117</sup> Jonah 1:17); <sup>14107</sup> Genesis 41:7,24, et al. The verb means to swallow; and then, to consume or destroy.

O thou deceitful tongue Margin, “and the deceitful tongue.” The sense is best expressed in the text. It is an address to the tongue as loving deceit or fraud.

Psalm 52:5. God shall likewise destroy thee for ever Margin, “beat thee down.” The Hebrew word means to “tear, to break down, to destroy:” <sup><6145></sup>Leviticus 14:45; <sup><1061></sup>Judges 6:30. The reference here is not to the “tongue” alluded to in the previous verses, but to Doeg himself. The language in the verse is intensive and emphatic. The main idea is presented in a variety of forms, all designed to denote utter and absolute destruction — a complete and entire sweeping away, so that nothing should be left. The word “here” used would suggest the idea of “pulling down” — as a house, a fence, a wall; that is, the idea of completely “demolishing” it; and the meaning is, that destruction would come upon the informer and slanderer “like” the destruction which comes upon a house, or wall, or fence, when it is entirely pulled down.

He shall take thee away An expression indicating in another form that he would be certainly destroyed. The verb used here — htj, <sup><12846></sup> — is elsewhere used only in the sense of taking up and carrying fire or coals: <sup><2314></sup>Isaiah 30:14; <sup><3157></sup>Proverbs 6:27; 25:22. The idea here “may” be that he would be seized and carried away with haste, as when one takes up fire or coals, he does it as rapidly as possible, lest he should be burned.

And shall pluck thee out of thy dwelling-place literally, “out of the tent.” The reference is to his abode. The allusion here in the verb that is used — j sœ, <sup><45255></sup> — is to the act of pulling up plants; and the idea is, that he would be plucked up as a plant is torn from its roots.

And root thee out of the land of the living As a tree is torn up from the roots and thus destroyed. He would be no more among the living. Compare <sup><9273></sup>Psalm 27:13. All these phrases are intended to denote that such a man would be utterly destroyed.

Psalm 52:6. The righteous also shall see See the notes at <sup><19734></sup>Psalm 37:34.

And fear The effect of such a judgment will be to produce reverence in the minds of good people — a solemn sense of the justice of God; to make them tremble at such fearful judgments; and to fear lest they should violate the law, and bring judgment on themselves.

And shall laugh at him Compare the notes at <sup><19114></sup>Psalm 2:4. See also <sup><19810></sup>Psalm 58:10; 64:9,10; <sup><31135></sup>Proverbs 1:26. The idea here is not exultation in the “sufferings” of others, or joy that “calamity” has come upon them, or the gratification of selfish and revengeful feeling that an enemy is deservedly punished; it is that of approbation that punishment has come upon those who deserve it, and joy that wickedness is not allowed to triumph. It is not wrong for us to feel a sense of approbation and joy that the laws are maintained, and that justice is done, even though this does involve suffering, for we know that the guilty deserve it, and it is better that they should suffer than that the righteous should suffer through them. All this may be entirely free from any malignant, or any revengeful feeling. It may even be connected with the deepest pity, and with the purest benevolence toward the sufferers themselves.

Psalm 52:7. Lo, this is the man that made not God his strength That is, the righteous (<sup>1916</sup>Psalm 52:6) would say this. They would designate him as a man who had not made God his refuge, but who had trusted in his own resources. The result would be that he would be abandoned by God, and that those things on which he had relied would fail him in the day of calamity. He would be pointed out as an instance of what must occur when a man does not act with a wise reference to the will of God, but, confiding in his own strength and resources, pursues his own plans of iniquity.

But trusted in the abundance of his riches See the notes at <sup>1916</sup>Psalm 49:6. From this it would seem that Doeg was a rich man, and that, as a general thing, in his life, and in his plans of evil, he felt confident in his wealth. He had that spirit of arrogance and self-confidence which springs from the conscious possession of property where there is no fear of God; and into all that he did he carried the sense of his own importance as derived from his riches. In the particular matter referred to in the psalm the meaning is, that he would perform the iniquitous work of giving “information” with the proud and haughty feeling springing from wealth and from self-importance — the feeling that he was a man of consequence, and that whatever such a man might do would be entitled to special attention.

And strengthened himself in his wickedness Margin, “substance.” This is the same word which in <sup>1916</sup>Psalm 52:1 is rendered “mischief.” The idea is, that he had a malicious pleasure in doing wrong, or in injuring others, and that by every art, and against all the convictions and remonstrances of his own conscience, he endeavored to confirm himself “in” this unholy purpose and employment.

Psalm 52:8. But I am like a green olive-tree in the house of God I am safe and happy, notwithstanding the effort made by my enemy, the informer, to secure my destruction. I have been kept unharmed, like a green and flourishing tree — a tree protected in the very courts of the sanctuary — safe under the care and the eye of God. A green tree is the emblem of prosperity. See the notes at Psalm 1:3; 37:35; compare Psalm 92:12. The “house of God” here referred to is the tabernacle, considered as the place where God was supposed to reside. See the notes at Psalm 15:1; 23:6; 27:4,5. The particular allusion here is to the “courts” of the tabernacle. An olive tree would not be cultivated in the tabernacle, but it might in the “courts” or “area” which surrounded it. The name “house of God” would be given to the whole area, as it was afterward to the entire area in which the temple was. A tree thus planted in the very courts of the sanctuary would be regarded as sacred, and would be safe as long as the tabernacle itself was safe, for it would be, as it were, directly under the divine protection. So David had been, notwithstanding all the efforts of his enemies to destroy him.

I trust in the mercy of God forever and ever

(a) I “have” always done it. It has been my constant practice in trouble or danger.

(b) I “will” always do it.

As the result of all my experience, I will still do it; and thus trusting in God, I shall have the consciousness of safety.

Psalm 52:9. I will praise thee forever, because thou hast done it Because thou art the source of my safety. The fact that I have been delivered from the designs of Saul, and saved from the efforts of Doeg to betray me, is to be traced wholly to thee. It has been ordered by thy providence that the purposes alike of Doeg and of Saul have been defeated, and I am still safe.

And I will wait on thy name That is, I will wait on “thee;” the name being often put for the person himself: Psalm 20:1; 69:30; Proverbs 18:10; Isaiah 59:19. The language used here means that he would trust in God, or confide in him. All his expectation and hope would be in him. There are two ideas essentially in the language:

(1) the expression of a sense of “dependence” on God, as if the only ground of trust was in him;

(2) a willingness to “await” his interposition at all times; a belief that, however long such an interposition might be delayed, God “would” interfere at the proper time to bring deliverance; and a purpose calmly and patiently to look to him until the time of deliverance should come. Compare <sup><4278></sup>Psalm 25:3,5,21; 27:14; 37:7,9,34; 69:3; <sup><2387></sup>Isaiah 8:17; 40:31.

For it is good before thy saints God is good; and I will confess it before his “saints.” His mercy has been so marked, that a public acknowledgment of it is proper; and before his assembled people I will declare what he has done for me. So signal an act of mercy, an interposition so suited to illustrate the character of God, demands more than a private acknowledgment, and I will render him public praise. The same idea occurs in <sup><4225></sup>Psalm 22:25; 35:18; 111:1; <sup><2380></sup>Isaiah 38:20. The general thought is, that for great and special mercies it is proper to render special praise to God before his assembled people. It is not that we are to obtrude our private affairs upon the public eye or the public ear; it is not that mercies shown to us have any particular claim to the attention of our fellow-men, but it is that such interpositions illustrate the character of God, and that they may constitute an argument before the world in favor of his benevolent and merciful character. Among the “saints” there is a common bond of union — a common interest in all that pertains to each other; and when special mercy is shown to anyone of the great brotherhood, it is proper that all should join in the thanksgiving, and render praise to God.

The importance of the subject considered in this psalm — the fact that it is not often referred to in books on moral science, or even in sermons, — and the fact that it involves many points of practical difficulty in the conversation between man and man in the various relations of life — may justify at the close of an exposition of this psalm a consideration of the general question about the morality of giving “information,” or, in general, the character of the “informer.” Such a departure from the usual method adopted in works designed to be expository would not be ordinarily proper, since it would swell such works beyond reasonable dimensions; but perhaps it may be admitted in a single instance.

In what cases is it our duty to give information which may be in our possession about the conduct of others; and in what cases does it become a moral wrong or a crime to do it?

This is a question of much importance in respect to our own conduct, and often of much difficulty in its solution. It may not be possible to answer all the inquiries which might be made on this subject, or to lay down principles of undoubted plainness which would be applicable to every case which might occur, but a few general principles may be suggested.

The question is one which may occur at any time, and in any situation of life — Is it never right to give such information? Are we never bound to do it? Are there no circumstances in which it is proper that it should be voluntary? Are there any situations in which we are exempt by established customs or laws from giving such information? Are there any in which we are bound, by the obligations of conscience, not to give such information, whatever may be the penalty? Where and when does guilt begin or end in our volunteering to give information of the conduct or the concealments of others?

These questions often come with much perplexity before the mind of an ingenuous schoolboy, who would desire to do right, and who yet has so much honor that he desires to escape the guilt and the reproach of being a “tell-tale.” They are questions which occur to a lawyer (or, rather, which “did” occur before the general principle, which I will soon advert to, had been settled by the courts), in regard to the knowledge of which he has been put in possession under the confidential relation of advocate and client. They are questions which may occur to a clergyman, either in respect to the confidential disclosures made at the confessional of the Catholic priest, or in respect to the confidential statements of the true penitent made to a Protestant pastor, in order that spiritual counsel may be obtained to give relief to a burdened conscience. They are questions which it was necessary should be settled in regard to a fugitive from justice, who seeks protection under the roof of a friend or a stranger. They are questions respecting refugees from oppression in foreign lands — suggesting the inquiry whether they shall be welcomed, or whether there shall be any law by which they shall, on demand, be restored to the dominion of a tyrant. They are questions which the conscience will ask, and does ask, about those who make their escape from slavery, who apply to us for aid in securing their liberty, and who seek an asylum beneath our roof; questions whether the law of God requires or permits us to render any active assistance in making known the place of their refuge, and returning them to bondage. When, and in what cases, if any, is a man bound to give information in such circumstances as these? It is to be admitted that cases may occur, in regard to these questions, in which there would be great difficulty in determining what are the exact limits of duty, and writers on the subject of morals have not laid down such clear rules as would leave the mind perfectly free from doubt, or be sufficient to guide us on all these points. It will be admitted, also, that some of them are questions of much difficulty, and where instruction would be desirable.

Much may be learned, in regard to the proper estimate of human conduct among people, from the “language” which they employ — language which, in its very structure, often conveys their sentiments from age to age. The ideas of people on many of the subjects of morals, in respect to that which is honorable or dishonorable, right or wrong, manly or mean, became thus “imbedded” — I might almost say “fossilized” — in their modes of speech. Language, in its very structure, thus carries down to future times the sentiments cherished in regard to the morality of actions — as the fossil remains that are beneath the surface of the earth, in the strata of the rocks, bring to us the forms of ancient types of animals, and ferns, and palms, of which there are now no living specimens on the globe. They who have studied Dean Trench’s Treatise on “Words” will recollect how this idea is illustrated in that remarkable work; how, without any other information about the views of people in other times, the very “words” which they employed, and which have been transmitted to us, convey to us the estimate which was formed in past ages in regard to the moral quality of an action, as proper or improper — as honorable or dishonorable — as conformed to the noble principles of our nature, or the reverse.

As illustrating the general sentiments of mankind in this respect, I will select “two” words as specimens of many which might be selected, and as words which people have been agreed in applying to some of the acts referred to in the questions of difficulty that I have just mentioned, and which may enable us to do something in determining the morality of an action, so far as those words, in their just application to the subject, indicate the judgment of mankind.

One of these is the word “meanness” — a word which a schoolboy would be most “likely” to apply to the act of a tell-tale or an informer, and which we instinctively apply to numerous actions in more advanced periods of life, and which serves to mark the judgment of mankind in regard to certain kinds of conduct. The “idea” in such a case is not so much the “guilt” or the “criminality” of the act considered as a violation of law, as it is that of being opposed to just notions of “honor,” or indicating a base, low, sordid, grovelling spirits — “lowness of mind, want of dignity and elevation; want of honor.” (Webster)

The other word is “sycophant.” The Athenians had a law prohibiting the exportation of figs. This law, of course, had a penalty, and it was a matter of importance to the magistrate to ascertain who had been guilty of violating it. It suggested, also, a method of securing the favor of such a magistrate, and perhaps of obtaining a reward, by giving “information” of those who had been guilty of violating the law. From these two words — the Greek word “fig,” and the Greek word to “show,” or to “discover,” we have derived the word “sycophant;” and this word has come down from the Greeks, and through the long tract of ages intervening between its first use in Athens to the present time, always bearing in every age the original idea imbedded in the word, as the old fossil that is now dug up bears the form of the fern, the leaf, the worm, or the shell that was imbedded there perhaps million of ages ago. As such a man would be “likely” to be mean, and fawning, and flattering, so the word has come to describe always a parasite; a mean flatterer; a flatterer of princes and great men; and hence it is, and would be applied as one of the words indicating the sense of mankind in regard to a “tale-bearer,” or an “informer.”

Words like these indicate the general judgment of mankind on such conduct as that referred to in the psalm before us. Of course, to what particular “actions” of the kind they are properly applicable, would be another point; they are referred to here only as indicating the general judgment of mankind in regard to certain kinds of conduct, and to show how careful people are, in their very language, to express their permanent approbation of that which is “honorable” and “right,” and their detestation of that which is “dishonorable” and “wrong.”

Let us now consider more particularly the subject with respect to “duty,” and to “criminality.” The question is, whether we can find any cases where it is “right” — where it is our duty to give such information; or, in what cases, if any, it is right; and in what cases it is malignant, guilty, wrong. The points to be considered are:

(1) When it is right, or when it may be demanded that we should give information of another; and

(2) When it becomes guilt.

(1) When it is right, or when it may be demanded of us.

(a) It is to be admitted that there are cases in which the interests of justice demand that people should be “required” to give information of others; or, there are cases where the courts have a right to summon us, to put us upon our oath, and to demand the information which may be in our possession. The courts constantly act on this; and the interests of justice could not be promoted, nor could a cause ever be determined, without exercising this right. If all people were bound in conscience to withhold information simply because they have it in their possession, or because of the mode in which they came in possession of it — or if they withheld it from mere stubbornness and obstinacy — all the departments of justice must stand still, and the officers of justice might be discharged, since it can neither be presumed that “they” would possess all the knowledge necessary to the administration of justice themselves, nor would the law allow them to act on it if they did. The law never presumes that a judge is to decide a case from a knowledge of the facts in his own possession, or simply because “he knows what was done in the case.” The ultimate decision must be made in view of testimony given, not of knowledge “possessed.” In most cases, however, there is no difficulty on this point. There is no necessary violation of confidence in giving this information. There have been no improper means used to obtain it. There has been only an observation of that which any other man might have seen. There has been no baseness in “spying” out what was done. There has been no “sycophantic” purpose; there is no voluntariness in betraying what we know; there is no dishonorableness in divulging what “happened” to be known to us. A man may “regret” that he witnessed the act of crime, but he does not blame himself for it; he may feel “pained” that his testimony may consign another man to the gallows, but he does not deem it dishonorable, for he has no mean purpose in it, and the interests of justice demand it.

(b) It is an admitted principle that one employed as counsel in a case — a lawyer — shall “not” be required to give up information which may be in his possession as counsel; information which has been entrusted to him by his client. It is held essential to the interests of justice, that whatever is thus communicated to a professional adviser shall be regarded by the court as strictly confidential, and that the counsel incurs no blame if he does “not” give information on the subject; or, in other words, the true interests of justice do not demand, and the principles of honor will not admit, that he should betray the man who has entrusted his cause to him. How far a man, governed by a good conscience, and by the principles of honor, may undertake a cause which, from the statements of his client in the beginning, he may regard as doubtful, or where in the progress of the case he may become sure that his client is guilty, is a point which does not come under the present inquiry, and which may, in fact, be in some respects a question of difficult solution. It must still, however, even in such a case, be held that he cannot be required to give the information in his possession, and every principle of honor or of right would be understood to be violated, if, abandoning the case, he should become a voluntary “informer.” (3 Blackstone p. 370, Book iii., ch. 23)

(c) In like manner, it is understood that the law does not require a jurymen to give voluntary “information” of what may be within his own knowledge in the case that may be submitted for trial. The extent of his oath and his obligation is that he shall give a verdict according to the testimony submitted under the proper forms of law. He may not “go back” of that, and found his opinion in the verdict on any private knowledge which he may have in his own possession, and which has not, under the proper forms of law, been laid before the court; nor may what he himself may have seen and heard enter at all into his verdict, or influence it in any manner, unless it has been submitted with the other testimony in the case to the court. The verdict is to be based on evidence “given;” not on what he “has seen.” An accused man has a right to demand that “all” that shall bear on the sentence in the case — “all” that shall enter into the verdict — shall be submitted as testimony, under the solemnities of an oath, and with all proper opportunities of cross-examination, and of rebutting it by counter testimony. A jurymen may, indeed, be called as a witness in a case. But then he is to be sworn and examined as any other witness, and when he comes to unite with others in making up the verdict, he is to allow to enter into that verdict “only” that which is in possession of all the members of the jury, and he is not to permit “any” knowledge which he may have, which was “not” obtained from him in giving testimony, to influence his own judgment in the case. (3 Blackstone, p. 375, Book iii., ch. 23. See p. 370.)

(d) There are cases, however, in which things entrusted to one as a secret, or in confidence, may be required to be given up. Such cases may occur in a matter of private friendship, or in a case of professional confidence.

("The confidence which is placed in a counsel or solicitor, must necessarily be inviolable when the use of advocates and legal assistants is admitted. But the purposes of public justice supersede the delicacy of every other species of confidential communication. In the trial of the Duchess of Kingston, it was determined that a friend might be bound to disclose, if necessary, in a court of justice, secrets of the most sacred nature which one sex could repose in another. And that a surgeon was bound to communicate any information whatever, which he was possessed of, in consequence of his professional attendance. And those secrets only, communicated to a counsel or attorney, are inviolable in a court of justice, which have been entrusted to them while acting in their respective characters to the party as their client. (3 Blackstone, 370, note).

In the case of a Presbyterian clergyman, it has been held that he was bound to submit a letter to the court which had been addressed to him by the accused as her pastor, and which was supposed to contain important disclosures in regard to her criminality. (In the "Burch" case, tried in Chicago.) In this case, however, the disclosure was not originally made by the pastor; nor was the fact of the existence of such a letter made known by him. The fact that such a letter had been sent to him, was stated by the party herself; and the court, having this knowledge of it, "demanded" its production in court. It was submitted after taking legal advice, and the community justified the conduct of the pastor. So the principle is regarded as well settled that a minister of religion may be required to disclose what has been communicated to him, whether at the "confessional," or as a pastor, which may be necessary to establish the guilt of a party; and that the fact that it had been communicated in confidence, and for spiritual advice, does not constitute a reason for refusing to disclose it.

(2) But the point before us relates rather to the inquiry when the act of giving such information becomes "guilt," or in what circumstances it is forbidden and wrong.

Perhaps all that need to be said on this point can be reduced to three heads: when it is for base purposes; when the innocent are betrayed; and when professional confidence is violated. The illustration of these points, after what has been said, need not detain us long.

First. When it is for base purposes. This would include all those cases where it is for gain; where it is to secure favor; and where it is from envy, malice, spite, or revenge. The case of Doeg was, manifestly, an instance of this kind, where the motive was not that of promoting public justice, or preserving the peace of the realm, but where it was to ingratiate himself into the favor of Saul, and secure his own influence at court. The parallel case of the Ziphims (Psalm 54) was another instance of this kind, where, so far as the narrative goes, it is supposable that the only motive was to obtain the favor of Saul, or to secure a reward, by betraying an innocent and a persecuted man who had fled to them for a secure retreat. The case of Judas Iscariot was another instance of this kind. He betrayed his Saviour; he agreed, for a paltry reward, to disclose his place of usual retreat — a place to which he had resorted so often for prayer, that Judas knew that he could be found there. It was for no wrong done to him. It was from no regard to public peace or justice. It was not because he even supposed the Saviour to be guilty. He knew that he was innocent. He even himself confessed this in the most solemn manner, and in the very presence of those with whom he had made the infamous bargain — and with just such a result as the mean and the wicked must always expect, when those for whom they have performed a mean and wicked act have no further use for them.

“I have sinned in that I have betrayed the innocent blood. And they said, What is that to us?” — ~~1776~~ Matthew 27:4

Such, also, is the case of the “sycophant.” That a man might, in some circumstances, give information about the exportation of “figs” contrary to law, or might even be required to do it, may be true; but it was equally true that it was not commonly done for any patriotic or honorable ends, but from the most base and ignoble motives; and hence, the sense of mankind in regard to the nature of the transaction has been perpetuated in the world itself. So, in a school, there is often no better motive than envy, or rivalry, or malice, or a desire to obtain favor or reward, when information is given by one school-boy of another; and hence, the contempt and scorn with which a boy who acts under the influence of these motives is always regarded — emblem of what he is likely to meet in all his subsequent life.

Second. The innocent are never robe betrayed. The divine law pertaining to this seems to be perfectly plain, and the principles of that law are such as to commend themselves to the consciences of all mankind. Thus, <sup><2316B></sup>Isaiah 16:3,4, “Take counsel, execute judgment; make thy shadow as the night in the midst of the noonday; hide the outcasts; bewray not him that wandereth. Let mine outcasts dwell with thee, Moab; be thou a covert to them from the face of the spoiler.” Also in <sup><18215></sup>Deuteronomy 23:15,16, “Thou shalt not deliver unto his master the servant which is escaped from his master unto thee: he shall dwell with thee, even among you, in that place which he shall choose in one of thy gates, where it liketh him best: thou shalt not oppress him.”

On these passages I remark:

1. That they are settled principles of the law of God. There is no ambiguity in them. They have not been repealed. They are, therefore, still binding, and extend to all cases pertaining to the innocent and the oppressed.
2. They accord with the convictions of the human mind — the deep-seated principles which God has laid in our very being, as designed to guide us in our treatment of others.
3. They accord with some of the highest principles of self-sacrifice as illustrated in history — the noblest exhibitions of human nature in giving an asylum to the oppressed and the wronged; instances where life has been perilled, or even given up, rather than that the persecuted, the innocent, and the wronged, should be surrendered or betrayed. How often, in the history of the church has life been thus endangered, because a refuge and a shelter was furnished to the persecuted Christian — the poor outcast, driven from his home under oppressive laws! How honorable have people esteemed such acts to be! How illustrious is the example of those who have at all hazards opened their arms to receive the oppressed, and to welcome the persecuted and the wronged! In the year 1685, by the Revocation of the Edict of Nantz, eight hundred thousand professed followers of the Saviour — Huguenots — were driven from their homes and their country, and compelled to seek safety by flight to other lands. In their own country, fire and the sword spread desolation everywhere, and the voice of wailing filled the land. Those who could flee, did flee. The best people of France — those of noblest blood — fled in every direction, and sought a refuge in other countries. They fled — carrying with them not only the purest form and the best spirit of religion, but the best knowledge of the arts, to all the surrounding nations. Belgium, Holland, England, Scotland, Switzerland, opened their arms to welcome the fugitives. Our own country welcomed them — then, as now, an asylum for the oppressed. In every part of our land they found a home. Thousands of the noblest spirits — the best people of the South and the North, were composed of these exiles and wanderers. But suppose the world had been barred against them. Suppose they had been driven back again to their native land, poor persecuted men and women returned to suffering and to death. How justly mankind would have execrated such an act!

The same principles are applicable to the fugitive from slavery. Indeed, one of the texts quoted relates to this very point, and is designed to guide people on this subject in all ages and in all lands. “Thou shalt not deliver unto his master the servant which is escaped from his master unto thee.” No law could possibly be more explicit; none could be more humane, just, or proper; and consequently all those provisions in human laws which require people to aid in delivering up such fugitives are violations of the law of God — have no binding obligation on the conscience — and are, at all hazards, to be disobeyed. ~~412~~ Acts 5:29; 4:19.

Third. Professional confidence is not to be betrayed. We have seen, in the remarks before made, that those who are employed as counselors in the courts, cannot be required to communicate facts which are stated to them by their clients, but that confidential communications made to others may be demanded in promoting the interests of justice. The point now, however, relates only to the cases where professional confidence is voluntarily violated, or where knowledge thus obtained is made use of in a manner which cannot be sanctioned either by the principles of honor or religion. Two such instances may be referred to as illustrations:

(a) One occurs when a clergyman, to whom such knowledge is imparted as a clergyman for spiritual advice, instruction, or comfort, abuses the trust reposed in him, by making use of that information for any other purpose whatever. It is entrusted to him for that purpose alone. It is committed to him as a man of honor. The secret is lodged with him, with the implied understanding that it is there to remain, and to be employed only for that purpose. Whether at the “confessional” of the Roman Catholic, or whether made in the confidence reposed in a Protestant pastor, the principle is the same. Whatever advantage may be taken of that secret for the promotion of any other ends; whatever object the minister of religion may propose to secure, based on the fact that he is in possession of it; whatever influence he may choose to exert, founded on the assumption that he could divulge it; whatever statement he may make in regard to such a person — based on the fact that he is in possession of knowledge which he has, but which he is not at liberty to communicate — and designed to injure the person; whatever use he may make of it as enabling him to form an estimate for his own purposes of what occurs in a family; or, in general, whatever communication he may make of it, of any kind (except under process of law, and because the law demands it), is to be regarded as a betrayal of professional confidence. The interests of religion require that a pastor should be regarded as among the most faithful of confidential friends; and no people, or class of people, should be placed in such circumstances that they may, at the “confessional,” or in any other way, have the means of arriving at secrets which may be employed for any purposes of their own whatever.

(b) It is a breach of professional confidence when a lawyer is entrusted with knowledge in one case by a client, which, by being employed in another case, and on another occasion, he uses against him. The secret, whatever it may be, which is entrusted to him by a client, is for that case alone; and is, to all intents, to die when that case is determined. It is dishonorable in any way for him to engage as counsel for another party against his former client when, by even the remotest possibility, the knowledge obtained in the former occurrence could come as an element in the determination of the case, or could be made use of to the advantage of his new client. Every sentiment of honesty and honor demands that if there is a possibility of this, or if there would be the remotest temptation of the kind, he should at once promptly and firmly decline to engage against his former client.

In human nature there are two classes of propensities or principles: those which are generous, magnanimous, gentle, kind, benevolent, large-hearted, humane, noble; and those which are low, grovelling, sordid, sycophantic, mean, ignoble.

Though man is destitute of holiness, and though, as I believe, not one or all of these things which I have referred to as generous and noble can by cultivation become true religion, or constitute, by mere development, what is needful to secure the salvation of the soul, yet they are to be cultivated, for they are invaluable in society, and necessary to the happiness and the progress of mankind. On these, more than on most other things, the happiness of families, and the welfare of the world depend; and whatever may be our views of the necessity and value of religion, we are not required to undervalue “the ornament of a meek and quiet spirit,” or those virtues which we connect, in our apprehensions, with that which is manly and honorable, and which tend to elevate and ennoble the race.

Christianity has, if I may so express it, a “natural affinity” for one class of these propensities; it has none for the other. It, too, is generous, humane, gentle, kind, benevolent, noble; it blends easily with these tilings when it finds them in human nature; and it produces them in the soul which is fully under its influence, where they did not exist before. It has no more affinity for that which is mean, ignoble, morose, sycophantic, than it has for profanity or falsehood, for dishonesty or fraud, for licentiousness or ambition.

That true religion may be found in hearts where these virtues, so generous and noble, are not developed, or where there is not a little that dishonors religion as not large, and liberal, and courteous, and gentlemanly, it is, perhaps, impossible to deny mean, so sycophantic, so narrow, so sour, and so morose, that a large part of the work of sanctification seems to be reserved for the close of life — for that mysterious and unexplained process by which all who are redeemed are made perfect when they pass “through the valley of the shadow of death.” But though there may be religion in such a case, it is among the lowest forms of piety. What is mean, ignoble, and narrow, is no part of the Christian religion, and can never be transmuted into it.

There has come down to us as the result of the progress of civilization in this world, and with the highest approbation of mankind, a class of virtues connected with the ideas of honor and honorableness. That the sentiment of honor has been abused among people; that an attempt has been made to set it up as the governing principle in cases where conscience should rule; that in doing this a code has been established which, in many respects, is a departure from the rules of morality, there can be no doubt; — but still there are just principles of honor which Christianity does not disdain; which are to be incorporated into our principles of religion, and which we are to endeavor to instil into the hearts of our children. Whatever there is in the world that is “true, and honest, and just, and pure, and lovely, and of good report;" whatever belongs to the name of "virtue," and whatever deserves "praise," is to be blended with our religion, constituting our idea of a Christian man.

It is the blending of these things — the union of Christian principle with what is noble, and manly, and generous, and humane — which, in any case, entitles to the highest appellation that can be given to any of our race — that of THE CHRISTIAN GENTLEMAN.

APPENDIX NOTES ON PSALM 52

~~PS~~ Psalm 52:8. But I am like a green olive-tree ... We have seen that David was enabled by the exercise of faith to look down upon the worldly grandeur of Doeg with a holy contempt; and now we find him rising superior to all that was presently afflictive in his own condition. Though to appearance he more resembled the withered trunk of a tree which rots upon the ground, he compares himself, in the confidence of coming prosperity, to a green olive. I need not say that the destruction of Doeg could only communicate comfort to his mind, in the way of convincing him that God was the avenging judge of human cruelty, and leading him to infer that, as he had punished his wrongs, so he would advance him to renewed measures of prosperity. From his language it appears that he could conceive of no higher felicity in his condition than being admitted among the number of the worshippers of God, and engaging in the exercises of devotion. This was characteristic of his spirit. We have already had occasion to see that he felt his banishment from the sanctuary of God more keenly than separation from his consort, the loss of worldly substance, or the dangers and hardships of the wilderness. The idea of an allusion being here made by way of contrast to Doeg, who came to the tabernacle of the Lord merely as a spy, and under hypocritical pretexts, is strained and far-fetched. It is more natural to suppose that David distinguishes himself from all his enemies, without exception, intimating that though he was presently removed from the tabernacle, he would soon be restored to it; and that they who boasted of possessing, or rather monopolizing, the house of God, would be rooted out of it with disgrace. And here let us engrave the useful lesson upon our hearts, that we should consider it the great end of our existence to be found numbered among the worshippers of God; and that we should avail ourselves of the inestimable privilege of the stated assemblies of the church, which are necessary helps to our infirmity, and means of mutual excitement and encouragement. By these, and our common sacraments, the Lord, who is one God, and who designed that we should be one in him, is training us up together in the hope of eternal life, and in the united celebration of his holy name. Let us learn with David to prefer a place in the house of God to all the lying vanities of this world. He adds the reason why he should be like the green olive-tree — because he hoped in the goodness of God, for the causal particle appears to be understood. And in this he adverts to the contrast between him and his enemies. They might flourish for a time, spread their branches far and wide, and shoot themselves up to a gigantic stature, but would speedily wither away, because they had no root in the goodness of God; whereas he was certain to derive from this source ever renewed supplies of sap and vigor. As the term of his earthly trials might be protracted, and there was a danger that he might sink under their long continuance, unless his confidence should extend itself far into futurity, he declares expressly that he would not presume to prescribe times to God, and that his hopes were stretched into eternity. It followed that he surrendered himself entirely to God in all that regarded his life or his death. The passage puts us in possession of the grand distinction between the genuine children of God and those who are hypocrites. They are to be found together in the church, as the wheat is mingled with the chaff on the same threshing-floor; but the one class abides forever in the steadfastness of a well-founded hope, while the other is driven away in the vanity of its false confidences. — Calvin.

NOTES ON PSALM 53

There is a remarkable resemblance between this psalm and Psalm 14. Both are ascribed to the same author, David; and each pursues the same line of thought — the folly and wickedness of Atheism. They both show that the belief that there is no God is not a harmless idea, or a mere speculation, but that it has important consequences on the life, and is naturally connected with a wicked life, <sup><4918></sup>Psalm 53:3,4.

The difference in the two compositions is

(a) in the title; and

(b) in the psalm itself.

(a) In the title. Both psalms are ascribed to David, and both are dedicated to the “Chief Musician.” But in the title to the psalm before us, there is this addition: “Upon Mahalath, Maschil.” On the meaning of the term Maschil, see Introduction to Psalm 32. The term here would seem to imply that the psalm was designed to give instruction on an important subject, but why it is prefixed to this psalm, and not to the others, we have no means of determining. The word, rendered “Mahalath” — tl jəmə <sup><4257></sup> — occurs only here and in the title to Psalm 88. It is supposed by Gesenius to denote a stringed instrument, as a lute or guitar, that was designed to be accompanied with the voice. DeWette renders it “flute.” Luther renders it “for a choir, to be sung by one another;” that is, a responsive choir. The Septuagint and the Latin Vulgate retain the original word with no attempt to translate it. Prof. Alexander renders it disease, because a form of the word “almost identical” occurs (<sup><1256></sup>Exodus 15:26; <sup><1814></sup>Proverbs 18:14; <sup><4215></sup>2 Chronicles 21:15) meaning “disease,” and he supposes reference is to “the spiritual malady with which all mankind are infected, and which is really the theme or subject of the composition.” It is true that there IS a word — hl j mæ <sup><4245></sup> — similar to this, meaning “disease,” but it is also true that the word used here is never employed in that sense, and equally true that such a construction here is forced and unnatural. The obvious supposition is that it refers to an instrument of music.

(b) The difference in the psalms themselves is mainly that in Psalm 53 <sup><1946></sup>Psalm 14:6 is omitted, and that in the other parts of the psalm there are enlargements designed to illustrate or to explain more fully the course of thought in the psalm. It is not known by whom these changes were made. They are, as DeWette remarks, such as could not have occurred by an error in transcribing, and they must have been made by design. Whether the changes were made by the author, or by someone who collected and arranged the psalms, and who, adopting the main thoughts of Psalm 14, inserted additions conveying new phases of thought, though without intending to supersede the use of the original composition, it is not possible now to determine. It is by no means an improbable supposition that the author of the psalm — David — may have revised it himself, and made these changes as expressing more fully his idea, while, as embodying valuable thoughts, it was deemed not undesirable to retain the original psalm in the collection as proper to be used in the service of God. Similar changes occur in Psalm 18, as compared with 2 Samuel 22, where that psalm occurs in the original form of composition. There is no evidence that the alteration was made by a later writer; we may doubt whether a later writer would alter a composition of David, and publish it under his name.

For an analysis of the psalm, see Introduction to Psalm 14.

Psalm 53:1. The fool hath said in his heart ... For the meaning of this verse, see the notes at <sup><B94D></sup>Psalm 14:1. The only change in this verse — a change which does not affect the sense — is the substitution of the word “iniquity,” in Psalm 53, for “works,” in Psalm 14.

Psalm 53:2. God looked down from heaven ... See the notes at <sup><B94D></sup>Psalm 14:2. The only change which occurs in this verse is the substitution of the word pyhi a<sup><h430></sup>, rendered “God,” for “Yahweh,” rendered LORD, in <sup><B94D></sup>Psalm 14:2. The same change occurs also in <sup><B94D></sup>Psalm 14:4,6. It is to be observed, also, that the word “Yahweh” does not occur in this psalm, but that the term used is uniformly. pyhi a<sup><h430></sup>, God. In Psalm 14 both terms are found — the word pyhi a<sup><h430></sup> three times (<sup><B94D></sup>Psalm 14:1,2,5), and the word hwbyj<sup><h3068></sup> four times, <sup><B94D></sup>Psalm 14:2,4,6,7. It is impossible to account for this change. There is nothing in it, however, to indicate anything in regard to the authorship of the psalm or to the time when it was written, for both these words are frequently used by David elsewhere.

Psalm 53:3. Every one of them is gone back See the notes at Psalm 14:3. The only variation here in the two psalms is in the substitution of the word — gws<sup><15472></sup>, for rws<sup><15493></sup> — words almost identical in form and in sense. The only difference in meaning is, that the former word — the word used here — means “to draw back,” or “to go back;” the other, the word used in Psalm 14, means “to go off, to turn aside.” Each of them indicates a departure from God; a departure equally fatal and equally guilty, whether people turn “back” from following him, or turn “aside” to something else. Both of these forms of apostasy occur with lamentable frequency.

Psalm 53:4. Have the workers of iniquity no knowledge? See the notes at Psalm 14:4. The only change in this verse is in the omission of the word “all.” This word, as it occurs in Psalm 14 (“all the workers of iniquity”), makes the sentence stronger and more emphatic. It is designed to affirm in the most absolute and unqualified manner that none of these workers of iniquity had any true knowledge of God. This has been noticed by critics as the only instance in which the expression in Psalm 14 is stronger than in the revised form of the psalm before us.

Psalm 53:5. There were they in great fear ... Margin, as in Hebrew, “they feared a fear.” For the general meaning of the verse, see the notes at Psalm 14:5. There is, however, an important change introduced here — the most important in the psalm. The general sentiment of two verses (Psalm 14:5,6) in Psalm 14 is here compressed into one, and yet with such an important change as to show that it was by design, and apparently to adapt it to some new circumstance. The solution of this would seem to be that the original form (Psalm 14) was suited to some occasion then present to the mind of the writer, and that some new event occurred to which the general sentiment in the psalm might be easily applied (or which would express that as well as could be done by an entirely new composition), but that, in order to adapt it to this new purpose, it would be proper to insert some expression more particularly referring to the event. The principal of these additions is found in the verse before us. In Psalm 14:5,6, the language is, “There were they in great fear, for God is in the generation of the righteous; ye have shamed the counsel of the poor, because the Lord is his refuge.” In the psalm before us, the language is, “There were they in great fear, where no fear was: for God hath scattered the bones of him that encampeth against thee: thou hast put them to shame, because God hath despised them.” “Where no fear was.” The reference here, as in <sup><94B></sup>Psalm 14:5, is to the fear or consternation of the people of God on account of the designs and efforts of the wicked. They were apprehensive of being overthrown by the wicked. The design of the psalmist in both cases is to show that there was no occasion for that fear. In <sup><94B></sup>Psalm 14:5, he shows it by saying that “God is in the congregation of the righteous.” In the psalm before us he says expressly that there was no ground for that fear — “where no fear was,” — and he adds, as a reason, that God had “scattered the bones” of them “that encamped against” them. That is, though there seemed to be occasion for fear — though those enemies were formidable in numbers and in power — yet God was their friend, and he had now showed them that they had no real occasion for alarm by dispersing those foes.

For God hath scattered the bones of him that encampeth against thee Of the besieger. This, as already intimated, would seem to have been introduced in order to adapt the psalm to the particular circumstances of the occasion when it was revised. From this clause, as well as others, it appears probable that the particular occasion contemplated in the revision of the psalm was an attack on Jerusalem, or a siege of the city — an attack which had been repelled, or a siege which the enemy had been compelled to raise. That is, they had been overthrown, and their bones had been scattered, unburied, on the ground. The whole language of Psalm 14, thus modified, would be well suited to such an occurrence. The general description of atheism and wickedness in Psalm 14 would be appropriate in reference to such an attempt on the city — for those who made the attack might well be represented as practically saying that there was no God; as being corrupt and abominable; as bent on iniquity; as polluted and defiled; and as attempting to eat up the people of God as they eat bread; and as those who did not call upon God. The verse before us would describe them as discomfited, and as being scattered in slaughtered heaps upon the earth.

Thou hast put them to shame That is, they had been put to shame by being overthrown; by being unsuccessful in their attempt. The word “thou” here must be understood as referring to God.

Because God hath despised them He has wholly disapproved their character, and he has “despised” their attempts; that is, he has shown that they were not formidable or to be feared. They were efforts which might be looked on with contempt, and he had evinced this by showing how easily they could be overthrown.

<sup><1916></sup>Psalm 53:6. Oh that the salvation of Israel ... The only change here from <sup><1947></sup>Psalm 14:7 is that the word יְהוָה <sup><h430></sup>, God, is substituted for “Jehovah,” LORD, and that the word rendered “salvation” is here in the plural. On the supposition that the psalm was adapted to a state of things when the city had been besieged, and the enemy discomfited, this language would express the deep and earnest desire of the people that the Lord would grant deliverance. Perhaps it may be supposed, also, that at the time of such a siege, and while the Lord interposed to save them from the siege, it was also true that there was some general danger hanging over the people; that even the nation might be described as in some sense “captive;” or that some portions of the land were subject to a foreign power. The desire expressed is, that the deliverance might be complete, and that the whole land might be brought to the possession of liberty, and be rescued from all foreign domination. That time, when it should arrive, would be the occasion of universal rejoicing.

APPENDIX NOTES ON PSALM 53

The name Yahweh is not used at all in the psalm before us, but occurs four times in Psalm 14, and יְהוָה <sup><h430></sup> thrice. This difference seems to mark Psalm 53 as the later composition, in which the writer aimed at an external uniformity, which did not occur to him at first. This is a much more natural supposition than that he afterward varied what was uniform at first. The attempts which have been made to account still more particularly for the use of the divine names in these two psalms have entirely failed. — Alexander.

How is this diverse use of the divine names to be accounted for? A century has not yet elapsed since the subject first attracted the study of the learned, little more than twenty years since the facts were accurately noted, yet theories not a few have already been elaborated, some feasible, others not feasible at all. The one best known in this country is associated with the name of Dr. Colenso. It is very simple. He has found out that the name which translators, ancient and modern, have been accustomed reverently to veil under the more general title LORD, was invented — say by the prophet Samuel — shortly before David came to the throne, and that all the earlier Scriptures in which it occurs are spurious or hopelessly interpolated! The older name  $\mu y h i a^{<h430>}$  continued in use, however, for some time, and accordingly prevails in some of the psalms. After a while it gave place entirely to the newer word. Thus the whole difficulty is resolved into an affair of chronology; the Elohim psalms are the earlier, the others are the later. A very simple theory, if the facts would only accommodate themselves to it. However, they absolutely refuse to do so. Two may be named out of the hundreds that are available. The song of Deborah in the book of Judges, which is accounted genuine by all critics of every school, celebrates the praises of God by his name Yahweh; whereas Psalm 68, written long after, and with marked allusions to Deborah's song, uses the other and less sacred title. Moreover, Dr. Colenso's theory obliges him to make some later psalmist, and not David, the writer of Psalm 51. A theory which involves such an obligation is self-condemned.

Nevertheless, there must be some ground for the usage in question. No one who believes in the inspiration of the psalmists can doubt that there must be some wise reason for it. The appropriate use of the divine names in prayer is an excellent aid to faith, helping the supplicant "to take encouragement in prayer from God only;" it is no less excellent, we may be sure, in the kindred exercise of praise. It is certain that the psalmists did not vary their usage by accident. It could not be by accident that David, after having given forth Psalm 14 as a Yahweh-psalm, in giving forth a second edition of it substituted the name  $\mu y h i a^{<h430>}$ . Yet he has done this in Psalm 53. And the same remark applies to Psalm 70 in relation to the closing verses of Psalm 40. In all this there must have been some object; but what the precise object was it is hard to tell. None of the explanations yet given will solve the whole problem. A partial solution is, however, to be found in the different import of the divine names.  $\mu y h i a^{<h430>}$  is the more general designation, being occasionally applied to angels, to magistrates, to pagan deities;  $h w b y j^{<h3068>}$  is the special and special designation expressing God's covenant relation to his own Israel, and is absolutely incommunicable. This obvious diversity of import goes a good way toward explaining the remarkable manner in which the use of the names is varied throughout all the Old Testament Scriptures. Thus it explains the exclusive employment of  $\mu y h i a^{<h430>}$  in Ecclesiastes, a book which, dealing with the problems lying on the border-ground between natural and revealed religion, could not so fitly use the more sacred name. It explains the repeated employment of the same title in Psalm 14, although it is a Yahweh-psalm. If it does not perfectly explain the existence of a whole book of 'Elohiym-psalms, it at least furnishes a valuable contribution toward the solution of the difficulty. — Binnie.

~~<BIB>~~ Psalm 53:5. There were they in great fear where no fear was The rebels who rose up against David's authority, chiefly because they hated his religion, and were instigated by the spirit of persecution, proved on trial very cowardly, for no doubt God was pleased to impress terror on their hearts when there was no adequate danger. Thus the army of Absalom, which encamped against David, was easily routed; numbers fell in the forests, and being left unburied, their bones were scattered; and because God despised the impotent rage of this abandoned party, his servant easily put them to confusion. They were a sort of type of the Jewish persecutors of Christ and his disciples. — Scott.

NOTES ON PSALM 54

This psalm purports to be a psalm of David, and it bears all the internal marks of being his composition. The title suggests, doubtless with accuracy, the occasion on which it was composed, as well as the design for which it was intended. It is addressed or dedicated to the “chief Musician,” to be set by him to music, and to be employed in the public service of God. See Introduction to Psalm 4 — where, also, see the phrase “on Neginoth.” The word “Maschil” denotes that it was a didactic poem, or a poem designed to set forth important truth. See Introduction to Psalm 32. The occasion on which the psalm was composed is indicated by the statement that it was “when the Ziphims came and said to Saul, Doth not David hide himself with us?” Such an occurrence is twice recorded; <sup><0239></sup>1 Samuel 23:19; 26:1. It would seem not improbable that they in fact made two communications to Saul on the subject at different times, or that David was twice in their country, and that they twice endeavored to betray him to Saul. On the first occasion (<sup><0239></sup>1 Samuel 23:19ff) Saul, after commending them for their zeal, expressly desired them (<sup><0232></sup>1 Samuel 23:22) to return, and look carefully that they might be sure that he was there, or that he had not escaped into some other place, “for,” he adds, “it is told me that he dealeth very subtilly.” Before making the attempt himself to seize him, he wished to be certified that he was really there. On their return, the Ziphims found that David had escaped to “Maon” (<sup><0234></sup>1 Samuel 23:24), and they came again and informed Saul of that fact, After a vain effort on the part of Saul to find him, and after some other occurrences recorded in 1 Samuel 24; 25, it would seem that David came again into the country of the Ziphites, and that they again informed Saul of that fact, <sup><0241></sup>1 Samuel 26:1. Of course, it is not known precisely on which of these occasions the psalm was composed.

This psalm is similar in design to Psalm 52; and is intended, like that, to characterize the base conduct of informers. The psalm consists of three parts:

- (1) An earnest prayer for deliverance, <sup><3541></sup>Psalm 54:1-3;
- (2) an expression of confident belief that God would interpose and deliver him, <sup><3544></sup>Psalm 54:4,5;

(3) a resolution to render sacrifice to God, or to offer the tribute of praise, if he should be thus delivered, <sup><5516></sup>Psalm 54:6,7.

<sup><5518></sup>Psalm 54:1. Save me, O God, by thy name The word “name” here may include the perfections or attributes properly implied in the name. It is a calling on God as God, or in view of all that is implied in his name, or that constitutes the idea of “God.” That name would imply all of power and benevolence that was necessary to secure his salvation or safety. The particular object of the prayer here is that God would save him from the design of the Ziphims to betray him to Saul. In some way David seems to have been apprised of the information which they had given to Saul, or at least to have suspected it so strongly that he felt it was necessary for him to move from place to place in order to find safety.

And judge me by thy strength The word “judge” here is used in the sense of declaring a judgment in his favor, or of vindicating him. See the notes at <sup><5178></sup>Psalm 7:8. Compare <sup><5183></sup>Psalm 18:20; 26:1; 43:1. The idea is, Vindicate or save me by thy power.

<sup><5519></sup>Psalm 54:2. Hear my prayer, O God My earnest cry for deliverance from the designs of those who would betray me.

Give ear to the words of my mouth Incline thine ear to me, as one does who wishes to hear. See the notes at <sup><5176></sup>Psalm 17:6.

<sup><5521></sup>Psalm 54:3. For strangers are risen up against me That is, foreigners; those of another nation or land. Saul and his friends who sought the life of David were his own countrymen; these persons who sought to betray him were another people. They attempted to gain the favor of Saul, or to secure a reward from him, by betraying to him an innocent man whom he was persecuting.

And oppressors seek after my soul Seek after my life. The word here rendered “oppressors” means people of violence; the proud; the haughty; persecutors; tyrants. The word properly denotes those who exert their power in an arbitrary manner, or not under the sanction of law.

They have not set God before them They do not act as in the presence of God. They do not regard his authority. See the notes at <sup><5521></sup>Psalm 36:1. The word “Selah” here merely marks a musical pause. It indicates nothing in regard to the sense.

Psalm 54:4. Behold, God is mine helper That is, God alone can aid me in these circumstances, and to him I confidently look.

The Lord is with them that uphold my soul My friends; those who have rallied around me to defend me; those who comfort me by their presence; those who sustain me in my cause, and who keep me from sinking under the burden of my accumulated troubles.

Psalm 54:5. He shall reward evil unto mine enemies Margin, “those that observe me.” The original word here means literally “to twist, to twist together;” then, to press together; then, to “oppress,” or to treat as an enemy. The reference here is to those who pressed upon him as enemies, or who endeavored to crush him. The idea is that God would recompense them for this conduct, or that he would deal with them as they deserved.

Cut them off in thy truth In thy faithfulness; in thy regard for what is right. This is simply a prayer, or an expression of strong confidence, that God would deal with them as they deserved, or that he would not suffer such conduct to pass without a proper expression of his sense of the wrong. There is no evidence that David in this prayer was prompted by private or vindictive feeling.

Psalm 54:6. I will freely sacrifice unto thee The Hebrew words rendered “freely,” mean with “willingness, voluntariness, spontaneousness.” The idea is, that he would do it of a free or willing mind; without constraint or compulsion; voluntarily. The reference is to a free-will or voluntary offering, as distinguished from one, that was prescribed by law. See Exodus 35:29; 36:3; Leviticus 7:16; 22:18; Numbers 15:3; 29:39. The idea is, that as the result of the divine interposition which he prayed for, he would bring voluntary offerings to God in acknowledgment of his goodness and mercy.

I will praise thy name, O LORD I will praise thee. See Psalm 52:9.

For it is good That is, God himself is benevolent; and David says that he would express his sense of God’s goodness by offering him praise.

Psalm 54:7. For he hath delivered me out of all trouble This is spoken either in confident expectation of what would be, or as the statement of a general truth that God did deliver him from all trouble. It was what he had experienced in his past life; it was what he confidently expected in all time to come.

And mine eye hath seen his desire upon mine enemies The words “his desire” are not in the original. A literal translation would be, “And on my enemies hath my eye looked.” The meaning is, that they had been overthrown; they had been unsuccessful in their malignant attempts against him; and he had had the satisfaction of “seeing” them thus discomfited. Their overthrow had not merely been reported to him, but he had had ocular demonstration of its reality. This is not the expression of malice, but of certainty. The fact on which the eye of the psalmist rested was his own safety. Of that he was assured by what he had witnessed with his own eyes; and in that fact he rejoiced. There is no more reason to charge malignity in this case on David, or to suppose that he rejoiced in the destruction of his enemies as such, than there is in our own case when we are rescued from impending danger. It is proper for Americans to rejoice in their freedom, and to give thanks to God for it; nor, in doing this, is it to be supposed that there is a malicious pleasure in the fact that in the accomplishment of this thousands of British soldiers were slain, or that thousands of women and children as the result of their discomfiture were made widows and orphans. We can be thankful for the mercies which we enjoy without having any malignant delight in those woes of others through which our blessings may have come upon us.

APPENDIX NOTES ON PSALM 54

tribes, q.d. among pagans and Turks. Analogous also are the numerous passages in which Israelites either in general are described as aliens or pagans, or are coupled with the name of a particular outlandish people, in order to mark their degeneracy and ungodliness. The transition to the figurative use of  $\text{r}\text{Wz}$ <sup><h2114></sup> was the more easy, as it almost invariably carries the related idea of hostile, compare Gesen. Thes., who is so candid as to admit here this figurative use. — Hengstenberg.

<h504> Psalm 54:4. Behold! God is mine helper Such language as this may show us that David did not direct his prayers at random into the air, but offered them in the exercise of a lively faith. There is much force in the demonstrative adverb. He points as it were with the finger, to that God who stood at his side to defend him; and was not this an amazing illustration of the power with which faith can surmount all obstacles, and glance in a moment from the depths of despair to the very throne of God? He was a fugitive among the dens of the earth, and even there in hazard of his life — how then could he speak of God as being near to him? He was pressed down to the very mouth of the grave; and how could he recognize the gracious presence of God? He was trembling in the momentary expectation of being destroyed; and how is it possible that he can triumph in the certain hope that divine help will presently be extended to him? In numbering God among his defenders, we must not suppose that he assigns him a mere common rank among the people who supported his cause, which would have been highly derogatory to his glory. He means that God took part with there, such as Jonathan and others, who were interested in his welfare. These might be few in number, possessed of little power, and east down with fears; but he believed that, under the guidance and protection of the Almighty, they would prove superior to his enemies; or perhaps we may view him as referring in the words to his complete destitution of all human de fenders, and asserting that the help of God would abundantly compensate for all. — Calvin.

<h504> Psalm 54:7. Mine eye hath seen his desire upon mine enemies When our cause is the cause of God, and there is full sympathy with him in the triumph of right, this language is justified. Both private parties, however, and nations are in some danger, when they suppose their circumstances to be analogous with those of David. Prof. Alexander's illustration here is therefore in better taste than that of our author. "Mine eye has looked or gazed, with an implication of delight, or at least of acquiescence, which is commonly conveyed by this construction. This kind of satisfaction in the execution of God's threatenings is sinful only when combined with selfish malignity. Apart from this corrupt admixture, it is inseparable from conformity of will and coincidence of judgment with God. The same kind and degree of acquiescence which is felt by holy angels in heaven may surely be expressed by saints on earth, especially in their collective capacity as a church, fit whose name the psalmist is here speaking, and not merely in his own or that of any other individual."

NOTES ON PSALM 55

This psalm is entitled “A Psalm of David,” and there is every reason to believe that it is properly ascribed to him. It is addressed to “the chief Musician” — to be by him set to appropriate music, that it might be employed in the public worship of God. See the notes at the title to Psalm 4. On the word “Neginoth” in the title, see also the note in the Introduction of Psalm 4.

The occasion on which the psalm was composed is not indicated in the title, nor can it be with certainty ascertained. The author of the Chaldee Paraphrase refers the psalm to the time of Absalom and to his rebellion, and this is also the opinion of the Jewish expositors in general. They suppose that the psalm was composed on occasion of the departure of David from Jerusalem, when he had heard of the rebellion, and that the psalm has special reference to the time when, having fled from the city, and having come to the ascent of the Mount of Olives, while all was consternation around him, he learned that Ahithophel also was among the conspirators, which was the consummation of his calamity, <sup><0531></sup>2 Samuel 15:31. Others suppose that the psalm was composed when David was in Keilah, and when, surrounded by foes, he was apprehensive that the inhabitants of that place would deliver him into the hand of Saul, <sup><0201></sup>1 Samuel 23:1-12. Of all the known events in the life of David, the supposition which regards the psalm as composed during the rebellion of Absalom, and at the special time when he learned that the man whom he had trusted — Ahithophel — was among the traitors, is the most probable. All the circumstances in the psalm agree with his condition at that time, and the occasion was one in which the persecuted and much-afflicted king would be likely to pour out the desires of his heart before God. Paulus and DeWette have remarked that it is evident from the psalm that the enemies to whom the author refers were inhabitants of the same city with himself, and that the danger was from treason within the walls of the city, <sup><1811></sup>Psalm 55:10. This seems not improbable, and this agrees well with the supposition that the scene of the psalm is laid in the time of the rebellion of Absalom.

The contents of the psalm are as follows:

- (1) The prayer of the psalmist that God would hear his cry, <sup><151></sup>Psalm 55:1-3.
- (2) A general description of his trouble and sorrows, as being so great that he was overwhelmed, and such as to make him wish for the wings of a dove that he might fly away, and be at rest, <sup><150></sup>Psalm 55:4-8.
- (3) The causes, or sources of his trouble, <sup><150></sup>Psalm 55:9-14;
- (a) The general fact that he was surrounded by enemies; that there were violence, strife, and mischief in the city, <sup><150></sup>Psalm 55:9-11.
- (b) The particular fact that someone in whom he had put confidence, and who had been his special friend, was, to his surprise, found among his enemies, and had proved himself faithless to him, <sup><152></sup>Psalm 55:12-14.
- (4) His earnest prayer for the destruction of his enemies, <sup><155></sup>Psalm 55:15.
- (5) His own confidence in God; his reliance on the divine mercy and protection in the time of trouble and danger; and his assurance that God would interpose in his behalf, <sup><156></sup>Psalm 55:16-21.
- (6) A general exhortation, as a practical lesson from all that had occurred, to trust in God — to cast every burden on him — with the assurance that the righteous would never be moved, but that the wicked must be subdued, <sup><152></sup>Psalm 55:22,23.

<sup><151></sup>Psalm 55:1. Give ear to my prayer See the notes at <sup><151></sup>Psalm 5:1; 17:6. This is the language of earnestness. The psalmist was in deep affliction, and he pleaded, therefore, that God would not turn away from him in his troubles.

And hide not thyself from my supplication That is, Do not withdraw thyself, or render thyself inaccessible to my prayer. Do not so conceal thyself that I may not have the privilege of approaching thee. Compare the notes at <sup><2015></sup>Isaiah 1:15. See also <sup><226></sup>Ezekiel 22:26; <sup><187></sup>Proverbs 28:27; <sup><104></sup>Leviticus 20:4; <sup><912></sup>1 Samuel 12:3. The same word is used in all these places, and the general meaning is that of “shutting the eyes upon,” as implying neglect. So also in <sup><2056></sup>Lamentations 3:56, the phrase “to hide the ear” means to turn away so as not to hear. The earnest prayer of the psalmist here is, that God would not, as it were, withdraw or conceal himself, but would give free access to himself in prayer. The language is, of course, figurative, but it illustrates what often occurs when God seems to withdraw himself; when our prayers do not appear to be heard; when God is apparently unwilling to attend to us.

Psalm 55:2. Attend unto me, and hear me This also is the language of earnest supplication, as if he was afraid that God would not regard his cry. These varied forms of speech show the intense earnestness of the psalmist, and his deep conviction that he must have help from God.

I mourn The word used here — dwr<sup><47300></sup> — means properly to wander about; to ramble — especially applied to animals that have broken loose; and then, to inquire after, to seek, as one does “by running up and down;” hence, to desire, to wish. Thus in <sup><2112></sup>Hosea 11:12 — “Judah runs wild toward God,” — in our translation, “Judah yet ruleth with God.” The word occurs also in <sup><2423></sup>Jeremiah 2:31, “We are lords” (margin, have dominion); and in <sup><0274></sup>Genesis 27:40, “When thou shalt have the dominion.” It is not elsewhere found in the Scriptures. The idea here seems not to be to mourn, but to inquire earnestly; to seek; to look for, as one does who wanders about, or who looks every way for help. David was in deep distress. He looked in every direction. He earnestly desired to find God as a Helper. He was in the condition of one who had lost his way, or who had lost what was most valuable to him; and he directed his eyes most earnestly toward God for help.

In my complaint The word here employed commonly means speech, discourse, meditation. It here occurs in the sense of complaint, as in <sup><1873></sup>Job 7:13; 9:27; 21:4; 23:2; <sup><4523></sup>Psalm 142:2; <sup><0916></sup>1 Samuel 1:16. It is not used, however, to denote complaint in the sense of fault-finding, but in the sense of deep distress. As the word is now commonly used, we connect with it the idea of fault-finding, complaining, accusing, or the idea that we have been dealt with unjustly. This is not the meaning in tills place, or in the Scriptures generally. It is the language of a troubled, not of an injured spirit.

And make a noise To wit, by prayer; or, by groaning. The psalmist did not hesitate to give vent to his feelings by groans, or sobs, or prayers. Such expressions are not merely indications of deep feeling, but they are among the appointed means of relief. They are the effort which nature makes to throw off the burden, and if they are without complaining or impatience they are not wrong. See <sup><23814></sup>Isaiah 38:14; 59:11; <sup><3817></sup>Hebrews 5:7; <sup><4174></sup>Matthew 27:46.

Psalm 55:3. Because of the voice of the enemy He now states the cause of his troubles. He had been, and was, unjustly treated by others. The particular idea in the word “voice” here is, that he was suffering from slanderous reproaches; from assaults which had been made on his character. He was charged with evil conduct, and the charge was made in such a manner that he could not meet it. The result was, that a series of calamities had come upon him which was quite overwhelming.

Because of the oppression of the wicked The word here rendered “oppression” occurs nowhere else. The verb from which it is derived occurs twice, Amos 2:13: “Behold, I am “pressed” under you as a cart is “pressed” that is full of sheaves.” The idea is that of crushing by a heavy weight; and hence, of crushing by affliction. The “wicked” alluded to here, if the supposition referred to in the Introduction about the occasion of the psalm is correct, were Absalom and those who were associated with him in the rebellion, particularly Ahithophel, who had showed himself false to David, and had united with his enemies in their purpose to drive him from his throne.

For they east iniquity upon me That is, they charge me with sin; they attempt to justify themselves in their treatment of me by accusing me of wrong-doing, or by endeavoring to satisfy themselves that I deserve to be treated in this manner. If this refers to the time of the rebellion of Absalom, the allusion would be to the charges, brought by him against his father, of severity and injustice in his administration, 2 Samuel 15:2-6.

And in wrath they hate me In their indignation, in their excitement, they are full of hatred against me. This was manifested by driving him froth his throne and his home.

Psalm 55:4. My heart is sore pained within me Heavy and sad; that is, I am deeply afflicted. The word rendered is “sore pained,” means properly to turn round; to twist; to dance in a circle; to be whirled round; and then to twist or writhe with pain, especially applied to a woman in travail, Isaiah 13:8; 23:4; 26:18. Here the idea is, that he was in deep distress and anguish. It is easy to see that this would be so, if the psalm refers to the revolt of Absalom. The ingratitude and rebellion of a son — the fact of being driven away from his throne — the number of his enemies — the unexpected news that Ahithophel was among them — and the entire uncertainty as to the result, justified the use of this strong language.

And the terrors of death are fallen upon me The Septuagint, the Vulgate, and Luther, render this “the fear of death,” as if he were afraid for his life, or afraid that the result of all this would be his death. A more natural construction, however, is to suppose that the reference is to the ordinary pains of death, and that he means to say that the pangs which he endured were like the pangs of death. The words “are fallen” suggest the idea that this had come suddenly upon him, like a “horror of great darkness” (compare <sup><152></sup>Genesis 15:12), or as if the gloomy shadow of death had suddenly crossed his path. Compare the notes at <sup><204></sup>Psalms 23:4. The calamities had come suddenly upon him; the conspiracy had been suddenly developed; and he had been suddenly driven away.

<sup><487></sup>Psalm 55:5. Fearfulness and trembling Fear so great as to produce trembling. Compare the notes at <sup><304></sup>Job 4:14. He knew not when these things would end. How far the spirit of rebellion had spread he knew not, and he had no means of ascertaining. It seemed as if he would be wholly overthrown; as if his power was wholly at an end; as if even his life was in the greatest peril.

And horror hath overwhelmed me Margin, as in Hebrew, “covered me.” That is; it had come upon him so as to cover or envelop him entirely. The shades of horror and despair spread all around and above him, and all things were filled with gloom. The word rendered “horror” occurs only in three other places; — <sup><378></sup>Ezekiel 7:18, rendered (as here) “horror;” <sup><206></sup>Job 21:6, rendered “trembling;” and <sup><204></sup>Isaiah 21:4, rendered “fearfulness.” It refers to that state when we are deeply agitated with fear.

<sup><486></sup>Psalm 55:6. And I said That is, when I saw these calamities coming upon me, and knew not what the result was to be.

Oh, that I had wings like a dove! literally, “Who will give me wings like a dove?” or, Who will give me the pinion of a dove? The original word — rbæ<sup><83></sup> — means properly, “a wing-feather;” a pinion; the penna major or flagfeather of a bird’s wing by which he steers his course, — as of an eagle, <sup><341></sup>Isaiah 40:31, or of a dove, as here. It is distinguished from the wing itself, <sup><378></sup>Ezekiel 17:3: “A great eagle, with great wings, “long-winged,” full of feathers.” The reference here is supposed to be to the turtle-dove — a species of dove common in Palestine. Compare the notes at <sup><910></sup>Psalms 11:1. These doves, it is said, are never tamed.

“Confined in a cage, they droop, and, like Cowper, sigh for ‘A lodge in some vast wilderness — some boundless contiguity of shade;’ and no sooner are they set at liberty, than they flee to their mountains.” Land and the Book (Dr. Thomson), vol. i., p. 416.

For then would I fly away, and be at rest I would escape from these dangers, and be in a place of safety. How often do we feel this in times of trouble! How often do we wish that we could get beyond the reach of enemies; of sorrows; of afflictions! How often do we sigh to be in a place where we might be assured that we should be safe from all annoyances; from all trouble! There is such a place, but not on earth. David might have borne his severest troubles with him if he could have fled — for those troubles are in the heart, and a mere change of place does not affect them; or he might have found new troubles in the place that seemed to him to be a place of peace and of rest. But there is a world which trouble never enters. That world is heaven; to that world we shall soon go, if we are God’s children; and there we shall find absolute and eternal rest. Without “the wings of a dove,” we shall soon fly away and be at rest. None of the troubles of earth will accompany us there; no new troubles will spring up there to disturb our peace.

~~1850~~ Psalm 55:7. Lo, then would I wander far off literally, “Lo, I would make the distance far by wandering;” I would separate myself far from these troubles.

And remain in the wilderness literally, I would sojourn; or, I would pass the night; or, I would put up for the night. The idea is taken from a traveler who puts up for the night, or who rests for a night in his weary travels, and seeks repose. Compare ~~1810~~ Genesis 19:2; 32:21; ~~3026~~ 2 Samuel 12:16; ~~0793~~ Judges 19:13. The word “wilderness” means, in the Scripture, a place not inhabited by man; a place where wild beasts resort; a place uncultivated. It does not denote, as with us, an extensive forest. It might be a place of rocks and sands, but the essential idea is, that it was not inhabited. See the notes at <sup><400></sup>Matthew 4:1. In such a place, remote from the habitations of people, he felt that he might be at rest.

<sup><458></sup>Psalm 55:8. I would hasten my escape I would make haste to secure an escape. I would not delay, but I would flee at once.

From the windy storm and tempest From the calamities which have come upon me, and which beat upon me like a violent tempest. If this psalm was composed on occasion of the rebellion of Absalom, it is easy to see with what propriety this language is used. The troubles connected with that unnatural rebellion had burst upon him with the fury of a sudden storm, and threatened to sweep everything away.

And divide their tongues There is evident allusion here to the confusion of tongues at Babel (<sup><1008></sup>Genesis 11:1-9); and as the language of those who undertook to build that tower was confounded so that they could not understand each other, so the psalmist prays that the counsels of those engaged against him might be confounded, or that they might be divided and distracted in their plans, so that they could not act in harmony. It is very probable that there is an allusion here to the prayer which David offered when he learned that Ahithophel was among the conspirators (<sup><1051></sup>2 Samuel 15:31);

This would tend to divide and distract; the purposes of Absalom, and secure his defeat.

For I have seen violence and strife in the city In Jerusalem. Perhaps he had learned that among the conspirators there was not entire harmony, but that there were elements of “strife” and discord which led him to hope that their counsels would be confounded. There was little homogeneousness of aim and purpose among the followers of Absalom; and perhaps David knew enough of Ahithophel to see that his views, though he might be enlisted in the cause of the rebellion, would not be likely to harmonize with the views of the masses of those who were engaged in the revolt.

Psalm 55:10. Day and night they go about it, upon the walls thereof That is, continually. The word “they” in this place probably refers to the violence and strife mentioned in the preceding verse. They are here personified, and they seem to surround the city; to be everywhere moving, even on the very walls. They are like a besieging army. Inside and outside; in the midst of the city and on the walls, there was nothing but violence and strife — conspiracy, rebellion, and crime.

Mischief also and sorrow are in the midst of it Crime abounded, and the result was anguish or sorrow. This language would well describe the scenes when Absalom rebelled; when the city was filled with conspirators and rebels; and when crime and anguish seemed to prevail in every part of it.

Psalm 55:11. Wickedness is in the midst thereof That is, the wickedness connected with rebellion and revolt.

Deceit and guile depart not from her streets They are everywhere. They are found in every street and alley. They pervade all classes of the people. The word rendered “deceit” means rather “oppression.” This was connected with “guile,” or with “deceit.” That is, wrong would be everywhere committed, and the perpetration of those wrongs would be connected with false representations, and false pretences — a state of things that might be expected in the unnatural rebellion under Absalom.

Psalm 55:12. For it was not an enemy that reproached me The word “reproached” here refers to slander; calumny; abuse. It is not necessarily implied that it was in his presence, but he was apprized of it. When he says that it is not an enemy that did this, the meaning is that it was not one who had been an avowed and open foe. The severest part of the trial did not arise from the fact that it was done by such an one, for that he could have borne. That which overwhelmed him was the fact that the reproach came from one who had been his friend; or, the reproach which he felt most keenly came from one whom he had regarded as a personal confidant. It is not to be supposed that the psalmist means to say that he was not reproached by his enemies, for the whole structure of the psalm implies that this was so; but his anguish was made complete and unbearable by the discovery that one especially who had been his friend was found among those who reproached and calumniated him. The connection leads us to suppose, if the right view (Introduction) has been taken of the occasion on which the psalm was composed, that the allusion here is to Ahithophel (<sup><105b></sup>2 Samuel 15:31); and the particular distress here referred to was that which David experienced on learning that he was among the conspirators. A case of trouble remarkably resembling this is referred to in <sup><104b></sup>Psalm 41:9. See the notes at that place.

Then I could have borne it The affliction would have been such as I could bear. Reproaches from an enemy, being known to be an enemy, we expect; and we feel them comparatively little. We attribute them to the very fact that such an one is an enemy, and that he feels it necessary to sustain himself by reproaching and calumniating us. We trust also that the world will understand them in that way; and will set them down to the mere fact that he is our enemy. In such a case there is only the testimony against us of one who is avowedly our foe, and who has every inducement to utter malicious words against us in order to sustain his own cause. But the case is different when the accuser and slanderer is one who has been our intimate friend. He is supposed to know all about us. He has been admitted to our counsels. He has known our purposes and plans. He can speak not “slanderosly” but “knowingly.” It is supposed that he could have no motive to speak ill of us except his own conviction of truth, and that it could be only the strongest conviction of truth — the existence of facts to which not even a friend could close his eyes — that could induce him to abandon us, and hold us up to reprove and scorn. So Ahithophel — the confidential counselor and friend of David — would be supposed to be acquainted with his secret plans and his true character; and hence, reproaches from such a one became unendurable. “Neither was it he that hated me.” That avowedly and openly hated me. If that had been the case, I should have expected such usage, and it would not injure me.

That did magnify himself a against me That is, by asserting that I was a bad man, thus exalting himself in character above me, or claiming that he was more pure than I am. Or, it may mean, that exalted himself above me, or sought to reach the eminence of power in my downfall and ruin.

Then I would have hid myself from him I should have been like one pursued by an enemy who could hide himself in a cave, or in a fastness, or in the mountains, so as to be safe from his attacks. The arrows of malice would fly harmlessly by me, and I should be safe. Not so, when one reproached me who had been an intimate friend; who had known all about me; and whose statements would be believed.

Psalm 55:13. But it was thou, a man mine equal Margin, “a man according to my rank.” Septuagint, ἰσοψυχε, equal-souled, like-souled, “second self” (Thompson); Vulgate, “unanimus,” of the same mind; Luther, “Geselle,” companion. The Hebrew word used here — Ēr[e<sup>46187</sup>] — means properly a row or pile, as of the showbread piled one loaf on another, <sup>40123</sup>Exodus 40:23; then it would naturally mean one of the same row or pile; of the same rank or condition. The word also means price, estimation, or value, <sup>43313</sup>Job 28:13; <sup>43315</sup>Leviticus 5:15,18; 6:6. Here the expression may mean a man “according to my estimation, value, or price;” that is, of the same value as myself (Gesenius, Lexicon); or more probably it means a man of my own rank; according to my condition; that is, a man whom I esteemed as my equal, or whom I regarded and treated as a friend.

My guide The word used here properly denotes one who is familiar — a friend — from the verb āl æ<sup>4502</sup> — to be associated with; to be familiar; to be accustomed to. The noun is frequently used to denote a military leader — the head of a tribe — a chieftain; and is, in this sense, several times employed in Genesis 36 to denote the leaders or princes of the Edomites, where it is rendered duke. But here it seems to be used, not in the sense of a leader or a guide, but of a familiar friend.

And mine acquaintance The word used here is derived from the verb to know — [dæ<sup>43045</sup>] — and the proper idea is that of “one well known” by us; that is, one who keeps no secrets from us, but who permits us to understand him thoroughly. The phrase “mine acquaintance” is a feeble expression, and does not convey the full force of the original, which denotes a more intimate friend than would be suggested by the word “acquaintance.” It is language applied to one whom we thoroughly “know,” and who “knows us;” and this exists only in the case of very intimate friends. All the expressions used in this verse would probably be applicable to Ahithophel, and to the intimacy between him and David.

Psalm 55:14. We took sweet counsel together Margin, “who sweetened counsel.” Literally, “We sweetened counsel together;” that is, We consulted together; we opened our minds and plans to each other; in other words, We found that happiness in each other which those do who freely and confidentially communicate their plans and wishes — who have that mutual satisfaction which results from the approval of each other’s plans.

And walked unto the house of God in company We went up to worship God together. The word rendered “company” means properly a noisy crowd, a multitude. The idea here is not that which would seem to be conveyed by our translation — that they went up to the house of God in company “with each other,” but that both went with the great company — the crowd — the multitude — that assembled to worship God. They were engaged in the same service, they united in the worship of the same God; associated with those that loved their Maker; belonged to the companionship of those who sought his favor. There is nothing that constitutes a stronger bond of friendship and affection than being united in the worship of God, or belonging to his people. Connexion with a church in acts of worship, ought always to constitute a strong bond of love, confidence, esteem, and affection; the consciousness of having been redeemed by the same blood of the atonement should be a stronger tie than any tie of natural friendship; and the expectation and hope of spending an eternity together in heaven should unite heart to heart in a bond which nothing — not even death — can sever.

Psalm 55:15. Let death seize upon them This would be more correctly rendered, “Desolations (are) upon them!” That is, Desolation, or destruction will certainly come upon them. There is in the original no necessary expression of a wish or prayer that this might be, but it is rather the language of certain assurance — the expression of a fact — that such base conduct — such wickedness — would make their destruction certain; that as God is just, they must be overwhelmed with ruin. Injury is sometimes done in the translation of the Scriptures by the insertion of a wish or prayer, where all that is necessarily implied in the original is the statement of a fact. This has been caused here by the somewhat uncertain meaning of the word which is used in the original. That phrase is אָנִי,<sup>46377</sup>

twm<sup><4194></sup>. It occurs nowhere else. Our translators understood it (as the Septuagint, the Vulgate, and Luther do) as made up of two words. More correctly, however, it is to be regarded as one word, meaning “desolations,” or “destructions.” So Gesenius (Lexicon), Rosenmuller, and Prof. Alexander understand it.

And let them go down quick into hell “Alive,” or “living,” for that is the meaning of the word “quick” here — yj æ<sup><2416></sup> — as it commonly is in the Scriptures. Compare <sup><8330></sup>Leviticus 13:10; <sup><0460></sup>Numbers 16:30; <sup><4402></sup>Acts 10:42; <sup><5002></sup>2 Timothy 4:1; <sup><5042></sup>Hebrews 4:12; <sup><4045></sup>1 Peter 4:5. The word “hell” is rendered in the margin “the grave.” The original word is “sheol,” and means here either the grave, or the abode of departed spirits. See the notes at <sup><2344></sup>Isaiah 14:9; <sup><8302></sup>Job 10:21,22. There is a harshness in the translation of the term here which is unnecessary, as the word “hell” with us now uniformly refers to the place of punishment for the wicked beyond death. The meaning here, however, is not that they would be consigned to wrath, but that they would be cut off from the land of the living. The idea is that their destruction might be as sudden as if the earth were to open, and they were to descend alive into the chasm. Probably there is an implied allusion here to the manner in which the company of Korah, Dathan, and Abiram was destroyed, <sup><0463></sup>Numbers 16:31-33. Compare <sup><0467></sup>Psalms 106:17.

For wickedness is in their dwellings, and among them Wickedness abounds in all their transactions. It is in their houses, and in their hearts. This is mentioned as a reason why they should be cut off and consigned to the grave. It is the reason why people are cut down at all; it is often a fact that wicked people are most manifestly cut down for their sins. And because it will be better for the community that the wicked should be punished than that they should escape, so there is no evidence that David cherished malice or ill-will in his heart. See General Introduction, Section 6 (5).

<sup><4516></sup>Psalm 55:16. As for me, I will call upon God That is, I have no other refuge in my troubles, yet I can go to him, and pour out all the desires of my heart before him.

And the LORD shall save me This expresses strong confidence. On the supposition that the psalm refers to the rebellion of Absalom, David was driven from his home, and his throne, and from the house of God — a poor exile, forsaken by nearly all. But his faith did not fail. He confided in God, and believed that He was able to effect his deliverance, and that He would do it. Rarely can we be placed in circumstances so trying and discouraging as were those of David; never should we, in any circumstances, fall to believe, as he did, that God can deliver us, and that, if we are his friends, we shall be ultimately safe.

Psalm 55:17. Evening, and morning, and at noon, will I pray In another place (<sup>119:164</sup>Psalm 119:164) the psalmist says that he engaged in acts of devotion seven times in a day. Daniel prayed three times a day, <sup>6:10</sup>Daniel 6:10. David went, in his troubles, before God evening, morning, and mid-day, in solemn, earnest prayer. So Paul, in a time of great distress, gave himself on three set occasions to earnest prayer for deliverance. See the notes at <sup>2:8</sup>2 Corinthians 12:8. This verse, therefore, does not prove that it was a regular habit of David to pray three times a day; but in view of the passage, it may be remarked

(a) that it is proper to have regular seasons for devotion, of frequent occurrence; and

(b) that there are favorable and suitable times for devotion.

The morning and the evening are obviously appropriate; and it is well to divide the day also by prayer — to seek, at mid-day, the rest titan bodily and mental toil which is secured by communion with God — and to implore that strength which we need for the remaining duties of the day. True religion is cultivated by frequent and REGULAR seasons of devotion.

And cry aloud The word here employed properly means to murmur; to make a humming sound; to sigh; to growl; to groan. See the notes at <sup>42:5</sup>Psalm 42:5. Here the language means that he would give utterance to his deep feelings in appropriate tones — whether words, sighs, or groans. To the deep thoughts and sorrows of his soul he would often give suitable expression before God.

And he shall hear my voice The confident language of faith, as in <sup>55:16</sup>Psalm 55:16.

Psalm 55:18. He hath delivered my soul in peace The Hebrew is, “He has redeemed;” so also the Septuagint and Vulgate. The meaning is, He has “rescued” me, or has saved me from my enemies. Either the psalmist composed the psalm “after” the struggle was over, and in view of it, here speaks of what had actually occurred; or he is so confident of being redeemed and saved that he speaks of it as if it were already done. See <sup><1519></sup>Psalm 55:19. There are many instances in the Psalms in which the writer is so certain that what he prays for will be accomplished that he speaks of it as if it had already actually occurred. The words “in peace” mean that God had given him peace; or that the result of the divine interposition was that he had calmness of mind.

From the battle that was against me The hostile array; the armies prepared for conflict.

For there were many with me This language conveys to us the idea that there were many on his side, or many that were associated with him, and that this was the reason why he was delivered. It is doubtful, however, whether this is the meaning of the original. The idea may be that there were many contending with him; that is, that there were many who were arrayed against him. The Hebrew will admit of this construction.

<sup><1519></sup>Psalm 55:19. God shall hear and afflict them That is, God will hear my prayer, and will afflict them, or bring upon them deserved judgments. As this looks to the future, it would seem to show that when in the previous verse he uses the past tense, and says that God “had” redeemed him, the language there, as suggested above, is that of strong confidence, implying that he had such certain assurance that the thing would be, that he speaks of it as if it were already done. Here he expresses the same confidence in another form — his firm belief that God “would” hear his prayer, and would bring upon his enemies deserved punishment.

Even he that abideth of old The eternal God; he who is from everlasting. Literally, “He inhabits antiquity;” that is, he sits enthroned in the most distant past; he is eternal and unchanging. The same God who has heard prayer, will hear it now; he who has always shown himself a just God and an avenger, will show himself the same now. The fact that God is from everlasting, and is unchanging, is the only foundation for our security at any time, and the only ground of success in our plans. To a Being who is always the same we may confidently appeal, for we know what he will do. But who could have confidence in a changeable God? Who would know what to expect? Who can make any “calculation” on mere chance?

Because they have no changes ... Margin, “With whom there be no changes, yet they fear not God.” Literally, “To whom there are no changes, and they fear not God.” Prof. Alexander supposes this to mean that God will “hear” the reproaches and blasphemies of those who have no changes, and who, therefore, have no fear of God. The meaning of the original is not exactly expressed in our common version. According to that version, the idea would seem to be that the fact that they meet with no changes or reverses in life, or that they are favored with uniform prosperity, is a “reason” why they do not fear or worship God. This may be true in fact (compare the notes at ~~1821D~~ Job 21:9-14), but it is not the idea here. The meaning is, that the God who is unchanging — who is always true and just — will “afflict,” that is, will bring punishment on those who heretofore have had no changes; who have experienced no adversities; who are confident of success because they have always been prosperous, and who have no fear of God. Their continual success and prosperity “may” be a reason — as it often is — why they do “not” feel their need of religion, and do “not” seek and serve God; but the precise truth taught here is, that the fact of continued prosperity is no argument for impunity and safety in a course of wrong doing. God is unchangeable in fact, as they seem to be; and an unchangeable God will not suffer the wicked always to prosper. To constitute safety there must be a better ground of assurance than the mere fact that we have been uniformly prospered, and have experienced no reverses hitherto.

They fear not God They do not regard him. They do not dread his interposition as a just God. How many such there are upon the earth, who argue secretly that because they have always been favored with success, therefore they are safe; who, in the midst of abundant prosperity — of unchanging “good fortune,” as they would term it — worship no God, feel no need of religion, and are regardless of the changes of life which may soon occur, and even of that one great change which death must soon produce!

— who was thinking of one thing — and who did not deem it necessary to specify by name the man who had injured him, and whose conduct had so deeply pained him. He, therefore, begins the verse, “He hath put forth his hands,” etc.; showing that his mind was fixed on the base conduct of his enemy. The language is such as leads us to suppose that the psalmist had Ahithophel in view, as being eminently the man that had in this cruel and unexpected manner put forth his hands against one who was his friend, and who had always treated him with confidence.

He hath broken his covenant He, Ahithophel. The margin, as the Hebrew, is, “He hath profaned.” The idea is, that he had defiled, or polluted it; or he had treated it as a vile thing — a thing to be regarded with contempt and aversion, as a polluted object is. The “covenant” here referred to, according to the views expressed above, may be supposed to refer to the compact or agreement of Ahithophel with David as an officer of his realm — as an adviser and counselor — that he would be faithful to the interests of the king and to his cause. All this he had disregarded, and had treated as if it were a worthless thing, by identifying himself with Absalom in his rebellion. See ~~40512~~ 2 Samuel 15:12,31.

~~48521~~ Psalm 55:21. The words of his mouth were smoother than butter Prof. Alexander renders this, “Smooth are the butterings of his mouth.” This is in accordance with the Hebrew, but the general meaning is well expressed in our common version. The idea is, that he was a hypocrite; that his professions of friendship were false; that he only used pleasant words — words expressive of friendship and love — to deceive and betray. We have a similar expression when we speak of “honeyed words,” or “honeyed accents.” This would apply to Ahithophel, and it will apply to thousands of similar cases in the world.

But war was in his heart He was base, treacherous, false. He was really my enemy, and was ready, when any suitable occasion occurred, to show himself to be such.

His words were softer than oil Smooth, pleasant, gentle. He was full of professions of love and kindness.

Yet were they drawn swords As swords drawn from the scabbard, and ready to be used. Compare ~~428XB~~ Psalm 28:3; 57:4.

Psalm 55:22. Cast thy burden upon the LORD This may be regarded as an address of the psalmist to himself, or to his own soul — an exhortation to himself to roll all his care upon the Lord, and to be calm. It is expressed, however, in so general language, that it may be applicable to all persons in similar circumstances. Compare <sup><4128></sup>Matthew 11:28,29; <sup><1016></sup>Philippians 4:6,7; <sup><1017></sup>1 Peter 5:7. The Margin here is, “gift.” The “literal” rendering would be, “Cast upon Jehovah what he hath given (or laid upon) thee; that is, thy lot.” (Gesenius, Lexicon) The phrase, “he gives thee,” here means what he appoints for thee; what he allots to thee as thy portion; what, in the great distribution of things in his world, he has assigned to “thee” to be done or to be borne; cast it all on him. Receive the allotment as coming from him; as what “he” has, in his infinite wisdom, assigned to thee as thy portion in this life; as what “he” has judged it to be best that then shouldst do or bear; as “thy” part of toil, or trouble, or sacrifice, in carrying out his great arrangements in the world. All that is to be “borne” or to be “done” in this world he has “divided up” among people, giving or assigning to each one what He thought best suited to his ability, his circumstances, his position in life — what “he” could do or bear best — and what, therefore, would most conduce to the great end in view. That portion thus assigned to “us,” we are directed to “cast upon the Lord;” that is, we are to look to him to enable us to do or to bear it. As it is “his” appointment, we should receive it, and submit to it, without complaining; as it is “his” appointment, we may feel assured that no more has been laid upon us than is commensurate with our ability, our condition, our usefulness, our salvation. We have not to rearrange what has been thus appointed, or to adjust it anew, but to do all, and endure all that he has ordained, leaning on his arm.

And he shall sustain thee He will make you sufficient for it. The word literally means “to measure;” then to hold or contain, as a vessel or measure; and then, to hold up or sustain “by” a sufficiency of strength or nourishment, as life is sustained. <sup><1451></sup>Genesis 45:11; 47:12; 50:21; <sup><1047></sup>1 Kings 4:7; 17:4. Here it means that God would give such a “measure” of strength and grace as would be adapted to the duty or the trial; or such as would be sufficient to bear us up under it. Compare the notes at <sup><4713></sup>2 Corinthians 12:9.

He shall never suffer the righteous to be moved literally, “He will not give moving forever to the righteous.” That is, he will not so appoint, arrange, or permit things to occur, that the righteous shall be “ultimately” and “permanently” removed from their steadfastness and their hope; he will not suffer them to fall away and perish. In all their trials and temptations he will sustain them, and will ultimately bring them off in triumph. The meaning here cannot be that the righteous shall never be “moved” in the sense that their circumstances will not be changed; or that none of their plans will fail; or that they will never be disappointed; or that their minds will never in any sense be discomposed; but that whatever trials may come upon them, they will be “ultimately” safe. Compare <sup><13724></sup>Psalm 37:24.

<sup><13723></sup>Psalm 55:23. But thou, O God, shalt bring them down into the pit of destruction The word “them,” here evidently refers to the enemies of the psalmist; the wicked people who were arrayed against him, and who sought his life. The “pit of destruction” refers here to the grave, or to death, considered with reference to the fact that they would be “destroyed” or “cut off,” or would not die in the usual course of nature. The meaning is, that God would come forth in his displeasure, and cut them down for their crimes. The word “pit” usually denotes “a well,” or “cavern” (<sup><1140></sup>Genesis 14:10; 37:20; <sup><12134></sup>Exodus 21:34), but is often used to denote the grave (<sup><13176></sup>Job 17:16; 33:18,24; <sup><13915></sup>Psalm 9:15; 28:1; 30:3,9, et al.); and the idea here is that they would be cut off for their sins. The word “destruction” is added to denote that this would be by some direct act, or by punishment inflicted by the hand of God.

Bloody and deceitful men Margin, as in Hebrew, “Men of bloods and deceit.” The allusion is to people of violence; people who live by plunder and rapine; and especially to such people considered as false, unfaithful, and treacherous — as they commonly are. The special allusion here is to the enemies of David, and particularly to such as Ahithophel — men who not only sought his life, but who had proved themselves to be treacherous and false to him.

Shall not live out half their days Margin, as in Hebrew, “shall not halve their days.” So the Septuagint, and the Latin Vulgate. The statement is general, not universal. The meaning is, that they do not live half as long as they might do, and would do, if they were “not” bloody and deceitful. Beyond all question this is true. Such people are either cut off in strife and conflict, in personal affrays in duels, or in battle; or they are arrested for their crimes, and punished by an ignominious death. Thousands and tens of thousands thus die every year, who, “but” for their evil deeds, might have doubled the actual length of their lives; who might have passed onward to old age respected, beloved, happy, useful. There is to all, indeed, an outer limit of life. There is a bound which we cannot pass. That natural limit, however, is one that in numerous cases is much “beyond” what people actually reach, though one to which they “might” have come by a course of temperance, prudence, virtue, and piety. God has fixed a limit beyond which we cannot pass; but, wherever that may be, as arranged in his providence, it is our duty not to cut off our lives “before” that natural limit is reached; or, in other words, it is our duty to live on the earth just as long as we can. Whatever makes us come short of this is self-murder, for there is no difference in principle between a man’s cutting off his life by the pistol, by poison, or by the halter, and cutting it off by vice, by crime, by dissipation, by the neglect of health, or by those habits of indolence and self-indulgence which undermine the constitution, and bring the body down to the grave. Thousands die each year whose proper record on their graves would be “self-murderers.” Thousands of young people are indulging in habits which, unless arrested, “must” have such a result, and who are destined to an early grave — who will not live out half their days — unless their mode of life is changed, and they become temperate, chaste, and virtuous. One of the ablest lawyers that I have ever known — an example of what often occurs — was cut down in middle life by the use of tobacco. How many thousands perish each year, in a similar manner, by indulgence in intoxicating drinks!

APPENDIX NOTES ON PSALM 55

 Psalm 55:8. I would hasten my escape from the windy storm and tempest Such was the language of David — and it may be the language of any other good man in the depth of distress. But is it allowable and proper? There is no perfection here; and there is nothing concerning which we should indulge more tenderness of censure than hasty expressions uttered under the pressure of pain or grief. Perhaps it was to prevent our severity here that the cases of Job and Jeremiah are recorded, both of whom, though eminent in piety, cursed the day of their birth. The Scripture is not harsh upon them; and it is observable, that when James refers to one of these bitterly complaining sufferers, he only says, “Ye have heard of the patience of Job.” They who have never been in a state of special distress know little of the feelings of human nature under it. But there are others who can respond to the invitation of sympathy, “Pity me, pity me, O ye my friends, for the hand of God hath touched me!” And the Father of mercies knows our frame, and remembers that we are dust. We are not required to choose suffering for its own sake; or to be indifferene to ease and deliverance. Our Saviour himself had not that fortitude which mocks at pain; but that which felt deeply; and yet submitted. With strong cryings and tears he prayed, “Father, if it be possible, let this cup pass from me: nevertheless not my will, but thine be done.” But what allows of excuse, truth does not require us to commend. It was his infirmity that induced David to long for death, to hasten his escape from the stormy wind and tempest; and an old writer tells us it would have been more honorable for him to have asked for the strength of an ox to bear his trials, than for the wings of a dove to flee from them. — Jay.

Psalm 55:12-15. It was not an enemy ... Ahithophel’s treachery was especially distressing to David; and it was the more painful for being wholly unsuspected. So far from having been an avowed enemy who now took occasion to reproach him and to exult in his calamities, or menace his life, Ahithophel had been David’s counselor and bosom friend, and had been treated by him as an equal, or as one of his own rank; he had also been his chosen and pleasing companion in the exercise of religion and in pious conversation. Yet this very man, without any affront or previous quarrel, became an apostate and a traitor; and gave Absalom the most malicious and infernal counsel imaginable! Thus Christ was betrayed by one whom he had honored as a companion, a disciple, and an apostle; who resembled Ahithophel in his crimes and in his doom: for both were speedily overtaken by divine vengeance in the same dreadful manner. This was foretold by David concerning Ahithophel, and by Jesus concerning Judas, for the words are in the future, and more naturally signify a prediction than an imprecation.

“The sudden destruction of Korah, Dathan, and Abiram, who, for stirring up rebellion against Moses and Aaron, ‘went down alive into the pit,’ seems here alluded to, as the grand representation of the manner in which the bottomless pit shall one day shut her mouth forever upon all the impenitent enemies of the true King of Israel and the great high priest of our profession” (Horne). — Scott.

NOTES ON PSALM 56

This purports to be a psalm of David, and there is no sufficient reason for doubting the correctness of its being thus attributed to him. DeWette indeed thinks that the contents of the psalm do not well agree with the circumstances of David's life, and especially with that period of his life referred to in the title, and supposes that it was composed by some Hebrew in exile in the time of the captivity. But this is evidently mere conjecture. There "were" times in the life of David to which all that is said in this psalm would be applicable; and it is not difficult to explain all the allusions in it with reference to the circumstances specified in the title.

On the words "To the chief Musician," see Introduction to Psalm 4. In the expression in the title "upon Jonath-elem-rechokim," the first word — "Jonath" — means a "dove," a favorite emblem of suffering innocence; and the second —  $\mu\lambda\ \acute{\alpha}\epsilon$ <sup><h482></sup> — means "silence," dumbness, sometimes put for uncomplaining submission; and the third —  $q\omega Dr$ <sup><h7350></sup> — means "distant" or "remote," agreeing here with places or persons, probably the latter, in which sense it is applicable to the Philistines, as aliens in blood and religion from the Hebrews. Thus understood, the whole title is an enigmatical description of David as an innocent and uncomplaining sufferer among strangers. See Prof. Alexander. DeWette, however, renders it, "The dove of the far-off terebinth trees." The Septuagint and the Vulgate render it, "for the people who are made remote from their sanctuary." The common rendering of the phrase is, "Upon, or respecting the dove of silence, in remote plaees," or "far-off from its nest," or "in distant groves." Gesenius (Lexicon) renders it, "the silent dove among strangers," and applies it to the people of Israel in the time of the exile, as an uncomplaining, uncomplaining people. This explanation of the "words," "the silent dove among strangers," is probably the true one; but it is applicable here, not to the people of Israel, as Gesenius, the Septuagint, and the Vulgate, render it, but to David, as an exile and a wanderer — one who was driven away from country and home, as a dove wandering from its nest. Whether it was the title of a "tune" or a piece of music already known, or whether it was music that was composed for this occasion, and with reference to this very psalm, it is not practicable now to determine. It is very "possible" that there was already a piece of music in existence, and in common use, to which this beautiful title of "A silent dove among strangers," or "A patient dove driven from her nest into remote places,” was given — plaintive, tender, pensive music, and therefore especially appropriate for a psalm composed to describe the feelings of David when driven from home, and compelled to seek a place of safety in a remote region, like a dove driven from its nest. On the meaning of the word “Michtam,” see the notes at the introduction to Psalm 16. The portion of the title “When the Philistines took him in Gath,” evidently refers to the event recorded in <sup><0210></sup>1 Samuel 21:10ff when David, fleeing from Saul, took refuge in the country of Achish, king of Gath, and when the “servants” of the king of Gath made him known to Achish, whose fears they so aroused as to lead him to drive the stranger away. The words “took him in Gath,” refer not to their “apprehending” him, or “seizing” him, but to their following him, or overtaking him, to wit, by their calumnies and reproaches, so that he found no safety there. He was persecuted by Saul; he was also persecuted by the Philistines, among whom he sought refuge and safety.

The psalm embraces the following points:

- I. An earnest prayer for the divine interposition in behalf of the author of the psalm, <sup><0500></sup>Psalm 56:1,2.
- II. An expression of his trust in God in times of danger, <sup><0503></sup>Psalm 56:3,4.
- III. A description of his enemies: of their wresting his words; of their evil thoughts against him; of their gathering together; of their watching his steps; of their lying in wait for his life, <sup><0505></sup>Psalm 56:5,6.
- IV. His confident belief that they would not escape by their iniquity; that God knew all his wanderings; that God remembered his tears, as if He put them in His bottle; and that his enemies would know that God was with him, <sup><0507></sup>Psalm 56:7-9.
- V. His entire trust in God, and his firm assurance that he would yet be kept from falling, and would walk before God in the light of the living. <sup><0510></sup>Psalm 56:10-13.

The general “subject” of the psalm, therefore, is “confidence or trust in God in the time of danger.”

For man would swallow me up The word used here means properly to breathe hard; to pant; to blow hard; and then, to pant after, to yawn after with open mouth. The idea is, that people came upon him everywhere with open mouth, as if they would swallow him down whole. He found no friend in man — in any man. Everywhere his life was sought. There was no “man,” wherever he might go, on whom he could rely, or whom he could trust; and his only refuge, therefore, was in God.

He fighting daily Constantly; without intermission. That is, all people seemed to be at war with him, and to pursue him always.

Oppresseth me Presses hard upon me; so presses on me as always to endanger my life, and so that I feel no security anywhere.

Psalm 56:2. Mine enemies Margin, “mine observers.” The Hebrew word here used means properly to twist, to twist together; then, to be firm, hard, tough; then, “to press together,” as a rope that is twisted — and hence, the idea of oppressing, or pressing hard on one, as an enemy. See Psalm 27:11; 54:5. In the former verse the psalmist spoke of an enemy, or of “one” that would swallow him up (in the singular number), or of “man” as an enemy to him anywhere. Here he uses the plural number, implying that there were “many” who were enlisted against him. He was surrounded by enemies. He met them wherever he went. He had an enemy in Saul; he had enemies in the followers of Saul; he had enemies among the Philistines, and now when he had fled to Achish, king of Gath, and had hoped to find a refuge and a friend there, he found only bitter foes.

Would daily swallow me up Constantly; their efforts to do it are unceasing. A new day brings no relief to me, but every day I am called to meet some new form of opposition.

For they be many that fight against me His own followers and friends were few; his foes were many. Saul had numerous followers, and David encountered foes wherever he went. “O thou Most High.” The word used here — יָמוֹם,<sup>h4791</sup> — means properly height, altitude, elevation; then, a high place, especially heaven, Psalm 18:16; Isaiah 24:18,21; then it is applied to anything high or inaccessible, as a fortress, Isaiah 26:5. It is supposed by Gesenius (Lexicon), and some others, to mean here “elation of mind, pride,” — implying that his enemies fought against him with elated minds, or proudly. So the Septuagint, the Vulgate, and Luther render it; and so DeWette understands it. Yet it seems most probable that our translators have given the correct rendering, and that the passage is a solemn appeal to God as more exalted than his foes, and as one, therefore, in whom he could put entire confidence. Compare ~~Psalm~~ Psalm 92:8; 93:4; ~~Micah~~ Micah 6:6.

~~Psalm~~ Psalm 56:3. What time I am afraid literally, “the day I am afraid.” David did not hesitate to admit that there were times when he was afraid. He saw himself to be in danger, and he had apprehensions as to the result. There is a natural fear of danger and of death; a fear implanted in us:

(a) to make us cautious, and

(b) to induce us to put our trust in God as a Preserver and Friend.

Our very nature — our physical constitution — is full of arrangements most skillfully adjusted, and most wisely planted there, to lead us to God as our Protector. Fear is one of these things, designed to make us feel that we “need” a God, and to lead us to him when we realize that we have no power to save ourselves from impending dangers.

I will trust in thee As one that is able to save, and one that will order all things as they should be ordered. It is only this that can make the mind calm in the midst of danger:

(a) the feeling that God can protect us and save us from danger, and that he “will” protect us if he sees fit;

(b) the feeling that whatever may be the result, whether life or death, it will be such as God sees to be best — if “life,” that we may be useful, and glorify his name yet upon the earth; if “death,” that it will occur not because he had not “power” to interpose and save, but because there were good and sufficient reasons why he should “not” put forth his power on that occasion and rescue us.

Of this we may be, however, assured, that God has “power” to deliver us always, and that if not delivered from calamity it is not because he is inattentive, or has not power. And of this higher truth also we may be assured always, that he has power to save us from that which we have most occasion to fear — a dreadful hell. It is a good maxim with which to go into a world of danger; a good maxim to go to sea with; a good maxim in a storm; a good maxim when in danger on the land; a good maxim when we are sick; a good maxim when we think of death and the judgment — “What time I am afraid, I WILL TRUST IN THEE.”

Psalm 56:4. In God I will praise his word The meaning of this seems to be, “In reference to God — or, in my trust on God — I will especially have respect to his “word” — his gracious promise; I will make that the special object of my praise. In dwelling in my own mind on the divine perfections; in finding there materials for praise, I will have special respect to his revealed truth — to what he has “spoken” as an encouragement to me. I will be thankful that he “has” spoken, and that he has given me assurances on which I may rely in the times of danger.” The idea is, that he would “always” find in God that which was the ground or foundation for praise; and that that which called for special praise in meditating on the divine character, was the word or promise which God had made to his people.

I will not fear what flesh can do unto me What man can do to me. Compare the notes at <sup><40B></sup>Matthew 10:28; <sup><43B></sup>Romans 8:31-34; <sup><83B></sup>Hebrews 13:6.

Psalm 56:5. Every day they wrest my words The word here rendered “wrest,” means literally to give pain, to grieve, to afflict; and it is used here in the sense of “wresting,” as if force were applied to words; that is, they are “tortured,” twisted, perverted. We have the same use of the word “torture” in our language. This they did by affixing a meaning to his words which he never intended, so as to injure him.

All their thoughts are against me for evil All their plans, devices, purposes. They never seek my good, but always seek to do me harm.

Psalm 56:6. They gather themselves together That is, they do not attack me singly, but they unite their forces; they combine against me.

They hide themselves They lurk in ambush. They do not come upon me openly, but they conceal themselves in places where they cannot be seen, that they may spring upon me suddenly.

They mark my steps They watch me whatever I do. They keep a spy upon me, so that I can never be sure that I am not observed.

When they wait for my soul As they watch for my life; or, as they watch for opportunities to take away my life. I am never secure; I know not at what time, or in what manner, they may spring upon me. This would apply to David when he fled to Achish, king of Gath; when he was driven away by him; and when he was watched and pursued by Saul and his followers as he fled into the wilderness. 1 Samuel 21; 22.

Psalm 56:7. Shall they escape by iniquity? This expression in the original is very obscure. There is in the Hebrew no mark of interrogation; and a literal rendering would be, “By iniquity (there is) escape to them;” and, according to this, the sense would be, that they contrived to escape from just punishment by their sins; by the boldness of their crimes; by their wicked arts. The Septuagint renders it, “As I have suffered this for my life, thou wilt on no account save them.” Luther, “What they have done evil, that is already forgiven.” DeWette reads it, as in our translation, as a question: “Shall their deliverance be in wickedness?” Probably this is the true idea. The psalmist asks with earnestness and amazement whether, under the divine administration, people “can” find safety in mere wickedness; whether great crimes constitute an evidence of security; whether his enemies owed their apparent safety to the fact that they were so eminently wicked. He prays, therefore, that God would interfere, and show that this was not, and could not be so.

In thine anger cast down the people, O God That is, show by thine own interposition — by the infliction of justice — by preventing the success of their plans — by discomfiting them — that under the divine administration wickedness does not constitute security; in other words, that thou art a just God, and that wickedness is not a passport to thy favor.

Psalm 56:8. Thou tellest my wanderings Thou dost “number” or “recount” them; that is, in thy own mind. Thou dost keep an account of them; thou dost notice me as I am driven from one place to another to find safety. “My wanderings,” to Gath, <sup><0210></sup>1 Samuel 21:10; to the cave of Adullam, <sup><0211></sup>1 Samuel 22:1; to Mizpeh, in Moab, <sup><0212></sup>1 Samuel 22:3; to the forest of Hareth, <sup><0215></sup>1 Samuel 22:5; to Keilah, <sup><0216></sup>1 Samuel 23:5; to the wilderness of Ziph, <sup><0234></sup>1 Samuel 23:14; to the wilderness of Maon, <sup><0235></sup>1 Samuel 23:25; to En-ge-di, <sup><0240></sup>1 Samuel 24:1,2.

Put thou my tears into thy bottle The tears which I shed in my wanderings. Let them not fall to the ground and be forgotten. Let them be remembered by thee as if they were gathered up and placed in a bottle — “a lachrymatory” — that they may be brought to remembrance hereafter. The word here rendered “bottle” means properly a bottle made of skin, such as was used in the East; but it may be employed to denote a bottle of any kind. It is possible, and, indeed, it seems probable, that there is an allusion here to the custom of collecting tears shed in a time of calamity and sorrow, and preserving them in a small bottle or “lachrymatory,” as a memorial of the grief. The Romans had a custom, that in a time of mourning — on a funeral occasion — a friend went to one in sorrow, and wiped away the tears from the eyes with a piece of cloth, and squeezed the tears into a small bottle of glass or earth, which was carefully preserved as a memorial of friendship and sorrow. Many of these lachrymatories have been found in the ancient Roman tombs. I myself saw a large quantity of them in the “Columbaria” at Rome, and in the Capitol, among the relics and curiosities of the place. The above engraving will illustrate the form of THESE lachrymatories. The annexed remarks of Dr. Thomson (“land and the Book,” vol. i. p. 147), will show that the same custom prevailed in the East, and will describe the forms of the “tear-bottles” that were used THERE. “These lachrymatories are still found in great numbers on opening ancient tombs. A sepulchre lately discovered in one of the gardens of our city had scores of them in it. They are made of thin glass, or more generally of simple pottery, often not even baked or glazed, with a slender body, a broad bottom, and a funnel-shaped top. They have nothing in them but “dust” at present. If the friends were expected to contribute their share of tears for these bottles, they would very much need cunning women to cause their eyelids to gush out with water. These forms of ostentatious sorrow have ever been offensive to sensible people. Thus Tacitus says, ‘At my funeral let no tokens of sorrow be seen, no pompous mockery of woe. Crown me with chaplets, strew flowers on my grave, and let my friends erect no vain memorial to tell where my remains are lodged.’”

TEAR-BOTTLES.

Are they not in thy book? In thy book of remembrance; are they not numbered and recorded so that they will not be forgotten? This expresses strong confidence that his tears “would” be remembered; that they would not be forgotten. All the tears that we shed “are” remembered by God. If “properly” shed — shed in sorrow, without murmuring or complaining, they will be remembered for our good; if “improperly shed” — if with the spirit of complaining, and with a want of submission to the divine will, they will be remembered against us. But it is not wrong to weep. David wept; the Saviour wept; nature prompts us to weep; and it cannot be wrong to weep if “our” eye “poureth out” its tears “unto God” (~~18161~~ Job 16:20); that is, if in our sorrow we look to God with submission and with earnest supplication.

~~1860~~ Psalm 56:9. When I cry unto thee This expresses strong confidence in prayer. The psalmist felt that he had only to cry unto God, to secure the overthrow of his enemies. God had all power, and his power would be put forth in answer to prayer.

Then shall mine enemies turn back Then shall they cease to pursue and persecute me. He did not doubt that this would be the ultimate result — that this blessing would be conferred, though it might be delayed, and though his faith and patience might be greatly tried.

For God is for me He is on my side; and he is with me in my wanderings. Compare the notes at ~~18381~~ Romans 8:31.

~~1860~~ Psalm 56:10. In God will I praise his word Luther renders this, “I will praise the word of God.” The phrase “in God” means probably “in respect to God;” or, “in what pertains to God.” That which he would “particularly” praise or celebrate in respect to God — that which called for the most decided expressions of praise and gratitude, was his “word,” his promise, his revealed truth. So in ~~18402~~ Psalm 138:2, “Thou hast magnified thy word above all thy name;” that is, above all the other manifestations of thyself. The allusion in the passage here is to what God had “spoken” to David, or the “promise” which he had made — the declaration of his gracious purposes in regard to him. Amidst all the perfections of Deity, and all which God had done for him, this now seemed to him to have special pre-eminence in his praises. The “word” of God was to him that which impressed his mind most deeply — that which most tenderly affected his heart. There are times when we feel this, and properly feel it; times when, in the contemplation of the divine perfections and dealings, our minds so rest on his word, on his truth, on what he has revealed, on his gracious promises, on the disclosures of a plan of redemption, on the assurance of a heaven hereafter, on the instructions which he has given us about himself and his plans — about ourselves, our duty, and our prospects, that this absorbs all our thoughts, and we feel that this is “the” great blessing for which we are to be thankful; this, “the” great mercy for which we are to praise him. What would the life of man be without the Bible! What a dark, gloomy, sad course would ours be on earth if we had nothing to guide us to a better world!

In the LORD will I praise his word In “Yahweh.” That is, whether I contemplate God in the usual name by which he is known — יְהוָה <sup><h430></sup> — or by that more sacred name which he has assumed — יהוהי <sup><h3068></sup> — that which seems now to me to lay the foundation of loftiest praise and most hearty thanksgiving, is that he has spoken to people, and made known his will in his revealed truth.

<sup><h51></sup>Psalm 56:11. In God have I put my trust The sentiment in this verse is the same as in <sup><h516></sup>Psalm 56:6, except that the word “man” is used here instead of “flesh.” The meaning, however, is the same. The idea is, that he would not be afraid of what “any man” — any human being — could do to him, if God was his friend.

<sup><h521></sup>Psalm 56:12. Thy vows are upon me, O God The word “vow” means something promised; some obligation under which we have voluntarily brought ourselves. It differs from duty, or obligation in general, since that is the result of the divine command, while this is an obligation arising from the fact that we have “voluntarily” taken it upon ourselves. The extent of this obligation, therefore, is measured by the nature of the promise or vow which we have made; and God will hold us responsible for carrying out our vows. Such voluntary obligations or vows were allowable, as an expression of thanksgiving, or as a means of exciting to a more strict religious service, under the Mosaic dispensation (<sup><h1231></sup>Genesis 28:20; <sup><h412></sup>Numbers 6:2; 30:2,3; <sup><h521></sup>Deuteronomy 23:21; <sup><h111></sup>1 Samuel 1:11); and they cannot be wrong under any dispensation. They are not of the nature of “merit,” or works of supererogation, but they are

(a) a “means” of bringing the obligations of religion to bear upon us more decidedly, and

(b) a proper expression of gratitude.

Such vows are those which all persons take upon themselves when they make a profession of religion; and when such a profession of religion is made, it should be a constant reflection on our part, that “the vows of God are upon us,” or that we have voluntarily consecrated all that we have to God. David had made such a vow

(a) in his general purpose to lead a religious life;

(b) very probably in some specific act or promise that he would devote himself to God if he would deliver him, or as an expression of his gratitude for deliverance. Compare the notes at <sup><4183></sup>Acts 18:18; 21:23,24.

I will render praises unto thee literally, “I will recompense praises unto thee;” that is, I will “pay” what I have vowed, or I will faithfully perform my vows.

<sup><4963></sup>Psalm 56:13. For thou hast delivered my soul from death That is, my “life.” Thou hast kept “me” from death. He was surrounded by enemies. He was pursued by them from place to place. He had been, however, graciously delivered from these dangers, and had been kept alive. Now he gratefully remembers this mercy, and confidently appeals to God to interpose still further, and keep him from stumbling.

Wilt not thou deliver my feet from falling This might be rendered, “Hast thou not delivered;” thus carrying forward the thought just before expressed. So the Septuagint, the Vulgate, and Luther and DeWette render it. The Hebrew, however, will admit of the translation in our common version, and such a petition would be an appropriate close of the psalm. Thus understood, it would be the recognition of dependence on God; the expression of gratitude for his former mercies; the utterance of a desire to honor him always; the acknowledgment of the fact that God only could keep him; and the manifestation of a wish that he might be enabled to live and act as in His presence. The word here rendered “falling” means usually a “thrusting” or “casting down,” as by violence. The prayer is, that he might be kept amid the dangers of his way; or that God would uphold him so that he might still honor Him.

That I may walk before God As in his presence; enjoying his friendship and favor.

In the light of the living See the notes at <sup><4833></sup>Job 33:30. The grave is represented everywhere in the Scriptures as a region of darkness (see the notes at ~~1802~~ Job 10:21,22; compare ~~4965~~ Psalm 6:5; 30:9; ~~2381~~ Isaiah 38:11,18,19), and this world as light. The prayer, therefore, is, that he might continue to live, and that he might enjoy the favor of God: a prayer always proper for man, whatever his rank or condition.

APPENDIX NOTES ON PSALM 56

According to the inscription, composed when David was detained in Gath by the Philistines. But on neither occasion when he visited Gath does the history inform us of any such detention, 1 Samuel 21; 27; 29.

Hengstenberg, indeed, and Delitzsch suppose that some seizure or imprisonment is implied in the words he “feigned himself mad in their hands;” and the expression at the beginning of 1 Samuel 22, “David therefore departed thence, and escaped to the cave of Adullam,” may imply that he had been subjected to some confinement. Hupfeld concludes from the absence of anything in the history corresponding to the title of the psalm, that the title is not to be trusted. Yet it is perhaps more likely on this very account that it rests upon some ancient tradition. A modern compiler would have endeavored to make the title square better with the history. — Perowne.

Only from the poet himself could such a poetical superscription be expected; it was precisely David’s custom to prefix such emblematical superscriptions to his psalms; and every one of the very special words is found again in the Davidic psalms — the dove in Psalm 55, which, certainly not by accident, our psalm immediately follows — the superscription was to derive its explanation from it — the being dumb in Psalm 58, the far-dwelling in Psalm 65, the secret in Psalm 16 — The second part of the superscription is to be regarded as an explanation of the first part. The Philistines are the “far-dwelling;” David seized by them, “the dumb dove.” The history is given in 1 Samuel 21. David fled, as he no longer found security in his fatherland, to the Philistines. Alone there he waited for his new danger. He, the conqueror of Goliath, was conducted as a formidable enemy before the king, and only by an artifice delivered his life. — Hengstenberg.

~~4965~~ Psalm 56:4. In God I will praise his word We must understand by the word of God, all his promises, which had hitherto been given to the psalmist through the law (compare ~~4925~~ Psalm 119:25), through Samuel, through internal communications during his earlier history. This word of God, and God himself, who had therein promised to be his God, the psalmist extols as his firm shield, which is sufficient to protect him against the whole world. John Arnd: “As Saul and the potentates of this world boast of their hosts of war, their thousands of men, and their munition, I will glory in God’s word and promise, which are my warlike force, my fortress, and support; let them trust in their chariots and wagons, we shall think of the name of the Lord.” The psalmist calls man flesh by way of contempt, because where there is corporeity there is no real strength — compare <sup><2308></sup>Isaiah 31:3, “The Egyptians are men and not God, their horses are flesh and not spirit;” <sup><2306></sup>Isaiah 40:6, John Arnd: “He sets against each other the mighty God and impotent flesh, which is as grass and as the flower of the field.” — Hengstenberg.

<sup><2308></sup>Psalm 56:8. Put thou my tears into thy bottle In the Roman tombs are found small bottles (usually called lachrymatories) of glass or pottery, but most commonly glass, and of various forms, but generally with long narrow necks. These are commonly supposed to have contained tears shed by the surviving friends of the deceased, and to have been deposited in the sepulchres as memorials of affection and distress. We might very well suppose that the present text alludes to such a custom; and it would therefore imply that it existed very anciently in the East, and particularly among the Hebrews. It must not, however, be concealed that the use assigned to these phials is a modern conjecture, and that there is no trace of such a custom in ancient writings or sculptures; from where Shoefflin, Paciaudi, and others, were rather led to conclude that these phials were intended to contain the perfumes used in sprinkling the funeral pile. This is not the place to discuss such a question; but we may add that the representation of one or two eyes which is observed upon some of these vessels, is a circumstance in favor of the common opinion. Whatever be concluded on this point, we have little doubt that the psalmist does refer to some custom then existing of putting tears in small bottles, particularly as there are still some traces of such a usage in the East. Thus, in the annual lamentations of the Persians for the slaughtered sons of Ali, their tears are copiously excited by passionate discourses and tragical recitations. When at the height of their grief, a priest sometimes goes round to each person and collects the tears with a piece of cotton, from which he presses them into a bottle, preserving them with the greatest care. This seems a striking illustration of the present text, which takes its allusion from one person putting the tears of another into a bottle. The Persians believe that there is a special virtue in the tears shed on the occasion mentioned; so that persons at the point of death have revived when a drop has been administered to them. This is the reason why they are so carefully collected. — Pictorial Bible.

God will not be unmindful of our tears and sorrows. O no! He puts them in his bottle. He registers them in his book. Trials will bring tears. “But,” says Arnd, “here lies a powerful consolation, that God gathers up such tears, and puts them in his bottle, just as one would pour precious wine into a flagon, so precious and dear are such tears before God, and God lays them up as a treasure in the heavens; and if we think that all such tears are lost, lo! God hath preserved them for us a treasure in the heavens, with which we shall be richly consoled in that day,” ~~1COR5~~ Psalm 126:5. Calvin:

“We may surely believe that if God bestows such honor upon the tears of his saints, he must number every drop of their blood.

Tyrants may burn their flesh and their bones, but the blood remains to cry aloud for vengeance; and intervening ages can never erase what has been written in the register of God’s remembrance.” — Plumer.

NOTES ON PSALM 57

This is another psalm which purports to be a psalm of David. The propriety of ascribing it to him cannot be called in question. It is addressed to “the chief Musician” (see the notes to Introduction of Psalm 4). Though relating to an individual case, and to the particular trials of an individual, yet it had much in it that would be appropriate to the condition of others in similar circumstances, and it contained, moreover, such general sentiments on the subject of religion, that it would be useful to the people of God in all ages. The expression in the title, “Al-taschith,” rendered in the margin, “Destroy not,” and by the Septuagint, μη <sup><3361></sup> διαφθειρης <sup><1311></sup> (destroy not), and in the same manner in the Latin Vulgate, occurs also in the titles of the two following psalms, and of the seventy-fifth. It is regarded by some as a musical expression — and by others as the first words of some well-known poem or hymn, in order to show that this psalm was to be set to the music which was employed in using that poem; or, as we should say, that the “tune” appropriate to that was also appropriate to this, so that the words would at once suggest the tune, in the same manner as the Latin designations “De Profundis,” “Miserere,” “Non Nobis Domine,” “Te Deum,” etc., indicate well-known tunes as pieces of music — the tunes to which the hymns beginning with those words are always sung. The author of the Chaldee Paraphrase regards this psalm as belonging to that period of David’s history when he was under a constant necessity of using language of this nature, or of saying “Destroy not,” and as therefore suited to all similar emergencies. The language seems to be derived from the prayer of Moses, <sup><8926></sup>Deuteronomy 9:26;

“I prayed therefore unto the Lord, and said, O Lord God, destroy not thy people,” etc.

This very expression is found in <sup><8819></sup>1 Samuel 26:9, in a command which David addressed to his followers, and it “may” have been a common expression with him. On the meaning of the word “Michtam” in the title, see the notes at the Introduction to Psalm 16. It is found in the three following psalms — in the two former of them, in connection with the phrase “Al-taschith, showing that probably those psalms had reference to the same period of David’s life.

When he fled from Saul in the cave Possibly the cave of Adullam (<0271>1 Samuel 22:1), or that of En-gedi (<0241>1 Samuel 24:1-3). Or, the word may be used in a “general” sense as referring not to any “particular” cave, but to that period of his life when he was compelled to flee from one place to another for safety, and when his home was “often” in caves.

The psalm consists of the following parts:

I. An earnest prayer of the suffering and persecuted man, with a full expression of confidence that God would hear him, <0570> Psalm 57:1-3.

II. A description of his enemies, as people that resembled lions; people, whose souls were inflamed and infuriated; people, whose teeth were like spears and arrows, <0570> Psalm 57:4.

III. The expression of a desire that God might be exalted and honored, or that all these events might result in his honor and glory, <0570> Psalm 57:5.

IV. A further description of the purposes of his enemies, as people who had prepared a net to take him, or had dugged a pit into which he might fall, but which he felt assured was a pit into which they themselves would fall, <0570> Psalm 57:6.

V. A joyful and exulting expression of confidence in God; an assurance that he would interpose for him; a determination to praise and honor him; a desire that God might be exalted above the heaven, and that his glory might fill all the earth — forgetting his own particular troubles, and pouring out the desire of his heart that “God” might be honored whatever might occur to “him.”

<0570> Psalm 57:1. Be merciful unto me, O God The same beginning as the former psalm — a cry for mercy; an overwhelming sense of trouble and danger leading him to come at once to the throne of God for help. See the notes at <0561> Psalm 56:1.

For my soul trusteth in thee See the notes at <0563> Psalm 56:3. He had nowhere else to go; there was no one on whom he could rely but God.

Yea, in the shadow of thy wings will I make my refuge Under the protection or covering of his wings — as young birds seek protection under the wings of the parent bird. See the notes at <0178> Psalm 17:8. Compare <0367> Psalm 36:7.

Until these calamities be overpast Compare the notes at <sup><8413></sup>Job 14:13; <sup><4973></sup>Psalm 27:13; also at <sup><2351></sup>Isaiah 26:20. He believed that these calamities “would” pass away, or would cease; that a time would come when he would not thus be driven from place to place. At present he knew that he was in danger, and he desired the divine protection, for under “that” protection he would be safe.

<sup><8502></sup>Psalm 57:2. I will cry unto God most high The idea is — God is exalted above all creatures; all events are “under” him, and he can control them. The appeal was not to man, however exalted; not to an angel, however far he may be above man; it was an appeal made at once to the Supreme Being, the God to whom all worlds and all creatures are subject, and under whose protection, therefore, he must be safe.

Unto God that performeth all things for me The word used here, and rendered “performeth” — rmae<sup><1584></sup> — means properly to bring to an end; to complete; to perfect. The idea here is, that it is the character of God, that he “completes” or “perfects,” or brings to a happy issue all his plans. The psalmist had had experience of that in the past. God had done this in former trials; he felt assured that God would do it in this; and he, therefore, came to God with a confident belief that all would be safe in his hands.

<sup><8502></sup>Psalm 57:3. He shall send from heaven That is, from himself; or, he will interpose to save me. The psalmist does not say “how” he expected this interposition — whether by an angel, by a miracle, by tempest or storm, but he felt that help was to come from God alone, and he was sure that it would come.

And save me from the reproach ... This would be more correctly rendered, “He shall save me; he shall reproach him that would swallow me up.” So it is rendered in the margin. On the word rendered “would swallow me up,” see the notes at <sup><8501></sup>Psalm 56:1. The idea here is, that God would “reprove” or “reproach,” to wit, by overthrowing him that sought to devour or destroy him. God had interposed formerly in his behalf (<sup><8502></sup>Psalm 57:2), and he felt assured that he would do it again.

Selah This seems here to be a mere musical pause. It has no connection with the sense. See the notes at <sup><8492></sup>Psalm 3:2.

God shall send forth his mercy In saving me. He will “manifest” his mercy. And his truth His fidelity to his promise; his faithfulness to those who put their trust in him. He will show himself “true” to all the promises which he has made. Compare <sup><941></sup>Psalm 40:11.

<sup><574></sup>Psalm 57:4. My soul is among lions That is, among people who resemble lions; men, fierce, savage, ferocious.

And I lie even among them that are set on fire We have a term of similar import in common use now, when we say that one is “inflamed” with passion, referring to one who is infuriated and enraged. So we speak of “burning” with rage or wrath — an expression derived, perhaps, from the inflamed “appearance” of a man in anger. The idea here is not that he “would” lie down calmly among those persons, as Prof. Alexander suggests, but that he actually “did” thus lie down. When he laid himself down at night, when he sought repose in sleep, he was surrounded by such persons, and seemed to be sleeping in the midst of them.

Even the sons of men Yet they are not wild beasts, but “men” who seem to have the ferocious nature of wild beasts. The phrase, “sons of men,” is often used to denote men themselves.

Whose teeth are spears and arrows Spears and arrows in their hands are what the teeth of wild beasts are.

And their tongue a sharp sword The mention of the tongue here has reference, probably, to the abuse and slander to which he was exposed, and which was like a sharp sword that pierced even to the seat of life. See the notes at <sup><575></sup>Psalm 55:21.

<sup><575></sup>Psalm 57:5. Be thou exalted, O God, above the heavens Compare <sup><581></sup>Psalm 8:1. The language here is that of a man who in trouble lifts his thoughts to God; who feels that God reigns; who is assured in his own soul that all things are under his hand; and who is desirous that God should be magnified whatever may become of himself. His prime and leading wish is not for himself, for his own safety, for his own deliverance from danger; it is that “God” may be honored — that the name of God may be glorified — that God may be regarded as supreme over all things — that God may be exalted in the highest possible degree — an idea expressed in the prayer that he may be exalted “above the heavens.”

Let thy glory be above all the earth The honor of thy name; thy praise. Let it be regarded, and be in fact, “above” all that pertains to this lower world; let everything on earth, or that pertains to earth, be subordinate to thee, or be surrendered for thee. This was the comfort which David found in trouble. And this “is” the only true source of consolation. The welfare of the universe depends on God; and that God should be true, and just, and good, and worthy of confidence and love — that he should reign, — that his law should be obeyed — that his plans should be accomplished, — is of more importance to the universe than anything that merely pertains to us; than the success of any of our own plans; than our health, our prosperity, or our life.

Psalm 57:6. They have prepared a net for my steps A net for my goings; or, into which I may fall. See the notes at Psalm 9:15.

My soul is bowed down The Septuagint, the Vulgate, and Luther render this in the plural, and in the active form: “They have bowed down my soul;” that is, they have caused my soul to be bowed down. The Hebrew may be correctly rendered, “he pressed down my soul,” — referring to his enemies, and speaking of them in the singular number.

They have digged a pit before me ... See the notes at Psalm 7:15,16; 9:15; Job 5:13.

Psalm 57:7. My heart is fixed, O God Margin, as in Hebrew, “prepared.” Compare the notes at Psalm 51:10. The word “suited” or “prepared” accurately expresses the sense of the Hebrew, and it is so rendered in the Septuagint, (ἑτοιμῆ)<sup><2092></sup>; in the Vulgate, “paratum;” and by Luther, “bereit.” The word is used, however, in the sense of “standing erect,” Psalm 9:7; to “establish” or “strengthen,” Psalm 89:4; 10:17; and hence, to be erect; to be firm, steady, constant, fixed. This seems to be the meaning here, as it is expressed in our common version. His heart was firm and decided. He did not waver in his purpose, or lean now to one side and then to the other; he was not “swayed” or “moved” by the events that had occurred. He felt conscious of standing firm in the midst of all his troubles. He confided in God. He did not doubt his justice, his goodness, his mercy; and, even in his trials, he was ready to praise him, and was “resolved” to praise him. The repetition of the word “fixed” gives emphasis and intensity to the expression, and is designed to show in the strongest manner that his heart, his purpose, his confidence in God, did not waver in the slightest degree.

I will sing and give praise My heart shall confide in thee; my lips shall utter the language of praise. In all his troubles God was his refuge; in all, he found occasion for praise. So it should be the fixed and settled purpose of our hearts that we will at all times confide in God, and that in every situation in life we will render him praise.

Psalm 57:8. Awake up, my glory By the word “glory” here some understand the tongue; others understand the soul itself, as the glory of man. The “word” properly refers to that which is weighty, or important; then, anything valuable, splendid, magnificent. Here it seems to refer to all that David regarded as glorious and honorable in himself — his noblest powers of soul — all in him that “could” be employed in the praise of God. The occasion was one on which it was proper to call all his powers into exercise; all that was noble in him as a man. The words “awake up” are equivalent to “arouse;” a solemn appeal to put forth all the powers of the soul.

Awake, psaltery and harp In regard to these instruments, see the notes at Isaiah 5:12. The instrument denoted by the word “psaltery” — לבו — was a stringed instrument, usually with twelve strings, and played with the fingers. See the notes at Psalm 33:2. The “harp” or “lyre” — קנ — was also a stringed instrument, usually consisting of ten strings. Josephus says that it was struck or played with a key. From 1 Samuel 16:23; 18:10; 19:9, it appears, however, that it was sometimes played with the fingers.

I myself will awake early That is, I will awake early in the morning to praise God; I will arouse myself from slumber to do this; I will devote the first moments — the early morning — to his worship. These words do not imply that this was an evening psalm, and that he would awake on the morrow — the next day — to praise God; but they refer to what he intended should be his general habit — that he would devote the early morning (arousing himself for that purpose) to the praise of God. No time in the day is more appropriate for worship than the early morning; no object is more worthy to rouse us from our slumbers than a desire to praise God; in no way can the day be more appropriately begun than by prayer and praise; and nothing will conduce more to keep up the flame of piety — the life of religion in the soul — than the habit of devoting the early morning to the worship of God; to prayer; to meditation; to praise.

Psalm 57:9. I will praise thee, O Lord, among the people So great a deliverance as he here hoped for, would make it proper that he should celebrate the praise of God in the most public manner; that he should make his goodness known as far as possible among the nations. See the notes at ~~1918~~ Psalm 18:49.

~~1870~~ Psalm 57:10. For thy mercy is great unto the heavens ... See this explained in the notes at ~~1815~~ Psalm 36:5.

~~1871~~ Psalm 57:11. Be thou exalted, O God, above the heavens See the notes at ~~1875~~ Psalm 57:5. The sentiment here is repeated as being that on which the mind of the psalmist was intensely fixed; that which he most earnestly desired; that which was the crowning aim and desire of his life.

APPENDIX NOTES ON PSALM 57

Al-taschith. Few expressions in the Psalter have proved so perplexing as the words Al-taschith, that is, "Destroy not," which occur in the superscriptions of the three Davidic psalms, Psalm 57; 58; 59, and also in that of Psalm 75. The one main feature common to these four particular psalms is that they all imprecate or foretell divine destruction upon the wicked. The "destroy not" cannot therefore well be any part of a prayer to God to spare: it is more probably part of some maxim which David had laid down for himself to observe that he would not take the work of destruction into his own hands, but would await the divine vengeance that must in due time overtake his enemies. It is easily conceivable that some unrecorded incident in David's life may have originally suggested these words, which afterward continually recurred to his thoughts as a sort of motto for his behavior, and which, in the spirit of simple faith, we might almost say of playfulness, he perpetuated in the superscriptions of his psalms, as a testimony that his utterances of woe against his persecutors arose from no feelings of private malice or hatred. What, for example, if in one of the earlier interviews in which Jonathan warned David of his father's purpose to kill him, he should have used words similar to those he is related to have used in ~~1875~~ 1 Samuel 20:15, and should have said, "Destroy not thou, my father, even though thou believe that God will one day destroy him for thy sake?" What if the words, "destroy not," with some such import as this, should have been once employed as a watchword between Jonathan and David? These are of course merely imaginary instances of the numberless ways in which the words "destroy not," with a particular meaning and particular associations attached, might by some trivial circumstance be indelibly impressed upon David's mind. And it may be observed that these very words were repeated by David to Abishai, when on a subsequent occasion the latter wished to kill Saul, whom they had discovered by night unguarded and asleep in his camp in the wilderness of Ziph. — Thrupp.

Psalm 57 may be referred to as exemplifying a somewhat different aspect of the psalmist's exercise of soul during these years of peril and unrest. We still hear in it a cry for mercy and an appeal to the just judgment of God, but the thing that principally strikes a thoughtful reader is the unwavering confidence expressed in the divine faithfulness. David's faith, soaring above the clouds and tempest, bathes itself in the light of God's countenance. "I will praise thee among the peoples; I will sing psalms unto thee among the nations." These are remarkable words. They show that David from his early days was filled with the presentiment that he was inditing songs in which not Israel only, but the Gentiles, far and near, would one day praise the God of Abraham. How remarkably has the anticipation been fulfilled! David now "sings to God among the nations," in this very psalm which so many nations have already learned to use. — Binnie.

Psalm 57:8. I myself will awake early Strictly translated, this clause contains a bold but beautiful poetical conception, that of awakening the dawn instead of being awakened by it, in other words, preventing or anticipating it by early praises. In like manner Ovid says the crowing of the cock evocat auroram. We thus obtain the same sense in a far more striking form than is expressed by the inexact and prosaic version, I will awake early. The intransitive sense given to the verb and the adverbial sense given to the noun are both without sufficient authority in usage. From this verse some have inferred that the psalm was expressly designed to be an evening-song; but he does not say, I will do thus tomorrow. The meaning is rather that he will do it daily. The summons to the harp and lyre may be understood as implying that they have long slept without occasion for such praise as they are now to utter. — Alexander.

Psalm 57:9. I will praise thee, O Lord, among the people These intimations of mercy in store for the Gentiles do not lie quite on the surface of the early Scriptures; and it is likely that in every generation there would be many among the children of Israel who overlooked them, and, like the Pharisees, took occasion from the covenant with Abraham to despise the Gentiles, instead of learning from it to take an affectionate and prayerful interest in them, and to look forward in hope to a time when they should be enrolled among the fearers of the Lord. But we must not do the Old Testament church the injustice of supposing that all its members were so blind and carnal. Here, as in so many other particulars, the psalms enable us to vindicate the faith of the ancient saints. They show that the intimations we have pointed out were neither overlooked nor forgotten. The church's missionary work, it is true, did not begin under the former dispensation; nor indeed did it begin until the day of Pentecost, for even Christ himself was not sent save to the house of Israel. Until the full time came for the great Sacrifice to be offered up and the Comforter to be sent forth, there was no commission given to the church to go into all nations, preaching repentance and the remission of sins. The Hebrew church was neither called nor qualified to be a missionary society. But it never ceased to desire and hope for the conversion of the nations. This is seen in those passages in which the psalmists betray a consciousness that they shall one day have all the world for auditors. How boldly does David exclaim,

“I will praise thee, O Lord, among the peoples; I will sing unto thee among the nations,” <sup><457D></sup>Psalm 57:9.

In the same spirit a later psalmist summons the church to lift up her voice, so that all the nations may hear her recital of the Lord's mighty acts:

“O give thanks unto the LORD; call upon his name: make known his deeds among the peoples,” <sup><494C></sup>Psalm 105:1.

The full import of this class of texts is often hidden from the English reader by the circumstance that our translators have hardly ever used the word people in its plural form. Twice in the Revelation they venture to write peoples; everywhere else the singular form has to do duty for both numbers; so that in not a few passages the sense is greatly obscured to those who have no access either to the original or to other versions. In the Psalms, in particular, the mention of the Gentiles is more frequent than the English reader is made aware of. It is to be observed, moreover, that in addition to this strain of indirect prediction, the conversion of the world is articulately celebrated in many glorious psalms. Indeed, so numerous are these, and so generally distributed over the centuries between David and Ezra, that it would seem that at no time during the long history of inspired psalmody, did the Spirit cease to indite new songs in which the children of Zion might give utterance to their world-embracing hopes. — Binnie.

<sup><457I></sup>Psalm 57:11. Be thou exalted, O God The same word which he had used, <sup><457B></sup>Psalm 57:5, to sum up his prayers in, he here uses again (and no vain repetition) to sum up his praises in; “Lord, I desire to exalt thy name, and that all the creatures may exalt it; but what can the best of us do toward it? Lord, take the work into thine own hands; do it thyself, be thou exalted, O God. In the praises of the church triumphant, thou art exalted to the heavens, and in the praises of the church militant, thy glory is throughout all the earth; but thou art above all the blessing and praise of both, <sup><JOE></sup>Nehemiah 9:5, and therefore, Lord, exalt thyself above the heavens, and above all the earth: Father, glorify thine own name: thou hast glorified it, glorify it yet again.” — Henry.

NOTES ON PSALM 58

This psalm is also inscribed as a psalm of David. Both the title and the contents agree in fixing the time of its composition, and the occasion, as being the same as in the two previous psalms. Knapp indeed refers it to the time of Absalom, and DeWette supposes that it was composed in the time of the Babylonian captivity. But there is no reason for departing from the supposition that the title is correct. There is nothing in the psalm inconsistent with the supposition that it was composed by David, and in the time of the persecutions under Saul. On the meaning of the expression in the title, “To the chief Musician,” see the notes at the Introduction to Psalm 4. On the phrase “Al-taschith,” see Introduction to Psalm 57. On the word “Michtam,” see Introduction to Psalm 16.

The psalm consists of three parts:

I. A description of the enemies of the psalmist, suggesting a “general” description of the character of the wicked, ~~1801~~ Psalm 58:1-5. The psalmist, by an emphatic “question” impliedly affirms that those whom he referred to were wicked and false (~~1801~~ Psalm 58:1,2); and this leads him to a general reflection on the character of wicked people;

- (a) as estranged from the womb;
- (b) as going astray as soon as they are born;
- (c) as resembling the serpent injecting deadly poison; and
- (d) as deaf to all appeals of conscience, virtue, and religion — like an adder that will not listen to the voice of the charmer, ~~1801~~ Psalm 58:3-5.

II. A prayer that God would interpose and deal with them as they deserved, ~~1806~~ Psalm 58:6-9. This prayer is expressed in different illustrations: —

- (a) by comparing them with lions, and praying that their teeth might be broken out, ~~1806~~ Psalm 58:6;
- (b) by comparing them with water, and praying that they might disappear as waters flow off, ~~1807~~ Psalm 58:7;

(c) by comparing them with a snail, and praying that they might be dissolved, and pass away as a snail appears to do, ~~<BR>~~Psalm 58:8;

(d) by comparing them with the untimely birth of a woman, that is cast away, ~~<BR>~~Psalm 58:8;

(e) by comparing them with a pot which is made to feel the heat of thorns on fire, and made to boil quickly — praying that God would take them away before even that could be done, ~~<BR>~~Psalm 58:9.

III. The exultation of the righteous at such a result, ~~<BR>~~Psalm 58:10-11.

(a) They would rejoice at the deliverance, ~~<BR>~~Psalm 58:10;

(b) they would see that God is a righteous God; that he is not a friend of wickedness, but that he regards the cause of truth; that there is in fact a just moral government in the world; that there is a God who is a judge in the earth, ~~<BR>~~Psalm 58:11.

~~<BR>~~Psalm 58:1. Do ye indeed speak righteousness, O congregation?

Luther renders this, “Are you then dumb, that you will not speak what is right, and judge what is proper, ye children of men?” The meaning of the verse is exceedingly obscure; but probably the whole sense of the psalm turns on it. The word rendered “congregation,”  $\mu\lambda\ \text{a}\epsilon$ <sup>h482</sup> — occurs only in this place and in the title to Psalm 56, “Jonath-elem-rechokim.” See the notes at that title. The word properly means “dumbness, silence.” Gesenius (Lexicon) renders it here, “Do ye indeed decree dumb justice?” that is, “Do ye really at length decree justice, which so long has seemed dumb?” Professor Alexander renders it, “Are ye indeed dumb when ye should speak righteousness?” The allusion is clearly to some public act of judging; to a judicial sentence; to magistrates and rulers; to people who “should” give a righteous sentence; to those in authority who “ought” to pronounce a just opinion on the conduct of others. The “fact” in the case on which the appeal is made seems to have been that they did “not” do this; that their conduct was wicked and perverse; that no reliance could be placed on their judicial decisions. Rosenmuller renders it, “There is, in fact, silence of justice;” that is, justice is not declared or spoken. Perhaps the meaning of the phrase may be thus expressed: “Is there truly a dumbness or silence of justice when ye speak? do you judge righteously, O ye sons of men?” That is, “You indeed speak; you do declare an opinion; you pronounce a sentence; but justice is, in fact, dumb or silent when you do it. There is no correct or just judgment in the matter. The opinion which is declared is based on error, and has its origin in a wicked heart.” There is no expression in the original to correspond to the words “O congregation” in our translation, unless it is the word  $\mu\lambda\ \alpha\epsilon$ <sup><h482></sup>, which never has this signification. It is not so rendered in any of the versions. It is not easy to determine “who” is referred to by this question. It cannot be, as is implied in our common version, that it is to any “congregation,” any people gathered together for the purpose of pronouncing judgment. Yet it is evidently a reference to some persons, or classes of persons, who were expected to “judge,” or to whom it pertained to pass judgment; and the most natural supposition is that the reference is to the rulers of the nation — to Saul, and the heads of the government. If the supposition is correct that the psalm was composed, like Psalm 56; 57; 59, in the time of the Sauline persecutions, and that it belongs to the same “group” of psalms, then it would have reference to Saul and to those who were associated with him in persecuting David. The subject of the psalm would then be the unjust judgments which they passed on him in treating him as an enemy of the commonwealth; in regarding him as an outlaw, and in driving him from his places of refuge as if hunting him down like a wild beast. The contents of the psalm well accord with this explanation.

Do ye judge uprightly? Do you judge right things? are your judgments in accordance with truth and justice?

O ye sons of men Perhaps referring to the fact that in their judgments they showed that they were people — influenced by the common passions of people; in other words, they showed that they could not, in forming their judgments, rise above the corrupt passions and prejudices which usually influence and sway mankind.

~~<FRD>~~ Psalm 58:2. Yea, in heart ye work wickedness Whatever might be the outward appearances, whatever pretences they might make to just judgment, yet in fact their hearts were set on wickedness, and they were conscious of doing wrong.

Ye weigh the violence of your hands in the earth It is difficult to attach any meaning to this language; the translators evidently felt that they could not express the meaning of the original; and they, therefore, gave what seems to be a literal translation of the Hebrew. The Septuagint renders it, “In heart you work iniquity in the land; your hands weave together iniquity.”

The Latin Vulgate: “In heart you work iniquity; in the land your hands prepare injustice.” Luther: “Yea, willingly do you work iniquity in the land, and go straight through to work evil with your hands.” Professor Alexander: “In the land, the violence of your hands ye weigh.” Perhaps the true translation of the whole verse would be, “Yea, in heart ye work iniquity in the land; ye weigh (weigh out) the violence of your hands;” that is, the deeds of violence or wickedness which your hands commit. The idea of “weighing” them, or “weighing them out,” is derived from the administration of justice. In all lands people are accustomed to speak of “weighing out” justice; to symbolize its administration by scales and balances; and to express the doing of it as holding an even balance. Compare the notes at <sup><1830></sup>Job 31:6; <sup><1857></sup>Daniel 5:27; <sup><1815></sup>Revelation 6:5. Thus interpreted, this verse refers, as <sup><1881></sup>Psalms 58:1, to the act of pronouncing judgment; and the idea is that instead of pronouncing a just judgment — of holding an equal balance — they determined in favor of violence — of acts of oppression and wrong to be committed by their own hands. That which they weighed out, or dispensed, was not a just sentence, but violence, wrong, injustice, crime.

<sup><1881></sup>Psalm 58:3. The wicked are estranged from the womb The allusion here undoubtedly is to the persons principally referred to in the psalm — the enemies of David. But their conduct toward him suggests a more general reflection in regard to “all” the wicked as having the same characteristics. The psalmist, therefore, instead of confining his remarks to them, makes his observations general, on the principle that all wicked men have essentially the same character, and especially in respect to the thing here affirmed, that they go astray early; that they are apostate and alienated from God from their very birth. The words, “the wicked,” here do not necessarily refer to the whole human family (though what is thus affirmed is true of all the human race), but to people who in their lives develop a wicked character; and the affirmation in regard to them is that they go astray early in life — from their very infancy. Strictly speaking, therefore, it cannot be shown that the psalmist in this declaration had reference to the whole human race, or that he meant to make a universal declaration in regard to man as being early estranged or alienated from God; and the passage, therefore, cannot directly, and with exact propriety, be adduced to prove the doctrine that “original sin” pertains to all the race — whatever may be true on that point. If, however, it is demonstrated from “other” passages, and from facts, that all men “are” “wicked” or depraved, then the assertion here becomes a proof that this is from the womb — from their very birth — that they begin life with a propensity to evil — and that all their subsequent acts are but developments of the depravity or corruption with which they are born. It is only, therefore, after it is proved that people “are” depraved or “wicked,” that this passage can be cited in favor of the doctrine of original sin. The word rendered are “estranged” — rwz<sup><12114></sup> — means properly, “to go off, to turn aside,” or “away, to depart;” and then it comes to mean “to be strange,” or “a stranger.” The proper idea in the word is that one is a stranger, or a foreigner, and the word would be properly applied to one of another tribe or nation, like the Latin “hostis,” and the Greek ξενος . <sup><12113></sup>Exodus 30:33; <sup><21017></sup>Isaiah 1:7; 25:2; 29:5; <sup><19411></sup>Psalms 44:20. The meaning of the term as thus explained is, that, from earliest childhood, they are “as if” they belonged to another people than the people of God; they manifest another spirit; they are governed by other principles than those which pertain to the righteous. Compare <sup><4119></sup>Ephesians 2:19. Their first indications of character are not those of the children of God, but are “alien, strange, hostile” to him. The phrase “from the womb,” refers, undoubtedly, to their birth; and the idea is, that as soon as they begin to act they act wrong; they show that they are strangers to God. Strictly speaking, this passage does not affirm anything directly of what exists in the heart “before” people begin to act, for it is by their “speaking lies” that they show their estrangement; yet it is proper to “infer” that where this is universal, there “is” something lying back of this which makes it certain that they “will” act thus — just as when a tree always bears the same kind of fruit, we infer that there is something “in” the tree, back of the actual “bearing” of the fruit, which makes it certain that it “will” bear such fruit and no other. This “something” in the heart of a child is what is commonly meant by “original sin.”

They go astray The Hebrew word used here means to go astray, to wander, to err. It is used in reference to drunken persons who reel, <sup><23817></sup>Isaiah 28:7; and to the soul, as erring or wandering from the paths of truth and piety, <sup><26811></sup>Ezekiel 48:11; <sup><19510></sup>Psalms 95:10; 119:110; <sup><12116></sup>Proverbs 21:16. The “manner” in which the persons here referred to did this, is indicated here by their “speaking lies.”

As soon as they be born Margin, as in Hebrew, “from the belly.” The meaning is, not that they speak lies “as soon as” they are born, which could not be literally true, but that this is the “first act.” The first thing “done” is not an act of holiness, but an act of sin — showing what is in the heart.

Speaking lies They are false in their statements; false in their promises; false in their general character. This is one of the forms of sin, indicating original depravity; and it is undoubtedly selected here because this was particularly manifested by the enemies of David. They were false, perfidious, and could not be trusted. If it be proved, therefore, that all people are wicked, then “this” passage becomes a proper and an important text to demonstrate that this wickedness is not the result of temptation or example, but that it is the expression of the depravity of the heart by nature; that the tendency of man by nature is not to goodness, but to sin; that the first developments of character are sinful; that there is something lying of sinful acts in people which makes it certain that they will act as they do; and that this always manifests itself in the first acts which they perform.

~~4804~~ Psalm 58:4. Their poison Their malignity; their bad spirit; that which they utter or throw out of their mouth. The reference here is to what they speak or utter (~~4803~~ Psalm 58:3), and the idea is, that it is penetrating and deadly.

Like the poison of a serpent Margin, as in Hebrew, “according to the likeness.” In this expression no particular class of serpents is referred to except those which are “poisonous.”

Like the deaf adder Margin, “asp.” The word may refer either to the viper, the asp, or the adder. See the notes at ~~23108~~ Isaiah 11:8. The “particular” idea here is, that the serpent referred to was as it were “deaf;” it could not be tamed or charmed; it seemed to stop its own ears, so that there was no means of rendering it a safe thing to approach it. The supposition is that there “were” serpents which, though deadly in their poison, “might” be charmed or tamed, but that “this” species of serpent could “not.” The sense, as applied to the wicked, is, that there was no way of overcoming their evil propensities — of preventing them from giving utterance to words that were like poison, or from doing mischief to all with whom they came in contact. They were malignant, and there was no power of checking their malignity. Their poison was deadly, and there was no possibility of restraining them from doing evil.

That stoppeth her ear Which “seems” to stop her ear; which refuses to hear the words and incantations by which other serpents are subdued and tamed. Others, however, refer this to the man himself, meaning, “like the deaf adder he stops his ear;” that is, he voluntarily makes himself like the adder that does not hear, and that will not be tamed. The former interpretation, however, is to be preferred.

Psalm 58:5. Which will not hearken to the voice of charmers The word rendered “charmers” — vj bæ — means properly “whisperers, mutterers,” and it refers here to those who made use of spells or incantations — sorcerers or magicians. See the notes at Isaiah 8:19. These incantations were accompanied usually with a low, muttering sound, or with a gentle whisper, as if for the purpose of calming and controlling the object of the incantation. Such charmers of serpents (or pretended charmers) abounded among the ancients, and still abound in India. The art is carried in India to great perfection; and there are multitudes of persons who obtain a livelihood by this pretended or real power over venomous serpents. Their living is obtained either by “exhibiting” their power over serpents which they carry with them in their peregrinations, or by “drawing” them by their incantations from the walls of gardens, houses, and hedges, where they had taken up their abode. Multitudes of facts, referred to by those who have resided in India, seem to confirm the opinion that this power is real.

Charming never so wisely Margin, “Be the charmer never so cunning.” The word rendered here “charming” — rbje — means properly to bind; to bind together. The “literal” meaning of the original Hebrew is, “binding spells that are wise,” or, that are “cunning;” in other words, making use of the most cunning or skillful of their incantations and charms. The meaning is, that the utmost skill of enchantment will be unsuccessful. They are beyond the reach of any such arts. So with the people referred to by David. They were malignant and venomous; and nothing would disarm them of their malignity, and destroy their venom. What is here affirmed of these men is true in a certain sense of all people. The depravity of the human heart is such that nothing that man can employ will subdue it. No eloquence, no persuasion, no commands, no remonstrances, no influence that man can exert, will subdue it. It cannot be charmed down; it cannot be removed by any skill or power of man, however great. The following remarks from Dr. Thomson, who has spent twenty years in Palestine (land and the Book, vol. i. pp. 221-223), will illustrate this passage: "I have seen many serpent-charmers who do really exercise some extraordinary power over these reptiles. They carry enormous snakes, generally black, about them, allow them to crawl all over their persons and into their bosoms; always, however, with certain precautions, either necessary, or pretended to be so. They repeatedly breathe strongly into the face of the serpent, and occasionally blow spittle, or some medicated composition upon them. It is needless to describe the mountebank tricks which they perform. That which I am least able to account for is the power of detecting the presence of serpents in a house, and of enticing or 'charming' them out of it. The thing is far too common to be made a matter of scepticism. The following account, by Mr. Lane, is a fair statement of this matter: 'The charmer professes to discover, without ocular perception (but perhaps he does so by a unique smell), whether there be any serpents in the house, and if there be, to attract them to him, as the fowler, by the fascination of his voice, allures the bird into his net. As the serpent seeks the darkest place in which to hide himself, the charmer has, in most cases, to exercise his skill in an obscure chamber, where he might easily take a serpent from his bosom, bring it to the people without the door, and affirm that he had found it in the apartment, for no one would venture to enter with him, after having been assured of the presence of one of these reptiles within. But he is often required to perform in the full light of day, surrounded by spectators; and incredulous persons have searched him beforehand, and even stripped him naked, yet his success has been complete. He assumes an air of mystery, strikes the walls with a short palm-stick, whistles, makes a clucking noise with his tongue, and spits upon the ground, and generally says — I adjure you, by God, if ye be above or if ye be below, that ye come forth; I adjure you by the most great name, if ye be obedient, come forth, and if ye be disobedient, die! die! die!' The serpent is generally dislodged by his stick from a fissure in the wall or from the ceiling of the room. I have heard it asserted that a serpent-charmer, before he enters a house in which he is to try his skill, always employs a servant of that house to introduce one or more serpents; but I have known instances in which this could not be the case, and am inclined to believe that the dervishes above mentioned are generally acquainted with some physical means of discovering the presence of serpents without seeing them, and of attracting them from their lurking-places. What these ‘physical means’ may be is yet a secret, as also the ‘means’ by which persons can handle live scorpions, and can put them into their bosom without fear or injury. I have seen this done again and again, even by small boys. This has always excited my curiosity and astonishment, for scorpions are the most malignant and irascible of all insects. The Hindoos, and after them the Egyptians, are the most famous snake-charmers, scorpion-eaters, etc., etc., although gipsies, Arabs, and others are occasionally found, who gain a vagabond livelihood by strolling round the country, and confounding the ignorant with these feats.”

Psalm 58:6. Break their teeth, O God, in their mouth The word here rendered “break” means properly “to tear out.” The allusion is to his enemies, represented as wild beasts; and the prayer is, that God would deprive them of the means of doing harm — as wild animals are rendered harmless when their teeth are broken out.

Psalm 58:7. Let them melt away as waters which run continually Let them vanish or disappear as waters that flow off, or floods that run by, and are no more seen. “Perhaps” the allusion here may be to the waters of a torrent that is swollen, which flow off and are lost in the sand, so that they wholly disappear. See the notes at <sup><BR15></sup>Job 6:15-19. The prayer is, that his enemies might perish or be cut off, and that he might thus be saved from them.

When he bendeth his bow to shoot his arrows literally, “he treads on his arrows.” See the notes at <sup><BR12></sup>Psalm 11:2. The meaning here is, When he prepares for an attack — or, prepares to make war, as one does who bends his bow, and places his arrow on the string. The allusion here is to the enemies of David, as seeking his life.

Let them be as cut in pieces That is, Let his arrows be as if they were cut off or “blunted,” so that they will produce no effect. Let them be such, that they will not penetrate and wound.

Psalm 58:8. As a snail which melteth, let every one of them pass away Or rather, As the snail which melteth as it goes; that is, which leaves a slimy trail as it moves along, and thus melts away the more as it advances, until at length it dies. Gesenius, Lexicon. The allusion is to what seems to occur to the snail; it seems to melt or to be dissolved as it moves along; or seems to leave a part of itself in the slime which flows from it.

Like the untimely birth of a woman The Hebrew word means literally “that which falls from a woman;” and hence, the word is used to denote an abortion. The prayer is, that they might utterly pass away; that they might become like those who never had real life; that their power might wholly disappear.

That they may not see the sun May not be among the living. Compare the notes at <sup><1816></sup>Job 3:16.

Psalm 58:9. Before your pots can feel the thorns The word “thorns” here — <sup><1819></sup>dfa,<sup><h329></sup> — refers to what is called “Christ’s thorn,” the southern buckthorn. “Gesenius.” The fire made of such thorns when dry would be quick and rapid, and water would be soon heated by it. The idea is, that what is here referred to would occur “quickly” — sooner than the most rapid and intense fire could make an impression on a kettle and its contents. The destruction of the wicked would be, as it were, instantaneous. The following quotation from Prof. Hackitt (Illustrations of Scripture, p. 135) will explain this passage: “A species of thorn, now very common near Jerusalem, bears the name of Spina Christi, or Christ’s thorn. The people of the country gather these bushes and plants, and use them as fuel. As it is now, so it was of old.

The figure in this case is taken from travelers in the desert, or from shepherds tenting abroad, who build a fire in the open air, where it is exposed to the wind; a sudden gust arises and sweeps away the fuel almost before it has begun to burn. ‘As thorns cut up shall they be burned in the fire’ (<sup><23312></sup>Isaiah 33:12). The meaning is that the wicked are worthless — their destruction shall be sudden and complete.”

He shall take them away The word rendered “shall take them away” means properly “to shiver, to shudder;” and it is then applied to the commotion and raging of a tempest. They shall be taken away as in a storm that makes everything shiver or tremble; <sup><1872></sup>Job 27:21. It would be done “suddenly” and “entirely.” A sudden storm sent by God would beat upon them, and they would be swept away in an instant.

Both living and in his wrath Margin, “as living as wrath.” This expression is exceedingly obscure. The Septuagint renders it, “he shall devour them as it were living — as it were in wrath.” The Latin Vulgate: “He shall devour them as living, so in wrath.” Prof. Alexander: “Whether raw or done.” He supposes that the idea is, that God would come upon them while forming their plans; and that the illustration is derived from the act of “cooking,” and that the meaning is, that God would come upon them whether those plans were matured or not — “cooked” or “raw.” This seems to me to be a very forced construction, and one which it is doubtful whether the Hebrew will bear. The word rendered “living” — yj <sup><12416></sup> — means properly “alive, living;” and then, “lively, fresh, vigorous;” and is applicable then to a plant that is living or green. It “may” be here applied to the “thorns” that had been gathered for the fire, still green or alive; and the idea “here” would be, that even while those thorns were alive and green — before they had been kindled by the fire (or while they were trying to kindle them), a sudden tempest would come and sweep them all away. It is not, indeed, an uncommon occurrence in the deserts of the East, that while, in their journeyings, travelers pause to cook their food, and have gathered the fuel — thorns, or whatever may be at hand — and have placed their pot over the fire, a sudden tempest comes from the desert, and sweeps everything away. Rosenmuller “in loc.” Such an occurrence “may” be referred to here. The word rendered “wrath” — wōj ; <sup><12740></sup> — means properly “burning;” and then it is used to denote anything burning. It is applied to wrath or anger, because it seems to “burn.” <sup><12704></sup>Numbers 25:4; 32:14; <sup><12818></sup>1 Samuel 28:18. Here, however, it “may” be taken literally as applicable to thorns when they begin to be kindled, though still green. They are seen first as gathered and placed under the pots; then they are seen as still green — not dried up by the kindling flame; then they are seen as on fire; and, in a moment — before the pots could be affected by them — all is swept away by a sudden gust of wind. The “idea” is that of the sudden and unexpected descent of God on the wicked, frustrating their schemes even when they seemed to be well formed, and to promise complete success. This does not mean, therefore, that God would cut off and punish the wicked while “living,” but it refers to the fact that their schemes would be suddenly defeated even while they supposed that all things were going on well; defeated before there was, in fact, any progress made toward the accomplishment, as the arrangements for the evening-meal would all be swept away before even the pot had begun to be warm.

<sup><1880></sup>Psalm 58:10. The righteous shall rejoice when he seeth the vengeance When he sees the just punishment inflicted on the wicked. He will approve of it; he will see that it is right; he will be glad that law is maintained, and that wickedness does not triumph; he will rejoice in the safety of those who do right, and in their deliverance from the assaults and the designs of the wicked. People everywhere approve of the just administration of law, even though it consigns the transgressors to prison or to death; and it is a matter of gratification to all who love law and order when a righteous government is maintained; when wickedness is checked; when justice is administered in a community. This is the end of government and of law; this is what all magistrates are appointed to secure; this is what all good citizens are aiming to accomplish. There is no evidence that the psalmist had any vindictive or revengeful feeling when he uttered the sentiment in this verse. See the notes at <sup><18316></sup>Psalm 52:6. Compare <sup><18574></sup>Psalm 37:34; 40:3.

He shall wash his feet in the blood of the wicked Compare <sup><18623></sup>Psalm 68:23. The image here is taken from a battlefield, where the victor treads in the blood of the slain. It is strong language denoting the entire overthrow of the wicked. There can be no doubt, however, that the allusion is to the “feelings” of satisfaction and triumph with which a victor walks over such a field; the exultation which he has that his foes are subdued, and that he has triumphed. The “idea” is that the righteous will have emotions, when the wicked are subdued and punished, which in some respects “resemble” the feelings of the victor who walks over a field covered with the blood of the slain. Still it is not “necessary” to suppose that these are, in either case, vindictive feelings; or that either the victor or the righteous have pleasure in the shedding of blood, or in the sufferings of others; or that they would not have preferred that the discomfited and slain should “not” have been wicked, and should “not” have been made to suffer in this manner. All that is “essentially” implied in this is, that there is a feeling of satisfaction and approval when law is vindicated, and when the triumph of wickedness is prevented. It would be difficult to show that the feelings expressed by the psalmist are “less” proper than those which an officer of justice “may” have, and “ought” to have, and “does” have, when he has faithfully discharged his duty, and has secured the arrest and punishment of the violators of law; or that the psalmist has expressed anything more than every man must feel who sees “just” punishment inflicted on the guilty. Assuredly it is a matter of rejoicing that wickedness does “not” triumph; it is a thing to exult in when it “is” arrested.

Psalm 58:11. So that a man shall say That is, every man shall say, or people everywhere shall see this. This expresses the result of a close observation of the divine dealings among people. The conclusion from those dealings is,

(a) that there is, on the whole, a reward for the righteous on earth, or that righteousness tends to secure the favor of God and to promote human happiness; and

(b) that there is a God — a just Being presiding over human affairs.

A reward for the righteous Margin, as in Hebrew, “fruit for the righteous.” That is, righteousness will produce its appropriate “fruits,” as trees that are cultivated will reward the cultivator. The idea is, that there is a course of things on earth, even with all there is that is mixed and mysterious, which is favorable to virtue; which shows that there is an “advantage” in being righteous; which demonstrates that there is a moral government; which makes it certain that God is the friend of virtue and the enemy of vice; that he is the friend of holiness and an enemy of sin. Compare the notes at <sup>508</sup>1 Timothy 4:8.

Verily he is a God that judgeth in the earth Or, Truly there is a God that judges in the earth. In other words, the course of things demonstrates that the affairs of the world are not left to chance, to fate, or to mere physical laws. There are results of human conduct which show that there is a “Mind” that presides over all; that there is One who has a purpose and plan of his own; that there is One who “administers” government, rewarding the good, and punishing the wicked. The argument is, that there is a course of things which cannot be explained on the supposition that the affairs of earth are left to chance; that they are controlled by fate; that they are regulated by mere physical laws; that they take care of themselves. There is a clear proof of divine interposition in those affairs, and a clear proof that, on the whole, and in the final result, that interposition is favorable to righteousness and opposed to sin. No man, in other words, can take the “facts” which occur on the earth, and explain them satisfactorily, except on the supposition that there is a God. All other explanations fail; and numerous as it must be admitted are the difficulties that meet us even on this supposition, yet all other suppositions utterly fail in giving any intelligible account of what occurs in our world. See this argument stated in a manner which cannot be confuted, in Bishop Butler’s Analogy, part i. chap. iii.

APPENDIX NOTES ON PSALM 58

Psalm 58:3. The wicked are estranged from the womb What makes human corruption so dreadful is the fact of its growing out of original sin, and consequently it has its root in the inmost depths of the heart. Those with whom nature is allowed free scope to develop itself as it will, and who shut out grace from access to their heart, must attain to a ripeness in sinning which would be incredible if nature were originally and still predominantly good. The opposition is not between those who have been corrupt from their mother’s womb, and who are not so now, but between those in whom the corruption common to all has uninterruptedly developed itself, and those in whom the development has been hemmed in and broken through. That the inborn depravity is quite a general one, extending over the whole family of man, appears from Genesis 8:21, the confession of David himself in Psalm 51:6, and Job 14:4. Arnd:

“The godless are wayward from their mother’s womb, from their childhood upward there is nothing good in them; the godly, although they also are conceived and born in sin, yet live in the new birth, in daily repentance.” — Hengstenberg.

Psalm 58:4. They are like the deaf adder that stoppeth her ear What the ineffectual charms are in reference to the excessively poisonous serpent, that are with the venomous and wicked man the prayers and entreaties of those who suffer injury from him and his friends, as an example of which we have only to think of David’s representations to Saul, and Jonathan’s intercessions, both so persuasive, that their fruitlessness presents to our view the wickedness of Saul, which is a reflection of man’s generally, as a deep abyss. Not only, however, does the resemblance hold in regard to such prayers and entreaties, but also to the admonitions of the servants of God, and last of all, to the reproofs and warnings which God himself brings to bear on people through their conscience. How powerfully these resounded in the dark soul of Saul, may be seen in the conviction often uttered by him, that David, upheld by God, would escape his persecutions and gain the day. But although his conscience called to him aloud that his striving was wrong and to no purpose, the strength of wickedness in him was so great, that he could not desist from it. The subject in  $\mu f \text{æ}^{\langle h331 \rangle}$  is not the adder (commonly, “which stops its ear”), but the wicked. The stopping requires hands, and what is already deaf by nature has no need to stop. It is just by means of stopping that the wicked make themselves like the deaf adder. Arnd:

“As we see in the history of the holy martyr Stephen. When he made his confession before the ecclesiastical council at Jerusalem, and said, ‘Lo, I see the heavens opened, and the Son of man standing on the right hand of God,’ to the Jewish prelates that was so insufferable a testimony, that in order to retain their poison, they stopped their ears, and cried aloud.” — Hengstenberg.

NOTES ON PSALM 59

The general title to this psalm is the same as in the two preceding psalms. That it was written by David, as is affirmed in the title, there is every reason to believe. The “occasion” on which it is said to have been composed was “when Saul sent, and they watched the house to kill him.” This incident is related in <sup><091></sup>1 Samuel 19:11: “Saul also sent messengers unto David’s house to watch him, and to slay him in the morning.” There is nothing in the psalm inconsistent with this statement in regard to the time and the occasion of its composition, unless it is in the word “heathen” — <sup>sh1471></sup>ywg — twice used (<sup><091></sup>Psalm 59:5,8) — a term, which (DeWette maintains) belongs properly to people of a foreign nation, and a foreign religion. It is true, however, that while the word originally had this meaning, it came to be used to denote any people or persons who had the general character and spirit which was supposed to distinguish nations without the knowledge of the true God; those who were cruel, harsh, unfeeling, oppressive, savage. <sup><091></sup>Psalm 2:1,8; 9:5,15,19,20; 10:16; 79:6,10; 106:47, et al. In this sense it might be used here, without impropriety, as applicable to the enemies of David.

At what precise “time” the psalm was composed, it is, of course, impossible now to ascertain. All that is determined by the title is that it was on that occasion, or with reference to that event; but whether it was at the very time when those enemies were known to be watching the house, or whether it was in view of that scene as recollected afterward, recalling the feelings which then passed through his mind, cannot now be determined with certainty. That David was aware that his enemies were thus watching him is apparent from <sup><091></sup>1 Samuel 19:11; that such thoughts as are recorded in the psalm passed through his mind in that time of danger is not improbable, but it can hardly be supposed that such an occasion would allow of the leisure necessary to express them in the form in which we now have them in the psalm. The probability, therefore, seems to be, that the psalm is a subsequent composition, recording the thoughts which then actually passed through his mind.

The psalm has no very regular order. The mind passes from one thing to another — now uttering fervent prayer; now describing the enemy — his character and plans; and now expressing the confident hope of deliverance, and the purpose to praise God. Indeed the very structure of the psalm seems to me to furnish evidence that it describes feelings which “would” pass through the mind on such an occasion. Thus we have in <sup><1890></sup>Psalm 59:1,2,5,11-15, “prayer” for deliverance; in <sup><1893></sup>Psalm 59:3,4,6,12, intermingled with these prayers, a description of the character and designs of these enemies; and in <sup><1898></sup>Psalm 59:8,9,16,17, an expression of confident hope — a purpose to praise God, for deliverance and mercy. All this is indicative of such feelings as “might,” and probably “would,” pass through the mind in such a time of peril as that referred to in the title.

On the different phrases in the title, see Introduction to Psalms 4; 47; 16.

<sup><1890></sup>Psalm 59:1. Deliver me from mine enemies, O my God See the notes at <sup><1898></sup>Psalm 18:48. This prayer was offered when the spies sent by Saul surrounded the house of David. They had come to apprehend him, and it is to be presumed that they had come in sufficient numbers, and with sufficient power, to effect their object. Their purpose was not to break in upon him in the night, but to watch their opportunity, when he went forth in the morning, to slay him (<sup><1891></sup>1 Samuel 19:11), and there seemed no way for him to escape. Of their coming, and of their design, Michal, the daughter of Saul, and the wife of David, seems to have been apprised — perhaps by someone of her father’s family. She informed David of the arrangement, and assured him that unless he should escape in the night, he would be put to death in the morning. She, therefore, let him down through a window, and he escaped, <sup><1892></sup>1 Samuel 19:12. It was in this way that he was in fact delivered; in this way that his prayer was answered. A faithful wife saved him.

Defend me from them that rise up against me Margin, as in Hebrew, “Set me on high.” The idea is that of placing him, as it were, on a tower, or on an eminence which would be inaccessible. These were common places of refuge or defense. See the notes at <sup><1892></sup>Psalm 18:2.

<sup><1891></sup>Psalm 59:2. Deliver me from the workers of iniquity The workers of iniquity here referred to were Saul and those whom he employed to carry out his murderous purpose — the people that had been sent to slay him.

And save me from bloody men Hebrew, “Men of bloods;” that is, men whose trade is blood; who seek to shed my blood, or who seek my life. See the notes at <sup><1895></sup>Psalm 5:6; 26:9; 55:23.

Psalm 59:3. For, lo, they lie in wait for my soul They lie in wait as wild beasts do for their prey, ready to spring upon it. The word used here is often employed to denote the act of lying in ambush; of watching in secret places to spring upon a victim: <sup>4002</sup>Judges 9:32; 21:20; <sup>4909</sup>Psalm 10:9. The word “soul” here means “life.” They lie in ambush that they may kill me.

The mighty are gathered against me Strong men; hostile men; cruel men. Saul would employ on this occasion not the weak, the cowardly, the faint-hearted, but men of courage and strength; men who were unscrupulous in their character; men who would not be likely to be moved by entreaty, or turned from their purpose by compassion. It is not mere “strength” that is here referred to, but that kind of strength or courage which can be employed in a desperate enterprise, and which is suited to accomplish any scheme of wickedness, however daring or difficult.

Not for my transgression, nor for my sin This is done not on account of my violating the laws of the land, nor because it is alleged that I am a sinner against God. David was conscious that he did not deserve this treatment from the hand of man. He had been guilty of no wrong against Saul that exposed him to just punishment. He carried with him the consciousness of innocence as to any crime that could have made this treatment proper; and he felt that it was all the result of unjust suspicions. It was not improper for him to refer to this in his prayer; for, however he might feel that he was a sinner in the sight of God, yet he felt that a great and grievous wrong was done him by man; and he prayed, therefore, that a righteous God would interpose. See the notes at <sup>4008</sup>Psalm 7:8; 17:2; 35:24; 43:1.

Psalm 59:4. They run and prepare themselves That is, they “hasten” to accomplish this; they are quick to obey the command of Saul requiring them to slay me. The word “prepare” refers to whatever was deemed necessary to enable them to accomplish what they had been commanded to do — arming themselves, making provision for their journey, etc.

Without my fault That is, without anything on my part to deserve this, or to justify Saul and those employed by him in what they attempt to do. David, in all this, was conscious of innocence. In his own feelings toward Saul, and in all his public acts, he knew that he had sought only the king’s welfare, and that he had been obedient to the laws.

Awake to help me That is, “arouse,” as one does from sleep. See the notes at <sup><4916></sup>Psalm 7:6. Compare <sup><4923></sup>Psalm 35:23. The word rendered “to help me,” is rendered in the margin, “to meet me.” This is the meaning of the Hebrew. It is a prayer that God would meet him, or come to him, and aid him.

<sup><4916></sup>Psalm 59:5. Thou therefore, O LORD God of hosts God of armies: commanding all the armies of heaven — the angels, and the stars and constellations drawn out in the form of armies; thou, thus endowed with all power, and able to subdue all people though arrayed and combined for purposes of evil — awake to my help. On the meaning of the phrase “God of hosts,” see the notes at <sup><2009></sup>Isaiah 1:9.

The God of Israel The God of the Hebrew people — the descendants of Jacob or Israel — the Protector of thy people — awake to help me, one of those who, being of that covenant people, come under the promise of protection.

Awake to visit all the heathen On the word here rendered “heathen” — <sup>ywG</sup><sup>h1471</sup> — see the notes at <sup><4916></sup>Psalm 2:1. It is from the use of this word in this verse and in <sup><4918></sup>Psalm 59:8, as remarked in the Introduction to the psalm, that DeWette infers that the psalm could not have been composed on the occasion referred to in the title, and argues, that this term could not be applied by David to Saul and his followers. This objection, however, will lose its force if the word is understood as denoting people who had the usual character of pagans, who were fierce, bloody, savage, cruel. In this sense the word might be employed with reference to those who were engaged in seeking the life of David. David, using the common word “heathen” or “nations,” as denoting those who are wicked, cruel, harsh, prays that God would awake to visit them; that is, to visit them for purposes of punishment, or so to visit them as to prevent their carrying out their designs.

Be not merciful to any tricked transgressors That is, Arrest and punish them “as” transgressors, or “being” transgressors. This prayer is not inconsistent with a desire that such people might be converted, and “thus” obtain mercy; but it is a prayer that God would not suffer them, being wicked people, to go at large and accomplish the work of wickedness which they designed. See General Introduction Section 6. (5) (e).

Psalm 59:6. They return at evening Many have rendered this in the imperative, as in <sup><18914></sup>Psalm 59:14, “Let them return at evening,” etc. So Luther renders it, and so also DeWette. But the more natural and obvious interpretation is to render it in the indicative, as describing the manner in which his enemies came upon him — like dogs seeking their prey; fierce mastiffs, howling and ready to spring upon him. From the phrase “they return at evening,” thus explained, it would seem probable that they watched their opportunity, or lay in wait, to secure their object; that having failed at first, they drew off again until evening, perhaps continuing thus for several days unable to accomplish their object.

They make a noise like a dog So savages, after lurking stealthily all day, raise the war-whoop at night, and come upon their victims. It is possible that an assault of this kind “had” been attempted; or, more probably, it is a description of the manner in which they “would” make their assault, and of the spirit with which it would be done.

And go round about the city The word “city” is used in a large sense in the Scriptures, and is often applied to places that we should now describe as “villages.” Any town within the limits of which David was lodged, would answer to this term.

Psalm 59:7. Behold, they belch out with their mouth The word rendered “belch out” means properly to boil forth; to gush out, to flow; and then, to pour forth copiously, or in a running stream, as a fountain does. Hence, the word means also to pour out “words” — words that flow freely — words of folly, abuse, or reproach. <sup><2182></sup>Proverbs 15:2, “The mouth of fools poureth out (Margin, belcheth or babbleth) foolishness.”

For who, say they, doth hear? That is, no one hears who will be able to punish us. They dread no man; and they have no fear of God. Compare the notes at <sup><19011></sup>Psalm 10:11. The words “say they” are, however, supplied here by the translators, and are not in the original; and the language “may” be understood as that of David himself, “as if” no one heard; that is, It is no wonder that they thus pour out words of reproach, for who “is” there to hear and to punish them? The former interpretation, however, is to be preferred. The language expresses the feelings of the enemies of David, who indulged freely in language of abuse and reproach “as if” there were none to hear.

Psalm 59:8. But thou, O LORD, shalt laugh at them That is, God will hear them, and will have all their efforts in derision, or will treat them with contempt. See the notes at <sup><4918></sup>Psalm 2:4; 37:13.

Thou shalt have all the heathen in derision All those referred to in this psalm — the enemies of David — who have the character, and who manifest the spirit of the pagan; that is, of those who are not actuated by true religion. See the notes at <sup><4915></sup>Psalm 59:5. This verse expresses the strong conviction of David, that all the efforts of his enemies would be vain; that God “would be” his Protector; and that he would save him from their evil designs.

Psalm 59:9. Because of his strength will I wait upon thee literally, “His strength — I will wait upon thee.” The reference here is not to the strength or power of God, as if the fact that “He” was powerful was a reason why the psalmist should look to him — but it is to the strength or power of the enemy — of Saul and his followers. There is much abruptness in the expression. The psalmist looks at the power of his enemy. “‘His strength,’ he cries. It is great. It is beyond my power to resist it. It is so great that I have no other refuge but God; and because it is so great, I will fix my eyes on him alone.” The word rendered “wait upon” means rather to look to; to observe; to fix the eyes upon.

For God is my defense Margin, “My high place.” That is, God was to him “as” a high place, or a place of refuge; a place where he would be safe. See the notes at <sup><4912></sup>Psalm 18:2.

Psalm 59:10. The God of my mercy shall prevent me Or rather, “My God — his mercy shall prevent me.” This is in accordance with the present reading of the Hebrew text, and is probably correct. The psalmist looks to God as his God, and then the feeling at once springs up that his mercy — favor — his loving-kindness — “would” “prevent” him. On the word “prevent” see the notes at <sup><4913></sup>Psalm 21:3; compare <sup><4973></sup>Psalm 17:13; 18:5. The meaning here is, that God would “go before him,” or would “anticipate” his necessities.

God shall let me see my desire upon mine enemies That is, He will let me see them discomfited, and disappointed in their plans. This is equivalent to saying that God would give him the victory, or would not suffer them to triumph over him. See the notes at <sup><1547></sup>Psalm 54:7.

<sup><1541></sup>Psalm 59:11. Slay them not, lest my people forget The meaning of this seems to be, Do not destroy them at once, lest, being removed out of the way, the people should forget what was done, or should lose the impression which it is desirable should be produced by their punishment. Let them live, and let them wander about, as exiles under the divine displeasure, that they may be permanent and enduring proofs of the justice of God; of the evil of sin; of the danger of violating the divine law. So Cain wandered on the earth (<sup><0042></sup>Genesis 4:12-14), a living proof of that justice which avenges murder; and so the Jews still wander, a lasting illustration of the justice which followed their rejection of the Messiah. The prayer of the psalmist, therefore, is that the fullest expression might be given to the divine sense of the wrong which his enemies had done, that the salutary lesson might not be soon forgotten, but might be permanent and enduring.

Scatter them by thy power Break up their combinations, and let them go abroad as separate wanderers, proclaiming everywhere, by being thus vagabonds on the earth, the justice of God.

And bring them down Humble them. Show them their weakness. Show them that they have not power to contend against God.

O Lord our shield See the notes at <sup><1512></sup>Psalm 5:12; 33:20. The words “our” here, and “my” in the former part of the verse, are designed to show that the author of the psalm regarded God as “his” God, and the people of the land as “his,” in the sense that he was identified with them, and felt that his cause was really that of the people.

Let them even be taken in their pride In the very midst of their schemes, or while confidently relying on the success of their plans. Even while their hearts are elated, and they are sure of success, let them be arrested, and let their plans be foiled.

And for cursing and lying which they speak That is, on account of the false charges which they have brought against me, and of their bitter imprecations on me. The allusion is to the accusations brought against David, and which were believed by Saul, and which were the foundation of the efforts made by Saul to take his life.

Psalm 59:13. Consume them in wrath Or, in thy justice. The idea in the word “consume” here is to finish; to complete; to bring to an end. It does not mean to “burn” them as our word might seem to imply, nor is there any reference to the “mode” or “manner” in which their power was to be brought to an end. It is merely a prayer that all their plans might be frustrated; that there might be an entire completion of their attempts; or that they might be in no sense successful.

Consume them The expression is repeated for the sake of emphasis, implying a desire that the work might be “complete.”

That they may not be That things might be as if they were not in the land of the living.

And let them know Those who are now plotting my death.

That God ruleth in Jacob That God rules among his people, protecting them and guarding them from the attacks of their enemies; that he is their friend, and that he is the enemy of all those who seek to injure and destroy them.

Unto the ends of the earth Everywhere. All over the world. Let it be shown that the same principles of government prevail wherever man abides or wanders — that God manifests himself everywhere as the friend of right, and the enemy of wrong. The phrase “the ends of the earth,” is in accordance with the prevailing conception that the earth was an extended plane, and that it had limits or boundaries. Compare the notes at <sup>2342</sup>Isaiah 40:22,28.

Psalm 59:14. And at evening let them return See the notes at <sup>2316</sup>Psalm 59:6. The original here is the same as in <sup>2316</sup>Psalm 59:6, with the exception of the word “and” at the beginning. This qualifies the sentence, and makes the construction in our version proper. The language is that of confident triumph. They came around the city to take David; they shouted and shrieked as dogs bark and howl when they come upon their prey. David asked God to interpose and save him; and then, says he, let them come if they will, and howl around the city; they will find no prey; they will be like hungry dogs from whom their anticipated victim has escaped. Let them come, and howl and rage. They can do no harm. They will meet with disappointment; and such disappointment will be a proper punishment for their sins.

Psalm 59:15. Let them wander up and down for meat Let them be like dogs that wander about for food, and find none. The idea is, that they would not find him, and would be then as dogs that had sought in vain for food.

And grudge if they be not satisfied Margin, If they be not satisfied, then they will stay all night. The marginal reading is most in accordance with the Hebrew. The sentence is obscure, but the idea seems to be that they would not be satisfied — that is, they would not obtain that which they had sought; and, like hungry and disappointed dogs, they would be compelled to pass the night in this miserable and wretched condition. The word which our translators have rendered “grudge” — from <sup>W</sup> <sup>h3885</sup> — means properly to pass the night; then, to abide, to remain, to dwell; and then, in Hiphil, to show oneself obstinate and stubborn — from the idea of remaining or persisting in a bad cause; and hence, the word sometimes means to complain: <sup>h443</sup> Numbers 14:29; <sup>h2778</sup> Exodus 17:3. It has not, however, the signification of grudging, though it might mean here to murmur or complain because they were disappointed. But the most natural meaning is that which the word properly bears — that of passing the night, as referring to their wandering about, disappointed in their object, and yet still hoping that they might possibly obtain it. The anticipated feeling in the mind of the psalmist is that which he would have in the consciousness of his own safety, and in the pleasure of knowing that they must sooner or later find out that their victim had escaped.

Psalm 59:16. But I will sing of thy power That is, I will praise thee for the manifestation of thy power in rescuing me from danger.

Yea, I will sing aloud of thy mercy in the morning When the light dawns; when these troubles are over; when the night of calamity shall have passed by. There is an allusion here, probably, to the fact that they encompassed the place of his abode at night (<sup>h5916</sup> Psalm 59:6,14); but there is also the implied idea that that night was emblematic of sorrow and distress. The morning would come; morning after such a night of sorrow and trouble; a morning of joy and gladness, when he would feel that he had complete deliverance. Then would he praise God aloud. Compare the notes at <sup><3212></sup>Isaiah 21:12.

For thou hast been my defense and refuge in the day of my trouble That is, he looked to the time when he would feel this; when looking back he could say this; when in view of it he would praise God.

<sup><3917></sup>Psalm 59:17. Unto thee, O my strength, will I sing The source of strength to me; the real strength by which I have obtained deliverance is in thee. See the notes at <sup><3981></sup>Psalm 18:1.

For God is my defense See the notes at <sup><3500></sup>Psalm 59:9.

And the God of my mercy The God who has showed mercy to me; he from whom all these favors have sprung. Whatever means might be used to secure his own safety (compare <sup><3992></sup>1 Samuel 19:12ff) still he felt that his deliverance was to be traced wholly to God. He had interposed and had saved him; and it was proper, therefore, that praise should be ascribed to him. The experience of David in the case referred to in this psalm should be an inducement to all who are in danger to put their trust in God; his anticipated feelings of gratitude, and his purpose to praise God when he should be delivered, should awaken in us the resolution to ascribe to God all the praise when we are delivered from impending troubles, and when our lives are lengthened out where we have been in imminent danger. Whatever may have been the means of our rescue, it is to be traced to the interposition of God.

APPENDIX NOTES ON PSALM 59

<sup><3501></sup>Psalm 59:1. Deliver me ... David prays to be delivered out of the hands of his enemies, and that their cruel designs against him might be defeated. "Deliver me from mine enemies, O my God; thou art God, and canst deliver me; my God, under whose protection I have put myself, and thou hast promised to be a God all-sufficient, and therefore, in honor and faithfulness, thou wilt deliver me. Set me on high out of the reach of the power and malice of them that rise up against me, and above the fear of it. Let me be safe, and see myself so, safe and easy, safe and satisfied. Oh deliver me and save me!" He cries out as one ready to perish, and that had his eye to God only for salvation and deliverance. He prays, <sup><3504></sup>Psalm 59:4,

“Awake to help me; take cognizance of my case, behold that with an eye of pity, and exert thy power for my relief.”

Thus the disciples in the storm awoke Christ, saying, Master, save us, we perish. And thus earnestly should we pray daily to be defended and delivered from our spiritual enemies, the temptations of Satan and the corruptions of our own hearts, which war against our spiritual life. — Henry.

Psalm 59:7. Swords are in their lips This and similar expressions of Scripture bring to mind the strong poetical phrase of our great dramatic poet, “I’ll speak daggers to her.” See Psalm 55:21. — Pictorial Bible.

Psalm 59:11,13. Slay them not. — Consume them in wrath that they may not be David may seem to contradict himself in praying for the utter destruction of his enemies, when immediately before he had expressed his desire that they might not be exterminated at once. What else could he mean when he asks that God would consume them in wrath, but that he would cut them off suddenly, and not by a gradual and slower process of punishment? But he evidently refers in what he says here to a different point of time, and this removes any apparent inconsistency, for he prays that when they had been set up for a sufficient period as an example, they might eventually be devoted to destruction. It was customary with the victorious Roman generals, first to lead the captives which had been kept for the day of triumph through the city, and afterward, upon reaching the capital, to give them over to the lictors for execution. Now David prays that when God had, in a similar manner, reserved his enemies for an interval sufficient to illustrate his triumph, he would upon this consign them to summary punishment. The two things are not at all inconsistent; first, that the divine judgments should be lengthened out through a considerable period, to secure their being remembered better, and that then, upon sufficient evidence being given to the world of the certainty with which the wicked are subjected in the displeasure of God to the slower process of destruction, he should in due time bring them forth to final execution, the better to awake, by such a demonstration of his power, the minds of those who may be more secure than others, or less affected by witnessing moderate inflictions of punishment. He adds, accordingly, that they may know, even to the ends of the earth, that God ruleth in Jacob. Some would insert the copulative particle, reading, that they may know that God rules in Jacob, and in all the nations of the world, an interpretation which I do not approve, and which does violence to the sense. The allusion is to the condign nature of the judgment, which would be such that the report of it would reach the remotest regions, and strike salutary terror into the minds even of their benighted and godless inhabitants. He was more especially anxious that God should be recognized as ruling in the church, it being preposterous that the place where his throne was erected should present such an aspect of confusion as converted his temple into a den of thieves. — Calvin.

~~1895~~ Psalm 59:15. Wander up and down for meat Dogs may in England do this for amusement, when their essential needs are provided for by their masters; but in the East, where they have no particular masters, they are obliged to do so from necessity. Retaining much of their native habits, as beasts of prey, they do this chiefly by night, as the text intimates, being in general dozy and inactive in the daytime. This contributes to render their presence in an oriental city more formidable, to passengers, at night than by day. In their night prowlings they effectually clear the streets of whatever offal or carrion may be in them; and their want of squeamish appetites is then, as well as by day, evinced to an extent which would alone well account for all the abhorrent allusions which the Scriptures contain. They refuse scarcely anything (except crude vegetables) capable of mastication; and yet are forever lean, hungry, and unsatisfied: which seems to intimate that the dog was so much intended for and suited to complete domestication, that even while in a position more favorable than that which any other undomesticated beast obtains, it is only in fellowship with man that he can arrive at a prosperous condition of existence. — Pictorial Bible.

NOTES ON PSALM 60

In the title, this psalm is ascribed to David. The occasion on which it is said to have been composed was after he had been engaged in wars in the East — in Aramea — and when he was meditating the completion of his conquests in the subjugation of Idumea. The time of its composition, according to the title, was that referred to in 2 Samuel 8, compare 1 Chronicles 18. The occasion will be best understood by an explanation of the title.

On the phrase “To the chief Musician,” see the notes at the introduction to Psalm 4.

The phrase “upon Shushan-eduth” means properly “Lily of Testimony.” The word <sup><1779></sup> means properly lily. See the notes at the title to Psalm 45, where, as in the titles to Psalm 69; 80, the plural form of the word occurs. This is the only instance in which it is found in the singular number, when in the title to a psalm. The word <sup><5715></sup> means properly testimony; law; precept; revelation. It is applied to the law of God, as a testimony which God bears to the truth, <sup><1907></sup> Psalm 19:7; <sup><12112></sup> 2 Kings 11:12; and especially to the ark, called “the ark of the testimony,” as containing the law or the divine testimony to the truth. <sup><12521></sup> Exodus 25:21,22 (compare 16:34); <sup><1263></sup> Exodus 26:33,34; 30:6,26; 31:7. The word occurs frequently, and is uniformly translated testimony. <sup><12721></sup> Exodus 27:21; 30:36; 31:18, et saepe. See the notes at <sup><1907></sup> Psalm 19:7. The lily of the law would properly express the meaning of the phrase here, and it may have been the name of a musical instrument having a resemblance to a lily — open-mouthed like the lily; perhaps some form of the trumpet. Why the term earth — testimony or law — was connected with this, it is not easy to determine. Gesenius (Lexicon) supposes that the word means revelation, and that the term was used in these inscriptions because the authors of the psalms wrote by revelation. But if this was the reason, it would not explain why the title was prefixed to these psalms rather than others, since all were composed by revelation. Prof. Alexander, somewhat fancifully, supposes that the name lily is used in this title to denote beauty; that the reference is to the beauty of the law, and that the psalm is designed to celebrate that beauty. But it is sufficient to say in reply to this that there is no particular mention of the law in this psalm, and no special commemoration of its beauty. If the title had been prefixed to Psalm 19, or to Psalm 119, there would then have been some foundation for the remark. On the whole, it seems impossible to determine the reason of the use of the term here. It would seem most probable that the allusion is to a musical instrument, or to some classes of musical instruments to which the term had been originally applied with reference to the use of those instruments in the services connected with the “ark of the testimony,” or the celebration of the law of God; but on what occasion such instruments were first used, or why the term was applied, we cannot hope now to understand.

On the word Michtan, see the notes at the Introduction to Psalm 16. It indicates nothing here in regard to the character of the psalm to which it is prefixed. It may be merely one form of denoting that it was a composition of David.

The word rendered “to teach,” means here that the psalm was adapted to impart instruction, and in this sense it is not unlike the word Maschil (Title to Psalm 32), as being a psalm suited to impart valuable information on the subject referred to, or perhaps to be learned and treasured up in the memory. It is not possible for us, however, to understand why the language was applied to this psalm rather than to others.

The psalm is said to have been composed when David “strove with Aramnaharaim and with Aram-zobah, when Joab returned and smote in the valley of salt twelve thousand.” The allusion is to the transactions referred to in 2 Samuel 8 and 1 Chronicles 18. In those chapters we learn that David made extensive conquests in the East, extending his victories over Moab, Syria, and Hamath, and subduing the country as far as the Euphrates. It is to these victories that the psalm refers, see <sup><1910></sup>Psalm 60:7,8. The words rendered Aram-nahaim mean properly Aram (or Aramea) of the two rivers, and the reference is to Syria or Mesopotamia. The compound word occurs elsewhere in the following places, in all of which it is rendered Mesopotamia, <sup><1240></sup>Genesis 24:10; <sup><1270></sup>Deuteronomy 23:4; <sup><1088></sup>Judges 3:8; <sup><1396></sup>1 Chronicles 19:6. The word Aram is of frequent occurrence, and properly refers to Syria. The name comprehended more than Syria proper, and the term Aram-naharaim, or Aram of the two rivers, was used to designate that part of the general country of Aramea which was between the Tigris and the Euphrates. The compound term Aram-zobah refers also to a part of Aramea or Syria. This kingdom was in the neighborhood of Damascus, and perhaps comprehended Hamath, and probably extended as far as the Euphrates. The king of this country is represented as making war with Saul (<sup><0947></sup>1 Samuel 14:47), and with David (<sup><1083></sup>2 Samuel 8:3; 10:6). In <sup><1083></sup>2 Samuel 8:3, David is represented as having smitten “Hadadezer, the son of Rehob, king of Zobah, as he went to recover his border at the river Euphrates.” It is to these wars, and to this conquest, that the title of the psalm alludes.

The language in the title “when Joab returned,” would seem to imply that these conquests were achieved not by David in person, but by Joab — a circumstance not at all improbable, as he was the leader of the armies of David; <sup><1083></sup>2 Samuel 20:23, “Now Joab was over all the host of Israel.” David had thus subdued Syria, and Moab, and the children of Ammon, and the Philistines, and the Amalekites, and Hadadezer, king of Zobah, and had dedicated to the Lord the silver and the gold which he had taken in these conquests (<sup><1081></sup>2 Samuel 8:11,12); but it would seem probable that Edom or Idumea still held out, or that at the time of composing the psalm that country had not been subdued. But the subjugation of that land was necessary to complete the conquests of David, and to make his kingdom safe. It was at this time probably, in the interval between <sup><1082></sup>2 Samuel 8:12 and <sup><1084></sup>2 Samuel 8:14, that the psalm was composed, or in view of the strong desire of David to subdue Edom; see <sup><1088></sup>Psalms 60:8,9, “Over Edom will I cast out my shoe,” ... “Who will lead me into Edom?” It would seem that there were some special difficulties in the conquest of that country; or that there had been some partial discomfiture in attempting it (<sup><1081></sup>Psalms 60:1-3), and David was now fearful that he had in some way incurred the divine displeasure after all his conquests, and that Edom — a place so strong and so important — was likely to remain unsubdued. And yet the conquest was made, for it is said in the title “that Joab smote of Edom in the valley of salt twelve thousand.” Compare <sup><1083></sup>2 Samuel 8:13.

The phrase “the Valley of Salt” is explained by the fact that not a few valleys are found in Arabia and Syria, which are at certain periods — in the wet seasons — stagnant pools; but which, when they are dried up, leave an incrustation of salt, or a saline deposit on the sand. Travelers make mention of such pools, from which they obtain their supplies of salt. Van Hamelsveld, Bib. Geog., i. p. 402. What valley is here referred to is not certain. It would seem most probable that it was the valley in which the Dead Sea is situated, as being eminently the valley of salt, or the valley in which such deposits abounded. Dr. Robinson (Researches in Palestine, vol. ii. p. 483), supposes that this “valley of salt” is situated at the southern end of the Dead Sea — the Ghor south of the Dead Sea; and adjacent to the Mountain of Salt — “the whole body of the mountain being a solid mass of rock-salt” p. 482. This valley separates the ancient territories of Judah and Edom, and would, therefore, be the place where the battle would naturally be fought.

This victory is said in the title of the psalm to have been achieved by Joab; in <sup><1013></sup>2 Samuel 8:13, it is attributed to David; in the parallel place in <sup><1312></sup>1 Chronicles 18:12, it is said to have been achieved by Abishai — in the margin, Abshai. There is no discrepancy between the account in 2 Samuel, where the victory is ascribed to David, and that in the title to the psalm where it is ascribed to Joab, for though the battle may have been fought by Joab, yet it was really one of the victories of David, as Joab acted under him and by his orders — as we speak of the conquests of Napoleon, attributing to him the conquests which were secured by the armies under his command. There is greater difficulty in reconciling the account in 1 Chronicles with the title to the psalm, where one ascribes the victory to Joab, and the other to Abishai. Some have supposed that either in the title to the psalm or in 1 Chronicles there has been an error in transcribing. But such an error could hardly have occurred. The most probable opinion seems to be that the victory was achieved by the joint action of the forces under Joab and his brother Abishai, and that with propriety it may be spoken of as the victory of either of them. We know that on one occasion Joab thus divided his forces, retaining the command of a portion of the army to himself, and assigning the other portion to his brother Abishai (<sup><1009></sup>2 Samuel 10:9,10), and it is possible that there may have been such a division of the army here, and that the victory may have been so connected with the skill and valor of Abishai that it might without impropriety be spoken of as his victory, while there was no impropriety also in ascribing it to Joab, as entrusted with the general command, or to David who had planned and directed the expedition.

There is, also, a discrepancy in the numbers mentioned as slain, in the title to the psalm, and in the account in Samuel and Chronicles. In <sup><1013></sup>2 Samuel 8:13, and in <sup><1312></sup>1 Chronicles 18:12, the number is “eighteen thousand;” in the title to the psalm, it is “twelve thousand.” Why the statement varies, it is impossible to determine with certainty. We cannot suppose that the author of the psalm was ignorant of the usual estimate of the number, and we have no evidence that there is an error in the transcription. The probability is, that there may have been, as is often the case, in the account of battles, two estimates. The common and more moderate estimate may have been that the number was twelve thousand — and this was adopted by the author of the psalm. The more accurate and well-ascertained estimate may have been that which was placed in the regular history, in the Books of Samuel and the Chronicles. If the actual number was in fact as great as eighteen thousand, then there is no contradiction — for the greater number includes the less. If eighteen thousand were actually slain, there was no falsehood in the assertion, according to the first estimate, that twelve thousand had fallen in the battle, for that statement was in fact true, though a subsequent and more accurate “return” from the army made the number larger. Both statements were true. In saying that three men were drowned in a flood, or lost at sea in a storm, I do not falsify a declaration which may be made subsequently that not only three perished but six or more.

There is no reference, in the accounts in Samuel and the Chronicles, to the partial discomfiture referred to in the psalm (<sup>3901E</sup>Psalm 60:1-3); and the impression from those historical narratives would probably be that the armies of David had been uniformly successful. Yet it is possible that some things may have been omitted in the rapid survey of the conquests of David in Samuel and the Chronicles. The design of the authors of those books may have been to give a general summary of the wars or series of wars by which David obtained a final victory over his enemies, and brought into subjection all that he regarded as properly his territory, or all that had been included in the general promise to Abraham and his posterity, without noticing the reverses or disasters that may have occurred in securing those triumphs. Perhaps the most probable supposition in the case is, that during the absence of the armies in the east the Edomites had taken occasion to invade the land of Palestine from the south, and that in endeavoring to repel them, there had been some defeats and losses in the comparatively small forces which David was then able to employ. He now summoned his armies on their return, and made a vigorous and decided effort to expel the Edomites from the land, to carry the warfare into their own country, and to add their territory to that which he had already brought under subjection. In this he was entirely successful. <sup>1084</sup>2 Samuel 8:14; <sup>1383</sup>1 Chronicles 18:13.

The contents of the psalm are as follows:

I. A statement of the disaster which had occurred, as if God had cast his people off, and as if, after all, they might be given up into the hands of their enemies, <sup><980></sup>Psalm 60:1-3.

II. A statement of the object for which God now summoned his people to war — that of carrying forth the banner of truth, or of bringing nations into subjection to the true religion, <sup><980></sup>Psalm 60:4,5.

III. A reference to the conquests already made, or to the dominion which David had set up over Shechem, Succoth, Gilead, Manasseh, Ephraim, Judah, Moab, and Philistia, <sup><980></sup>Psalm 60:6-8.

IV. The expression of a strong desire to complete the series of conquests by subduing Edom or Idumea, <sup><980></sup>Psalm 60:8,9. That alone remained. That offered formidable resistance to the armies of David. The conquest of that seemed difficult, if not hopeless, and the psalmist, therefore, asks with deep solicitude who would aid him in this war; who would bring him successfully into the strong city — the strong fortifications of Edom, <sup><980></sup>Psalm 60:9.

V. An appeal to God to do it; to that God who had cast them off; to him who had left their armies to go forth alone. David now calls on him to return to those forces, and to render aid — expressing the confident assurance that he would thus return, and that the victory would be secured, <sup><980></sup>Psalm 60:10-12.

<sup><980></sup>Psalm 60:1. O God, thou hast cast us off The word used here means properly to be foul, rancid, offensive; and then, to treat anything as if it were foul or rancid; to repel, to spurn, to cast away. See the notes at <sup><980></sup>Psalm 43:2. It is strong language, meaning that God had seemed to treat them as if they were loathsome or offensive to him. The allusion, according to the view taken in the introduction to the psalm, is to some defeat or disaster which had occurred after the conquests in the East, or during the absence of the armies of David in the East (2 Samuel 8; 1 Chronicles 18); probably to the fact that the Edomites had taken occasion to invade the southern part of Palestine, and that the forces employed to expel them had been unsuccessful.

Thou hast scattered us Margin, broken. So the Hebrew. The word is applied to the forces of war which are broken and scattered by defeat, <sup><1050></sup>2 Samuel 5:20.

Thou hast been displeased The word used here means “to breathe”; to breathe hard; and then, to be angry. See the notes at <sup><4912></sup>Psalm 2:12. God had treated them as if he was displeased or angry. He had suffered them to be defeated.

O turn thyself to us again Return to our armies, and give us success. This might be rendered, “Thou wilt turn to us;” that is, thou wilt favor us — expressing a confident belief that God would do this, as in <sup><4912></sup>Psalm 60:12. It is more in accordance, however, with the usual structure of the Psalms to regard this as a prayer. Many of the psalms begin with a prayer, and end with the expression of a confident assurance that the prayer has been, or would certainly be heard.

<sup><4912></sup>Psalm 60:2. Thou hast made the earth to tremble This refers, doubtless, to some calamity that might be compared with an earthquake — some disaster, discomfiture, or defeat that had shaken their hopes, as a city is shaken by an earthquake. Such comparisons are common in the Scriptures.

Thou hast broken it As if it were broken up, or convulsed.

Heal the breaches thereof That is, Appear for thy people, and repair their disasters, as if after an earthquake thou shouldst appear and fill up the rents which it had made. The prayer is that he would place things in their former condition of prosperity and success.

For it shaketh It is convulsed or agitated. That is, there is still commotion. Things are unsettled and disturbed. The prayer is, that there might be stability or continued success.

<sup><4912></sup>Psalm 60:3. Thou hast showed thy people hard things Thou hast caused them to see reverses, disappointments, and trials. This refers, according to the supposition in the Introduction to the psalm, to some calamitous events which had occurred. The probability seems to be that the Edomites may have spread desolation over the land.

Thou hast made us to drink the wine of astonishment The word rendered “astonishment” — hl [e]tæ <sup><48653></sup> — occurs only here and in <sup><2517></sup>Isaiah 51:17,22 — in both of which verses in Isaiah it is rendered trembling. It means properly reeling, drunkenness; and the idea here is, that it was as if he had given them a cup — that is, an intoxicating drink — which had caused them to reel as a drunken man; or, in other words, their efforts had been unsuccessful. Compare the notes at <sup><9106></sup>Psalm 11:6; <sup><2517></sup>Isaiah 51:17.

<sup><9104></sup>Psalm 60:4. Thou hast given a banner to them that fear thee The word rendered “banner” — <sup><5251></sup>sne — means properly anything elevated or lifted up, and hence, a standard, a flag, a sign, or a signal. It may refer to a standard reared on lofty mountains or high places during an invasion of a country, to point out to the people a place of rendezvous or a rallying place (<sup><2165></sup>Isaiah 5:26; 11:12; 18:3); or it may refer to a standard or ensign borne by an army; or it may refer to the flag of a ship, <sup><5707></sup>Ezekiel 27:7; <sup><2333></sup>Isaiah 33:23. Here it doubtless refers to the flag, the banner, the standard of an army; and the idea is that God had committed such a standard to his people that they might go forth as soldiers in his cause. They were enlisted in his service, and were fighting his battles.

That it may be displayed because of the truth In the cause of truth; or, in the defense of justice and right. It was not to be displayed for vain parade or ostentation; it was not to be unfolded in an unrighteous or unjust cause; it was not to be waved for the mere purpose of carrying desolation, or of securing victory; it was that a righteous cause might be vindicated, and that the honor of God might be promoted. This was the reason which the psalmist now urges why (God should interpose and repair their disasters — that it was his cause, and that they were appointed to maintain and defend it. What was true then of the people of God, is true of the church now. God has given to his church a banner or a standard that it may wage a war of justice, righteousness, and truth; that it may be employed in resisting and overcoming his enemies; that it may carry the weapons of truth and right against all injustice, falsehood, error, oppression, and wrong; that it may ever be found on the side of humanity and benevolence — of virtue, temperance, liberty, and equality; and that it may bear the great principles of the true religion to every territory of the enemy, until the whole world shall be subdued to God.

<sup><9105></sup>Psalm 60:5. That thy beloved may be delivered The word beloved is in the plural number, and might be rendered beloved ones. It refers not merely to David as his servant and friend, but to those associated with him. The reference is to the calamities and dangers then existing, to which allusion has been made above. The prayer is, that the enemy might be driven back, and the land delivered from their invasion.

Save with thy right hand The right hand is that by which the sword is handled, the spear hurled, the arrow drawn on the bow. The prayer is, that God would put forth his power and deliver his people.

And hear me literally, Answer me. The answer which he desired was that God would lead his armies successfully into Edom, <sup><991B></sup>Psalm 60:8,9.

<sup><991B></sup>Psalm 60:6. God hath spoken in his holiness That is, as a holy God; a God who is true; a God whose promises are always fulfilled. The idea is, that the holiness of God was the public pledge or assurance that what he had promised he would certainly perform. God had made promises in regard to the land of Canaan or Palestine, as a country to be put into the possession of Abraham and his posterity. <sup><912B></sup>Genesis 12:7; 13:15; 17:8; <sup><995B></sup>Psalm 105:8-11. The original promise of the gift of that land, made to Abraham under the general name of Canaan (<sup><912B></sup>Genesis 12:7), embraced the whole territory from the river (that divided the land from Egypt) to the Euphrates: “Unto thy seed [addressed to Abraham] have I given this land, from the river of Egypt unto the great river, the river Euphrates,” <sup><915B></sup>Genesis 15:18. This would embrace the country of Edom, as well as the other countries which are specified in the psalm. The natural and proper boundary of the land on the east, therefore, according to the promise, was the river Euphrates; on the west, Egypt and the Mediterranean sea; on the south, the outer limit of Edom. It was the object of David to carry out what was implied in this promise, and to secure the possession of all that had been thus granted to the Hebrews as the descendants of Abraham. Hence, he had been engaged in carrying his conquests to the east, with a view to make the Euphrates the eastern border or boundary of the land: “David smote also Hadarezer, the son of Rehob, king of Zobah, as he went to recover his border at the river Euphrates,” <sup><918B></sup>2 Samuel 8:3. Compare <sup><938B></sup>1 Chronicles 18:3. In the prosecution of the same purpose he was anxious also to subdue Edom, that the entire territory thus promised to Abraham might be put in possession of the Hebrews, and that he might transmit the kingdom in the fullness of the original grant to his posterity. It is to this promise made to Abraham that he doubtless refers in the passage before us.

I will rejoice I, David, will exult or rejoice in the prospect of success. I will find my happiness, or my confidence in what I now undertake, in the promise which God has made. The meaning is, that since God had made this promise, he would certainly triumph.

I will divide Shechem That is, I will divide up the whole land according to the promise. The language here is taken from that which was employed when the country of Canaan was conquered by Joshua, and when it was divided among the tribes: “Be strong and of a good courage: for unto this people shalt thou divide for an inheritance the land which I swear unto their fathers to give them,” <sup><0106></sup>Joshua 1:6. Compare <sup><036></sup>Joshua 13:6,7; 14:5; 18:10; 19:51; 23:4; <sup><985></sup>Psalms 78:55; <sup><4139></sup>Acts 13:19. David here applies the same language to Shechem, “and the valley of Succoth,” as portions of the land, meaning that he would accomplish the original purpose in regard to the land by placing it in possession of the people of God. Shechem or Sichem was a city within the limits of the tribe of Ephraim, between Mount Ebal and Mount Gerizim, called by the Romans Neapolis, and now Nablus. It is about two hours, or eight miles, south of Samaria. It seems to be mentioned here as being the spot where the law of Moses was read to the people of Israel, and especially the blessings and curses recorded in Deuteronomy 27; Deuteronomy 28, which Moses commanded to be read to the different tribes on the above-named mountains, <sup><6711></sup>Deuteronomy 27:11-13. This was actually done, <sup><0833></sup>Joshua 8:33. Shechem, therefore, as lying between these mountains, and as being the place where the great mass of the people were assembled to hear what was read, became a central place, a representative spot of the whole land, and to say that that was conquered or subdued, was to speak of that which implied a victory over the land. David speaks of having secured this, as significant of the fact that the central point of influence and power had been brought under subjection, and as in fact implying that the land was subdued. The importance of that place, and the allusion to it here, will justify a more extended reference to it, which I copy from “The Land and the Book,” by Dr. Thomson, vol. ii. p. 203,204.

“Nablus is a queer old place. The streets are narrow, and vaulted over; and in the winter time it is difficult to pass along many of them on account of brooks which rush over the pavement with deafening roar. In this respect, I know no city with which to compare it except Brusa; and, like that city, it has mulberry, orange, pomegranate, and other trees, mingled in with the houses, whose odoriferous flowers lead the air with delicious perfume during the months of April and May. Here the billbul delights to sit and sing, and thousands of other birds unite to swell the chorus. The inhabitants maintain that theirs is the most musical vale in Palestine, and my experience does not enable me to contradict them.

“Imagine that the lofty range of mountains running north and south was cleft open to its base by some tremendous convulsion of nature, at right angles to its own line of extension, and the broad fissure thus made is the vale of Nablus, as it appears to one coming up the plain of Mukhna from Jerusalem. Mount Ebal is on the north, Gerizim on the south, and the city between. Near the eastern end, the vale is not more than sixty rods wide; and just there, I suppose, the tribes assembled to hear the ‘blessings and the curses’ read by the Levites. We have them in extenso in Deuteronomy 27 and Deuteronomy 28; and in Joshua 8 we are informed that it was actually done, and how. Simeon, and Levi, and Judah, and Issachar, and Joseph, and Benjamin, stood on Gerizim; and Reuben, Gad, Asher, Zebulon, Dan, and Naphtali, on Ebal; while all Israel, and their elders, and officers, and their judges, stood on this side of the ark and on that side before the priests which bare the ark of the covenant of the Lord; the whole nation of Israel, with the women and little ones, were there. And Joshua read all the words of the law, the blessings and the cursings; there was not a word of all that Moses commanded which Joshua read not before all the congregation of Israel. This was, beyond question or comparison, the most august assembly the sun has ever shone upon; and I never stand in the narrow plain, with Ebal and Gerizim rising on either hand to the sky, without involuntarily recalling and reproducing the scene. I have shouted to hear the echo, and then fancied how it must have been when the loud-voiced Levites proclaimed from the naked cliffs of Ebal, ‘Cursed be the man that maketh any graven image, an abomination unto Jehovah.’ And then the tremendous AMEN! tenfold louder, from the mighty congregation, rising, and swelling, and re-echoing from Ebal to Gerizim, and from Gerizim to Ebal. AMEN! even so let him be accursed. No, there never was an assembly to compare with this.”

And mete out the valley of Succoth Measure out; that is, measure or survey for the purpose of “dividing” it, or assigning it to the conquerors, to the people of God, according to the promise. There is the same allusion here, as in the former clause, to the dividing of the land in the time of Joshua. Succoth, in the division of the land by Joshua, fell to the tribe of Gad; ~~1637~~ Joshua 13:27. It was on the east side of the river Jordan, and is now called Sakut. It is first mentioned in ~~1637~~ Genesis 33:17, in the account of the journey which Jacob took on returning from the East to the land of Canaan. At this place he paused in his journey, and made booths for his cattle; and hence, the name Succoth, or booths. Why this place is referred to here by David, as representing his conquests, cannot now be ascertained. It seems most probable that it was because it was a place east of the Jordan, as Shechem was west of the Jordan, and that the two might, therefore, represent the conquest of the whole country. Succoth, too, though not more prominent than many other places, and though in itself of no special importance, was well known as among the places mentioned in history. It is possible, also, though no such fact is mentioned, that there may have been some transaction of special importance there in connection with David's conquests in the East, which was well understood at the time, and which justified this special reference to it.

~~1617~~ Psalm 60:7. Gilead is mine, and Manasseh is mine That is, My dominion or authority is extended over these regions — Gilead, Manasseh, Ephraim, and Judah. The idea here is substantially the same as in the former verse, that his dominion extended over the country on both sides of the Jordan; or that in the direction of east and west it embraced all that had been promised — “from the great sea to the river Euphrates.” In verse 6, this idea is expressed by selecting two spots or towns as representatives of the whole country — Shechem on the west, and Succoth on the east; in this verse, the same idea is expressed by a reference to the two regions so situated — Gilead and Manasseh on the east, and Ephraim and Judah on the west. Gilead was on the east of the river Jordan, properly embracing the mountainous region south of the river Jabbok, ~~1632~~ Genesis 31:21-48; Cant. 4:1. The word has sometimes, however, a wider signification, including the whole mountainous tract between the rivers Arnon and Bashan, and thus including the region occupied by the tribes of Gad, Reuben, and Manasseh, <sup><0626></sup>Numbers 32:26,29,39. Hence, in this place, it is put for the region occupied by the tribes of Reuben and Gad. “Manasseh” refers to the district or region occupied by the half tribe of Manasseh, on the east of the Jordan. These two portions — Gilead and Manasseh — or, Reuben, Gad, and Manasseh — would, therefore, embrace the whole of the land of promise, north and south, on the east of the Jordan. The limits of these regions to the east were properly the banks of the Euphrates; that is, the original promise would embrace this. David had gone to carry the boundaries of his country to those assigned limits (<sup><1018></sup>2 Samuel 8:3), and he now says that he had completed that undertaking.

Ephraim also Ephraim and Judah were the principal tribes on the west of the Jordan, and they would well represent that part of Canaan. The idea is, that the whole of the promised land, east and west, was now under his control. There needed only the territory of Edom, on the south, to complete the conquest, and place the whole of the promised land under his dominion, <sup><3918></sup>Psalms 60:8,9.

Is the strength of my head This means that Ephraim constituted his chief strength, or was that on which he mainly relied. It was that which protected him, as the helmet does the head; that on which his very life in battle depended. This honor is given to the tribe of Ephraim because it was one of the largest tribes, and because it was situated in the very center of the land.

Judah is my lawgiver This means that the tribe of Judah, by its position, its numbers, and the prominence given to it in the prophecies (<sup><0408></sup>Genesis 49:8-12), actually gave law to the nation. Its influence was felt in all the institutions of the land. The controlling influence went out from that tribe in the time of David; and its authority in this respect was recognized, perhaps partly in anticipation of what it had been said would be its importance in future times: “The scepter shall not depart from Judah, nor a lawgiver from between his feet until Shiloh come.” <sup><0110></sup>Genesis 49:10.

<sup><0118></sup>Psalms 60:8. Moab is my washpot Moab was a region of country on the east of the Dead Sea, extending as far north as the river Arnon. See the notes at Isaiah 15. The words rendered wash-pot mean properly a pot or basin for washing, a wash-basin; and the expression is used here as one of contempt, as if he would use it as the meanest vessel is used. It implies that Moab was already subdued, and that the author of the psalm could make any use of it he pleased. It also implies that Moab was not regarded as adding much to his strength, or to the value of his dominions; but that, compared with other portions of his kingdom, it was of as little value as a wash-basin compared with the more valuable vessels in a house.

Over Edom will I cast out my shoe Edom or Idumea was the country which still remained unsubdued. This David was anxious to possess, though the conquest had been delayed and prevented by the adverse circumstances to which allusion has already been made in the notes at the psalm. On the situation of Idumea, see the notes at Isaiah 34. It was a region whose possession was necessary to complete the acquisition of territory that properly pertained to the promised land; and David was now intent on acquiring it. He here expresses the utmost confidence that he would succeed in this, notwithstanding the adverse events which had occurred. It is supposed that there is allusion in the expression “I will cast out my shoe,” to the custom, when transferring a possession, of throwing down a shoe on the ground as a symbol of occupancy. Compare <sup><800></sup>Ruth 4:7. In the middle ages this was expressed by throwing down a glove; in the time of Columbus, by solemnly taking possession and setting up a cross; in other times, by erecting a standard, or by building a fort. Compare Rosenmuller, Das alte und neue Morgenland, No. 483. The idea is, that he would take possession of it, or would make it his own.

Philistia, triumph thou because of me On the situation of Philistia, see the notes at <sup><2114></sup>Isaiah 11:14. In the margin this is, “triumph thou over me, by an irony.” It may be regarded as irony, or as a taunt, meaning that Philistia was no longer now in a situation to triumph over him; or it may be understood as referring to the exultation and shouting which would ensue on the reception of its sovereign. The former seems to be the most probable interpretation, as the language is undoubtedly intended to denote absolute subjection, and not the voluntary reception of a king. The language in the entire passage is that of triumph over foes.

Who will lead me into Edom? Into the capital, and thence into the whole land to subdue it. This was done under the combined command of Joab and Abishai his brother. See the notes at the title to the psalm.

Psalm 60:10. Wilt not thou, O God, which hadst east us off? See the notes at Psalm 60:1. The meaning is, that although God had seemed to reject and forsake them, they had no other resource, and the appeal might be still made to him. The psalmist hoped that he would again be favorable to his people, and would not forsake them altogether. It is still true that although God may seem to forsake us, that although he may leave us for a time to discouragement and darkness, yet we have no other resource but himself; it is still true that we may hope in his mercy, and plead for his return.

And thou, O God, which didst not go out with our armies? Who didst suffer us to be defeated. See the notes at Psalm 60:2,3.

Psalm 60:11. Give us help from trouble From the troubles which have now come upon us and overwhelmed us.

For vain is the help of man Margin, salvation. The idea is, that they would look in vain to man to assist them in their present difficulties. They must depend on God alone. What is here said of temporal troubles is true as absolutely in the matter of salvation. When we are burdened with the consciousness of guilt, and trembling under the apprehension of the wrath to come, it is not man that can aid us. Our help is in God alone. Man can neither guide, comfort, pardon, nor save; and in vain should we look to any man, or to all people, for aid. We must look to God alone: to God as the only one who can remove guilt from the soul; who can give peace to the troubled heart; who can deliver us — from condemnation and ruin.

Psalm 60:12. Through God By the help of God.

We shall do valiantly literally, we shall make strength. That is, we shall gain or gather strength; we shall go forth with spirit and with courage to the war. This expresses the confident assurance that they would secure the aid of God, and that under him they would achieve the victory.

For he it is that shall tread down our enemies He will himself tread or trample them down; that is, he will enable us to do it. The psalm, therefore, though begun in despondency and sadness, closes, as the Psalms often do, with confident hope; with the assurance of the favor of God; and with the firm belief that the object sought in the psalm would be obtained. The history shows that the prayer was answered; that the armies of David were successful; that Edom was subdued; and that thus the territories of the Hebrew people had, in fact, in the time of David, the boundaries promised to Abraham.

APPENDIX NOTES ON PSALM 60

The question has been raised whether of the two should be regarded as the speaker in this psalm — Israel, or Israel's king: in other words, whether the psalm should be treated as strictly national, or as mainly personal. The latter is probably the correct view. The plural pronoun of the opening and concluding verses unquestionably refers to the whole community; but the I of the central verses belongs to the king alone. In proof of this, it may be observed that all the other psalms, from Psalm 51—64, are personal; that there is thus no other instance of a national psalm among those Davidic compositions which were excluded by David himself from the first book of the Psalter; and that it is not easy to understand on what principle he should have omitted to consign to the permanent and immediate service of the sanctuary a psalm to which he had given utterance in the name of the whole nation.

But, furthermore, reference is made in <sup>1906</sup>Psalm 60:6 to a certain special announcement or promise on God's part. This announcement cannot well be any other than the first part of the message from God to David by the prophet Nathan, <sup>1008</sup>2 Samuel 7:8-11; which message would appear to have been delivered not long before the wars in the midst of which this psalm was written. With the purport of that message the contents of the psalm sufficiently agree. It had been previously known that David, as king of God's people Israel, was to deliver them out of the hand of the Philistines, and out of the hand of all their enemies, <sup>1008</sup>2 Samuel 3:18. God now more formally declared that by the hand of his servant David he would give his people Israel rest, that he would plant them that they might dwell in a place of their own, where the children of wickedness should no more afflict them. And therefore, in accordance with this announcement, David's prayer in the psalm is, "That thy beloved (ones) may be delivered; save with thy right hand, and hear me;" that is, "Hear and help me, inasmuch as thou hast chosen me to be the instrument of deliverance to thy beloved." Nor, indeed, can the "banner" which God had given to them that feared him, "to be displayed because of the truth," well be aught else than the Davidic sovereignty, now rendered permanent through the promise given by Nathan, and therefore the sure pledge of the salvation of Israel. Hence, such passages as these in the prophecies of Isaiah: “In that day there shall be a root of Jesse, which shall stand for an ensign of the people;” and, “Behold, I have given him (David, that is, Christ, the representative of the Davidic house) for a witness to the people, a leader and commander to the people.”

<800>Psalm 60:1-5 form the opening, <800>Psalm 60:9-12 the concluding portion of the psalm; the central and prominent portion is <800>Psalm 60:6-8, consisting of three verses of three lines each. The opening verses delineate the state of depression hitherto; the concluding verses contain the supplication for help; the center of the psalm is reserved for the announcement of God’s promise, and the anticipation, in glorious detail, of its fulfillment.

And here, as unity at home would be essential to the achievement of victory abroad, the king first speaks in <800>Psalm 60:6,7 of the submission of all Israel to his sway. In <800>Psalm 60:6 Shechem apparently indicates the districts to the west, Succoth those to the east of the Jordan; or should it be urged that Succoth itself was situated to the west of that river, then Shechem may denote the mountain-range of the land of inheritance, and Succoth its level plains. Both Shechem and Succoth are mentioned in the history of Jacob’s return from Mesopotamia. He built, as Hengstenberg observes, a house at the latter place, and an altar at the former. In <800>Psalm 60:7 the territories to the east of Jordan are again denoted by the names Gilead and Manasseh; while Ephraim appears as the representative of the central tribes. The Ephraimites were especially strong in point of numbers. In the blessing of Moses it had been said of Ephraim, “His horns are like the horns of unicorns; with them he shall push the people together to the ends of the earth;” hence, in the present psalm Ephraim is appropriately described as the “strength of head” of Israel’s sovereign. On the other hand, Judah, the royal and dominant tribe, is the king’s “staff of authority;” for the staff was not to depart from between Judah’s feet until Shiloh came; and in regard to David, it was the tribe of Judah alone that had, immediately upon Saul’s death, anointed him king in Hebron, and acknowledged his authority, while Ishbosheth was reigning over the remaining tribes. But at length all Israel had been for a while reconciled; and at the head of a united nation David was gone forth to subdue the surrounding foes of God’s people, and to put an end to that state of depression in which Israel had remained during the reign of Saul, and to which reference is made in the beginning of the present psalm.

And in the prosecution of this career of victory there is meted out to each foe his own appropriate recompense. Moab, the descendant and representative of unholy lust, Moab, who had at Shittim enticed Israel to impurity, becomes at David's hands a mere receptacle of filth. Edom, the proudest and most malicious enemy of Israel, is in contumely reduced to the most menial servitude: or if the casting out of the shoe be regarded as the customary token of the appropriation of an estate, then Edom, who had profanely despised his birthright, beholds the inheritance to which birthright is the title ravished from him. And Philistia, the warrior-foe, who had so long oppressed God's people, and so often triumphed over them in the battlefield, is now at last, in bitter irony, bidden triumph if she can. A stronger than she is come upon her to overcome her, taking from her all the armor wherein she trusted, and dividing her spoils.

It is not without reason that we venture to expound the words of this psalm by those of our Saviour. For as the banner of ~~Psalm~~ Psalm 60:4, which was to be "displayed because of the truth," is evidently contemplated in the psalm as something permanent, it is certain that David could not have uttered the psalm in his own individual person so much as in the person of his lineage, and more especially of that Great Representative of his house, the Lion of the tribe of Judah, who, having trodden the wine-press alone, should come from Edom, with dyed garments from Bozrah, speaking in righteousness, mighty to save; and who, himself the author of a new and better covenant, and with the whole of the people of the new covenant united under his sway, should go forth conquering and to conquer, and should reign until all enemies were put under his feet. The Christian church, in repeating this psalm, glories, as in Psalm 18, in the triumphs of her eternal King; and learns at the same time for herself the important lesson that it is by her own internal unity, and the united obedience of her several members to the true sovereignty of Christ, that she will best prepare herself for a career of victory over her pagan foes. — Thrupp.

NOTES ON PSALM 61

This psalm (title) is inscribed “To the chief Musician upon Neginah.” On the meaning of the expression, “To the chief Musician,” see the notes at the title to Psalm 4, where also we have the following word in another form, — “on Neginoth” — the plural, instead of the singular. The word means a stringed instrument; and the idea is, that the psalm was committed to the leader of those who played on stringed instruments in the sanctuary.

The psalm is ascribed to David, but the occasion on which it was composed is not specified. From the psalm itself it is evident that it was composed by one who was in exile (<sup><1960D></sup>Psalm 61:2), and by one who was a king (<sup><1960E></sup>Psalm 61:6). The supposition which best agrees with all the circumstances alluded to in the psalm is, that it was composed by David when he was driven into exile on the rebellion of Absalom, and that it was composed when he was still beyond the Jordan (<sup><1072></sup>2 Samuel 17:22), and when his life was yet in danger. Psalm 42 and Psalm 43 refer to the same period, and have the same general characteristics.

The psalm consists of the following parts:

- I. A prayer for the divine interposition, <sup><1960B></sup>Psalm 61:1,2. The psalmist was far away from his home — in exile — and his heart was overwhelmed.
- II. A reference to former mercies, and to the divine interposition in other days, as a ground of hope and of pleading now, <sup><1960C></sup>Psalm 61:3-5.
- III. An expression of confident assurance that his prayer would be heard; that his life would be preserved; that his days would be lengthened out, and that he would be delivered from danger, <sup><1960E></sup>Psalm 61:6,7.
- IV. The result of this deliverance; or, as an expression of gratitude for it, a purpose to devote himself to God, in a life spent in the daily performance of his vows, <sup><1960F></sup>Psalm 61:8.

<sup><1960G></sup>Psalm 61:1. Hear my cry, O God See the notes at <sup><1960D></sup>Psalm 5:2. The word rendered cry in this place sometimes denotes a joyful shout — a shout of triumph; but the connection makes it certain that it here refers to the voice of prayer. It is implied that it was audible prayer, or that the psalmist gave utterance to his desires in words. It is language such as would be produced by deep distress; when a sad and burdened heart gives vent to its feelings in a loud cry for mercy.

Attend unto my prayer Give ear; incline the ear to me, <sup><1981></sup>Psalm 5:1; 17:1,6; 39:12; 71:2.

<sup><1982></sup>Psalm 61:2. From the end of the earth will I cry unto thee This language is derived from the idea that the earth is one extended plain, and that it has limits or boundaries. Such language is common in the Scriptures, and indeed is in constant use now, even although we know that the earth is globular, and that there are no parts which can properly be called “the ends of the earth.” The meaning is plain. The psalmist was far from the place where he was accustomed to live; or, in other words, he was in exile or in banishment. The language agrees well with the supposition that the psalm was composed when David was driven from his home and his throne by Absalom, and was in exile beyond the Jordan, <sup><1072></sup>2 Samuel 17:22. Compare Psalm 42.

Lead me to the rock that is higher than I To a rock; to some place of refuge; to some stronghold where I may be safe. The allusion is to God as such a rock or place of refuge. See the notes at <sup><19812></sup>Psalm 18:2. The idea is, that he had no strength in himself; that if he depended on himself, he could not be safe. He was, as it were, in a low vale, exposed to every enemy. He wished to be put in a place of safety. To such a place of safety — to Himself — he prayed that God would lead him. We need one much higher than we are to save us. A Saviour — a Redeemer — on the same level with ourselves could not help us. We must have one that is supreme over all things; one that is divine.

<sup><19813></sup>Psalm 61:3. For thou hast been a shelter for me A place of refuge; a place where I have found safety. He refers here to what had occurred in former times. God had protected him when in danger, and he pleads that fact as a reason why God should now interpose and deliver him. That reason seems to be founded on two considerations:

- (a) God had thus shown that he had power to deliver him; and
- (b) it might be expected that God who is unchangeable, and who had interposed, would manifest the same traits of character still, and would not leave him now.

Both of these are proper grounds for prayer.

<sup><960E></sup>Psalm 61:4. I will abide in thy tabernacle for ever This expresses the confident assurance that he would be restored to his home, and to the privileges of public worship. The word forever here means perpetually; that is, his permanent home would be there, or he would dwell with God who dwelt in the tabernacle. The word “tabernacle” refers to the sacred tent which was erected for the worship of God, within which were the ark, the tables of the law, the table of showbread, etc. In the innermost part of that tent — the holy of holies — the symbol of the divine presence rested on the mercy-seat or cover of the ark of the covenant. David regarded it as a great privilege to abide near that sacred tent; near to the place of; public worship; near to the place where God was supposed to dwell. See the notes at <sup><927E></sup>Psalm 23:6; 26:8; 27:4. It is possible that his mind looked beyond the tabernacle on earth to an eternal residence in the very presence of God; to his being admitted into his own sacred abode in heaven.

I will trust in the covert of thy wings Margin, Make my refuge. See the notes at <sup><970E></sup>Psalm 17:8. Compare <sup><980E></sup>Psalm 36:7; 57:1. The idea is, that he would seek and find protection in God — as young birds do under the outstretched wings of the parent bird.

<sup><960E></sup>Psalm 61:5. For thou, O God, hast heard my vows That is, my prayers accompanied with solemn pledges or promises that I will devote myself to thy service. In some way David had the assurance that those vows and prayers had been heard; that God would answer his supplications — that he would restore him to his home, and to the privilege of uniting with others in the sacred services of the sanctuary. In what way he had this assurance we are not informed, but the statement here accords with what we often find in the Psalms. His troubled mind became calm, for he looked upon the blessing as already granted. He entertained no doubt that what he had asked would be bestowed. The mind of a true believer often feels this assurance now. Somehow he feels an undoubting persuasion that the prayer which he has offered has been heard; that God will be merciful; that the blessing which has been sought will assuredly be conferred. That there may be danger of illusion here, no one can doubt — for we are not, as David was, inspired; but no one can prove that God may not impart such a gracious assurance to the soul; no one can show that it is wrong for a believer to allow peace to flow into his soul, in the confident hope that the blessing which he had sought will be his.

Thou hast given me the heritage of those that fear thy name The heirship which pertains to such; the privileges of those who are the true children of God. One of these privileges is that of prayer; another is the peace which results from adoption into the family of God; of feeling that we are his heirs. Compare the notes at ~~816~~Romans 8:16,17.

~~816~~Psalm 61:6. Thou wilt prolong the king's life literally, “Days upon the days of the king thou wilt add;” that is, Thou wilt add days to those which thou hast already permitted him to live. The language does not necessarily mean that he would have a long life, but that he would still be permitted to live. He had apprehended death. He knew that his life was sought by those who were engaged with Absalom in the rebellion. At first it was uncertain what the issue would be. He had fled for his life. But now, in answer to prayer, he felt assured that his life would be preserved; that he would be permitted to return to his home and his throne; and that as king — as the sovereign of his people — he would be permitted to honor God.

And his years as many generations Margin, as in Hebrew, generation and generation. This probably means that he would be permitted to live longer than the ordinary time of a generation; that he would live as if one generation — or as if one ordinary lifetime — were added to another, so that he would live through successive generations of men. The average life of a generation is about thirty years. David is supposed to have lived from 1085 before the Christian era to 1016 B.C., or 69 years, which would reach a third generation. This is a more natural interpretation of the passage than to suppose that he refers to an “ideal” king, or that his dynasty would continue for many generations.

~~816~~Psalm 61:7. He shall abide before God for ever That is, perpetually; without danger of change, or of being driven into exile. This may allude, however, to the hope which David had that he would always live with God in a higher world — a world where there would be no danger of change or banishment. His restoration to his home, to his throne, and to the privileges of the sanctuary, he may have regarded as an emblem of his ultimate reception into a peaceful heaven, and his mind may have glanced rapidly from the one to the other. On earth, after his restoration, he would have no fear that he would be banished again; in heaven, of which such a restoration might be regarded as an emblem, there could be no change, no exile.

O prepare mercy and truth literally, divide, or divide out; then, allot or appoint; and then, make ready or prepare. The prayer is, that God would measure out to him, or impart to him, such favor that this desire of his heart would be realized. On the phrase mercy and truth, see the notes at <sup><250></sup>Psalm 25:10; 57:3,10.

Which may preserve him They will preserve him. That is, the manifestation of such mercy and truth would make his permanent occupancy of his throne on earth, and his ultimate reception into heaven, secure.

<sup><608></sup>Psalm 61:8. So will I sing praise unto thy name for ever As the result of this gracious interposition. Compare the notes at <sup><330></sup>Isaiah 38:20. The meaning is, that he would do this constantly. It would be the regular business of his life.

That I may daily perform my vows The solemn promises which I have made in my exile; the purposes which I have expressed to devote myself to thee. Or, the language may have been used in a more general sense, denoting that, as a religious man, the vows of God were constantly on him, or that he had pledged himself to serve God faithfully and always, and that he could better perform this duty at the tabernacle — in the place consecrated to public worship — than he could in exile. He desired, therefore, to be restored to the sanctuary, that he might keep up the performance of the daily duties of religion without interruption or hindrance. The whole psalm indicates a fervent desire to be engaged in the worship and service of God; a desire to be with Him and to enjoy His favor on earth; a confident hope that he would be permitted to enjoy His presence forever.

APPENDIX NOTES ON PSALM 61

The question may be asked, whether David composed the psalm for any particular occasion, or merely for his own comfort, and that of his successors on the throne, in disastrous times, and for the purpose of confirming the courage of his subjects. In favor of the first view, we have the clause, “from the ends of the earth,” which would seem to intimate that the psalmist was at the time in exile, and that therefore the psalm must have been composed during the rebellion of Absalom, when David was beyond Jordan. Compare <sup><916></sup>Psalm 42:6. This special occasion, however, must not lead us to lose sight of the general reference. It could only be by keeping this reference in view that David issued the psalm for public use. The psalm, even in our days, has its complete use, inasmuch as the promises in 2 Samuel 7 have undoubtedly their complete fulfillment in Christ. Generally, whenever the kingdom of Christ is in danger, we may, in addition to other considerations, plead with God as the psalmist does, on the ground also of this particular promise which he there made. — Hengstenberg.

<sup><916></sup>Psalm 61:6. Thou wilt prolong the king's life ... David cannot be considered as using these words of gratulation with an exclusive reference to himself. It is true that he lived to an extreme old age, and died full of days, leaving the kingdom in a settled condition, and in the hands of his son, who succeeded him; but he did not exceed the period of one man's life, and the greater part of it was spent in continual dangers and anxieties. There can be no doubt, therefore, that the series of years, and even ages, of which he speaks, extends prospectively to the coming of Christ, it being the very condition of the kingdom, as I have often remarked, that God maintained them as one people under one head, or, when scattered, united them again. The same succession still subsists in reference to ourselves. Christ must be viewed as living in his members to the end of the world. To this Isaiah alludes when he says, “Who shall declare his generation or age?” Words in which he predicts that the church would survive through all ages, notwithstanding the incessant danger of destruction to which it is exposed through the attacks of its enemies, and the many storms assailing it. So here David foretells the uninterrupted succession of the kingdom down to the time of Christ. — Calvin.

<sup><916></sup>Psalm 61:6,7. These words must be applied to Him of whom it was said by the angel,

“The Lord God shall give unto him the throne of his father David, and he shall reign over the house of Jacob forever, and of his kingdom there shall be no end,” <sup><916></sup>Luke 1:32.

The ancient church prayed for “his” exaltation and glory, under those of his representative; nay, the Chaldee paraphrast expounds this passage of Messiah only: “Thou shalt add days to the days of King Messias; his years shall be as the generation of this world, and of the world to come.” Nor can a better paraphrase be easily devised. — Horne.

NOTES ON PSALM 62

On the phrase in the title to this psalm, “To the chief Musician,” see the notes at the title to Psalm 4. On the expression “To Jeduthun,” see the notes at the title to Psalm 39. Jeduthun was one of those who were appointed by David to preside over the music of the tabernacle (~~1351~~1 Chronicles 25:1-3), but it is impossible now to determine why this psalm, and the others where his name is found in the title (Psalm 39; Psalm 77), were dedicated to him, or committed to his special care. The psalm is, in the title, ascribed to David as the author, but we have no certain knowledge on what occasion it was composed. Its contents agree well with the common supposition that it is to be referred to the time of Absalom, and to the troubles which David experienced in his rebellion.

The psalm, apparently for musical purposes only, is divided into three parts, the divisions being indicated by the word Selah, ~~1951~~Psalm 62:4,8. Another division is indicated in the original by the recurrence of the word ~~1389~~Ēāæ — “truly” — at the beginning of ~~1951~~Psalm 62:1,4,5,6,9, as if the mind of the author had been greatly impressed with the importance of the particular sentiment introduced by that word.

The general purpose of the psalm is to lead people to trust in God. The contents are as follows:

- I. A statement of the humble trust of the author in God — trust in him as his only hope — as his rock and his refuge, ~~1951~~Psalm 62:1,2.
- II. A description of his enemies and of their designs. They devised mischief; they sought to cast down others from their high places; they delighted in falsehood; they made great pretensions of friendship, but they were false in heart, ~~1951~~Psalm 62:3,4.
- III. A renewed expression of the confidence of the psalmist in God — repeating what he had said in ~~1951~~Psalm 62:1,2 — and reaffirming his entire trust in the divine protection, ~~1951~~Psalm 62:5-7.
- IV. An exhortation to others to trust in God, and not in people; whether people of high or low condition; to trust in nothing else than God: not in power — the power of oppression; not in the robbery of others, or that which was obtained from others by violence; not in riches, in whatever way they might have been acquired, <sup><1918></sup>Psalm 62:8-10.

V. Reasons for trusting in God, <sup><1921></sup>Psalm 62:11,12.

(a) All power belongs to him, <sup><1921></sup>Psalm 62:11.

(b) He is merciful or kind, <sup><1922></sup>Psalm 62:12.

<sup><1918></sup>Psalm 62:1. Truly Indeed; really. The state of mind indicated by this particle is that of one who had been seriously contemplating a subject; who had looked round on his own actual condition; who had taken an estimate of all his resources, and of all his means of reliance, and who had carefully examined his own state of mind to see what was his real trust, and what were his real feelings toward God. Having done all this, he, at last, breaks out with the expression — “My soul does sincerely confide in God; I have no other resource; I have no power to meet my foes, and I am sure — my inmost soul testifies — that my real trust is, where it ought to be, in God; I see nothing in myself on which to rely; I see so much crime, falsehood, treachery in people, that I cannot confide in them; I have had so much painful experience of their insincerity and baseness that I cannot rely on them; but I do see that in God which leads me to trust in him, and I am sure that my heart truly does rely on him.”

My soul waiteth upon God Margin, is silent. Septuagint, “Is not my soul subject to God?” So the Latin Vulgate. Luther, “My soul is still (calm) in God.” The Hebrew word — <sup>hYmWD<1747></sup> — means “silence, quiet, rest”; and then, a silent expectation or hope. The idea here is, “Truly toward God is the silent waiting of my soul”; that is, “In him alone do I trust; there is calmness of mind; I have no apprehension as to what can happen. My mind is at peace, for I feel that all is in the hands of God, and that lie is worthy of entire trust and confidence.” The feeling is that which exists when we have entrusted all to God; when, having entire confidence in his power, his goodness, his wisdom, his mercy, we commit the whole case to him as if it were no longer our own. Such is the calmness — the peace — the quiet — the silence of the soul — when all is left with God. See the notes at <sup><2318></sup>Isaiah 26:3, and <sup><1046></sup>Philippians 4:6,7.

From him cometh my salvation That is, My safety is from him; my security is with him. It is true, also, that all that is ever implied in this word salvation, whether pertaining to this life or the life to come, is derived from God.

◀981▶ Psalm 62:2. He only is my rock ... See the notes at ▶982▶ Psalm 18:2.

I shall not be greatly moved The word greatly here, or much — “I shall not be much moved,” implies that he did not anticipate perfect security from danger or calamity; he did not suppose that he would escape all disaster or trouble, but he felt that no great evil would befall him, that his most important interests were safe, and that he would be ultimately secure. He would be restored to his home and his throne, and would be favored with future peace and tranquility. None of us can hope wholly to escape calamity in this life. It is enough if we can be assured that our great interests will be ultimately secured; that we shall be safe at last in the heavenly world. Having that confidence the soul may be, and should be, calm; and we need little apprehend what will occur in this world.

◀983▶ Psalm 62:3. How long will ye imagine mischief against a man? The original word here rendered “imagine mischief,” from t t b e <sup>h2050</sup>, occurs only in this place. It means, according to Gesenius (Lexicon), to break in upon; to set upon; to assail: “How long will ye break in upon a man?” that is, set upon him. So the Septuagint, and the Latin Vulgate. It does not refer to their merely forming purposes of mischief against a man, but to their making assaults upon him; to their endeavoring to take his life or to destroy him. The address here is to the enemies of David, and the language would apply well to the attempts made upon his life by Absalom and his followers. The question here is, “how long” they would continue to do this; how long they would show this determined purpose to take his life; whether they would never cease thus to persecute him. They had already done it long; they had showed great perseverance in this course of wickedness; and he asks whether it would never come to an end? Who these persons were he does not intimate; but there can be no great danger of mistake in referring the description to Absalom and his adherents.

Ye shall be slain all of you Prof. Alexander renders this entire passage, “Will ye murder (that is, seek to murder him) all of you (combined against a single person, who is consequently) like wall inclined (or bent by violence), fence (or hedge) crushed (broken down).” So, substantially, DeWette renders it. Those who thus interpret the passage give it an active signification, meaning that his enemies pressed upon him, like a wall that was bent by violence, or a fence that was likely to fall on one. The original word rendered “ye shall be slain,” י × אֵפֶ <sup>17523</sup>, is in the active form (Piel), and cannot without violence be rendered in the passive, as it is in our translation. But the active form may still be retained, and a consistent meaning be given to the whole passage without the forced meaning put on it in the rendering by Prof. Alexander. It is not natural to speak of enemies as so coming on a man as to make him like a falling wall, or a tottering fence. The evident idea is, that they themselves would be as a falling wall; that is, that they would be defeated or disappointed in their purpose, as a wall that has no solid foundation tumbles to the ground. The meaning of the original may be thus expressed: “How long will ye assail a man, that ye may put him to death? All of you shall be as a bowing wall,” etc. That is, You will not accomplish your design; you will fail in your enterprise, as a wall without strength falls to the ground.

As a bowing wall A wall that bows out, or swells out; a wall that may fall at any moment. See the notes at <sup>2303</sup>Isaiah 30:13.

And as a tottering fence A fence that is ready to fall; that has no firmness. So it would be with them. Their purposes would suddenly give way, as a fence does when the posts are rotted off, and when there is nothing to support it.

<sup>661</sup>Psalm 62:4. They only consult to cast him down from his excellency This is the object of all their counsels and plans. They aim at one high in rank — and their purpose, their sole purpose, is to bring him down. This would apply well to the case of David in the time of the rebellion of Absalom.

They delight in lies In false pretences; in secret plans of evil; in hypocritical assurances. This was eminently true of Absalom, who made use of these arts to seduce the people from allegiance to his father. <sup>4050</sup>2 Samuel 15:1-6.

They bless with their mouth, but they curse inwardly They profess true attachment and zeal, but they are traitors at heart. See the notes at <sup>4203</sup>Psalm 28:3. This, too, would apply well to the conduct of Absalom and those associated with him.

Psalm 62:5. My soul, wait thou only upon God See the notes at Psalm 62:1. There is, in the word used here, and rendered wait, the same idea of rest or repose which occurs in verse 1. The meaning is, that he would commit the whole cause to God, and that his soul would thus be calm and without apprehension.

For my expectation is from him In Psalm 62:1, this is salvation. The idea here is, that all that he expected or hoped for must come from God. He did not rely on his fellow men; he did not rely on himself. God alone could deliver him, and he confidently believed that God would do it. Often are we in such circumstances that we feel that our only “expectation” — our only hope — is in God. All our strength fails; all our resources are exhausted; our fellow-men cannot or will not aid us; our own efforts seem to be vain; our plans are frustrated, and we are shut up to the conclusion that God alone can help us. How often is this felt by a Christian parent in regard to the conversion of his children. All his own efforts seem to be vain; all that he says is powerless; his hopes, long-cherished, are disappointed; his very prayers seem not to be heard; and he is made to feel that his only hope is in God — a sovereign God — and that the whole case must be left in His hands. This state of mind, when it is fully reached, is often all that is needful in order that our desires may be granted. It is desirable that this state of mind should be produced; and when it is produced, the prayer is answered.

Psalm 62:6. He only is my rock ... See the notes at Psalm 62:2. The only difference between this verse and Psalm 62:2 is, that in this verse the word “greatly” is omitted. The psalmist declares here in the most absolute manner, that he shall not be “moved” at all. In Psalm 62:2, he said that he would not be “greatly moved;” his mind would not be much or materially disturbed. The language here indicates more entire confidence — more certain conviction — showing that the slight apprehension or fear which existed in the beginning of the psalm, had been wholly dissipated, and that his mind had become perfectly calm.

Psalm 62:7. In God is my salvation See Psalm 62:1. That is, his salvation, his safety, his anticipated deliverance, was to come only from God.

And my glory That in which I glory or boast; the source of all in me that is glorious or honorable. he gloried that there was such a God; he gloried that He was his God.

The rock of my strength The strong rock; the refuge that cannot be successfully assailed; where I shall feel strong and secure. See the notes at <sup><BIB></sup>Psalm 18:2.

My refuge That to which I may flee for safety. See the notes at <sup><BIB></sup>Psalm 46:1.

<sup><BIB></sup>Psalm 62:8. Trust in him at all times This exhortation, addressed to all persons, in all circumstances, and at all times, is founded on the personal experience of the psalmist, and on the views which he had of the character of God, as worthy of universal confidence. David had found him worthy of such confidence; he now exhorts all others to make the same trial, and to put their trust in God in like manner. What he had found God to be, all others would find him to be. His own experience of God's goodness and mercy — of his gracious interposition in the time of trouble — had been such that he could confidently exhort all others, in similar circumstances, to make the same trial of his love.

Ye people, pour out your heart before him All people. On the meaning of the phrase "pour out your heart," see the notes at <sup><BIB></sup>Psalm 42:4. The idea is, that the heart becomes tender and soft, so that its feelings and desires flow out as water, and all its emotions, all its wishes, its sorrows, its troubles, are poured out before God. All that is in our hearts may be made known to God. There is not a desire which he cannot gratify; not a trouble in which he cannot relieve us; not a danger in which he cannot defend us. And, in like manner there is not a spiritual want in which he will not feel a deep interest, nor a danger to our souls from which he will not be ready to deliver us. Much more freely than to any earthly parent — to a father, or even to a mother — may we make mention of all our troubles, little or great, before God.

God is a refuge for us For all. For one as well as another. He is the only refuge; he is all the refuge that we need.

<sup><BIB></sup>Psalm 62:9. Surely men of low degree are vanity literally, "vanity are the sons of Adam," but the word Adam here is used evidently to represent men, or the race. The same word is also employed particularly to represent common men, or men of the humbler rank, in contradistinction to the word vvai<sup>h376></sup> — which is the other word used here, and rendered “men of high degree.” Compare, for this use of the word, <sup><3017></sup>Hosea 6:7. The same antithesis between the two words is found in <sup><2119></sup>Isaiah 2:9; 5:15. The idea here is, that in the great matters which pertain to us, we cannot depend on men, and that our hope — our trust — must be in God. Of men of the humbler or lower classes, it is said that they are “vanity;” that is, they are like a vain, empty, unsubstantial thing. They cannot help us. It is useless to rely on them when we most need aid.

Men of high degree are a lie Men of exalted rank, kings, princes, nobles. This does not refer to their personal character, as if they were always false, deceitful, treacherous; but the idea is, that any prospect of protection or aid from men of rank and station — front any power which they wield — is unworthy to be relied on. It is not that which we need; it is not that on which we can depend.

To be laid in the balance literally, “In the scales to go up;” that is, they are seen to go up, or to show how light they are. They have no real weight; no real value. On the scales or balance, see the notes at <sup><2172></sup>Daniel 5:27.

They are altogether lighter than vanity They are all vain; single or combined, they have no power to save us. The meaning is not that if these two ranks of persons were weighed against each other they would both be found to be vanity; but that it is true of each and every rank of men — high and low — whether single or combined — that, as weighed against our interests and needs, they are nothing. All the kings of the earth with all their hosts of war, all princes and nobles with all that they can summon from the lower ranks of their people, cannot save one soul from death — cannot deliver us from the consequences of our transgressions. God, and God alone, can do this.

<sup><9210></sup>Psalm 62:10. Trust not in oppression The general meaning here is, that we are not to trust in anything but God. In the previous verse the psalmist had stated reasons why we should not trust in men of any rank. In this verse he enumerates several things on which people are accustomed to rely, or in which they place confidence, and he says that we should put no confidence in them in respect to the help which we need, or the great objects which are to be accomplished by us. The first thing mentioned is oppression; and the idea is, that we must not hope to accomplish our object by oppressing others; extorting their property or their service; making them by force subject to us, and subservient to our wishes. Many do this. Conquerors do it. Tyrants do it. The owners of slaves do it.

And become not vain in robbery That is, Do not resort to theft or robbery, and depend on that for what is needed in life. Many do. The great robbers of the world — conquerors — have done it. Thieves and burglars do it. People who seek to defraud others of their earnings do it. They who withhold wages from laborers, and they who cheat in trade, do it.

If riches increase, set not your heart upon them If you become rich without oppression, or without robbery. If your riches seem to grow of themselves — for that is the meaning of the original word (compare <sup><4012></sup>Mark 4:2) — do not rely on them as being all that you require. People are prone to do this. The rich man confides in his wealth, and supposes that he has all he needs. The psalmist says that none of these things constitute the true reliance of man. None of them can supply his real needs; none can defend him in the great perils of his existence; none can save his soul. He needs, over and above all these, a God and Saviour; and it is such a God and Saviour only that can meet the real needs of his nature.

<sup><4921></sup>Psalm 62:11. God hath spoken once; twice have I heard this This repetition, or this declaration that he had heard the thing repeated, is designed to give emphasis to what was said, or to call attention to it as particularly worthy of notice. See the notes at <sup><4934></sup>Job 33:14. Compare <sup><4915></sup>Job 40:5. The sentiment here is particularly important, or is deserving of special attention, because, as the psalmist had shown, all other resources fail, and confidence is to be placed in nothing else for that which man so much needs; neither in people, whether of low degree or high (<sup><4919></sup>Psalm 62:9); not in oppressive acts — acts of mere power; not in plunder; not in wealth, however acquired, <sup><4920></sup>Psalm 62:10.

That power belongeth unto God Margin, strength. The idea is, that the strength which man needs — the ability to defend and to save him — is to be found in God. All else may fail, but the power of God will not fail. The result of all, therefore, should be to lead us to put our trust in God alone.

<sup><4922></sup>Psalm 62:12. Also unto thee, O Lord, belongeth mercy Power, indeed, belongs to God (<sup><4921></sup>Psalm 62:11); but this is an attribute to be feared, and while, in one respect, it will inspire confidence, or while it gives us the assurance that God is able to defend us when all else shall fail, yet, unattended by any other attribute, it might produce only apprehension and alarm. What man, weak and sinful man, needs to know is not merely that God has almighty power, but how that power will be wielded, or with what other attributes it is combined; whether it will be put forth to destroy or to save; to kill or to keep alive; to crush or to uphold. Man, therefore, needs the assurance that God is a benevolent Being, as really as that he is a powerful Being; that he is disposed to show mercy; that his power will be put forth in behalf of those who confide in him, and not employed against them. Hence, the attribute of mercy is so essential to a proper conception of God; and hence, the psalm so appropriately closes by a reference to his mercy and compassion.

For thou renderest to every man according to his work As this stands in our version, it would seem that the psalmist regarded what is here referred to as a manifestation of mercy. Yet the “rendering to every man according to his work” is an act of justice rather than of mercy. It is probable, therefore, that the word rendered “for” — yKI<sup>th3588</sup> — does not refer here to either of the attributes mentioned exclusively — either power or mercy — but is to be understood with reference to the general course of argument in the psalm, as adapted to lead to confidence in God. The fact that he is a God who will deal impartially with mankind, or who will regard what is right and proper to be done in view of the characters of mankind, is a reason why they should confide in God — since there could be no just ground of confidence in a Being who is not thus impartial and just. All these combined — power, mercy, equity — constitute a reason why people should confide in God. If either of these were missing in the divine character, man could have no confidence in God. If these things do exist in God, unlimited confidence may be placed in him as having all needful power to save; as being so merciful that sinful people may trust in him; and as being so just and equal in his dealings that all may feel that it is right to repose confidence in a Being by whom all the interests of the universe will be secured. Compare <sup><6100></sup>1 John 1:9.

APPENDIX NOTES ON PSALM 62

<sup><6975></sup>Psalm 62:5. My soul, wait thou only upon God Calvin renders, “Nevertheless, my soul, be thou silent before God,” and remarks that “here there may appear to be a slight inconsistency, inasmuch as he encourages himself to do what he had already declared himself to have done. His soul was silent before God; and where the necessity of this new silence, as if still under agitation of spirit? Here it is to be remembered that our minds can never be expected to reach such perfect composure as shall preclude every inward feeling of disquietude, but are at the best as the sea before a light breeze, fluctuating sensibly, though not swollen into billows. It is not without a struggle that the saint can compose his mind; and we can very well understand how David should enjoin more perfect submission upon a spirit which was already submissive, urging upon himself further advancement in this grace of silence until he had mortified every carnal inclination, and thoroughly subjected himself to the will of God. How often, besides, will Satan renew the disquietudes which seemed to be effectually expelled? Creatures of such instability, and liable to be borne away by a thousand different influences, we need to be confirmed again and again. I repeat that there is no reason to be surprised, though David here calls upon himself a second time to preserve that silence before God which he might already appear to have attained, for, amidst the disturbing motions of the flesh, perfect composure is what we never reach. The danger is that when new winds of trouble spring up, we lose that inward tranquility which we enjoyed; and hence, the necessity of improving the example of David by establishing ourselves in it more and more. He adds the ground of his silence. He had no immediate response from God, but he confidently hoped in him. My expectation, he says, is from God. Never, as if he had said, will he frustrate the patient waiting of his saints; doubtless my silence shall meet with its reward; I shall restrain myself, and not make that false haste which will only retard my deliverance.”

⌘ Psalm 62:11,12. Power belongeth unto God also ... mercy The man who disciplines himself to the contemplation: of these two attributes, which ought never to be dissociated in our minds from the idea of God, is certain to stand erect and immovable under the fiercest assaults of temptation; while, on the other hand, by losing sight of the all-sufficiency of God (which we are too apt to do), we lay ourselves open to be overwhelmed in the first encounter. The world's opinion of God is, that he sits in heaven an idle and unconcerned spectator of events which are passing. Need we wonder that people tremble under every casualty when they thus believe themselves to be the sport of blind chance? There can be no security felt unless we satisfy ourselves of the truth of a divine superintendence, and can commit our lives, and all that we have, to the hands of God. The first thing which we must look to is his power, that we may have a through conviction of his being a sure refuge to such as cast themselves upon his care. With this there must be conjoined confidence in his mercy, to prevent those anxious thoughts which might otherwise rise in our minds. These may suggest the doubt, What though God govern the world? does it follow that he will concern himself about such unworthy objects as ourselves? There is an obvious reason, then, for the psalmist coupling these two things together, his power and his clemency. They are the two wings wherewith we fly upward to heaven; the two pillars on which we rest, and may defy the surges of temptation. Does danger, in short, spring up from any quarter, then just let us call to remembrance that divine power which can bid away all harms, and as this sentiment prevails in our minds, our troubles cannot fail to fall prostrate before it. Why should we fear? how can we be afraid, when the God who covers us with the shadow of his wings, is the same who rules the universe with his nod, holds in secret chains the devil and all the wicked, and effectually overrules their designs and intrigues? — Calvin.

NOTES ON PSALM 63

This psalm purports to be a “psalm of David,” and there can be no just ground of doubt in regard to the correctness of the title in this respect. DeWette indeed supposes that the way in which mention is made of the “king” in <sup><1931></sup>Psalm 63:11, seems to indicate that the psalm was not composed by David himself, but that it was written by some friend of his, who was his companion in the troubles which he experienced; but it is not necessary to resort to this supposition, for it is not very uncommon for an author to refer to himself in the third person, as Caesar does everywhere. The psalm further purports to have been composed by David “when he was in the wilderness of Judah.” The “wilderness of Judah” was that wild and uncultivated tract of country lying on the east side of the territory of the tribe of Judah, commonly called “the wilderness of Judea” (<sup><1911></sup>Matthew 3:1; compare the notes at <sup><1941></sup>Matthew 4:1), lying along the Jordan. David was repeatedly driven into that wilderness in the time of Saul; and the general structure of the psalm would accord well with any one of those occasions; but the mention of the “king” in <sup><1931></sup>Psalm 63:11, as undoubtedly meaning David, makes it necessary to refer the composition of the psalm to a later period in his life, since the title “king” was not given to him in the time of Saul. The psalm, therefore, was doubtless composed in the time of Absalom — the period when David was driven away by the rebellion, and compelled to seek a refuge in that wilderness. It belongs, if this view is correct, to the same period in the life of David as Psalm 42; 43; 61; and probably some others.

The psalm consists of the following parts:

- I. An expression of earnest desire to see the power and glory of God again, as he had formerly done in the sanctuary, <sup><1931></sup>Psalm 63:1,2.
- II. His sense of the goodness of God, and of the value of the divine favor, as being greater than that of life; and his purpose to find his happiness in God, and to praise and bless him in all situations, especially in those moments of solemn meditation when he was alone upon his bed, <sup><1931></sup>Psalm 63:3-6.
- III. His remembrance of former mercies, and his conviction that God still upheld him by his right hand, <sup><1931></sup>Psalm 63:7,8.

IV. His firm belief that all his enemies would be destroyed, <sup><8530></sup>Psalm 63:9-11.

Early will I seek thee The word used here has reference to the early dawn, or the morning; and the noun which is derived from the verb, means the aurora, the dawn, the morning. The proper idea, therefore, would be that of seeking God in the morning, or the early dawn; that is, as the first thing in the day. Compare the notes at <sup><2300></sup>Isaiah 26:9. The meaning here is, that he would seek God as the first thing in the day; first in his plans and purposes; first in all things. He would seek God before other things came in to distract and divert his attention; he would seek God when he formed his plans for the day, and before other influences came in, to control and direct him. The favor of God was the supreme desire of his heart, and that desire would be indicated by his making him the earliest — the first — object of his search. His first thoughts — his best thoughts — therefore, he resolved should be given to God. A desire to seek God as the first object in life — in youth — in each returning day — at the beginning of each year, season, month, week — in all our plans and enterprises — is one of the most certain evidences of true piety; and religion flourishes most in the soul, and flourishes only in the soul, when we make God the first object of our affections and desires.

My soul thirsteth for thee See the notes at <sup><BR></sup>Psalm 42:2.

My flesh longeth for thee All my passions and desires — my whole nature. The two words — “soul” and “flesh,” are designed to embrace the entire man, and to express the idea that he longed supremely for God; that all his desires, whether springing directly from the soul, or the needs of the body, rose to God as the only source from which they could be gratified.

In a dry and thirsty land That is, As one longs for water in a parched desert, so my soul longs for God. The word thirsty is in the margin, as in Hebrew, weary. The idea is that of a land where, from its parched nature — its barrenness — its rocks — its heat — its desolation — one would be faint and weary on a journey.

Where no water is No running streams; no gushing fountains; nothing to allay the thirst.

<sup><BR></sup>Psalm 63:2. To see thy power and thy glory The reference here is to what was manifested of the presence and the power of God in the services of public worship; the praises, the prayers, the rejoicings, the evidences of the divine presence.

So as I have seen thee in the sanctuary At the tabernacle, amidst the solemn services of divine worship. There seems to be no reason for supposing that he here refers to the mere external pomp and splendor of public worship, but he doubtless includes the power of the divine presence which he had felt in such services on his own soul. As applied now to a place of Christian worship, it may be observed that there are nowhere more striking exhibitions of the Tower of God on earth than those which occur in such a place, especially in a revival of religion. The scene on the day of Pentecost was as striking an exhibition of the power of God as that which goes forth in the fury of the storm, in the raging of the ocean, or in the guidance of the heavenly bodies. Nothing can so well express what occurs in such a scene as the words “power” and “glory;” nothing shows more certainly the power of God than that influence which bows down haughty sinners, and makes them humble; which produces a deep stillness and awe in the assembled multitudes; which extorts the cry, “Men and brethren, what must we do to be saved?” which makes hardened men weep, and men long addicted to habits of sin willing to abandon their iniquities, and turn to God: and nothing shows more clearly the “glory” of God than that power, that grace, that mercy, which thus turns multitudes from the ways of sin and death, and directs their feet into the path of peace and salvation. They who have ever witnessed the power of God in a revival of religion, will ever afterward long to see again “the power and glory” of God, as they “have seen” it “in the sanctuary.”

Psalm 63:3. Because thy loving-kindness is better than life Thy favor; thy mercy. This is of more value than life; more to be desired than life. Life is the most valued and valuable thing pertaining to this world which we can possess. See the notes at Job 2:4. But, above this, David valued the favor and friendship of God. If one or the other was to be sacrificed, he preferred that it should be his life; he would be willing to exchange that for the favor of God. Life was not desirable, life furnished no comforts — no joys — without the divine favor.

*“My life itself, without Thy love,
No taste of pleasure could afford;
‘Twould but a tiresome burden prove,
If I were banished from the Lord.”*

My lips shall praise thee That is either

(a) because of this loving-kindness; because I have this trust in thy character; or

(b) because thou wilt restore me to the place of public worship, and I shall be permitted again to praise thee.

Probably the latter is the true idea.

Psalm 63:4. Thus will I bless thee while I live In my life; or, as long as life lasts, will I praise thee. The word “thus” refers to the sentiment in the previous verse, meaning that as the result of his deep sense of the value of the loving kindness of God, he would praise him through all the remainder of his life, or would never cease to praise him. A true purpose of serving God embraces the whole of this life, and the whole of eternity. He who loves God, and who has any proper sense of his mercy, does not anticipate a time when he will cease to praise and bless him, or when he will have any desire or wish not to be engaged in his service.

I will lift up my hands in thy name In solemn prayer and praise. See the notes at <sup><481B></sup>Psalm 28:2.

<sup><491B></sup>Psalm 63:5. My soul shall be satisfied See the notes at <sup><491B></sup>Psalm 36:8. The idea is, that his soul now longed for the service of God as one who is hungry longs for food, or as one who is thirsty longs for drink; and that the time would come when this longing desire would be satisfied. He would engage in the service of God as he desired to do; he would be permitted to enjoy that service without interruption.

As with marrow and fatness See the notes at <sup><491B></sup>Psalm 36:8. The words here employed denote rich food; and the comparison is between the pleasure of serving God, and the satisfaction derived from food when one is hungry. It is not uncommon to compare the pleasures of religion with a feast or banquet. Compare <sup><231B></sup>Isaiah 25:6.

And my mouth shall praise thee with joyful lips Lips full of joy; or, which give utterance to the joy of the heart.

<sup><491B></sup>Psalm 63:6. When I remember thee upon my bed See the notes at <sup><491B></sup>Psalm 42:8. That is, when I lie down at night; when I compose myself to sleep. Nothing can be more proper than that our last thoughts, as we sink into quiet slumber, should be of God; of his being, his character, his mercy, his loving-kindness; of the dealings of his providence, and the manifestations of his grace toward us, during the day; and nothing is better suited to compose the mind to rest, and to induce quiet and gentle slumber, than the calmness of soul which arises from the idea of an Infinite God, and from confidence in him. Often when restless on our beds — when nothing else will lull the body to rest, the thought of God — the contemplation of his greatness, his mercy, and his love — the sweet sense of an assurance of his favor will soothe us, and cause us to sink into gentle repose. So it may be — so it will be — when we are about to sleep the long sleep of death, for then the most appropriate thoughts — the thoughts that will best prepare us for that long sleep — will be thoughts of God.

And meditate on thee in the night-watches See the notes at <sup><491B></sup>Psalm 1:2. The word watches here refers to the ancient divisions of the night for municipal or military purposes — periods of the night assigned to different persons to keep watch around a camp or city. The most common division of the night was into three parts, though the arrangement varied at different times. See <sup><4145></sup>Matthew 14:25; <sup><4128></sup>Luke 12:38.

<977> Psalm 63:7. Because thou hast been my help Because thou hast interposed to defend me in danger. The idea is, that he had experienced the divine interposition in times of danger, and that this was a reason why he should still confide in God. The argument is, that God's mercy and favor in the past is a reason why we should confide in him in time to come.

Therefore in the shadow of thy wings will I rejoice Under the shadow or protection of thy wings will I feel safe. See the notes at <978> Psalm 17:8. Compare <980> Psalm 36:7; 57:1; 61:4.

<978> Psalm 63:8. My soul followeth hard after thee The word used here — q̄bæ<sup>sh1692</sup> — means properly to cleave to; to adhere; to be glued to; to stick fast. Then it means to attach oneself to anything; and then, to pursue or follow after. The idea here is that of adhering to, or cleaving to; and the meaning is, that the psalmist adhered firmly to God, as pieces of wood glued together adhere to each other; that he, as it were, stuck fast to him; that he would not leave him or be separated from him. The language represents the feelings of true piety in adhering firmly and constantly to God, whatever there may be that tends to separate us from him. The adhesion of bodies by glue is a striking but not an adequate representation of the firmness with which the soul adheres to God. Portions of matter held together by glue may be separated; the soul of the true believer never can be separated from God.

Thy right hand upholdeth me The right hand is that by which we accomplish anything; and, by constant use, is stronger than the left hand. Hence, the expression is equivalent to saying that God upheld him with all his strength. The meaning is, that God sustained him in life; defended him in danger; kept him from the power of his enemies.

<980> Psalm 63:9. But those that seek my soul to destroy it Who seek my life; who endeavor to kill me. This language would well describe the purposes of Absalom and his followers.

Shall go into the lower parts of the earth Shall descend into the earth; into the deepest graves. He would live; but they would perish.

<980> Psalm 63:10. They shall fall by the sword Margin, They shall make him run out like water by the hands of the sword. The word rendered in the text "they shall fall," and in the margin "they shall make him run out" — r̄gæ<sup>sh064</sup> — means properly, to flow, to pour out, as water; and then, to pour out; then, to give up or deliver. The idea here is that of delivering over, as one pours out water from a basin or pitcher: they shall be delivered over to the sword. The original rendered “sword” is, as in the margin, “by the hands of the sword;” that is, the sword is represented as accomplishing its purpose as if it had hands. The sword shall slay them.

They shall be a portion for foxes The original word — I [WV<sup>-31776</sup>] — means properly and commonly a fox. But under this general name fox, the Orientals seem to have comprehended other animals also, having some resemblance to a fox, and particularly jackals. Thus jackals seem to be meant in <sup><07134></sup>Judges 15:4; since foxes are with great difficulty taken alive; and in this place also it has the same meaning, inasmuch as foxes do not feast on dead bodies, though a favorite repast of the jackal. Gesenius, Lexicon. Compare Bochart Hieroz. T. ii. p. 190, ed. Lips. Jackals are wild, fierce, savage; they howl around dwellings at night — producing most hideous music, beginning — and ready to gather at any moment when there is prey to be devoured. “These sinister, guilty, wo-begone brutes, when pressed with hunger, gather in gangs among the graves, and yell in rage, and fight like fiends over their midnight orgies; but on the battlefield is their great carnival. Oh! let me never even dream that anyone dear to me has fallen by the sword, and lies there to be torn, and gnawed at, and dragged about by these hideous howlers.”

“in a sort of solo, a low, long-drawn wail, rising and swelling higher and higher until it quite overtops the wind,” (Thomson’s “Land and the Book,” i. 133)

<sup><0681></sup>Psalm 63:11. But the king shall rejoice in God This passage, as was remarked in the Introduction to the psalm, shows that this psalm could not have been composed in the time of Saul, since the title king was not then given to David. The use of the term here in the third person does not prove that the psalm could not have been written by David himself, for he may have spoken of himself simply as “the king,” and all the more forcibly and properly as he was driven unjustly from his throne, and was now an exile, yet was still a king — the king. The title was his; the throne belonged to him, and not to Absalom who had driven him from it. It was not improper to allude to this fact in the manner in which it is referred to here, and to say that “the king” — the true, the real king — himself — should and would rejoice in God. He would find God to be his helper; and by God he would yet be restored to his throne.

Every one that sweareth by him shall glory Everyone that sweareth to him, or maintains his oath of allegiance to him, shall be honored.

But the mouth of them that speak lies All who have sworn falsely; all who have professed allegiance and have proved unfaithful; all those who, contrary to their oaths and their obligations, have been found in the rebellion. They shall not be permitted to exult or rejoice, but they shall be confounded and silenced. This expresses, therefore, the fullest confidence in God; the absolute belief of David that he would be again placed on his throne, and again permitted “to see the power and glory of God as” he had “seen it in the sanctuary” (<sup>1967B</sup>Psalm 63:2); the belief that he would be restored to prosperity, and that his enemies would be humbled and destroyed — So it will be with all who put their trust in God. There is certain joy and triumph for them, if not in this world, at least in the world to come.

APPENDIX NOTES ON PSALM 63

It may have been near the Dead Sea, on his way to the ford of Jordan, that the psalmist first sang this song. It is a psalm first heard by David’s faithful ones in the wilderness of Judah; but truly a psalm for every godly man who in the dry world-wilderness can sing, “All my springs are in thee” — a psalm for David — a psalm for David’s Son — a psalm for the church in every age — a psalm for every member of the church in the weary land: What assurance, what vehement desire, what soul-filling delight in God, in God alone — in God the only fountain of living water amid a boundless wilderness! Hope, too, has its visions here, for it sees the ungodly perish, <sup>1967B</sup>Psalm 63:8-10, and the King on the throne surrounded by a company who swear allegiance to Yahweh. Hope sees for itself what <sup>2601</sup>Isaiah 64:16 describes — every mouth “swearing by the God of truth;” and what <sup><617></sup>Revelation 21:27 has foretold, the mouth of “liars” closed forever — all who sought other gods, and trusted to other saviours, gone forever. And when we read all this as spoken of Christ, how much does every verse become enhanced? His thirst for God! His vision of God! His estimate of God’s loving-kindness! His soul satisfied! His mouth full of praise! His soul following hard after God!

“O God, thou art my El” — mighty one. Thou art my omnipotence. It is this God he still seeks. The <sup><3651></sup>Ke of <sup><617></sup>Psalm 63:2 and of <sup><617></sup>Psalm 63:4 is interesting. In <sup><617></sup>Psalm 63:2 the force of it is this, “No wonder that I so thirst for thee; no wonder that my first thoughts at morning are toward thee: no wonder that my very flesh longeth for thee! Who would not that has seen what I have seen? So have I gazed on thee in the sanctuary, seeing thy power and thy glory!” The “so” is like <sup><617></sup>2 Peter 1:17, “such a voice!” And then if the past has been thus exquisitely blessed, my prospects for the future are not less so. I see illimitable bliss coming in as a tide; “so will I bless thee while I have being!” <sup><617></sup>Psalm 63:4. Yes; in ages to come, as well as in many a happy moment on earth, my soul shall be satiated as with marrow and with fatness! And when <sup><617></sup>Psalm 63:7 shows us the soul under the shadow of God’s wings, rejoicing, we may say, it is not only like as “the bird sheltered from the heat of the sun amid the rich foliage sings its merry note,” but it is the soul reposing there as if entering the cloud of glory, like Moses and Elias.

*O world! come and see the Righteous
One finding water-springs in God. — A. A. Bonar.*

Psalm 63 is a sunny one, although it comes from the darkest period of David’s life. It embalms for the solace of God’s people the sentiments that filled the psalmist’s heart when Absalom’s revolt drove him into the wilderness of Judah. In the day of his distress his soul turns to God as his true portion, and he finds ineffable enjoyment in communing with him. How deeply does the psalmist realize the presence of God — of a personal God — to whom he can speak, whom his heart can trust! How entirely is he persuaded that he may behold, and has often beheld, God’s power and glory; and that this beholding of “the beauty of the Lord” is the proper felicity of his soul. It ought not to be thought to derogate from the sincerity or value of this profession of faith, or of the similar professions uttered in the psalms formerly cited, that they were elicited by sharp afflictions and temptations. When we are surrounded with the lights of a city, the stars are unheeded; but when those nearer lights are extinguished, the stars shine out and fill the eye with a superior delight. It is just so with God's people. In a prosperous time earthly enjoyments are apt so to occupy the thoughts and affections as to turn them aside from God. He is accustomed accordingly to send on his people afflictions and temptations in order to drive them in upon their proper portion, and thus to fill their souls with the deep and tranquil enjoyment which it alone yields. — Binnie.

The psalm is aptly described by Clauss as

“a precious confession of a soul thirsting after God and his grace, and finding itself quickened through inward communion with him, and which knows how to commit its outward lot also into his hand.”

Its lesson is, that the consciousness of communion with God in trouble is the sure pledge of deliverance. This is the special fountain of consolation which is opened up to the sufferer in the psalm. The Berleb. Bible describes it as a psalm “which proceeds from a spirit really in earnest. It was the favorite psalm of M. Schade, the famous preacher in Berlin, which he daily prayed with such earnestness and appropriation to himself that it was impossible to hear it without emotion.” — Hengstenberg.

Psalm 63:1. A dry and thirsty land ... The more recent expositors consider the residence in the wilderness and the being weary as a mere figure, descriptive of a miserable condition. This in itself is possible; but the parallel passage in Samuel shows that we must abide by the literal rendering. The particular feature, however, is not to be viewed by itself, but as symptomatic and descriptive of the whole condition in which the psalmist was placed. For this it was singularly suited: a king who could not get even a drink of water to quench his thirst! All human fountains of consolation and happiness were dried up to the psalmist. But he thirsts all the more earnestly after the divine fountain which still remained open to him. It is by this that he is known as a child of God. When the children of the world are in a dry land, and are wearied and without water, the last remains of any desire after God disappear from their souls. But real piety in proportion to the severity of personal suffering becomes all the more intense in its longings after God. By the extent to which a man in severe sufferings can say, "I seek thee," etc., may he decide on the state of his soul. — Hengstenberg.

NOTES ON PSALM 64

This psalm is described as a “psalm of David,” and it bears internal evidence that it was composed by him, as it contains first, a prayer for deliverance from enemies (<sup><B64></sup>Psalm 64:1-6); and second, a confident expectation of deliverance, <sup><B64></sup>Psalm 64:7-10; a form of structure found in many of the psalms written by David. It is addressed, or dedicated, as many others are, “To the chief Musician.” This fact shows that it was not designed as an expression of mere private feeling, but was intended to be employed in the worship of God. See the notes at the Introduction to Psalm 4.

The occasion on which this psalm was composed is unknown. In its general structure and character, it bears a strong resemblance to Psalm 58. Indeed, many of the expressions in the two psalms are the same, and it would seem probable that it was composed with reference to the same occasion, or that the circumstances in the two cases were so similar as to make the same expressions in the main appropriate. The occasion may have been, either the times of persecution under Saul, or the rebellion of Absalom. Perhaps we may suppose, without impropriety, that the former psalm (Psalm 58) was composed in the time of Saul, and this in the time of Absalom, and that the circumstances in the two cases were so similar, that the author found the same phraseology which he had used on the former occasion to be appropriate to his present position, or that his feelings were so identical now with what they were then, that he naturally expressed himself in substantially the same language.

The psalm, as observed above, is composed of two parts:

- I. A prayer for deliverance from his enemies, with a description of their character, <sup><B64></sup>Psalm 64:1-6.
- II. An expression of confident expectation that his prayer would be answered, and that God would interpose in his behalf, <sup><B64></sup>Psalm 64:7-10.

<sup><B64></sup>Psalm 64:1. Hear my voice, O God, in my prayer The use of the word voice here would seem to imply that this was audible prayer, or that, though alone, he gave utterance to his petitions aloud. We have this same use of the word often in the Psalms, making it probable that even private prayers were uttered in an audible manner. In most cases, when there is no danger of being overheard, or of its being construed as ostentation or Pharisaism, this is favorable to the spirit of secret devotion. Compare the notes at <sup><2160></sup>Daniel 6:10. The word here rendered prayer means properly speech, discourse; then, complaint; then, meditation. It is most commonly rendered complaint. See <sup><1873></sup>Job 7:13; 9:27; 10:1; 21:4; <sup><1882></sup>Psalms 55:2 (Notes); Psalm 102 (Title); <sup><1472></sup>Psalms 142:2. It refers here to a state of mind caused by trouble and danger, when the deep meditation on his troubles and dangers found expression in audible words — whether those words were complaint or petition. As there are no indications in the psalm that David was disposed to complain in the sense of blaming God, the proper interpretation here is that his deep meditations took the form of prayer.

Preserve my life from fear of the enemy Either Saul or Absalom. He prayed that his life might be made so secure that he would not have occasion to be afraid of his enemy.

<sup><1842></sup>Psalm 64:2. Hide me Or, more literally, thou wilt hide me. There is both an implied prayer that this might be done, and a confident belief that it would be done. The idea is, Protect me; guard me; make me safe — as one is who is hidden or concealed so that his enemies cannot find him.

From the secret counsel The word used here — <sup><15475></sup>dws — means properly couch, cushion; and then, a divan, a circle of friends sitting together on couches for familiar conversation, or for counsel. See the notes at <sup><19214></sup>Psalms 25:14; 55:14; compare <sup><18158></sup>Job 15:8; 29:4. Here the reference is to the consultations of his enemies for the purpose of doing him wrong. Of course, as they took this counsel together, he could not know it, and the word secret is not improperly applied to it. The idea here is, that although he did not know what that counsel or purpose was, or what was the result of their consultations, yet God knew, and he could guard him against it.

Of the wicked Not the wicked in general, but his particular foes who were endeavoring to destroy him. Luther renders this, “from the assembling of the wicked.”

From the insurrection The word used here — <sup><17285></sup>vgr — means properly a “noisy crowd, a multitude.” The allusion is to such a crowd, such a disorderly and violent rabble, as constituted a mob. He was in danger not only from the secret purposes of the more calm and thoughtful of his enemies who were plotting against him, but from the excited passions of the multitude, and thus his life was in double danger. If he escaped the one, he had no security that he would escape the other. So the Redeemer was exposed to a double danger. There was the danger arising from the secret plottings of the Scribes and Pharisees assembled in council, and there was also the danger arising from the infuriated passions of the multitude. The former calmly laid the plan for putting him to death by a judicial trial; the others took up stones to stone him, or cried, “Crucify him, crucify him!” The word insurrection here does not well express the idea. The word tumult would better represent the meaning of the original.

Of the workers of iniquity That is, of those who were arrayed against him.

Psalm 64:3. Who whet their tongue like a sword Who sharpen their tongue; that is, they utter words that will cut deep, or penetrate the soul. The idea is that of slander or reproach — the same idea which we have in Shakespeare (Cymbeline):

“’Tis slander; Whose edge is sharper than the sword.”

This comparison is a favorite one with David. Compare Psalm 52:2; 57:4; 59:7.

And bend their bows ... That is, they prepare for this — as they make ready to shoot who bend their bows, and fix their arrows on the string. The idea here is, that this was deliberate, or was the result of counsel and purpose. It was not an outbreak of mere passion and excitement; it was by fixed design and careful preparation. See the notes at Psalm 11:2; 58:7.

Even bitter words We apply the same term bitter now to words of malice and reproach.

Psalm 64:4. That they may shoot in secret From an unobserved quarter; from a place where they are so concealed that it cannot be known where the arrows come from. There was a purpose to ruin him, and at the same time to conceal themselves, or not to let him know from what source the ruin came. It was not an open and manly fight, where he could see his enemy, but it was a warfare with a concealed foe.

At the perfect At the upright; at one who is perfect so far as his treatment of them is concerned. Compare the notes at Psalm 18:20,23.

Suddenly do they shoot at him At an unexpected time, and from an unlooked-for quarter. They accomplish what they intended; they carry out their design.

And fear not They feel confident that they are not known, and that they will not be detected. They have no fear of God or man. Compare <sup><1959></sup>Psalm 55:19.

<sup><1965></sup>Psalm 64:5. They encourage themselves literally, they strengthen themselves, or make themselves strong. That is, they take counsel; they encourage each other; they urge one another forward; they suggest to each other methods by which what they purpose may be done, and by which difficulties may be overcome. This was a part of their “secret counsel” or their consultation, <sup><1941></sup>Psalm 64:2.

In an evil matter Margin, as in Hebrew, speech. The reference is to their purpose or plan. They strengthen themselves for doing what they know to be a wrong or wicked thing.

They commune literally, they tell or speak. That is, they tell each other how it may be done, or suggest different methods by which it may be successfully accomplished. They compare views, that they may select that which will be most likely to be successful. All this indicates plan, consultation, design.

Of laying snares privily Margin, as in Hebrew, to hide snares. This is a figure derived from the method of taking wild beasts. See the notes at <sup><1975></sup>Psalm 7:15; 38:12. The reference here is to some secret plan by which they intended that the author of the psalm should be entrapped and ruined. It was not a plan of open and manly warfare, but a purpose to destroy him when he would have no opportunity of defense.

They say, Who shall see them? That is, who will see the snares or pit-falls? Who will be aware of their existence? They sought to make the plan so secret that no one could discover it, or even suspect it; to keep it so concealed that he for whom it was intended could not be put on his guard. Compare <sup><1908></sup>Psalm 10:8,9.

when one searches for treasure, or for anything that is hidden or lost — implying a deep and close attention of the mind to the subject. So here they examined every plan, or every way which was suggested to them, by which they could hope to accomplish their purpose.

They accomplish This would be better translated by rendering it, “We have perfected it!” That is, We have found it out; it is complete; meaning that they had found a plan to their liking. It is the language of self-congratulation.

A diligent search Or rather, “The search is a deep search.” In other words, “The plan is a consummate plan; it is just to our mind; it is exactly what we have sought to find.” This, too, is language of self-congratulation and satisfaction at the plan which they had thought of, and which was so exactly to their mind.

Both the inward thought literally, the inside; that is, the hidden design.

And the heart The plan formed in the heart; the secret purpose.

Is deep A deep-laid scheme; a plan that indicates profound thought; a purpose that is the result of consummate sagacity. This is the language of the author of the psalm. He admitted that there had been great talent and skill in the formation of the plan. Hence, it was that he cried so earnestly to God.

Psalm 64:7. But God shall shoot at them with an arrow That is, Instead of their being able to carry out their purposes of shooting the arrows which they had prepared against others, God will shoot his arrows against them. The tables will be turned. They themselves will experience what they had intended to inflict on others. God will deal with them as they intended to deal with others. The sentiment here is substantially the same as in <sup><9075></sup>Psalm 7:15; see the notes at that passage. It is also in accordance with what we often find in the writings of David, when in the close of a psalm he expresses a confident expectation that the prayer which he had offered in the beginning would be heard, or rejoices in the assurance that he had been heard. The idea, also, is involved in this part of the psalm that God will deal with men as they purpose to deal with others; that is, according to their true character. Compare the notes at <sup><9125></sup>Psalm 18:25,26.

Suddenly shall they be wounded Margin, their wound shall be. The Hebrew is, “Suddenly shall be their wounds.” The idea is, that the wounds in the case would be theirs; and would be inflicted suddenly. The blows which they thought to give to others would come on themselves, and this would occur at an unexpected moment.

Psalm 64:8. So they shall make their own tongue to fall upon themselves In verse 3, their tongue is represented as a sword; and here, keeping up the figure, the tongue, as a sword, is represented as falling on them, or as inflicting the wound on themselves which they had intended to inflict on others. This might be rendered, “And they have cast him down; upon them is their own tongue;” or, “Upon them their own tongue has come.” That is, someone would cast them down, and they would fall as if smitten by their own tongue like a sword. It is not said who would do this, but the most natural interpretation is that it would be done by God. The idea is, that the instrument which they had employed to injure others would be the means of their own ruin.

All that see them shall flee away Compare Psalm 31:11. That is, they shall flee in consternation from those who are so fearfully overthrown. They shall see that God is just, and that He will punish the wicked; and they will desire to escape from a ruin so dreadful as that which comes upon the ungodly. The idea is, that when God punishes sinners, the effect on others is, and should be, to lead them to wish not to be associated with such people, but to escape from a doom so fearful.

Psalm 64:9. And all men shall fear That is, a deep impression would be made, not only on the associates and companions of the wicked, but on all that should hear of what was done. People, in view of the just punishment of the wicked, would learn to reverence God, and to stand in awe of One so powerful and so just. Judgments, punishment, wrath, are adapted and designed to make a deep impression on mankind. On this principle, the final punishment of the wicked will make a deep and salutary impression on the universe FOREVER.

And shall declare the work of God Shall make it known to others. It will become a subject of conversation, or they will talk about it, as illustrating the divine perfections and character. Such should always be the effect of the judgments of God, for they illustrate his true character; they make known his attributes; they convey to the world lessons of the utmost importance. Nothing is more proper than to talk about the judgments of God, and to endeavor to derive from them the instructions which they are adapted to convey about the divine nature, and the principles of the administration under which the universe is placed. Wars, pestilences, famines, earthquakes, conflagrations, inundations, diseases, all teach important lessons about God; and each one bears its own special message to mankind.

For they shall wisely consider of his doing They shall attentively and carefully consider it; they shall endeavor to derive such lessons from his dealings as they are suited to convey. In other words, an attentive consideration of his doings will contribute to maintain a just knowledge of world in subjection to him. God is thus always speaking to human beings; and nothing is more proper for human beings than to give their minds to a careful consideration of what is really intended to be taught us by the events which are occurring in his providential dealings.

Psalm 64:10. The righteous shall be glad in the LORD, and shall trust in him That is, As the result of his gracious intervention, or as the effect of his judgments on the wicked, the righteous will rejoice on account of their own security, and put their trust in One who has thus shown himself to be the friend of holiness, and the enemy of sin. Whatever tends to reveal the divine character, or to make a proper exhibition of that character, will also lead good people to confide in God, and to feel that they are safe.

And all the upright in heart shall glory Shall rejoice; shall feel that they have cause for trust and triumph. The good — the pure — the righteous — the godly — will always rejoice in everything which tends to show that God is just, and true, and holy; — for all their own hope of security and salvation rests upon the fact that the God in whom they trust is a righteous God.

NOTES ON PSALM 65

This also purports to be a psalm of David. It is dedicated to “the chief Musician,” or committed to him to be set to appropriate music for the public worship of God. See the notes at the Introduction to Psalm 4. It is described as both “a psalm,” and “a song.” It is not easy to account for this double appellation, or to distinguish between the meaning of these words, though probably the real distinction is that the former word — psalm — refers to that to which it is applied, considered merely as a poem or composition; the latter — song — is applied with reference to its being sung in public worship. See Introduction to Psalm 48.

Though the psalm is ascribed to David, and though there is nothing in its general character which is inconsistent with this supposition, yet it has been maintained by DeWette and some others that the expressions in <sup><3950></sup>Psalm 65:4 demonstrate that the psalm was composed after the temple was erected. The ground of this supposition is, that the words “courts,” “house,” and “holy temple,” occurring in that verse, are applicable only to the temple. This, however, is not decisive, for all these words may have been used in reference to the tabernacle, or to the tent which David erected on Mount Zion (<sup><4400></sup>2 Chronicles 1:4), and where he was accustomed to worship. Compare the notes at <sup><3950></sup>Psalm 65:4. If this is so, then there is nothing to forbid the supposition that the psalm was composed by David. Compare also the notes at <sup><3950></sup>Psalm 65:1.

The occasion on which it was written is not indicated in the title, and it is impossible now to determine it. It would seem from the psalm itself to have been composed after a copious and much-needed rain, perhaps after a long drought, when the earth was again refreshed by showers from heaven. The language, however, is of so general character that it may have had no particular reference to any recent event in the time of the psalmist, but may have been suggested, like Psalm 104, by a general contemplation of the power and the beneficence of God as manifested in his providential dealings. Possibly it may have been a song composed for some annual occasion, recounting the acts of God in the revolving seasons of the year — the general reasons which his people had to praise him. It evidently refers to some public solemnity — some acts of praise to be rendered to God in his house (<sup><1951></sup>Psalm 65:1,4), and would be eminently appropriate when his people approached him in an annual thanksgiving.

The contents of the psalm are as follows:

I. The blessedness of praising God, or of coming before him, in his house, with the language of prayer and praise, <sup><1951></sup>Psalm 65:1-4.

(a) Praise “waits” for God;

(b) he is the hearer of prayer;

(c) he alone can cleanse the soul from sin;

(d) it is a blessed privilege to be permitted to come before him, and to dwell in his courts.

II. The things for which he is to be praised, <sup><1951></sup>Psalm 65:5-13.

(1) He is to be praised for the exhibitions of his power, or as the Almighty God; as one who answers the prayers of his people by heavy judgments; as one who shows that all may have confidence in him, on the earth and on the sea; as one who makes the mountains firm, who stills the noise of the waves, who calms the tumults of the people, who displays the tokens of his power everywhere, and makes the outgoings of the morning and evening to rejoice, <sup><1951></sup>Psalm 65:5-8.

(2) For his beneficence, especially in sending down refreshing rains upon the earth, and causing the grain to spring up, the grass to grow, and the hills to rejoice on every side, <sup><1951></sup>Psalm 65:9-13.

<sup><1951></sup>Psalm 65:1. Praise waiteth for thee, O God, in Sion That is, all the arrangements are made; the people are assembled; their hearts are prepared to praise thee. The fact that Zion is mentioned here as the seat of praise would seem to imply that this psalm was composed before the building of the temple, contrary to the opinion of DeWette and others, as noticed in the Introduction to the psalm, for after the building of the temple the seat of worship was transferred from Mount Zion, where David had placed the ark and prepared a tent for it (<sup><1350></sup>1 Chronicles 15:1; 16:1; <sup><4001></sup>2 Chronicles 1:4), to Mount Moriah. It is true that the general name Zion was given familiarly to Jerusalem as a city, but it is also true that the particular place for the worship of God in the time of David was Mount Zion strictly so called. See the notes at <sup><1951></sup>Psalm 2:6. The margin in this place is, “Praise is silent.” The Hebrew is, “To thee is silence-praise,” — a kind of compound phrase, not meaning “silent praise,” but referring to a condition where everything is ready; where the preparations have been entirely made; where the noise usually attendant on preparation has ceased, and all is in readiness as if waiting for that for which the arrangements had been carried forward. The noise of building — of preparation — was now hushed, and all was calm. The language here would also denote the state of feeling in an individual or an assembly, when the heart was prepared for praise; when it was filled with a deep sense of the majesty and goodness of God; when all feelings of anxiety were calmed down, or were in a state of rest; when the soul was ready to burst forth in expressions of thanksgiving, and nothing would meet its needs but praise.

And unto thee shall the vow be performed See the notes at <sup>4925</sup>Psalm 22:25; 50:14; 56:12. The reference here is to the vows or promises which the people had made in view of the manifested judgments of God and the proofs of his goodness. Those vows they were now ready to carry out in expressions of praise.

<sup>4926</sup>Psalm 65:2. O thou that hearest prayer Who hast revealed thyself as a God hearing prayer — one of the leading characteristics of whose nature it is that thou dost hear prayer. Literally, “Hearer of prayer, to thee shall all flesh come.” Nothing as applied even to God is more sublime and beautiful than the appellative “Hearer of prayer.” Nothing in his attributes is of more interest and importance to man. Nothing more indicates his condescension and goodness; nothing so much encourages us in the endeavor to overcome our sins, to do good, to save our souls, and to save the souls of others. Dark and dismal would this world be, if God did not hear prayer; gloomy, inexpressibly gloomy, would be the prospects of man, if he had not the assurance that God is a prayer-hearing God — if he might not come to God at all times with the assurance that it is his very nature to hear prayer, and that his ear is ever open to the cries of the guilty, the suffering, the sad, the troubled, the dying.

Unto thee shall all flesh come That is, all people — for the word is here used evidently to denote mankind. The idea is, that there is no other resource for man, no other help, no other refuge, but the God that hears prayer. No other being can meet his actual needs; and those needs are to be met only in connection with prayer. All people are permitted to come thus to God; all have need of his favor; all must perish unless, in answer to prayer, he interposes and saves the soul. It is also true that the period will arrive on earth when all flesh — all people — will come to God and worship him; when, instead of the scattered few who now approach him, all nations, all the dwellers on continents and islands, will worship him; will look to him in trouble; will acknowledge him as God; will supplicate his favor.

Psalm 65:3. Iniquities prevail against me Margin, as in Hebrew, Words, or matters of iniquities. The literal meaning is words; and the idea may be that words spoken in iniquity, or slanderous words spoken by others, prevailed against him. The phrase, however, is susceptible of the interpretation which refers it to iniquity itself; meaning the matter of iniquity — the thing — iniquity itself — as if that overcame him, or got the mastery of him. The psalmist here, in his own name, seems to represent the people who thus approached God, for the psalm refers to the worship of an assembly or a congregation. The idea is, that when they thus came before God; when they had prepared all things for his praise (Psalm 65:1); when they approached him in an attitude of prayer, they were so bowed down under a load of transgression — a weight of sin — as to hinder their easy access to his throne. They were so conscious of unworthiness; their sin had such an effect on their minds; it rendered them so dull, cold, and stupid, that they could not find access to the throne of God. How often do the people of God find this to be the case!

As for our transgressions, thou shalt purge them away That is, In reference to these very transgressions or iniquities that now press us down, thou wilt remove them. The language expresses the rising confidence and hope of the worshippers that God would not allow those transgressions so to prevail as to prevent their worshipping God acceptably. Heavy as was the burden of sin, and much as the consciousness of guilt tended to impede their worship, yet they felt assured that God would so remove their transgressions that they might have access to his mercy-seat. The word rendered “purge away” — rp̄k<sup>45722</sup> — is the word which is commonly rendered “to atone for,” or which is used to represent the idea of atonement. See the notes at Isaiah 43:3. The word has here the sense of cleansing or purifying, but it always carries with it, in the Scriptures, a reference to that through which the heart is cleansed — the atonement, or the expiatory offering made for sin. The language here expresses the feeling which all may have, and should have, and which very many do have, when they approach God, that, although they are deeply conscious of sin, God will so graciously remove the guilt of sin, and lift off the burden, cleansing the soul by his grace, as to make it not improper that we should approach him, and that he will enable us to do it with peace, and joy, and hope. Compare the notes at <sup><455D></sup>Psalm 51:2.

<sup><464A></sup>Psalm 65:4. Blessed is the man whom thou chooseth That is, Happy is the man; or, “Oh, the happiness of the man whom thou dost thus permit to approach thee.” The construction here in the Hebrew is the same as in <sup><400B></sup>Psalm 1:1. See the notes at that passage. The word chooseth refers to the fact that true piety regards all such blessings as the result of the divine favor; the fruit of his electing grace and love. Compare the notes at <sup><400B></sup>Ephesians 1:3,4; <sup><400D></sup>1 Peter 1:2,3. We approach God with confidence, with the spirit of true worshippers, with the spirit of his children, only as he inclines us to him, and calls us to partake of his favor. Compare <sup><464A></sup>John 6:44.

And causeth to approach unto thee That is, that he may worship thee. The idea is here recognized in the word “causeth,” that it is only by a divine influence that people are led to worship God. The cause — the efficient reason — why any man worships his Maker at all, is to be found in God himself. This idea is fairly implied in the form of the word as it is used in the Hebrew.

That he may dwell in thy courts That is, either temporarily for the purpose of worship; or permanently, that he may serve thee in the sanctuary. See the notes at <sup><423B></sup>Psalm 23:6; 27:4. Compare <sup><495B></sup>Psalm 15:1. The word “courts” refers properly to the area around the tabernacle or the temple, and not to the tabernacle or temple itself. The worship of the people was offered in those courts, and not in the tabernacle or temple. See the notes at <sup><421D></sup>Matthew 21:12.

We shall be satisfied with the goodness of thy house Our souls will find thus what they need; what they long for. See the notes at <sup><498B></sup>Psalm 36:8. It is the nature of religion to satisfy the mind; that is, the soul finds in religion what meets its needs, for religion leaves no necessity of its nature unsupplied. It may be added that nothing else will do this but religion. The word “house” here denotes a place where God dwells, and it might be applied to the temple, as it often is in the Scriptures (compare <sup><230B></sup>Isaiah 2:3; 56:7; <sup><421B></sup>Matthew 21:13; <sup><41117></sup>Mark 11:17; <sup><42944></sup>Luke 19:44; <sup><4326></sup>John 2:16; et al.); or to the tabernacle, before the temple was reared. <sup><494B></sup>Psalm 42:4; <sup><1176></sup>Matthew 12:4; <sup><1783></sup>Judges 18:31; 20:18,26,31. The reference here is to the tabernacle or tent which David reared on Mount Zion, and where the worship of God was celebrated before the temple was built. “Even of thy holy temple.” The word “temple” is most commonly applied in the Scriptures to the structure which Solomon built for the worship of God; and it is on the ground that the Word is usually so applied, that DeWette and others have argued that this psalm could not have been written by David, but that it was composed after the temple was reared. But the word rendered “temple” — <sup><1964></sup>I kyhe — is a word of so general a character that it may be applied to any house erected for the worship of God. It is not unfrequently applied to the tabernacle. See the notes at <sup><1877></sup>Psalm 5:7. This psalm, therefore, may have been composed while the tabernacle was standing, and before the temple was built, and hence, may have been composed by David, as the title intimates.

That is, By things suited to inspire us and all people with awe, or with a deep sense of thy majesty, thy power, and thy glory. The answer to their prayers would be in such a manner as deeply to impress their minds and hearts. God’s judgments on his foes, and the manner of his manifesting his favor to his people, would be such as to impress the mind with a deep sense of his own greatness. Yet all this would be in righteousness; in the infliction of a just sentence on the wicked; in direct interposition in favor of the righteous. The judgments of God on guilty people have been always such as to keep the world in awe; such as were adapted deeply to impress mankind with a sense of his own majesty and glory.

O God of our salvation The God on whom our salvation, or our safety depends.

Who art the confidence of all the ends of the earth Of all parts of the earth, the word “ends” being used on the supposition that the earth is a plain having appropriate limits. This allusion is often found in the Scriptures, the sacred writers speaking, as all men do, as things appear to be. Thus all philosophers, as well as other people, speak of the sun as rising and setting, which is, in itself, no more strictly accurate than it is to speak of the earth as if it had limits or boundaries. The word confidence as used here means that God is the source of trust, or, that all proper reliance, by all people, in all parts of the earth and on the sea, must be in him; that is, that there is no other on whom people can properly rely. It does not mean that all people actually repose such confidence in him, which would not be true — but that he is the only true source of confidence.

And of them that are afar off upon the sea That is, of all men on sea and land. The seaman has no other source of security amidst the dangers of the deep than God. Compare <sup><39A73></sup>Psalm 107:23-30. The language does not mean that all mariners actually do put their trust in God, but that they cannot confide in the winds and the waves — in the strength of their vessel — or their own power or skill in managing it — but that the true and only ground of trust is God.

<sup><39B16></sup>Psalm 65:6. Which by his strength setteth fast the mountains Fixing them firm on their foundations. This is an exhibition of vast strength or power on the part of God, as if he fixed them so firm that they could not be moved — as if he handled with ease those vast masses of matter, with all their rocks and forests — and caused them to repose steadily and calmly on their foundations. We have few more exalted conceptions of the power of God than to suppose him lifting with ease a vast mountain; letting it down where he pleases, and settling it so firmly that it cannot be moved.

Being girded with power That is, they seemed to be surrounded or encompassed with power, as a man girds himself up when he wishes to put forth a great effort of strength.

<sup><39B17></sup>Psalm 65:7. Which stilleth the noise of the seas He calms the seas when they have been agitated by the storm. He causes the mighty waves to settle down, and the whole surface of the ocean becomes calm and smooth. The storm subsides at his command, and the sea is still. It was the manifestation of this power which demonstrated so clearly the divinity of the Lord Jesus, when he said to the troubled waves, “Peace, be still, and the wind ceased, and there was a great calm.” <sup><40E9></sup>Mark 4:39. Compare <sup><39A73></sup>Psalm 107:29.

The noise of their waves The loud roar of the waters, so that they are still.

And the tumult of the people The raging; the fury; the excitement of assembled multitudes, resembling the raging waves of the ocean. This comparison is very common. See <sup><23712></sup>Isaiah 17:12,13. Compare the notes at <sup><6816></sup>Revelation 19:6. This is perhaps a more striking and wonderful exhibition of the power of God than that of calming down the waves of the ocean. In the one case, it is the exertion of mere power on nature, acting through its established laws, and where there is no resistance of will; in the other, it is power exerted over the will; power over agents conscious that they are free, and where the worst passions meet and mingle and rage.

Psalm 65:8. They also that dwell in the utter-most parts That is, Those who dwell in the remotest regions; far from civilized lands; far from those places where people are instructed as to the causes of the events which occur, and as to the being and character of the great God who performs these wonders. The idea is, that even they see enough of the evidences of the divine presence and power to fill their minds with awe. In other words, there are in all lands evidences of the Divine existence and might. There is enough to fill the minds of people with awe, and to make them solemn.

Are afraid Thus the thunder, the storm, the tempest, the earthquake, the eclipse of the sun or the moon, fill the minds of barbarous nations with terror.

At thy tokens Or signs. That is, the signs which really indicate the existence, the presence, and the power of God.

Thou makest the outgoings The word rendered outgoings means properly a going forth, as of the rising of the sun (Psalm 19:7); and then, a place of going forth, or from which anything goes forth, as a gate or door (Ezekiel 42:11), or fountains from which water issues (Isaiah 41:18); and hence, the east, where the sun seems to come forth from his hiding-place. The representation here is that the morning seems to come forth, or that the rays of light stream out from the east; and, in like manner, that the fading light of the evening — the twilight — seems to come from the west.

Of the morning and evening to rejoice The allusion is to the east and the west. The sun in his rising and his setting seems to rejoice; that is, he appears happy, bright, cheerful. The margin is to sing — a poetic expression indicating exultation and joy.

Psalm 65:9. Thou visitest the earth God seems to come down that he may attend to the needs of the earth; survey the condition of things; arrange for the welfare of the world which he has made; and supply the needs of those whom he has created to dwell upon it. See the notes at Psalm 8:4.

And waterest it Margin, After thou hadst made it to desire rain. This difference between the translations in the text and in the margin can be accounted for by the various meanings of the original word. The Hebrew term — qww<sup><1778></sup> — means properly:

- (a) to run;
- (b) to run after anything, to desire, to look for;
- (c) to run over, to overflow; and then,
- (d) to cause to overflow.

The meaning here evidently is, he drenched the earth, or caused the water to run abundantly. The reference is to a copious rain after a drought.

Thou greatly enrichest it That is, Thou givest to it abundance; thou pourest water upon it in such quantities, and in such a manner, as to make it rich in its productions.

With the river of God A river so abundant and full that it seems to come from God; it is such as we should expect to flow from a Being infinite in resources and in benevolence. Anything great is in the Scriptures often described as belonging to God, or his name is added to it to denote its greatness. Thus, hills of God mean lofty hills; cedars of God, lofty cedars, etc.

Which is full of water The waters are so abundant that it seems as if they must come from God.

Thou preparest them corn Grain. Thou givest to those who cultivate the earth an abundant harvest.

When thou hast so provided for it Or rather, When thou hast thus prepared the earth, to wit, by sending down abundant rains upon it. God prepares the earth to bear an abundant harvest, and then he gives that harvest. The preparation of the earth for the harvest, and then the giving of the harvest, are alike from him. The harvest could not be without the previous rain, and neither the rain nor the harvest could be without God. He does not create a harvest by miracle, but follows the order which he has himself ordained, and has respect to his own laws.

Psalm 65:10. Thou waterest the ridges thereof abundantly Or rather, its furrows, for so the Hebrew word properly means. <sup><8513></sup>Job 31:38; 39:10. The allusion is to the furrows made by the plow, which are filled with water by the rains.

Thou settlest the furrows thereof Or rather, thou beatest down the ridges thereof. Literally, thou makest them to descend. That is, The rain — falling on them — beats them down, so that the ground becomes level.

Thou makest it soft with showers Margin, thou dissolvest it. The idea is, to soften, to loosen, to make the soil light and open. All farmers know that this is necessary, and that it cannot be done without water.

Thou blessest the springing thereof Or, what springs from it; the vegetation. Thou dost bless it by causing it to grow luxuriantly, thus producing an abundant harvest.

Psalm 65:11. Thou crownest the year with thy goodness Margin, the year of thy goodness. The Hebrew is literally the year of thy goodness — meaning a year remarkable for the manifestation of kindness; or a year of abundant productions. But the Hebrew will admit of the other construction, meaning that God crowns or adorns the year, as it revolves, with his goodness; or that the harvests, the fruits, the flowers of the year are, as it were, a crown set on the head of the year. The Septuagint renders it, “Thou wilt bless the crown of the year of thy goodness.” DeWette renders it, “Thou crownest the year with thy blessing.” Luther, “Thou crownest the year with good.” On the whole, the most probable meaning is that expressed in our common version, referring to the beauty and the abundant productions of the year as if they were a crown on its head. The seasons are often personified, and the year is here represented as a beautiful female, perhaps, walking forward with a diadem on her brow.

And thy paths drop fatness That is, fertility; or, Fertility attends thy goings. The word rendered “drop,” means properly to distil; to let fall gently, as the rain or the dew falls to the earth; and the idea is, that wherever God goes, marching through the earth, fertility, beauty, abundance seems to distil or to fall gently along his path. God, in the advancing seasons, passes along through the earth, and rich abundance springs up wherever he goes.

Psalm 65:12. They drop upon the pastures of the wilderness The waste places, or the waste parts of the land; the uncultivated places, the places of rocks and sands. The word wilderness in the Scriptures does not mean, as with us, a tract of country covered with trees, but a place of barren rocks or sands — an uncultivated or thinly inhabited region. See the notes at <sup>(108)</sup>Matthew 3:1; <sup>(280)</sup>Isaiah 35:1. In those wastes, however, there would be valleys, or places watered by springs and streams that would afford pastures for flocks and herds. Such are the “pastures of the wilderness” referred to here. God’s passing along those valleys would seem to “drop,” or distil, fertility and beauty, causing grass and flowers to spring up in abundance, and clothing them with luxuriance.

And the little hills rejoice on every side Margin, as in Hebrew, are girded with joy. That is, Joyful, happy scenes surround them; or, they seem to be full of joy and happiness. The valleys and the hills alike seem to be made glad. The following remarks of Professor Hackett (“Illustrations of Scripture,” p. 30), will explain this passage.

“Another peculiarity of the desert is that, though the soil is sandy, it rarely consists, for successive days together, of mere sand; it is interspersed, at frequent intervals, with clumps of coarse grass and low shrubs, affording very good pasturage, not only for camels, the proper tenants of the desert, but for sheep and goats. The people of the villages on the borders of the desert are accustomed to lead forth their flocks to the pastures found there. We frequently passed on our way shepherds so employed; and it was interesting to observe as a verification of what is implied in the Saviour’s statement (<sup>(425)</sup>Matthew 25:33), that the sheep and goats were not kept distinct, but intermixed with one another. The shepherds not only frequent the parts of the desert near their places of abode, but go often to a considerable distance from them; they remain absent for weeks and months, only changing their station from time to time, as their needs in respect to water and herbage may require. The incident related of Moses shows that the pastoral habits of the people were the same in his day: ‘Now Moses kept the flock of Jethro, his father-in-law, the priest of Midian; and he led the flock to the further part of the desert, even to Horeb,’ <sup>(108)</sup>Exodus 3:1. It is of the desert in this sense, as supplying to some extent the means of pasturage, that the prophet Joel speaks in <sup>(201)</sup>Joel 1:19; 2:22. The psalmist also says (<sup>(452)</sup>Psalms 65:12,13), with the same reference:

*Thou crownest the year with thy goodness,
And thy paths drop fatness;
They drop fatness on the pastures of the wilderness.*

Psalm 65:13. The pastures are clothed with flocks The flocks stand so thick together, and are spread so far, that they seem to be a clothing for the pasture; or, the fields are entirely covered with them.

The valleys also are covered over with corn With grain. That is, the parts of the land — the fertile valleys — which are devoted to tillage. They are covered over, or clothed with waving grain, as the pasture-fields are with flocks.

They shout for joy, they also sing They seem to be full of joy and happiness. What a beautiful image is this! How well does it express the loveliness of nature; how appropriately does it describe the goodness of God! Everything seems to be happy; to be full of song; and all this is to be traced to the goodness of God, as it all serves to express that goodness. Strange that there should be an atheist in such a world as this; — strange that there should be an unhappy man; — strange that amidst such beauties, while all nature joins in rejoicing and praise — pastures, cultivated fields, valleys, hills — there can be found a human being who, instead of uniting in the language of joy, makes himself miserable by attempting to cherish the feeling that God is not good!

APPENDIX NOTES ON PSALM 65

The object of the psalm is announced in the concluding verse. It should be sung when “the flocks are covered with lambs, and the valleys are clothed with corn.” Hence, the whole, from Psalm 65:1-8, is to be considered as an introduction. We are led to the same result, by observing that it is only the goodness of God, as seen in the blessings of harvest, that is dwelt upon at length, while everything else is touched upon briefly and slightly; that the whole psalm ends with such a special delineation without returning to those general views with which it opened; and finally, that the ninth verse, with which the description of harvest begins, is of such disproportionate length as to show that in it the psalmist enters for the first time upon his proper subject ...

Although the psalm refers to the harvest, yet it is incorrect to maintain that it is especially a song of thanksgiving for harvest, and especially to suppose that it was sung at the passover, on the second day of which the first-fruits were presented in the temple, upon which harvest began. Luther says more correctly: he thanks God for “good weather and a propitious season.” It was intended to be sung when favorable appearances had presented themselves in reference to the harvest, when God had given the former and the latter rain in their seasons, <sup><2492></sup>Jeremiah 5:24, and when, in consequence of this, everything was flourishing and growing luxuriantly. This is manifest from the concluding verse, according to which, the psalm was intended to be sung at a time when the valleys are clothing themselves with grain (not have been clothed), and from <sup><1951></sup>Psalms 65:9,10, where the psalmist speaks of rain as if he saw it just descending. Hitzig has taken altogether a wrong view, according to whom, the psalm was composed for the feast of tabernacles, “when the fruits of the earth had been gathered in, and the seed, recently committed to the ground, was waiting for the early rain.” — Hengstenberg.

<sup><1951></sup>Psalm 65:2. Thou that hearest prayer The title here given to God carries with it a truth of great importance, That the answer of our prayers is secured by the fact, that in rejecting them he would in a certain sense deny his own nature. The psalmist does not say, that God has heard prayer in this or that instance, but gives him the name of the Hearer of prayer, as what constitutes an abiding part of his glory, so that he might as soon deny himself as shut his ear to our petitions. Could we only impress this upon our minds, that it is something special to God, and inseparable from him, to hear prayer, it would inspire us with unflinching confidence. The power of helping us he can never want, so that nothing can stand in the way of a successful issue of our supplications. — Calvin.

<sup><1951></sup>Psalm 65:3. Iniquities prevail against me Calvin gives the translation, Words of iniquity have prevailed, but adds, “He does not complain of the people being assailed with calumny, but is to be understood as confessing that their sins were the cause of any interruption which had taken place in the communication of the divine favor to the Jews. The passage is parallel with that in <sup><2801></sup>Isaiah 59:1

“The ear of the Lord is not heavy that it cannot hear, but our iniquities have separated between us and him.”

David imputes it to his own sins and those of the people, that God, who was accustomed to be liberal in his help, and so gracious and kind in inviting their dependence upon him, had withdrawn for a time his divine countenance. First, he acknowledges his own personal guilt; afterward, like <sup><2705></sup>Daniel 9:5, he joins the whole nation with himself. And this truth is introduced by the psalmist with no design to damp confidence in prayer, but rather to remove an obstacle standing in the way of it, as none could draw near to God unless convinced that he would hear the unworthy. It is probable that the Lord's people were at that time suffering under some token of the divine displeasure, since David seems here to struggle with some temptation of this kind. He evidently felt that there was a sure remedy at hand, for no sooner has he referred to the subject of guilt, than he recognizes the prerogative of God to pardon and expiate it. The verse before us must be viewed in connection with the preceding, and as meaning that though their iniquities merited their being cast out of God's sight, yet they would continue to pray, encouraged by his readiness to be reconciled to them. We learn from the passage that God will not be entreated of us unless we humbly supplicate the pardon of our sins. On the other hand, we are to believe firmly in reconciliation with God being procured through gratuitous remission. Should he at any time withdraw his favor, and frown upon us, we must learn by David's example to rise to the hope of the expiation of our sins."

<sup><2804></sup>Psalm 65:4. We shall be satisfied with the goodness of thy house The psalmist insists upon the fruit springing out of the blessed privilege of which he had spoken, when he adds that believers would be satisfied with the fullness of his temple. Hypocrites may go there, but they return empty and unsatisfied as to any spiritual blessing enjoyed. It is noticeable that the person is changed in this part of the verse, and that David associates himself with other believers, preferring to speak upon this subject from personal experience. We are not to understand that believers are fully replenished with the goodness of God at anyone moment; it is conveyed to them gradually; but while the influences of the Spirit are thus imparted in successive measures, each of them is enriched with a present sufficiency, until all be in due time advanced to perfection. I might remark here that while it is true, as stated, <sup><2935></sup>Psalm 103:5, that God "satisfieth our mouth with good things," at the same time it is necessary to remember what is said elsewhere, "Open thy mouth, and I will fill it." Our contracted desires is the reason why we do not receive a more copious supply of blessings from God; he sees that we are straitened in ourselves, and accommodates the communications of his goodness to the measure of our expectations.

By specifying particularly the goodness of the sanctuary, the psalmist passes an implied commendation upon the outward helps which God has appointed for leading us into the enjoyment of heavenly blessings. In these former times God could have directly stretched out his hand from heaven to supply the needs of his worshippers, but saw fit to satisfy their souls by means of the doctrine of the law, sacrifices, and other rites and external aids to piety. Similar are the means which he employs in the church still; and though we are not to rest in these, neither must we neglect them. — Calvin.

~~Psalm~~ Psalm 65:9-13. This is the special thanksgiving which is called forth by the refreshing rain which God has sent, and the rich and glorious harvest which is already waving and ripening before their eyes ...

The language flows with the thoughts. The bright harvest-scene is before the eyes of the inspired singer. He stands looking on the fields white already to the harvest, and his soul within him rejoices in their golden promise. The poet and the world without him are at one accord. The fullness of joy in his heart, as he sees how his God has poured blessing upon the land, passes as it were by a contagion of sunny gladness into the inanimate creation, and the very grain-fields seem to him to shout together, yea to sing for joy. — Perowne.

(Conclusion of the psalm.) We should, with wonder, gratitude, and praise, behold and participate the abundance, which, by the wise and kind providence of God, is diffused through the earth: and, while we see year after year crowned with the goodness of the Lord, so that the hills and valleys, covered with grain and cattle, seem to proclaim and rejoice in their Creator's praise; we should remember our unworthiness, be thankful for our portion, and use it to the glory of the Giver; admire and imitate his bounty to the indigent, as we are able, and his goodness to the wicked and ungrateful children of men; and pity and pray for those who abuse these gifts to the dishonor of the giver. But these temporal mercies to us unworthy creatures, shadow forth more important blessings. The rising of "the Sun of righteousness," and the pouring out of the Holy Spirit, that "river of God" full of the waters of life and salvation, render the hearts of sinners, which before were hard, barren, and worthless, fruitful in every good work; and change the face of nations, far more than the sun and rain do the face of nature. Wherever the Lord passes, by the preaching of his gospel, attended by his Holy Spirit, "his paths drop fatness;" and numbers of every description are taught to rejoice in him and praise him. These blessings have already been extended to many nations which were far off: may we unite in fervent prayers and vigorous, persevering, and self-denying endeavors, that they may descend upon the pastures of the wilderness, the heaven world, and the poor benighted Jews; and that the whole earth may hear and embrace the gospel; and may all who are favored with the means of grace bring forth abundantly “those fruits of righteousness, which are through Jesus Christ, to the glory of God the Father.” — Scott.

NOTES ON PSALM 66

The name of the author of this psalm is unknown. There is no certain evidence that it was composed by David, yet there is nothing in the psalm itself which is inconsistent with the supposition that he was the author. Perhaps the most natural and obvious interpretation of <sup><19613></sup>Psalm 66:13-15, would be that there is reference there to the temple; and if so, of course, the psalm must have been written by someone else. But it is not absolutely necessary to suppose that the temple is there referred to, for the language might be applied to the tabernacle as the “house” or the place of the worship of God. There is, however, no positive evidence that it was composed by David, and it is impossible now to determine its authorship.

As little can the occasion on which the psalm was composed be determined. It is evident only that it was after there had been some calamity of a private nature, or after the nation had been subjected to oppression by some powerful enemies, and when there had been deliverance from that calamity, <sup><19611></sup>Psalm 66:11,12. The calamity was similar to those which had been endured by the nation in the time of the Egyptian oppressions, and naturally brought to mind the sufferings endured by the people of God at that time, while their own deliverance suggested a recollection of the deliverance of their fathers from that bondage, <sup><19616></sup>Psalm 66:6. On the whole, the supposition of Rosenmuller that it was composed after the Babylonian captivity, and in view of the return of the people to their native land — perhaps to be sung on their journey from the land of exile, seems to me to be the most probable of any. Venema supposes that it refers to the time of Hezekiah, and the overthrow of Sennacherib; others regard it as referring to the persecutions of David by Saul; others, to the rebellion of Absalom; others, to the famine which is mentioned in 2 Samuel 21, or the pestilence, 2 Samuel 24. Paulus supposes that it had reference to the times of the Maccabees. The psalm relates to “vows” or promises which had been made in a time of trouble; and its composition and use are designed as the fulfillment of those vows, <sup><19613></sup>Psalm 66:13-15. Such a psalm of praise would be a proper fulfillment of “vows” which it might be supposed the Hebrews would make in the time of their exile; to wit, that if they were ever permitted to return to their native land, they would go to the house of God, and sacrifice again on his altars.

On the phrase in the title, “To the chief Musician,” see Introduction to Psalm 4. On the words, “A Song or Psalm,” see the notes at the titles to Psalm 30 and Psalm 65.

The psalm contains:

- I. An exhortation, addressed to all the earth, to praise God, as a matter pertaining to all lands, <sup><B66></sup>Psalm 66:1,2.
- II. A reference to the mighty acts of God, as a reason for worshipping him, <sup><B66></sup>Psalm 66:3-7.
- III. A reference to his gracious interposition in time of national danger and trouble, and to the fact that he had rescued the nation in a marvelous manner, <sup><B66></sup>Psalm 66:8-12.
- IV. A reference to the vows which had been made in that time of trouble, and the purpose now to execute those vows, by going to the house of God, and sacrificing on his altars, <sup><B66></sup>Psalm 66:13-15.
- V. A call on all people to hear what God had done for the worshippers: namely, That he had heard prayer; that he had interposed for their deliverance; that he had attended to the voice of supplication; that he had not turned away his mercy, <sup><B66></sup>Psalm 66:16-20.

<sup><B66></sup>Psalm 66:1. Make a joyful noise unto God literally, “Shout.” It is a call for exultation and praise.

All ye lands Margin, as in Hebrew, all the earth. The occasion was one that made universal exultation and praise proper. They who had been so deeply affected by the gracious interposition of God, could not but call on all the nations of the earth to unite with them in the expression of joy. The deliverance was so great that they wished all to rejoice with them (compare <sup><L15></sup>Luke 15:6,9); and the intervention of God in the case of his people, furnished lessons about his character which gave occasion to all men to rejoice.

<sup><B66></sup>Psalm 66:2. Sing forth the honor of his name That is, Celebrate in appropriate praise the honor due to his name. Make that honor known in connection with songs.

Make his praise glorious literally, “place honor, his praise;” that is, Give him honor; give him praise. The meaning is, Set forth his praise with songs — with music — with shouts; — that will be the appropriate expression of the praise which is due to him.

Psalm 66:3. Say unto God In your songs of praise. Let your songs be directly addressed to him, setting forth the grounds of that praise, or the reasons why it is due to him.

How terrible art thou in thy works! How fearful! how much to be revered! The meaning is, that the manifestations of his power and greatness, in the events which occur under his government, are suited to impress the mind with awe and reverence.

Through the greatness of thy power By the putting forth of thy power. Or, Thou hast such power over thine enemies as to be able to compel them to submit to thee.

Shall thine enemies submit themselves unto thee Margin, Lie, or yield reigned obedience. The Hebrew word means to lie, to speak lies; then, to feign, to flatter, to play the hypocrite. It is thus applied to the vanquished, who make a hollow profession of submission and love to their victors. See the word explained in the notes at <sup><9184></sup>Psalm 18:44; compare <sup><9815></sup>Psalm 81:15; <sup><6329></sup>Deuteronomy 33:29; <sup><828></sup>Job 31:28. The meaning here is, that he had power to subdue them, and to compel them to acknowledge his right to reign. It is the putting forth of mere power which is here referred to; and all that such power can do, is to secure outward and reigned submission. It cannot of itself secure the submission of the heart, the will, and the affections. That is to be secured by love, not by power; and the difference between the submission of the true people of God and that of all others is that the former are subdued by love, the latter by power; the submission of the former is genuine, that of the latter is forced. The inhabitants of heaven will be submissive to God because they love him; the dwellers in hell will be restrained by power, because they cannot deliver themselves. So now, the submission of a true child of God is that of love, or is a willing submission; the submission of a hypocrite is that of fear, when he feigns obedience because he cannot help it, or because he simply dreads the wrath of God. The object here is to celebrate the power of God, and it was sufficient, in order to set that forth, to say that it awed, and outwardly subdued the enemies of God.

Psalm 66:4. All the earth shall worship thee That is, all the inhabitants of the world will bow down before thee, or render thee homage. The time will come when thy right to reign will be universally acknowledged, or when thou wilt everywhere be adored as the true God. This is in accordance with all the statements in the Bible. See the notes at Psalm 22:27; Compare the notes at Isaiah 45:23; Romans 14:11.

And shall sing unto thee Shall celebrate thy praises. “To thy name.” To thee.

Psalm 66:5. Come and see the works of God See the notes at Psalm 46:8, where substantially the same expression occurs. The idea is, “Come and see what God has done and is doing; come and learn from this what he is; and let your hearts in view of all this, be excited to gratitude and praise.” The particular reference here is to what God had done in delivering his people from their former bondage in Egypt (Psalm 66:6); but there is, connected with this, the idea that he actually rules among the nations, and that in his providence he has shown his power to govern and subdue them.

He is terrible in his doing That is, His acts are suited to inspire awe and veneration. See the notes at Psalm 66:3.

Psalm 66:6. He turned the sea into dry land The Red Sea, when he brought his people out of Egypt, Exodus 14:21. This was an illustration of his power, and of his ability to defend and deliver his people. The terror in that case, or that which was “terrible,” was the overthrow of their enemies the destruction of the Egyptians in the Red Sea — thus showing that he had power to destroy all the enemies of his people.

They went through the flood on foot literally, “through the river.” It is probable that the reference here is to the passage of the river Jordan, when the Israelites were about to pass into the promised land (Joshua 3:14-17); thus combining the two great acts of divine interposition in favor of his people, and showing his power over streams and floods.

There did we rejoice in him We, as a nation — our fathers — thus rejoiced in God. See Exodus 15.

Psalm 66:7. He ruleth by his power for ever literally, “Ruling by his power forever.” The idea is, that he does this constantly; in each age and generation. He never has ceased to rule; he never will. His dominion extends from age to age, and will stretch forward forever. The power which he evinced in delivering his people he retains now, and will retain forever. In that unchanging power, his people may confide; that unchanging power, the wicked should fear.

His eyes behold the nations All nations; all people. He sees all their conduct. They can conceal nothing from him. They should, therefore, stand in awe. The wicked have much to fear from One who sees all that they do, and who has power to crush and destroy them. Compare the notes at ~~<9104>~~ Psalm 11:4.

Let not the rebellious exalt themselves Be lifted up with pride, or feel secure. They cannot overcome an Almighty God; they cannot escape from his power. The word rebellious here has reference to those who are impatient under the restraints of the law of God, and who are disposed to east off his authority. The admonition is one that may be addressed to all who thus rebel against God, whether they are nations or individuals. Alike they must feel the vengeance of his arm, and fall beneath his power.

~~<9108>~~ Psalm 66:8. O bless our God, ye people That is, particularly the people of the nation; the Hebrew people. The call here to praise or bless God is on account of some special benefit which had been conferred on them, and which is referred to more particularly in the following verses. It was his gracious interposition in the time of danger, by which they were delivered from their foes, ~~<9111>~~ Psalm 66:11,12.

And make the voice of his praise to be heard Let it be sounded out afar, that it may be heard abroad.

~~<9109>~~ Psalm 66:9. Which holdeth our soul in life Margin, as in Hebrew, putteth. That is, He has put (or placed) us in a state of safety. The word rendered “in life” means literally “among the living.” The word soul here is equivalent to us — ourselves; and the idea is, that he keeps us among the living. What is here said of this special deliverance is true of all people at all times, that they owe the fact that they are among the living to the care of God; or, it is because he puts them among the living, or keeps them alive.

And suffereth not our feet to be moved That is, from their firm position of safety. The idea is taken from one who is walking, and who is kept from slipping or falling.

Psalm 66:10. For thou, O God, hast proved us That is, Thou hast tried us; thou hast tested the reality of our attachment to thee, as silver is tried by the application of fire. God had proved or tried them by bringing calamity upon them to test the reality of their allegiance to him. The nature of the proof or trial is referred to in the following verses.

Thou hast tried us, as silver is tried That is, by being subjected to appropriate tests to ascertain its real nature, and to remove from it imperfections. Compare the notes at <sup><4007></sup>1 Peter 1:7; <sup><2025></sup>Isaiah 1:25; 48:10; see also <sup><3830></sup>Zechariah 13:9; <sup><3008></sup>Malachi 3:3.

Psalm 66:11. Thou broughtest us into the net That is, Thou hast suffered or permitted us to be brought into the net; thou hast suffered us to be taken captive, as beasts are caught in a snare. See the notes at <sup><3915></sup>Psalm 9:15. The allusion here is to the efforts made by their enemies to take them, as hunters lay gins, or spread nets, to capture wild beasts. The idea here is, that those enemies had been successful; God had suffered them to fall into their hands. If we suppose this psalm to have been composed on the return from the Babylonian captivity, the propriety of this language will be apparent, for it well describes the fact that the nation had been subdued by the Babylonians, and had been led captive into a distant land. Compare <sup><2013></sup>Lamentations 1:13.

Thou laidst affliction upon our loins The loins are mentioned as the seat of strength (compare <sup><6531></sup>Deuteronomy 33:11; <sup><1120></sup>1 Kings 12:10; <sup><3816></sup>Job 40:16).; and the idea here is, that he had put their strength to the test; he had tried them to see how much they could bear; he had made the test effectual by applying it to the part which was able to bear most. The idea is, that he had called them to endure as much as they were able to endure. He had tried them to the utmost.

Psalm 66:12. Thou hast caused men to ride over our heads This refers evidently to some national subjection or conquest — most probably to their having been subdued by the Babylonians. Professor Alexander renders this, “Thou hast caused men to ride at our head,” as if leading them forth as captives in war. The most probable meaning, however, is that they had been subdued, as if on a field of battle, and as if their conquerors had ridden over them when prostrate on the ground. Compare the notes at <sup><1941b></sup>Psalm 44:5, and <sup><25123></sup>Isaiah 51:23.

We went through fire and through water This is designed to represent the nature of their trials. It was as if they had been made to pass through burning flames and raging floods. Compare the notes at <sup><2441b></sup>Isaiah 43:2. Instead of passing through the seas and rivers when the waters had been turned back, and when a dry and safe path was made for them, as was the ease with their fathers (<sup><1961b></sup>Psalm 66:6), they had been compelled to breast the flood itself; and yet, notwithstanding this, God had brought them into a place of safety. In either way, by parting the floods, or by conducting his people through them, as shall seem best pleasing to him, God can conduct his people safely, and deliver them from danger. The power, the protecting care, the love, and the faithfulness of God are shown with equal clearness whether he divides the flood and causes his people to march through as on dry land, or whether he suffers the flood to rage and heave around them while he conducts his chosen people safely through.

But there broughtest us out into a wealthy place Margin, moist. Professor Alexander, overflow, abundance. Vulgate, info a place of refreshment — refrigerium. The Septuagint, εἰς ἀναψυχὴν . Luther, Thou hast led us forth and quickened us. DeWette, zum Ueberflusse — “to overflowing, or abundance.” The Hebrew word — hywr<sup><17310></sup> — means properly “abundant drink,” “abundance.” It occurs only here and in <sup><19215></sup>Psalm 23:5, where it is rendered “runneth over.” See the notes at that place. The proper idea here is, that he had brought them into a land where there was plenty of water — as emblematic of abundance in general. He had led them to a place where there were ample rivers, springs, and streams, producing fertility and abundance. This would be the language of the people after their return from exile, and when they were permitted again to re-visit their native land — a land always characterized as a land of plenty. See <sup><1817></sup>Deuteronomy 8:7; compare <sup><1118></sup>Exodus 3:8; <sup><1814></sup>Leviticus 20:24; <sup><14137></sup>Numbers 13:27.

<sup><1963></sup>Psalm 66:13. I will go into thy house with burnt-offerings To thy temple — the place of worship. This is language designed to represent the feelings and the purpose of the people. If the psalm was composed on occasion of the return from the Babylonian captivity, it means that, as their first act, the people would go to the house of God, and acknowledge his goodness to them, and render him praise. On the word burnt-offerings, see the notes at <sup><2111b></sup>Isaiah 1:11.

I will pay thee my vows I will keep the solemn promises which I had made; that is, the promises which the people had made in the long period of their captivity. On the word vows, see the notes at <sup><49225></sup>Psalm 22:25.

<sup><8664></sup>Psalm 66:14. Which my lips have uttered ... Margin, “opened.” The Hebrew word, however — hxp,<sup><46475></sup> — means properly to tear apart; to rend; and then, to open wide, as the mouth, for example — or the throat, — as wild beasts do, <sup><49213></sup>Psalm 22:13. Then it means to open the mouth in scorn (<sup><21216></sup>Lamentations 2:16; 3:46); and then, to utter hasty words, <sup><48516></sup>Job 35:16. The idea would be expressed by us by the phrases to bolt or blurt out; to utter hastily; or, to utter from a heart full and overflowing to utter with very little care as to the language employed. It is the fullness of the heart which would be suggested by the word, and not a nice choice of expressions. The idea is, that the heart was full; and that the vows were made under the influence of deep emotion, when the heart was so full that it could not but speak, and when there was very little attention to the language. It was not a calm and studied selection of words. Such vows are not less acceptable to God than those which are made in the best-selected language. Not a little of the most popular sacred poetry in all tongues is of this nature; and when refined down to the nicest rules of art it ceases to be popular, or to meet the needs of the soul, and is laid aside. The psalmist here means to say, that though these vows were the result of deep feeling — of warm, gushing emotion — rather than of calm and thoughtful reflection, yet there was no disposition to disown or repudiate them now. They were made in the depth of feeling — in real sincerity — and there was a purpose fairly to carry them out.

When I was in trouble When the people were in captivity, languishing in a foreign land. Vows made in trouble — in sickness, in bereavement, in times of public calamity — should be faithfully performed when health and prosperity visit us again; but, alas, how often are they forgotten!

With the incense of rams The word here rendered incense is commonly applied to aromatics which were burned in the tabernacle or temple, producing a grateful odor (see the notes at <sup><2013></sup>Isaiah 1:13); but it seems here to be used with reference to the smoke ascending from burning rams offered in sacrifice — ascending as the smoke of incense did. The smoke thus ascending would be as grateful and acceptable as incense.

I will offer bullocks with goats Bullocks and goats. That is, I will present sacrifices in all the forms required in worship; in all the forms that will express gratitude to God, or that will be an acknowledgment of dependence and guilt; in all that would properly express homage to the Deity. Bullocks and goats were both required in the ancient worship.

<sup><0916></sup>Psalm 66:16. Come and hear, all ye that fear God All who are true worshippers of God — the idea of fear or reverence being put for worship in general. The call is on all who truly loved God to hear what he had done, in order that he might be suitably honored, and that due praise might be given him.

And I will declare what he hath done for my soul This is probably the personification of an individual to represent the people, considered as delivered from oppression and bondage. The words “for my soul” are equivalent to “for me.” Literally, “for my life.” The phrase would embrace all that God had done by his gracious intervention in delivering the people from bondage. The language here is such as may be used by any one who is converted to God, in reference

- (a) to all that God has done to redeem the soul;
- (b) to all that he has done to pardon its guilt;
- (c) to all that he has done to give it peace and joy;
- (d) to all that he has done to enable it to overcome sin;
- (e) to all that he has done to give it comfort in the prospect of death;
- (f) to all that he has done to impart thee hope of heaven.

The principle here is one which it is right to apply to all such cases. It is right and proper for a converted sinner to call on others to hear what God has done for him;

- (a) because it is due to God thus to honor him;

(b) because the converted heart naturally gives utterance to expressions of gratitude and praise, or wishes to make known the joy derived from pardoned sin;

(c) because there is in such a soul a strong desire that others may partake of the same blessedness, and find the same satisfaction and peace in the service of God.

It is the duty of those who are pardoned and converted thus to call on others to hear what God has done for them;

(a) because others have the same need of religion which they have;

(b) because the same salvation is provided for them which has been provided for those who have found peace;

(c) because all are under obligation to make known as far as possible the fact that God has provided salvation for sinners, and that all may be saved.

He who has no such sense of the mercy of God, manifested toward himself, as to desire that others may be saved — who sees no such value in the religion which he professes as to have an earnest wish that others may partake of it also — can have no real evidence that his own heart has ever been converted to God. Compare the notes at ~~Psalm~~ Romans 9:1-3; 10:1.

~~Psalm~~ Psalm 66:17. I cried unto him with my mouth That is, in my trouble; when distress came upon me. This, according to the explanation of the design of the psalm given above, is one individual speaking on behalf of the nation, or uttering the sentiment of the people. At the same time, however, all this is language appropriate to an individual when recording his own experience.

And he was extolled with my tongue I praised him; I acknowledged his supremacy. I recognized my dependence on him, and looked to him as that God who had all things under his control, and who could grant me the deliverance which I desired.

~~Psalm~~ Psalm 66:18. If I regard iniquity in my heart literally, “If I have seen iniquity in my heart.” That is, If I have indulged in a purpose of iniquity; if I have had a wicked end in view; if I have not been willing to forsake all sin; if I have cherished a purpose of pollution or wrong. The meaning is not literally, If I have “seen” any iniquity in my heart — for no one can look into his own heart, and not see that it is defiled by sin; but, If I have cherished it in my soul; if I have gloated over past sins; if I am purposing to commit sin again; if I am not willing to abandon all sin, and to be holy.

The Lord will not hear me That is, He will not regard and answer my prayer. The idea is, that in order that prayer may be heard, there must be a purpose to forsake all forms of sin. This is a great and most important principle in regard to prayer. The same principle is affirmed or implied in ~~9184~~ Psalm 18:41; 34:15; ~~1003~~ Proverbs 1:28; 15:29; 28:9; Isaiah 15; ~~3411~~ Jeremiah 11:11; 14:12; ~~3073~~ Zechariah 7:13; ~~4081~~ John 9:31. It is also especially stated in ~~2888~~ Isaiah 58:3-7. The principle is applicable

- (a) to secret purposes of sin; to sinful desires, corrupt passions. and evil propensities;
- (b) to acts of sin in individuals, as when a man is pursuing a business founded on fraud, dishonesty, oppression, and wrong;
- (c) to public acts of sin, as when a people fast and pray (Isaiah 58), and yet hold their fellow-men in bondage; or enact and maintain unjust and unrighteous laws; or uphold the acts of wicked rulers; or countenance and support by law that which is contrary to the law of God; and
- (d) to the feelings of an awakened and trembling sinner when he is professedly seeking salvation.

If there is still the love of evil in his heart; if he has some cherished purpose of iniquity which he is not willing to abandon; if there is any one sin, however small or unimportant it may seem to be, which he is not willing to forsake, he cannot hope that God will hear his prayer; he may be assured that he will not. All prayer, to be acceptable to God, MUST be connected with a purpose to forsake all sin.

~~969~~ Psalm 66:19. But verily God hath heard me ... That is, He has given me evidence that he has heard my prayer; and, in doing this, he has thus given me the assurance also that I do not regard iniquity in my heart. The evidence that he has heard me is at the same time proof to my mind that I do not love sin. As it is a settled and universal principle that God does not hear prayer when there is in the heart a cherished love and purpose of iniquity, so it follows that, if there is evidence that he has heard our prayers, it is proof that he has seen that our hearts are sincere, and that we truly desire to forsake all forms of sin.

Psalm 66:20. Blessed be God, which hath not turned away my prayer That is, It is fit that I should praise and adore God for the fact that he has graciously condescended to listen to the voice of my supplications.

Nor his mercy from me There is no more proper ground of praise than the fact that God hears prayer — the prayer of poor, ignorant, sinful, dying men. When we consider how great is his condescension in doing this; when we think of his greatness and immensity; when we reflect that the whole universe is dependent on him, and that the farthest worlds need his care and attention; when we bear in mind that we are creatures of a day and “know nothing;” and especially when we remember how we have violated his laws, how sensual, corrupt, and vile our lives have been, how low and grovelling have been our aims and purposes, how we have provoked him by our unbelief, our ingratitude, and our hardness of heart — we can never express, in appropriate words, the extent of his goodness in hearing our prayers, nor can we find language which will properly give utterance to the praises due to his name for having condescended to listen to our cries for mercy.

APPENDIX NOTES ON PSALM 66

Psalm 66:10,12. Thou, O God! hast proved us ... We may read, Though thou, O God! etc., and then the passage comes in as a qualification of what went before, and is brought forward by the psalmist to enhance the goodness of God, who had delivered them from such severe calamities. But there is another object which I consider him to have in view, and this is the alleviation of the grief of God’s people, by setting before them the comfort suggested by the words which follow. When visited with affliction it is of great importance that we should consider it as coming from God, and as expressly intended for our good. It is in reference to this that the psalmist speaks of their having been proved and tried. At the same time, while he adverts to God’s trying his children with the view of purging away their sin, as dross is expelled from the silver by fire, he would intimate also that trial had been made of their patience. The figure implies that their probation had been severe, for silver is cast repeatedly into the furnace. They express themselves thankful to God that, while proved with affliction, they had not been destroyed by it; but that their affliction was both varied and very severe, appears not only from the metaphor, but from the whole context, where they speak of having been cast into the net, being reduced to straits, people riding over their heads, and of being brought through shipwreck and conflagration. The expression, laying a restraint (or chain) upon their loins, is introduced as being stronger than the one which goes before. It was not a net of thread which had been thrown over them, but rather they had been bound down with hard and insolvable fetters. The expression which follows refers to people who had shamefully tyrannized over them, and ridden them down as cattle. By fire and water are evidently meant complicated afflictions; and it is intimated that God had exercised his people in every form of calamity. They are the two elements which contribute more than any other to sustain human life, but are equally powerful for the destruction of it. It is noticeable that the psalmist speaks of all the cruelties they had most unjustly suffered from the bands of their enemies as an infliction of divine punishment; and would guard the Lord's people against imagining that God was ignorant of what they endured, or distracted by other things from giving attention to it. In their condition as here described, we have that of the church generally represented to us; and this, that when subjected to vicissitudes, and cast out of the fire into the water, by a succession of trials, there may at last be felt to be nothing new or strange in the event to strike us with alarm. The Hebrew word, hywr <sup>317310</sup>, which I have rendered "fruitful place," means literally "a well-watered land." Here it is taken metaphorically for a condition of prosperity, the people of God being represented as brought into a pleasant and fertile place, where there is abundance of pasturage. The truth conveyed is, that God, although he visit his children with temporary chastisements of a severe description, will ultimately crown them with joy and prosperity. It is a mistake to suppose that the allusion is entirely to their being settled in the land of Canaan, for the psalm has not merely reference to the troubles which they underwent in the wilderness, but to the whole series of distresses to which they were subjected at the different periods of their history. — Calvin.

How grievous the distress and danger were. What particular trouble of the church this refers to does not appear. It might be the trouble of some private persons or families only. But whatever it was, they were surprised with it, as a bird with a snare, enclosed and entangled in it as a fish in a net; they were pressed down with it and kept under as with a load upon their loins. But they owned the hand of God in it. We are never in the net but God brings us into it; never under affliction but God lays it upon us. Is anything more dangerous than fire and water? We went through both — afflictions of different kinds; the end of one trouble was the beginning of another; when we had got clear of one sort of dangers, we found ourselves involved in dangers of another sort. Such may be the troubles of the best of God's saints; but he has promised, "Where thou passest through the waters, through the fire, I will be with thee," <sup><284D></sup>Isaiah 43:2. Yet proud and cruel people may be as dangerous as fire and water, and more so. "Beware of men," <sup><400I></sup>Matthew 10:17. When people rose up against us, that was fire and water, and all that is threatening, <sup><49C4D></sup>Psalms 124:2-4; and that was the case here. "Thou hast caused men to ride over our heads;" to trample upon us and insult over us; to hector and abuse us: nay, to make perfect slaves of us. They have said to our souls, "Bow down that we may go over," <sup><25I2></sup>Isaiah 51:23. While it is the pleasure of good princes to rule in the hearts of their subjects, it is the pride of tyrants to ride over their heads; yet the afflicted church in this also owns the hand of God: "Thou hast caused them thus to abuse us;" for the most furious oppressor has no power but what is given him from above. — Henry.

NOTES ON PSALM 67

On the phrases in the title, “To the chief Musician” and “on Neginoth,” see the notes at the Introduction to Psalm 4. On the words “psalm” and “song,” see the notes at the title to Psalm 48.

Four of the psalms (Psalm 4; 6; 54; 55), where the phrase “on Neginoth” occurs, are ascribed to David; one (Psalm 77) is ascribed to Asaph; but there is no intimation in the title of this psalm (or in the psalm itself), which would enable us to determine by whom it was composed. It cannot be demonstrated that it was not written by David, but there is no certain evidence that it was. Nor is it possible to ascertain the occasion on which it was composed. Venema supposes that it was written in the time of Hezekiah, after the land was delivered from the Assyrian invasion, and was at peace; and, especially, in reference to the prediction in <sup><2373></sup>Isaiah 37:30, “Ye shall eat this year such as groweth of itself; and the second year such as groweth of the same: and in the third year sow ye, and reap, and plant vineyards, and eat the fruit there-of.” This was to be a “sign” to the people of Israel that the land would not be subjugated to the foreigners (see my notes at that passage); and the psalm, according to this supposition, was written in view of the fact that God had, at the time of its composition, mercifully interposed in the destruction of the Assyrian army. The psalm contains, according to this idea, an expression of praise for the merciful interposition which God had thus vouchsafed, and a prayer that the promise might be fully accomplished; that the land might be free from any future invasion; and that, according to the prediction, it might produce abundantly, or that it might be cultivated in peace, and with no fear of foreign conquest. Thus, (<sup><9576></sup>Psalm 67:6):

“Then shall the earth yield her increase; and God, even our own God, shall bless us.”

There is much plausibility in this supposition, though it is not possible with certainty to determine its correctness.

Thus understood, the psalm is designed to express the feelings — the desires — the hopes of the Hebrew people in those circumstances. It contains,

- I. A prayer that God would still be merciful to them and bless them, as if there were still some danger to be apprehended, <sup><1950></sup>Psalm 67:1.
- II. A desire that his ways — the principles of his administration — might be made known to all people, <sup><1950></sup>Psalm 67:2.
- III. A call on the people to praise God for what he had done, with the expression of a wish that all nations might be glad and rejoice; that they might put their trust in God as a righteous God; that they might understand the great principles on which he governs the world, <sup><1957></sup>Psalm 67:3-5.
- IV. A statement of the fact that then — in connection with this universal recognition of God — the prophecy would be fulfilled in its most complete sense; that the earth would yield her increase as it was made to do; that there would be universal prosperity: in other words, that the proper acknowledgment of God, and the prevalence of true religion, would be an incalculable benefit to man's temporal interests; or, that under such a state of things, the true fertility and productiveness of the earth would be developed, <sup><1956></sup>Psalm 67:6,7. The psalm thus illustrates the influence of true religion in securing the proper cultivation of the earth (accomplishing so far the purpose for which man was made, <sup><1012></sup>Genesis 1:28; 2:15), and consequently in promoting the happiness of mankind.

And cause his face to shine upon us Margin, With us. That is, among us. It is an invocation of his presence and favor. On the phrase "cause his face to shine," see the notes at <sup><1946></sup>Psalm 4:6.

<sup><1950></sup>Psalm 67:2. That thy way may be known upon earth The law of God; the principles and methods of the divine administration; the way in which God rules mankind and in which he bestows his blessings on people. The prayer is, that all the earth might be made acquainted with the methods in which God deals with his people, or confers favors on people. The happiness of man depends on a knowledge of the principles on which God bestows his favors; for all people are, in all things, dependent on him. The success of a farmer depends on his understanding, and complying with, the laws and principles on which God bestows a harvest; the preservation of health, the restoration of health when we are sick, depends on a knowledge of the great laws which God has ordained for the continuance of the healthy functions of our bodies, and on the use of the means which he has provided for restoring health when those functions are disordered; and, in like manner, the salvation of the soul depends on the right understanding of the method which God has appointed to secure his favor. In neither of these cases — in no case — is it the business of people to originate laws of their own; laws for the cultivation of the earth, or for the preservation of health, or for the saving of the soul. The business of man is to find out the rules in accordance with which God bestows his favors, and then to act in obedience to them. The psalmist here supposes that there are certain rules or principles, in accordance with which God bestows blessings on mankind; and he prays that those rules and principles may be everywhere made known upon the earth.

<sup><1870></sup>Psalm 67:3. Let the people praise thee, O God Do thou incline them to praise thee: a prayer that all people might so understand the character and ways of God, and might have such a sense of his claims upon them, as to lead them to praise him.

<sup><1954></sup>Psalm 67:4. O let the nations be glad, and sing for joy All the nations of the earth. Let them all be made acquainted with thee; with thy character; with the principles of thy government; with the methods by which thou dost bestow thy favors, that they all may be made glad. These things pertain to them all. The knowledge of these things would convey inestimable blessings to them all, and fill all their hearts with joy. Nothing would, in fact, diffuse so much happiness over a miserable and guilty world — nothing would furnish such an occasion for universal joy, gratitude, and praise — as the possession of the knowledge of the great principles on which God rules the world, and on which he blesses people.

For thou shalt judge the people righteously That is, The great principles of thy administration are right, or righteous. and the nations will have occasion to rejoice in them.

And, govern the nations upon earth Margin, lead. So the Hebrew. That is, God would instruct them what to do; he would guide them in paths of prosperity, happiness, salvation. Individuals and nations, as they follow the counsels of God, are safe and happy; and in no other way.

<sup><1955></sup>Psalm 67:5. Let the people praise thee ... See <sup><1955></sup>Psalm 67:5. The repetition shows that this was the principal thought in the mind of the author of the psalm. It expresses an earnest — an intense — desire, that all nations should acknowledge God as the true God, and praise him for his mercies.

to the fact that God would bless the people, <sup><9616></sup>Psalm 67:6,7. Thus understood, the idea is, that the prevalence of true religion in the world would be connected with prosperity, or that it would tend greatly to increase the productions of the earth. This, it would do,

(a) as such an acknowledgment of God would tend to secure the divine favor and blessing on those who cultivate the earth, preventing the necessity, by way of judgment, of cutting off its harvests by blight, and drought, and mildew, by frost, and storm, and destructive insects, caterpillars, and locusts;

(b) as it would lead to a much more extensive and general cultivation of the soil, bringing into the field multitudes, as laborers, to occupy its waste places, who are now idle, or intemperate, or who are cut down by vice and consigned to an early grave.

If all who are now idle were made industrious — as they would be by the influence of true religion; if all who by intemperance are rendered worthless, improvident, and wasteful, were made sober and working people; if all who are withdrawn from cultivating the earth by wars — who are kept in standing armies, consumers and not producers — or who are cut down in battle, should be occupied in tilling the soil, or should become producers in any way; and if all who are now slaves, and whose labor is not worth half as much as that of freemen, should be restored to their equal rights, — the productions of the earth would at once be increased many times beyond the present amount. The prevalence of true religion in the world, arresting the cause of idleness and improvidence, and keeping alive those who are now cut off by vice, by crime, and by the ravages of war, would soon make the whole world assume a different aspect, and would accomplish the prediction of the prophet (<sup><23510></sup>Isaiah 35:1) that the “wilderness and the solitary place shall be glad, and that the desert shall rejoice and blossom as the rose.” The earth has never yet been half cultivated. Vast tracts of land are still wholly unsubdued and uninhabited. No part of the earth has yet been made to produce all that it could be made to yield; and no one can estimate what the teeming earth might be made to produce if it were brought under the influence of proper cultivation. As far as the true religion spreads, it will be cultivated; and in the days of the millennium, when the true religion shall be diffused over all continents and islands, the earth will be a vast fruitful field, and much of the beauty and the fertility of Eden be reproduced in every land.

And God, even our own God, shall bless us The true God; the God whom we adore. That is, He will bless us with this abundant fertility; he will bless us with every needed favor.

<1950> Psalm 67:7. God shall bless us That is, with prosperity, peace, salvation. The making of his name known abroad will be the means of blessing the world; will be the highest favor that can be conferred on mankind.

And all the ends of the earth shall fear him All parts of the earth. See the notes at <1977> Psalm 22:27. The time, therefore, looked for is that when the knowledge of the Lord shall pervade all lands; the time to which the ancient prophets were constantly looking forward as the sum of all their wishes, and the burden of all their communications; that time, for the coming of which all who love their fellow-men, and who earnestly desire the welfare of the world, should most earnestly pray. The hope that this may occur, is the only bright thing in the future respecting this world; and he lives most in accordance with the high ends for which man was made who most earnestly desires this, and who, by his prayers and efforts, contributes most to this glorious consummation.

APPENDIX NOTES ON PSALM 67

Prayer for revival at home and prayer for a blessing abroad ought ever therefore to go hand in hand. This is brought out in Psalm 67; the missionary hymn of the Hebrew church. How admirably balanced are the parts of this missionary song! The people of God long to see all the nations participating in their privileges, “visited with God’s salvation, and gladdened with the gladness of his nation,” <1946> Psalm 106:5. They long to hear all the nationalities giving thanks to the Lord, and hallowing his name; to see the face of the whole earth, which sin has darkened so long, smiling with the brightness of a second Eden. This is not a vapid sentiment. The desire is so expressed as to connect with it the thought of duty and responsibility. For how do they expect that the happy times are to be reached? They trust, in the first instance, to the general diffusion of the knowledge of God’s way, the spreading abroad of the truth regarding the way of salvation. With a view to that they Cry for a time of quickening from the presence of the Lord, and take encouragement in this prayer from the terms of the divinely-appointed benediction. As if they had said, “Hast thou not commanded the sons of Aaron to put thy name upon us and to say, The LORD bless thee and keep thee; the LORD cause his face to shine on thee and be gracious to thee? Remember that sure word of thine! God be gracious unto us, and bless us, and cause his face to shine upon us. Let us be thus blessed, and we shall in our turn become a blessing. All the families of the earth shall through us become acquainted with thy salvation.” Such is the church’s expectation. And who shall say it is unreasonable? If the little company of a hundred and twenty disciples who met in the upper chamber at Jerusalem, all of them persons of humble station and unobtrusive talents, were endued with such power by the baptism of the Holy Spirit, that within three hundred years the paganism of the empire was overthrown, one need not fear to affirm that, in order to the evangelization of the world, nothing more is required than that the churches of Christendom be baptized with a fresh effusion of the same Spirit of power. — Binnie.

Psalm 67:2. Thy way The way of God is his procedure: from the experience of Israel, the pagan shall know how God acts, what are those treasures of salvation which are laid up with him for his people; as even at the present time there are not more powerful means of bringing the world to God than the perception of the gifts which he imparts to the living members of his church: compare <sup><9250></sup>Psalm 25:10, “All the ways of God are grace and truth;” <sup><9437></sup>Psalm 103:7, “He has made known his ways to Moses, his deeds to the children of Israel.” The parallel term, “his salvation,” is sufficient against the translation, “his religion;” compare <sup><9902></sup>Psalm 96:2; 98:2. The idea that the blessings of Israel would exert an attractive influence on pagan nations, occurs in the promises made to the patriarchs, <sup><0228></sup>Genesis 22:18; 26:4, “And all the nations of the earth shall be blessed in thy seed,” that is, they wish for, and they earnestly desire for themselves the lot of Israel as the highest good, and this wish shall be the means of their obtaining the blessing (being blessed, Niph. <sup><0128></sup>Genesis 12:3; 18:18), inasmuch as it will lead them to the Author of the blessing. <sup><2908></sup>Isaiah 60:3 is also parallel: “and the Gentiles shall come to thy light, and kings to the brightness of thy rising.” — Hengstenberg.

Psalm 67:3. Let all the people praise thee As if she had said, Hitherto indeed, blessed Lord, thou hast thought fit to make me the guardian and keeper of that great deposit, thy true religion, from which the nations revolted and fell; but the time is coming, when, by the gospel of thy dear Son, they shall again be called to the knowledge of thee. Thy glory, impatient, as it were, of any longer restraint, and demanding a larger sphere, shall diffuse itself, like the light of heaven, to the ends of the world. Hasten, then, O hasten the dawning of that happy day when congregations of converted Gentiles shall everywhere lift up their voices, and perhaps in the words of this very psalm, sing to thy praise and glory! — Horne.

NOTES ON PSALM 68

This psalm purports to be a psalm of David. It is dedicated to “the chief Musician.” See the notes at the Introduction to Psalm 4. There is no reason to doubt the correctness of the title, as there is nothing in the psalm which conflicts with the supposition that David was the author, and as it accords so much, in its scope and language, with his undoubted compositions. On the phrase in the title “A Psalm or Song,” see the notes at the title to Psalm 65.

It is not certainly known on what occasion the song was composed. It is evidently, like the eighteenth psalm, a triumphal song designed to celebrate victories which had been achieved; but whether composed to celebrate some particular victory, or in view of all that had been done in subduing the enemies of the people of God, it is impossible now to determine. Prof. Alexander supposes that it was in reference to the victory recorded in <sup><0126></sup>2 Samuel 12:26-31, the last important victory of David’s reign. Venema supposes that it was composed on the occasion of removing the ark to Mount Zion, to the place which David had prepared for it. This also is the opinion of Rosenmuller. DeWette inclines to the opinion that it was written in view of the victory over the Ammonites and others, as recorded in 2 Samuel 8—12. There are some things, however, in regard to the time and occasion on which the psalm was composed, which can be determined from the psalm itself.

(1) It is clear that it was not composed before the time of David, because before his time Jerusalem or Zion was not the seat of the royal authority, nor the place of divine worship, which it is evidently supposed to be in the psalm, <sup><0129></sup>Psalm 68:29.

(2) It was composed when the Hebrew nation was one, or before the separation of the ten tribes and the formation of the kingdom of Israel under Jeroboam, for Benjamin, Judah, Zebulon and Naphtali are especially mentioned as taking part in the solemnities referred to in the psalm, <sup><0127></sup>Psalm 68:27.

(3) It was consequently before the Babylonian captivity.

(4) It was composed on some occasion of bringing up the ark, and putting it in the place which had been prepared for it, <sup><0116></sup>Psalm 68:16,24,25. These verses can be best explained on the supposition that the psalm was written on that occasion. Indeed they cannot well be explained on any other supposition.

(5) It was in view of past triumphs; of victories secured in former times; of what God had then done for his people, and especially of what he had done when the ark of the covenant had been placed at the head of the armies of Israel, <sup><9884></sup>Psalm 68:14. Compare <sup><9807></sup>Psalm 68:7,8,12,17,18.

(6) It was in anticipation of future triumphs — the triumphs of the true religion; under the feeling and belief that Jerusalem would be the center from which wholesome influences would go out over the world; and that through the influences which would go out from Jerusalem the world would be subdued to God, <sup><9807></sup>Psalm 68:20-23; 29-31. Compare <sup><3103></sup>Isaiah 2:3.

The psalm was composed, therefore, I apprehend, when the ark was brought up from the house of Obed-edom, and placed in the city of David, in the tent or tabernacle which he had erected for it there: <sup><1062></sup>2 Samuel 6:12; 1 Chronicles 15. It is not improbable that other psalms, also, were composed for this occasion, as it was one of great solemnity.

The contents of the psalm accord entirely with this supposition. They are as follows:

I. A prayer that God would arise and scatter all his enemies, <sup><9801></sup>Psalm 68:1,2.

II. A call on the people to praise God, with reference to his greatness, and to his paternal character, <sup><9803></sup>Psalm 68:3-6.

III. A reference to what he had done in former times for his people in conducting them from bondage to the promised land, <sup><9807></sup>Psalm 68:7-4.

IV. A particular reference to the ark, <sup><9815></sup>Psalm 68:15-18. After it had been lying neglected, God had gone forth with it, and Zion had become distinguished above the hills; the chariots of God had been poured forth; victory had attended its movements; and God had gone up leading captivity captive.

V. The anticipation of future triumphs — the confident expectation of future interposition — as derived from the history of the past, <sup><68:19></sup>Psalm 68:19-23.

VI. A description of the procession on the removing of the ark, <sup><68:24></sup>Psalm 68:24-27.

VII. The anticipation of future triumphs expressed in another form, not that of subjugation by mere power, but of a voluntary submission of kings and nations to God, <sup><68:28></sup>Psalm 68:28-31. Kings would come with presents (<sup><68:29></sup>Psalm 68:29); nations — Egypt and Ethiopia — would stretch out their hands to God, <sup><68:31></sup>Psalm 68:31.

VIII. A call on all the nations, in view of these things, to ascribe praise to God, <sup><68:32></sup>Psalm 68:32-35.

<sup><68:1></sup>Psalm 68:1. Let God arise See the notes at <sup><3:7></sup>Psalm 3:7. There is an obvious reference here to the words used by Moses on the removal of the ark in <sup><10:35></sup>Numbers 10:35. The same language was also employed by Solomon when the ark was removed to the temple, and deposited in the most holy place (<sup><6:41></sup>2 Chronicles 6:41):

“Now therefore arise, O Lord God, into thy resting place, thou, and the ark of thy strength.”

It would seem probable, therefore, that this psalm was composed on some such occasion.

Let his enemies be scattered So in <sup><10:35></sup>Numbers 10:35: “Rise up, Lord, and let thine enemies be scattered; and let them that hate thee flee before thee.” The ark was the symbol of the divine presence, and the idea is, that wherever that was, the enemies of God would be subdued, or that it was only by the power of Him who was supposed to reside there that his enemies could be overcome.

Let them also that hate him flee before him Almost the exact language used by Moses in <sup><10:35></sup>Numbers 10:35. It is possible that this may have been used on some occasion when the Hebrews were going out to war; but the more probable supposition is that it is general language designed to illustrate the power of God, or to state that his rising up, at any time, would be followed by the discomfiture of his enemies. The placing of the ark where it was designed to remain permanently would be a proper occasion for suggesting this general truth, that all the enemies of God must be scattered when he rose up in his majesty and power.

Psalm 68:2. As smoke is driven away To wit, by the wind. Smoke — vapor — easily disturbed and moved by the slightest breath of air — represents an object of no stability, or having no power of resistance, and would thus represent the real weakness of the most mighty armies of men as opposed to God.

So drive them away With the same ease with which smoke is driven by the slightest breeze, so do the enemies of God disappear before his power. Compare the notes at Psalm 1:4.

As wax melteth before the fire Compare Psalm 22:14. The meaning here is plain. As wax is melted down by fire — losing all its hardness, its firmness, its power of resistance, so must the most mighty armies melt away before God.

So let the wicked perish at the presence of God That is, those who rise up against him; his enemies. It will be as easy for God to destroy wicked men as it is for fire to melt down wax.

Psalm 68:3. But let the righteous be glad That is, Let them be prosperous and happy; let them be under thy protecting care, and partake of thy favor. While the wicked are driven away like smoke, let the righteous live, and flourish, and be safe. Compare Psalm 32:11.

Let them rejoice before God In the presence of God; or as admitted to his presence. The wicked will be driven far off; the righteous will be admitted to his presence, and will rejoice before him.

Yea, let them exceedingly rejoice Margin, as in Hebrew, rejoice with gladness. The expression is designed to express great joy; joy that is multiplied and prolonged. It is joy of heart accompanied with all the outward expressions of joy.

Psalm 68:4. Sing unto God, sing praises to his name That is, to him; the name being often put for the person himself. The repetition denotes intensity of desire; a wish that God might be praised with the highest praises.

Extol him The word here rendered “extol” — l l e<sup><15549></sup> — means to lift up, to raise, to raise up, as into a heap or mound; and especially to cast up and prepare a way, or to make a way level before an army by casting up earth; that is, to prepare a way for an army. See the notes at <sup><2340B></sup>Isaiah 40:3. Compare also <sup><25714></sup>Isaiah 57:14; 62:10; <sup><18912></sup>Job 19:12; 30:12, <sup><11519></sup>Proverbs 15:19 (margin); <sup><21815></sup>Jeremiah 18:15. This is evidently the idea here. It is not to “extol” God in the sense of praising him; it is to prepare the way before him, as of one marching at the head of his armies, or as a leader of his hosts. The allusion is to God as passing before his people in the march to the promised land; and the call is to make ready the way before him — that is, to remove all obstructions out of his path and to make the road smooth and level.

That rideth Rather, “that marcheth.” There is, indeed, the idea of riding, yet it is not that of “riding upon the heavens,” which is the meaning, but of riding at the head of his hosts on their march.

Upon the heavens The word used here — br e<sup><46160></sup> — never means either heaven, or the clouds. It properly denotes an arid tract, a sterile region, a desert; and then, a plain. It is rendered desert in <sup><23811></sup>Isaiah 35:1,6; 40:3; 41:19; 51:3; <sup><24016></sup>Jeremiah 2:6; 17:6; 50:12; <sup><34708></sup>Ezekiel 47:8; and should have been so rendered here. So it is translated by DeWette, Prof. Alexander, and others. The Septuagint renders it, “Make way for him who is riding westward.” So the Latin Vulgate. The Chaldee renders it, “Extol him who is seated upon the throne of his glory in the north heaven.” The reference, doubtless, is to the passage through the desert over which the Hebrews wandered for forty years. The Hebrew word which is employed here is still applied by the Arabs to that region. The idea is that of Yahweh marching over those deserts at the head of his armies, and the call is to prepare a way for him on his march, compare <sup><19817></sup>Psalms 68:7,8.

By his name JAH This refers to his riding or marching at the head of his forces through the desert, in the character described by that name — or, as Hy<sup><13060></sup>; that is, hwbyj<sup><13068></sup>. Yah (Jah) is an abbreviation of the word Yahweh (Jehovah), which was assumed by God as His special name, <sup><1003></sup>Exodus 6:3. The word Yahweh is usually rendered, in our version, LORD, printed in small capitals to denote that the original is hwbyj<sup><13068></sup>; the word itself is retained, however, in <sup><1003></sup>Exodus 6:3; <sup><18318></sup>Psalms 83:18; <sup><23121></sup>Isaiah 12:2 (see the Notes); and <sup><22041></sup>Isaiah 26:4. The word “Jah” occurs in this place only, in our English translation. It is found in combination, or in certain formulas — as in the phrase Hallelujah, <sup><94MS></sup>Psalm 104:35; 105:45; 106:1. The meaning here is, that God went thus before His people in the character of the true God, or as Yahweh.

And rejoice before him Or, in His presence. Let there be joy when He thus manifests Himself as the true God. The presence of God is suited to give joy to all the worlds that He has made, or wherever He manifests Himself to His creatures.

<sup><98RS></sup>Psalm 68:5. A father of the fatherless Or, of orphans. Compare <sup><9104></sup>Psalm 10:14,18. That is, God takes the place of the parent. See <sup><4401></sup>Jeremiah 49:11: “Leave thy fatherless children, I will preserve them alive; and let thy widows trust in me.” This is one of the most tender appellations that could be given to God, and conveys one of the most striking descriptions that can be given of his character. We see his greatness, his majesty, his power, in the worlds that he has made — in the storm, the tempest, the rolling ocean; but it is in such expressions as this that we learn, what we most desire to know, and what we cannot elsewhere learn, that he is a Father; that he is to be loved as well as feared. Nothing suggests more strikingly a state of helplessness and dependence than the condition of orphan children and widows; nothing, therefore, conveys a more affecting description of the character of God — of his condescension and kindness — than to say that he will take the place of the parent in the one case, and be a protector in the other.

And a judge of the widows That is, He will see justice done them; he will save them from oppression and wrong. No persons are more liable to be oppressed and wronged than widows. They are regarded as incapable of defending or vindicating their own rights, and are likely to be deceived and betrayed by those to whom their property and rights may be entrusted. Hence, the care which God manifests for them; hence, his solemn charges, so often made to those who are in authority, and who are entrusted with power, to respect their rights; hence, his frequent and solemn rebukes to those who violate their rights. See the notes at <sup><2317></sup>Isaiah 1:17. Compare <sup><5108></sup>Deuteronomy 10:18; 14:29; 24:17; <sup><1222></sup>Exodus 22:22; <sup><484B></sup>Job 24:3,21; <sup><2406></sup>Jeremiah 7:6; <sup><348B></sup>Malachi 3:5; <sup><5027></sup>James 1:27.

Is God in his holy habitation Where he dwells; to wit, in heaven. The design of the psalmist seems to be to take us at once up to God; to let us see what he is in his holy home; to conduct us into his very presence, that we may see him as he is. What a man is we see in his own home — when we get near to him; when we look upon him, not on great or state occasions, when he is abroad, and assumes appearances befitting his rank and office, but in his own house; as he is constantly. This is the idea here, that if we approach God most nearly, if we look upon him, not merely in the splendor and magnificence in which he appears in governing the worlds, in his judgments, in storm and tempest, riding on the clouds and controlling the ocean, but, as it were, in his own dwelling, his quiet heavens — if we look most closely at his character, we shall find that character best represented by the kind and benignant traits of a father — in his care for widows and orphans. In other words, the more we see of God — the more we become intimately acquainted with his real nature — the more evidence we shall find that he is benevolent and kind.

Psalm 68:6. God setteth the solitary in families Margin, as in Hebrew, in a house. The word rendered solitary means properly one alone, as an only child; <sup><927></sup>Genesis 22:2,12,16; and then it means alone, solitary, wretched, forsaken. See the notes at <sup><927></sup>Psalm 22:20. The word rendered “families” would be more literally and better translated as in the margin, houses. The idea then is, not that he constitutes families of those who were solitary and alone, but that to those who are alone in the world — who seem to have no friends — who are destitute, wretched, forsaken, he gives comfortable dwellings. Thus the idea is carried out which is expressed in the previous verse. God is the friend of the orphan and the widow; and, in like manner, he is the friend of the cast out — the wandering — the homeless; — he provides for them a home. The meaning is, that he is benevolent and kind, and that they who have no other friend may find a friend in God. At the same time it is true, however, that the family organization is to be traced to God. It is his original appointment; and all that there is in the family that contributes to the happiness of mankind — all that there is of comfort in the world that depends on the family organization — is to be traced to the goodness of God. Nothing more clearly marks the benignity and the wisdom of God than the arrangement by which people, instead of being solitary wanderers on the face of the earth, with nothing to bind them in sympathy, in love, and in interest to each other, are grouped together in families.

He bringeth out those which are bound with chains He releases the prisoners. That is, He delivers those who are unjustly confined in prison, and held in bondage. The principles of his administration are opposed to oppression and wrong, and in favor of the rights of man. The meaning is not that he always does this by his direct power, but that his law, his government, his requirements are all against oppression and wrong, and in favor of liberty. So <sup><1910></sup>Psalm 146:7, “The Lord looseth the prisoners.” Compare the notes at <sup><2300></sup>Isaiah 61:1.

But the rebellious dwell in a dry land The rebels; all who rebel against him. The word rendered dry land means a dry or arid place; a desert. The idea is, that the condition of the rebellious as contrasted with that of those whom God has under his protection would be as a fertile and well-watered field compared with a desert. For the one class he would provide a comfortable home; the other, the wicked, would be left as if to dwell in deserts and solitudes: In other words, the difference in condition between those who are the objects of his favor, and those who are found in proud rebellion against him, would be as great as that between such as have comfortable abodes in a land producing abundance, and such as are wretched and homeless wanderers in regions of arid sand. While God befriends the poor and the needy, while he cares for the widow and the orphan, he leaves the rebel to misery and want. The allusion here probably is to his conducting his people through the desert to the land of promise and of plenty; but still the passage contains a general truth in regard to the principles of his administration.

That is, in conducting them through the desert to the promised land. The statement in regard to the paternal character of God in the previous verses is here illustrated by his guiding his own people, when fleeing from a land of oppression, through the barren desert — and his interpositions there in their behalf. All that had been said of him in the previous verses is here confirmed by the provision which he made for their needs in their perilous journey through the wilderness.

The heavens also dropped at the presence of God That is, dropped down rain and food. The idea is that the very heavens seemed to be shaken or convulsed, so that rain and food were shaken down — as ripe fruit falls from a tree that is shaken. Compare the notes at <sup><2340></sup>Isaiah 34:4. So also, <sup><2340></sup>Isaiah 64:1-3. The meaning is not that the heavens themselves dropped down, but that they dropped or distilled rain and food.

Even Sinai itself was moved This was true; but this does not seem to be the idea intended here, for the words “even” and “was moved” are not in the original. The Hebrew is, literally, “This Sinai;” meaning probably “this was at Sinai,” or, “this took place at Sinai.” The correct translation perhaps would be, “The heavens distilled rain at the presence of God, this at Sinai, at the presence of God.”

At the presence of God, the God of Israel The whole region seemed to be moved and awed at the presence of God, or when he came down to visit his people. The earth and the heavens, all seemed to be in commotion.

Psalm 68:9. Thou, O God, didst send a plentiful rain Margin, shake out. Prof. Alexander, “a rain of free gifts.” The Septuagint and the Vulgate render it, “a voluntary or willing rain.” The Syriac, “the rain of a vow.” The Hebrew word translated “plentiful” means free, voluntary, of its own accord — hbdnj<sup><h5071></sup> — (See the notes at Psalm 51:12, where it is rendered free); then it means that which is given freely; and hence, abundantly. It means, therefore, in this place, plentiful, abundant. The reference, however, is to the manna, with which the people were supplied from day to day, and which seemed to be showered upon them in abundance. The word rendered “didst send” means properly to shake out, as if God shook the clouds or the heavens, and the abundant supplies for their needs were thus shaken out.

Whereby thou didst confirm thine inheritance, when it was weary Thou didst strengthen thy people when they were exhausted, or were in danger of fainting. In other words, God sent a supply of food — manna, quails, etc. — when they were in the pathless wilderness, and when they were ready to perish.

Psalm 68:10. Thy congregation hath dwelt therein In the land of promise; for the connection requires us to understand it in this manner. The idea of the writer all along pertains to that land, and to the mercy which God had shown to it. After showing by an historical reference what God had done for the people in the wilderness, he returns here, though without expressly mentioning it, to the land of promise, and to what God had done there for his people. The word tendered “congregation” — hyj<sup><h2421></sup> — means properly a beast, an animal, Genesis 1:30; 2:19; 8:19; 37:20. Then it comes to be used as a collective noun, meaning a herd or flock; thus, a troop of people, an array or host, 2 Samuel 23:11,13; and it is applied here to the people, under the idea so common in the Scriptures that God is a Shepherd.

Thou, O God, hast prepared of thy goodness for the poor For thy flock considered as poor or wretched. That is, Thou hast provided for them when they had no resources of their own — when they were a poor, oppressed, and afflicted people — wanderers wholly dependent on thee.

Psalm 68:11. The Lord gave the word The command, or the order. It is not certain to what the psalmist here refers; whether to some particular occasion then fresh in the recollection of the people, when a great victory had been gained, which it was the design of the psalm to celebrate; or whether it is a general statement in regard to the doings of God, having reference to all his victories and triumphs, and meaning that in all cases the command came from him. The subsequent verses make it evident that there is an allusion here to the ark of the covenant, and to the victories which had been achieved under that as a guide or protector. The entire psalm refers to the ark, and its triumphs; and the idea here seems to be, that in all the victories which had been achieved the “word” or the command came from God, and that its promulgation was immediately made by a “great company” who stood ready to communicate it or to “publish” it.

Great was the company of those that published it Margin, army. More literally, “The women publishing it were a great host.” The word used is in the feminine gender, and refers to the Oriental custom whereby females celebrated victories in songs and dances. See <sup><0150></sup>Exodus 15:20,21; <sup><0134></sup>Judges 11:34; 21:21; <sup><0806></sup>1 Samuel 18:6,7. The idea here is, that when there was a proclamation of war — when God commanded his people to go out to battle, and to take with them the ark, the females of the land — the singers — were ready to make known the proclamation; to celebrate the will of the Lord by songs and dances; to cheer and encourage their husbands, brothers, and fathers, as they went out to the conflict. The result is stated in the following verse.

Psalm 68:12. Kings of armies did flee apace Margin, as in Hebrew, did flee, did flee. This is the Hebrew mode of expressing that which is emphatic or superlative. It is by simply repeating the word. The idea is, that they fled speedily; they fled at once, and in alarm. <sup><0812></sup>Psalm 68:12,13 are marked by DeWette as a quotation, and the language is supposed by him to be the substance of the song that was sung by the women as referred to in <sup><981></sup>Psalm 68:11. This supposition is not improbable. The reference is, undoubtedly, to the former victories achieved by the people of God when they went out to war; and the idea is, that when the command came, when God gave the word (<sup><981></sup>Psalm 68:11), their foes fled in consternation.

And she that tarried at home divided the spoil The women remaining in their homes, while the men went out to war. On them devolved the office of dividing the plunder, and of giving the proper portions to each of the victors. They would take an interest in the battle, and receive the booty, and assign the portion due to each of the brave soldiers — the more acceptable as given to them by female hands. Possibly, however, the meaning may be, that the victors would bring the plunder home, and lay it at the feet of their wives and daughters to be divided among the women themselves. The dividing of the spoils of battle after a victory was always an important act. Compare <sup><1650></sup>Judges 5:30; <sup><1872></sup>Joshua 7:21; <sup><1377></sup>1 Chronicles 26:27; <sup><8704></sup>Hebrews 7:4.

<sup><983></sup>Psalm 68:13. Though ye have lien among the pots There are few passages in the Bible more difficult of interpretation than this verse and the following. Our translators seem to have supposed that the whole refers to the ark, considered as having been neglected, or as having been suffered to remain among the common vessels of the tabernacle, until it became like those vessels in appearance — that is, until its brilliancy had become tarnished by neglect, or by want of being cleaned and furbished — yet that it would be again like the wings of a dove covered with silver, as it had been formerly, and pure like the whitest snow. But it is not certain, if it is probable, that this is the meaning. Prof. Alexander renders it, “When ye lie down between the borders (ye shall be like) the wings of a dove covered with silver;” that is, “when the land had rest,” or was restored to a state of tranquility. DeWette renders it, “When ye rest between the cattle-stalls:” expressing the same idea, that of quiet repose as among the herds of cattle lying calmly down to rest. The Septuagint renders it, “Though you may have slept in kitchens.” The words rendered “Though ye have lien” mean literally, “If you have lain,” alluding to some act or state of lying down quietly or calmly. The verb is in the plural number, but it is not quite clear what it refers to. There is apparently much confusion of number in the passage. The word rendered “pots” — <sup><18240></sup>tpv, — in the dual form, occurs only in this place and in <sup><2603></sup>Ezekiel 40:43, where it is translated hooks (margin, end-irons, or the two hearth-stones). Gesenius renders it here “stalls,” that is, folds for cattle, and supposes that in Ezekiel it denotes places in the temple-court, where the victims for sacrifice were fastened. Tholuck renders it, “When you shall again rest within your stone-borders (that is, within the limits of your own country, or within your own borders), ye shall be like the wings of a dove.” For other interpretations of the passage, see Rosenmuller in loc. I confess that none of these explanations of the passage seem to me to be satisfactory, and that I cannot understand it. The wonder is not, however, that, in a book so large as the Bible, and written in a remote age, and in a language which has long ceased to be a spoken language, there should be here and there a passage which cannot now be made clear, but that there should be so few of that description. There is no ancient book that has not more difficulties of this kind than the Hebrew Scriptures:

Yet shall ye be as the wings of a dove covered with silver ... The phrase “yet shall ye be” is not in the original. The image here is simply one of beauty. The allusion is to the changeable colors of the plumage of a dove, now seeming to be bright silver, and then, as the rays of light fall on it in another direction, to be yellow as gold. If the allusion is to the ark, considered as having been laid aside among the ordinary vessels of the tabernacle, and having become dark and dingy by neglect, then the meaning would be, that, when restored to its proper place, and with the proper degree of attention and care bestowed upon it, it would become a most beautiful object. If the allusion is to the people of the land considered either as lying down in dishonor, as if among filth, or as lying down calmly and quietly as the beasts do in their stalls, or as peacefully reposing within their natural limits or borders, then the meaning would be, that the spectacle would be most beautiful. The varied tints of loveliness in the land — the gardens, the farms, the flowers, the fruits, the vineyards, the orchards, the villages, the towns, the cheerful homes — would be like the dove — the emblem of calmness — so beautiful in the variety and the changeableness of its plumage. The comparison of a beautiful and variegated country with a dove is not a very obvious one, and yet, in this view, it would not be wholly unnatural. It is not easy always to vindicate philosophically the images used in poetry; nor is it always easy for a Western mind to see the reasons of the images employed by an Oriental poet. It seems probable that the comparison of the land (considered as thus variegated in its beauty) with the changing beauties of the plumage of the dove is the idea intended to be conveyed by this verse; but it is not easy to make it out on strictly exegetical or philological principles.

Psalm 68:14. When the Almighty scattered kings in it The Hebrew here is, "In the scattering of (that is, by) the Almighty of kings." The reference is to the act of God in causing kings to abandon their purposes of invasion, or to flee when their own countries were invaded. Compare Psalm 48:5,6. The language here is so general that it might be applied to any such acts in the history of the Hebrew people; to any wars of defense or offence which they waged. It may have reference to the scattering of kings and people when Joshua invaded the land of Canaan, and when he discomfited the numerous forces, led by different kings, as the Israelites took possession of the country. The close connection of the passage with the reference to the journey through the wilderness (Psalm 68:7-9) would make it probable that this is the allusion. The phrase "in it," (margin, for her), refers doubtless to the land of Canaan, and to the victories achieved there.

It was white as snow in Salmon Margin, She was. The allusion is to the land of Canaan. But about the meaning of the phrase "white as snow in Salmon," there has been great diversity of opinion. The word rendered "was white as snow" is correctly rendered. It means to be snowy; then, to be white like snow. The verb occurs nowhere else. The noun is of frequent occurrence, and is always rendered snow. Exodus 4:6; Numbers 12:10; 2 Samuel 23:20; 2 Kings 5:27; et al. The word Salmon properly means shady, and was applied to the mountain here referred to, probably on account of the dark forests which covered it. That mountain was in Samaria, near Shechem. Judges 9:48. It is not known why the snow of that mountain is particularly alluded to here, as if there was any special whiteness or purity in it. It is probably specified by name only to give more vivacity to the description. There is much difference of opinion as to what is the meaning of the expression, or in what respects the land was thus white. The most common opinion has been that it was from the bones of the slain which were left to bleach unburied, and which covered the land so that it seemed to be white. Compare Virg. AEn. v. 865; xii. 36. Ovid uses similar language, Fast. i: "Humanis ossibus albet humus." So also Horace, Serra. 1,8: "Albis informem spectabant ossibus agrum." This interpretation of the passage is adopted by Rosenmuller, Gesenius, and DeWette. Others suppose it to mean that the land was like the dazzling whiteness of snow in the midst of blackness or darkness. This was the opinion of Kimchi, and this interpretation is adopted by Prof. Alexander. Tholuck supposes it to mean that, when war was waged on the kings and people, they fell as fast as snow-flakes on Mount Salmon; and that the idea is not so much the whiteness of the land, as the fact that they fell in great numbers, covering the land as the snow-flakes do. It is perhaps not possible to determine which of these explanations is correct. Either of them would accord with the meaning of the words and the general sense of the psalm. That of Tholuck is the most poetical, but it is less obvious from the Hebrew words used.

Psalm 68:15. The hill of God The phrase “the hill of God,” or the mountain of God, is elsewhere applied in the Scriptures only to Mount Horeb or Sinai (<sup><1198></sup>Exodus 3:1; 18:5; 24:13; <sup><1198></sup>1 Kings 19:8), and to Mount Zion, (<sup><924></sup>Psalm 24:3; <sup><2319></sup>Isaiah 30:29). There is no reason for supposing that there is a reference here to Mount Horeb or Sinai, as the psalm does not particularly relate to that mountain, and as there is nothing in the psalm to bring that mountain into comparison with other mountains. The allusion is, I think, clearly to Mount Zion; and the idea is, that that mountain, though it was not distinguished for its elevation or grandeur — though it had nothing in itself to claim attention, or to excite wonder — yet, from the fact that it had been selected as the place where God was to be worshipped, had an honor not less than that of the loftiest mountain, or than those which showed forth the divine perfections by their loftiness and sublimity. There is connected with this, also, the idea that, although it might be less defensible by its natural position, yet, because God resided there, it was defended by his presence more certainly than loftier mountains were by their natural strength. It should be remarked, however, that many other interpretations have been given of the passage, but this seems to me to be its natural meaning.

Is as the hill of Bashan Luther renders this, “The mount of God is a fruit-bearing hill; a great and fruitbearing mountain.” On the word Bashan, see the notes at <sup><2123></sup>Isaiah 2:13; 33:9; <sup><2212></sup>Psalm 22:12. Bashan was properly the region beyond Jordan, bounded on the north by Mount Hermon or the Anti-Libanus, and extending south as far as the stream Jabbok, and the mountains of Gilead. The “hill” of Bashan, or the “mountain of Bashan,” was properly Mount Hermon — the principal mountain pertaining to Bashan. The name Bashan was properly given to the country, and not to the mountain. The mountain referred to — Hermon — is that lofty range which lies on the east of the Jordan, and in the northern part of the country — a range some twelve thousand feet in height. See the notes at <sup><1916></sup>Psalm 42:6. It is the most lofty and distinguished mountain in Palestine, and the idea here, as above expressed, is, that Mount Zion, though not so lofty, or not having so much in itself to attract attention, was not less honored, and not less safe, as being the special dwelling-place of God.

An high hill ... Or rather; a mount of peaks or ridges as Bashan. Mount Hermon was not a single hill, or a detached mountain, but a chain of mountains — a range of lofty peaks or summits. So of Zion. It was by the presence and protection of God what Bashan was by its natural strength and grandeur. Comparatively low and unimportant as Zion was, it had in fact more in it to show what God is, and to constitute safety, than there was in the loftiness and grandeur of Bashan. The latter, though thus lofty and grand, had no “advantage” over Zion, but Zion might in every way be compared with that lofty range of hills which, by their natural position, their strength, and their grandeur, showed forth so much the greatness and glory of God. The teaching would be, as applied to Zion, or the Church, that there is “as much” there to show the divine perfections, to illustrate the greatness and the power of God, as there is in the most sublime works of nature; or that they who look upon the works of God in nature to learn his perfections, have no advantage over those who seek to learn what he is in his church.

<sup><1916></sup>Psalm 68:16. Why leap ye, ye high hills? That is, with exultation; with pride; with conscious superiority. Why do you seem to regard yourselves as so superior to Mount Zion, in strength, in beauty, in grandeur? The Hebrew, however — <sup><17520></sup>dxæ — rather means, “Why do ye watch insidiously? why do ye look askance at?” The word occurs only in this place. In Arabic it means to watch closely; to lie in wait for. This is the idea here. The mountains around Palestine — the mountains of the pagan world — the lofty hills — as if conscious of their grandeur, are represented as looking “askance,” in their pride, at Mount Zion; as eyeing it with silent contempt, as if it were not worthy of notice; as if it were so insignificant that it had no claim to attention. The idea is not that of “leaping,” as in our English Bible, or of “hopping,” as in the version of the Episcopal Prayer Book, but that of a look of silent disdain, as if, by their side, Zion, so insignificant, was not worthy of regard. “Perhaps,” by the high hills here, however, are disguisedly also represented the mighty powers of the pagan world, as if looking with contempt on the people of the land where Zion was the place of worship.

This is the hill which God desireth to dwell in The hill which “he” has selected as his abode, and which “he” has honored above all the mountains of the earth, by his permanent residence there. As such, Zion has an honor above the loftiest hills and ranges of mountains in the earth.

Yea, the LORD will dwell in it for ever Permanently; he will make it his fixed habitation on earth. Notwithstanding the envy or the contempt of surrounding hills, he will make this his settled abode. He has chosen it; he delights in it; he will not forsake it for the mountains and hills that are in themselves more grand and lofty.

Psalm 68:17. The chariots of God The meaning of this verse is, that God is abundantly able to maintain his position on Mount Zion; to defend the place which he had selected as his abode. Though it has less natural strength than many other places have — though other hills and mountains, on account of their natural grandeur, may be represented as looking on this with contempt, as incapable of defense, yet he who has selected it is fully able to defend it. He is himself encompassed with armies and chariots of war; thousands of angels guard the place which he has chosen as the place of his abode. “Chariots,” usually two-wheeled vehicles, often armed with scythes attached to their axles, were among the most powerful means of attack or defense in ancient warfare. See the notes at <sup><0807></sup>Psalm 20:7; 46:9; <sup><2301></sup>Isaiah 31:1; 37:24; Compare <sup><0247></sup>Exodus 14:7; <sup><0676></sup>Joshua 17:16; <sup><0705></sup>Judges 4:15.

Are twenty thousand A closer version is “two myriads,” or twice ten thousand. The original word is in the dual form. The language is designed to denote a very great number. A myriad was a great number; the idea here is that even “that” great number was doubled.

Even thousands of angels Margin, “many thousands.” The Hebrew is, “thousands repeated,” or “multiplied.” There is in the Hebrew no mention of angels. The Septuagint and the Vulgate render it, “thousands of the rejoicing;” that is, thousands of happy attendants. The original, however, would most naturally refer to the chariots, as being multiplied by thousands.

The Lord is among them The real strength, after all, is not in Zion itself, or in the chariots of the Lord surrounding it, but in the Lord himself. “He” is there as the Head of the host; He, as the Protector of his chosen dwelling-place.

As in Sinai, in the holy place literally, “The Lord is among them; Sinai, in the sanctuary.” The idea seems to be, that even Sinai with all its splendor and glory — the Lord himself with all the attending hosts that came down on Sinai — seemed to be in the sanctuary, the holy place on Mount Zion. All that there was of pomp and grandeur on Mount Sinai when God came down with the attending thousands of angels, was really around Mount Zion for its protection and defense.

~~688~~ Psalm 68:18. Thou hast ascended on high That is, Thou hast gone up to the high place; to thy throne; to thine abode. The idea is, that God had descended or come down from his dwelling-place in the case referred to in the psalm, and that having now secured a victory by vanquishing his foes, and having given deliverance to his people, he had now returned, or reascended to his seat. This may either mean his throne on earth, or his abode in heaven. It would seem most probable that the latter is the idea.

Thou hast led captivity captive “Thou hast made captivity captive,” or “Thou hast captured a captivity.” The main idea is, that he had achieved a complete victory; he had led all his foes captive. The language “would” also express the idea that he had made captives for himself of those who were captives to others, or who were in subjection to another. As applied in the Christian sense, this would refer to those who were captives to Satan, and who were held in bondage by him, but who had been rescued by the Redeemer, and brought under another captivity — the yielding of voluntary service to himself. Those once captives to sin were now led by him, captives in a higher sense. See the notes at ~~408~~ Ephesians 4:8.

Thou hast received gifts for men Margin, “in the man.” That is, “Among men,” or while among them as a conqueror. The idea here most naturally conveyed would be, that he had obtained “gifts,” privileges, advantages, “in” man; that is, that men, considered as captives, constituted the victory which he had achieved — the advantage which he had acquired. It was not so much “for” them as “in” them, and “by” them, to wit, by possessing them as captives or subjects to him. With this victory achieved, he had now ascended on high.

Yea, for the rebellious also Or, more properly, “even the rebellious.” That is, Those who had been in a state of rebellion he had subdued to himself, and had thus led captivity captive. It was a triumph by which they had become subdued to him.

That the LORD God might dwell among them literally, “For the dwelling of Jah, God.” The idea is, that he had achieved such a triumph; he had so brought the rebellious under subjection to himself, that he could take up his abode with them, or dwell with them as his people. His rule could be extended over them, and they would acknowledge him as their sovereign. This would be applicable to a people in ancient times that had been subdued by the people of God. It might now be properly applied, also, to sinners who by the power of truth have been so subdued as to submit to God. It is applicable to all who have been conquered by the Gospel — whose enmity has been slain — who have been changed from enemies to friends — so that the Lord may dwell in their hearts, or rule over them. This passage is applied by the apostle Paul (<sup><0408></sup>Ephesians 4:8) to the Messiah, not as having original reference to him, but as suggesting language which would appropriately express the nature of his work, and the glory of his triumph. See the notes at that place.

<sup><0889></sup>Psalm 68:19. Blessed be the Lord, who daily loadeth us with benefits ... literally, “day, day;” that is, day by day; or, constantly. The words “with benefits” are not in the original, and they do not convey the true idea of the passage. The word rendered “loadeth” means to take up; to lift, as a stone, <sup><0128></sup>Zechariah 12:3; to bear, to carry, <sup><0348></sup>Isaiah 46:3. Then it means “to take up and place upon a beast of burden;” to load, <sup><0340></sup>Isaiah 46:1; <sup><0443></sup>Genesis 44:13. Hence, it means to impose or lay a burden or a load on one; and the idea here is, “Blessed be the Lord God even if he lays a burden on us, and if he does this daily, for he is the God of our salvation.” He enables us to bear it; he gives us strength; and finally he delivers us from it. “Though,” therefore, he constantly lays on us a burden, he as constantly aids us to bear it. He does not leave us. He enables us to triumph in him, and through him; and we have occasion constantly to honor and to praise his name. This accords with the experience of all his people, that however heavy may be the burden laid on them, and however constant their trials, they find him as constant a helper, and they daily have occasion to praise and bless him.

Psalm 68:20. He that is our God is the God of salvation literally, “God is for us a God of salvation.” That is, The God whom we worship is the God from whom salvation comes, and who brings salvation to us. It is not a vain thing that we serve him, for he is the only being who can save us, and he will save us.

And unto GOD the Lord belong the issues from death The “outgoings” or “escapes” from death. That is, He only can save from death. The Hebrew word means, properly, a going forth, a deliverance; then, a place of going forth as a gate, <sup><2683></sup>Ezekiel 48:30; a fountain, <sup><3023></sup>Proverbs 4:23. Probably the only idea intended here by the psalmist was, that safety or deliverance from death proceeds solely from God. The sentiment, however, is true in a larger sense. All that pertains to deliverance from death, all that prepares for it, all that makes it easy to be borne, all that constitutes a rescue from its pains and horrors, all that follows death in a higher and more blessed world, all that makes death “final,” and places us in a condition where death is no more to be dreaded — all this belongs to God. All this is under his control. He only can enable us to bear death; he only can conduct us from a bed of death to a world where we shall never die.

Psalm 68:21. But God shall wound the head of his enemies More properly, “God shall crush the head,” etc. The idea is that of complete destruction, — as, if the head is crushed, life becomes extinct. See <sup><0085></sup>Genesis 3:15; compare <sup><3305></sup>Psalm 110:6.

And the hairy scalp More literally, “the top of the hair.” The Hebrew word used here for “scalp” means the vertex, the top, the crown, as of the head, where the hair “divides itself;” and the idea is properly, “the dividing of the hair.” Gesenius, Lexicon. The allusion is to the top of the head; that is, the blow would descend on the top of the head, producing death.

Of such an one as goeth on still in his trespasses Of the man who perseveres in a course of wickedness. If he repents, God will be merciful to him; if he persists in sin, he will be punished. The literal rendering would be, “the hairy scalp going on, or going [sc. “about”) in his trespasses.” The reference is to a wicked man “continuing” in his transgressions.

Psalm 68:22. The Lord said, I will bring again from Bashan On the situation of Bashan, see the notes at <sup><0985></sup>Psalm 68:15. There may be an allusion here to the victory achieved over Og, king of Bashan, in the time of Moses, <sup><0233></sup>Numbers 21:33-35. The idea may be that as, at that time, a victory was achieved over a formidable enemy, so in times of similar peril, God would deliver his people, and save them from danger. Or, as Bashan was the remote frontier of the holy land, the meaning may be, that God would bring his people from the remotest borders where they should be scattered. Another meaning is suggested by Professor Alexander, namely, that as the subject referred to in the subsequent verses is the “enemy” of God, the meaning may be that God would bring back his enemies for punishment, even from the remotest borders, when they were endeavoring to escape, and even when they supposed they were safe. The first of these opinions is probably the true one. God would rescue his people, as he had done from the attacks of the mighty king of Bashan; he would deliver them, as he had brought their fathers from the depths of the sea.

I will bring my people again from the depths of the sea The words “my people” are not in the Hebrew, but they seem to be not improperly supplied by the translators. If so, the allusion is to the interposition of God in conducting his people through the Red Sea (<sup><19142></sup>Exodus 14:22); and the idea is, that God would at all times interpose in their behalf, and deliver them from similar dangers.

<sup><19123></sup>Psalm 68:23. That thy foot may be dipped in the blood of thine enemies ... Margin, “red.” A more literal rendering would be, “That thou mayest crush — thy foot in blood — the tongue of thy dogs from the enemies, from him.” The idea of “dipping” the foot in blood is not in the passage directly; but the leading thought is that of “crushing” the enemy. It is then “added” that the foot would be in blood. So of the tongue of the dogs. The “meaning” is, that the tongues of dogs would be employed in licking up the blood of the enemies, though that is not “expressed” in so many words. The sense of the whole is, that the foes of the people would be slain.

<sup><19124></sup>Psalm 68:24. They have seen thy goings, O God That is, the lookers on in the solemn procession referred to in <sup><19125></sup>Psalm 68:25; or, in other words, Thy goings have been attended by pomp and magnificence, and have been witnessed by multitudes. The word “goings” here refers to the solemn triumphal processions which celebrated the victories achieved by God.

Even the goings of my God, my King The psalmist here speaks of God as “his” God and “his” King. The idea seems to have suddenly crossed his mind that this great God, so glorious, is “his” God. He exults and rejoices that He whom he adores is such a God; that a God so great and glorious is “his.” So the believer now, when he looks upon the works of God, when he contemplates their vastness, their beauty, and their grandeur, is permitted to feel that the God who made them is “his” God; to find consolation in the thought that his “Father made them all.”

“He looks abroad into the varied field
 Of Nature, and, though poor, perhaps, compared With those whose mansions glitter in his sight,
 Calls the delightful scenery all his own.
 His are the mountains, and the valleys his,
 And the resplendent rivers; — his to enjoy
 With a propriety that none can feel
 But who, with filial confidence inspired,
 Can lift to heaven an unpresumptuous eye,
 And smiling say, ‘My Father made them all!’
 Are they not his by a peculiar right,
 And by an emphasis of interest his,
 Whose eye they fill with tears of holy joy,
 Whose heart with praise, and whose exalted mind
 With worthy thoughts of that unwearied love
 That plann’d, and built, and still upholds a world
 So clothed with beauty for rebellious man?” — TASK, Boole v.

In the sanctuary Or, “to” the sanctuary; in other words, as the ark was borne to the sanctuary, the place appointed for its rest, for, as above remarked, the psalm seems to have been composed on such an occasion.

~~1825~~ Psalm 68:25. The singers went before That is, in the removal of the ark; in the solemn procession referred to in the previous verse. “In” that procession those who sang preceded those who performed on instruments of music. Compare ~~1338~~ 1 Chronicles 13:8; 15:16. “The players on instruments followed after.” The different classes of performers would naturally be ranged together. In ~~1338~~ 1 Chronicles 13:8, the following instruments of music are mentioned as having been employed on a similar occasion, if not on this very occasion — harps, psalteries, timbrels, cymbals, and trumpets.

Among them were the damsels playing with timbrels The true construction of the passage is, “Behind were the players in the midst of damsels playing.” The singers and the players were surrounded by these women playing on timbrels. The word rendered “playing with timbrels” — āpā<sup>48608</sup> — means to strike, to beat; and hence, to strike or beat upon a timbrel. A timbrel is a kind of drum, a tabret, or tambourine, usually beaten with the fingers. See a description of it in the notes at <sup>23152</sup>Isaiah 5:12, under the word “tabret.” It is an instrument which has been in use from the remotest antiquity.

<sup>49826</sup>Psalm 68:26. Bless ye God in the congregations In the assemblages of the people; not only as individuals, but in solemn processions; in triumphal marches; when the people are assembled together. In this public manner acknowledge God as the true God, and render him praise.

Even the Lord, from the fountain of Israel Margin, “Ye that are of;” that is, “of the fountain of Israel.” The margin has undoubtedly expressed the correct idea. The appeal is to the Hebrew people represented as descending from a common stock or ancestor — Jacob or Israel — as a stream or river flows from a fountain. Compare the notes at <sup>23801</sup>Isaiah 48:1; see also <sup>25101</sup>Isaiah 51:1; <sup>05333</sup>Deuteronomy 33:28. All the descendants of Jacob or Israel are thus called on to unite in solemnly praising the Lord their God.

<sup>49827</sup>Psalm 68:27. There is little Benjamin In that solemn procession. That is, the tribe of Benjamin is “represented” there; or, there are in the procession those who are connected with that tribe. The name “little” is given to the tribe either because Benjamin was the youngest of the sons of Jacob, or, more probably, because that tribe was among the smallest of the tribes of Israel. In fact, the tribe was so small, as compared with that of Judah, for instance, that, after the revolt of the ten tribes, the name of Benjamin was lost, and the whole nation was called, after the tribe of Judah, “Jews.”

With their ruler The word “with” is not in the original. The Hebrew is literally “ruling them.” This would seem to mean that, on the occasion referred to, Benjamin, or those who were connected with that tribe, had the oversight, or the direction of those who were engaged in this solemn procession. Though small, it had the preeminence on this occasion. To it was committed the important duty of presiding over these solemnities; that is, those who were prominent in the arrangements for the occasion were of the tribe of Benjamin. This seems to me to be a better explanation than to suppose, as Professor Alexander does, that it has reference to the enemies of the people of God, and that Benjamin had “conquered” or “subdued” them.

The princes of Judah The principal men of the tribe of Judah.

And “their council” Margin, “with their company.” The Hebrew word here, — hmgjri<sup>h7277</sup> — means crowd, throng, band. It never means “council.” The idea is, evidently, that large numbers of the tribe of Judah attended — that the “princes” or leaders were accompanied by throngs of their own people; in allusion to the fact that Judah was one of the largest of the tribes of Israel — and in contrast with Benjamin, which was few in number, and yet thus occupied the most honorable place as having “charge” of the arrangements.

The princes of Zebulun, and the princes of Naphtali These were remote or border tribes, and they seem to be mentioned here to show that all the tribes were represented; that is, that this was a national celebration. The fact that these tribes are mentioned as being represented on the occasion, proves that this psalm was composed before the revolt of the ten tribes, and the formation of the kingdom of Israel; that is, as “early” as the time of Solomon. This increases the probability that the psalm was written by David.

~~<888>~~ Psalm 68:28. Thy God hath commanded thy strength Has ordered thy strength to appear, or to be manifested. This is addressed, evidently, to the people of the land; and the idea is, that, on this occasion, God had called forth a full representation of the strength of the nation; or, as we should say, there had been a full “turn out.” It was an impressive sight, showing the real strength of the people.

Strengthen, O God, that which thou hast wrought for us Increase the strength thus manifested. Let it be still greater. The scene is now impressive and grand; make it still more so, by adding to the number and the prosperity of thy people. This is an illustration of the desire in the heart of every pious man that, whatever prosperity God may have given to his people, he would give a still larger measure — that however greatly he may have increased their numbers, he would add to them many more. This desire of the heart of piety will not be satisfied until the whole world shall be converted to God.

Psalm 68:29. Because of thy temple at Jerusalem The word rendered “temple” here properly means a palace; then, the abode of God considered as a king, or his residence as a king. It might, therefore, be applied either to the tabernacle or to the temple, erected as the special dwelling-place of God. As the word has so general a meaning, the passage here does not prove that the psalm was composed after Solomon’s temple was reared, for it may refer to the tabernacle that David set up for the ark on Mount Zion. See the notes at Psalm 5:7; 65:4.

At Jerusalem literally, “upon,” or “above” Jerusalem. Perhaps the idea is, that as the place of worship was built on Mount Zion, it was “above,” or seemed to “overhang” the city. The city was built mostly in the valleys that lay between the different hills or eminences — Mount Zion, Mount Moriah, Mount Ophel.

Shall kings bring presents unto thee In honor of God and his religion. Compare Psalm 72:10. See also the notes at Isaiah 49:7,23; 60:5,16.

Psalm 68:30. Rebuke the company of spearmen Margin, “the beasts of the reeds.” This is in the form of a prayer — “Rebuke;” but the idea is, that this “would” occur; and the meaning of the whole verse, though there is much difficulty in interpreting the particular expressions, is, that the most formidable enemies of the people of God, represented here by wild beasts, would be subdued, and would be made to show their submission by bringing presents — by “pieces of silver,” or, with tribute. Thus the idea corresponds with that in the previous verse, that “kings would bring presents.” The rendering in the margin here expresses the meaning of the Hebrew. It “might” perhaps be possible to make out from the Hebrew the sense in our common translation, but it is not the “obvious” meaning, and would not accord so well with the scope of the passage. On the word rendered “company,” which primarily means an animal, see the notes at Psalm 68:10. It is applied to an army as being formidable, or terrible, “like” a wild beast. The word rendered “spearmen” — hnq, <sup>h7070</sup> — means “a reed” or “cane;” “calamus.” Compare the notes at Isaiah 42:3; 36:6. This phrase, “the beast of the reeds,” would properly denote a wild beast, as living among the reeds or canes that sprang up on the banks of a river, and having his home there. It would thus, perhaps, most naturally suggest the crocodile, but it might also be applicable to a lion or other wild beast that had its dwelling in the jungles or bushes on the banks of a river. Compare Jeremiah 49:19; 50:44. The comparison here would, therefore, denote any powerful and fierce monarch or people that might be compared with such a fierce beast. There is no particular allusion to Egypt, as being the abode of the crocodile, but the reference is more general, and the language would imply that fierce and savage people — kings who might be compared with wild beasts that had their homes in the deep and inaccessible thickets — would come bending with the tribute money, with pieces of silver, in token of their subjection to God.

The multitude of the bulls Fierce and warlike kings, who might be compared with bulls. See the notes at ~~19212~~ Psalm 22:12.

With the calves of the people That is, the nations that might be compared with the calves of such wild herds — fierce, savage, powerful. Their leaders might be compared with the bulls; the people — the multitudes — were like the wild and lawless herd of young ones that accompanied them. The general idea is, that the most wild and savage nations would come and acknowledge their subjection to God, and would express that subjection by an appropriate offering.

Till every one submit himself with pieces of silver The word here rendered “submit” means properly to tread with the feet, to trample upon; and then, in the form used here, to let oneself be trampled under feet, to prostrate oneself; to humble oneself. Here it means that they would come and submissively offer silver as a tribute. That is, they would acknowledge the authority of God, and become subject to him.

Scatter thou the people that delight in war Margin, “He scattereth.” The margin expresses the sense most accurately. The reference is to God. The psalmist sees the work already accomplished. In anticipation of the victory of God over his foes, he sees them already discomfited and put to flight. The mighty hosts which had been arrayed against the people of God are dissipated and driven asunder; or, in other words, a complete victory is obtained. The people that “delighted in war” were those that had a pleasure in arraying themselves against the people of God — the enemies that had sought their overthrow.

~~19681~~ Psalm 68:31. Princes shall come out of Egypt That is, Shall come and acknowledge the true God. Egypt is referred to here as one of the most prominent of the foreign nations then known; and the idea is, that the distinguished men of foreign nations — the rulers and princes of the world — would come and submit themselves to God, and be united to his people.

The word rendered “princes” here —  $\hat{m}\ddot{a}j\ \ddot{a}e$  <sup>42831</sup> — occurs nowhere else in the Scriptures. It means, according to Gesenius (Lexicon), the fat; then, the rich; the opulent; nobles. It is the word from which the name “Hasmonean” (or Asmonean), which was given by the Jews to the Maccabees, or Jewish princes in the time of the Jewish history between the Old and New Testaments, is supposed to have been derived. The Septuagint, the Vulgate, and the Syriac, render it “legates” or “ambassadors.” Luther renders it “princes.” The reference is undoubtedly to men of station or rank.

Shall soon stretch out her hands literally, “Shall make its hands to run.” The expression denotes the eagerness or haste with which it would be done. The act is an act of supplication, and the reference is to prayer.

Unto God To the true God. The nation will supplicate the mercy of God, or will worship him. The idea, in accordance with that in the previous verses, is, that the country here referred to would become subject to the true God. It is a view of the future; of the time when the nations would be converted to the true faith, or would acknowledge the true God. Whether this refers to the Cush in Arabia, or to the Cush in Africa (Ethiopia as commonly understood), it is a description of what will yet occur, for all these lands, and all other lands, will be converted to the true religion, and will stretch out their hands in supplication and prayer, and will find acceptance with God. Even Africa — wronged, degraded, oppressed, injured Africa — will do it; and the worship of her children will be as acceptable to the Universal Father as that of any other of the races of mankind that dwell on the earth.

<sup>4882</sup>Psalm 68:32. Sing unto God, ye kingdoms of the earth That is — that acknowledge the true God — celebrate his praise. The psalmist sees the conversion of the world to God to be so certain an event that he calls on all nations to join in the song.

<sup>4883</sup>Psalm 68:33. To him that rideth upon the heavens of heavens The highest heavens. The heaven of heaven would properly mean the heaven above that which is heaven to us; that is, the heaven above the sky. This is represented as the special dwelling-place of God. The Jews were accustomed to speak of three heavens:

- (a) The aerial heaven, or the region above us, where the birds fly, and the winds blow;
- (b) the starry heavens, or the firmament in which the stars are fixed; and
- (c) the heaven above all, the abode of God and of angels.

The word “rideth” here means that he appears there as a conqueror, or that he moves in majesty and glory. See the notes at <sup><9810></sup>Psalm 18:10.

Which were of old The words “of old” refer here to the heavens, and denote their antiquity. He rides upon those ancient heavens. He occupies a position above those ancient works of his power.

Lo, he doth send out his voice Margin, as in Hebrew, “give.” The reference is to thunder. The design of this is to increase the impression of his majesty and power.

His excellency is over Israel His majesty; his glory; his protecting care. The idea is, that his glorious character — his majesty — was manifested particularly in his protection of his people.

And his strength is in the clouds Margin, “heavens.” The Hebrew word rather means “clouds.” The idea is, that while his character as Protector was evinced particularly in his care of his people, his “power” was particularly seen in the clouds — the storm — the thunder — the lightning. Thus, all the manifestations of his character, alike in nature, and toward his people, are adapted to produce a deep and solemn impression in regard to his majesty and glory, or to lay the just foundation of praise.

<sup><9835></sup>Psalm 68:35. O God, thou art terrible out of thy holy places The places where thou dwellest, and from which thou dost manifest thyself. That is, The manifestations which thou dost make of thyself when thou seemest to come forth from thine abode are “terrible,” or are suited to fill the mind with awe. Compare the notes at <sup><9814></sup>Psalm 45:4; 65:5; 66:5.

The God of Israel The God who is adored by Israel, or by his true people; our God.

Is he that giveth strength and power unto his people He is not weak and feeble. He is able to protect them. He shows that he can gird them with strength; that he can defend them; that he can sustain them in the trials of life. The God whom they acknowledge as their God is not one whose strength fails, or who is seen to be feeble and powerless when his aid is needed. He is fully equal to all their needs, and they never trust him in vain. “Blessed be God.” For all that he is, for all that he has done. This is the language of joy and praise in view of the contemplation of his character as depicted in the psalm. At the close of every right contemplation of his character, his government, his plans, his claims, his law, his gospel, the heart that is right will say, “Blessed be such a God.” To one endowed with “such” attributes, praise — everlasting praise — is due.

APPENDIX NOTES ON PSALM 68

The title confines itself to the announcement that the psalm was composed by David, and set apart by him for the public service; but is silent as to the occasion on which it was composed. For determining this last point, we have nothing therefore to look to except internal reasons. Many expositors, and latterly Stier, have come to the conclusion that the psalm was written on the occasion when the ark of the covenant was brought to Mount Zion: compare at Psalm 24. Others again have adopted the idea that the occasion must have been the termination of some war, when the ark was brought back to the holy mountain. This last view is the correct one. A strong argument in its favor is drawn from the circumstance that God is throughout celebrated decidedly as the Lord of battle and of victory. The introductory clause, “God arises, his enemies are scattered, and they who hate him flee before him,” gives forth at the very beginning the fundamental tone, and the subject of the whole psalm; while at the same time, in a psalm composed for such an occasion, and of such a length, many other subjects would certainly be introduced. Further, we are led to a victory as the occasion by <sup><19818></sup>Psalm 68:18, which, like <sup><19576></sup>Psalm 67:6, “The earth gave its increase,” announces the matter of fact which called forth the psalm, and which ought to be considered as supplementary to the title, and should properly be printed in large characters. Then we have the epithets which are applied in <sup><19817></sup>Psalm 68:17 to Benjamin and Judah, and, finally, the close fitting in to the victory-song of Deborah: inasmuch as the author, in <sup><1987></sup>Psalm 68:7,8, at the very beginning of his chief division, refers verbally to the beginning of the chief division of this song, he declares, as distinctly as possible, that he walks in the footsteps of Deborah, and that his song is to be considered as a continuation or resumption of hers, exactly as with manifest design, by the reference in the opening verse of the psalm to the language of Moses, he intimates that the text and the subject of the whole are taken from him.

We have two data to guide us in our inquiry as to what particular battle and victory the triumphal procession in the sanctuary belongs, at which, according to <sup><1987></sup>Psalm 68:24-27, the psalm was sung. First, the psalm must have been composed at a time when the sanctuary of the Lord was on Mount Zion (<sup><1985></sup>Psalm 68:15,16,29,35). The choice is thus very much narrowed. There remain only two great victories, the Syrian-Edomite and the Ammonitic-Syrian. Second, in the war referred to in this psalm, the ark of the covenant must have been in the field according to <sup><1981></sup>Psalm 68:1,24. It is evident from <sup><1011></sup>2 Samuel 11:11, that this was the case in the Ammonitic war. We may therefore with great probability conclude that the psalm was composed after the capture of Rabbah (<sup><1026></sup>2 Samuel 12:26-31), which terminated that war, the most dangerous with which David had to do. It was quite in accordance with David's usual manner to celebrate a great religious festival at the close of such a war. The closing character which our psalm so manifestly bears, is in favor of this view. That war was the last important external war in which David engaged, and from existing circumstances he might pretty confidently conclude that it would be so. The name of Solomon, which soon after this he gave to his son, shows that he considered peace as secured for a long time. — Hengstenberg.

<sup><1980></sup>Psalm 68:10. Thou, O God, hast prepared of thy goodness for the poor The acknowledgment refers to the gracious attention of God to Israel, his pensioners, while they sojourned in the wilderness. They were destitute of all ordinary supplies; but “he commanded the clouds from above, and opened the doors of heaven, and rained down manna upon them to eat, and gave them of the grain of heaven. Man did eat angels' food: he sent them meat to the full.” We are not to look for miraculous provision; but God has not forsaken the earth, nor forgotten to be gracious. Let us observe the nature of this goodness, and the subjects for whom it is prepared. The goodness of God appears in the produce of the ground even for the brute creation. Indeed man is concerned in their support; and a deficiency with regard to them would materially affect his own welfare. But while the Lord cares for oxen, and causes the grass to grow for the cattle, he provides grain for the more immediate service of man ... But we are here reminded not only of the nature of his goodness, but the subjects of it: "Thou, O God, hast prepared of thy goodness for the poor." It is not for them exclusively. "The king is served by the field." A supply for the poor is of course a supply for the rich; and it is easy to see that a suspension of the divine goodness would involve all ranks. The rich can no more create than the poor; and should the course of vegetation be stopped by Him who has power to destroy as well as to produce, what profit would a man have of all the wealth he possessed? Wealth would be nothing if it could not be laid out: and if the time ever came, which the Lord forbid! in which there was neither earing nor harvest, the proprietor, as well as the peasant and the pauper, would perish. But it is spoken in reference to the poor, because, First, they are the larger mass of mankind; and whatever pride may think, in the eye of reason, policy, and revelation, by far the most important, useful, and necessary part. Secondly, they would be more especially affected by deficiency. Dear purchases can be made by the rich, who, as the price of provisions advances, can follow it. But the poor are speedily straitened, and become a prey to scarceness; and every door is shut against them but that of precarious charity. Thirdly, to encourage those in humble and trying life to depend upon him. What he did formerly he does now. He prepares of his goodness for the poor. He may try you, and require proof of your confidence, before he communicates relief: but "the needy shall not always be forgotten, the expectation of the poor shall not perish forever." "Trust in the Lord, and do good, and dwell in the land, and verily thou shalt be fed." And "a little that a righteous man hath is better than the riches of many wicked." Fourthly, to enforce our attention to them front the divine example. We see how he had his eye upon the poor in the Jewish economy. It is delightful to read the various provisions concerning them in the law of Moses. All the earth spontaneously yielded, the seventh year, belonged to the poor. At harvest the owners were not to cut down the corners of their fields; they were to scatter some handfuls behind them for the gleaner; and if they dropped a sheaf, they were not to go back for it. — Jay.

Psalm 68:13. Though ye have lien among the pots ... Professor Alexander renders when ye lie down between the borders, (ye shall be like) the wings of a dove covered with silver and her pinions with yellow gold. The general idea, he adds, seems to be that when "the land had rest," her condition was one of peaceful prosperity. The common version of the first clause (though ye hare lien among the pots) is justified neither by rabbinical tradition nor the ancient versions. The Hebrew noun occurs only here, and in <sup><308></sup>Ezekiel 40:43, where it is equally obscure, and the cognate forms in <sup><404></sup>Genesis 49:14; <sup><056></sup>Judges 5:16: are scarcely less so. The only meaning, besides those already mentioned, which has any probability, is that of folds or sheep-cotes, lying among which might be viewed as a poetical figure for rural or pastoral repose, thus amounting to the same thing with the first translation, which describes the people as residing quietly between the borders, that is, within the boundaries or frontiers of their territory, now once more forsaken by the enemy. The beautiful allusion in the last clause to the changeable colors of a dove's plumage seems intended to suggest the idea of a peaceful but splendid prosperity.

<sup><068></sup>Psalm 68:18. Thou hast ascended ... As the passage is applied by Paul in a more spiritual sense to Christ (<sup><408></sup>Ephesians 4:8), it may be necessary to show how this agrees with the meaning and scope of the psalmist. It may be laid down as an incontrovertible truth that David, in reigning over Christ's ancient people, shadowed forth the beginning of Christ's eternal kingdom. This must appear evident to every one who remembers the promise made to him of a never-failing succession, and which received its verification in the person of Christ. As God illustrated his power in David by exalting him with the view of delivering his people, so has he magnified his name in his only-begotten Son. But let us consider more particularly how the parallel holds. Christ, before he was exalted, emptied himself of his glory, having not merely assumed the form of a servant, but humbled himself to the death of the cross. To show how exactly the figure was fulfilled, Paul notices that what David had foretold was accomplished in the person of Christ by his being cast down to the lowest parts of the earth, in the reproach and ignominy to which he was subjected, before he ascended to the right hand of his Father (<sup><927></sup>Psalm 22:7). That in thinking upon the ascension, we might not confine our views to the body of Christ, our attention is called to the result and fruit of it in his subjecting heaven and earth to his government. Those who were formerly his inveterate enemies he compelled to submission and made tributary — this being the effect of the word of the gospel to lead people to renounce their pride and their obstinacy, to bring down every high thought which exalteth itself, and reduce the senses and the affections of people to obedience unto Christ. As to the devils and reprobate people who are instigated to rebellion and revolt by obstinate malice, he holds them bound by a secret control, and prevents them from executing intended destruction. So far the parallel is complete. Nor when Paul speaks of Christ having given gifts to people, is there any real inconsistency with what is here stated, although he has altered the words, having followed the Greek version in accommodation to the unlearned reader. It was not himself that God enriched with the spoils of the enemy, but his people; and neither did Christ seek or need to seek his own advancement, but made his enemies tributary, that he might adorn his church with the spoil. From the close union subsisting between the head and members, to say that God manifest in the flesh received gifts from the captives, is one and the same thing with saying that he distributed them to his church. What is said in the close of the verse is no less applicable to Christ — that he obtained his victories that as God he might dwell among us. Although he departed, it was not that he might remove to a distance from us; but, as Paul says, “that he might fill all things” (~~4040~~Ephesians 4:10). By his ascension to heaven the glory of his divinity has been only more illustriously displayed, and though no longer present with us in the flesh, our souls receive spiritual nourishment from his body and blood, and we find, notwithstanding distance of place, that his flesh is meat indeed, and his blood drink indeed. — Calvin.

The ascent of the ark, in which God was present, into Zion, prefigured the ascent of Christ into heaven. As God came down to fight for his people, so Christ had descended to this earth for the salvation of mankind. As, on the return of the ark, the captives and the spoil appeared in the procession, so on the return of Christ in triumph to heaven (~~5015~~Colossians 2:15), He led captive sin and death, and hell, and all evil powers. As God had taken tribute among people, which he, however, as the victorious monarch of Israel, had given to Israel, so Christ also had taken gifts among people (in his human nature and through his work on earth) which he now, as ascended Lord, gave to people. The apostle sees that when a king takes, he takes to give, and therefore substitutes the one word for the other, without at all putting the one word as the translation of the other. He seizes the idea and represents it in its true fulfillment. Calvin has some excellent remarks on the principle of interpretation to be followed here. — Perowne.

NOTES ON PSALM 69

This psalm is said in the title to be a psalm of David, but on what occasion it was composed is not there intimated, nor can it be determined from the psalm itself. There is nothing “in” the psalm which is inconsistent with the supposition that it was composed by David; and, in fact, it has, in many respects, a strong resemblance to not a few of his undoubted compositions, as Psalm 6; Psalm 22; Psalm 25; Psalm 35; Psalm 38. Compare Psalm 42. On the expression in the title “To the chief Musician,” see Notes in the Introduction to Psalm 4. On the words “upon Shoshannim,” see the notes on the Title to Psalm 45.

On what occasion in the life of David the psalm was written cannot now be determined. There were many occasions in his life to which all that is said in the psalm might be applicable, for his was a life of many trials and perils; but the most natural interpretation would be that which ascribes it to the time of the rebellion of Absalom. Some have supposed that it was written at a later period than the time of David. Thus De Wette maintains that the closing verses (~~69:34~~ Psalm 69:34-36) demonstrate that it must have been written in the time of the exile. Rosenmuller coincides with that opinion in regard to those verses, but supposes that they were added to the psalm (as originally composed) by some later author. It will be found, however, on examination of these verses, that there is nothing in them inconsistent with the supposition that the entire psalm was composed by David. The psalm evidently pertains to an individual sufferer; a man who regarded himself as suffering in the cause of religion, or on account of his zeal for the service of God. It is this fact which is laid at the foundation of the psalmist’s prayer for the divine intervention. The author is a sufferer in the cause of God and of truth, and he beseeches God, in whose cause he suffers, on that account to interpose in his behalf.

There are several passages in the psalm which are applied in the New Testament to the Messiah and his times; ~~69:9~~ Psalm 69:9, compare ~~17~~ John 2:17, and ~~51:3~~ Romans 15:3; ~~69:4~~ Psalm 69:4, compare ~~52:5~~ John 15:25; ~~69:21~~ Psalm 69:21, compare ~~27:34,48~~ Matthew 27:34,48 (~~15:23~~ Mark 15:23, and ~~69:29~~ John 19:29); ~~69:25~~ Psalm 69:25, compare ~~23:38~~ Matthew 23:38, and ~~40:1~~ Acts 1:20. These passages, however, are of so “general” a character that they do not seem to have been designed to refer exclusively to the Messiah, or even to have had “any” original reference to him. The language is such that it “would accurately describe” the events to which it is applied; and the fact that the language is quoted in this manner in the New Testament history does not prove that the psalm had any original reference to the Messiah.

In the psalm, the sufferer first (<sup><3901></sup>Psalm 69:1-6) describes his condition; he then (<sup><3907></sup>Psalm 69:7-13) represents himself as suffering in the cause of God or of religion; then (<sup><3914></sup>Psalm 69:14-18), prays to be delivered from these troubles. In <sup><3919></sup>Psalm 69:19-21 he again adverts to his sufferings with a more explicit reference to their cause, the malice of his enemies; and then (<sup><3922></sup>Psalm 69:22-28) prays that his enemies may be destroyed. He anticipates that his prayer will be heard, and that this will have a favorable effect on others, leading them to praise God (<sup><3929></sup>Psalm 69:29-33); and this leads him to look forward to the general prosperity of Zion — to the fact that Zion will be delivered out of all its troubles — as laying the foundation for universal praise (<sup><3934></sup>Psalm 69:34-36).

<sup><3901></sup>Psalm 69:1. Save me, O God That is, Interpose and deliver me from the dangers which have come upon me.

For the waters are come in unto my soul So as to endanger my life. Waters, deep, raging, overwhelming, are images of calamity or danger. See the notes at <sup><3916></sup>Psalm 32:6. Compare <sup><3917></sup>Psalm 42:7.

<sup><3902></sup>Psalm 69:2. I sink in deep mire Margin, as in Hebrew, “the mire of the depth.” This would denote either mire which was itself so deep that one could not extricate himself from it; or, mire found in a deep place, as at the bottom of a pit. Compare the notes at <sup><3912></sup>Psalm 40:2. An illustration of this might be drawn from the case of Joseph, cast by his brethren into a deep pit (<sup><013724></sup>Genesis 37:24); or from the case of Jeremiah, thrown into a deep dungeon: “And they let down Jeremiah with cords; and in the dungeon there was no water, but mire: so Jeremiah sunk in the mire,” <sup><3916></sup>Jeremiah 38:6.

Where there is no standing No solid ground; nothing for the foot to rest on. “I am come into deep waters.” Margin, as in Hebrew, “depth of waters.” That is, waters where he could not touch the bottom — an image of some peril that threatened his life.

Where the floods overflow me The waters. They break over my head. My life is “in danger.”

Psalm 69:3. I am weary of my crying The word “crying” here does not mean weeping, or shedding tears, but calling upon God for help. He had grown weary; his strength had been exhausted in the act of calling upon God to assist him. See the notes at Psalm 6:6. This was an instance where one had called so long on God, and prayed so much and so earnestly, that his strength was gone. Compare Matthew 26:41.

My throat is dried Or, “is parched up.” The Hebrew word denotes to burn; to be enkindled; and then, to be inflamed. Here it means that by the excessive exertion of his voice, his throat had become parched, so that he could not speak.

Mine eyes fail That is, become dim from exhaustion. I have looked so long in that one direction that the power of vision begins to fail, and I see nothing clearly. See the notes at Psalm 6:7. Compare Job 17:7; Psalm 31:9; 38:10.

While I wait for my God That is, by continued “looking” to God. The word “wait” is not used here, nor is it generally in the Bible, as it is now with us, in the sense of looking for “future” interposition, or of doing nothing ourselves in expectation of what “may” occur; but it is used in the sense of looking to God alone; of exercising dependence on him; of seeking his aid. This is indeed connected with the ordinary idea of abiding his will, but it is also an “active” state of mind — a state expressive of intense interest and desire. See the notes at Psalm 62:5.

Psalm 69:4. They that hate me without a cause Without any just reason; without any provocation on my part. There were many such in the case of David, for to those who rose up against him in the time of Saul, and to Absalom also, he had given no real occasion of offence. An expression similar to the one used here occurs in Psalm 35:19. See the notes at that passage. The “language” is applied to the Saviour (John 15:25), not as having had original reference to him, but as language which received its most perfect fulfillment in the treatment which he received from his enemies. See the notes at John 15:25.

Are more than the hairs of mine head The number is so great that it cannot be estimated.

They that would destroy me, being mine enemies wrongfully, are mighty literally, “More than the hairs of my head are my haters falsely [those who hate me falsely); strong are those destroying me; my enemies.” The idea is, that those who were numbered among his foes without any just provocation on his part were so numerous and strong that he could not contend with them.

Then I restored that which I took not away Prof. Alexander renders this, “What I did not rob, then must I restore.” This seems to have a proverbial cast, and the idea is, that under this pressure of circumstances — borne down by numbers — he was compelled to give up what he had not taken away from others. They regarded and treated him as a bad man — as if he had been a robber; and they compelled him to give up what he possessed, “as if” he had no right to it, or “as if” he had obtained it by robbery. This does not seem to refer to anything that was “voluntary” on his part — as if, for the sake of peace, he had proposed to give up that to which they had no claim, or to surrender his just rights, but to the act of compulsion by which he was “forced” to surrender what he had, “as if” he had been a public offender. How far it is proper to yield to an unjust claim for the sake of peace, or to act “as if” we had done wrong, rather than to have controversy or strife, is a point which, if this interpretation is correct, is not settled by this passage. It seems here to have been merely a question of “power.”

Psalm 69:5. O God, thou knowest my foolishness The errors and follies of my life. Though conscious of innocence in this case — though he felt that his enemies hated him “without cause,” and that they took what belonged to him and not to them, yet he was not insensible to the fact that he was a sinner, and he was not unwilling to confess before God, that, however conscious of uprightness he might be in his dealings toward people, yet toward God, he was a sinful man. From him he deserved all that had come upon him. Indeed the very calamities which had been permitted to come upon him were proof to his own mind that he was a sinner, and served, as they were doubtless designed, to turn his mind to that fact, and to humble him. The effect of calamities coming upon us, as reminding us of the fact that we are sinners, is often referred to in the Psalms. See Psalm 38:2-4; 40:12.

And my sins are not hid from thee Margin, “guiltiness.” The word used here has always attached to it the idea of “guilt.” The meaning is, that God knew all his life; and that however unjust the conduct of “men” toward him might be when they treated him as if he had wronged them, yet considered as a part of the dealings of God, or as having been suffered to come upon him from God, all that had occurred was right, for it was a proper expression of the divine displeasure against his sins. We may feel that we have not wronged our fellow-men; yet even the treatment which we receive from them, however unjust so far as they are concerned, may be regarded as deserved by us at the hand of God, and as proper on his part as an expression of his displeasure for our transgressions against him, and as a proof that we are sinners. Trial never comes to us from any quarter except as founded on the fact that we are sinners; and even where there is entire innocence toward our fellow-men, God may make use of their passions to rebuke and discipline us for our sins toward himself.

Psalm 69:6. Let not them that wait on thee Those who worship thee; those who are thy true friends. True piety is often, in the Scriptures, represented as waiting on the Lord. See Psalm 25:3,5; 37:9; Isaiah 40:31.

Be ashamed for my sake On account of me; or, in consequence of what I do. Let me not be suffered to do anything that would make them ashamed of me, or ashamed to have it known that I belong to their number. I know that I am a sinner; I know that judgments come justly on me; I know that if left to myself I shall fall into sin, and shall dishonor religion; and I pray, therefore, that I may be kept from acting out the depravity of my heart, and bringing dishonor on the cause that I profess to love. No one who knows the evil of his own heart can fail to see the propriety of this prayer; no one who remembers how often people high in the church, and zealous in their professed piety, fall into sin, and disgrace their profession, can help feeling that what has happened to others “may” happen to him also, and that he has need of special prayer, and special grace, that he may go down into the grave at last without having brought dishonor upon religion.

Let not those that seek thee Another phrase to denote people of true piety — as those who are “seeking” after God; that is, who are desirous of understanding his character, and obtaining his favor.

Be confounded for my sake Let them not feel “disgraced” in me; let them not feel it a dishonor to have it said that I am one of their number, or that I profess to be united to them.

Psalm 69:7. Because for thy sake I have borne reproach In thy cause; in defense of thy truth; because I have professed to be a friend of God. The true reason why these calamities have come upon me is that I have been thy professed friend, and have endeavored to do my duty to thee. The reproach connected with religion in a world of sin, or where true religion is hated, has fallen on me.

Shame hath covered my face The idea here is not that he had himself been ashamed of religion or of the service of God, but that he had suffered shame, derision, reproach among people for his professed attachment to the truth. Compare <sup><19415></sup>Psalm 44:15,16.

<sup><19308></sup>Psalm 69:8. I am become a stranger unto my brethren That is, They treat me as they would a stranger; as one in whom they have no interest, and whom they regard with no friendship. Compare the notes at <sup><19311></sup>Psalm 31:11.

And an alien unto my mother's children A foreigner; one of another tribe or nation; one to whom they were bound by no tie of relationship. The allusion in the language “unto my mother’s children” is intended to denote the most intimate relationship. In families where a man had many wives, as was common among the Hebrews, the nearest relationship would be denoted by being of the same “mother” rather than of the same “father.” See the notes at <sup><19311></sup>Psalm 50:20. The same thing occurs also where polygamy is not practiced, in cases where a man has married more wives than one. The idea of the psalmist here, therefore, is, that his nearest relatives treated him as if he were a stranger and a foreigner. Compare <sup><19313></sup>Job 19:13-19.

<sup><19309></sup>Psalm 69:9. For the zeal of thine house hath eaten me up My zeal — my ardor — in the cause of religion (that is, of thy pure worship) has been so great as to consume me. It has been like a devouring fire within me. Zeal is represented under the idea of heat — as it is in the Greek language; and the characteristics of heat or fire are here applied to it. This passage is quoted in <sup><19317></sup>John 2:17, and applied to the Saviour, not as having had originally a reference to him, but as language which would accurately describe his character. See the notes at that passage.

And the reproaches of them that reproached thee are fallen upon me This, too, is applied, in the same way, to the Saviour, by the Apostle Paul, in <sup><19318></sup>Romans 15:3. See the notes at that passage.

Psalm 69:10. When I wept, and chastened my soul with fasting The words “and chastened” are not in the original. The literal translation would be, “And I wept (away) my soul with fasting;” that is, I gave myself so much to fasting accompanied with weeping, that my strength was exhausted. This refers to his acts of devotion; to his endeavors to discipline his soul so as to lead a strictly religious life.

That was to my reproach This may either mean that they accused him of hypocrisy and insincerity; or, that they charged him with folly for being so religious, so strict, so self-sacrificing, so serious — perhaps they would say, so superstitious, so gloomy, so fanatical. The latter best accords with the connection, since it was for his “religion” mainly that they reproached him, <sup><8917></sup>Psalm 69:7-9.

Psalm 69:11. I made sackcloth also my garment I put on sackcloth. This was often done as expressive of grief and sorrow. See the notes at <sup><8911></sup>Psalm 30:11; 35:13. Compare <sup><2212></sup>Isaiah 22:12; <sup><7118></sup>Daniel 9:3. In the case here referred to, this was an act of religion; an expression of penitence and humiliation.

And I became a proverb to them A jest; a subject of derision; a by-word. They ridiculed me for it. Compare <sup><1007></sup>1 Kings 9:7.

Psalm 69:12. They that sit in the gate speak against me The gates of cities were places of concourse; places where business was transacted; places where courts were frequently held. See the notes at <sup><8217></sup>Job 29:7. Compare <sup><2143></sup>Isaiah 14:31; 28:6; <sup><1914></sup>Psalm 9:14. Calvin supposes that as the gates were the places where the judges sat to administer justice, the meaning here is that magistrates, or those who were high in rank and power, joined in the cry of reproach against him. The more probable interpretation, however, is, that he was subject to the reproach of those who were gathered around these places — the people of business, and the idlers who were assembled there; or, as we should say, that he was the subject of “towntalk.”

And I was the song of the drunkards Margin, as in the Hebrew, “drinkers of strong drink.” They made ballads or low songs about me. They selected me for an example in their drunken songs. David was not alone in this. It has not been uncommon that the songs of revellers and drunkards have been designed to turn piety and the pious into derision. Compare, alas!

some of the songs of Burns. See the notes at <sup><331D></sup>Job 30:9; <sup><3315></sup>Psalms 35:15,16.

<sup><3313></sup>Psalm 69:13. But as for me In respect to my conduct and my feelings in these circumstances, and under this treatment.

My prayer is unto thee I indulge in no reproaches of others, and no recriminations. I do not permit myself to indulge in any revengeful feelings. I give myself to prayer. I look to God alone. I keep up my devotions, I maintain my habits of religion, notwithstanding their reproaches, and revilings. I do not allow these things to alter my course of life. Compare the notes at <sup><2060></sup>Daniel 6:10.

In an acceptable time A time that is well-pleasing to thee; a time when thou wilt hear me. See <sup><2408></sup>Isaiah 49:83; 61:2; <sup><4062></sup>2 Corinthians 6:2. This implies

- (a) that he had come to God when he was “disposed” to hear; and
- (b) that he had heard him, and had answered his requests.

While others mocked, he continued to pray, and the Lord heard him. No time for prayer can be more “acceptable” to God than when others are reproaching us because we are his friends.

In the multitude of thy mercy hear me In the abundance of thy mercy; or, in thy abounding compassion. This was the substance of his prayer.

In the truth of thy salvation In the exercise of that faithfulness on which salvation depends; or which is manifested in the salvation of people. He prayed that God would show himself faithful to the promises which he had made to those who were seeking salvation.

<sup><3314></sup>Psalm 69:14. Deliver me out of the mire Out of my troubles and calamities. See <sup><3301></sup>Psalms 69:1,2.

And let me not sink As in, mire. Let me not be overwhelmed by my sorrows.

Let me be delivered from them that hate me All my enemies. Let me be saved from their machinations and devices.

And out of the deep waters See <sup><3301></sup>Psalms 69:1,2. From my troubles.

Psalm 69:15. Let not the waterflood overflow me The stream; the volume of waters. The idea is that of a flood or stream rolling along, that threatened to drown him.

Neither let the deep swallow me up The abyss; the deep waters.

And let not the pit shut her mouth upon me In his anguish and distress he passes here from the idea of running streams, and deep waters, to that of a well, pit, or cavern — representing himself as “in” that pit, and praying that it might not be closed upon him, leaving him in darkness and in mire, from which he could not then escape. The general idea in all these expressions is the same — that of overwhelming calamities from which he prayed to be delivered.

Psalm 69:16. Hear me, O LORD, for thy lovingkindness is good Thy mercy — thy favor — is good; that is, it is ample, abundant, great: it delights in deeds of mercy; in acts of benevolence. This was the only ground of his plea; and this was enough. Compare Psalm 63:3.

Turn unto me Incline thine ear unto me; turn not away, but be favorable to me.

According to the multitude of thy tender mercies See the notes at Psalm 51:1. He felt that he had occasion for the exercise of “all” the mercy of God; that the case was one which could be reached only by the exercise of the highest kindness and compassion.

Psalm 69:17. And hide not thy face from thy servant See the notes at Psalm 27:9.

For I am in trouble In the midst of dangers and sorrows. Literally, “there is trouble upon me.”

Hear me speedily Margin, as in Hebrew, “Make haste to hear me.” That is, Grant me without delay what I ask. The case is one of urgent necessity. I “must” have relief or I shall perish. It is not wrong to ask God to interpose at once in our behalf when we are in trouble, though it is our duty to be patient and resigned if his interposition is delayed, for he may have important ends to accomplish by our continuing to suffer. In our distress on account of sin also, it is right to plead with him to interpose “at once,” and to relieve us by forgiveness. In this respect we are not to be contented with delay; we are to cast ourselves upon his mercy, and to plead for immediate pardon, for as it is our only safety, so it is for the honor of God that we should be forgiven, and that we should not continue in a state of guilt. An afflicted child of God will be safe in the final issue, whether he is relieved at once, or whether he is suddenly cut off by death, or whether he continues to suffer for even many years; but an unpardoned sinner is “not” safe for a moment, and if he should be cut off, unforgiven, even when under the deepest conviction for sin, he would perish. Every consideration, therefore, makes it proper that he should plead for forgiveness at once, and ask that God would not “delay” to show him mercy.

Psalm 69:18. Draw nigh unto my soul To me — for my life is in danger.

And redeem it Ransom it; save it from ruin. See the notes at Isaiah 43:3; 44:22.

Deliver me, because of mine enemies Because they are so numerous, so powerful, and so determined on my destruction. Compare Psalm 13:4.

Psalm 69:19. Thou hast known my reproach The reproach that has come upon me; the shame and contempt which I am called to endure. God had seen all this; and the psalmist appeals to him as having seen it, as a reason why he should now interpose and save him.

And my shame, and my dishonor These are different words to express the same idea. They are accumulated here to denote the “greatness” of his distress. In other words, shame and reproach had come upon him in every possible form.

Mine adversaries are all before thee All who persecute and oppose me are constantly in thine eye. Thou knowest who they are; thou seest all that they do. Nothing in their conduct is concealed from thee. God, therefore, could take an accurate view of his troubles, and could see all the reasons which existed for interfering in his behalf.

Psalm 69:20. Reproach hath broken my heart The reproaches, the calumnies, the aspersions, the slanders of others, have crushed me. I am not able to bear up under them; I fail under the burden. Distress may become so great that life may sink under it, for many die of what is called “a broken heart.” Undeserved reproaches will be as likely to produce this result on a sensitive heart as any form of suffering; and there are thousands who are crushed to the earth by such reproaches.

And I am full of heaviness Or, I am sick; I am weak; I am ill at ease. My strength is gone.

And I looked for some to take pity Margin, “to lament with me.” The meaning of the Hebrew word is to pity; to commiserate; to show compassion. <sup><821></sup>Job 2:11; 42:11; <sup><2519></sup>Isaiah 51:19; <sup><2465></sup>Jeremiah 16:5.

But there was none There was no one whose heart seemed to be touched with compassion in the case; none who sympathized with me.

And for comforters For those who would show sympathy for me; who would evince a friendly feeling in my distress.

But I found none He felt that he was utterly forsaken by mankind. There is no feeling of desolation like that.

<sup><892></sup>Psalm 69:21. They gave me also My enemies; all persons around me. No one would show me even so much kindness as to give me food when I was hungry, or drink when I was thirsty. They utterly forsook me; they left me to die unpitied. Nay, they did more than this. When I was perishing with hunger, they not only refused to give me wholesome food, but they mocked my sufferings by giving me a bitter and poisonous herb for food, and vinegar for my drink.

Gall for my meat For my food. Or, they gave me this “instead” of wholesome food. The word here rendered “gall” — varo<sup><47218></sup> — is the same “in form” which is commonly rendered “head,” and occurs in this sense very often in the Scriptures. It is also used to denote a “poisonous plant,” perhaps from the idea that the plant referred to was distinguished for, or remarkable for its “head” — as the poppy; and “then” the name may have been given also to some other similar plants. The word then comes to denote poison; venom; anything poisonous; and then, anything very bad-tasted; “bitter.” It is rendered “gall,” as here, in <sup><6298></sup>Deuteronomy 29:18; <sup><2484></sup>Jeremiah 8:14; 9:15; 23:15; <sup><2385></sup>Lamentations 3:5,19; <sup><3162></sup>Amos 6:12; “venom” in <sup><6233></sup>Deuteronomy 32:33; “poison,” in <sup><806></sup>Job 20:16; and “hemlock,” in <sup><2804></sup>Hosea 10:4. In <sup><6298></sup>Deuteronomy 29:18, it is rendered, in the margin, “rosh,” or “a poisonous herb.” It does not occur elsewhere with any such signification. It may not be possible to determine precisely what is denoted here by the word, but it undoubtedly refers to some poisonous, bitter, deadly, stupefying substance given to a sufferer, “instead” of that which would be wholesome food, or suited to sustain life.

And in my thirst they gave me vinegar to drink Instead of giving me pure water, they gave me sour wine — vinegar — that which would not slake my thirst, or which would not answer the purpose of drink. The form of trial here referred to is that where one is dying of thirst, and where, instead of giving water to assuage the thirst, one should give, in mockery, that which could not be drunk, or which would answer none of the purposes required. The word translated “vinegar” — xmj <sup>A2558</sup> — is rendered in the ancient versions “sour grapes,” but the proper signification here seems to be vinegar — the usual meaning of the word. What is here stated to have been done to David was also done to the dying Saviour, though without any intimation that the passage here had an original reference to him — or that what was done to him was intended to be a fulfillment of what is here said. See <sup><4173></sup>Matthew 27:34,48; <sup><4153></sup>Mark 15:23; <sup><6182></sup>John 19:29. In the case of the Saviour, they first gave him vinegar mingled with myrrh — a usual custom in reference to those who were crucified — for the purpose of deadening the pain, or stupefying the sufferer. <sup><4173></sup>Matthew 27:34. At a subsequent part of the crucifixion they gave him vinegar, extended to him in a sponge affixed to a reed. <sup><4173></sup>Matthew 27:48; <sup><6182></sup>John 19:29. This was for a different purpose. It was to allay his thirst, and it seems (as the former may have been) to have been an act of kindness or compassion on the part of those who were appointed to crucify him. The former he refused to take, because he came to suffer; the latter he just tasted as he died. <sup><6182></sup>John 19:30. The “coincidence” in the cases of David and the Saviour was remarkable; but in the case of the Saviour no further use is made of what occurred to David than to employ the “language” which he employed to describe his own sufferings. The one was not, in any proper sense, a “type” of the other; nor does the language in the psalm refer to the Saviour.

<sup><6822></sup>Psalm 69:22,23. Let their table become a snare before them These verses are quoted by Paul (<sup><5109></sup>Romans 11:9,10) as descriptive of the character of persons in his time, or as “language” which would express what he desired to say. See the passage explained at length in the notes at <sup><5109></sup>Romans 11:9,10. The whole passage is a prayer that they might receive a proper recompense for what they had done. The word “table” here means the table at which they were accustomed to eat. As they refused food to a hungry man, the prayer is, that they might find the recompense for their conduct “in that very line;” or that, as they refused food to the hungry, they might find “their” food a “snare” to them. That is, Let it be the means of punishing them for their not giving wholesome food to the hungry, or for their offering poisonous herbs to a starving man. The word “snare” here means unexpected danger; danger sprung suddenly upon them — as a snare is upon a wild beast.

And that which should have been for their welfare, let it become a trap

Much of this is supplied by the translators. The literal rendering would be, “And to those at peace (or secure) a trap.” The word here rendered “welfare” is the plural form of the word meaning “peace,” and may denote those who feel that they are at peace; that they are secure; that they are in no danger. The ancient versions give it the sense of “requitals,” that is, a recompence for their transgressions; but the other signification best accords with the connection. The word “trap” is usually applied to the devices for capturing wild beasts, and the meaning is, “Let the recompence come suddenly upon them, while they think themselves at peace, or when they are surrounded by all the comforts and luxuries of life.” This prayer is such as occurs frequently in the Psalms. It cannot be “proved” that it was uttered in a malignant spirit, or that anything more is intended by it than that the psalmist desired that justice might be done to all people — an object which all magistrates, and all good citizens, should pray for.

Psalm 69:23. Let their eyes be darkened ... See the notes at Romans 11:10.

And make their loins continually to shake As under a heavy burden. The apostle (Romans 11:10) varies the language, but retains the idea: “and bow down their back alway.”

Psalm 69:24. Pour out thine indignation upon them That is, Punish them for their sins; or, do justice to them.

And let thy wrathful anger literally, “the burning of thy wrath;” glow of anger; burning wrath. See Numbers 25:4; 32:14, 1 Samuel 28:18. This is undoubtedly a petition that God would visit them with the severity of his indignation; or, it expresses the belief of the psalmist that they “deserved” such tokens of his displeasure.

Take hold of them Seize upon them; overtake them when they expect to escape.

Psalm 69:25. Let their habitation be desolate Margin, “their palace.” The Hebrew word means properly a wall; then, a fortress or castle; and then it means also a nomadic encampment, a rustic village, a farm-hamlet.

The word conveys the idea of an “enclosure,” with special reference to an encampment, or a collection of tents. The Septuagint renders it here επανλις <sup><1886></sup>, meaning a place to pass the night in, especially for flocks and herds. The Hebrew word — hryfi <sup>h2918</sup> — is rendered “castles” in <sup><1256></sup>Genesis 25:16; <sup><1310></sup>Numbers 31:10; <sup><1364></sup>1 Chronicles 6:54; “palaces” in Cant. 8:9; <sup><3234></sup>Ezekiel 25:4; “rows” in <sup><3423></sup>Ezekiel 46:23; and “habitation” in this place. It does not occur elsewhere. Here it means their “home,” — their place of abode, — but with no particular reference to the “kind” of home, whether a palace, a castle, or an encampment. The idea is, that the place which they had occupied, or where they had dwelt, would be made vacant. They would be removed, and the place would be solitary and forsaken. It is equivalent to a prayer that they might be destroyed.

And let none dwell in their tents Margin, as in Hebrew, “let there not be a dweller.” That is, Let their tents where they had dwelt be wholly forsaken. This passage is quoted in <sup><4023></sup>Acts 1:20, as applicable to Judas. See the notes at that passage.

<sup><1326></sup>Psalm 69:26. For they persecute him whom thou hast smitten That is, instead of pitying one who is afflicted of God, or showing compassion for him, they “add” to his sorrows by their own persecutions. The psalmist was suffering as under the hand of God. He needed sympathy from others in his trials. Instead of that, however, he found only reproaches, opposition, persecution, calumny. There was an entire want of sympathy and kindness. There was a disposition to take advantage of the fact that he was suffering at the hand of God, to increase his sorrows in all ways in which they could do it.

And they talk to the grief of those What they say adds to their sorrow. They speak of the character of those who are afflicted; they allege that the affliction is the punishment of some crime which they have committed; they take advantage of any expressions of impatience which they may let fall in their affliction to charge them with being of a rebellious spirit, or regard it as proof that they are destitute of all true piety. See the notes at <sup><13475></sup>Psalm 41:5-8. It was this which added so much to the affliction of Job. His professed friends, instead of sympathizing with him, endeavored to prove that the fact that he suffered so much at the hand of God demonstrated that he was a hypocrite; and the expressions of impatience which he uttered in his trial, instead of leading them to sympathize with him, only tended to confirm them in this belief.

whom thou hast wounded literally, as in the margin, “thy wounded.” That is, of those whom “thou” hast afflicted. The reference is to the psalmist himself as afflicted by God, while, at the same time, he makes the remark general by saying that this was their character; this was what they were accustomed to do.

Psalm 69:27. Add iniquity unto their iniquity Margin, “punishment of iniquity.” The literal rendering is, “Give iniquity upon their iniquity.” Luther understands this as a prayer that “sin may be made a punishment for sin;” that is, that they may, as a punishment for their former sins, be left to commit still more aggravated crimes, and thus draw on themselves severer punishment. So Rosenmuller renders it, “Suffer them to accumulate sins by rushing from one sin to another, until their crimes are matured, and their destined punishment comes upon them.”

An idea similar to this occurs in <sup><45128></sup>Romans 1:28, where God is represented as having “given the pagan over to a reprobate mind, to do those things which are not convenient” (fit, or proper) “because they did not like to retain him in their knowledge.” Perhaps this is the most natural interpretation here, though another has been suggested which the original will bear. According to that, there is an allusion here to the double sense of the equivocal term rendered “iniquity” — <sup><45771></sup> — which properly denotes sin as such, or in itself considered, but which sometimes seems to denote sin in its consequences or effects. This latter is the interpretation adopted by Prof. Alexander. Thus understood, it is a prayer that God would add, or give, to their sin that which sin deserved; or, in other words, that he would punish it “as” it deserved.

And let them not come into thy righteousness Let them not be treated “as” righteous; as those who are regarded by “thee” as righteous. Let them be treated as they deserve. This is the same as praying that a murderer may not be treated as an innocent man; a burglar, as if he were a man of peace; or a dishonest man, as if he were honest. Let people be regarded and treated as they “are in fact;” or, as they deserve to be treated. It seems difficult to see why this prayer may not be offered with propriety, and with a benevolent heart — for to bring this about is what all officers of justice are endeavoring to accomplish.

Psalm 69:28. Let them be blotted out of the book of the living That is, Let them cease to live; let them not be numbered among living people; let them be cut off. This language is taken from the custom of registering the names of persons in a list, roll, or catalogue, <sup><122></sup>Exodus 32:32. See the notes at <sup><104></sup>Philippians 4:3. Compare <sup><68></sup>Revelation 3:5. The language has no reference to the future world; it is “not” a prayer that they should not be saved.

And not be written with the righteous Let them not be registered or numbered with the righteous. As they “are” wicked, so let them be numbered; so regarded. Let them be reckoned and treated as they are. They deserve to be punished; so let them be. All that this “necessarily” means is, that they should not be treated as righteous, when they were in fact “not” righteous. It cannot be shown that the author of the psalm would not have desired that they should “become” righteous, and that they should “then” be regarded and treated as such. All that the language here implies is, a desire that they should be regarded and treated as they were; that is, as they deserved. The language is evidently derived from the idea so common in the Old Testament that length of days would be the reward of a righteous life (see <sup><18></sup>Job 5:26; <sup><112></sup>Proverbs 3:2; 9:11; 10:27), and that the wicked would be cut off in the midst of their days. See the notes at <sup><65></sup>Psalm 55:23.

Psalm 69:29. But I am poor and sorrowful I am afflicted and suffering. The word here rendered “poor” often means “afflicted.”

Let thy salvation, O God, set me up on high Let thy help raise me up from my low condition, and exalt me to a place of safety.

Psalm 69:30. I will praise the name of God with a song As the result of my deliverance, I will “compose” a song or a psalm especially adapted to the occasion, and suited to express and perpetuate my feelings. It was in such circumstances that a large part of the psalms were composed; and since others besides the psalmist are often in such circumstances, the Book of Psalms becomes permanently useful in the church. It is not always necessary now to “compose” a song or hymn to express our feelings in the circumstances in which we are placed in life — for we may commonly find such sacred songs ready at our hand; yet no one can doubt the propriety of adding to the number of such by those who can do it, or of increasing the compositions for praise in the church in view of the ever-varied experience of the children of God.

And will magnify him Will exalt his name; will endeavor to make it “seem” greater; or, will spread it further abroad.

With thanksgiving I will use expressions of thanks to make his name more widely known.

Psalm 69:31. This also shall please the LORD This will be more acceptable to the Lord.

Better than an ox or bullock that hath horns and hoofs Better than a burnt sacrifice — horns, and hoofs, and all. The original here is, “horning and hoofing;” that is, an ox whose horns were fully grown, and whose hoofs were compact and solid; a perfect animal in its kind, offered whole on the altar. The psalmist does not say that such an offering would “not” be acceptable to the Lord, but that the offering of the heart — the sacrifice of praise — would be “more” acceptable than any such offering in itself considered. This sentiment accords with the common language of the Old Testament. See the notes at Psalm 40:6-8. Compare Psalm 2:16,17; 1 Samuel 15:22.

Psalm 69:32. The humble shall see this, and be glad Margin, “The meek.” That is, Others who are thus afflicted — the poor, the needy, the oppressed, the sad — shall be made acquainted with what has been done in my behalf, and shall take courage, or be strengthened. They will learn to trust that God will also interpose in “their” troubles, and bring them out of “their” distresses.

And your heart shall live that seek God Shall be revived; shall be encouraged, strengthened, animated.

Psalm 69:33. For the Lord heareth the poor The needy; the humble; the unprotected. The reference is to those who are in circumstances of want and distress. The truth stated here is in accordance with all that is said in the Scriptures. Compare the notes at Psalm 34:6. See also Job 5:15; Psalm 10:14; 12:5; 35:10; 68:10.

And despiseth not his prisoners He does not overlook them; he does not treat them as if they were worthy of no attention or regard. The word “prisoners” here may refer to those who are, as it were, bound by affliction under his own providential dealings; or to those who are oppressed, or are held as captives, or are thrown into prison, on his account. The particular reference here seems to be to David, and to those associated with him, who were straitened or deprived of their freedom in the cause of God.

Psalm 69:34. Let the heaven and earth praise him All things; all above and all below.

The seas The waters — the oceans. This is in accordance with what often occurs in the Scriptures, when all things, animate and inanimate, are called on to praise God. Compare Psalm 148.

And everything that moveth therein Margin, as in Hebrew, “creepeth.” Compare the notes at <sup><9988></sup>Psalm 8:8. See also the notes at <sup><2552></sup>Isaiah 55:12.

Psalm 69:35. For God will save Zion See the notes at <sup><9518></sup>Psalm 51:18. That is, he will save his people; he will protect and defend them. This expresses the confident assurance of the psalmist that, whatever might be the existing troubles, God would not forsake his people, but would interpose in their behalf.

And will build the cities of Judah Though they may now lie waste, or be desolate. See the notes at <sup><9518></sup>Psalm 51:18. The general idea here is, that God would be favorable to his land; that he would give success and prosperity to his people; that he would manifest his mercy to them. There is no necessity from the language used here to suppose, as DeWette and Rosenmuller do, that there is an allusion to the time of the exile, and to the restoration of the Jews from Babylon, and that consequently either the whole psalm must have been composed at that time — or (as Rosenmuller supposes) that the last verses of the psalm were added by a later hand, and that thus the whole psalm was adapted to the time of the exile. From <sup><9919></sup>Psalm 69:9 it would seem that, when the psalm was composed, the place of public worship was still standing, and the language here, as in <sup><9518></sup>Psalm 51:18, is so general that it might have been employed at any time.

That they may dwell there ... That his people may dwell there according to the ancient promise. The idea is, that he would be the protector of his people, and that all his promises to them would be fulfilled.

Psalm 69:36. The seed also of his servants The children or the descendants of his people.

Shall inherit it Shall continue to dwell in it.

And they that love his name They that love him; they that are his true friends.

Shall dwell therein They shall be safe there; they shall find there a home. This indicates the confident belief of the author of the psalm that the favor of God would be shown to the land. Whatever might be the present troubles, his faith was unwavering — his confidence unshaken — in regard to the faithfulness of God. Palestine — the promised land — would still be the inheritance of those who loved God, and the interests of those who dwelt there would be secure. As applied to the church of God now, the idea is, that it is safe; that it will always be under the divine protection; and that it will be the loved and the secure abode of all that “love the name” of their God and Saviour.

APPENDIX NOTES ON PSALM 69

We are somewhat surprised that our author should have any difficulty in connection with the Messianic character of this psalm, and that he should find it necessary to explain the numerous quotations from it in the New Testament on the principle of accommodation — a principle which he has in so many other places abandoned (<sup>1860</sup>Psalm 69:4,9,21,22,25). We subjoin Dr. Binnie’s view:

“The frequency with which the Old Testament scriptures are cited by our blessed Lord and the writers of the New Testament, and the marked deference with which the citations are made, have always and justly been regarded as a strong testimony to the plenary authority of the ancient scriptures. Well, it is remarkable that the psalms under discussion have been counted worthy of an eminent share in this honor. Psalm 69, for example, which bears more of the imprecatory character than any other except Psalm 109, is expressly quoted in five separate places, besides being alluded to in several places more. Among all the psalms there are only some three or four others that have been so largely quoted by Christ and the apostles; and they are all great Messianic hymns (Psalm 2; 22; 110; 118 are the four most frequently quoted in the New Testament). The nature of the quotations is even more significant than their number. It would seem that our Lord appropriated the psalm to himself, and that we are to take it as a disclosure of thoughts and feelings which found a place in his heart during the period of his ministry on the earth. In the guest-chamber he quoted the words of the fourth verse: ‘They hated me without a cause;’ and represented them as a prediction of the people’s hatred of the Father and of himself (<sup><48525></sup>John 15:25). When he drove the traffickers from the temple, John informs us that ‘his disciples remembered that it was written, The zeal of thine house hath eaten me up’ (<sup><4027></sup>John 2:17); which implies that those words of the psalm expressed the very mind that was in Christ. When Peter, after mentioning the crime and perdition of Judas, suggested to the company of the hundred and twenty disciples that they ought to take measures for the appointment of a new apostle to fill the vacant place, he enforced the suggestion by a quotation: ‘For it is written in the book of Psalms, Let his habitation be desolate, and let no man dwell therein, and his bishoprick let another take’ (<sup><4023></sup>Acts 1:20): manifestly on the supposition that this psalm and the hundred and ninth (for the quotation is from them both) were written with reference to Judas. In the Epistle to the Romans, the duty of pleasing, every one of us, our neighbor for his good, is enforced by the apostle with the argument that ‘even Christ pleased not himself, but as it is written, The reproaches of them that reproached thee fell on me’ (<sup><3922></sup>Psalms 69:22,23, compared with <sup><5109></sup>Romans 11:9,10): an argument which has no weight if David alone is the speaker in the psalm — if Christ be not, in some real sense, the speaker in it also. Finally, we are taught in the same Epistle to recognize a fulfillment of the psalmist’s most terrible imprecations in the judicial blindness which befell the body of the Jewish nation after the crucifixion of Christ. All this proves that if we are not to reject the authority of the apostles and of Christ himself, we must take this imprecatory psalm as having been spoken by David as the ancestor and type of Christ. I do not say that the circumstance that these psalms are so unequivocally endorsed and appropriated by our blessed Lord explains the difficulty they involve. But I am sure that the simple statement of it will constrain disciples of Christ to touch them with a reverent hand; and rather to distrust their own judgment than to brand such scriptures as the products of an unsanctified and unchristian temper.”

See also Fairbairn's Typology, i. p. 102. Plumer gives the following excellent digest: The psalm is decidedly Messianic. The only question is whether it is directly and fully prophetic or typical-messianic. There is no valid objection to the admission that in some parts David as a sufferer speaks as a type of Christ, and that in others he rises to the height of unqualified prediction respecting Messiah. <sup><1904></sup>Psalm 69:4 is cited in <sup><1925></sup>John 15:25; <sup><1930></sup>Psalm 69:9 in <sup><1927></sup>John 2:17; <sup><1913></sup>Romans 15:3; <sup><1921></sup>Psalm 69:21 in <sup><1974></sup>Matthew 27:34,48; <sup><1153></sup>Mark 15:23; <sup><1928></sup>John 19:28,29; <sup><1922></sup>Psalm 69:22,23 in <sup><1910></sup>Romans 11:9,10; and <sup><1925></sup>Psalm 69:25 in <sup><1916></sup>Acts 1:16,20. Sound commentators generally admit that it has its fulfillment in Christ. Theodoret:

“It is a prediction of the sufferings of Christ, and the final destruction of the Jews on that account.”

Calvin:

“David wrote this inspired ode, not so much in his own name, as in the name of the whole church, of whose head he was an eminent type.”

Vitringa:

“It is admitted among Christians, that in Psalm 69 Christ, and Christ as a sufferer, is to be placed before our eyes. We add that it refers to Christ crucified as the evangelists Matthew, Mark, and John apply it.”

Fabritius:

“In this psalm David is a figure of Christ.” Alexander: “The only individual in whom the traits meet is Christ.”

Hodge:

“This psalm is so frequently quoted and applied to Christ in the New Testament, that it must be considered as directly prophetic.”

Similar remarks might be cited from Gill, Anderson, Scott, and others. Calvin's first remark on this psalm is: “There is a close resemblance between this and Psalm 22.” Many others have observed the likeness. This is a composition of great beauty and poetic excellence.

◀BIB▶ Psalm 69:5. O God, thou knowest my foolishness The broad principle laid down in the introduction to Psalm 22 applies here. The history of prophets and holy men of old is a typical history. They were, it may be said, representative men, suffering and hoping, not for themselves only, but for the nation whom they represented. In their sufferings they were feeble and transient images of the great Sufferer, who by his sufferings accomplished man's redemption: their hopes could never be fully realized but in the issue of his work, nor their aspirations be truly uttered save by his mouth. But confessions of sinfulness and imprecations of vengeance, mingling with these better hopes and aspirations, are a beacon to guide us in our interpretation. They teach us that the psalm is not a prediction; that the psalmist does not put himself in the place of the Messiah to come. They show us that here, as indeed in all Scripture, two streams, the human and the divine, flow on in the same channel. They seem designed to remind us that if prophets and minstrels of old were types of the great Teacher of the church, yet that they were so only in some respects, and not altogether. They bear witness to the imperfection of those by whom God spake in time past unto the fathers, in many portions and in many ways, even while they point to him who is the living Word, the perfect revelation of the Father.

NOTES ON PSALM 70

This psalm bears to the closing part of Psalm 40 (<sup><9013></sup>Psalm 40:13-17, see the notes in the Introduction to that psalm) a resemblance similar to that between Psalm 14 and Psalm 53. The one is not indeed a mere copy of the other, but the one is substantially the same as the other, with some slight variations, apparently introduced to fit it for some new occasion on which it was to be used. We do not know what the occasion in either case was; but it would seem that in this instance, the psalmist found, in the closing verses of the fortieth psalm, language which “very nearly” expressed what he felt on some particular occasion, and which might, by a slight change, be applied to the use for which it was then desired.

We have no further knowledge of the “occasion” on which this was done, than what is implied in the title: “to bring to remembrance.” For the meaning of this, see the notes at the title to Psalm 38. It determines nothing, however, as to the reason why the closing part of Psalm 40 was selected as the subject of a separate psalm, or why the changes were made which here occur. It merely denotes that there were things which it was proper to preserve in the recollection; or principles which it was of importance for the people of God to remember.

It will be necessary, in considering the psalm, only to note, in each verse successively, the alterations which are made from Psalm 40.

<sup><9013></sup>Psalm 70:1. Make haste These words are supplied by our translators. The first word in <sup><9013></sup>Psalm 40:13, rendered “be pleased,” is here omitted in the original. The psalm in the Hebrew begins abruptly — “O God, to deliver me,” — leaving the impression that this is a fragment — a fragment commencing without even the care necessary to make the grammatical construction complete.

O God Hebrew, יְהוָה אֱלֹהֵי <sup><h430></sup>. In the corresponding place in <sup><9013></sup>Psalm 40:13 the word is “Yahweh.” Why the change was made is unknown. The remainder of the verse is the same as in Psalm 40.

<sup><9013></sup>Psalm 70:2. Let them be ashamed and confounded that seek after my soul The only change here from <sup><9014></sup>Psalm 40:14, is the omission of the word “together” which occurs there, and the omission of the words “to destroy it.”

Let them be turned backward, and put to confusion, that desire my hurt

This corresponds in the Hebrew entirely with <sup><904></sup>Psalm 40:14.

The only change which occurs in this verse is the substitution of the milder phrase “Let them be turned back,” for “Let them be desolate.” See the notes at <sup><905></sup>Psalm 40:15.

<sup><904></sup>Psalm 70:4. Let all those that seek thee ... The only change in this verse from <sup><906></sup>Psalm 40:16, is in the insertion of the word “and” in the beginning of the second clause — “and let such as love,” etc.

<sup><905></sup>Psalm 70:5. But I am poor and needy This is the same as in <sup><907></sup>Psalm 40:17.

Make haste unto me, O God Hebrew, ꝑyhi a <sup><h430></sup>. In the parallel place in <sup><907></sup>Psalm 40:17, this is, “The Lord thinketh upon me,” — where the Hebrew word is not ꝑyhi a <sup><h430></sup>, but wnda <sup><h136></sup> (Lord). The word “make haste” seems to have been introduced here by design — thus carrying out the main idea in Psalm 40, but turning here to “petition” what is there stated as a “fact.”

Thou art my help and my deliverer ... The close of the psalm is the same as the close of Psalm 40, except that the word LORD (Yahweh) is used here instead of “God” ꝑyhi a <sup><h430></sup>. It is not possible to ascertain whether these changes were mere matters of taste, or whether they were designed to adapt the psalm to some new circumstance, or to the special feelings of the psalmist at the time. There is no evidence that they are mere errors of transcribers, and indeed the changes are so made that this cannot be supposed. The change of the names ꝑyhi a <sup><h430></sup>, hwbyj <sup><h3068></sup>, and wnda <sup><h136></sup>, for example, is such as must have been by design, and could not have been made by copyists. But what that design was must remain unknown. The alterations do not in any way, as far as we can understand, affect the sense.

NOTES ON PSALM 71

This psalm is without a title, as is the case with the first, second, tenth, and some others. Of course it is impossible to determine on what occasion it was composed. There is some plausibility in the supposition that Psalm 70 might have been placed before it, or in connection with it, as a kind of introduction, or as indicating the character of the psalms among which it is found; but nothing of certainty can be ascertained on that point. It evidently belongs to the “class” of psalms which refer to the trials of the righteous; but it was rather in view of past troubles than of those which were then existing.

There is no certain evidence that the psalm was composed by David. If so, it was when he was advanced in life. There is, indeed, much in the psalm which would be appropriate to David — much which he might have written; but there is no way now of ascertaining with certainty who was the author. In the Syriac version, the psalm is, indeed, ascribed to David, and this may perhaps express the prevailing idea in regard to the authorship as it had been handed down by tradition. The title in Syriac is, “Composed by David. When Saul warred against the house of David. And a prophecy respecting the passion and resurrection of the Messiah.” The Latin Vulgate and the Septuagint also ascribe it to David. The title in both is the same — “By David. Of the sons of Jonadab, and the first captives.” But these titles are of no authority, as they are not in the Hebrew, and they are of little historic value.

All that is known respecting the occasion on which the psalm was composed, whoever was the author, is, that it was composed when old age was drawing near, and in view of the trials and the blessings of life as considered from the contemplation of its approaching close, <sup>(19706)</sup>Psalm 71:5,9,17,18. The life of the author had been one of trials (<sup>(19712)</sup>Psalm 71:20), but also of great mercies (<sup>(19706)</sup>Psalm 71:6,7,17). He was then surrounded with difficulties; the infirmities of age were coming upon him, and he was encompassed with enemies (<sup>(19710)</sup>Psalm 71:10,11,20); therefore, he sought the continued favor and blessing of God in the little that remained to him of life.

It is a psalm of great value as describing the feelings of a good man when he is growing old, and is an illustration of what there has been occasion so often to remark in this exposition of the Book of Psalms, that the Bible is adapted to all the conditions of human life. In a book professing to be a revelation from God, and in a world where “old age,” with its trials, its infirmities, its recollections, and its hopes, must be so prominent in the actual state of things existing, it would have been unaccountable if there had been nothing to illustrate the feelings of those in advancing or advanced years — nothing to suggest the kind of reflections appropriate to that period of life — nothing to cheer the heart of the aged man, and to inspire him with hope — nothing to prompt him to recall the lessons of the past, and to make use of those lessons to prepare him for the future; even as, in a world so full of trial, it would have been strange if there had been nothing to comfort the mind in affliction, and to enable people to derive proper lessons from the experiences of life. This psalm, therefore, is one of the most valuable portions of the Bible to a certain class of mankind, and may be to any of the living, as suggesting the proper reflections of a good man as the infirmities of age draw on, and as he reviews the mercies and the trials of the past.

It is not necessary to make a more particular analysis of its contents. The psalm, in general, embraces these points:

- (1) A prayer for deliverance from troubles, and from wicked people, <sup><3701></sup>Psalm 71:1-4.
- (2) An acknowledgment of God’s goodness in early life; a grateful review of divine mercies manifested from the earliest years of life, <sup><3705></sup>Psalm 71:5-8.
- (3) A prayer that God would still preserve him as old age came on; a prayer that God would interpose in his behalf, and enable him still to be useful to the world — to that generation, and to the generations to come, <sup><3709></sup>Psalm 71:9-18.
- (4) The expression of a confident expectation that his prayer would be answered, and that God would be merciful to him, <sup><3719></sup>Psalm 71:19-21.
- (5) The expression of a purpose to offer praise to God as a suitable return for the mercies of the past, and for all that he hoped to receive in time to come, <sup><3722></sup>Psalm 71:22-24.

Let me never be put to confusion Let me never be ashamed; that is, Let me not be so disappointed in the trust that I repose in thee as to have occasion to feel ashamed that I have done it.

Psalm 71:2. Deliver me in thy righteousness See the notes at Psalm 31:1. The first three verses of this psalm seem in fact to have been taken, with slight variations, from the first three verses of Psalm 31.

And cause me to escape That is, from impending dangers; from the power of my enemies.

Incline thine ear unto me In Psalm 31:2, this is, “Bow down thine ear to me.” The idea is the same. See the notes at that place. Compare the notes at Psalm 17:6.

And save me In Psalm 31:2, this is, “Deliver me speedily.”

Psalm 71:3. Be thou my strong habitation Margin, as in Hebrew, “Be thou to me for a rock of habitation.” That is, a rock where I may safely make my abode, or to which I may resort and feel safe. In Psalm 31:2, this is, “Be thou my strong rock, for an house of defense to save me.” The idea is the same. See the notes at that passage, and compare the notes at Psalm 18:2.

Whereunto I may continually resort Where I may take refuge at all times, in all circumstances of danger.

Thou hast given commandment to save me There was some command, or some promise, on which the psalmist relied, or which he felt he might plead as the ground of his appeal. This may refer to some “special” promise or command made to the author of the psalm — and, if the psalm was composed by David, there were many such; or the reference may have been to the general commands or promises made to the people of God as such, which he felt he was at liberty to plead, and which all may plead who are the friends of God. “We” cannot refer, as David could, to any special promise made to “us” as “individuals;” but, in proportion as we have evidence of piety, we can refer to the promises made to all the people of God, or to all who devote themselves to him, as a reason why he should interpose in our behalf. In this respect the promises made in the Scriptures to the children of God, may be pleaded by us “as if” they were made personally to ourselves, for, if we are his, they are made to us — they are intended for us.

For thou art my rock and my fortress See the notes at <sup><918D></sup>Psalm 18:2.

<sup><970E></sup>Psalm 71:4. Deliver me, O my God, out of the hand of the wicked It is, of course, not possible now to ascertain who are particularly referred to here. If David was the author of the psalm, they may have been any of the numerous enemies that he had in his life.

Out of the hand of the unrighteous and cruel man Hebrew, “out of the palm.” This means here the same as hand, and refers to the “grasp” which anyone makes in taking hold of a thing by the hand.

<sup><970E></sup>Psalm 71:5. For thou art my hope, O Lord GOD The ground of my hope and my expectation is in thee.

(1) I have no other help; no other defense; but

(2) I “have” confidence; on thee I “do” rely.

Thou art my trust from my youth From my earliest years. The meaning is, that he had always trusted in God, and had always found him a helper. All that he was, and all that he possessed, he owed to God; and he felt now that God had been his protector from his earliest years. Perhaps it could not be shown certainly from this expression that he meant to say he had “actually trusted” in God from his youth, for the “language” means no more than that God had actually protected him, and holden him up, and had continually interposed to save and keep him. As God had always been his Protector, so he felt that he might come to Him now, and put his trust in Him.

<sup><970E></sup>Psalm 71:6. By thee have I been holden up from the womb From the beginning of my existence. The “idea” in all this is, that, since God had sustained him from his earliest years — since he had shown his power in keeping him, and manifested his care for him, there was ground to pray that God would keep him still, and that he would guard him as old age came on. The sentiment in this verse is substantially the same as in <sup><922B></sup>Psalm 22:9,10. See the notes at that passage.

My praise shall be continually of thee My praise shall ascend to thee constantly. I will not cease to praise thee. Compare the notes at <sup><922E></sup>Psalm 22:25.

Psalm 71:7. I am as a wonder unto many The word here rendered “wonder” — תפוד <sup><4159></sup> — means properly a miracle, a prodigy; then things that are suited to excite wonder or admiration; then, a sign, a token. See the notes at <sup><2088></sup> Isaiah 8:18. The meaning here is, that the course of things in regard to him — the divine dealings toward him — had been such as to excite attention; to strike the mind as something unusual, and out of the common course, in the same way that miracles do. This might be either from the number and the character of the calamities which had come upon him; or from the narrow escapes which he had had from death; or from the frequency of the divine intervention in his behalf; or from the abundant mercies which had been manifested toward him. The connection makes it probable that he refers to the unusual number of afflictions which had come upon him, and the frequency of the divine interpositions in his behalf when there was no other refuge, and no other hope.

But thou art my strong refuge See the notes at <sup><1982></sup> Psalm 18:2. That is, God had been his Protector, his hiding-place.

Psalm 71:8. Let my mouth be filled This is an appeal to himself, in view of the goodness of God, to praise him always. See the notes at <sup><1953></sup> Psalm 35:28.

With thy praise With the expressions of praise.

And with thy honor all the day With such expressions as shall promote thy glory, and make thy honor known.

Psalm 71:9. Cast me not off in the time of old age When old age comes with its infirmities; its weaknesses; its trials. When my strength fails me; when my eyes grow dim; when my knees totter; when my friends have died; when I am no longer able to labor for my support; when the buoyant feelings of earlier years are no more; when my old companions and associates are gone, and I am left alone. Thou who didst watch over me in infancy; who didst guard me in childhood and youth; who hast defended me in manhood; who hast upheld me in the days of sickness, danger, bereavement, trouble — do thou not leave me when, in advanced years, I have special need of thy care; when I have reason to apprehend that there may come upon me, in that season of my life, troubles that I have never known before; when I shall not have the strength, the buoyancy, the elasticity, the ardor, the animal spirits of other years, to enable me to meet those troubles; and when I shall have none of the friends to cheer me whom I had in the earlier periods of my course. It is not unnatural or improper for a man who sees old age coming upon him to pray for special grace, and special strength, to enable him to meet what he cannot ward off, and what he cannot but dread; for who can look upon the infirmities of old age as coming upon himself but with sad and pensive feelings? Who would wish “to be” an old man? Who can look upon a man tottering with years, and broken down with infirmities — a man whose sight and hearing are gone — a man who is alone amidst the graves of all the friends that he had in early life — a man who is a burden to himself and to the world, a man who has reached the “last scene of all, that ends the strange eventful history,” that scene of

Sans teeth, sans eyes, sans taste, sans everything,” —* that scene when one can say,

*“I have lived long enough; my way of life
Is fallen into the sear, the yellow leaf;
And that which should accompany old age,
As honor, love, obedience, troops of friends,
I must not look to have,”*

who can think of all this, and not pray for special grace for himself should he live to see those days of infirmity and weakness? And who, in view of such infirmities, can fail to see the propriety of seeking the favor of God in early years? Compare <sup><2133></sup>Ecclesiastes 12:1-6.

Forsake me not when my strength faileth As I may expect it to do, when I grow old. A man can lay up nothing better for the infirmities of old age than the favor of God sought, by earnest prayer, in the days of his youth and his maturer years.

<sup><9710></sup>Psalm 71:10. For mine enemies speak against me That is, they said substantially, as it is stated in <sup><9711></sup>Psalm 71:11, that God had forsaken him, and that therefore, they would arise and punish him, or treat him as an outcast from God.

And they that lay wait for my soul For my life; or, to take my life. The margin here — as the Hebrew — is, “watch,” or “observe.” The “watchers for my life;" that is, they who watch for an opportunity to take my life, or to destroy me.

Take counsel together About the best means of accomplishing their object.

<sup><9711></sup>Psalm 71:11. Saying, God hath forsaken him That is, God has given him over; he no longer protects him; he regards him as a wicked man, and we shall therefore, not only be "safe" in our attempts upon his life, but we shall be "justified" in those attempts.

Persecute and take him It can be done safely now; it can be done with propriety.

For there is none to deliver him He has no one now to whom to look; no one on whom he can rely. Abandoned by God and by man, he will be an easy prey. Compare the notes at <sup><9407></sup>Psalm 41:7,8.

<sup><9713></sup>Psalm 71:13. Let them be confounded and consumed See the notes at the similar passage in <sup><9804></sup>Psalm 35:4. The sentiment in this verse is the same; the language is slightly varied. See also <sup><9404></sup>Psalm 40:14, where the same sentiment occurs.

<sup><9714></sup>Psalm 71:14. But I will hope continually I will always cherish hope; I will not give up to despair. I will trust in God whatever may be the number, the power, and the confidence of my enemies. None of these things shall make me despair, for as long as I have a God, I have every ground for hope. No man should despair who has God for his Friend. Compare <sup><9405></sup>Psalm 42:5,11; 43:5.

And will yet praise thee more and more literally, "I will add upon all thy praise." That is, I will accumulate it; I will increase it. He saw abundant cause in the past for praising God; he had such confidence in him, and he felt such an assurance that he would interpose in his behalf, that he did not doubt that in the future dealings of God with him, he would have every reason to "add" to that praise.

Psalm 71:15. My mouth shall show forth thy righteousness ... See the notes at <sup><9708></sup>Psalm 71:8. The word “righteousness” here refers to the righteous character of God, particularly as manifested in his behalf; the word “salvation” refers to what God had done to deliver him from his dangers.

For I know not the numbers thereof That is, I cannot estimate the amount of thy favors; they are innumerable. See the notes at <sup><9415></sup>Psalm 40:5.

Psalm 71:16. I will go in the strength of the Lord GOD In my future journey through life; in my trials; in my duties; in my conflicts; in my temptations. Admonished in the past of my own weakness, and remembering how often God has interposed, I will hereafter lean only on his arm, and not trust to my own strength. But thus leaning on his arm, I “will” go confidently to meet the duties and the trials of life. If one has the strength of God to lean on, or can use that strength “as if” it were his own, there is no duty which he may not discharge; no trial which he may not bear. The Hebrew here is, “I will come with the mighty deeds (more literally, “strengths”) of the Lord God.” The word is used to denote the “mighty acts” of Yahweh, in <sup><1824></sup>Deuteronomy 3:24; <sup><1940></sup>Psalm 106:2; <sup><8344></sup>Job 26:14. DeWette proposes to render this, “I will go in the mighty deeds of Yahweh;” that is, I will sing of his mighty deeds. Rosenmuller explains it, “I will go into the temple to celebrate his praise there;” that is, I will bring the remembrance of his mighty acts there as the foundation of praise. So Professor Alexander explains it. It seems to me, however, that our translation has expressed the true idea, that he would go in the strength of God; that he would rely on no other; that he would make mention of no other. Old age, trials, difficulties, arduous duties, were before him; and in all these he would rely on no other strength but that of the Almighty.

I will make mention of thy righteousness, even of thine only Of thy just and holy character. I will allude to nothing else; I will rely on nothing else as the foundation of my hope, and as my encouragement in the duties and trials of life.

Psalm 71:17. O God, thou hast taught me from my youth See <sup><9705></sup>Psalm 71:5,6. That is, God had guided and instructed him from his earliest years. He had made known to him his own being and perfections; he had made his duty plain; he had led him along the dangerous path of life.

And hitherto have I declared I have made known. That is, he had done this by public praise; he had done it by his writings; he had done it by maintaining and defending the truth. In all situations of life, up to that time, he had been willing to stand up for God and his cause.

Thy wondrous works See the notes at <sup><4900></sup>Psalm 9:1; 26:7. Doings or acts which were suited to attract attention; to awe the mind by their greatness; to inspire confidence by their wisdom.

<sup><4718></sup>Psalm 71:18. Now also when I am old and grey-headed Margin, “unto old age and grey hairs.” This does not necessarily mean that he was then actually old and grey-headed, but it would imply that he was approaching that period, or that he had it in prospect. The time of youth was past, and he was approaching old age. The literal rendering would be, “And also unto old age and grey hairs, do not forsake me.” This is the prayer of one who had been favored in youth, and in all his former course of life, and who now asked that God would continue his mercy, and not forsake him when the infirmities of age drew on.

Forsake me not Still keep me alive. Give me health, and strength, and ability to set forth thy praise, and to make known thy truth. See the notes at <sup><4709></sup>Psalm 71:9.

Until I have showed thy strength Margin, as in Hebrew, “thine arm.” The arm is the instrument by which we execute a purpose, and it thus becomes a symbol of strength.

Unto this generation literally, “to a generation.” The reference is to the generation then living; that is, the generation which had come on the stage since he had reached manhood — the generation — the new generation — which one who is approaching old age sees engaged in the active scenes of life, cultivating the fields, filling the offices, constructing the bridges and roads, manning the ships, occupying the dwellings, instead of those with whom he was formerly associated, and who are now in their graves. His own generation — the companions of his own early years — had passed away. He had lived to speak to a new generation, and he was desirous that they should start on the journey of life with the advantage of his experience, as of one that had gone before. Each generation “may” thus enter on life with all the accumulated wisdom of the past; that is, as wise as those had become who had themselves had the experience, and treasured up results from the observations, of a long life. Society thus makes progress. One generation becomes wiser and better than the one which went before it, and the experience of all ages thus accumulates as the world advances, enabling a future age to act on the results of all the wisdom of the past. Man thus differs from the inferior creation. The animals, governed by instinct alone, make no progress. Compare the notes at <sup><BIB></sup>Psalm 49:13. They profit neither by the wisdom, nor the follies of the past. The first robin built its nest of the same materials, and with as much art, as the robin does now; the first stock of bees constructed their cells with as nice and accurate adaptations, with mathematical precision as complete, as a swarm of bees will do now. Neither the bird nor the bee has learned anything by experience, by study, or by observation — nor lays up, to transmit to future generations of birds or bees, the results of its own sagacity or observation. Not so with man. The result of the experiences of one generation goes into the general experience of the world, and becomes its capital; a new thought, or a new invention struck out by some splendid genius, becomes the common property of the race; and society, as it rolls on, gathers up all these results, as the Ganges or the Mississippi, rolling on to the ocean, gathers into one mighty volume all the waters that flow in a thousand streams, and all that come from rivulets and fountains, however remote. It is this which makes the life of “a man” so valuable in this world; this which makes it so desirable for a man, even when approaching old age, yet to live a little longer, for, as the fruit of his experience, his observation, his ripe wisdom, his acquired knowledge, he may yet suggest something, by writing or otherwise, which may add to the intelligence of the world; some principle which may be elaborated and perfected by the coming age.

And thy power Thy greatness; majesty; glory.

To every one that is to come To all future generations. That I may state truths which may benefit future ages. He who suggests one truth which the world was not in possession of before, is a benefactor to mankind, and will not have lived in vain, for that truth will do something to set the race forward, and to make the world better and happier. It is not a vain thing, then, for a man to live; and every one should endeavor “so” to live that the world may not be the worse — or may not go backward — by his living in it, but that it may be the wiser and the better: not merely so that it may keep on the same level, but that it may rise to a higher level, and start off on a new career.

Psalm 71:19. Thy righteousness also, O God, is very high See the notes at <sup><4719></sup>Psalm 36:5. The purpose of the psalmist is to exalt that righteousness as much as possible, and he, therefore, compares it with that which is high — the heavens — the highest thing of all. The literal rendering would be, “even to the high,” or the height; that is, to the highest place. The passage is designed to express his confidence in God, in the infirmities and troubles which he must expect to come upon him with advancing years.

Who hast done great things In his work of creation; in his providence; in his manifested mercy toward his people. He had done things so great as to show that he could protect those who put their trust in him.

O God, who is like unto thee! Who can be compared to thee! See the notes at <sup><4950></sup>Psalm 35:10. Compare the notes at <sup><2408></sup>Isaiah 40:18. See also <sup><4808></sup>Psalm 89:8; <sup><2511></sup>Exodus 15:11; <sup><1072></sup>2 Samuel 7:22.

Psalm 71:20. Thou, which hast showed me great and sore troubles Or rather, who hast caused us to see or experience great trials. The psalmist here, by a change from the singular to the plural, connects himself with his friends and followers, meaning that he had suffered with them and through them. It was not merely a personal affliction, but others connected with him had been identified with him, and his personal sorrows had been increased by the trials which had come upon them also. Our severest trials often are those which affect our friends.

Shalt quicken me again literally, “Shalt return and make us live.” The word “quicken” in the Scriptures has always this sense of “making to live again.” See the notes at <sup><4321></sup>John 5:21; compare <sup><4447></sup>Romans 4:17; <sup><4536></sup>1 Corinthians 15:36; <sup><4411></sup>Ephesians 2:1. The plural form should have been retained here as in the former member of the sentence. The authors of the Masoretic punctuation have pointed this as if it were to be read in the singular, but the plural is undoubtedly the true reading. Alike in his affliction, and in his hope of the returning mercy of God, he connects himself here with those who had suffered with him. The language expresses firm confidence in the goodness of God — an assurance that these troubles would pass away, and that he would see a brighter day.

And shalt bring me up again from the depths of the earth As if he had been sunk in the waters, or in the mire. See <sup><4406></sup>Psalm 130:1. The word here used means commonly “wave, billow, surge;” then, a mass of waters, “a flood,” the deep; then, a gulf, an abyss. The idea here is, that, instead of being on the mountain top, in a place of security, he had sunk down to the lowest point; he had, as it were, sunk “into” the very earth. Yet from that low estate he felt assured that God would raise him up, and place him in a condition of happiness and safety. This is one of the many instances which we have in the Psalms, where the psalmist in great trouble expresses the most entire confidence that God would interpose in his behalf.

Psalm 71:21. Thou shalt increase my greatness Thou wilt not merely restore me to my former condition, but wilt enlarge my happiness, and wilt do still greater things for me.

And comfort me on every side literally, “Thou wilt turn thyself; thou wilt comfort me.” The word also means to surround; to encompass (<sup><0021></sup>Genesis 2:11,13; <sup><1072></sup>1 Kings 7:24; <sup><0185></sup>Psalm 18:5); and the idea here may be that God would “go around him,” or encircle him, and would thus comfort him. This idea is expressed in our common version. It was the confident assurance of entire, or complete consolation.

Psalm 71:22. I will also praise thee with the psaltery Margin, as in Hebrew, “with the instrument of psaltery.” The Hebrew word is לְבַנְיָן<sup><5035></sup>. In <sup><2352></sup>Isaiah 5:12 it is rendered “viol.” See the notes at that passage. It is rendered “psaltery” in <sup><0105></sup>1 Samuel 10:5; <sup><0165></sup>2 Samuel 6:5; <sup><1102></sup>1 Kings 10:12; and elsewhere. Compare the notes at <sup><0332></sup>Psalm 33:2.

Even thy truth I will make mention of thy truth and faithfulness in my songs of praise; or, I will celebrate these in connection with appropriate music.

Unto thee will I sing with the harp Hebrew, רַנְּנִי<sup><3658></sup>. See the notes at <sup><2352></sup>Isaiah 5:12. Compare the notes at <sup><0332></sup>Psalm 33:2.

O thou Holy One of Israel The God of Israel or the Hebrew people; the God regarded by them as most holy, and worshipped by them as their God. This is the first time that this title occurs in the Psalms, but it is common in the prophets, particularly in Isaiah. See <sup><2304></sup>Isaiah 1:4; 5:19,24; 10:20; 12:6. It occurs also in <sup><0784></sup>Psalm 78:41; 89:18.

Psalm 71:23. My lips shall greatly rejoice ... My lips will seem to be happy in the privilege of celebrating the praises of God.

And my soul, which thou hast redeemed Compare <sup><38D2></sup>Psalm 34:22. The word soul here seems to be employed to denote “the soul” properly, as we understand the word — the immortal part. The usual meaning of the word, in the Psalms, however, is “life,” and it is possible that the psalmist meant merely to say here that the “life” which had been spared should find pleasure in celebrating the praises of God; but there is no impropriety in supposing that he has reference to his higher — his immortal — nature.

<sup><37D4></sup>Psalm 71:24. My tongue also shall talk of thy righteousness Thy righteous character; the truthfulness, the goodness, the fidelity which thou hast manifested in delivering me. The word rendered “talk” means properly to meditate; then, to think aloud, to talk to oneself; and the idea may be, that his mind would be so full of the subject that he would give utterance to his thoughts in audible expressions when alone. It denotes fullness of heart, and language naturally flowing out from a full soul.

All the day long Continually. This shall occupy my mind at all times. See the notes at <sup><390D></sup>Psalm 1:2.

For they are confounded ... That is, they are put to confusion; they are disappointed in their hopes; they are defeated in their plans. The psalmist sees this to be so certain that he speaks of it as if it were already done. The Psalms often conclude in this way. They begin in trouble, they end in joy; they begin in darkness, they end in light; they begin with a desponding mind, they end with a triumphant spirit; they begin with prayer, they end in praise. On the “language” used here, see the notes at <sup><3713></sup>Psalm 71:13. On such a “close” of the Psalms, see <sup><393D></sup>Psalm 3:7,8; 6:9,10; 7:17; 17:15; 22:30,31; 26:12; 42:11; 43:5; 52:8,9.

APPENDIX NOTES ON PSALM 71

I am much inclined to think that David’s was a case of infant regeneration — certainly it was a case of early piety. Touching proof of this is found in Psalm 71. The psalm, I am aware, is anonymous, and is therefore by many recent critics referred to some later writer; but I am satisfied that Venema and Hengstenberg have adduced sufficient reasons for retaining the opinion of Calvin and the older expositors, that it is from David’s pen, and is the plaintive song of his old age. It shows us the soul of the aged saint darkened by the remembrance of his great transgression, and by the swarm of sorrows with which that sin filled all his later years. But he finds comfort in reverting to the happy days of his childhood, and especially to the irrevocable trust which he was then enabled to repose in God. The thoughts and feelings expressed remind one of those which invest with such a solemn, tender interest the Second Epistle to Timothy — which embalms the dying thoughts of the great apostle. Like Paul, David takes a retrospect of the Lord's dealings with him from the beginning; and, in effect, declares, with the dying apostle;

“I am not, ashamed, for I know whom I have believed, and am persuaded that he is able to keep that which I have committed to him against that day” (~~2~~ Timothy 1:12).

Only there is this notable difference between the two, that while Paul gathered confirmation of his faith from the experience of a thirty years' walk with his Lord, David's experience stretched over a tract of more than twice so many years; for it began with his childhood — Binnie.

NOTES ON PSALM 72

The title of this psalm, in the original, is simply “For Solomon.” The words “a psalm” are supplied by the translators. In the margin this is “of” to wit, of Solomon — as if Solomon were the writer. Prof. Alexander renders it, “By Solomon,” and supposes, of course, that he was the author. The Septuagint renders it, “For” — εἰς <sup><1519></sup> — “Solomon.” So the Latin Vulgate: “In Salomonem.” The Syriac: “Of David; when he constituted Solomon king.” Luther: “Of Solomon.” It is true that the Hebrew in the title is the same which is used in other psalms where the author is designated, as in Psalm 68; Psalm 69; Psalm 70, and elsewhere, “of David;” in Psalm 73; Psalm 74, and elsewhere, “of Asaph,” etc.; and it is true that the mode of expression would most naturally convey the idea that Solomon was the author; but it is also true that this construction is not necessary as is shown by the fact that it is understood otherwise by the Septuagint, the Latin Vulgate, the Syriac, and by the author of the Chaldee Paraphrase. No one can doubt that the Hebrew is susceptible of this latter interpretation, (see Gesenius on the Hebrew letter lamedh (L), which is an inseparable preposition L, and that the translation “FOR Solomon” is a fair rendering. The contents of the psalm also demand this construction here. It is wholly improbable that Solomon would pen the predictions in the psalm as referring to himself; but not at all improbable that David would utter these predictions and prayers in reference to his son about to ascend the throne. The language of the psalm is every way appropriate to the supposition that it was composed by David in view of the anticipated glories and the peaceful reign of his son and successor, as an inspired production indicating what that reign would be, and looking onward to the still more glorious and peaceful reign of the Messiah as king. It seems to me, therefore, that the evidence is sufficiently clear that the psalm was composed in reference to Solomon, and not by him; and, if so, the most natural supposition is that it was composed by David. The evidence, indeed, is not positive, but it is such probable evidence as to leave little room for doubt.

It is a question of much importance whether the psalm had original reference to Solomon alone, or whether it had a reference to the Messiah, and is to be reckoned among the Messianic psalms. That it was applicable to the reign of Solomon, as a reign of peace and prosperity, there can be no doubt, and there seems to be as little reason to doubt that it was intended to describe his reign, and that the principal images in the psalm are taken from what it was foreseen would characterize his government; but that it also had reference to the Messiah, and to his reign, will be apparent, I think, from the following considerations:

(1) The testimony of tradition. Thus the ancient Chaldee Paraphrase, which undoubtedly gives the prevailing opinion of the ancient Jews, regards it as referring to the Messiah. The first verse of the psalm is thus rendered in that Paraphrase: “O God, give the knowledge of thy judgments to the king the Messiah — Ēl æg<sup><1430></sup> j æm,<sup><1489></sup> — and thy righteousness to the sons of David the king.” The older Jewish writers, according to Schottgen, agreed in applying it to the Messiah.

(2) The fact that it is not applicable, in the fullness of its meaning, to the reign of Solomon. It is true that the psalm describes the general characteristics of that reign as one of peace and prosperity; but it is also true, as will be seen in the progress of the explanation of the psalm, that there are passages in it which cannot be well applied to him, or which have a fullness of meaning — an amplitude of signification — which requires an application to some other state of things than that which occurred under his rule.

(3) The psalm “is” applicable to the Messiah, and accords in its general character, and in the particular expressions, with the other descriptions of the Messiah in the Old Testament. Compare <171> Psalm 72:2,4, with <2104> Isaiah 11:4; <1718> Psalm 72:3, with <2006> Isaiah 9:6; <1715> Psalm 72:5, with <2007> Isaiah 9:7. See also <1718> Psalm 72:8,11,17. It will be shown in the exposition of these verses that they accurately describe the state of things under the Messiah, and that they cannot be literally applied to the reign of Solomon.

(4) It may be added that this interpretation is in accordance with the prevalent style of the Old Testament. No one can doubt, however the fact may be explained, that the writers of the Old Testament “did” look forward to a remarkable personage who was to appear in the future. Whether the reality of the inspiration of the prophets is admitted or denied, they somehow had conceived “that notion,” and this idea is constantly manifesting itself in their writings. They delight to dwell upon the prospect of his appearing; they dwell with pleasure on his characteristics; they turn to him in times of national trouble; they anticipate final deliverance under him alone. They describe him as clothed with regal magnificence; they exalt him to the highest rank; they represent him as most beautiful in character, and most mighty in power; they apply to him the most exalted names; priest; prophet; prince; king; warrior; angel; “God.” We are not surprised to find the sacred writers recurring to this idea at any time, whatever may be the subject on which they are writing; and to think of the Old Testament “without a Messiah,” would be much the same as to think of the Iliad without Achilles; or the Aeneid without Aeneas; or “Hamlet” without Hamlet. It is for those who deny the inspiration of the prophets to explain how this idea sprang up in their minds; they cannot deny the fact that it was there. There is, perhaps, no part of the Old Testament where this is more manifest than in the psalm before us. It bears all the marks of having been composed under the influence of such an idea.

The psalm consists of two parts:

I. A description of the reign of the “king” — the Messiah, <sup><49721></sup>Psalm 72:1-17.

II. A doxology, <sup><49728></sup>Psalm 72:18,19.

I. A description of the reign of the “king” — the Messiah. That reign would be

(1) A reign of righteousness. justice would be done to all; the poor and down-trodden would be protected; prosperity would attend the righteous; the whole course of the administration would be in favor of virtue and religion, <sup><49721></sup>Psalm 72:1-7.

(2) The reign would be universal, <sup><49728></sup>Psalm 72:8-11. The king would have dominion from sea to sea, foreign princes would send him presents; all kings would bow down before him; and all nations would serve him.

(3) It would be a reign of benevolence; a reign that would have special regard for the poor; the needy, and the oppressed, <sup><49722></sup>Psalm 72:12-14.

(4) It would be perpetual; it would spread afar, and endure forever, <sup><49725></sup>Psalm 72:15-17.

II. The doxology, <sup><49728></sup>Psalm 72:18,19; a doxology eminently appropriate in view of the prospective glories of the reign of the Messiah. For such a kingdom, for such a reign of glory and beneficence, for such mercy shown to mankind in the prospect of setting up such a dominion, it was meet that the heart should be filled with adoration, and that the lips should pour forth blessings on the name of God.

To the psalm a postscript is added, (~~1972~~ Psalm 72:20), intimating that this was the close of the collection of psalms ascribed to David. On the meaning of this, see the notes at the verse.

~~1972~~ Psalm 72:1. Give the king Supposing the psalm to have been composed by David in view of the inauguration of his son and successor, this is a prayer that God would bestow on him the qualifications which would tend to secure a just, a protracted, and a peaceful reign. Though it is to be admitted that the psalm was designed to refer ultimately to the Messiah, and to be descriptive of “his” reign, yet there is no impropriety in supposing that the psalmist believed the reign of Solomon would be, in some proper sense emblematic of that reign, and that it was his desire the reign of the one “might,” as far as possible, resemble that of the other. There is no improbability, therefore, in supposing that the mind of the psalmist might have been directed to both in the composition of the psalm, and that while he used the language of prayer for the one, his eye was mainly directed to the characteristics of the other.

Thy judgments Knowledge; authority; ability to execute thy judgments, or thy laws. That is, he speaks of the king as appointed to administer justice; to maintain the laws of God, and to exercise judicial power. It is one of the primary ideas in the character of a king that he is the fountain of justice; the maker of the laws; the dispenser of right to all his subjects. The officers of the law administer justice “under” him; the last appeal is to him.

And thy righteousness That is, Clothe him, in the administration of justice, with a righteousness like thine own. Let it be seen that he represents “thee;” that his government may be regarded as thine own administration through him.

Unto the king’s son Not only to him, but to his successor; that is, let the administration of justice in the government be perpetuated. There is no improbability in supposing that in this the psalmist may have designed also to refer to the last and the greatest of his successors in the line — the Messiah.

Psalm 72:2. He shall judge thy people with righteousness On this verse see the notes at <sup><2311B></sup>Isaiah 11:3,4. The fact that this so entirely accords with the description in Isaiah 11, which undoubtedly refers to the Messiah, has been alluded to above as confirming the opinion that the psalm has a similar reference.

Psalm 72:3. The mountains shall bring peace to the people The idea in this verse is that the land would be full of peace and the fruits of peace. All parts of it would be covered with the evidences that it was a land of quietness and security, where people could pursue their callings in safety, and enjoy the fruit of their labors. On the mountains and on all the little hills in the land there would be abundant harvests, the result of peace (so strongly in contrast with the desolations of war) — all showing the advantages of a peaceful reign. It is to be remembered that Judea is a country abounding in hills and mountains, and that a great part of its former fertility resulted from terracing the hills, and cultivating them as far as possible toward the summit. The idea here is, that one who should look upon the land — who could take in at a glance the whole country — would see those mountains and hills cultivated in the most careful manner, and everywhere bringing forth the productions of peace. Compare <sup><9511></sup>Psalm 65:11-13. See also the notes at <sup><9511></sup>Psalm 85:11,12.

And the little hills, by righteousness That is, By the prevalence of righteousness, or under a reign of righteousness, the little hills would furnish illustrations of the influence of a reign of peace. Everywhere there would be the effects of a reign of peace. The whole land would be cultivated, and there would be abundance. Peace always produces these blessings; war always spreads desolation.

Psalm 72:4. He shall judge the poor of the people The afflicted; the down-trodden; the needy. He would vindicate their cause against their oppressors; his reign would be one of impartial justice, under which the rights of the poor as well as of the rich would be respected. See the notes at <sup><23104></sup>Isaiah 11:4.

He shall save the children of the needy Those in humble life; those most likely to be oppressed by others; those who have no natural protectors.

And shall break in pieces the oppressor Shall subdue, or destroy, those who live to oppress others. See the notes at <sup><9115></sup>Psalm 12:5.

Psalm 72:5. They shall fear thee That is, “men” shall fear thee, or thou shalt be feared, or revered. The idea is, that his reign would continue, or that he would be obeyed during all the time mentioned here.

As long as the sun and moon endure literally, “With the sun, and before the moon;” that is, as long as they have the sun with them, or have it to shine upon them, and as long as they are in the presence of the moon, or have its light. In other words, they would continue to the end of time; or to the end of the world. It does not denote “eternity,” for it is not assumed in the Bible that the sun and moon will continue forever; but the idea is, that as long as the sun shall continue to shine upon the earth — as long as people shall dwell upon the earth — the kingdom would be perpetual. There would be no change of dynasty; no new empire would arise to displace and to supersede this. This would be the dynasty under which the affairs of the world would be wound up; this the kingdom which would be found at the consummation of all things. The reign of the Messiah will be the “final” reign in the earth; that under which the affairs of earth will close.

Throughout all generations While the generations of people dwell on the earth.

Psalm 72:6. He shall come down That is, The influence of his reign will be like fertilising showers. The word “he” in this place might have been “it,” referring to his reign, or to the influence of his government.

Like rain upon the mown grass The word rendered “mown grass” — zGe<sup>41488</sup> — means properly “a shearing,” and is applied in Deuteronomy 18:4, and Job 31:20, to a fleece of wool. So it is understood here by the Septuagint, by the Latin Vulgate, by the Syriac, and by Luther; and, in accordance with this, it has been supposed by some that there is an allusion to the dew that descended on the fleece spread out by Gideon, Judges 6:37. The Chaldee Paraphrase renders it, “As the grass that has been eaten off by locusts;” where the idea would be that after locusts have passed over a field, devouring everything, when the rain descends the fields revive, and nature again puts on the appearance of life. This idea is adopted by Rosenmuller. The common interpretation, however, which refers the word to a “mowing,” that is, a “mown meadow,” is probably the correct one; and thus understood, the image is very beautiful. The reign of the Messiah would resemble the gently descending shower, under which the grass which has been mown springs up again with freshness and beauty.

As showers that water the earth literally, “like showers, the watering of the earth.” The original word rendered “that water” suggests the idea of distilling, or “gently” flowing.

Psalm 72:7. In his days shall the righteous flourish It will be a period when just and upright people will be protected, or when they shall receive the countenance of him who reigns. The administration of the kingdom that is to be set up will be in favor of righteousness or justice. The word “flourish” here is derived from the growth of plants — as plants sprout, or spring up — an emblem of prosperity.

And abundance of peace literally, “multitude of peace;” that is, The things which produce peace, or which indicate peace, will not be few, but numerous; they will abound everywhere. They will be found in towns and villages, and private dwellings; in the calm and just administration of the affairs of the State; in abundant harvests; in intelligence, in education, and in undisturbed industry; in the protection extended to the rights of all.

So long as the moon endureth Margin, as in Hebrew, “until there be no moon.” That is, until the moon shall cease to shine upon the earth. See Psalm 72:5.

Psalm 72:8. He shall have dominion also from sea to sea There is probably an allusion here to the promise in Exodus 23:31: “And I will set thy bounds from the Red Sea even unto the sea of the Philistines, and from the desert unto the river.” This was the original promise in regard to the bounds of the promised land. A promise similar to this occurs also in Genesis 15:18:

“In the same day the Lord made a covenant with Abram, saying, Unto thy seed have I given this land, from the river of Egypt unto the great river, the river Euphrates.”

The meaning here is, that what was implied in these ancient promises would be carried out under the reign of the king referred to in the psalm. The “immediate” allusion, therefore, in the phrase “from sea to sea,” may have been from the Red Sea on the East to the Mediterranean on the West; but still the language is susceptible of a more enlarged application, and may mean from one sea to another; that is, embracing all the lands or countries lying between seas and oceans; or, in other words, that the dominion would be universal. Compare the notes at Psalm 2:8.

And from the river ... The Euphrates. This was emphatically “the river” to the Hebrews — the great river — the greatest river known to them; and this river would be naturally understood as intended by the expression, unless there was something to limit it. Besides, this was expressly designated in the original covenant as the boundary of the promised land. See, as above, <sup><0158></sup>Genesis 15:18. The meaning here is, that, taking that river as one of the boundaries, or as a starting point, the dominion would extend from that to the utmost limits of the earth. It would have no other boundary but the limits of the world. The promise, therefore, is, that the dominion would be universal, or would pervade the earth; at once a kingdom of peace, and yet spreading itself all over the world. It is hardly necessary to say that this did not occur under Solomon, and that it could not have been expected that it would occur under him, and especially as it was expected that his reign would be one of peace and not of conquest. It would find its complete fulfillment only under the Messiah.

The word rendered “they that dwell in the wilderness” — yŷki<sup><6728></sup>, means properly those who abide in deserts, dry places, solitudes; and it might be applied either to animals or to people. It is applied to the former in <sup><0312></sup>Isaiah 13:21 (see the notes at that place); <sup><0313></sup>Isaiah 23:13; 34:14; <sup><0319></sup>Jeremiah 50:39. In all these, except <sup><0313></sup>Isaiah 23:13, it is rendered “wild beasts of the desert,” denoting jackals, ostriches, etc.; but here, and in <sup><0714></sup>Psalm 74:14, it is evidently applied to people, as denoting shepherds — nomadic tribes — people who have no permanent home, but who wander from place to place. The idea is, that these wild, wandering, unsettled hordes would become subject to him, or would bow down and acknowledge his authority. This can be fulfilled only under the Messiah.

And his enemies shall lick the dust This is expressive of the most thorough submission and abject humiliation. It is language derived from what seems actually to occur in Oriental countries, where people prostrate themselves on their faces, and place their mouths on the ground, in token of reverence or submission. Rosenmuller (Morgenland, vol. ii., pp. 82,83) quotes a passage from Hugh Boyd’s Account of his embassy to Candy in Ceylon, where he says that when he himself came to show respect to the king, it was by kneeling before him. But this, says he, was not the case with other ambassadors. “They almost literally licked the dust. They cast themselves on their faces on the stony ground, and stretched out their arms and legs; then they raised themselves upon their knees, and uttered certain forms of good wishes in the loudest tones — May the head of the king of kings reach above the sun; may he reign a thousand years.” Compare the notes at <sup><3423></sup>Isaiah 49:23.

And of the isles ... Representing also distant lands; or lands beyond the seas. The word “islands” among the Hebrews commonly denoted distant seacoasts, particularly those of the Mediterranean. See the notes at <sup><2401></sup>Isaiah 41:1.

Shall offer gifts See the notes at <sup><1952></sup>Psalm 45:12. Compare <sup><2315></sup>Isaiah 60:5-7,13-17.

<sup><3721></sup>Psalm 72:11. Yea, all kings shall fall down ... That is, his reign will be universal. The kings and people mentioned in the previous verses are only specimens of what will occur. “All” kings — “all” nations — will do what these are represented as doing. They will submit to the Messiah; they will own him as their Lord. See the notes at <sup><1918></sup>Psalm 2:8. Compare <sup><3423></sup>Isaiah 49:23.

The poor also ... All who have no protector; all who are exposed to injustice and wrong from others. This is everywhere declared to be the characteristic of the reign of the Messiah. See the notes at <sup><23104></sup>Isaiah 11:4.

<sup><3723></sup>Psalm 72:13. He shall spare the poor and needy He will have pity on; he will show mercy or favor to them.

And shall save the souls of the needy Will guard and defend them; will be their protector and friend. His administration will have special respect to those who are commonly overlooked, and who are exposed to oppression and wrong.

He will rescue their lives; that is, he will deliver them from the hands of men who practice deceit, or who are dishonest and unjust — and from the hands of those who oppress. This is stating in another form the idea that his reign would be one of equity, protecting the rights of the poor, and delivering the oppressed.

And precious shall their blood be in his sight That is, so precious that he will not permit it to be shed unjustly, but will come to their rescue when their life is in danger; or, that — being shed — he will regard it as so valuable that he will not permit it to go unavenged. He will never be indifferent to their safety, or their reputation.

<sup><19725></sup> Psalm 72:15. And he shall live So far as the language here is concerned, this may either refer to the king — the Messiah — or to the poor and the oppressed man. If the former, then it means that the life of the Messiah would be perpetual; that he would not be cut off as other sovereigns are; that there would be no change of dynasty; that he would be, as a king, the same — unchanging and unchanged — in all the generations of people, and in all the revolutions which occur on the earth. This would accord with the truth, and with what is elsewhere said of the Messiah; but, perhaps, the more correct interpretation is the latter — that it refers to the poor and the oppressed man — meaning that he would live to bring an offering to the Messiah, and to pray for the extension of his kingdom upon the earth.

And to him shall be given Margin, “one shall give.” Literally, “he shall give to him;” that is, the man who has enjoyed his protection, and who has been saved by him, will do this. As a token of his gratitude, and as an expression of his submission, he will bring to him a costly offering, the gold of Sheba.

Of the gold of Sheba One of the gifts referred to in <sup><19720></sup> Psalm 72:10, as coming from Sheba. Compare <sup><23418></sup> Isaiah 43:3; 45:14. The meaning is, that those who are redeemed by him — who owe so much to him for protecting and saving them — will bring the most valued things of the earth, or will consecrate to him all that they are, and all that they possess. Compare <sup><23415></sup> Isaiah 60:5-7,13-17.

Prayer also shall be made for him continually Not for him personally, but for the success of his reign, for the extension of his kingdom. Prayer made for “that” is made for “him,” for he is identified with that.

And daily shall he be praised Every day; constantly. It will not be only at stated and distant intervals — at set seasons, and on special occasions — but those who love him will do it every day. It is not necessary to say that this accords with the truth in reference to those who are the friends and followers of the Messiah — the Lord Jesus. Their lives are lives of praise and gratitude. From their dwellings daily praise ascends to him; from their hearts praise is constant; praise uttered in the closet and in the family; praise breathed forth from the heart, whether on the farm, in the workshop, on a journey, or in the busy marts of commerce. The time will come when this shall be universal; when he who can take in at a glance the condition of the world, will see it to be a world of praise; when he who looks on all hearts at the same moment will see a world full of thankfulness.

<sup><3726></sup>Psalm 72:16. There shall be an handful of corn “Of grain,” for so the word means in the Scriptures. The “general” idea in this verse is plain. It is, that, in the time of the Messiah, there would be an ample supply of the fruits of the earth; or that his reign would tend to the promotion of prosperity, industry, abundance. It would be as if fields of grain waved everywhere, even on the tops of mountains, or as if the hills were cultivated to the very summit, so that the whole land would be covered over with waving, smiling harvests. There is a difference of opinion, however, and consequently of interpretation, as to the meaning of the word rendered “handful.” This word — hSpi<sup><3645></sup> — occurs nowhere else, and it is impossible, therefore, to determine its exact meaning. By some it is rendered “handful;” by others, “abundance.” The former interpretation is adopted by Prof. Alexander, and is found in the older interpreters generally; the latter is the opinion of Gesenius, DeWette, and most modern expositors. It is also the interpretation in the Syriac. The Vulgate and the Septuagint render it “strength” — meaning something “firm” or “secure,” “firmamentum,” στηριγμα<sup><4740></sup>. According to the explanation which regards the word as meaning “handful,” the idea is, that there would be a great contrast between the small beginnings of the Messiah’s reign and its ultimate triumph — as if a mere handful of grain were sown on the top of a mountain — on a place little likely to produce anything — a place usually barren and unproductive — which would grow into an abundant harvest, so that it would wave everywhere like the cedar trees of Lebanon. According to the other interpretation, the idea is simply that there would be an “abundance” in the land. The whole land would be cultivated, even to the tops of the hills, and the evidences of plenty would be seen everywhere. It is impossible to determine which of these is the correct idea; but both agree in that which is essential — that the reign of the Messiah would be one of peace and plenty. The former interpretation is the most poetic, and the most beautiful. It accords, also, with other representations — as in the parable of the grain of mustard-seed, and the parable of the leaven; and it accords, also, with the fact that the beginning of the Gospel was small in comparison with what would be the ultimate result. This would seem to render that interpretation the most probable.

In the earth In the land; the land of Canaan; the place where the kingdom of the Messiah would be set up.

Upon the top of the mountains In places “like” the tops of mountains. The mountains and hills were seldom cultivated to the tops. Yet here the idea is, that the state of things under the Messiah would be as if a handful of grain were sown in the place most unlikely to produce a harvest, or which no one thought of cultivating. No one needs to be told how well this would represent the cold and barren human heart in general; or the state of the Jewish world in respect to true religion, at the time when the Saviour appeared.

The fruit thereof That which would spring up from the mere handful of grain thus sown.

Shall shake like Lebanon Like the cedar trees of Lebanon. The harvest will wave as those tall and stately trees do. This is an image designed to show that the growth would be strong and abundant, far beyond what could have been anticipated from the small quantity of the seed sown, and the barrenness of the soil. The word rendered “shake” means more than is implied in our word “shake” or “wave.” It conveys also the idea of a rushing sound, such as that which whistles among cedar or pine trees. “The origin of the Hebrew verb,” says Gesenius, “and its primary idea lies in the “noise” and “crashing” which is made by concussion.” Hence, it is used to denote the “rustling” motion of grain waving in the wind, and the sound of the wind whistling through trees when they are agitated by it.

And they of the city Most interpreters suppose that this refers to Jerusalem, as the center of the Messiah's kingdom. It seems more probable, however, that it is not designed to refer to Jerusalem, or to any particular city, but to stand in contrast with the top of the mountain. Cities and hills would alike flourish; there would be prosperity everywhere — in barren and unpopulated wastes, and in places where people had been congregated together. The “figure” is changed, as is not uncommon, but the “idea” is retained. The indications of prosperity would be apparent everywhere.

Shall flourish like grass of the earth As grass springs out of the ground, producing the idea of beauty and plenty. See the notes at <sup><244B></sup>Isaiah 44:3,4.

<sup><1927></sup>Psalm 72:17. His name shall endure for ever Margin, as in Hebrew, “Shall be forever;” that is, “He” shall endure forever.

His name shall be continued as long as the sun As long as that continues to shine — an expression designed to express perpetuity. See the notes at <sup><1925></sup>Psalm 72:5. The margin here is, “shall be as a son to continue his father's name forever.” The Hebrew word — <sup>~Wn</sup><sup><15126></sup> — means “to sprout, to put forth;” and hence, to “flourish.” The idea is that of a tree which continues always to sprout, or put forth leaves, branches, blossoms; or, which never dies.

And men shall be blessed in him See <sup><1123></sup>Genesis 12:3; 22:18. He will be a source of blessing to them, in the pardon of sin; in happiness; in peace; in salvation.

All nations shall call him blessed Shall praise him; shall speak of him as the source of their highest comforts, joys, and hopes. See <sup><1938></sup>Luke 19:38; <sup><1910></sup>Matthew 21:9; 23:39. The time will come when all the nations of the earth will honor and praise him.

<sup><1928></sup>Psalm 72:18. Blessed be the LORD God, the God of Israel The God who rules over Israel; the God who is worshipped by the Hebrew people, and who is recognized as their God. They adore him as the true God; and he “is” their God, their Protector, their Friend.

Who only doeth wondrous things Things that can properly be regarded as “wonders;” things suited to excite admiration by their vastness and power. Compare <sup><1951></sup>Exodus 15:11.

Psalm 72:19. And blessed be his glorious name for ever The name by which he is known — referring perhaps particularly to his name “Yahweh.” Still the prayer would be, that all the names by which he is known, all by which he has revealed himself, might be regarded with veneration always and everywhere.

And let the whole earth be filled with his glory With the knowledge of himself; with the manifestations of his presence; with the influences of his religion. Compare <sup>(41:21)</sup>Numbers 14:21. This prayer was especially appropriate at the close of a psalm designed to celebrate the glorious reign of the Messiah. Under that reign the earth will be, in fact, filled with the glory of God; the world will be a world of glory. Assuredly all who love God, and who love mankind, all who desire that God may be honored, and that the world may be blessed and happy, will unite in this fervent prayer, and reecho the hearty “Amen and amen” of the psalmist.

Amen, and amen So be it. Let this occur. Let this time come. The expression is doubled to denote intensity of feeling. It is the going out of a heart full of desire that this might be so.

Psalm 72:20. The prayers of David the son of Jesse are ended This is not found in the Syriac. The following is added in that version at the close of the psalm: “The end of the Second Book.” In regard to this twentieth verse, it is quite clear that it is no part of the psalm; and it is every way probable that it was not placed here by the author of the psalm, and also that it has no special and exclusive reference to this psalm, for the psalm could in no special sense be called “a prayer of David.” The words bear all the marks of having been placed at the close of a collection of psalms, or a division of the Book of Psalms, to which might be given as an appropriate designation, the title “The Prayers of David, the son of Jesse;” meaning that that book, or that division of the book, was made up of the compositions of David, and might be thus distinguished from other portions of the general collection. This would not imply that in this part of the collection there were literally no other psalms than those which had been composed by David, or that none of the psalms of David might be found in other parts of the general collection, but that this division was more entirely made up of his psalms, and that the name might therefore be given to this as his collection. It may be fairly inferred from this, that there was such a collection, or that there were, in the Book of Psalms, divisions which were early recognized. See the General Introduction. Dr. Horsley supposes, however, that this declaration, “The prayers of David the son of Jesse are ended,” pertains to this psalm alone, as if David had nothing more to pray for or to wish than what was expressed in these glowing representations of the kingdom of the Messiah, and of the happy times which would be enjoyed under his rule.

APPENDIX NOTES ON PSALM 72

Solomon is named in the title as the author of the psalm. Attempts have been made to no purpose to interpret hmbv<sup>48010</sup> here, as in Psalm 127, in another sense. The l i when it occurs in the titles, without anything to limit its application, ALWAYS indicates, as here, the author .... In favor of the announcement in the title, we have first the remarkably objective character of the psalm, common to it with the other writings of Solomon, and in striking contrast to that flow of feeling, which forms such a marked feature in the psalms of David. And, in the second place, there is also, the fact that it is the circumstances of Solomon’s time that form the ground-work of the psalm. The references to these circumstances partake too much of an individual character, as will be seen in the progress of our exposition, to admit of our supposing with Stier again that they are prophetic. There are no reasons of any importance against considering Solomon as the author. It is maintained by Stier, that on account of the typical reference to Solomon, the authorship is suitable only to David. But, in reply to this, it is sufficient to advert to Psalm 2; 110, where David himself, out of the grace imparted to him in his contests against the enemies of the kingdom of God, constructs a ladder, by which he rises to the contemplation of the infinitely more glorious victories to be won in battle by his descendant. Why should not Solomon, in like manner, see in his righteous reign of peace, a type of the kingdom of the Prince of peace? — Hengstenberg.

Two psalms bear Solomon’s name in their titles. One of these is the hundred and twenty-seventh, entitled A Song of Degrees, of Solomon ... Solomon’s other psalm is the seventy-second, and here also the traces of his pen are unequivocal. A mistaken interpretation of the note appended to it — “the prayers of David, the son of Jesse, are ended,” led most of the older commentators to attribute the psalm to David, and to suppose that it is a prayer offered in his old age “for Solomon,” as the peaceful prince who was to succeed him on the throne. However, it has long been known that the note in question refers to the whole of the preceding portion of the psalter — much of which was written by Asaph and the sons of Korah; and there can be no doubt that the title can only be translated “OF Solomon.” So clear are the traces of Solomon’s pen, that Calvin — whose sagacity in this kind of criticism has never been excelled — although he thought himself obliged, by the note at the end of the psalm, to attribute the substance of it to David, felt Solomon’s touch so sensibly, that he threw out the conjecture that the prayer was the father’s, but that it was afterward thrown into the lyrical form by the son. This is not the place for detailed exposition; I will therefore content myself with remarking that, properly speaking, the psalm is not “for Solomon” at all. If it refers to him and his peaceful reign, it does so only in as far as they were types of the person and kingdom of the Prince of peace. The psalm, from beginning to end, is not only capable of being applied to Christ, but great part is incapable of being fairly applied to any other. — Binnie.

Remarking on the opening part of the psalm (~~Psalm~~ Psalm 72:1-4), Dr. Binnie again says — “Solomon is certainly here. The psalm is the joint prayer of prince and people, entreating that the new reign may be wise and just, long and happy. But we cannot read it to the end without feeling that, even when it was first sung, the thought of every reflective Israelite must have been carried beyond the young king, who had just entered upon the government, with such honorable aspirations and such a rich dower of wisdom and diversified accomplishment. In Hebrew the optative and future run so much into each other that it is hard to say whether the psalm ought to be translated throughout as a prayer, or ought not rather to be thrown, in the latter part, into the form of a prediction, as it is in the English version. Some, like Hupfeld, make it a prayer throughout, and read it thus:

Let the kings of Tarshish and the isles render gifts, Let the kings of Sheba and Saba offer presents. Yea, let all kings bow themselves down before him, Let all nations serve him. For he delivereth the poor when he crieth, And the afflicted who hath no helper. — Mr. Perowne’s Translation

But even thus rendered, the terms would have been too fulsome for a Bible psalm, if the scope of it had been limited to the person and reign of Solomon. He could not modestly have asked his people to unite with him in offering to God requests of such far-reaching and glorious import, unless he had intended them to be offered in behalf of THE KING in the most comprehensive sense of the term, as including the seed of David forever, and especially the greater Son of David who was promised to succeed upon the throne. The reference to Christ is of course still more pointed and obvious, if (as seems preferable) the latter part of the psalm be rendered as a prediction. And if those who first made use of the psalm may be presumed to have looked beyond Solomon, what shall we say regarding those who lived to see the kingdom divided and the house of David represented by people like Rehoboam? The psalm, let it be remembered, was not a mere coronation anthem sung once and then forgotten. It was a new song added to the church's Psalter, and continued to be sung in divine worship. We may be sure, therefore, that even if it could be supposed that the people, in the bright morning of Solomon's reign fixed their hopes on him as they sang the psalm, they would cease to do so when their hopes from him and his were so cruelly disappointed. The type would more and more recede from their view, as the temporal glory of David's house waned; and they would come to sing the psalm, very much as we do, with an entire concentration of the thoughts on the Prince of peace."

Psalm 72:3-6. The mountains shall bring peace ... The hills and mountains prominent in Israel's land, the hills and mountains, too, of earth at large, generally so barren, hills and mountains on which the feet of other messengers have often stood (<sup>2341b</sup>Isaiah 40:9), but never any messengers so blessed as those that visit them now; these hills and mountains display the signs of peace, namely, abundant produce, "because of righteousness" — because the righteous One has come to dwell in this new earth. Antichrist and all oppressors are overthrown (<sup>4970d</sup>Psalm 72:4); earth's thick-populated regions fear him, and shall go on fearing him in peace, so long as sun and moon remain, that sun and moon which at creation's dawn were appointed to light up earth and guide people to keep holy festivals to the Lord. The Lord Jesus is there. Like "plenty-dropping showers" that reach the very roots of the mown grass (<sup>4971b</sup>Psalm 72:6), so is he to the earth after it has been shorn by the scythe of war, and every form of ruin and wrath. He revives it, as summer's genial rains cause grass to spring up in new vigor, clothing the soil with a richer and thicker mantle of verdure than before — as Layard tells us how in the season of spring the dusty soil of Mesopotamia will change its aspect, in one night the tame plains turning to a bright scarlet, or to deepest blue, through the burst of flowers, while the meadows put on the emerald green of the most luxuriant pastures, causing even the wild Bedouin, as he riots in the rich herbage and scented air, to exclaim, "What delight has God given us equal to this!" — A. A. Bonar.

Psalm 72:15. He shall live On Psalm 72:15 a modern translator of the Psalter has appropriately indicated that that which was said to other kings in flattery shall be said to the Messiah in truth: "O King, live forever." The best commentary on the words "he shall live" is however, to be found in the declaration of the glorified Saviour himself in the Apocalypse, "I am he that liveth and was dead; and behold, I am alive for evermore, Amen; and have the keys of hell and of death." In the words "to him shall be given of the gold of Sheba," it is implied that rich offerings shall be made to him by people of their substance as a testimony of the devotion of their hearts. That "prayer shall be made for him continually," has been verified in the supplications which are being continually poured forth by all Christians for the advancement of his kingdom: and the universal worship of the Christian church has already set the seal of truth to the words, "daily shall he be praised." — Thrupp.

Prayer shall be made for him But what should we pray for on his behalf? Our prayers should vary with the state of his cause; but we should always bear four things upon our minds.

First, the degree of its resources; that there be always a sufficiency of suitable and able instruments to carry on the work. To this the Saviour himself directs us: "The harvest truly is great; but the laborers are few; pray ye therefore the Lord of the harvest that he would send forth laborers into his harvest."

Secondly, the freedom of its administration; that whatever opposes or hinders its progress may be removed. "Pray ye for us," says the apostle, "that the word of the Lord may have free course and be glorified."

Thirdly, the diffusion of its principles; that they may become general and universal; spreading through every family, neighborhood, and province, and realm. So prayed of old the pious Jews: "That thy way may be known on earth; thy saving health among all nations. Let the people praise thee, O God; yea, let all the people praise thee."

Fourthly, the increase of its glory, as well as its extent; that it may abound more in wisdom, purity, spirituality, charity, and zeal; that the light of the moon may be as the light of the sun; and the light of the sun be sevenfold as the light of seven days; that for brass he would bring gold; and for iron, silver; and for wood, brass; and for stones, iron. Thus they that make mention of the Lord are to “give him no rest,” not only until he “establish,” but make Jerusalem a praise in the whole earth. — Jay.

NOTES ON PSALM 73

This psalm (with the ten succeeding psalms, together with Psalm 50 — twelve in all) is ascribed to Asaph, unless the reading in the margin, “for Asaph” be correct. The most natural sense of the expression in the title, however, is that they are psalms of Asaph; that is, that they were composed by him. See Introduction to Psalm 50. It has been maintained that a part of these psalms, particularly Psalm 74; 79; 80; could not be his, for it is alleged that they refer to events long subsequent to his age. There seems to be no objection, however, to the supposition that this psalm was composed by him, as it has no particular reference to any particular age or country, but is made up of general reflections, which might have arisen in any age, or in any land.

Respecting the particular occasion on which the psalm was composed we have no information. It was in view of the prosperity of the wicked, and suggests the reflections which troubled the writer in regard to the divine administration in view of that prosperity. The thoughts which are recorded are such as might occur to any mind, and do often occur, arising from the fact that wicked people are so successful and so happy in the world, living in prosperity, and dying apparently without pain or alarm, while so many of the good are poor and sorrowful in their lives, and their whole course on earth is one of so much grief and sorrow. Such thoughts as are expressed in this psalm will often cross the mind, and the question will arise why God permits this; whether there is any advantage in being good; and whether that God who sees this, and permits this, can be just and benevolent — the friend of the righteous, and the enemy of the wicked — or whether there is any God. The psalm describes these feelings, and shows how the difficulties were solved in the case of its author, suggesting as the solution, that this is not the world of retribution; that there is a future state where exact justice will be done, and where all the inequalities of the present system will be adjusted. In that future world — “in eternity” — there will be ample time and room to make such an adjustment; to do exact justice to all. The “idea” in the psalm is, that these things cannot be explained except on the supposition that there is a future state; and the psalm, therefore, is an argument for a future state of existence. The affairs of earth cannot be explained, and the character of God cannot be vindicated, except on that supposition.

The psalm in its general structure and design bears a strong resemblance to Psalm 37, though there is no evidence that the author of this psalm had that before him, or in his eye. The expressions are not the same, nor does one appear to have been copied from the other. They contain independent reflections on the same general subject, suggesting the same perplexities, and finding a solution of the difficulties in the same way — in looking to the future, to a just retribution in the end. In this case — Psalm 73 — the psalmist says that he learned the solution of the problem by the instructions of the sanctuary (<sup><197317></sup>Psalm 73:17); in the former case — Psalm 37 — the solution was found by an observation of the comparative effects of a wicked and a religious life, <sup><1970></sup>Psalm 37:10,11,20,23-25,35-37. The idea in both is, that the ultimate effect of goodness or piety must be happiness; the ultimate effect of sin must be misery. The author of one of these psalms finds this solution in the present life; the author of the other, in the life to come. In either case, the character of God is vindicated, and the troubled feelings of the soul calmed down.

The general “idea” in the psalm is stated in the first verse, that “God is good to Israel, to such as are of a clean heart;” that is, that he is the true friend of the righteous, or that his administration is in favor of virtue, or in favor of those who are righteous. The psalm states the process by which the writer came to this conclusion; the mental conflicts through which he passed before this result was reached; his own agitation of mind, and the difficulties he saw in the subject, in view of the facts which exist in this world. His mind had been greatly perplexed when he had meditated on the subject, and the mental conflict had gone so far with him as almost to lead him to abandon the idea that there was a God, or that there was anything in religion, and to conclude that it was all a delusion.

The psalm, therefore, consists of the following parts:

I. The statement of the general proposition that the divine administration is favorable to virtue, or that there is a God who presides in the affairs of people, <sup><19731></sup>Psalm 73:1.

II. The facts which the psalmist had observed, out of which his doubts had sprung, or which had given him so much perplexity and trouble, <sup><197312></sup>Psalm 73:2-14. Those facts were, that the wicked seemed to be prosperous and happy; that they lived without trouble, and died without any tokens of the divine disapproval; that their eyes stood out with fatness, and that they had more than heart could desire; that they set their mouths against the heavens, and were proud blasphemers, while God took no notice of them, or manifested no disapprobation; that they contemned God, and yet were prospered in the world, while, on the other hand, he himself — the psalmist — was chastened, and afflicted, and plagued — suggesting the idea that there could be no advantage in piety, and that all his anxiety to have pure hands and a pure heart was in vain.

III. The statement of his purpose to conceal his feelings on the subject, lest he should do injury to those who had not these troublesome thoughts, but who endeavored in humility to serve God, <sup><19715></sup>Psalm 73:15. He had thoughts which he did not consider it proper to make known to others — thoughts which would only pain them, or unsettle their faith in God, without doing any good.

IV. The means by which his mind had been made calm on the subject, and his difficulties solved, <sup><19717></sup>Psalm 73:17-20. He had gone to the sanctuary; he had looked at the end of these things; he had seen what was to be the result; he had been instructed to look forward to a time when all these inequalities would be adjusted, and when, in the punishment of the wicked, it would be seen that there is a God, and that he is just.

V. He now condemns his own former folly, and sees that his conduct had been wholly irrational; that his views had been short-sighted; that he had been stupid, like a beast, in the low conceptions which he had taken of God, <sup><19721></sup>Psalm 73:21,22.

VI. In view of all, the psalmist now commits himself to God. He sees that there is reason to trust in him. He resolves to murmur or complain no more. He finds his portion in God. He believes that God will guide him by his counsel, and ultimately receive him to glory. He says that there is none in heaven or on earth that he desires beside him. He is cheered with the thought that when his strength and heart should fail, God would be the strength of his heart, and his portion forever. He would, therefore, henceforth, confide in the Lord God, <sup><19723></sup>Psalm 73:23-28.

<sup><19731></sup>Psalm 73:1. Truly God is good to Israel That is, to his people; to the righteous; to those who serve him. That is, God is the “real” friend of the righteous. He has not forgotten them. He does not abandon them. He is not indifferent to them. He is not the friend of wicked people; and the administration of his government is not in favor of wickedness. After all that seems to indicate this, after all that troubles the mind in regard to his dealings, it is a truth that God is the friend of righteousness, and not of wickedness, and that there is advantage in his service. To see the force of what is said here by the psalmist we must realize that the train of thought in the psalm had passed through his mind, and that his perplexities had been relieved in the manner specified in the psalm. The margin here is “yet;” “yet God is good to Israel.” This word “yet” would, in this place, be a happy translation. The psalmist then would be represented as having been engaged in meditating on the subject and in looking at all its perplexities, and then he says, “Yet God is good; notwithstanding all the difficulties in the case, it is nevertheless true that he is the friend of his people — the friend of righteousness.”

Even to such as are of a clean heart Margin, as in Hebrew, “clean of heart.” See <sup><973></sup>Psalm 73:13. The reference is to those who are truly righteous, for all true righteousness has its seat in the heart. See <sup><9810></sup>Psalm 51:10.

<sup><973></sup>Psalm 73:2. But as for me literally, “And I.” The meaning is, “And I, who so confidently now trust in God, and believe that he is good, was formerly in a far different state of mind; I was so hesitating, so troubled, and so doubtful, that I had almost entirely lost confidence in him as a wise and just moral governor.”

My feet were almost gone I was just ready to fall. Of course, this refers to his state of mind. In regard to his faith or confidence in God, he was like a man standing in a slippery place, and scarcely able to remain upright.

My steps had well nigh slipped The expression rendered “well nigh” means “like nothing,” or “as nothing;” that is, in reference to firmness it was as if there was “nothing” left. There was nothing which would keep him from slipping. The word rendered “slipped” means “poured out.” That is, in his going he was like water poured out, instead of being like something solid and firm. The idea is, that his faith seemed to be all gone. He was like a falling man; a man who had no strength to walk.

When I saw the prosperity of the wicked More literally, “the peace of the wicked.” The reference is not so much to their prosperity in general as to their peace; their conscious safety; their freedom from trouble; and especially their calmness, and their freedom from suffering, in death. From all this he was led for the moment to doubt whether there was any advantage in religion; whether God was just; and whether he befriended the righteous any more than he did the wicked.

Psalm 73:4. For there are no bands in their death The word rendered “bands” here means properly “cords tightly drawn,” <sup>25816</sup>Isaiah 58:6; then, pains, pangs, torments — “as if” one were twisted or tortured with pain, as a cord is closely twisted. The word occurs only in <sup>25816</sup>Isaiah 58:6, and in this place. The fact which is here referred to by the psalmist, and which gave him so much uneasiness, was that which so often occurs, that when the wicked die, they do not seem to suffer in proportion to their wickedness; or there seem to be no special marks of the divine displeasure as they are about to leave the world. They have lived in prosperity, and they die in peace. There is no uncommon agony in death; there is no special alarm about the future world. They have enjoyed this world, and a sinful life seems now to be followed by a peaceful death. They do not even suffer as much in death as good people often do; — what then is the advantage of piety? And how can we believe that God is just; or that he is the friend of the righteous; or even that there is a God? Of the fact here adverted to by the psalmist, that the wicked do thus live and die, there can be no doubt, and that fact has given perplexity to good people in all ages of the world.

But their strength is firm Margin, as in Hebrew, “fat.” That is, They are not emaciated and weakened by disease, but they go down to death apparently from good health, and without wasting disease. See the notes at <sup>48223</sup>Job 21:23-26.

Psalm 73:5. They are not in trouble as other men Margin, “In the trouble of other men.” Literally, “In the labor of man they are not;” that is, they are exempt from the common burdens and troubles of humanity, or those which pertain to man as man. There seems to be some special interposition in their favor to save them from the common calamities which come upon the race.

Neither are they plagued like other men Margin, “with.” Literally, “And with mankind they are not afflicted,” or smitten. The calamities which come so thickly and heavily on the race do not seem to come upon them. They are favored, prospered, happy, while others are afflicted.

Therefore they are proud, haughty, imperious. They put on the ornaments and trappings of pride; their clothing and their adorning all are indicative of a proud heart. They seem to imagine that they are better than others, and that they are treated in this manner “because” they are better than others. In the original it is a single word which is rendered “compasseth about as a chain.” The word means “to adorn with a necklace or collar;” and the idea is, that pride surrounds them as with a neck-chain, or a collar for the neck. They wear it as an ornament. They make it conspicuous. It is apparent on a haughty neck — in an erect and stiff demeanour. Compare the notes at <sup><43816></sup>Isaiah 3:16: “The daughters of Zion walk with stretched forth necks.”

Violence covereth them as a garment Injustice or cruelty seems to be their very clothing. It is manifest in their whole gait and demeanor that they are men of haughtiness and pride; that they are destitute of tenderness, sympathy, sensibility.

<sup><49317></sup>Psalm 73:7. Their eyes stand out with fatness As the fruit of their high living. They are not weakened and emaciated by toil and want, as other men often are. Compare the notes at <sup><49170></sup>Psalm 17:10.

They have more than heart could wish Margin, “they pass the thoughts of the heart.” Literally, “the imaginations (or thoughts) of the heart pass;” pass along; pass forth. The meaning seems to be, not that they have more than heart could desire, as in our translation — for that would not probably be true; nor, that the thoughts of the heart are “disclosed,” as Prof. Alexander supposes — for that idea does not seem to be in the language; but that their thoughts, their plans, their purposes, pass freely along without any obstruction; their wishes are all gratified; their purposes are accomplished; they have all that they wish. Whatever comes into the mind as an object of desire is obtained without hindrance or trouble. They seem only to wish for a thing, or to think of a thing, and they have it.

<sup><49318></sup>Psalm 73:8. They are corrupt literally, “they mock.” The word rendered “they are corrupt” never has this signification. It is the very word — qWm<sup><44167></sup> — from which our word mock is derived, and means the same thing. The idea is that they deride religion, or mock at all that pertains to God, and to the retributions of the future world.

And speak wickedly concerning oppression ... literally, “they speak in wickedness; oppression they speak from on high.” That is, they use arrogant language; they speak in a proud manner, as if they were above others; they use harsh and violent language, not regarding the feelings or the rights of others.

<sup><473D></sup>Psalm 73:9. They set their mouth against the heavens Compare <sup><6116></sup>Revelation 13:6. Literally, “They set their mouth in heaven,” or in the heavens. The idea is, they speak as if they were “in” the heavens; as if they were clothed with all authority; as if they were superior beings, and had a right to command the universe.

And their tongue walketh through the earth It has no limit; it is as if it roamed over all the earth. They speak without any restraint of law, or propriety; without any regard to the command of God, or to what is due to people. In other words, they seem to set themselves above all law, and to act as if there were no one in heaven or in earth to control them.

<sup><473D></sup>Psalm 73:10. Therefore his people Those that truly love God; the pious in the earth.

Return hither Return to this subject. In their musings — their meditations on divine things — they come back to this inquiry. The subject occupies their minds, and they recur to it as a subject which perplexes them; as a thing that is incomprehensible. They think it over again and again, and are more and more perplexed and embarrassed. The difficulties which these facts suggest about God and his government are such that they cannot solve them.

And waters of a full cup are wrung out to them literally, “waters of fullness;” or, full waters. The Chaldee renders this, “Many tears flow from them.” The Septuagint, and the Latin Vulgate, “And full days shall be found by them.” The word rendered “are wrung out” — from hxm,<sup><468D></sup> — means properly to “suck;” then, to suck out; to drink greedily. See <sup><2517></sup>Isaiah 51:17. It is applied to one who drinks greedily of an intoxicating cup; and then, to one who drinks a cup of poison to the dregs. <sup><473B></sup>Psalm 75:8. The meaning here is, that the facts in the case, and the questions which arose in regard to those facts, and which so perplexed them, were like a bitter cup; a cup of poison, or an intoxicating cup which overpowered their faculties — and that they, in their perplexities, “exhausted” the cup. They drank it all, even to the dregs. They did not merely taste it; but they drank it. It was a subject full of perplexity; a subject that wholly overpowered all their faculties, and “exhausted” all their powers.

<sup><49731></sup>Psalm 73:11. And they say His people say. The connection demands this interpretation. The meaning is, that his people, as they return again and again to this subject (<sup><49730></sup>Psalm 73:10), are constrained to put this question. They are compelled by these facts to start such painful inquiries about God; and distressing as the inquiries are, and as are the doubts which they involve, these thoughts will pass through their mind, even though to avoid giving needless pain to those who have no such perplexities and difficulties they keep these thoughts to themselves, <sup><49735></sup>Psalm 73:15.

How doth God know? That is, How can these facts be reconciled with God’s omniscience? How can it be that he sees all this, and yet suffers it to occur, or that he does not interpose to prevent it? Is it not a fair inference from these facts that God does “not” see them, and that he is “not” an Omniscient Being? Can it be explained, can it be believed, that God sees all this, and that he calmly looks on, and does nothing to prevent it? If he sees it, why does he not interpose and put an end to it? These perplexities were not confined to the psalmist. They are such as have been felt by good people in all ages; and no one yet has been able to furnish a solution of them that is wholly free from difficulty.

And is there knowledge in the Most High? Can there be in God a knowledge of these facts? Are we not driven to the conclusion that he must be ignorant of them? for, if he knew them, would he not interpose to prevent them? How “can” it be consistent with the idea that he “knows” them, and “sees” them, that he does “not” interpose, and that he suffers these things to take place without any attempt to check such evils? Who, even now, can answer these questions?

<sup><49732></sup>Psalm 73:12. Behold, these are the ungodly, who prosper in the world This is also to be understood as the language of the good man perplexed and embarrassed by the fact that the wicked are prosperous and happy. The meaning is, “Lo, these are wicked people — people of undoubted depravity; they are people who live regardless of God; and yet they are peaceful, tranquil, happy, prospered.” This was one of the facts which so much embarrassed the psalmist. If there had been any doubt about the character of those people, the case would have been different. But there was none. They were people whose character for wickedness was well known, and yet they were permitted to live in peace and prosperity, as if they were the favorites of heaven. The literal meaning of the words rendered “who prosper in the world” is, “tranquil (or secure) for the age;” that is, forever, or constantly. They know no changes; they see no reverses; they are the same through life. They are always tranquil, calm, happy, successful.

They increase in riches literally, “They become great in substance.” They make constant accumulations in wealth, until they become great.

<sup><9713></sup>Psalm 73:13. Verily I have cleansed my heart in vain That is, There is no advantage in all my efforts to become pure and holy. It does not assist me in obtaining the favor of God; and it would be just as well to live a sinful life — to indulge in the pleasures of sense — to make the world my portion. Nothing is to be gained by all my painful efforts at self-discipline; by all my endeavors to become righteous. It would have been as well for me — or better — if I had lived a life of sin like other people. The righteous obtain from God fewer blessings than the wicked; they have less happiness and less prosperity in this world; they are subjected to more trouble and sorrow; and to all else there must be added the struggles, the conflict, the warfare, the painful effort “to be” pure, and to lead a holy life, all of which is now seen to be of no advantage whatever. Such thoughts as these were not confined to the psalmist. They are thoughts which will start up in the mind, and which it is not easy to calm down.

And washed my hands in innocency That is, It has been of no use that I have washed my hands in innocency. The word “innocency” here means “purity.” He had washed his hands in that which was pure; as, pure water. To wash the hands is emblematic of innocence or purity. See the notes at <sup><9716></sup>Psalm 26:6.

Have I been plagued Smitten; afflicted; troubled. My life has been a life of trial. I have not known prosperity.

And chastened every morning Margin, as in Hebrew, “My chastisement was.” That is, my sufferings — my trials — have been repeated with every returning morning. Each new day has brought some new form of affliction, designed to rebuke and punish me. I never have found exemption from trial even for a single day. So different is my lot from the lot of wicked people, who know nothing of this, and who are always prospered and happy. See the notes at <sup><18718></sup>Job 7:18.

<sup><17315></sup>Psalm 73:15. If I say, I will speak thus If I should resolve to give expression to my feelings. If I should utter all that is passing in my mind and my heart. It is implied here that he had “not” given utterance to these thoughts, but had confined them to his own bosom. He knew how they might be regarded by others; how others might be led to feel as if no confidence was to be placed in God; how this might suggest thoughts to them which would not otherwise occur to them, and which would only tend to fill their minds with distress; how such thoughts might unsettle the foundations of their faith, their peace, their hope, and their joy.

I should offend against the generation of thy children The word rendered “I should offend,” means to treat perfidiously, or in a faithless or treacherous manner. Then it means, “to deal falsely with.” And this is the meaning here; “I should not be “true” to them; I should not be “faithful” to their real interests; I should do that which would be equivalent to dealing with them in a false and perfidious manner.” The idea is, that he “ought” not to say or do anything which would tend to lessen their confidence in God, or which would suggest to their minds grounds of distrust in God, or which would disturb their peace and hope. This was alike an act of justice and benevolence on his part. Whatever might be his own troubles and doubts, he had no “right” to fill their minds with doubts and distrust of God; and he felt that, as it was desirable that the minds of others should not be harassed as his own had been, it could not be kind to suggest such thoughts. This, however, should not forbid anyone from mentioning such difficulties to another for the purpose of having them removed. If they occur to the mind, as they may to the minds of any, however sincere and pious they may be, nothing can make it improper that they should be laid before one of greater age, or longer experience, or wider opportunities of knowledge, in order that the difficulties may be solved. Nothing can make it improper for a child to have recourse thus to a parent — or a member of a church, to a pastor. If, however, these doubts can be calmed down otherwise, it is better that they should be mentioned to no one. Some little additional strength may be given them even by dwelling on them long enough to mention them to another, and by putting them in such a form that they would be understood by another; and the true way is to go to God with them by prayer, and to spread them out before the mercy-seat. Prayer, and a careful study of the word of God may calm them down without their being suggested to any human being. At any rate, they should not be suggested at all to the young, or to those with fewer advantages of education, or of less experience than we have had, on whom the only effect would be to fill their minds with doubts which they could not solve — and with thoughts tending only to perplexity and unbelief — such as would never have occurred to themselves.

<sup><19716></sup>Psalm 73:16. When I thought to know this When I endeavored to comprehend this, or to explain it to myself. The idea is that he “thought” on the subject, or “meditated” on it with a view to be able to understand it. He did not express his opinions and feelings to others, but he dwelt on them in his own mind; not to find additional difficulties, not to confirm himself in opposition to God, and not to find new occasions for distrusting the divine government, but to understand exactly how this was. It was his object to seek and understand “the truth.”

It was too painful for me Margin, “It was labor in mine eyes.” The Hebrew word rendered “painful,” means properly labor, toil, a burden; and the idea is, that the question was a burden — was too weighty for his weak powers.

<sup><19717></sup>Psalm 73:17. Until I went into the sanctuary of God The word “sanctuary” we now apply to a place of public worship; and, thus understood, the passage here would mean that he learned the truth on the subject only by the statements and disclosures made there in regard to the divine plans and dealings, and the results of human conduct. This interpretation makes good sense, and is in itself true, but it is not the idea in the original. The word “sanctuary” in the Old Testament, in the singular number, is applied to the tabernacle, or the temple, or, more especially to the most holy place in the tabernacle or the temple; the place of the unique dwelling of God. Thus understood the idea would be that he learned the solution of the mystery “there.” But these were not places of instruction, and it cannot be supposed that the reference is to either of them. The word in the original is in the plural number — sanctuaries — things that God regarded as holy; and the meaning seems to be, that the only solution of the case was to be learned from those things which pertained to God’s most holy and secret places; or in those places which were nearest to him, and where he most clearly manifested himself. The difficulty was not to be solved by any mere human reasoning — by the powers of man, away from God; it was to be learned in the presence of God himself, and in the disclosures which He made about his divine plans and purposes. The psalmist had tried his own powers of reason, and the subject was above his reach. The only solution of the difficulty was to be obtained by a near approach to God himself. There the mystery could be solved, and there it was solved. The “end” of all this, as disclosed by God, would determine why, it was permitted, and would remove the perplexity of the mind.

Then understood I their end literally, their after things; that is, the things which will occur to them hereafter. That solves all the difficulty. There will be a judgment hereafter, and dark as things may now appear, it will be seen in the end, or in the result, that exact and equal justice will be done to all.

<sup><97318></sup>Psalm 73:18. Surely thou didst set them in slippery places Not in a solid and permanent position; not where their foothold would be secure, but as on smooth and slippery rocks, where they would be liable any moment to fall into the foaming billows. However prosperous their condition may seem to be now, yet it is a condition of uncertainty and danger, from which they must soon fall into ruin. In their prosperity there is nothing of permanence or Stability; and this fact will explain the difficulty.

Thou castedst them down into destruction They are placed, not in a permanent condition, but in a condition from which they will be cast down to destruction. Ruin is before them; and the end will demonstrate the justice of God. Nothing can be determined from their present condition as to the question which caused so much perplexity, but in order to a proper solution we must wait to see the end. As an illustration of this, see the interesting account of the interview between Solon of Athens, and Croesus, the rich king of Lydia, as given in Herodotus, book i., 30-33.

<sup><97319></sup>Psalm 73:19. How are they brought into desolation, as in a moment! How suddenly and unexpectedly does destruction come upon them! Nothing can be argued from their apparent prosperity, for there is no ground of security in “that,” no basis for an argument that it will continue. The end must be seen in order to form a correct estimate on the subject, and that end may soon come. Compare the notes at <sup><97321></sup>Job 15:20,21.

They are utterly consumed with terrors literally, “they perish; they are destroyed by terrors;” that is, by terrible things, or by things suited to produce terror in the mind. The idea is not that they are destroyed by their own fears, but that things come upon them which are suited to overwhelm the soul, and that by those things they are utterly destroyed. It is by this result that we are to determine in regard to the equity of the divine administration, and not by their prosperity and their apparent safety.

Psalm 73:20. As a dream when one awaketh Their prosperity is like the visions of a dream; the reality is seen when one awakes. A man in a dream may imagine that he is a king; that he dwells in a palace; that he is surrounded by flatterers and courtiers; that he walks in pleasant groves, listens to the sounds of sweet music, sits down at a table loaded with the luxuries of all climes, and lies upon a bed of down. He may awake only to find that he is encompassed with poverty, or that he is on a bed of languishing, or that he is the miserable tenant of a hovel or a dungeon. The reality is when he awakes. So it is in regard to our present condition on earth. The reality is seen when the dream — the gorgeous dream — of life is over.

So, O Lord, when thou awakest The Hebrew expression here —  $\text{ry}[\text{i}]^{\text{h5892}}$  — occurs in more than fifty other places in the Scriptures, and is in all these places translated “in the city.” This interpretation, however, would be quite unmeaning here, and the probability is that the expression is a form of the verb  $\text{rw}[\text{i}]^{\text{h5782}}$ , “to awake, to arouse;” and the idea is not, as in our version, that of “God’s” awaking as if he had been asleep, but it refers to the dreamer when he shall awake. It is, literally, in the awaking; that is, when the dream is over.

Thou shalt despise their image The image that floated before their imaginations in the dream of life. Thou wilt pay no attention to it; there is no reality in it; it will at once vanish. In the future world, God will pay no regard to the dreams of human life, to the outward show, to the appearance; but the affairs of eternity will be regulated by what is real — by that which constitutes the character of the man. By that, and not by the vain dreams of the world, will the destiny of people be determined. We are to look at “that” in determining the question about the government of God, and not at what “appears” in the brief dream of life.

Psalm 73:21. Thus my heart was grieved literally, and more expressively, “was soured.” The meaning is, that his heart was grieved, pained, dissatisfied. His mind was embittered, and he was rendered unhappy, by the views which he cherished about God, as doubting the wisdom and justice of his dealings with people — and about people, as being envious at their prosperity.

And I was pricked in my reins The reins are often in the Scriptures represented as the seat of the thoughts or affections. See the notes at Psalm 7:9. The word rendered “pricked” means to sharpen, as a sword; and then, to pierce and penetrate as a sword does. The idea is, that these thoughts, so distressing and painful, seemed to be like a sharp sword penetrating to the seat of life.

Psalm 73:22. So foolish was I, and ignorant Such low and imperfect views did I take of the subject. The margin is, “I knew not.” So the Hebrew: “And I am brutish, and know not;” that is, I did not understand the case; I had no correct views in regard to it.

I was as a beast before thee Margin, as in Hebrew, “with thee.” That is, in thy very presence; or, I was guilty of such foolishness in the very presence of my Maker. If it had been when I was alone, or when no one saw me, the folly would not have been so aggravated, and so much to be regretted, but it was when the very eye of God was upon me. Compare Isaiah 1:7; Jeremiah 7:30; 18:10; Psalm 51:4. When he says that he was as a beast, he means that he was stupid and senseless; he had no proper understanding of the case; he did not take any just views of it.

Psalm 73:23. Nevertheless, I am continually with thee I am kept by thee in the land of the living; I am permitted to abide in thy presence; I am allowed to hope in thy mercy. Notwithstanding my low and unworthy views, notwithstanding my doubts about the justice of the divine administration, notwithstanding my envy at the prosperity of the wicked, and my spirit of complaining against God, I am not driven away from God; I am not banished from his presence, or cut off from his favor. Well may we marvel when we reflect on our thoughts about God, that He has not risen in his anger, and banished us from his presence forever and ever.

Thou hast holden me by my right hand Thou hast not left me. Thou hast stretched out thy hand to keep me. Thou hast been to me as a Protector and Friend. Thou hast not been angry at my unkind and ungrateful thoughts; thou hast not banished me eternally from thy presence.

Psalm 73:24. Thou shalt guide me with thy counsel With thy advice; with thy teaching. This implies two things:

- (a) his belief that God “would” do this, notwithstanding his folly; and
- (b) his purpose that God “should” be his guide now.

He would no longer murmur or complain, but would entrust all to God, and allow himself to be led as God should be pleased to direct him.

And afterward receive me to glory After thou hast led me along the path of the present life in the way in which thou wouldst have me to go, thou wilt then receive me to thyself in heaven — to a world where all shall be clear; where I shall never have any doubts in regard to thy being, to the justice of thy dispensations, or to the principles of thy government.

Psalm 73:25. whom have I in heaven but thee? literally, “Who is to me in the heavens?” That is, There is no one there that in my love for him can be compared with thee; no one who can do for me what thou canst do; no one who can meet and satisfy the needs of my soul as thou canst; no one who can be to me what God “is” — what a God “must” be. After all my complaining and my doubts there is no one, not even in the heavens, who cant supply the place of “God,” or be to me what God is; and the warm affections of my soul, therefore, are “really” toward him. I feel my need of him; and I must and do find my supreme happiness in him. What would even heaven be to me without God? who there, even of the angels of light, could supply the place of God?

And there is none upon earth that I desire beside thee That is, Thou art all-sufficient; thou dost meet and satisfy the needs of my nature. All my happiness is in thee; no one on earth could be substituted in thy place, or be to me what thou art as God.

Psalm 73:26. My flesh and my heart faileth Flesh and heart here seem to refer to the whole man, body and soul; and the idea is, that his powers of body and mind failed; were spent; were exhausted. This seems to have been said in an “ideal” sense, or by anticipation. He does not mean to say that his strength then had actually failed, but he seems to have placed himself by imagination in the situation where his strength “would” be all gone — in sickness, in weakness, in sorrow, on the bed of death. He asks himself now what would be his strength then — what would be the object of chief interest and love — on what he would rely; and he answers without hesitation, and with entire confidence, that he could rely on God, and that He would be his portion forever. Even then, when heart and flesh should fail, when all the powers of mind and body should be exhausted, the love of God would survive, and he would find strength and joy in Him.

But God is the strength of my heart Margin, as in Hebrew, “rock;” the rock on which my heart relies; that is, my refuge, my defense. See the notes at <sup><1912></sup>Psalm 18:2. Compare <sup><1612></sup>Psalm 61:2.

And my portion for ever The source of my happiness. Not wealth, then; not honor; not earthly friends; not fame — will be my reliance and the ground of my hope; but that which I shall regard as most valuable — my supreme joy and rejoicing — will be the fact that God is my friend and portion. With all the doubts which I have had in regard to the rectitude of his government, I am sure that when I come to die, I shall cling to him as my hope, my joy, my all. My last refuge — my sufficient refuge — is God. When people come to die, they have “no other refuge” but God. Nothing that they can accumulate of this world’s goods will meet their needs then, for God only can give strength and comfort on the bed of death. Of each and all, however vigorous they may now be, it will be true that “flesh and heart” will “fail;” of each and all it is true that when this shall occur, none but God can be the portion and the strength of the soul.

<sup><1932></sup>Psalm 73:27. For, lo, they that are far from thee shall perish All that are estranged from thee; all who are not thy friends. They will certainly be destroyed. For them there can be no hope. This is the fact which solved the difficulty of the psalmist in regard to the divine dealings with people, <sup><1933></sup>Psalm 73:3-7. The fact that there will be a righteous judgment, in which God will deal with people according to their deserts, made all plain. Compare <sup><1936></sup>Psalm 73:16-20.

Thou hast destroyed That is, Thou wilt certainly destroy. The psalmist places himself in the future, and speaks of this as if it were already done. It will be so certainly done that he could speak of it as if it were already accomplished.

All them that go a whoring from thee The relation of God to his people is often compared in the Scriptures with the marriage relation (compare Psalm 45); and a departure from Him is compared with a want of fidelity to the marriage contract. See <sup><4029></sup>Matthew 12:39; 16:4; <sup><3488></sup>Jeremiah 3:8,9; 5:7; 13:27; <sup><4237></sup>Ezekiel 23:37; <sup><4122></sup>Revelation 2:22:

<sup><4938></sup>Psalm 73:28. But it is good for me to draw near to God That is, It is pleasant; it is profitable; it is the chief good. For myself, happiness is to be found in that alone; there I find what my nature pants for and desires. Others find, or attempt to find, happiness in other things; my happiness is found in God alone. This is the result to which the psalmist came after all his perplexity. With all his doubts and difficulties, his real desire was to be near to God; his supreme happiness was found there.

I have put my trust in the Lord GOD I have truly confided in him; he is my portion and the sole ground of my reliance. The doubts which he had had were not, after all, real doubts about the claim of God to confidence. There was an underlying trust in God in the midst of all this. He had not desired to cherish such doubts; he did, on the most calm reflection, still trust in God.

That I may declare all thy works That I might make known thy doings toward the children of men. I have desired rightly to understand thee and thy government, that I might vindicate thy name, and assert thy claim to the love and confidence of mankind. His doubts and perplexities had not really been because he was an enemy of God, or because he desired to cherish doubts in regard to him, but because, when appearances were against the equity of the divine government, he wished to see how the things which occurred could be explained consistently with a proper belief in the goodness and justice of God, in order that he might go and explain the matter to his fellow-men. Such perplexities and doubts, therefore, are not really inconsistent with true love for God and genuine confidence in him; and it is well when such doubts are made the means of enabling us more clearly to explain the divine dealings — it is well when, under all such doubts and difficulties, we can still find evidence that we truly love God.

APPENDIX NOTES ON PSALM 73

The psalm is very nearly related to Psalm 37; 49 as far as its contents are concerned. Amyraldus took quite a correct view as to what distinguishes it from these psalms and forms its individual physiognomy.

“In Psalm 37 the prophet merely shows how believers ought to conduct themselves when they perceive the prosperity of the ungodly: he himself did not stumble at it. But here Asaph, though a great and pious man, acknowledges that the providence of God in this respect did sometimes appear to him mysterious, and that he felt great difficulty in justifying it. Yea, from the beginning of this psalm we see how he merged out of the deep thoughts into which his spirit, agitated and vexed by doubts, had sunk, until in the end better views obtained the ascendancy ... He has adopted this method in order that believers might contemplate, as in a picture, the conflict to which at times they are exposed, and might see what weapons they have to seize against the assaults of the flesh.” — Hengstenberg.

This is one of the twelve psalms which bear the name of Asaph, and we have seen reason to conclude that it came from the pen of Asaph the seer, the great contemporary of David. The theme of it is one to which the prophets and psalmists often revert — the mystery of God’s providence toward the righteous and the wicked. Asaph’s faith staggers at the sight of the prosperity of the wicked. They get on in the world. Their forgetfulness of God seems no bar to their success. Beholding them, the saint is tempted to exclaim, My pains have been thrown away; verily I have cleansed my heart in vain, and washed my hands in innocency. Indeed, he is only restrained from venting these dark atheistic doubts by the apprehension that he may thereby undermine the dearest hopes of some whom he knows to be the generation of God’s children. Such is his temptation. He recovers himself in some measure when, retiring from the din and glitter of the world, he goes into the sanctuary of God, and contemplates things as they appear in the serene light that shines there. He now perceives what he had before failed to observe, the goal to which the prosperity of the wicked tends; how they are brought into desolation as in a moment; how their felicity passes away like a dream and gives place to consuming terrors. But the consideration which banishes all envy from his heart is not that of the sad end of the ungodly. It is by a loftier thought that his heart is purged of the perilous stuff with which it is overcharged:

“Yet as for me, I am continually with thee: Thou hast holden me by my right hand,” etc.

What a high estimate of the soul underlies these words with which the saint emerges from the cloud of his temptation! It is as if he had said, “Why should I envy because of the prosperity of the foolish? Why should my faith stagger because a full cup of temporal felicities is occasionally bestowed on them? Wealth, and health, and honor — these are not the objects in which it was ever intended that my soul should find rest and supreme enjoyment. God himself is my soul’s fit portion. Seeing then that I have, in the Lord’s great mercy, been made heir of that portion, I will make my boast in him, whatever my earthly lot may be. I shall be satisfied with his likeness.” It is thus that God would have us arm ourselves against unbelieving thoughts. It is well to be restrained from uttering unworthy suspicions of God by regard to the peace of our Christian acquaintances; it is better to curb envious thoughts by recollecting that godless prosperity is only a smooth road to hell; but it is best of all to be raised above the reach of Satan’s fiery darts by the assured persuasion that we possess in God’s favor a portion that is richer than a thousand worlds. — Binnie.

Psalm 73:17. Until I went into the sanctuary of God In Psalm 73:17 several explain, “till I pressed into the divine secrets.” But this explanation is altogether an arbitrary one. The word וּדְבַר־יְהוָה always signifies the sanctuary, and is the constant one for the tabernacle and the temple; compare in reference to the plural, Psalm 68:35. There is no occasion whatever for departing from the fully ascertained and literal sense if we only look upon the sanctuary with the eyes of the pious Israelites of the Old Testament dispensation. The substance of the temple to them was the presence of God, and just on this account, according to their view, any man could externally repair to the temple without being truly in it, and in like manner a man could be truly in it, even when outwardly at a distance from it: compare at Psalm 63:2, and the passages quoted there. The psalmist thus goes here also with the feet of his heart into the sanctuary, draws near to God, and gets from this clear fountain the insight which natural reason could not give him. — Hengstenberg.

So also Perowne, who remarks — “The sanctuary is the place of his teaching; not heaven, as Kimchi and others, but the temple, as the place of his special manifestation, not only by Urim and Thummim, but in direct answer to prayer. There, in some hour of fervent, secret prayer, like that of Hannah (<sup><0013></sup>1 Samuel 1:13, compare <sup><0280></sup>Luke 18:10), or perhaps in some solemn service, it may have been — who can tell? Through the words of some inspired psalm, a conviction of the truth broke upon him. The word sanctuary is in the plural, which is used here, as in <sup><0463></sup>Psalm 43:3; 68:35, for the singular.”

<sup><0738></sup>Psalm 73:28. It is good for me to draw near to God He was greatly encouraged to cleave to God, and to confide in him. If they that are far from God shall perish, then, 1. Let this constrain us to live in communion with God. If it fare so ill with those that live at a distance from him, then it is good, very good, the chief good, that good for a man in this life which he should most carefully pursue and secure. “It is best for me to draw near to God, and to have God draw near to me.” The original may take in both. But for my part (so I would read it) the approach of God is good for me. Our drawing near to God takes rise from his drawing near to us, and it is the happy meeting that makes the bliss. Here is a great truth laid down — That it is good to draw near to God; but the life of it lies in the application, “It is good for “me.” Those are the wise who know what is good for themselves. “It is good,” says he (and every good man agrees with him in it), “It is good for me to draw near to God; it is my duty, it is my interest.” — Henry.

NOTES ON PSALM 74

This psalm is entitled “Maschil of Asaph.” On the word Maschil — meaning “didactic,” or adapted “to give instruction” — see the notes at the title to Psalm 32. On the phrase “of Asaph,” see the notes at the title to Psalm 73. It may mean either “for” Asaph, or “of” Asaph; that is, it may either mean that it was composed “by” him, or that it was composed “for” him, to be used by him as the leader of music in public worship. The former is the most common, and the most probable opinion. The title, however, “may” mean that the psalm was dedicated or composed for one of the descendants of this Musician, among whom the office of their ancestor Asaph was hereditary. Thus understood, it might denote simply that the psalm belonged to that class of psalms which were composed for the one who, at the time, presided over the music.

If this is the meaning, there would be no impropriety in supposing that this psalm was composed near the time of the captivity, and had reference to the struction of the temple by the Chaldeans, to which the language seems “naturally” to refer. Yet the occasion on which it was composed is not certainly known, and cannot be ascertained from the psalm. All that is manifest is, that it was at a time when the land was invaded; when great ravages were committed; and when a work of desolation was perpetrated on the edifices upon Mount Zion, and particularly on the temple. The “language” could be applied either to the destruction of the temple in the time of the Babylonian invasion; or to the times of the Maccabees, and to the desolations brought upon the land Antiochus Epiphanes; or to some desolation before the temple was built. Rosenmuller, Venema, DeWette, some others, suppose that the reference is to the time of the Maccabees. The reason alleged for this opinion is founded on what is said in ~~1741~~ Psalm 74:4,9, particularly ~~1741~~ Psalm 74:9, where it is asserted that “there is no more any prophet;” that is, no one to instruct the people, or to declare what the result or the issue will be. It is alleged by them that at the time of the invasion by the Chaldeans there were prophets in the land, and particularly that Jeremiah was then living, who distinctly predicted what the result of it would be. But this is not a conclusive objection to the idea that the reference is to the destruction of the city and the temple by the Chaldees. The meaning of verse 9 may be that there was no divine teacher who could “save” the people, or who could “prevent” those desolations; the matter had gone so far that all divine interference and protection appeared to be withdrawn, and the nation seemed to be abandoned to its fate. Still there can now be no certainty as to the time or the occasion when the psalm was composed; though the most probable reference of the psalm is to the destruction of Jerusalem by the Babylonians.

The psalm consists essentially of two parts: a prayer; and the reasons why the prayer is urged, and should be answered.

I. The prayer, <sup><1970></sup>Psalm 74:1-3. It is a prayer that God would remember Mount Zion, now made desolate, or in ruins.

II. The reasons why the prayer is urged, <sup><1970></sup>Psalm 74:4-23.

(1) The desolations which had come upon the city and upon the edifices devoted to religion, <sup><1970></sup>Psalm 74:4-8.

(2) The fact that there was among the people, in those times of calamity, no prophet — no messenger of God — no one to show them how long this would continue, or to give them assurance that these desolations would cease, <sup><1970></sup>Psalm 74:9-11.

(3) A reference to what God had done for his people in former times when he interposed to save them from their enemies, <sup><1970></sup>Psalm 74:12-15.

(4) The fact that God rules over the earth, and has control of all things; that day and night, light and darkness, summer and winter, are all under him, and are directed and controlled by him, <sup><1970></sup>Psalm 74:16,17.

(5) A prayer that God would not forget his own cause; that he would remember that these reproaches were reproaches of his own name; that he would call to mind his own solemn covenant; and that he would pity and relieve the people that loved him, now poor and oppressed — the people that desired to serve and praise him, <sup><1970></sup>Psalm 74:18-23.

<sup><1970></sup>Psalm 74:1. O God, why hast thou cast us off for ever? Thou seemest to have cast us off forever, or finally. Compare the notes at <sup><1970></sup>Psalm 44:9; 13:1. “Why doth thine anger smoke.” See <sup><1970></sup>Deuteronomy 29:20. The presence of smoke indicates fire, and the language here is such as often occurs in the Scriptures, when anger or wrath is compared with fire. See <sup><1970></sup>Deuteronomy 32:22; <sup><1970></sup>Jeremiah 15:14.

Against the sheep of thy pasture Thy people, represented as a flock. See <sup><19713></sup>Psalm 79:13; 95:7. This increases the tenderness of the appeal. The wrath of God seemed to be enkindled against his own people, helpless and defenseless, who needed his care, and who might naturally look for it — as a flock needs the care of a shepherd, and as the care of the shepherd might be expected. He seemed to be angry with his people, and to have cast them off, when they had every reason to anticipate his protection.

<sup><19712></sup>Psalm 74:2. Remember thy congregation The word rendered “congregation” means properly an “assembly,” a “community,” and it is frequently applied to the Israelites, or the Jewish people, considered as a body or a community associated for the service of God. <sup><19113></sup>Exodus 12:3; 16:1,2,9; <sup><19115></sup>Leviticus 4:15; <sup><19171></sup>Numbers 27:17. The word used by the Septuagint is συναγωγή <sup><4864></sup> — synagogue — but refers here to the whole Jewish people, not to a particular synagogue or congregation.

Which thou hast purchased of old In ancient times; in a former age. That is, Thou hast “purchased” them to thyself, or as thine own, by redeeming them from bondage, thus securing to thyself the right to them, as one does who redeems or purchases a thing. See the notes at <sup><2313></sup>Isaiah 43:3.

The rod of thine inheritance Margin, as in Hebrew, “tribe.” The Hebrew word — fbyc <sup><1726></sup> — means properly “a staff,” stick, rod; then, a shepherd’s staff, a crook; then, a scepter; and then it is used to denote a “tribe,” so called from the staff or scepter which the chief of the tribe carried as the symbol of authority. <sup><1231></sup>Exodus 28:21; <sup><1711></sup>Judges 20:2. The word “inheritance” is frequently applied to the children of Israel considered as belonging to God, as property inherited belongs to him who owns it — perhaps suggesting the idea that the right to them had come down, as inherited property does, from age to age. It was a right over them acquired long before, in the days of the patriarchs.

Which thou hast redeemed By delivering them out of Egyptian bondage. So the church is now redeemed, and, as such, it belongs to God.

This mount Zion Jerusalem — the seat of government, and of public worship — the capital of the nation.

Wherein thou hast dwelt By the visible symbol of thy presence and power. — On all these considerations the psalmist prays that God would not forget Jerusalem in the present time of desolation and trouble.

Psalm 74:3. Lift up thy feet That is, Advance, or draw near. Come and look directly and personally on the desolations which now exist in the holy city.

Unto the perpetual desolations Hebrew, “the ruins of perpetuity,” or eternity; that is, such as have been long continued, and threaten to continue forever. The ruin had not suddenly come, and it did not seem likely soon to pass away, but appeared to be entire and permanent. The destruction of the city seemed to be complete and final.

Even all that the enemy hath done wickedly That is, with wicked intent and purpose. The reference seems to be to the Chaldeans, and to the ruin which they had brought upon the temple and city.

In the sanctuary That is, either Jerusalem, considered as a holy place; or the temple, the place of the public worship of God.

Psalm 74:4. Thine enemies roar This refers to the shout and tumult of war. They raised up the war-cry even in the very place where the congregations had been assembled; where God had been worshipped. The word rendered “roar” properly has reference to wild beasts; and the meaning is, that their war-cry resembled the howling of beasts of prey.

In the midst of thy congregations literally, “in the midst of thine assembly.” This is a different word from that which is rendered “congregation” in Psalm 74:2. This word — d[<sup>4150</sup>] — means a meeting together by mutual appointment, and is often applied to the meeting of God with his people at the tabernacle, which was therefore called “the tent of the congregation,” or, more properly, “the tent of meeting,” as the place where God met with his people, Exodus 29:10,44; 33:7; Leviticus 3:8,13; 10:7,9; “et saepe.” The meaning here is, that they roared like wild beasts in the very place which God had appointed as the place where he would meet with his people.

They set up their ensigns for signs That is, they set up “their” banners or standards, as “the” standards of the place; as that which indicated sovereignty over the place. They proclaimed thus that it was a conquered place, and they set up their own standards as denoting their title to it, or as declaring that they ruled there. It was no longer a place sacred to God; it was publicly seen to belong to a foreign power.

Psalm 74:5. A man was famous literally, “He is known;” or, shall be known. That is, he was or shall be celebrated.

According as he had lifted up axes literally, “As one raising on high axes;” that is, as one lifts up his axe high in the air in order to strike an effectual stroke.

Upon the thick trees The clumps of trees; the trees standing thick together. That is, As he showed skill and ability in cutting these down, and laying them low. His celebrity was founded on the rapidity with which the strokes of the axe fell on the trees, and his success in laying low the pride of the forest. According to our common translation the meaning is, that “formerly” a man derived his fame from his skill and success in wielding his axe so as to lay the forest low, but that “now” his fame was to be derived from another source, namely, the skill and power with which he cut down the elaborately-carved work of the sanctuary, despoiled the columns of their ornaments, and demolished the columns themselves. But another interpretation may be given to this, as has been suggested by Prof. Alexander. It is, that “the ruthless enemy is known or recognized as dealing with the sanctuary no more tenderly than a woodman with the forest which he fells.” The former, however, is the more natural, as well as the more common interpretation. Luther renders it, “One sees the axe glitter on high, as one cuts wood in the forest.” The Vulgate, and the Septuagint, “The signs pointing to the entrance above that they did not know.” What idea was attached to this rendering, it is impossible to determine.

Psalm 74:6. But now they break down the carved work thereof ... literally, “But now the carvings of it together (at once) with sledge and hammers they beat down.” The carved work refers evidently to the ornaments of the temple. The word used here —  $\text{j } \text{w} \text{p} \text{i}$ <sup>†6603</sup> — is rendered engraving, carved work, or carving; <sup>†281</sup>Exodus 28:11,21,36; 39:6,14,30; <sup>†3816</sup>Zechariah 3:9; <sup>†4214</sup>2 Chronicles 2:14. It is the very word which in <sup>†1072</sup>1 Kings 6:29 is applied to the ornaments around the walls of the temple — the “carved figures of cherubim, and palm trees, and open flowers,” and there can be no doubt that the allusion here is to those ornaments. These were rudely cut down, or knocked off, with axes and hammers, as a man lays low the trees of the wood. The phrase “at once” means that they drove forward the work with all despatch. They spared none of them. They treated them all alike as an axeman does the trees of a forest when his object is to clear the land.

Psalm 74:7. They have cast fire into thy sanctuary Into the temple to destroy it. Literally, “They have cast thy sanctuary into the fire.” The meaning is, that they had burned it down. This was actually done by the Chaldeans, <sup><0270></sup>2 Kings 25:9; <sup><0469></sup>2 Chronicles 36:19.

They have defiled by casting down the dwelling-place of thy name to the ground The place where thy name dwelt or was recorded (<sup><0224></sup>Exodus 20:24); that is, the place where God’s name was known, or where he was worshipped. The literal meaning is, “To the earth they have defiled the dwelling of thy name?” The idea is, that they had defiled or polluted the temple by throwing it to the ground; by making it a heap of ruins; by making it undistinguishable from common earth.

Psalm 74:8. They said in their hearts They purposed; they designed it.

Let us destroy them together Let us destroy all these buildings, temples, towers, and walls at the same time; let us make an entire destruction of them all.

They have burned up all the synagogues of God in the land The phrase “they have burned up” must refer to the places or edifices where assemblies for public worship were held, since it cannot be supposed that the idea is that they had burned up the assemblies of worshippers themselves. The word rendered “synagogues” is the same in the Hebrew that is used in <sup><0744></sup>Psalm 74:4, and is there rendered “congregations.” It means “assemblies,” persons collected together for public worship. See the notes at that verse. It is not used in the Bible to denote “places” for the meetings of such assemblies, nor is it elsewhere rendered “synagogues.” It is translated by the word “seasons,” <sup><0014></sup>Genesis 1:14; <sup><0130></sup>Exodus 13:10, “et al.; set time,” <sup><0172></sup>Genesis 17:21; <sup><0195></sup>Exodus 9:5, “et al.; time appointed,” <sup><0215></sup>Exodus 23:15; <sup><0245></sup>2 Samuel 24:15, “et al.; congregation,” <sup><0101></sup>Leviticus 1:1,3,5; 3:2,8,13, “and very often; feasts,” <sup><0230></sup>Leviticus 23:2,4,37, “et al.; — solemnity,” <sup><0510></sup>Deuteronomy 31:10; <sup><0330></sup>Isaiah 33:20;—and so also, set feasts, solemn feasts, appointed feasts, etc. But in no instance does it necessarily refer to an edifice, unless it is in the place before us. There is no reason, however, for doubting that, from the necessity of the case, in the course of events, there would be other places for assembling for the worship of God than the temple, and that in different cities, villages, towns, and neighborhoods, persons would be collected together for some form of social religious service. Buildings or tents would be necessary for the accommodation of such assemblages; and this, in time, might be developed into a system, until in this way the whole arrangement for “synagogues” might have grown up in the land. The exact origin of synagogues is not indeed known. Jahn (‘Biblical Archaeology,’ Section 344) supposes that they sprang up during the Babylonian captivity, and that they had their origin in the fact that the people, when deprived of their customary religious privileges, would collect around some prophet, or other pious man, who would teach them and their children the duties of religion, exhort them to good conduct, and read to them out of the sacred books. Compare <sup><441></sup>Ezekiel 14:1; 20:1; <sup><271></sup>Daniel 6:11; <sup><488></sup>Nehemiah 8:18. There seems, however, no good reason for doubting that synagogues may have existed before the time of the captivity, and may have sprung up in the manner suggested above from the necessities of the people, probably at first without any fixed rule or law on the subject, but as convenience suggested, and that they may at last, by custom and law, have grown into the regular form which they assumed as a part of the national worship. Compare Kitto’s Encyc. Art. ‘synagogue.’ I see no improbability, therefore, in supposing that the word here may refer to such edifices at the time when this psalm was composed. These, if they existed, would naturally be destroyed by the Chaldeans, as well as the temple itself.

<sup><474></sup>Psalm 74:9. We see not our signs The emblems of worship, or the national emblems or banners, which we have been accustomed to see. There are no signals or tokens of our nationality in the land. All have been removed by the invaders, and we see everywhere evidences of the presence of a foreign power. The marks of our own independency are gone. The nation is subdued and conquered.

There is no more any prophet No one is raised up as the special messenger of God to assure us of his favor, or to take the lead in the national troubles. In times of danger God had been accustomed to send to them some special teacher who would declare his will, direct the nation what to do, and give encouraging assurances that the national troubles would cease, and that deliverance would come. They saw no such messengers of God now. This is not inconsistent with the supposition that this psalm was written before the captivity, and in the time of the Chaldean invasion, or with the supposition that Jeremiah was then alive, for the meaning may be, not that literally there was no prophet in the land, but that there was no one who had come from God as a special messenger of comfort and deliverance.

Ruin had come upon them, and there were no indications of divine interposition in their behalf.

Neither is there among us any that knoweth how long How long these calamities are to continue. No one can tell when they are to end. The prophetic office seemed to have ceased among them. It was renewed, however, after the captivity, in the case of Daniel, Ezra, Nehemiah, Haggai, and Malachi.

Psalm 74:10. O God, how long shall the adversary reproach? ...

How long shall this state of things be allowed to continue? Is there to be no end to it? Are these desolations never to be repaired — these ruins never to be rebuilt? It “seemed” so; and hence, this earnest appeal. So to us it often appears as if our trials were never to come to an end. One calamity succeeds another; and there comes no relief. Yet there is relief. Deliverance may come, and soon come, in the present life; or if not in the present life, yet to all those who are the children of God it will soon come by their removal to a world where trial will be forever unknown.

Psalm 74:11. Why withdrawest thou thy hand, even thy right hand?

Why dost thou not stretch forth thy hand for our deliverance? The hand, especially the right hand, is the instrument by which we wield a sword, or strike a blow; and the expression here is equivalent to asking why God did not interfere and save them.

Pluck it out of thy bosom As if God had hidden his hand beneath the folds of his garment, or had wrapped his robe tightly around him. It “seemed” as if he had done this, as if he looked calmly on, and saw the temple fired, the synagogues burned up, the land laid waste, and the people slaughtered, without an attempt to interpose. How often are we constrained to use similar language — to ask a similar question — when iniquity abounds, when crime prevails, when sinners are perishing, when the church mourns — for God seems to have withdrawn his hand, and to be looking on with unconcern! No one can tell why this is so; and, without irreverence, or a spirit of complaining, but deeply affected with the mystery of the fact, we may ask “Why” this is so.

Psalm 74:12. For God is my King of old That is, the king, or ruler of his people. The people had acknowledged him as their king and ruler, and he had showed himself to be such. This is given as a reason why he should now interpose in their behalf. It is an argument, proper always to be urged, drawn from the faithfulness and unchangeableness of God.

Working salvation in the midst of the earth Salvation for his people. The reference here particularly is to what he had done for his people in delivering them from bondage in Egypt, and conducting them to the promised land, as is stated in the following verses.

<sup><1743></sup>Psalm 74:13. Thou didst divide the sea by thy strength Margin, as in Hebrew, “break.” That is, he had by his power “broken up” the strength of the sea so that it offered no resistance to their passing through it. The allusion is evidently to the passage through the Red Sea, <sup><1241></sup>Exodus 14:21.

Thou brakest the heads of the dragons Margin, “whales.” On the meaning of the word used here — “Tannin” — see the notes at <sup><2352></sup>Isaiah 13:22; <sup><1812></sup>Job 30:29. It refers here, undoubtedly, to crocodiles or sea monsters. The language here is used to denote the absolute power of God as manifested over the sea when the people of Israel passed through it. It was as if by slaying all the mighty monsters of the deep that would have resisted their passage, he had made their transit entirely safe.

In the waters That reside in the waters of the sea.

<sup><1744></sup>Psalm 74:14. Thou brakest the heads of leviathan in pieces On the meaning of the word “leviathan,” see the notes at <sup><1810></sup>Job 41:1. The word is used here as descriptive of sea monsters.

And gavest him to be meat Gavest him for “food.”

To the people inhabiting the wilderness That is, the sea monsters were killed, and, being thrown on shore, were gathered for food. The “inhabitants of the wilderness” or the desert, may refer either to the wild and savage tribes of men that lived on the shores of the sea, and that subsisted mainly on fish, or it may refer to the wild animals of the desert that consumed such sea monsters as they were cast up on the shore. There is no allusion to the Israelites considered as passing through the desert, as if they had fed on these sea monsters. The essential idea is, that these monsters were put to death, or were so removed but of the way as to offer no obstruction to the passage of the Israelites through the sea. It was as if they had been killed. The image is entirely poetic, and there is no necessity for supposing that such a thing literally occurred.

Psalm 74:15. Thou didst cleave the fountain and the flood That is, the source of the streams and the streams themselves. The main allusion is probably to the Jordan, and the idea is, that God had, as it were, divided all the waters, or prevented any obstruction to his people from the river in any respect; as if the waters in the very springs and fountains, and the waters in the channel of the river flowing from those springs and fountains, had been so restrained and divided that there was a safe passage through them.

Joshua 3:14-17.

Thou driedst up mighty rivers Margin, “rivers of strength.” The Hebrew — tyae <sup><h386></sup> — (compare Deuteronomy 21:4; Amos 5:24; 1 Kings 8:2) — means rather perennial, constant, ever-flowing. The allusion is to rivers or streams that flow constantly, or that do not dry up. It was this which made the miracle so apparent. It could not be pretended that they had gone over the bed of a stream which was accustomed to be dry at certain seasons of the year. They passed over rivers that never dried up; and, therefore, it could have been only by miracle. The main allusion is undoubtedly to the passage of the Jordan.

Psalm 74:16. The day is thine, the night also is thine Thou hast universal dominion. All things are under thy control. Thou hast power, therefore, to grant what we desire of thee.

Thou hast prepared the light and the sun He who has made the sun — that greatest and noblest object of creation to the view of man — must have almighty power, and must be able to give what we need.

Psalm 74:17. Thou hast set all the borders of the earth Thou hast established all the boundaries of the world; that is, the boundaries of the earth itself; or the natural boundaries of nations and people, made by seas, mountains, rivers, and deserts. The language in regard to the first of these — the earth itself — would be derived from the prevalent mode of speaking, as if the earth were a plane, and had limits — a common mode of expression in the Scriptures, as it is in all ancient writings, and in the common language of men, even of philosophers. In regard to the latter idea, the language would imply that God had fixed, by his own power and will, all the natural boundaries of nations, or that his dominion is over all the earth. There are natural boundaries, or arrangements in nature, which tend to break up the one great family of man into separate nations, and which seem to have been designed for that. Compare Acts 17:26. Over all these God presides, and he has his own great plans to accomplish by the arrangement.

Thou hast made summer and winter literally, as in the margin, “Summer and winter, thou hast made them.” That is, he has so made the earth that these various seasons will occur. The fact that there are different seasons of the year, or that the year is divided into seasons, is to be traced to the agency of God. He has so made the world that these changes will take place. Nothing is the result of chance; all things in the arrangements of nature are by his design.

<sup><1748></sup>Psalm 74:18. Remember this, that the enemy hath reproached Has used opprobrious and abusive words in regard to thee, and to thy people. The idea is, that religion — the true religion — had been reproached by the foe. They had treated that religion as if it were false; they had reproached God as if he were a false God, and as if he were unable to defend his people. Compare <sup><2304></sup>Isaiah 36:4-10,13-20; 37:10-13,23. The prayer here is, that God would remember that these words of reproach were against himself, and that he would regard them as such.

And that the foolish people have blasphemed thy name Have blasphemed thee — the name often being put for the person himself. The word “foolish” here may refer to them as “wicked” as well as foolish. Wickedness and folly are so connected — they are so commonly combined, that the word may be used to describe the enemies of God in either sense — characterising their conduct as either the one or the other. Compare the notes at <sup><1940></sup>Psalm 14:1.

<sup><1749></sup>Psalm 74:19. O deliver not the soul of thy turtle-dove The “life” of thy turtle-dove; or, thy turtle-dove itself. The turtle-dove is a name of endearment for one beloved, in Cant. 2:12, and is thus applied here to the people of Israel. The leading idea in such an application of the word is that of innocence, harmlessness, timidity, gentleness. The thought here is that of a people dear to God, now timid and alarmed. It is the prayer of a people beloved by God that he would not deliver them to their enemies. The prayer may be regarded as one which was used on the occasion referred to in the psalm; or, as a general prayer for the people of God, considered as exposed to ravening enemies.

Unto the multitude of the wicked The words “of the wicked” are not in the original. The word rendered “multitude” — yj æ <sup><2216></sup> — (compare the notes at <sup><0980></sup>Psalm 68:10) — is the same which in the other member of the sentence is rendered “congregation.” It may be applied to a herd of cattle, tame or wild; and then to a “people” — a band, a troop, a host — whether of orderly and civilized, or of wild and savage people. It seems to be used in this double sense in the verse before us; in the first member of the verse, “deliver not thy turtle-dove “to the multitude” — to the wild beast, or to the savage hosts; in the latter, “forget not the congregation of thy poor” — thy flock — thy people — considered as timid or alarmed. Save the timid and trembling flock from beasts of prey.

<sup><0970></sup>Psalm 74:20. Have respect unto the covenant The covenant which thou hast made with thy people, promising, on thy part, to protect them, and to be their God. Compare <sup><0943></sup>Deuteronomy 4:13; 5:2; 26:18,19. The prayer here is, that God would remember, in the day of national calamity, the solemn promise implied in that covenant, and that he would interpose to save his people. Compare <sup><0905></sup>Genesis 9:15; <sup><0950></sup>Leviticus 26:42; <sup><0960></sup>Ezekiel 16:60; <sup><0972></sup>Luke 1:72. This may be regarded as the language which the people did use when these calamities were about to come upon them.

For the dark places of the earth The allusion here is to the lands from whence came the armies that had invaded Judea, and that threatened desolation. They were dark regions of paganism and idolatry.

Are full of the habitations of cruelty The abodes of violence, or of violent and cruel men. They had sent forth their armies from such places for purposes of conquest and rapine, and no compassion could be expected from them. Their numbers were so great, and their character was so fierce and warlike, that the people of Israel could find defense and security only in God; and they, therefore, plead with him that he would interpose in their behalf. The prayer in this passage may with propriety be used by the people of God now. It is still true that “the dark parts of the earth are full of the habitations of cruelty;” and in view of this fact, and of the utter hopelessness of the renovation of the world by any human means, or by any progress which society can make of itself, it is proper to seek God’s interposition. And it is proper in such prayers to him now, as in ancient times, to make the ground of our appeal to him his own gracious covenant; his promises made to his church; his solemn assurances that this state of things shall not always continue, but that the time will arrive when the earth shall be filled with the knowledge of the Lord.

Psalm 74:21. O let not the oppressed return ashamed Ashamed by being disappointed, as if they had trusted in that which had no claims to confidence. Compare the notes at Job 6:20. The word rendered “oppressed,” means “trodden down, crushed, broken, afflicted.” It refers to the people as attacked by foreign armies, or as crushed by those who had gained power over them. The word “return” refers to their coming back from God — from the throne of mercy. Let them not come back from thee with no assurance of thy favor; with no evidence that their prayers have been heard; let them not come back, subject to the reproach that they had made their appeal to thee in vain.

Let the poor and needy praise thy name The people who are oppressed and helpless. Let them have occasion to praise thee because their prayer has been heard, and because thou dost save them.

Psalm 74:22. Arise, O God As if God were now insensible to the wrongs and sufferings of his people; as if he were inattentive and indisposed to come to their help. See the notes at Psalm 3:7.

Plead thine own cause literally, “Contend thine own contention.” That is, Maintain a cause which is really thine own. Thine own honor is concerned; thine own law and authority are assailed; the war is really made on “thee.” This is always the true idea in the prayers which are offered for the conversion of sinners, for the establishment of truth, and for the spread of the Gospel in the world. It is not originally the cause of the church; it is the cause of God. Everything in regard to truth, to justice, to humanity, to temperance, to liberty, to religion, is the cause of God. All the assaults made on these, are assaults made on God.

Remember how the foolish man reproacheth thee daily Constantly. He does not cease. The word “foolish” refers to the wicked. The idea is, that the wicked constantly reproach God — either by their language or their conduct; and this is a reason for calling on him to interpose. No better reason for asking his interposition can be given, than that such conduct is a real reproach to God, and reflects on his honor in the world.

Psalm 74:23. Forget not the voice of thine enemies The voice of thine enemies clamoring for the destruction of thy people. Compare Psalm 137:7. The prayer is, that God would bring deserved chastisement upon them for their purposes and their aims against his people. It is not necessarily a prayer for vengeance; it is a prayer for just retribution.

The tumult of those that rise up against thee Of those that make war on thee, and on thy people. The word ““tumult” here means clamor or shout — as the shout of battle. The reference is to the movement of a host pressing on to conquest, encouraging and exciting each other, and endeavoring to intimidate their enemies by the loud clamor of the war-cry. It is a description of what had occurred among the main events referred to in the psalm, when the enemy came in to lay waste the capital, and to spread desolation throughout the land.

Increases continually Margin, as in Hebrew, “Ascendeth.” That is, it seems to go up; it is the swelling clamor of a great multitude of warriors intent on conquest. A cry or clamor thus seems to swell or rise on the air, and (as it were) to ascend to God. The prayer here is, that God would regard that cry, not in the sense that he would grant them the fulfillment of their wishes, but in the sense that he would recompense them as they deserved. It is in this sense that the clamors of the wicked ascend to heaven — in this sense that God will regard them, as if they were a prayer for just retribution.

APPENDIX NOTES ON PSALM 74

Asaph is named as the author of the psalm. In those psalms which bear his name, we must, when there are no strong reasons against it, conclude that the person meant is the Asaph who lived in the time of David. For that he occupied a prominent place among the sacred poets; and that therefore there must be some of the psalms of his composition, is evident from <sup><1230></sup>2 Chronicles 29:30, according to which Hezekiah brought into use, in the worship of God, not only the songs of David, but also the songs of Asaph, and where Asaph is named the Seer, or the divinely illuminated, and from <sup><1236></sup>Nehemiah 12:46, where the days of the flower of Israelite sacred poetry are called the days of David and of Asaph. For these reasons, we are perfectly justified in considering this Asaph as the author especially of Psalm 50; 73; 78; and these are altogether well suited to have procured for him his poetic fame. But here we cannot have the least idea of the authorship belonging to David’s time. We must not, however, on this account, convict the title of a mistake, for just in proportion as the contents are decidedly and manifestly inconsistent with David’s age, was it unlikely that the title would announce that the psalm was composed at that time. Asaph was the founder of a family of singers, who went by the name of the sons of Asaph, even in the time of Isaiah, compare ~~14815~~ 2 Chronicles 35:15, yea even in the time of Ezra and Nehemiah, ~~15104~~ Ezra 2:41; 3:10; ~~16104~~ Nehemiah 7:44; 11:22. That the Holy Spirit, who inspired the founder, continued to exert his influence upon the members of this family from age to age, is manifest from the example of Jehaziel, one of the sons of Asaph in Jehoshaphat's time, on whom the Spirit of the Lord came down in the midst of the assembly, ~~14014~~ 2 Chronicles 20:14. All the sacred compositions of the different members of this family, from time to time, were designated songs of Asaph, just as in the title of Psalm 62, Jeduthun stands for the Jeduthunic choir. If the family had not possessed a founder so very famous in this department, these psalms, like those which bear the name of the sons of Korah, would have had inscribed on their titles "the sons of Asaph." — Hengstenberg.

The PSALMS OF THE CAPTIVITY, strictly so called, fall under three heads, according as they were written in the first anguish of the carrying away, or after the exiles had settled down in their new abodes in Mesopotamia, or when the time fixed for the return drew near. To the first class belong Psalm 74; 79. In reading them we seem to hear the cry of the people ascending up to heaven as the Chaldeans scale the wall, and fire the city, and desecrate the sanctuary. They are both entitled psalms of Asaph; and the vividness with which they describe the desolations wreaked by the Chaldeans, with sword and with fire, leaves the impression that they must have come from the pen of Levites who were eye-witnesses of the dismal scene. In the former of the two, the godly complain that there is "no more any prophet among them, nor any that knows how long." This has led some commentators to think that, whatever may be the true date of the psalm, it cannot refer to the Chaldean invasion: for it is certain that at that epoch the congregation enjoyed the ministry of distinguished prophets, and that Jeremiah, who was one of these, foretold how long the captivity was to last. The occurrence of the complaint is indeed, by some, deemed sufficient to show that the psalm belongs to the age of the Maccabees, and has reference to the sufferings inflicted on the Jews by Antiochus Epiphanes. This subject of Maccabean psalms will come up again; meanwhile it is enough to say that the one before us cannot have been written after the captivity, inasmuch as the second temple was never consumed with fire until its final destruction by the Romans. The truth is, that complaints uttered in the first pressure of sore affliction are not to be interpreted too literally. The eye dimmed with sudden tears sees only the dark side of things, and is unable for a while to do justice to the rays of light which mitigate the darkness of its affliction. That the psalmist's words must be taken with some qualification, is apparent from the fact, that the same complaint which he utters is found in the Lamentations of Jeremiah himself. He was certainly a prophet, and never ceased to see the visions of God; yet he exclaims, "The Lord hath cast off his altar: he hath purposed to destroy the wall of the daughter of Zion: the law is no more; her prophets also find no vision from the Lord," <sup><3118></sup>Lamentations 2:8,9. Let us hear the psalmist:

*"O God, why hast thou cast us off for ever?
Why doth thine anger smoke against the sheep of thy pasture?"*

etc., to <sup><5740></sup>Psalm 74:10. Such is the former half of the psalm. The latter half is of a more cheerful tenor. The church remembers God's mighty works in nature and in grace, and her grief is assuaged. With recovered faith she betakes once more to prayer:

"Have respect unto the covenant, for the dark places of the earth are full of the habitations of cruelty." — Binnie.

<sup><5749></sup>Psalm 74:9. There is no more any prophet The expression has without good reason been maintained to favor the Maccabean reference: it is rather against it. For it takes for granted that the people of the Lord had a little while ago enjoyed the presence of prophets. It is only of fresh wounds that the psalmist complains, not of the loss of something of which the people had been deprived for a hundred years, and with the want of which they had long since become familiar. The words are to be explained from <sup><3075></sup>Ezekiel 7:26, where it is threatened, "and they seek (in vain) the face of the prophet," from <sup><3119></sup>Lamentations 2:9, "and their prophets find not the face of the Lord," and from <sup><10215></sup>1 Samuel 28:6,15, according to which Saul got no answer from the Lord through the prophets. Jeremiah did indeed survive the destruction of the temple (and to this reference has been made in support of the Maccabean exposition), but his prophetic office terminated with it. It was assuredly the cessation of his office that more immediately gave occasion to the painful cry: There is no longer any prophet. This standing ruin of the prophetic class proclaimed, even in louder accents than the non-appearance of other prophets, that God was no longer Israel's King. It was necessary, that along with the other signs of the dominion of God, this one also should cease for a long period of time, that the people might be taught how they had treated it, wherein they had offended, and might at the same time be led with tears of repentance to seek its return. — Hengstenberg.

NOTES ON PSALM 75

This psalm, like the two previous psalms, is ascribed to Asaph (see Introduction to Psalm 73), and there is no reason to doubt that it is correctly attributed to him. On the phrase in the title, “To the chief Musician,” see Introduction to Psalm 4. On the phrase “Al-taschith,” see the notes on the title to Psalm 57. The phrase “A Psalm or Song” (in Hebrew, “a psalm — a song”), occurs also in the title, to other psalms, as Psalm 30; Psalm 65, etc.

It is not possible now to determine the occasion on which this psalm was composed, as it is not indicated in the title, and there are no historical references in the psalm itself which would enable us to ascertain it. The general purpose is indicated in <sup><1971B></sup>Psalm 75:1, which is to ascribe praise to God for some particular manifestation of his favor. So far as can be conjectured from the psalm, there are two things which may have been referred to.

(I) The first is, that it was composed by someone — or for some one, in his name, as expressing his feelings — who was about to enter on the administration of the affairs of the nation, apparently a young prince soon to ascend the throne. See <sup><1971D></sup>Psalm 75:2, “When I shall receive the congregation,” etc.

(II) The second is, that it would seem to have been a time of national danger; a time when there may have been other aspirants for the throne; a time when wicked and powerful men had combined for the purpose of usurping the authority, and setting aside the legitimate claimant to power, or when there seemed to have been a universal dissolution of authority, or general anarchy. See <sup><1973B></sup>Psalm 75:3, “The earth and all the inhabitants thereof are dissolved.” Compare <sup><1974></sup>Psalm 75:4,5.

In these circumstances, in this general rebellion, in this time of resistance to lawful authority, and of combination and conspiracy against right, the speaker in the psalm expresses confidence in God as the source of all authority (<sup><1976></sup>Psalm 75:6); as the “Judge” (<sup><1977></sup>Psalm 75:7); as a God in whose hand is a cup of punishment which he will administer to all wicked people, <sup><1978></sup>Psalm 75:8. “The psalm, therefore, expresses confidence in God in the endeavor to assert the claims of legitimate authority.”

Another, and a more common view, however, has been taken of the psalm, which is, that it refers to God as the Ruler among the nations, and as asserting that he will in due time take vengeance on those who are in rebellion against him. This is the view of DeWette, Prof. Alexander, Luther, and others. It was also the view taken by the translators of the Septuagint, and the Latin Vulgate. Compare, however, the notes at <sup><1978></sup>Psalm 75:2.

The contents of the psalm are as follows:

- (1) A purpose of the author of the psalm to praise God for the manifestation of his wondrous works, <sup><1970></sup>Psalm 75:1.
- (2) His purpose when he should “receive the congregation,” or should be invested with authority, to judge uprightly, or to discharge his duties with fidelity, <sup><1978></sup>Psalm 75:2.
- (3) A statement of the existing disorder and confusion, as if the very structure of society was broken up, <sup><1978></sup>Psalm 75:3.
- (4) Advice addressed to the authors of the prevailing disorder not to pursue their plans of evil (<sup><1978></sup>Psalm 75:4-8), for two reasons:
  - (a) Promotion or success must come from God, or from his counsels, and not by chance, or by any laws of nature (<sup><1978></sup>Psalm 75:6,7); and
  - (b) because God is a righteous Judge, and the wicked can expect nothing but punishment at his hand, <sup><1978></sup>Psalm 75:8.
- (5) A purpose to praise God, in view of the fact that all the power of the wicked would be broken, but the power of the righteous would be maintained and exalted, <sup><1978></sup>Psalm 75:9,10.

<sup><1978></sup>Psalm 75:1. Unto thee, O God, do we give thanks We, the people; language which would be appropriate to public thanksgiving — showing that the psalm was designed for public use. The reasons for this public thanksgiving are stated in the subsequent part of the psalm.

Do we give thanks The repetition is emphatic. The idea is, that the occasion was one for special thanksgiving.

For that thy name is near literally, “and near is thy name.” The word name is often used to designate the person himself; and the idea here is, that God was near; that he had manifested himself to them in some special manner, and that for this there was occasion of praise. Compare <sup><2023></sup>Jeremiah 23:23.

Thy wondrous works declare Or, “They declare thy wondrous works.” The Septuagint renders it, “I will declare all thy wondrous works.” The Latin Vulgate, “We will declare thy wonders.” Luther, “We will declare thy wonders, that thy name is so near.” Prof. Alexander, “They recount thy wonders.” The meaning seems to be, “They,” that is, the people, “declare thy wondrous works.” Thy marvelous doings constitute the foundation for praise — for the praise now offered.

<sup><973></sup>Psalm 75:2. When I shall receive the congregation The marginal rendering is, “Take a set time.” The phrase is thus rendered in most of the versions. So the Septuagint, “When I take the time” — ὅταν <sup><3752></sup> λαβῶ <sup><2983></sup> καιρὸν <sup><2540></sup>. So the Vulgate, “When I accept the time.” So Luther, “When in its own time.” So De Wette, “When I take the time.” According to this interpretation, this is the language of God, as if implying that, although “the earth” was then “dissolved,” or although disorders were allowed to exist, yet he would take a set time, or take the appointed time for judgment, and would pronounce a sentence on the conduct of people, and deal with them in a righteous manner, punishing the rebellious, and vindicating his own cause. The proper interpretation of the passage turns on the meaning of the Hebrew word rendered in the text “congregation” — דָּבַר <sup><14150></sup>. See the word explained in the notes at <sup><1948></sup>Psalm 74:8. It may mean a set time, an appointed season, <sup><1938></sup>1 Samuel 13:8,11; or a coming together, an assembly, <sup><8823></sup>Job 30:23; or a place of assemblage, as the tabernacle, etc.; <sup><1271></sup>Exodus 27:21; 40:22; <sup><1948></sup>Psalm 74:8. It may, therefore, be applied to the congregation of the Jewish people — the nation considered as an assemblage for the worship of God; and the idea of taking this, or receiving this, may be applied to the act of assuming authority or sovereignty over the people, and hence, the language may be used to denote the entrance on the discharge of the duties of such sovereignty. The language would be applicable to one who had the right of such an elevation to power — a prince — an heir apparent — in a time when his right was disputed; when there was an organized opposition to him; or when the nation was in a state of anarchy and confusion. It seems to me that this supposition best accords with the proper meaning of the language, and with the scope of the psalm.

I will judge uprightly I will put down all this opposition to law. I will deal with exact justice between man and man. I will restore order, and the supremacy of law, to the state. The language, therefore, according to this interpretation, is not the language of God, but that of a prince having a right to the throne, and about to ascend it in a time of great misrule and disorder.

~~1970B~~ Psalm 75:3. The earth and all the inhabitants thereof are dissolved The word rendered “dissolved” means properly to melt, to flow down; then, to melt away, to pine away, to perish. ~~2367B~~ Isaiah 64:7; ~~2812B~~ Job 30:22; ~~3400B~~ Nahum 1:5; ~~1947B~~ Psalm 107:26. Here it means that there was, as it were, a general breaking up of things; or that none of the institutions of the land seemed to have any stability. There seemed to be no government, but universal anarchy and confusion.

I bear up the pillars of it Of the earth; of society. The earth here is compared with an edifice supported by pillars. Compare ~~0765B~~ Judges 16:26; ~~0918B~~ 1 Samuel 2:8; ~~5485B~~ 1 Timothy 3:15. As applied to a prince or ruler, this means that the permanent structure of the state, the welfare of society, depended on his administration. If, according to the view of others, it is applied to God, the meaning is, that as he upholds the world, there cannot be permanent misrule; that amidst all the commotions of earth, and all that seemed to threaten ruin, his hand sustained all, and he would not allow things to proceed to permanent disorder. In the former case, the assertion would be true if a prince felt that he had power to support the government, and to restore order; in the latter case, it must be true, for God sustains the earth, and as he can check disorder when he shall judge it best to interpose, so he will not permit it ultimately to prevail.

~~1970B~~ Psalm 75:4. I said unto the fools To the wicked people in rebellion. Folly and wickedness in the Bible are synonymous terms, as they are identical in fact. See the notes at ~~1940B~~ Psalm 14:1.

Deal not foolishly Act not foolishly; carry not out your wicked plans. Do not pursue your schemes of wickedness and folly, for they cannot be successful, and they will only tend to involve you in ruin.

And to the wicked The wicked people engaged in rebellion — either against a lawful human government, or against God.

Lift not up the horn The horn is a symbol of strength. Compare <sup><18165></sup>Job 16:15; <sup><2003></sup>Daniel 7:7,8,11,21; 8:5,8,9,21. This is to be understood as the language of the person represented as speaking in the psalm — whether a prince, or whether God himself. It is counsel addressed to the wicked, that they should not attempt to put forth their strength in the accomplishment of their evil purposes. The reason given for this is stated in <sup><19716></sup>Psalm 75:6, namely, that success does not depend on chance, or on human power, but must come from God.

<sup><19716></sup>Psalm 75:5. Lift not up your horn on high In a proud, self-confident, arrogant manner.

Speak not with a stiff neck With arrogance and pride; in a haughty, imperious manner. The word rendered “stiff” (literally “a neck of stiffness”) — <sup><46277></sup>qt[ — means properly bold, impudent, wicked; and the idea is that of speaking as those do who are impudent, shameless, bold, licentious — indicating confidence in themselves, and a reckless disregard of truth and of the rights of others. The Septuagint and the Vulgate render it, “And speak not unrighteousness against God.”

<sup><19716></sup>Psalm 75:6. For promotion The word used here in the original, and rendered “promotion” — <sup><42022></sup>rhæ — is susceptible of two quite different significations. According to one — that which is adopted by our translators — it is the infinitive (Hiphil) of <sup><47312></sup>µllr; “to raise” — the word used in <sup><19716></sup>Psalm 75:5,6, and there rendered “lift up.” Thus it would mean, that to “lift up” is not the work of people, or is not originated by the earth — does not originate from any part of it, east, west, or south, but must come from God alone. According to the other view, this word is the plural of <sup><42022></sup>rhæ, “mountain,” and would mean that something — (something understood — as “judgment”) — comes not “from the east, nor the west, nor from the desert of mountains,” the mountainous regions of the south, but must come from God. The Septuagint, the Latin Vulgate, and the ancient versions generally, adopt the latter interpretation. De Wette renders it as our translators have done. This interpretation — rendering it promotions — seems to be the true one, for in the two previous verses this was the prominent idea — a caution against attempting to “lift themselves up,” or to exalt themselves, and in this and the following verse a reason is given for this caution, to wit, that the whole question about success or prosperity depends not on anything here below; not on any natural advantages of situation, or on any human skill or power; but on God alone. It was in vain, in regard to such an object, to form human alliances, or to depend on natural advantages; and therefore people should not depend on these things, but only on God.

Neither from the east literally, from the outgoing; that is, of the sun. The meaning may either be that success would not depend on any natural advantages of country furnished in the East; or that the persons referred to were seeking to form alliances with an Eastern people, and then the statement would be that no such alliances would of themselves secure success.

Nor from the west The setting; that is, the place where the sun goes down. This also may refer either to the natural advantages of a Western country, or to some alliance which it was intended to form with the people there.

Nor from the south Margin, as in Hebrew, “desert.” The reference is to the rocky and barren regions south of Palestine, and the allusion here also may be either to some natural advantages of those regions, or to some alliance which it was proposed to form.

Psalm 75:7. But God is the judge All depends on him, not on the natural advantages of a country; not on human strength, human skill, or human prowess. Whatever may be the natural resources of a country; whatever may be the enterprise, the numbers, or the valor of its inhabitants; whatever alliances of peace or war they may form with other nations, yet success depends on God. He presides over all; he can give success when it is least expected; and he also can humble people when they have made the most ample preparations for success, and anticipate it in the most confident manner.

He putteth down one, and setteth up another Literally, “This one he humbles, and this he exalts.” This is true alike of an individual or a nation. The word rendered “setteth up” is the same which is used in Psalm 75:4,5,6, rendered “Lift up,” and “promotion.” The idea is, that in the matter of “lifting up,” or “promotion,” all depends on God. He is a sovereign, and he confers exaltation, whether of an individual or a nation, as he pleases.

Psalm 75:8. For in the hand of the Lord ... The general idea in this verse is, that God holds in his hand a cup for people to drink; a cup whose contents will tend to prolong life, or to cause death. See the idea in this passage fully explained in the notes at <sup><8012></sup>Job 21:20; <sup><5918></sup>Psalm 60:3; <sup><2517></sup>Isaiah 51:17; <sup><6410></sup>Revelation 14:10.

And the wine is red The word used here — <sup>rmjē</sup><sup><2560></sup> — may mean either to boil up, or to be red — from the idea of boiling, or becoming heated. The Septuagint and the Vulgate render it, “And he pours it out from this into that;” that is, he draws it off, as is done with wine. The true idea in the expression is probably that it ferments; and the meaning may be that the wrath of God seems to boil like fermenting liquor.

It is full of mixture Mixed with spices, in order to increase its strength; or, as we should say, drugged. This was frequently done in order to increase the intoxicating quality of wine. The idea is, that the wrath of God was like wine whose native strength, or power of producing intoxication, was thus increased by drugs. And he poureth out of the same. He pours it out in order that his enemies may drink it; in other words, they reel and stagger under the expressions of his wrath, as men reel and stagger under the influence of spiced or drugged wine.

But the dregs thereof The “lees” — the settlings — what remains after the wine is racked off. See the notes at <sup><2516></sup>Isaiah 25:6. This would contain the strongest part of the mixture; and the idea is, that they would drink the wrath of God to the utmost.

All the wicked of the earth Wicked people everywhere. The expression of the wrath of God would not be confined to one nation, or one people; but wherever wicked people are found, he will punish them. He will be just in his dealings with all people.

Shall wring them out Wine was kept in skins; and the idea here is, that they would wring out these skins so as to get out “all” that there was in them, and leave nothing remaining. The wrath of God would be exhausted in the punishment of wicked people, as if it were all wrung out.

And drink them Not merely the wine; but the dregs; all that there was. Wicked people will suffer all that there is in the justice of God.

Psalm 75:9. But I will declare for ever I — the author of the psalm. I will make known at all times the character of God, and will declare the truth respecting his works and ways. The particular mode as referred to here, was praise.

I will sing praises to the God of Jacob The God whom Jacob worshipped; the God who proved himself to be his Friend, thus showing that he is the Friend of all that trust in him. See the notes at <sup><1974></sup>Psalm 24:6.

Psalm 75:10. All the horns of the wicked ... See the notes at <sup><1974></sup>Psalm 75:4. The meaning is, I will destroy all their power. This, too, may refer to the author of the psalm, supposed to be a prince or ruler about to ascend the throne, and to assert his rightful authority. This indicates his purpose in regard to his administration (compare <sup><1972></sup>Psalm 75:2); the principles on which he would administer his government. It would be an administration under which the wicked would be punished, and where the righteous would be protected. In this manner it would be an emblem of the administration of God. All just human governments are founded on the same principles as the government of God. People have only to apply to the affairs of civil society the principles on which God governs the universe, to constitute the most perfect human administration. Those which come nearest to that, most nearly approximate perfection; and civil governments will reach their end, and accomplish their design, only when those principles shall be universally applied among people.

APPENDIX NOTES ON PSALM 75

There are very decisive reasons for maintaining that the psalm was composed during the time of the Assyrian distress under Hezekiah. The triumphant tone of the psalm does not allow us to descend to the time of the falling, or rather fallen state. <sup><1974></sup>Psalm 75:4-8 render it quite evident that the psalm was called forth by some severe distress on the part of the church of God; compare especially “the wicked of the earth,” in <sup><1973></sup>Psalm 75:8. We have here, as in Psalm 46, a catastrophe of a universal character: according to <sup><1973></sup>Psalm 75:3, the whole circle of the earth is shaken, and the whole circle of the earth shall be calmed by the manifestations of might on the part of God. The catastrophe of the Assyrian invasion was the only one of this kind that ever occurred in all history. According to <sup><1972></sup>Psalm 75:2,3 the people were quieted in the midst of their trouble by an assurance of divine assistance. This happened at the time of the Assyrian invasion by the prophecy of Isaiah. In ~~<1971>~~ Psalm 75:6, the places named, from which Israel might possibly obtain human assistance, are the east, west, and south. The omission of the north indicates that the enemy had come from that quarter; and the Assyrians did make their entrance into Canaan from Syria. To this we may add, that the psalm is closely related to Psalm 46 (compare at Psalm 4), which undoubtedly belongs to the Assyrian period, and that the following psalm, which is also closely related, and is inscribed with the name of Asaph (compare at Psalm 74), belongs also to the same era.

The question may be asked, Was the psalm composed before or after the Assyrian invasion? Ewald adopts the latter supposition. The inspiration, he supposes, has descried in it the first visible beginning of a great general judgment of God upon all nations. But there are decisive reasons in favor of the former view, which indeed would never have been abandoned, had it not been supposed that there was an incongruity in conceiving of a song of triumph sung by the church before the victory, and while the trouble was still immediately lying upon her. In the very title, "To the chief musician, destroy not, a psalm of Asaph, a song of praise," the expression, "destroy not" (compare at ~~<1971>~~ Psalm 57:1), which does not occur in Psalm 76, where we find the celebration of the victory, after it had been gained, shows that, under "Lord God, we praise thee," there lies concealed, "Lord, have mercy on us." On the supposition that the psalm was composed after the deliverance had been obtained, there is assuredly too little said about it, and the basis laid for hope in the future is too narrow. The thanksgiving and the praise in ~~<1971>~~ Psalm 75:9 are merely promised for future assistance — a proof that as yet none had been imparted. Finally, the following psalm, which was also composed by Asaph, expresses thanks and joy for the assistance which had been already obtained. The two psalms make up one entire whole, if Psalm 75 be considered as a song of triumph over what had been "promised." — Hengstenberg.

The reign of Hezekiah witnessed just such another INVASION and DELIVERANCE as had been seen in Jehoshaphat's time. The facts already noticed remind us that this was the age in which the Assyrian monarchy had attained the highest noon of its splendor. It was at this time that the Assyrian kings were rearing at Nineveh those great palaces, whose sculptured slabs have lately lent a new attraction to the museums of Europe. Shalmanezar, who carried the ten tribes into captivity, had been succeeded by Sennacherib, and the new monarch was resolved to measure his strength with the king of Egypt. That he might leave no hostile fortress to threaten his rear, he determined to capture Jerusalem and remove the people to share the captivity of their brethren. The sacred writers have narrated in great detail the history of this attempt: the impious letter of the Assyrian king; the arrogant pride of Rabshakeh his lieutenant; Hezekiah's prayer as he spread the letter before the Lord in them temple; the comfortable answer sent; by Isaiah; the stroke of the angel of the Lord which laid low 180,000 men, the flower of Assyria, in one night; the flight of Sennacherib in shame to his own land. As in Jehoshaphat's time the danger and the deliverance are both of them celebrated in psalms. It is certain that Psalm 76 celebrates the deliverance; and Psalm 75 bears traces of having been written in the crisis of the danger. An unfortunate mistranslation in the second verse of the latter psalm is apt to mislead the reader of the authorized version. The verse expresses God's purpose, not the purpose of the psalmist. "When I shall seize the appointed time, I will judge uprightly:" God may hide himself long, but when the fit time, the time of his own appointment, comes, he will make bare his arm in the defense of the oppressed. — Binnie.

Psalm 75:2. When I shall receive the congregation, I will judge uprightly: "For I shall fix a time when I shall judge righteously." In Psalm 75:2,3 we have the grounds of the confidence which the church expressed in Psalm 75:1: God has promised to her his help. Both verses contain the words of God which are uttered in reply to the address of the church: You may well be thus full of my praise, for, etc.,  $\square$  [  $\square$  ] is the point of time which God has fixed for executing his purposes: compare Psalm 102:13, thou shalt arise and have mercy on Zion, for the time to be gracious to her is come, yea the "set time," Habakkuk 2:3; Daniel 8:19; 11:27,35. To this, God's point of time, the eye of faith should, in the midst of suffering, be steadily directed. Arnd:

"Our God, who governs the world by his omnipotence and wisdom, has appointed to all things a boundary, and has also fixed a time and an hour for his judgment, and when this comes, he reveals his judgments, and no man can hinder them. God withholds punishment for a very long time, but at last it comes with certainty, and makes no delay. Even the pagan have learned this from experience according to the saying: sera tamen tacitis poena venit pedibus, and also in the words of Val. Maximus, tarditatem poenoe gravitate compensat."

That point of time comes when the chastisement of the church has been brought to a close: compare <sup><2302></sup>Isaiah 10:12,

“And it shall come to pass, that when the Lord hath performed his whole work on mount Zion and on Jerusalem, I will punish the pride of the king of Assyria.” — Hengstenberg.

Although many attain to exalted stations either by unlawful arts or by the aid of worldly instrumentality, yet that does not happen by chance; such persons being advanced to their elevated position by the secret purpose of God, that immediately he may scatter them like refuse or chaff. The prophet does not simply attribute judgment to God. He also defines what kind of judgment it is, affirming it to consist in this, that, casting down one man and elevating another to dignity, he orders the affairs of the human race as seemeth good in his sight. I have stated that the consideration of this is the means by which haughty spirits are most effectually humbled, for the reason why worldly people have the daring to attempt whatever comes into their minds is because they conceive of God as shut up in heaven, and think not that they are kept under restraint by his secret providence. In short, they would divest him of all sovereign power, that they might find a free and an unimpeded course for the gratification of their lusts. To teach us then, with all moderation and humility, to remain contented with our condition, the psalmist clearly defines in what the judgment of God, or the order which he observes in the government of the world, consists, telling us that it belongs to him alone to exalt or to abase those of mankind whom he pleases.

From this it follows that all those who, spreading the wings of their vanity, aspire after any kind of exaltation, without any regard to or dependence upon God, are chargeable with robbing him as much as in them lies of his prerogative and power. This is very apparent, not only from their frantic counsels, but also from the blasphemous boastings in which they indulge, saying, Who shall hinder me? What shall withstand me? As if, forsooth! it were not an easy matter for God, with his nod alone, suddenly to cast a thousand obstacles in their way, with which to render ineffectual all their efforts. As worldly people by their fool-hardihood and perverse devices are chargeable with endeavoring to despoil God of his royal dignity, so whenever we are dismayed at their threatenings, we are guilty of wickedly setting limits to the sovereignty and power of God. If, whenever we hear the wind blowing with any degree of violence, we are as much frightened as if we were stricken with a thunderbolt from heaven, such extreme readiness to be thrown into a state of consternation manifestly shows that we do not as yet thoroughly understand the nature of that government which God exercises over the world. We would no doubt be ashamed to rob him of the title of Judge; yea, there is almost no individual who would not shrink with horror at the thought of so great a blasphemy; and yet when our natural understanding has extorted from us the confession that he is the judge and the supreme ruler of the world, we conceive of him as holding only a kind of inactive sovereignty, which I know not how to characterize, as if he did not govern mankind by his power and wisdom. — Calvin.

NOTES ON PSALM 76

This psalm is one of those which in the title are ascribed to Asaph (see Introduction to Psalm 73), and there is no reason to call in question that statement. On the phrase “To the chief Musician on Neginoth,” see Introduction to Psalm 4.

The occasion on which the psalm was composed is not stated, and cannot now be ascertained. The Septuagint regards it as having had reference to the Assyrians — ὠδή προς τον Ασσυριον — “An ode to the Assyrian.” So the Latin Vulgate; Canticum ad Assyrios. This is the opinion adopted also by Jarchi. The title in the Syriac version is, “When Rabbah of the Ammonites was laid waste; and further it describes the judgment of the Messiah against the wicked. Grotius supposes that it was intended to describe the victory over the Ammonites. Rudinger ascribes its composition to the time of the Maccabees. DeWette supposes that it refers to some late period of the Jewish history, but that the particular time is unknown. It would be vain to attempt to ascertain with any certainty the particular occasion on which the psalm was composed. It was evidently on some occasion when an attack had been made on “Salem,” that is, on Jerusalem (⚭ Psalm 76:2,3), and when that attack had been repelled, and the enemy had been driven back. Many of the circumstances in the psalm would agree well with the account of the invasion of the Assyrians under Sennacherib, but there were many other occasions in the Jewish history to which it would, in like manner, be applicable.

The psalm is a song of praise for deliverance from an enemy. The contents are as follows:

I. The fact that God had made himself known “in Judah,” or to the Jewish people — or, that he had manifested himself to them in a remarkable manner, ⚭ Psalm 76:1.

II. The fact that he had showed this in a special manner in “Salem,” the capital of the nation — referring to some particular time in which this was done, ⚭ Psalm 76:2.

III. The manner in which he had done this — by breaking the arrows of the bow, and the shield; by showing that his power was superior to all the defenses which men had set up; and by overcoming entirely the invading foe, <sup><976B></sup>Psalm 76:3-6.

IV. The fact that, on this account, God was to be feared and revered, <sup><976C></sup>Psalm 76:7-9.

V. The statement of a great truth, and a most important principle, which had been particularly illustrated by the occurrence; to wit, that the wrath of man would be made to praise God, and that the remainder of wrath he would restrain, <sup><976D></sup>Psalm 76:10.

VI. A call on all people to acknowledge God in a suitable manner, by bringing presents, and by standing in awe of him, <sup><976E></sup>Psalm 76:11,12.

<sup><976F></sup>Psalm 76:1. In Judah is God known That is, he has made himself known there in a special manner; he has evinced his watchful care over the city so as to demand a proper acknowledgment; he has manifested himself there as he has not elsewhere. It is true that God is known, or makes himself known everywhere; but it is also true that he does this in some places, and at some times, in a more marked and striking manner than he does in other places and at other times. The most clear and impressive displays of his character are among his own people — in the church. “His name is great in Israel.” Among the people of Israel; or, among his own people. The meaning here is, that, by some act referred to in the psalm, he had so displayed his power and his mercy in favor of that people, as to make it proper that his name should be exalted or praised.

<sup><976G></sup>Psalm 76:2. In Salem also This was the ancient name for Jerusalem, and is evidently so used here. It continued to be given to the town until the time of David, when it was called “Jerusalem.” See the notes at <sup><2700B></sup>Isaiah 1:1. The word properly means “peace,” and is so rendered here by the Septuagint, <sup><1722></sup>εν <sup><1515></sup>ειρηνη <sup><3588></sup>ὁ <sup><5117></sup>τοπος <sup><846></sup>αυτου — “his place is in peace.” There may have been an allusion here to that ancient signification of the name, as being more poetical, and as suggesting the fact that God had restored peace to the city and nation when invaded.

Is his tabernacle The tent, or sacred place where he is worshipped. Salem or Jerusalem was made the place of public worship, and the ark removed there by David, <sup><1067></sup>2 Samuel 6:17.

And his dwelling-place in Zion That is, on Mount Zion — the portion of Jerusalem in which David built his own palace, and which he made the place of public worship. This remained so until the temple was built on Mount Moriah; see the notes at <sup><4916></sup>Psalm 2:6; compare <sup><4901></sup>Psalm 9:11; 48:12; 65:1.

<sup><4916></sup>Psalm 76:3. There brake he the arrows of the bow That is, in Salem, or near Salem. The language is such as would be used in reference to invaders, or to armies that came up to storm the city. The occasion is unknown; but the meaning is, that God drove the invading army back, and showed his power in defending the city. The phrase “the arrows of the bow,” is literally, “the lightnings of the bow,” the word rendered “arrows” meaning properly “flame;” and then, “lightning.” The idea is, that the arrows sped from the bow with the rapidity of lightning.

The shield Used for defense in war. See <sup><4912></sup>Psalm 5:12; 33:20; compare the notes at <sup><4916></sup>Ephesians 6:16.

And the sword That is, he disarmed his enemies, or made them as powerless as if their swords were broken.

And the battle He broke the force of the battle; the strength of the armies drawn up for conflict.

Than the mountains of prey The word “prey” as employed here — <sup>hpr</sup><sup><47503></sup> — means that which is obtained by hunting; and then, plunder. It is usually applied to the food of wild beasts, beasts of prey. Here it refers to the “mountains” considered as the abode or stronghold of robbers and banditti, from where they sally forth in search of plunder. These mountains, in their heights, their rocks, their fastnesses, furnished safe places of retreat for robbers, and hence, they became emblems of power. It is not improbable that the hordes referred to in the psalm had their abodes in such mountains, and hence, the psalmist says that God who made those mountains and hills was superior to them in strength and power.

Psalm 76:5. The stout-hearted are spoiled The valiant men, the men who came so confidently to the invasion. The word “spoiled” here, as elsewhere in the Scriptures, means “plundered,” not (as the word is now used) “corrupted.” See the notes at <sup><5108></sup>Colossians 2:8.

They have slept their sleep They are dead; they have slept their last sleep. Death, in the Scriptures, as in all other writings, is often compared with sleep.

And none of the men of might The men who came forth for purposes of war and conquest.

Have found their hands The Septuagint renders this, “Have found nothing in their hands;” that is, they have obtained no plunder. Luther renders it, “And all warriors must suffer their hands to fall.” De Wette, “Have lost their hands?” The idea seems to be, that they had lost the use of their hands; that is, that they had no use for them, or did not find them of any use. They could not employ them for the purpose for which they were intended, but were suddenly stricken down.

Psalm 76:6. At thy rebuke, O God of Jacob At thy word; thy bidding; or, when God rebuked them for their attempt to attack the city. The idea is, that they were discomfited by a word spoken by God.

Both the chariot and horse ... The Septuagint renders this, “They who are mounted on horses.” The word rendered “chariot” here — <sup><17393></sup>bkr — may mean “riders, cavalry,” as well as chariot. See the notes at <sup><3207></sup>Isaiah 21:7. Hence, there would be less incongruity in the Hebrew than in our translation, where it is said that the “chariots” have fallen into a deep sleep. The idea may be either that horsemen and horses had fallen into a deep slumber, or that the rumbling of the chariot-wheels had ceased, and that there was a profound silence, like a deep sleep.

Psalm 76:7. Thou, even thou, art to be feared To be had in reverence or veneration. The repetition of the word “thou” is emphatic, as if the mind paused at the mention of God, and remained in a state of reverence, repeating the thought. The particular “reason” suggested here why God should be had in reverence, was the display of his power in overthrowing by a word the mighty hosts that had come against the holy city.

And who may stand in thy sight Who can stand before thee? implying that no one had the power to do it. “When once thou art angry.” If such armies have been overcome suddenly by thy might, then what power is there which could successfully resist thee?

Psalm 76:8. Thou didst cause judgment to be heard from heavens It seemed to come from heaven; it was manifestly from thee. The overthrow of these enemies of thy people was a manifest judgment from thee, and should be so regarded.

The earth feared The world itself seemed to hear the voice of God, and to stand in awe.

And was still It seemed to be profoundly attentive to what God said, and as if it reverently listened to his voice. It is not uncommon in the Scriptures to represent the earth — the hills, the mountains, the streams, the rivers, the plains — as conscious of the presence of God; as either rejoicing or trembling at his voice. Compare Psalm 65:12,13; 114:3-7;

Habakkuk 3:8-11.

Psalm 76:9. When God arose to judgment That is, when he came to overthrow and destroy the enemies of his people, as referred to in the former part of the psalm.

To save all the meek of the earth Of the land — to wit, the land of Judea; or, to save his people when in affliction. The word “meek,” which with us usually means those who are forbearing under injuries, means here the humble, the afflicted, the crushed, the oppressed.

Psalm 76:10. Surely the wrath of man shall praise thee It shall be the occasion of praise; or, honor shall accrue to thee from it, “as if” it were employed in thy praise, and “as if” it were voluntarily engaged in promoting thy glory. The deliverance of the people by the direct interposition of God in the case referred to in the psalm, the sudden and entire overthrow of the invading forces by his power, led to this reflection. The overruling power of God was displayed. The “wrath” of the invading host had given occasion for this manifestation of the divine perfections; or, in other words, his character would not have been displayed in this manner if it had not been for these wicked purposes of people. It is not that there was anything in the wrath itself, or in their plans or intentions, that was in itself “adapted” to honor God; but that it was overruled by him, so that he took “occasion” from it to display his own character. The wicked conduct of a child is an “occasion” for the display of the just character and the wise administration of a parent; the act of a pirate, a rebel, a murderer, furnishes an “occasion” for the display of the just principles of law, and the stability and power of a government. In like manner, the sins of the wicked are made an occasion for the display of the divine perfections in maintaining law; in the administering of justice; in preserving order. But there is another sense, also, in which the wrath of man is made the occasion for glorifying God. It is, that since there is such wrath, or since there are such wicked purposes, God makes use of that wrath, or of those wicked purposes, as he does of the powers of nature — of pestilence, disease, and storms, as instruments to accomplish his own designs, or to bring about great results. Thus he made use of the treasonable purpose of Judas, and the mad passions and the angry feelings of the Jews, in bringing about the work of redemption by the death of his Son; thus he made use of the purposes of Sennacherib in order to punish his own people (see the notes at <sup><3015></sup>Isaiah 10:5-7); thus he employed Cyrus to “execute his counsel” (<sup><2460></sup>Isaiah 46:10); and thus he made use of the wrath evinced in persecuting the church to secure its permanent establishment in the world. Whether these things could be accomplished “without” that wrath, is a question which is too high for man to determine. It is certain, also, that the fact that God overrules the wrath of people does not justify that wrath. The purposes of people are, like the pestilence and the storm, what they are in themselves; and the nature of their conduct is not affected by any use that God may make of it. People must be judged according to their own deeds, not for what God does through their wickedness.

The remainder of wrath The word “remainder” here — tyraē<sup>>#7611</sup> — means properly “part;” what remains, especially after a defeat or slaughter — the “survivors” of a battle, <sup><4123></sup>Jeremiah 11:23; 44:14; <sup><3078></sup>Micah 7:18; <sup><4017></sup>Zephaniah 2:7. Gesenius renders it here (Lexicon) “extreme wrath,” retained even in extremity. The Septuagint, ενγκαταλειμμα — “the things which are left.” So the Vulgate, “reliquice.” Luther, “When men rage against thee, thou turnest it to honor; and when they rage yet more, thou art yet prepared.” Venema supposes that the meaning is the whole wrath. As in Arabic the word used here means “wholeness,” or the whole of anything; and according to this, the idea would be that it was not merely wrath in general, or in a general sense, that would be made use of, but all that there was in wrath; it would all be made use of in advancing the divine purposes. The allusion seems to be to something that had been laid up in a magazine — as provision or arms, when the soldier went forth to war — which he would make use of if necessary, so that “all” might be ultimately consumed or employed. The control of God was over “this” as well as over that which was actually employed; he could overrule that which was employed. He could restrain people from at all using this that was kept in reserve. The idea seems to be that all the “wrath” which is “manifested” among people would be made to praise God, or would be overruled for his glory — and “all” which would “not” contribute to this end he would keep back, he would check; he would prevent its being put forth — so that “all” should be under his control, and “all” disposed of as he should will. There was nothing in the heart or the purposes of man that was beyond his jurisdiction or control; man could do nothing in his wrathful plans that God could not dispose of in his own way, and for his own honor.

Shalt thou restrain The word used here — ργῆ<sup>12296</sup> — means literally to bind around; to gird; to gird up, as of a garment or sword that is girded on, 1173 1 Samuel 17:39; 25:13; 1915 Psalm 45:3; or sackcloth, 215 Isaiah 15:3; 240 Jeremiah 49:3. The Septuagint renders this, “and the remainder of wrath shall make a feast to thee,” ἑορτάσει <sup><1858></sup> σοι <sup><4671></sup> — that is, it shall praise or honor thee as in a festival. So the Vulgate. Prof. Alexander renders it, “Shalt thou gird about thee;” that is, God would gird it on as a sword, and would make use of it as a weapon for executing his own purposes. So DeWette, “And with the last wrath thou shalt gird thyself.” Others render it, “Thou restrainest the remainder of thy wrath” — that is, punishment — “when the wrath of man will not promote the knowledge of thyself” It seems to me, however, that our translators have expressed the exact idea in the psalm; and the meaning is, that the whole of the wrath of man is under the control of God, and that whatever there is, or would be, in the manifestation of that wrath, or in carrying out the purposes of the heart, which could not, in the circumstances, be made to promote his glory, or which would do injury, he would check and restrain. He would suffer it to proceed no further than he chose, and would make it certain that there should be no exhibition of wrathful feelings on the part of man which would not, in some way, be made to promote his honor, and to advance his own great purposes. He has absolute control over the passions of people, as he has over the pestilence, over earthquakes, and over storms, and can make all tributary to his glory, and executioners of his will.

<sup><49761></sup>Psalm 76:11. vow, and pay unto the LORD your God That is, Pay your vows, or sacredly observe them. On the word “vow,” see the notes at <sup><49725></sup>Psalm 22:25. Compare <sup><49714></sup>Psalm 50:14; 56:12; 66:13. The word refers to a voluntary promise made to God.

Let all that be round about him All that worship him, or that profess to honor him.

Bring presents Bring gifts or offerings; things expressive of gratitude and homage. See the notes at <sup><49652></sup>Psalm 45:12. Compare the notes at <sup><23160></sup>Isaiah 16:1; 18:7; 60:5ff.

Unto him that ought to be feared Margin, “to fear.” The meaning would be well expressed by the word dread; “to the Dread One.” It was not to inspire fear that the presents were to be brought; but they were to be brought to One who had shown that he was the proper object of dread or reverence.

<sup><49762></sup>Psalm 76:12. He shall cut off the spirit of princes That is, He will cut down their pride; he will break them down. Luther renders it, “He shall take away the wrath of princes.” The allusion is to what he had done as celebrated in this psalm. He had shown that he could rebuke the pride and self-confidence of kings, and could bring them low at his feet.

He is terrible to the kings of the earth When they are arrayed against him.

- (1) They are wholly under his control.
- (2) He can defeat their plans.
- (3) He can check them when he pleases.
- (4) He can, and will, make their plans — even their wrath — the means of promoting or carrying out his own purposes.
- (5) He will allow them to proceed no further in their plans of evil than he can make subservient to the furtherance of his own.
- (6) He can cut down the most mighty of them at his pleasure, and destroy them forever.

APPENDIX NOTES ON PSALM 76

There are very satisfactory reasons for referring this psalm, as the translators of the Septuagint and the Vulgate saw, to the Assyrian catastrophe. The preceding psalm was composed in prospect of this, and the psalm before us after its actual commencement.

The enthusiastic feeling, the courageous tone which characterizes the prophecies and also the psalms of the Assyrian period (compare besides, Psalm 75, especially Psalm 46), meets us in this psalm. It celebrates, according to <sup><4976B></sup>Psalm 76:3, a mighty overthrow of the enemies, which put an end at one blow to the war. This overthrow took place, according to the same verse, before Jerusalem; on which Jarchi remarks, that within the whole compass of sacred history there occurs no other example of the overthrow of the enemy before Jerusalem. The overthrow took place without any cooperation on the part of the people, and by an immediate exercise of divine omnipotence, <sup><4976B></sup>Psalm 76:3,6,8, God has manifested himself as one who cuts off the breath of princes, <sup><4976C></sup>Psalm 76:12: the enemies are not only driven away, they are put to death. The catastrophe is an event in the world's history: all the meek of the earth are delivered through the judgment of God, <sup><4976B></sup>Psalm 76:9, the tumultuous earth is in consequence of it quieted, <sup><4976B></sup>Psalm 76:8, and God has manifested himself as terrible to the kings of the earth, <sup><4976C></sup>Psalm 76:12. The exhortation to the pagan to honor God by presents, <sup><4976B></sup>Psalm 76:11, is in accordance with the narrative as given in <sup><4422B></sup>2 Chronicles 32:23, that they actually did so in consequence of the destruction of the Assyrian army. — Hengstenberg.

Psalm 76 was evidently written in the first flush of the grateful joy with which the marvelous discomfiture of the Assyrians gladdened every countenance in Jerusalem. It is rendered with such exquisite skill and spirit in the authorized version (and, I may add, in the Scots metrical version also) that citation is unnecessary. Let the reader compare it with the narrative given in Isaiah and the historical books, and he will not marvel that the critics, divided as they are in opinion regarding the origin of so many other psalms, are almost unanimous in connecting this one with the mysterious discomfiture of Sennacherib's host.

To some it may seem that a psalm which originated in an event so marvelous, and which bears such indubitable marks of its origin, must be little adapted for the subsequent use of God's people, and therefore must be out of place in the hymnal of the church catholic. But facts refute such a notion. Times without number the psalm has been sung, as furnishing the fittest expression of the thoughts and feelings of God's people in view of deliverances performed for them. When the covenanters at Drumclog closed their ranks to meet the onset of Claverhouse and his dragoons, they sang the opening verses to the tune of Martyrs:

*“In Judah’s land God is well known,
His name’s in Isr’el great:
In Salem is his tabernacle,
In Zion is his seat.*

*There arrows of the bow he brake,
The shield, the sword, the war.
More glorious thou than hills of prey,
More excellent art far.*

*Those that were stout of heart are spoiled,
They slept their sleep outright;
And none of those their hands did find
That were the men of might.”*

A century earlier, in 1588, when the first rumour of the discomfiture of the Spanish Armada reached Edinburgh, and the citizens assembled to render thanks to God, Robert Bruce, addressing them in the West Kirk, took this psalm for his text, and the two noble sermons he preached on the occasion were, from beginning to end, little more than a running commentary on the psalm. And every hearer must have felt that the whole was as appropriate to the circumstances as if the psalm had been written for the occasion. — Binnie.

◀◀ Psalm 76:5-6. The stout-hearted are spoiled ... It must be acknowledged that these two verses seem, in a very particular manner, to point at the miraculous destruction of Sennacherib's army, when the “stout-hearted,” who doubted not of taking and spoiling the holy city, were themselves suddenly “spoiled” of strength and life; they “slept their sleep, and found not their hands;” they awaked not again to the use of their powers and faculties; a rebuking blast was sent from the God of Jacob, under which the flower of Assyria withered in the space of a night, and in the morning was no more; “the horse and his rider were cast into a dead sleep;” they slept the sleep of death. How, in a moment, “were the mighty fallen, and the weapons of war perished!” How astonishing the downfall of the tyrant! How complete the triumph of the daughter of Sion! Such will be the destruction of the world; such the salvation of the people of God. —

NOTES ON PSALM 77

For the meaning of the title to this psalm, see the notes at the title to Psalm 39. It purports, like the preceding ones, to be a psalm of Asaph. See the notes in the title to Psalm 73. Nothing is known, or can now be ascertained, of the occasion on which the psalm was composed. It is not absolutely certain whether it refers to some public calamity, and is designed to express the feelings of a pious Hebrew, as of the psalmist himself (Rosenmuller), or some other Jew (DeWette), in view of such a public calamity; or whether it is designed to represent the “complaint of the church in view of her calamity and desertion (Prof. Alexander); or whether it is the statement of the private and personal experience of the author of the psalm. To me it seems that the latter is the most probable supposition, and that, in this respect, it accords with the purport and design of Psalm 73, which is by the same author. It is an interesting statement of what passed through the mind of the author, and of what may, therefore, pass through the mind of any pious person, in regard to the divine dealings. The psalm was evidently composed in a time of affliction, and the thoughts which gave the author so much trouble, and which he endeavored to calm down, were such as were suggested by affliction; by the fact that God seemed to have forsaken him, and that he had forgotten to be gracious.

The contents of the psalm are as follows:

I. A general statement of the author that he had cried to God, and that he had been heard, <sup><1970></sup>Psalm 77:1. This, although it is in the beginning of the psalm, is clearly designed to be a general expression of his experience in the case “as recorded in the psalm,” or as the result of the conflict through which he had passed.

II. A statement of his affliction, and of the exercises of his mind in his affliction, <sup><1970></sup>Psalm 77:2-9.

(1) The statement of the affliction, <sup><1970></sup>Psalm 77:2.

(2) In that affliction he was troubled in mind, or he had painful ideas in regard to God. He could not reconcile his sufferings with such views as he desired to cherish of God, <sup><1970></sup>Psalm 77:3.

(3) His meditations, and perhaps the pain of disease, kept him awake, and he was unable to rest. The ordinary time of repose furnished no relief, <sup><1970></sup>Psalm 77:4.

(4) He recalled the past; he looked over the dealings of God with people in former times; he summoned up his own reflections in times past, and especially the time when he could praise God in trouble, recalling his “song in the night” — but in vain, <sup><1971></sup>Psalm 77:5,6.

(5) The result was that he had most painful thoughts in regard to God, as if he had forgotten to be gracious, and had cast him off forever, and would be favorable no more, <sup><1972></sup>Psalm 77:7-9.

III. His self-reproach; his recalling himself to a proper state of feeling; his purpose to think of the dealings of God with his people, and to examine them more closely, <sup><1973></sup>Psalm 77:10-12. He saw that the course of thought which he had indulged in was wrong, and was satisfied that it was an “infirmity,” that it was to be traced to his own weakness — and that he ought to take different views of God.

IV. The result of all; the things which comforted him in his troubles, and which enabled him at last to put his calm trust in God, <sup><1974></sup>Psalm 77:13-20.

He refers

(1) To the fact that God is great, and that he could not hope to be able to comprehend him, <sup><1975></sup>Psalm 77:13,14.

(2) To the fact that God had redeemed his people by surprising manifestations of power, showing that he was faithful, and that he was able to deliver from the deepest distresses, <sup><1976></sup>Psalm 77:15-18.

(3) To the fact that the way of God was in the sea, or in great waters, and that we cannot expect to be able to comprehend him, <sup><1977></sup>Psalm 77:19.

(4) To the fact that God had led his flock in ancient times amid scenes of danger and of trial, <sup><1978></sup>Psalm 77:20.

By all this his mind was comforted, and his soul was made calm. God heard his prayer, and gave him peace.

Psalm 77:1. I cried unto God with my voice That is, he cried or prayed audibly. It was not mere mental prayer. See the notes at Psalm 3:4.

Even unto God with my voice. The repetition here is emphatic. The idea is that it was an earnest or fervent cry. Compare the notes at 2 Corinthians 12:8.

And he gave ear unto me See the notes at Psalm 5:1; 17:6.

Psalm 77:2. In the day of my trouble I sought the Lord Compare the notes at Psalm 50:15. This trouble may have been either mental or bodily; that is, it may have arisen from some form of disease, or it may have been that which sprang from difficulties in regard to the divine character, government, and dealings. That it “assumed” the latter form, even if it had its beginning in the former, is apparent from the following verses. Whether it was connected with any form of bodily disease must be determined by the proper interpretation of the next clause in this verse.

My sore ran in the night Margin, “My hand.” It is evident that our translators sup. posed that there was some bodily disease — some running sore — which was the cause of his trouble. Hence, they so rendered the Hebrew word. But it is now generally agreed that this is without authority. The Hebrew word is “hand” — dy<sup>ch3027</sup> — a word which is never used in the sense of sore or wound. The Septuagint renders it, “my hands are before him.” The Vulgate renders it in the same manner. Luther, “My hand is stretched out at night.” DeWette, “My hand is stretched out at night unwearied.” The word which is rendered in our version “ran” — rgae<sup>ch5064</sup> — means to “flow;” and, in Niphil, to be poured out, and then, “to be stretched out;” which is evidently its meaning here. The idea is, that his hand was stretched out in earnest supplication, and that this continued in the night when these troubles came most upon him. See Psalm 77:4,6. In his painful meditations in the night. watches — in thinking on God and his ways, as he lay upon his bed, he stretched out his hand in fervent prayer to God.

And ceased not The word used here — gllp<sup>ch6313</sup> — means properly to be cold; then, to be torpid, sluggish, slack. Here it means that the hand did not become weary; it did not fall from exhaustion; or, in other words, that he did not give over praying through weariness or exhaustion.

My soul refused to be comforted I resisted all the suggestions that came to my own mind, that might have comforted me. My heart was so melancholy and downcast; my spirits were so crushed; my mind was so dark; I had become so morbid, that I loved to cherish these thoughts. I chose to dwell on them. They had obtained possession of me, and I could not let them go. There was nothing that my own mind could suggest, there was nothing that occurred to me, that would relieve the difficulty or restore peace to my soul. These sad and gloomy thoughts filled all my soul, and left no room for thoughts of consolation and peace. A truly pious man may, therefore, get into a state of mind — a sad, dispirited, melancholy, morbid state — in which nothing that can be said to him, nothing that will occur to himself, will give him comfort and peace. Compare <sup><3815></sup>Jeremiah 31:15.

<sup><9718></sup>Psalm 77:3. I remembered God That is, I thought on God; I thought on his character, his government, and his dealings; I thought on the mysteries — the incomprehensible things — the apparently unequal, unjust, and partial doings — of his administration. It is evident from the whole tenor of the psalm that these were the things which occupied his attention. He dwelt on them until his whole soul became sad; until his spirit became so overwhelmed that he could not find words in which to utter his thoughts.

And was troubled The Septuagint renders this, ευφρανθη <sup><2165></sup> — I was rejoiced or delighted. So the Vulgate. Luther renders it, “When I am troubled, then I think on God.” Our translation, however, has probably given the true idea; and in that has expressed

- (a) what often occurs in the case of even a good man — that by dwelling on the dark and incomprehensible things of the divine administration, the soul becomes sad and troubled to an extent bordering on murmuring, complaint, and rebellion; and may also serve to illustrate
- (b) what often happens in the mind of a sinner — that he delights to dwell on these things in the divine administration:
  - (1) as most in accordance with what he desires to think about God, or with the views which he wishes to cherish of him; and
  - (2) as justifying himself in his rebellion against God, and his refusal to submit to him — for if God is unjust, partial, and severe, the sinner is right;

such a Being would be unworthy of trust and confidence; he ought to be opposed, and his claims ought to be resisted.

I complained Or rather, I “mused” or “meditated.” The word used here does not necessarily mean to complain. It is sometimes used in that sense, but its proper and common signification is to meditate. See <sup><18915></sup>Psalm 119:15,23,27,48,78,148.

And my spirit was overwhelmed With the result of my own reflections. That is, I was amazed or confounded by the thoughts that came in upon me.

<sup><19704></sup>Psalm 77:4. Thou holdest mine eyes waking literally, “Thou holdest the watchings of my eyes.” Gesenius (Lexicon) translates the Hebrew word rendered “waking,” “eyelids.” Probably that is the true idea. The eyelids are the watchers or guardians of the eyes. In danger, and in sleep, they close. Here the idea is, that God held them so that they did not close. He overcame the natural tendency of the eye to shut. In other words, the psalmist was kept awake; he could not sleep. This he traces to God. The idea is, that God so kept himself before his mind — that such ideas occurred to him in regard to God — that he could not sleep.

I am so troubled With sad and dark views of God; so troubled in endeavoring to understand his character and doings; in explaining his acts; in painful ideas that suggest themselves in regard to his justice, his goodness, his mercy.

That I cannot speak I am struck dumb. I know not what to say. I cannot find “anything” to say. He must have a heart singularly and happily free by nature from scepticism, or must have reflected little on the divine administration, who has not had thoughts pass through his mind like these. As the psalmist was a good man, a pious man, it is of importance to remark, in view of his experience, that such reflections occur not only to the minds of bad people — of the profane — of sceptics — of infidel philosophers, but they come unbidden into the minds of good people, and often in a form which they cannot calm down. He who has never had such thoughts, happy as he may and should deem himself that he has not had them, has never known some of the deepest stirrings and workings of the human soul on the subject of religion, and is little qualified to sympathize with a spirit torn, crushed, agitated, as was that of the psalmist on these questions, or as Augustine and thousands of others have been in after-times. But let not a man conclude, because he has these thoughts, that therefore he cannot be a friend of God — a converted man. The wicked man invites them, cherishes them, and rejoices that he can find what seem to him to be reasons for indulging in such thoughts against God; the good man is pained; struggles against them: endeavors to banish them from his soul.

<sup><4976></sup> Psalm 77:5. I have considered the days of old Rather, “I do consider;” that is, “I think upon.” This refers to his resolution in his perplexity and trouble; the method to which he resorted in examining the subject, and in endeavoring to allay his troubles. He resolved to look at the past. He asked what was the evidence which was furnished on the subject by the former dealings of God with himself and with mankind; what could be learned from those dealings in regard to the great and difficult questions which now so perplexed his mind.

The years of ancient times The records and remembrances of past ages. What is the testimony which the history of the world bears on this subject? Does it prove that God is worthy of confidence or not? Does it or does it not authorize and justify these painful thoughts which pass through the mind?

I commune with mine own heart I think over the matter. See the notes at ~~4:4~~ Psalm 4:4.

And my spirit made diligent search In reference

(a) to the grounds of my former support and comfort; and

(b) in reference to the whole matter as it lies before me now.

~~77:7~~ Psalm 77:7. Will the Lord cast off for ever? This was the subject, and the substance, of his inquiry: whether it was a fair and just conclusion that God would show no mercy; would never be gracious again. Evidently the thought passed through his mind that this seemed to be the character of God; that things looked as if this were so; that it was difficult, if not impossible, to understand the divine dealings otherwise; and he asks whether this was a fair conclusion; whether he must be constrained to believe that this was so.

And will he be favorable no more? Will he no more show favor to people? Will he pardon and save no more of the race of mankind?

~~77:8~~ Psalm 77:8. Is his mercy clean gone for ever? The word rendered “clean gone” means to fail; to fail utterly. The idea is, Can it be that the compassion of God has become exhausted — that no more mercy is to be shown to mankind — that henceforth all is to be left to stern and severe justice? What would the world be if this were so! What must be the condition of mankind if mercy were no more to be shown to the race!

Doth his promise fail for evermore? Margin, as in Hebrew, “to generation and generation.” The original Hebrew rendered “promise” means “word;” and the question is, whether it can be that what God has spoken is to be found false. Can we no longer rely on what he has said? All the hopes of mankind depend on that, and if that should fail, all prospect of salvation in regard to our race must be at an end.

~~77:9~~ Psalm 77:9. Hath God forgotten to be gracious? Has he passed over mercy in administering his government? Has he ceased to remember that man needs mercy? Has he forgotten that this is an attribute of his own nature?

Hath he in anger shut up his tender mercies? The original word here rendered “tender mercies” refers to the “bowels,” as the seat of compassion or mercy, in accordance with a usage common in Hebrew. See the notes at <sup><1271></sup>Psalm 25:6; <sup><2161></sup>Isaiah 16:11; 63:15. Compare <sup><1078></sup>Luke 1:78 (in Greek); <sup><1008></sup>Philippians 1:8; 2:1; <sup><1117></sup>1 John 3:17. We speak of the “heart” as the seat of affection and kindness. The Hebrews included the heart, but they used a more general word. The word rendered “shut up” means “closed;” and the question is whether his mercy was closed, or had ceased forever. The psalmist concludes that if this were done, it must be as the result of anger — anger in view of the sins of people.

<sup><1970></sup>Psalm 77:10. And I said, This is my infirmity The meaning of this phrase is not, as would appear from our translation, that his reflections on the subject were to be traced to his weakness, or were a proof of weakness of mind, but that the subject overpowered him. This verse has been very variously rendered. The Septuagint and the Vulgate translate it, “And I said, now I begin; this is a change of the right hand of the Most High,” with what meaning it is difficult to see. Luther renders it, “But yet I said, I must suffer this; the right hand of the Most High can change all;” a beautiful sentiment, but probably not the idea in the original. The Hebrew means, “This makes me sick;” that is, “This distresses me; it afflicts me; it overwhelms me. Such reflections prostrate me, and I cannot bear up under them. I “must” seek relief. I “must” find it somewhere. I “must” take some view of this matter which will save me from these dreadful thoughts that overpower and crush the soul.” Any deep mental emotion may have this effect, and it is not strange that such a result should be produced by the momentous thoughts suggested by religion, as it sometimes attends even the manifestation of the divine mercy to the soul. Compare the notes at <sup><2708></sup>Daniel 10:8,9. The course of thought which the psalmist pursued, and in which he found relief, is stated in the following verses. It consisted of an attempt to obtain, from the remembrance of the divine administration in past times, views of God which would lead to confidence in him. The views thus obtained, as will be seen, were two-fold:

- (a) That, as far as his dealings could be understood, God was worthy of confidence; and
- (b) That in the ways of God there are, and must be, many things which man cannot comprehend.

But I will remember the years of the right hand of the Most High That is, the years when God displayed his power; when he reached out his right hand; when he manifested his true character; when there was a proper exhibition to the world of what he is, and of the true principles of his administration. The words “But I will remember” are not in the original, though, as they occur in the following verse, they are not improperly supplied by the translators. The original, however, is more striking and emphatic: “This makes me sick! The years of the right hand of the Most High!” The history of those years occurred to his mind. They rose to his view suddenly in his sorrow. They came before him in such a form and manner that he felt they should be inquired into. Their history should be examined. In that history — in those remembered years — “relief” might be found. It was natural to look there for relief. He instinctively turned, therefore, to examine the records of those years, and to inquire what testimony they bore in regard to God; what there might be in them that would give relief to a troubled heart.

Psalm 77:11. I will remember the works of the LORD That is, I will call them to remembrance, or I will reflect on them. I will look to what God has “done,” that I may learn his true character, or that I may see what is the proper interpretation to be put on his doings in respect to the question whether he is righteous or not; whether it is proper to put confidence in him or not. Or, in other words, I will examine those doings to see if I cannot find in them something to calm down my feelings; to remove my despondency; and to give me cheerful views of God.

Surely I will remember thy wonders of old Thy wonderful dealings with mankind; those acts which thou hast performed which are suited to excite amazement and wonder.

Psalm 77:12. I will meditate also of all thy work That is, with a view to learn thy real character; to see whether I am to be constrained by painful facts to cherish the thoughts which have given me such trouble, or whether I may not find reasons for cherishing more cheerful views of God.

And talk of thy doings Or rather, “I will muse on thy doings” — for so the Hebrew word signifies. It is not conversation with others to which he refers; it is meditation — musing — calm contemplation — thoughtful meditation. He designed to reflect on the doings of God, and to ask what was the proper interpretation to be put on them in regard to his character. Thus we must, and may, judge of God, as we judge of our fellow-men. We may, we must, inquire what is the proper interpretation to be put on the events which occur under his administration, and form our opinions accordingly. The result of the psalmist's reflections is stated in the following verses.

<1971> Psalm 77:13. Thy way, O God, is in the sanctuary Luther renders this, "O God, thy way is holy." Prof. Alexander, "O God, in holiness is thy way." DeWette, "O God, holy is thy way." The word rendered "sanctuary" — vdqo <sup><1694></sup> — means properly "holiness." It is not the same word which in <1937> Psalm 73:17 is rendered "sanctuary" — vDqjmi <sup>th4720</sup>. The word here employed, however, may mean a holy place, a sanctuary, as the tabernacle (<1024> Exodus 28:43; 29:30), or the temple (<1108> 1 Kings 8:8; <1437> 2 Chronicles 29:7). In this passage the word is ambiguous. It means either that the way of God is holy, or in holiness; or, that it is in the sanctuary, or holy place. If the former, it is a statement of the result to which the psalmist came in regard to the divine character, from a contemplation of his doings. If the latter, it means that the way of God — the true principles of the divine administration — are to be learned in the place where he is worshipped, and from the principles which are there set forth. Compare the notes at <1937> Psalm 73:17. It seems to me that the former is the correct interpretation, as it accords better with the scope of the passage.

Who is so great a God as our God! In greatness no one can be compared with him. He is supreme over all. This is the first reflection of the psalmist in regard to God — that he is great; that he is superior to all other beings; that no one can be compared with him. The evident inference from this in the mind of the psalmist, as bearing on the subject of his inquiry, is, that it is to be expected that there will be things in his administration which man cannot hope to understand; that a rash and sudden judgment should not be formed in regard to him from his doings; that people should wait for the developments of his plans; that he should not be condemned because there are things which we cannot comprehend, or which seem to be inconsistent with goodness. This is a consideration which ought always to influence us in our views of God and his government.

<1974> Psalm 77:14. Thou art the God that doest wonders It is, it must be, the characteristic of God, the true God, to do wonderful things; things which are suited to produce amazement, and which we can little hope to be able to understand. Our judgment of God, therefore, should not be hasty and rash, but calm and deliberate.

Thou hast declared thy strength among the people Thou hast manifested thy greatness in thy dealings with the people. The word “people” here refers not especially to the Hebrew people, but to the nations — the people of the world at large. On a wide scale, and among all nations, God had done that which was suited to excite wonder, and which people were little qualified as yet to comprehend. No one can judge aright of what another has done unless he can take in the whole subject, and see it as he does who performs the act — unless he understands all the causes, the motives, the results near and remote — unless he sees the necessity of the act — unless he sees what would have been the consequences if it had not been done, for in that which is unknown to us, and which lies beyond the range of our vision, there may be full and sufficient reasons for what has been done, and an explanation may be found there which would remove all the difficulty.

The sons of Jacob and Joseph The descendants of Jacob and Joseph. Jacob is mentioned because he was the ancestor of the twelve tribes; Joseph, because he was conspicuous or eminent among the sons of Jacob, and particularly because he acted so important a part in the affairs of Egypt, from whose dominion they were redeemed.

They were afraid On the word used here — Uj <sup><12342></sup> — see the notes at <sup><9115></sup>Psalm 10:5; 55:4. It may mean here to tremble or quake, as in pain (<sup><1125></sup>Deuteronomy 2:25; <sup><2116></sup>Joel 2:6).— Alarm, distress, anguish, came over the waters at the presence of God; and they trembled, and fled.

The depths also were troubled The deep waters, or the waters “in” the depths. It was not a ripple on the surface; but the very depths — the usually calm and undisturbed waters that lie below the surface — were heaved into commotion at the divine presence.

Psalm 77:17. The clouds poured out water Margin, “The clouds were poured forth with water.” The translation in the text is the more correct. This is a description of a storm; but to what particular storm in history does not appear. It was evidently some exhibition of the divine greatness and power in delivering the children of Israel, and may have referred to the extraordinary manifestation of God at Mount Sinai, amidst lightnings, and thunders, and tempests. <sup><1796></sup>Exodus 19:16. For a general description of a storm, as illustrating this passage, see the notes at <sup><1835></sup>Job 36:26-33; 37:1-5; and Psalm 29.

The skies sent out a sound The voice of thunder, which seems to come from the sky.

Thine arrows also The lightnings — compared with burning or ignited arrows. Such arrows were anciently used in war. They were bound round with rags, and dipped in some combustible substance — as turpentine — and shot into houses, grain-fields, haystacks, or towns, for the purpose of setting them on fire. It was not unnatural to compare the rapid lightnings with such blazing arrows.

Went abroad They moved rapidly in all directions.

Psalm 77:18. The voice of thy thunder was in the heaven Compare the notes at Psalm 29. The word rendered “heaven” here — למִצְפֹּת <sup><1534></sup> — means properly “a wheel,” as of a chariot, <sup><2153></sup>Isaiah 5:28; <sup><2502></sup>Ezekiel 10:2,6; 23:24; 26:10. Then it means a “whirlwind,” as that which rolls along, <sup><2603></sup>Ezekiel 10:13. Then it is used to denote chaff or stubble, as driven along before a whirlwind, <sup><4833></sup>Psalm 83:13; <sup><2173></sup>Isaiah 17:13. It is never used to denote heaven. It means here, undoubtedly, the whirlwind; and the idea is, that in the ragings of the storm, or of the whirlwind, the voice of God was heard — the deep bellowing thunder — as if God spoke to people.

The lightnings lightened the world The whole earth seemed to be in a blaze.

The earth trembled and shook See the notes at Psalm 29.

Psalm 77:19. Thy way is in the sea Probably the literal meaning here is, that God had shown his power and faithfulness in the sea (that is, the Red Sea), in delivering his people; it was there that his true character was seen, as possessing almighty power, and as being able to deliver his people. But this seems to have suggested, also, another idea — that the ways of God, in his providential dealings, were like walking through the sea, where no permanent track would be made, where the waves would close on the path, and where it would be impossible by any footprints to ascertain the way which he had taken. So in regard to his doings and his plans. There is nothing by which man can determine in regard to them. There are no traces by which he can follow out the divine designs — as none can follow one whose path is through the trackless waters. The subject is beyond man's reach, and there should be no rash or harsh judgment of the Almighty.

And thy path in the great waters The additional idea here may be, that the ways or plans of God are vast — like the ocean. Even in shallow waters, when one wades through them, the path closes at once, and the way cannot be traced; but God's goings are like those of one who should move through the great ocean — over a boundless sea — where none could hope to follow him.

And thy footsteps are not known The word rendered “footsteps” means properly the print made by the “heel,” and the print made by the foot. The idea here is, that there are no traces in regard to many of the dealings of God, which appear most incomprehensible to us, and which trouble us most, as there can be no footprints left in the waters. We should not venture, therefore, to sit in judgment on the doings of God, or presume that we can understand them.

Psalm 77:20. Thou leddest thy people like a flock by the hand of Moses and Aaron This satisfied and comforted the mind of the psalmist. God had never forsaken his people. He had shown himself faithful in his dealings with them. He had acted the part of a good shepherd. In all the dangers of their way; in their perilous journey through the wilderness; amidst foes, privations, and troubles — rocks, sands, storms, tempests — when surrounded by enemies, and when their camp was infested with poisonous serpents — God had shown himself able to protect his people, and had been faithful to all his promises and covenant-engagements. Looking back to this period of their history, the psalmist saw that there was abundant reason for confiding in God, and that the mind should repose on him calmly amid all that was dark and mysterious in his dealings. In view of the past, the mind ought to be calm; encouraged by the past, however incomprehensible may be God's doings, people may come to him, and entrust all their interests to him with the confident assurance that their salvation will be secure, and that all which seems dark and mysterious in the dealings of God will yet be made clear.

APPENDIX NOTES ON PSALM 77

Expositors differ widely on the occasion of the psalm, and the time to which it is to be referred. Dr. Binnie refers it to the eve of the captivity.

“Psalm 77 — another ‘psalm of Asaph’ — may with all confidence be likewise referred to the eve of the captivity. From the way in which the psalmist gathers comfort by the recollection of the past, ‘the days of old, the years of ancient times,’ ‘the years of the right hand of the Most High,’ it is sufficiently plain that his sorrow, the ‘sore which ran in the night and ceased not,’ was not private grief, but flowed from his sympathy with the calamity of Zion. It is pleasant to note here also the continued working of the brotherly love lately rekindled between Israel and Judah. Joseph participated in the redemption from Egypt, and the psalmist calls that fact to mind, that he may comfort himself with the hope that the children of Joseph will be remembered when the Lord shall turn the captivity of his people. ‘Thou art the God that doest wonders: thou hast declared thy strength among the ‘peoples.’ Thou hast with thine arm redeemed thy people, the sons of Jacob and Joseph.’”

(Close of the psalm.) There is a day coming when we shall, with Christ our head, sing of the church’s safe guidance to her rest, in such strains as these, remembering how often by the way we were ready to ask, “Has God forgotten to be gracious?” We are taught by the harp of Asaph in moments of despondency, to “remember the days of old,” and assure ourselves that the God of Israel liveth — the God of the passover night, the God of the Red Sea, the God of the pillar-cloud, the God of Sinai, the God of the wilderness, the God of Jordan — the God, too, we may add, of Calvary, and the God of Bethany, who shall lead us as he led Israel, even when earth shakes again, until that day when he comes to cast some light on “his way that was in the sea, and his paths that were in the great waters, and his footsteps” that were a mystery. Asaph has been the instrument of the Holy Spirit to cheer us here, by bidding us look on this picture of the righteous One under the cloud recalling to mind the Lord’s forester doings. — Bonar.

NOTES ON PSALM 78

This is one of the psalms ascribed to Asaph. See Introduction to Psalm 73. If, as is likely, it was composed at a later period than the time of David, the word “Asaph” must be taken as a general term denoting the successor in the family off Asaph, who presided over the music the sanctuary. On the word “Maschil” in the title, see the notes at the title to Psalm 32.

The time when the psalm was composed cannot now be ascertained with any certainty. It was evidently written, however, after the revolt of the ten tribes, and the establishment of the sovereignty in the tribe of Judah; that is, after the time of David and Solomon. This is apparent from ~~1978D~~ Psalm 78:9,67, where “Ephraim,” the chief of the ten tribes, is referred to in distinction from “Judah.”

The design of the psalm is, evidently, to vindicate the fact that Ephraim had been rejected, and that Judah had been chosen to be the head of the nation. The reason of this was found in the conduct of Ephraim, or the ten tribes, in revolting from God, and in forgetting the divine mercy and compassion shown to the Hebrew people in former days. See ~~1978D~~ Psalm 78:9-11,67,68.

The argument in the psalm is the following:

- I. A call on all the people, addressed to them by the king or the ruler, to attend to the instructions of former times — the lessons which it was of importance to transmit to future generations, ~~1978D~~ Psalm 78:1-4.
- II. God had established a general law which he had designed for all the people, or which he intended should be the law of the nation as such — that all the people might set their hope in God, or be worshippers of Him as the only true God, and that they might all be one people, ~~1978E~~ Psalm 78:5-8.
- III. Ephraim — the most powerful of the ten tribes, and their head and representative — had been guilty of disregarding that law, and had refused to come to the common defense of the nation, ~~1978D~~ Psalm 78:9-11.
- IV. The wickedness of this rebellion is shown by the great favors which, in its former history, God had shown to the nation as such, including these very tribes, ~~1978D~~ Psalm 78:12-66.

V. The reason is stated, founded on their apostasy, why God had rejected Ephraim, and why he had chosen Judah, and made Zion the capital of the nation, instead of selecting a place within the limits of the tribe of Ephraim for that purpose, <sup><1987></sup>Psalm 78:67,68.

VI. The fact is declared that David had been chosen to rule over the people; that he had been taken from humble life, and made the ruler of the nation, and that the line of the sovereignty had been settled in him, <sup><1989></sup>Psalm 78:69-72.

<sup><1981></sup>Psalm 78:1. Give ear, O my people This is not an address of God, but an address of the king or ruler of the people, calling their attention to an important subject; to wit, his right to rule over them, or showing why the power had been vested in him.

To my law The word law here seems to mean what he would say, as if what he should choose to say would have the force and authority of law. What follows is not exactly law in the sense that it was a rule to be obeyed; but it is something that is authoritatively said, and should have the force of law.

Incline your ears ... Be attentive. What is to be said is worthy of your particular regard. Compare the notes at <sup><1988></sup>Psalm 5:1.

<sup><1982></sup>Psalm 78:2. I will open my mouth in a parable See the notes at <sup><1984></sup>Psalm 49:4. The word “parable” here means a statement by analogy or comparison; that is, he would bring out what he had to say by a course of reasoning founded on an analogy drawn from the ancient history of the people.

I will utter dark sayings of old Of ancient times; that is, maxims, or sententious thoughts, which had come down from past times, and which embodied the results of ancient observation and reflection. Compare <sup><1984></sup>Psalm 49:4, where the word rendered “dark sayings” is explained. He would bring out, and apply, to the present case, the maxims of ancient wisdom.

<sup><1983></sup>Psalm 78:3. Which we have heard and known Which have been communicated to us as certain truth.

And our fathers have told us That is, we have heard and known them by their telling us; or, this is the means by which we have known them. They have come down to us by tradition from ancient times.

Psalm 78:4. We will not hide them from their children From their descendants, however remote. We of this generation will be faithful in handing down these truths to future times. We stand between past generations and the generations to come. We are entrusted by those who have gone before us with great and important truths; truths to be preserved and transmitted in their purity to future ages. That trust committed to us we will faithfully discharge. These truths shall not suffer in passing from us to them. They shall not be stayed in their progress; they shall not be corrupted or impaired. This is the duty of each successive generation in the world, receiving, as a trust, from past generations, the result of their thoughts, their experience, their wisdom, their inventions, their arts, their sciences, and the records of their doings, to hand these down unimpaired to future ages, combined with all that they may themselves invent or discover which may be of use or advantage to the generations following.

Shewing to the generation to come the praises of the Lord The “reasons” why he should be praised, as resulting from his past doings — and the ways in which it should be done. We will keep up, and transmit to future times, the pure institutions of religion.

And his strength The records of his power.

And his wonderful works that he hath done In the history of his people, and in his many and varied interpositions in their behalf.

Psalm 78:5. For he established a testimony in Jacob He ordained or appointed that which would be for a “witness” for him; that which would bear testimony to his character and perfections; that which would serve to remind them of what he was, and of his authority over them. Any law or ordinance of God is thus a standing and permanent witness in regard to his character as showing what he is.

And appointed a law in Israel That is, He gave law to Israel, or to the Hebrew people. Their laws were not human enactments, but were the appointments of God.

Which he commanded our fathers ... He made it a law of the land that these testimonies should be preserved and faithfully transmitted to future times. See <sup><R04></sup>Deuteronomy 4:9; 6:7; 11:19. They were not given for themselves only, but for the benefit of distant generations also.

<sup><R16></sup>Psalm 78:6. That the generation to come might know them ... That people in future times might enjoy the benefit of them as their fathers had done, and that they should then send them forward to those who were to succeed them.

Who should arise and declare them to their children Who, as they appeared on the stage of life, should receive the trust, and send it onward to future ages. Thus the world makes progress; thus one age starts where the previous one left off; thus it enters on its own career with the advantage of all the toils, the sacrifices, the happy thoughts, the inventions of all past times. It is designed that the world shall thus grow wiser and better as it advances; and that future generations shall be enriched with all that was worth preserving in the experience of the past. See the notes at <sup><R18></sup>Psalm 71:18.

<sup><R17></sup>Psalm 78:7. That they might set their hope in God That they might place confidence in God; that they might maintain their allegiance to him. The object was to give such exhibitions of his character and government as to inspire just confidence in him, or to lead people to trust in him; and not to trust in idols and false gods. All the laws which God has ordained are such as are suited to inspire confidence in him as a just and righteous ruler; and all his dealings with mankind, when they are properly — that is, “really” — understood, will be found to be adapted to the same end.

And not forget the works of God His doings. The word here does not refer to his “works” considered as the works of creation, or the material universe, but to his acts — to what he has done in administering his government over mankind.

But keep his commandments That by contemplating his doings, by understanding the design of his administration, they might be led to keep his commandments. The purpose was that they might see such wisdom, justice, equity, and goodness in his administration, that they would be led to keep laws so suited to promote the welfare of mankind. If people saw all the reasons of the divine dealings, or fully understood them, nothing more would be necessary to secure universal confidence in God and in his government.

Psalm 78:8. And might not be as their fathers Their ancestors, particularly in the wilderness, as they passed through it to the promised land. See <sup><1317></sup>Exodus 32:7-9; 33:3; 34:9; <sup><4051></sup>Acts 7:51-53.

A stubborn and rebellious generation Stiff-necked, ungovernable; inclined to revolt. Nothing was more remarkable in their early history than this.

A generation that set not their heart aright Margin, as in Hebrew, “prepared not their heart.” That is, they took no pains to keep their heart aright, or to cherish right feelings toward God. They yielded to any sudden impulse of passion, even when it led them to revolt against God. This is as true of sinners now as it was of them, that they “take no pains” to have their hearts right with God. If they did, there would be no difficulty in doing it. It is not with them “an object of desire” to have their hearts right with God, and hence, nothing is more easy or natural than that they should rebel and go astray.

And whose spirit was not steadfast with God That is, they themselves did not maintain a firm trust in God. They yielded readily to every impulse, and every passion, even when it tended to draw them away wholly from him. There was no such “strength” of attachment to him as would lead them to resist temptation, and they easily fell into the sin of idolatry.

Psalm 78:9. The children of Ephraim The sons of Ephraim; that is, the descendants of Ephraim; the tribe of Ephraim. Ephraim was one of the “largest” of the tribes of Israel, and was the “chief” tribe in the rebellion, and hence, the term is often used to denote the “ten” tribes, or the kingdom of Israel, in contradistinction from that of Judah. See <sup><2300></sup>Isaiah 7:2,5,8,9,17; 11:13; 28:1. The word is evidently used in this sense here, not as denoting that one tribe only, but that tribe as the head of the revolted kingdom; or, in other words, the name is used as representing the kingdom of that name after the revolt. See 1 Kings 12. This verse evidently contains the gist or the main idea of the psalm — to wit, that Ephraim, or the ten tribes, had turned away from the worship of the true God, and that, in consequence of that apostasy, the government had been transferred to another tribe — the tribe of Judah. See <sup><1985></sup>Psalm 78:67,68.

Being armed The idea in this phrase is, that they had abundant means for maintaining their independence in connection with the other tribes, or as a part of the nation, but that they refused to cooperate with their brethren.

And carrying bows Margin, “throwing forth.” Literally, “lifting up.” The idea is, that they were armed with bows; or, that they were fully armed.

Turned back in the day of battle That is, they did not stand by their brethren, or assist them in defending their country. There is probably no reference here to any particular battle, but the idea is, that in the wars of the nation — in those wars which were waged for national purposes — they refused to join with the tribes of Judah and Benjamin in defense of the lawful government.

Psalm 78:10. They kept not the covenant of God The covenant which God had made with the entire Hebrew people. They did not maintain their allegiance to Yahweh. Compare Deuteronomy 4:13,23; 17:2.

And refused to walk in his law Refused to obey his law. They rebelled against him.

Psalm 78:11. And forgat his works The works which he had performed in behalf of the nation. These works are referred to in the verses following.

And his wonders that he had shewed them The wonderful works in Egypt, at the Red Sea, and in the wilderness; the miracles which he had performed on behalf of the nation.

Psalm 78:12. Marvellous things did he in the sight of their fathers Things suited to excite wonder and astonishment. Such were all the miracles that he performed, in effecting the deliverance of his people.

In the land of Egypt In delivering them from Pharaoh.

In the field of Zoan The Septuagint renders this εν πεδιω Ταννεως — “in the plain of Tanis.” So the Latin Vulgate. Zoan or Tanis was an ancient city of Lower Egypt, situated on the eastern side of the Tanitic arm of the Nile. The name given to it in the Egyptian language signified “low region.” See the notes at Isaiah 19:11. The Hebrews seem to have been located in this region, and it was in this part of Egypt — that is, in the country lying round about Zoan — that the wonders of God were principally manifested in behalf of his people.

Psalm 78:13. He divided the sea ... The Red Sea. Exodus 14:21,22.

And he made the waters to stand as an heap The word rendered “heap” means anything piled up, or a mound; and the idea is, that the waters were piled up on each side of them as a “mound.” See the notes at <sup><49317></sup>Psalm 33:7. Compare <sup><49313></sup>Joshua 3:13,16; <sup><49158></sup>Exodus 15:8.

<sup><49784></sup>Psalm 78:14. In the day-time also he led them with a cloud That is, the cloud was the visible symbol of his presence, and its movements determined the way in which they were to go. It was “God” who led them, and who adopted this manner of doing it, so that they had “always” with them, by day and by night, a “visible” proof of his presence. There was that with them which could not be ascribed to any natural causes, and which, therefore, “demonstrated” that God was with them, and that as long as they followed the cloud and the pillar of fire they could not err. See <sup><49121></sup>Exodus 13:21; 14:24. They had the less excuse, therefore, for rebelling against him.

And all the night with a light of fire A column — a pillar — which stood over the camp, and which was a symbol of the divine presence and guidance. The cloud would not be visible by night, nor would the fire be a good guide by day; and hence, the form of the symbol was changed. The same thing, however, was intended by both, and together they were standing proofs of the presence of God.

<sup><49785></sup>Psalm 78:15. He clave the rocks in the wilderness There were two occasions on which the rock was smitten for water; one (<sup><49176></sup>Exodus 17:6) at Mount Horeb, shortly after they came out of Egypt; and the other (<sup><49211></sup>Numbers 20:11), when they had nearly ceased their wanderings in the wilderness. Hence, the plural term (rocks) is used here.

And gave them drink as out of the great depths As if he had formed a lake or an ocean, furnishing an inexhaustible supply.

<sup><49787></sup>Psalm 78:17. And they sinned yet more against him literally, “They added to sin against him.” The idea is, that his mercies, and the proofs of his presence were only made the occasion of greater sin on their part. This may have been in two ways;

(1) their sin was thus more aggravated, as being committed against greater light; and

(2) they evinced more and more their depravity, in proportion as he bestowed mercies on them — not an uncommon thing with people.

By provoking the Most High literally, “embittering.” They rebelled against him. They refused to submit to him. They forgot his mercies. Compare <sup><812></sup>Deuteronomy 9:22.

In the wilderness literally, “in the dry place;” in the desert. In the very place where they were most manifestly dependent on him — where there were no natural streams of water — where their needs were met by a miraculous supply — even there did they provoke him, and rebel against him. If he had simply stopped that miraculous supply of water they must have perished. But sinners forget how dependent they are on God, when they sin against him. On what can they rely, if he withdraws from them, and leaves them to themselves?

The heart was the source of the evil. They were not satisfied with what he gave them. They asked for that which would be more agreeable to them, and they did it with a complaining and a murmuring spirit. It is not wrong in itself to ask of God that which will be better than what we now possess, for that is the object of all our prayers; but this may be done from a wrong motive — for mere self-gratification, as was the case here; or it may be with a complaining and dissatisfied spirit, such as was evinced on this occasion. In such a case we cannot expect the prayer to be answered “except as a punishment.”

By asking meat for their lust Food. The word “meat” here does not necessarily denote animal food, as it does with us. They asked another kind of food than manna; and they did it, not because this was “necessary” to sustain life, but in order to gratify their appetites. The original word here, however, is not “lusts,” but “souls;” that is, “they asked food for themselves.”

Psalm 78:19. Yea, they spake against God That is, in the manner which is immediately specified — by calling in question his power, or his ability to provide for them in the wilderness. See Numbers 11:4.

They said, Can God furnish a table in the wilderness? In the desert. The word rendered “furnish” is in the margin “order.” It means to arrange; to set in order; and here to arrange and provide for, as at a feast. The precise words used by the complaining Hebrews are not quoted here, but the substance of what they said is retained. The idea is, that what they spake was “equivalent” to saying that God could not prepare a table for them; that is, provide for them, in the desert.

Psalm 78:20. Behold, he smote the rock ... See the notes at Psalm 78:15. The smiting of the rock the first time occurred “before” the complaining about the food. The fact that the rock had been smitten could not be doubted. They had thus had abundant evidence that God was able to do that, and to furnish “water” for them in the desert. It was unreasonable, therefore, to doubt whether he could provide “food” for them — for this in itself was no more difficult than to furnish water. Yet they are represented as affirming that this was far more difficult, and that, although it was admitted that God had provided “water,” yet that to provide “food” was wholly beyond his power. Their special sin, therefore, was, that they doubted the power of God in one case, when, in another, equally difficult, they had had abundant proof of it. The spirit of complaining had not been put down by one surprising and undoubted miracle performed in their behalf — a miracle which proved that God had all the power necessary to meet their needs.

Can he give bread also? Does the ability to cause water to flow from a rock prove that there is also ability to produce bread when necessary? They doubted it, and thus complained against God.

Can he provide flesh for his people? They supposed that this required greater power than the providing of water, or even of bread, and that if it were admitted that God could furnish the two former, it would by no means follow that he could provide the latter. It was this, as the next verse shows, which was the immediate occasion of the special anger of the Lord.

Psalm 78:21. Therefore the Lord heard this, and was wroth See Numbers 11:1,10.

So a fire was kindled against Jacob ... Fire may be used here, as in <sup><0410></sup>Numbers 11:1, as an emblem of wrath; a fire may have been literally sent down to consume them.

<sup><0782></sup>Psalm 78:22. Because they believed not in God They did not believe in his power, or in his promises.

And trusted not in his salvation In his power and his willingness to save. They had had abundant evidence of that power, but they still doubted his ability to save them, notwithstanding all that he had done for them.

<sup><0782></sup>Psalm 78:23. Though he had commanded the clouds from above Though he had showed that he had absolute control over the clouds, and had only to command them and they would furnish rain in abundance. Compare the notes at <sup><2316></sup>Isaiah 5:6.

And opened the doors of heaven As he had done at the deluge, <sup><0071></sup>Genesis 7:11. The idea is, that he had rained down manna upon them in such abundance that it might be compared with the waters that had been sent down at the deluge.

And had given them of the corn of heaven Food that seemed to come down from heaven. The reference here is to the manna, and it is called corn in the sense that it was food, or that it supplied the place of grain. It may also have been called corn from its resemblance to grain. See <sup><0261></sup>Exodus 16:31.

<sup><0782></sup>Psalm 78:25. Man did eat angels' food Food that came from heaven; food so directly and manifestly from heaven that it might be supposed to be the same kind that was eaten there, and that had now been sent down by a special miracle for man; food so delicate and so free from the ordinary coarse properties of food, that it might be supposed to be such as angels feed on. The word rendered "angels" — ryBaa <sup><147></sup> — means properly "strong, mighty," and may be applied to people in general, <sup><0152></sup>Judges 5:22; <sup><0015></sup>Lamentations 1:15; <sup><2465></sup>Jeremiah 46:15; to animals, <sup><0213></sup>Psalm 22:13 ("bulls of Bashan"); to princes, <sup><0681></sup>Psalm 68:31; or to nobles, <sup><0322></sup>Job 24:22. It might be rendered here food of nobles, or princes; that is, food of richer quality, or of a more delicate nature, than common food; such as nobles or princes have on their tables. The immediate connection, however, would rather seem to demand the rendering in our version, as the food is said to have come down from heaven. It is rendered food of angels in the Septuagint, in the Latin Vulgate, in the ancient versions generally, and also by Luther. DeWette renders it, “Each one ate the food of princes;” that is, they all lived like princes.

He sent them meat to the full Food to satisfy; or, as much as they wanted.

Psalm 78:26. He caused an east wind to blow in the heaven See Numbers 11:31. In the history, the quarter from which the wind came is not mentioned, except as it might be indicated by the statement that the “quails were brought from the sea;” — that is, evidently, the Red Sea. This wind would have come from the southeast. The phrase “in the heaven” means in the air, or from above.

And by his power ... By his direct agency. It was a wind which he caused to blow for the purpose; a miracle.

Psalm 78:27. He rained flesh also upon them as dust The flesh of quails, Numbers 11:31. The word “rained” means that they seemed to come upon them like a copious shower. The word dust denotes their great abundance.

And feathered fowls Margin, as in Hebrew, “fowl of wing.” This is a poetic expression, designed to give beauty to the description by the image of their fluttering wings.

Like as the sand of the sea An expression also designed to denote their great numbers, Genesis 22:17; 32:12; 41:49; Joshua 11:4; 1 Samuel 13:5; Revelation 20:8.

Psalm 78:28. And he let it fall in the midst of their camp ... It was brought to their very doors; they had not to go and seek it abroad.

Psalm 78:29. So they did eat, and were well filled The word rendered “well” here is intensive. It means that they were abundantly satisfied; that there was no lack; that they had the most ample supply.

For he gave them their own desire He gave them exactly what they asked. He gave them flesh to eat as they had demanded; and he gave it to them in such quantities that no one could say that he had not enough.

<sup><9783></sup>Psalm 78:30. They were not estranged from their lust literally, “They were not made strangers to;” that is, in regard to their lusts or desires they were not in the condition of “foreigners” or aliens; they were not separated from them. The word “lusts” here means “desires, wishes.” It is not used here in the restricted sense in which it is now with us. The reference is to their desire for food different from manna — for flesh; and the idea is, that they did not restrain their intense desire even when it should have been fully satisfied. They indulged to excess, and the consequence was that many of them perished.

But while their meat was yet in their mouths Even while they were eating, and were indulging in this unrestrained manner.

And slew the fattest of them literally, “slew among their fat ones.” That is, The most vigorous among them were cut down; the people most eminent for rank, for influence, for strength, for valor. How far this was the natural effect of indulgence in eating, and how far it was a direct miracle, cannot now be ascertained. In either case it would equally show the divine displeasure.

And smote down Margin, as in Hebrew, “made to bow.” That is, they were made to bow in death.

The chosen men of Israel Margin, “Young men.” The idea is that of select men; men that would be chosen from among the others; men distinguished for vigor or influence. Not the aged or the feeble particularly, not those who might be naturally expected to fall, but men of strength who might be supposed to be capable of resisting the ordinary attacks of disease. God showed in this way that the judgment came directly from his hand.

<sup><9782></sup>Psalm 78:32. For all this they sinned still Even this did not reclaim them, and prevent their sinning. Heavy judgments do not always restrain men from sin. Not unfrequently they take occasion from such judgments to sin the more.

And believed not for his wondrous works They did not trust in His wondrous works; or, those works did not have the effect of producing faith. See <sup><1982></sup>Psalm 78:22,23. The same thing occurred in the life of the Saviour. <sup><3125></sup>John 12:37.

<sup><1983></sup>Psalm 78:33. Therefore their days did he consume in vanity He suffered them to spend their days — the days of that entire generation — in vain and fruitless wanderings in the desert. Instead of leading them at once to the promised land, they were kept there to wear out their life in tedious monotony, accomplishing nothing — wandering from place to place — until all the generation that had come out of Egypt had died.

And their years in trouble literally, “in terror.” Amidst the troubles, the alarms, the terrors of a vast and frightful desert. Sin — rebellion against God — leads to a course of life, and a death, of which these gloomy, sad, and cheerless wanderings in the desert were a striking emblem.

<sup><1984></sup>Psalm 78:34. When he slew them When he came forth in his wrath and cut them down by the plague, by fiery serpents, or by their enemies.

Then they sought him Their calamities had the effect of producing temporary reformation. They became professedly penitent; they manifested a wish to know God, and expressed a purpose to serve him. It was, however, a temporary and hollow, not a deep and real reformation. This often occurs. In times of affliction, in sickness, in bereavement, in the loss of property, people become serious, and express a purpose to repent and turn to God. A deep impression seems to be produced on their minds, to last, alas! only as long as the hand of God rests upon them. Resolutions of repentance are formed only to be forgotten when the affliction is removed, and when the days of prosperity again return.

And they returned and inquired early after God The word rendered “inquired early” has reference to the first rays of the morning — the aurora — the dawn. Then it comes to denote the beginning of anything; or, the first thing. Thus employed, it may refer to the act of seeking God as the first thing; in youth; in the morning; at the commencement of any enterprise or undertaking. See <sup><1187></sup>Proverbs 8:17; 1:28. Here it means that, in their affliction, they did not delay to seek God, but expressed an early intention of serving him. They evinced a prompt purpose to break off their sins, and to return to him.

Psalm 78:35. And they remembered that God was their Rock See Deuteronomy 32:4,15,31. Compare the notes at Psalm 18:2. That is, they were brought to reflect that their only security and defense was God. They were made to feel that they could not rely on themselves, or on any human power, and that their only trust was in God.

And the high God their Redeemer The God who is exalted over all; the true and living God. The truth was brought to their recollection that it was He who had delivered them from bondage in Egypt, and who had brought them out into freedom. On the word “Redeemer,” see the notes at Isaiah 41:14. Compare Isaiah 43:14; 44:6,24; 47:4; 59:20; Psalm 25:22; Job 5:20.

Psalm 78:36. Nevertheless they did flatter him with their mouth The word rendered “flatter” means properly “to open;” and hence, “to be open; to be ingenious or frank;” and then, to be easily persuaded, to be deluded, to be beguiled; and hence, also, in an active form, to persuade, to entice, to seduce, to beguile, to delude. The meaning here is, that they attempted to deceive by their professions, or that their professions were false and hollow. Those professions were the mere result of affliction. They were based on no principle; there was no true love or confidence at the foundation. Such professions or promises are often made in affliction. Under the pressure of heavy judgments, the loss of property, the loss of friends, or the failure of health, people become serious, and resolve to give attention to religion. It is rarely that such purposes are founded in sincerity, and that the conversions apparently resulting from them are true conversions. The Septuagint and the Latin Vulgate render the phrase here, “They loved with their mouth.”

And they lied unto him with their tongues They made promises which they did not keep.

Psalm 78:37. For their heart was not right with him Luther renders this, “Not fast with him.” The Hebrew word means “to fit, to prepare;” and the idea is, that the heart was not “adjusted” to such a profession, or did not “accord” with such a promise or pledge. It was a mere profession made by the lips, while the heart remained unaffected. See the notes at Psalm 78:8.

Neither were they stedfast in his covenant In maintaining his covenant, or in adhering to it. Compare Psalm 25:14; 44:17. See also Psalm 78:8.

Psalm 78:38. But he, being full of compassion literally, “But he, merciful,” That is, he was ready to forgive them.

Forgave their iniquity literally, Atoned for, expiated, covered over their iniquity. There is connected with the word the idea of expiation or atonement, as the ground of pardon.

And destroyed them not Did not cut them off in their repeated acts of rebellion. He bore with them, and spared them.

Yea, many a time turned he his anger away literally, He multiplied to turn his anger away. That is, he did it repeatedly. There were frequent occasions on their journey for doing this, and he did it.

And did not stir up all his wrath literally, Did not excite, or arouse all his anger. His anger was stayed or mitigated, and they were suffered still to live.

Psalm 78:39. For he remembered that they were but flesh That they were human; that they were weak; that they were prone to err; that they were liable to fall into temptation. In his dealings with them he took into view their fallen nature; their training; their temptations; their trials; their weaknesses; and he judged them accordingly. Compare Psalm 103:14. So it was with the Saviour in his treatment of his disciples, “The spirit indeed is willing, but the flesh is weak,” Matthew 26:41. God will judge people as they are; he will not in his judgments forget that they are people, and that they are weak and feeble. People often judge their fellow-men with much more harshness, with much less allowance for their infirmities and weaknesses, than God shows in his dealings with mankind. And yet such are the very people who are most ready to blame God for his judgments. If God acted on the principle and in the manner according to which they act, they could hope for no mercy at his hand. It is well for them that there is not one like themselves on the throne of the universe.

A wind that passeth away, and cometh not again Which blows by us, and is gone forever. What a striking description is this of man! How true of an individual! How true of a generation! How true of the race at large! God remembers this when he thinks of people, and he deals with them accordingly. He is not harsh and severe, but kind and compassionate. To man, a being so feeble — to the human race, so frail — to the generations of that race, so transitory, so soon passing off the stage of life — he is ever willing to show compassion. He does not make use of his great power to crush them; he prefers to manifest his mercy in saving them.

Psalm 78:40. How oft did they provoke him in the wilderness

Margin, Or, rebel against him. The Hebrew word may have the signification in the margin. The idea is, that they were perverse and rebellious; that they excited his displeasure, and gave occasion for his anger. See <sup><97817></sup>Psalm 78:17.

And grieve him in the desert The word here rendered grieve means

- (1) to work, to fashion;
- (2) to suffer pain, to travail, to be afflicted; and then,
- (3) to cause one to suffer pain, or to afflict.

The meaning here is that the conduct of the Hebrews was such as was suited to cause pain — as the conduct of a disobedient and rebellious child is.

Psalm 78:41. Yea, they turned back, and tempted God They turned away from his service; they were disposed to return to Egypt, and to place themselves in the condition in which they were before they were delivered from bondage.

And limited the Holy One of Israel The idea is, that they set a limit to the power of God; they fancied or alleged — (and this is a thing often done practically even by the professed people of God) — that there was a boundary in respect to power which he could not pass, or that there were things to be done which he had not the ability to perform. The original word — <sup><18427></sup>חַוֵּת — occurs but three times in the Scriptures; in <sup><9213></sup>1 Samuel 21:13, where it is rendered scabbled (in the margin, made marks); in <sup><9304></sup>Ezekiel 9:4, where it is rendered set, that is, set a mark (margin, mark); and in the place before us. It is rendered here by the Septuagint and the Latin Vulgate, to provoke to anger. DeWette translates it troubled. Professor Alexander, “On the Holy One of Israel (they) set a mark.” The idea in the word would seem to be that of making a mark for any purpose; and then it means to delineate; to scrawl; or to set a mark for a limit or boundary. Thus it might be applied to God — as if, in estimating his character or his power, they set limits or bounds to it, as one does in marking out a farm or a house-lot in a city or town. There was a limit, in their estimation, to the power of God, beyond which he could not act; or, in other words, his power was defined and bounded, so that beyond a certain point he could not aid them.

Psalm 78:42. They remembered not his hand His gracious interpositions; the manifestations of his power. They forgot that power had been exercised which showed that he was omnipotent — that there was no limit to his ability to aid them.

Nor the day when he delivered them from the enemy The time when he rescued them. The power then manifested was sufficient to defend and deliver them in any new dangers that could befall them. The margin is, from affliction. The Hebrew will admit of either interpretation. The sense is not materially changed.

Psalm 78:43. How he had wrought his signs in Egypt Margin, set. The Hebrew word means to set or place. The word signs here refers to miracles as signs or indications of God's power and favor. The things which he did were of such a nature as to show that he was almighty, and at the same time to assure them of his disposition to protect them.

And his wonders in the field of Zoan The wonderful things which he did; the things suited to excite amazement, or astonishment. On the word Zoan, see the notes at Psalm 78:12.

Psalm 78:44. And had turned their rivers into blood Exodus 7:20. There was properly but one river in Egypt — the Nile. But there were several branches of that river at the mouth; and there were numerous artificial streams or canals cut from the river, to anyone of which the word river might be also given. Compare the notes at Isaiah 11:15.

And their floods ... Their streams; the canals and branches of the Nile, where they usually obtained a supply of water.

Psalm 78:45. He sent divers sorts of flies ... The account of this plague is found in Exodus 8:24. The word there used is simply "swarm," without indicating what the swarm was composed of. The rabbis explain the word as denoting a mixture, or a conflux of noxious insects, as if the word were derived from brē <sup>ch6148</sup> — "to mix." The Septuagint renders it κυνομύια — "dog-fly" — which Philo describes as so named from its impudence. The common explanation of the word now is that it denotes a species of fly — the gad-fly — exceedingly troublesome to man and beast, and that it derives its name — brq,<sup><h6157></sup> — from the verb brq,<sup><h6148></sup>, in one of its significations to suck, and hence, the allusion to sucking the blood of animals. The word occurs only in the following places, <sup><h182></sup>Exodus 8:21,22,24,29,31, where it is rendered swarm, or swarms, and <sup><h955></sup>Psalm 105:31, where (as here) it is rendered divers sorts of flies.

And frogs which destroyed them <sup><h186></sup>Exodus 8:6. The order in which the plagues occurred is not preserved in the account in the psalm.

And their labor unto the locust The fruit of their labor; the harvests in their fields.

<sup><h787></sup>Psalm 78:47. He destroyed their vines with hail Margin, killed. See <sup><h112></sup>Exodus 9:22-26. In the account in Exodus the hail is said to have smitten man and beast, the herb, and the tree of the field. In the psalm only one thing is mentioned, perhaps denoting the ruin by what would be particularly felt in Palestine, where the culture of the grape was so common and so important.

And their sycamore trees with frost The sycamore is mentioned particularly as giving poetic beauty to the passage. Of the sycamore tree, Dr. Thomson remarks (“land and the Book,” vol. i. p. 25),

“It is a tender tree, flourishes immensely in sandy plains and warm vales, but cannot bear the hard, cold mountain. A sharp frost will kill them; and this agrees with the fact that they were killed by it in Egypt. Among the wonders performed in the field of Zoan, David says, ‘He destroyed their vines with hail, and their sycamores with frost.’ Certainly, a frost keen enough to kill the sycamore would be one of the greatest ‘wonders’ that could happen at the present day in this same field of Zoan.”

The word rendered “frost” — l mnj <sup><12602></sup> — occurs nowhere else. It is parallel with the word hail in the other member of the sentence, and denotes something that would be destructive to trees. The Septuagint, the Vulgate, and the Arabic render it frost. Gesenius renders it ants.

<sup><1788></sup> Psalm 78:48. He gave up their cattle also to the hail Margin, he shut up. <sup><1102></sup>Exodus 9:22-25.

And their flocks to hot thunderbolts Margin, lightnings. The original word means flame; then, lightning. There is no allusion in the word to the idea of a bolt, or shaft, accompanying the lightning or the thunder, by which destruction is produced. The destruction is caused by the lightning, and not by the thunder, and it is hardly necessary to say that there is no shaft or bolt that accompanies it. Probably this notion was formerly entertained, and found its way into the common language used. The same idea is retained by us in the word thunderbolt. But this idea is not in the original; nor is there any foundation for it in fact.

<sup><1789></sup> Psalm 78:49. He cast upon them the fierceness of his anger ... This verse is designed to describe the last, and the most dreadful of the plagues that came upon the Egyptians, the slaying of their first-born; and hence, there is such an accumulation of expressions: anger — fierce anger — wrath — indignation — trouble. All these expressions are designed to be emphatic; all these things were combined when the first-born were slain. There was no form of affliction that could surpass this; and in this trial all the expressions of the divine displeasure seemed to be exhausted. It was meant that this should be the last of the plagues; it was meant that the nation should be humbled, and should be made willing that the people of Israel should go.

By sending evil angels among them There is reference here undoubtedly to the slaying of the first-born in Egypt. <sup><1104></sup>Exodus 11:4,5; 12:29,30. This work is ascribed to the agency of a destroyer (<sup><1123></sup>Exodus 12:23; compare <sup><8123></sup>Hebrews 11:28), and the allusion seems to be to a destroying angel, or to an angel employed and commissioned to accomplish such a work. Compare <sup><1246></sup>2 Samuel 24:16; <sup><1265></sup>2 Kings 19:35. The idea here is not that the angel himself was evil or wicked, but that he was the messenger of evil or calamity; he was the instrument by which these afflictions were brought upon them.

Psalm 78:50. He made a way to his anger Margin, he weighed a path. He leveled a path for it; he took away all hindrance to it; he allowed it to have free scope. The idea of weighing is not in the original. The allusion is to a preparation made by which one can march along freely, and without any obstruction. See the notes at <sup><230B></sup>Isaiah 40:3,4.

He spared not their soul from death He spared not their lives. That is, he gave them over to death.

But gave their life over to the pestilence Margin, their beasts to the murrain. The original will admit of either interpretation, but the connection seems rather to demand the interpretation which is in the text. Both these things, however, occurred.

Psalm 78:51. And smote all the firstborn in Egypt See <sup><0210H></sup>Exodus 11:4,5; 12:29,30.

The chief of their strength Those on whom they relied; their firstborn; their pride; their glory; their heirs. Compare <sup><0440B></sup>Genesis 49:3.

In the tabernacles of Ham The tents; the dwelling-places of Ham; that is, of Egypt. Compare <sup><0100B></sup>Genesis 10:6; <sup><1952B></sup>Psalm 105:23,27; 106:22.

Psalm 78:52. But made his own people to go forth like sheep ... That is, he was a shepherd to them. He defended them; provided for them; led them — as a shepherd does his flock. See the notes at <sup><0221B></sup>Psalm 23:1,2.

Psalm 78:53. And he led them on safely, so that they feared not In hope; in confidence; so that they had no occasion for alarm. He showed himself able and willing to defend them.

But the sea overwhelmed their enemies Margin, as in Hebrew, covered. See <sup><02127></sup>Exodus 14:27,28; 15:10.

Psalm 78:54. And he brought them to the border of his sanctuary The Septuagint and the Latin Vulgate render this, “to the mountain of his holiness”; that is, his holy mountain. But the reference is rather to the whole land of Canaan. He brought them to the borders of that land — the land of promise — the holy land. They who came out from Egypt did not indeed enter that land, except Caleb and Joshua, but they were conveyed to its borders before all of them fell. It was true also that the people — the Hebrew people — came to the promised land, and secured its possession.

Even to this mountain Mount Zion, for the object of the psalm was to show that the worship of God was properly celebrated there. See <sup><1788></sup>Psalm 78:68. The meaning is not that the people who came out of Egypt actually inherited that mountain, but that their descendants — the people of God — had been put in possession of it.

Which his right hand had purchased Had procured, or obtained possession of. That is, he had secured it by his power.

<sup><1785></sup>Psalm 78:55. He cast out the heathen also before them literally, the nations. The idea of their being pagan, in the sense which is now attached to that word, is not in the original. The word is one which would be applied to any nation, without reference to its religion. These nations were, indeed, pagans according to the present use of that term, but that idea is not necessarily in the Hebrew word.

And divided them an inheritance by line Divided to his people an inheritance by a measurement of the land. That is, the land was partitioned out among the tribes, by a survey, fixing their limits and boundaries. See <sup><1637></sup>Joshua 13:7; 18; 19.

And made the tribes of Israel to dwell in their tents To dwell securely and quietly, no longer roaming from place to place, but having a fixed habitation and a home.

<sup><1786></sup>Psalm 78:56. Yet they tempted and provoked ... They tried the patience of God, and provoked him to anger after they were peaceably settled in the promised land. See <sup><1020></sup>Judges 2:10-13. The object is to show that it was the character of the people that they were prone to depart from God. Compare the notes at <sup><1780></sup>Psalm 78:10,11,17,40.

They were turned aside like a deceitful bow literally, a bow of deceit. That is, a bow that could not be depended on; a bow, one of whose arms was longer or more elastic than the other, so that the arrow would turn aside from the mark. The marksman would attempt to hit an object, and would fail. So it was with the people of Israel. They could not be depended on. No reliance could be put on their promises, their covenant-engagements, their attachment, their fidelity, for in these things they failed, as the arrow from a deceitful bow would fail to strike the mark. Their whole history shows how just was this charge; alas! the history of many of the professed people of God has shown how applicable the description has been to them also.

Psalm 78:58. For they provoked him to anger with their high places places where idols were worshipped; usually on mountains or elevated places. <sup><1350></sup>Leviticus 26:30; compare <sup><1000></sup>1 Kings 3:2; 12:31,32; <sup><1270></sup>2 Kings 17:32; <sup><1430></sup>2 Chronicles 33:17.

And moved him to jealousy As one is when affections due to himself are bestowed upon another — as in the married life. “With their graven images.” Their idols. Graven images are here put for idols in general.

Psalm 78:59. When God heard this literally, “God heard;” that is, he understood this; he was acquainted with it. He heard their prayers addressed to false gods; he heard their praises sung in honor of idols.

He was wroth This is language taken from the common manner of speaking among people, for language derived from human conceptions and usages must be employed when we speak of God, though it may be difficult to say what is its exact meaning. The general sense is that his conduct toward them was as if he was angry; or was that which is used by a man who is displeased.

And greatly abhorred Israel The idea in the word rendered abhorred is that of rejecting them with abhorrence; that is, the reference is not merely to the internal feeling or emotion, but to the act which is the proper accompaniment of such an internal feeling. He cast them off; he treated them as not his own. The addition of the word “greatly” shows how intense this feeling was; how decided was his aversion to their conduct.

Psalm 78:60. So that he forsook the tabernacle of Shiloh The tabernacle or tent which had been erected at Shiloh. He forsook that as a place where he was to be worshipped; that is, he caused his tabernacle, or his place of worship, to be erected in another place, to wit, on Mount Zion. See <sup><1980></sup>Psalm 78:68. The name Shiloh means properly a place of rest, and seems to have been given to this place as such a place, or as a place where the ark might abide after its migrations. Shiloh was a city within the limits of the tribe of Ephraim, on a mountain north of Bethel. Here the ark of God remained for many years after it came into the promised land. <sup><680></sup>Joshua 18:1; <sup><0780></sup>Judges 18:31; 21:12,19; <sup><0000></sup>1 Samuel 1:3,24; 2:14; 4:3,4. The ark, after it was taken by the Philistines, was never returned to Shiloh, but was deposited successively at Nob (<sup><0200></sup>1 Samuel 21:1-6), and at Gibeon (<sup><1000></sup>1 Kings 3:4), until David pitched a tabernacle for it on Mount Zion (<sup><1300></sup>1 Chronicles 15:1). The meaning here is, that in consequence of the sins of the people, the place of worship was finally and forever removed from the tribe of Ephraim, within whose limits Shiloh was, to the tribe of Judah, and to Mount Zion.

The tent which he placed among men It was the place which he selected as his abode on earth.

<sup><0900></sup>Psalm 78:61. And delivered his strength into captivity That is, the ark, considered as the symbol of his power. This constituted the defense of the people; this was the emblem of the presence of God, which, when with them, was their real protection. The allusion here is to the time when the ark was taken by the Philistines in the days of Eli. See <sup><0000></sup>1 Samuel 4:3-11.

And his glory That which was emblematic of his glory, to wit, the ark.

Into the enemy's hand The hand or power of the Philistines.

<sup><0900></sup>Psalm 78:62. He gave his people over also unto the sword When the ark was taken, <sup><0000></sup>1 Samuel 4:10. Thirty thousand of the children of Israel fell on that occasion.

And was wroth with his inheritance Was angry with his people, considered as his inheritance; that is, considered as his own special people, or his possession.

<sup><0900></sup>Psalm 78:63. The fire consumed their young men Fire here may be regarded as an image of destructive war, as in <sup><0000></sup>Numbers 21:28: "For there is a fire gone out of Heshbon, a flame from the city of Sihon: it hath consumed Ar of Moab," etc. The idea here is, that the young people had been cut off in war.

And their maidens were not given to marriage As the young people who would have entered into this relation were cut off in war. The margin here is praised; "The maidens were not praised." This is in accordance with the Hebrew. The idea is, "Their virgins were not praised in nuptial songs;" that is, there were no marriage celebrations; no songs such as were usually composed on such occasions in praise of those who were brides. The Septuagint and the Latin Vulgate render this much less accurately, and much less beautifully, were not lamented.

Psalm 78:64. Their priests fell by the sword Compare <sup><0941></sup>1 Samuel 4:11. It was considered a special calamity that the ministers of religion were cut down in war.

And their widows made no lamentation That is, the public troubles were so great, the danger was still so imminent, the calamities thickened so fast, that there was no opportunity for public mourning by formal processions of women, and loud lamentations, such as were usual on these occasions. See the notes at <sup><18715></sup>Job 27:15. The meaning is not that there was a want of affection or attachment on the part of the friends of the slain, or that there was no real grief, but that there was no opportunity for displaying it in the customary manner.

Psalm 78:65. Then the Lord awaked as one out of sleep literally, as one sleeping; that is, as one who is asleep suddenly arouses himself. The Lord seemed to have slept, or to have been inattentive to what was occurring. Suddenly he aroused himself to inflict vengeance on the enemies of his people. Compare the notes at <sup><1906></sup>Psalm 7:6; 44:23.

And like a mighty man The allusion is probably to a warrior.

That shouteth by reason of wine The proper idea here is that of singing, or lifting up the voice in exultation and rejoicing; the idea of a man who sings and shouts as he is excited by wine, and as he presses onward to conflict and to victory. It is not uncommon in the Scriptures to compare God, as he goes forth to accomplish his purposes on his enemies, with a warrior. See <sup><1913></sup>Exodus 15:3; <sup><1943></sup>Psalm 24:8.

Psalm 78:66. And he smote his enemies in the hinder part From behind; that is, as they fled. There are two ideas here: one, that they fled at his approach, or turned their backs; the other, that as they fled, he smote and destroyed them.

He put them to a perpetual reproach As discomfited; as defeated and scattered; as unable to contend with him. The allusion is, probably, to the victories of David, occurring after the events related in the preceding verses.

Psalm 78:67. Moreover, he refused the tabernacle of Joseph As a place where his worship should be celebrated. This is the completion of the statement in <sup><1970></sup>Psalm 78:60. The design is to show that there had been a transfer of the preeminence from the tribe of Ephraim to the tribe of Judah, and from Shiloh to Zion. Joseph is mentioned here as the father of Ephraim, from whom one of the tribes — (one of the most influential and numerous) — was named. Jacob had twelve sons, from whom the twelve tribes in general took their name. As the tribe of Levi, however, being devoted to the sacerdotal work, was not reckoned as one of the, twelve, the number was made up by giving to the descendants of the two sons of Joseph — Ephraim and Manasseh (<sup>4485</sup>Genesis 48:5) — a place among the tribes; and, on this account, the name Joseph does not appear as one of the twelve tribes. Yet Joseph is mentioned here, as the ancestor of one of them — that of Ephraim, from whom the priority and supremacy were withdrawn in favor of the tribe of Judah.

And chose not the tribe of Ephraim To be the tribe within whose limits the tabernacle should be permanently set up; or within whose limits the place of public worship was finally to be established.

<sup>4785</sup>Psalm 78:68. But chose the tribe of Judah He chose David of the tribe of Judah as ruler and king; he chose a place within the limits of Judah, to wit, Mount Zion, or Jerusalem, as the place where his worship was to be celebrated. Thus, the ancient prediction in regard to the supremacy of Judah was accomplished. (<sup>4448</sup>Genesis 49:8-10.

The Mount Zion, which he loved Which he chose, for which he had an affection. Compare (<sup>4870</sup>Psalm 87:2.

<sup>4785</sup>Psalm 78:69. And he built his sanctuary His holy place; that is, his tabernacle. The temple was not then built; and, when reared, it was not on Mount Zion, but on Mount Moriah. The name Zion, however, was often given to the whole city.

Like high palaces The word palaces is not in the original. The Hebrew means simply high places, like hills or mountains. The meaning is, that his sanctuary was exalted, as if it were placed on a high hill. It was a conspicuous object; it could be seen from afar; it was the most prominent thing in the land. See the notes at (<sup>4300</sup>Isaiah 2:2.

Like the earth Permanent and established.

Which he hath established for ever Margin, as in Hebrew, founded. The earth is often represented as founded or established on a solid basis, and thus becomes an emblem of stability and perpetuity.

Psalm 78:70. He chose David also his servant He chose him that he might set him over his people as their king. The idea is, that David was selected when he had no natural pretensions to the office, as he did not pertain to a royal family, and could have no claim to such a distinction. The account of this choice is contained in <sup><0151></sup>1 Samuel 15:1-30.

And took him from the sheep-folds From the humble occupation of a shepherd. <sup><0161></sup>1 Samuel 16:11; <sup><0108></sup>2 Samuel 7:8.

Psalm 78:71. From following the ewes great with young Margin, as in Hebrew, From after. The meaning is, that he followed after them; that is, he attended them, or watched over them as a shepherd. The single word rendered “the ewes great with young” — ל ו ל <sup><45763></sup> — is a participle from הל ל, <sup><45927></sup>, to ascend, to go up; and then, to bring up, to nourish. The exact idea here is doubtless that of bringing up, or of sucking them, and the word should have been so translated here. It is so rendered by Luther. The idea in our translation has been derived from the Septuagint and the Latin Vulgate. The meaning is, that he brought him from being a shepherd to be the ruler of his people — expressed still in the language of a shepherd life.

To feed Jacob his people Rather, to be a shepherd to them; to perform toward them the office of a shepherd, including the ideas of governing them, providing for them, and defending them. See the notes at <sup><4231></sup>Psalm 23:1,2.

Psalm 78:72. So he fed them He performed toward them the office of a shepherd.

According to the integrity of his heart literally, “According to the perfection of his heart.” That is, he was upright and pure in the administration of his government.

And guided them by the skillfulness of his hands literally, “by the understanding of his hands” — as if the hand had been endued with intelligence. Compare <sup><1341></sup>Psalm 144:1: “Which teacheth my hands to war, and my fingers to fight.” See also <sup><4975></sup>Psalm 137:5. The idea is, that he administered the government with integrity and uprightness. This is a beautiful tribute to the integrity and purity of the administration of David. It is not the language of flattery; it is a simple statement, flowing from the heart, in favor of a just and upright administration; and it is a true statement of what the administration of David was. Save in the matter of Uriah — over which he afterward wept so bitterly — his administration was eminently just, pure, impartial, wise, and benignant; probably none among people have been more so. The whole psalm is thus a beautiful argument showing why the government had been transferred from Ephraim to Judah, and why it had been placed in the hands of David.

APPENDIX NOTES ON PSALM 78

This psalm appears to have been written after David's elevation to the throne, and perhaps before he was acknowledged by the whole race of Israel, <sup><1085></sup>2 Samuel 5:5. Its design is to impress upon the public mind the true grounds of the transfer which had taken place, of the pre-eminence in Israel, from the tribe of Ephraim to that of Judah, as the execution of a divine purpose long before disclosed, and at the same time a just judgment on the sins committed by the people, under the predominant influence of Ephraim from the time of Joshua to that of Eli. The internal character of the psalm determines its external form, which is simple, and admits of no minute division. beyond that afforded by the historical succession of events, and the logical design of the composition, to prove that the Israelites under the ascendancy of Ephraim were similar in character to the older generation which came out of Egypt — Alexander.

The general object of the psalm is to warn Israel, who had escaped the judgments of God, not to provoke a fresh judgment by a fresh apostasy. The conclusion, however, <sup><1085></sup>Psalm 78:65-72, indicates, that besides this general object, the psalmist designed to warn the Israelites against a special sin to which they were especially liable from the circumstances of the times. The danger was, that of not being willing to acquiesce in the divine arrangement, by which the prerogative of Ephraim was transferred to the tribe of Judah, of regarding that as a usurpation which was in fact a divine judgement, and of rebelling against the sanctuary in Zion and the dominion of David and his tribe ...

That the psalm, which in the title is called "An Instruction of Asaph," belonged to the age of David, and was therefore composed by the famous Asaph (compare at Psalm 74), cannot be considered as doubtful, if we take a correct view of its contents and object. The last matters of fact on which the author touches, are the kingdom of David, which by the fut. in <sup><1087></sup>Psalm 78:72 is exhibited as still standing, and the settlement of the sanctuary on Zion. His object is to warn the people against a possible revolt from David and from the sanctuary in Zion; he cannot therefore have possibly composed the psalm after this event had taken place. He acts in the prosecution of his object with such great tenderness — not naming expressly even once the disruption which it is his purpose to prevent, and making no express mention whatever of any inclination to this, which might exist at the time, but leaving his readers to make for themselves the practical application — that it is obvious that he must have written at a time when it was of importance not to irritate, for fear of increasing the dissatisfaction, by even supposing it to exist, and not to call forth the idea of the disruption, by naming it. — Hengstenberg.

Psalm 78:64. Their widows made no lamentation This implies the extent of the destruction, and is full of meaning to one who has been in an oriental city during a plague or other devastating calamity. At first the cry of wailing which always follows a death in ordinary circumstances is loud and frequent; but such cries do not increase but subside with the increase of the calamity and desolation. Death becomes a familiar object in every house, and every one absorbed in his own losses has little sympathy to spare for others. Hence, the loudest lamentations cease to be noticed, or to draw condoling friends to the house of mourning; and therefore, as well as from the stupefaction of feeling which scenes of continued horror never fail to produce, a new death is received in silence, or only with sighs and tears. In fact all the usual observances are suspended. The dead are carried out and buried without mourning ceremonies, and without the presence of surviving friends, by people who make it an employment to take away the dead, on the backs of mules or asses, from the homes they leave desolate. We have seen this. — Kitto.

Psalm 78:70. He chose David also his servant, and took him from the sheepfolds To apprehend the whole force of this passage to the end of Psalm 78:73, we should recollect some of the special conditions of the ancient pastoral life. The Hebrew patriarchs, and in a great measure their descendants, when settled in Canaan, did not usually entrust their flocks to menials and strangers, but either tended them in person, or entrusted them to their sons or near relations. The flock which David himself tended was that of his father Jesse. In later times the increase of the population and of the town life, led to the use of hired shepherds: but the difference of treatment which the flock received under the differing circumstances was most strongly felt by the Jews, and was on one occasion most pointedly indicated by our Saviour, who, in comparing himself to the shepherd-owner of a flock, says, "I am the good Shepherd: the good shepherd giveth his life for the sheep. But he that is an hireling, and not the shepherd, whose own the sheep are not, seeth the wolf coming, and leaveth the sheep, and fleeth ... The hireling fleeth because he is an hireling, and careth not for the sheep," <sup><B011></sup>John 10:11-13. This position of our Saviour is admirably illustrated by the conduct of David himself, who combated and killed both a lion and a bear in defense of his father's flock, <sup><B173></sup>1 Samuel 17:34,35. If, therefore, the sheep under the shepherd-owner may rest in quiet, confident of lacking nothing which the care of that shepherd can provide, how much more he whose Shepherd is the Lord. — Kitto.

NOTES ON PSALM 79

This psalm, also, purports to be a psalm of Asaph; that is, it was either composed by him or for him; or it was the composition of one of his descendants who presided over the music in the sanctuary, and to whom was given the general family name, Asaph. The psalm pertains to the same general subject as Psalm 74, and was composed evidently in view of the same calamities. Rudinger, DeWette, and some others, suppose that the reference in the psalm is to the persecutions under Antiochus Epiphanes. To this opinion, also, Rosenmuller inclines. The most common, and the most probable supposition, however, is that it refers to the destruction of the temple by Nebuchadnezzar and the Chaldeans.

The contents of the psalm are as follows:

I. A statement of the calamity which had come upon the nation. The pagan had come into the heritage of God; they had defiled the sanctuary; they had made Jerusalem desolate; they had murdered the inhabitants; and the nation had become a reproach before the world, <sup><9791></sup>Psalm 79:1-4.

II. A prayer for the divine interposition, <sup><9791></sup>Psalm 79:5,6.

III. Reasons for that prayer, or reasons why God should interpose in the case, <sup><9791></sup>Psalm 79:7-13. These reasons are,

(a) that they had devoured Jacob, <sup><9791></sup>Psalm 79:7;

(b) that the people, on account of their sins, had been brought very low, <sup><9791></sup>Psalm 79:8;

(c) that the divine glory was at stake, <sup><9791></sup>Psalm 79:9,10;

(d) that they were in a suffering and pitiable condition, many being held as captives, and many ready to die, <sup><9791></sup>Psalm 79:11:

(e) that justice demanded this, <sup><9791></sup>Psalm 79:12; and

(f) that this interposition would lay the foundation for praise to God, <sup><9791></sup>Psalm 79:13.

<sup><9791></sup>Psalm 79:1. O God, the heathen are come into thine inheritance The nations; a foreign people. See the notes at <sup><9791></sup>Psalm 2:1,8; 78:55. The term is one that would be applicable to the Chaldeans, or Babylonians, and the probable allusion here is to their invasion of the holy land under Nebuchadnezzar. <sup><4967></sup>2 Chronicles 36:17-21.

Thy holy temple have they defiled They have polluted it. By entering it; by removing the sacred furniture; by cutting down the carved work; by making it desolate. See <sup><4967></sup>2 Chronicles 36:17,18. Compare the notes at <sup><4945></sup>Psalm 74:5-7.

They have laid Jerusalem on heaps See <sup><4969></sup>2 Chronicles 36:19: “And they burnt the house of God, and brake down the wall of Jerusalem, and burnt all the palaces thereof with fire, and destroyed all the goodly vessels thereof.”

<sup><4943></sup>Psalm 79:3. Their blood have they shed like water round about Jerusalem They have poured it out in such quantities that it seems to flow like water — not an uncommon occurrence in war. There was no event in the history of the Hebrews to which this description would be more applicable than to the Babylonian invasion. The language might indeed be applicable to the desolation of the city by Antiochus Epiphanes, and also to its destruction by the Romans; but, of course, it cannot refer to the latter, and there is no necessity for supposing that it refers to the former. All the conditions of a proper interpretation are fulfilled by supposing that it refers to the time of the Chaldean invasion.

And there was none to bury them The Chaldeans would not do it, and they would not suffer the Hebrew people to do it.

<sup><4944></sup>Psalm 79:4. We are become a reproach to our neighbours See the language in this verse explained in the notes at <sup><4943></sup>Psalm 44:13. The words in the Hebrew are the same, and the one seems to have been copied from the other.

Psalm 79:5. How long, LORD? See the notes at Psalm 74:1,10; and Psalm 77:7-9. This is the language, not of impatience, but of anxiety; not of complaining, but of wonder. It is language such as the people of God are often constrained to employ under heavy trials — trials which continue so long that it seems as if they would never end.

Shall thy jealousy, burn like fire? That is, Shall it continue to burn like fire? Shall it utterly consume us? On the word jealousy, see the notes at Psalm 78:58.

Psalm 79:6. Pour out thy wrath upon the heathen Punish, as they deserve, the nations that have risen up against thy people, and that have brought; desolation upon the land. The word rendered here pour out is used with reference to a cup or vial, as containing a mixture for the people to drink — of intoxication, or of poison. See the notes at Revelation 16:1; Psalm 11:6; Isaiah 51:17; compare Jeremiah 25:15,17; Matthew 20:22; 26:39,42.

That have not known thee Who are strangers to thee; who are thy enemies. The prayer that the wrath of God might be poured upon them was not because they were ignorant of him, but on account of their wicked conduct toward the people of God. The phrase “that have not known thee” is used merely to designate them, or to describe their character. The prayer is not necessarily a prayer for vengeance, or in the spirit of revenge; it is simply a prayer that justice might be done to them, and is such a prayer as any man may offer who is anxious that justice may be done in the world. See remarks on the imprecations in the Psalms. General Introduction Section 6. It is not proper, however, to use this as a proof-text that God will punish the “pagan,” or will consign them to destruction. The passage obviously has no reference to such a doctrine, whether that doctrine be true or false.

And upon the kingdoms that have not called upon thy name The people that do not worship thee; referring here particularly to those who had invaded the land, and made it desolate.

Psalm 79:7. For they have devoured Jacob literally, “They have eaten.” That is, they have eaten up what the land produced.

And laid waste his dwelling-place His home; his habitation; the residence of Jacob, or of the people of Israel.

Psalm 79:8. O remember not against us former iniquities Margin, The iniquities of them that were before us. The Hebrew may mean either former times, or former generations. The allusion, however, is substantially the same. It is not their own iniquities which are particularly referred to, but the iniquity of the nation as committed in former times; and the prayer is, that God would not visit them with the results of the sins of former generations, though their own ancestors. The language is derived from the idea so constantly affirmed in the Scripture, and so often illustrated in fact, that the effects of sin pass over from one generation to the next, and involve it in calamity. See <sup><1216></sup>Exodus 20:5; 34:7; <sup><1316></sup>Leviticus 20:5; 26:39,40; <sup><1418></sup>Numbers 14:18,33; compare the notes at <sup><1512></sup>Romans 5:12, et seg.

Let thy tender mercies speedily prevent us literally, “Hasten; let thy tender mercies anticipate us.” The word prevent here, as elsewhere in the Scriptures, does not mean to hinder, as with us, but to go before; to anticipate. See the notes at <sup><1812></sup>Job 3:12; <sup><1973></sup>Psalm 17:13; 21:3; <sup><2314></sup>Isaiah 21:14; <sup><1725></sup>Matthew 17:25; <sup><3415></sup>1 Thessalonians 4:15. The prayer here is, that God, in his tender mercy or compassion, would anticipate their ruin; would interpose before matters had gone so far as to make their destruction inevitable.

For we are brought very low The idea in the original word is that of being pendulous, or hanging down — as vines do, or as anything does that is wilted, or withered, or as the hands do when one is weak, faint, or sick. Then it refers to a failure or exhaustion of strength; and the idea here is that their strength as a nation was exhausted.

Psalm 79:9. Help us, O God of our salvation On whom our salvation depends; who alone can save us.

For the glory of thy name That thy name may be honored. We are thy professed people; we have been redeemed by thee; and thine honor will be affected by the question whether we are saved or destroyed, It is the highest and purest ground for prayer, that the glory or honor of God may be promoted. See the notes at <sup><1019></sup>Matthew 6:9,13; <sup><1228></sup>John 12:28; <sup><1719></sup>Daniel 9:19.

And deliver us From our enemies.

And purge away our sins Forgive our sins, or cleanse us from them. The original word is that which is commonly used to denote an atonement. Compare in the Hebrew, <sup><7024></sup>Daniel 9:24.; <sup><3651></sup>Ezekiel 45:20; <sup><12315></sup>Exodus 30:15; 32:30; <sup><10010></sup>Leviticus 4:20; 5:26; 16:6, 11,24.

For thy name's sake See the notes at <sup><7093></sup>Daniel 9:19.

The nations. Why should such a course of forbearance toward them be pursued as to lead them to ask the question whether God is able to punish them, or to come to the conclusion that he is not the God of those who profess to worship him. See the notes at <sup><1943></sup>Psalm 42:3,10.

Let him be known among the heathen Let him so manifest himself among them that they cannot but see that he is God; that he is a just God; that he is the Friend and Protector of his people.

In our sight So that we may see it; or, so that it may be seen that he is our Friend and Protector.

By the revenging of the blood of thy servants which is shed Margin, vengeance. The true idea is, "Let the avenging of the blood of thy servants — the blood poured out [or shed) be known among the nations in our sight." The prayer is that God would so interpose that there could be no doubt that it was on account of the blood of his people which had been shed by their enemies. It is a prayer that just punishment might be executed — a prayer which may be offered at anytime.

<sup><1991></sup>Psalm 79:11. Let the sighing of the prisoner come before thee The sighing of him who is bound. The allusion here is, doubtless, to those among the Hebrews who had been taken captives, and who "sighed" not only on account of the sufferings which they endured in their bondage, but because they had been taken from their country and home. The meaning is, "Hear those sighs, and come for the deliverance of those who are thus held in captivity."

According to the greatness of thy power Margin, as in Hebrew, thine arm. The arm is the symbol of power. It is implied here that great power was needful to deliver those who were held in captivity, power such as God only could exert — power which could be wielded only by an Omnipotent

Being. It was the power of God only which could rescue them, as it is only by the power of God that sinners can be saved.

Preserve thou those that are appointed to die Margin, Reserve the children of death. The literal meaning is, “Let remain the sons of death;” that is, Preserve those who are in such circumstances that death is impending, and who may be called the sons of death. This might apply to those who were condemned to death; or, to those who were sick and in danger of death; or to those who were prisoners and captives, and who were, by their sufferings, exposed to death. The prayer is that such might be suffered to remain on the earth; that is, that they might be kept alive.

Psalm 79:12. And render unto our neighbors That is, the neighbors who had reproached them; the surrounding people who had seen these calamities come upon them, and who had regarded these calamities as proof that their God was unable to protect them, or that they were suffering under his displeasure. See the notes at Psalm 79:4. “Sevenfold.” Seven times the amount of reproach which they have heaped upon us. The word seven is often used to denote many, as seven was one of the perfect numbers. The idea is that of complete or full vengeance. Compare Genesis 4:15,24; Proverbs 6:31; Isaiah 30:26; Matthew 18:21,22; Luke 17:4.

Into their bosom ... Perhaps the allusion here is to the custom of carrying things in the bosom of the flowing dress as it was girded around the loins. “Let them be made to carry with them seven times the amount of reproach which they have endeavored to heap on us.”

Psalm 79:13. So we thy people, and sheep of thy pasture See the notes at Psalm 74:1.

Will give thee thanks for ever Will praise thee always; will acknowledge thee as our God, and will evermore render thee thanksgiving.

We will shew forth thy praise to all generations Margin, as in Hebrew, to generation and generation. That is, We will make arrangements that the memory of these gracious acts shall be transmitted to future times; to distant generations. This was done by the permanent record, made in the Scriptures, of these gracious interpositions of God, and by their being carefully preserved by each generation to whom they came. No work has been more faithfully done than that by which the records of God’s ancient dealings with his people have been preserved from age to age — that by which the sacred Scriptures have been guarded against error, and handed down from one generation to another.

APPENDIX NOTES ON PSALM 79

Perowne inclines to the Maccabean origin of this psalm. But there is great force in the argument below:

This psalm stands nearly related to Psalm 74; the situation is the same, and they come a good deal in contact as regards the expression. Both psalms refer to the Chaldean devastation. The psalm before us proceeds on the supposition that Psalm 74 had been previously composed, and supplements it. In Psalm 74 the destruction of the sanctuary was pre-eminently and almost exclusively brought forward; but in Psalm 79 it is referred to very briefly, for the purpose of indicating the passages where that psalm is to be brought in, and the other subjects are put in the foreground. There is no good reason for the assertion which has been made, that the psalm before us must have been composed previously to Psalm 74, as the temple is there spoken of as entirely destroyed, whereas it is only its desecration that is spoken of here. The desecration does not exclude its destruction; the destruction is one of the forms of its desecration. Had the psalmist designed, in allusion to Psalm 74, to speak of the sanctuary in one single expression, he could not possibly have found a stronger term than this: the most dreadful thing that can befall the sanctuary is that it be desecrated. In saying this everything that can be affirmed of it is said.

Several expositors, both ancient and modern, refer the psalm to the time of the Maccabees. But there are quite decisive grounds against this view. First, as it is so closely allied to Psalm 74, the arguments which were there adverted to are of force here. There are also no traces here of any reference to the special relations of the times of the Maccabees. And there are two circumstances which are not suitable to those times: the laying of Jerusalem in ruins, <sup><9791></sup>Psalm 79:1, and the mention of nations and kingdoms in <sup><9796></sup>Psalm 79:6 (compare <sup><2242></sup>2 Kings 24:2), whereas in the time of the Maccabees Judah had to do only with a single kingdom. There are also two weighty external reasons. Jeremiah was acquainted with the psalm, and made use of it — compare at <sup><9796></sup>Psalm 79:6, and in 1 Macc. 7:16,17 it is quoted as forming at that time a portion of the sacred volume.

It is thus not necessary here to avail ourselves of the general reasons which may be urged against the existence of Maecabean psalms.

The title, “a psalm of Asaph,” is confirmed by the fact that the psalm stands closely related to a whole class of psalms which bear in their titles the name of Asaph. Those critics who reject the titles are unable to explain this similarity admitted by themselves, which obtains among all the Asaphic psalms, even among those which were composed at different eras. If we follow the title the reason of this is clear as day. The descendants of Asaph looked upon themselves as the instruments by which the Asaph of David’s time, their illustrious ancestor, continued to speak, and therefore they very naturally followed as closely in his footsteps as possible: the later descendants, moreover, would always have the compositions of their more early ancestors before their minds. The unity of the person named in the title limits the unity of character of all these psalms. Anyone who composed at his own hand, and did not look at his ancestor, or the early or contemporaneous organs of that ancestor, could not have adopted it. — Hengstenberg.

Psalm 79:3. There was none to bury them This in the East is no uncommon result of a great mortality, whether from war or from plague. Those who feel the deepest interest in the departed have already died, and strangers are too much absorbed in their own misery to undertake so great a labor. The bodies are therefore left to be devoured by dogs and jackals, or are disposed of by some summary public act. We saw much of this ourselves during the great plague of Baghdad in 1831. At first the people were so shocked at the mortality that they made great efforts to dispose of their dead. We recollect that in one quarter where the dead had accumulated frightfully, all the young men arose, and in one night buried all the dead. But this effort was not repeated; and at length, as the mortality increased, the survivors could not exert themselves further than to put the dead bodies into the street; or they left them in the houses, and withdrew to other houses which the plague had untenanted. This produced many shocking scenes; and at length the government found it necessary to hire men at a high price, to go through the town every day to collect the dead bodies, and — not to bury them, for there was no strength in the city left for that labor — but to cast them into the river Tigris. It was also noticed there at that time, that as the mortality increased, and a man saw all his household thinned off, his anxiety about the disposal of his own body would become very great — greater it seemed to us than with respect to the question of life or death; and many took extraordinary pains and incurred much expense to secure beforehand the chance of a decent interment as soon as the angel of death should smite them down. — Kitto.

NOTES ON PSALM 80

This very touching and beautiful psalm purports also to be a psalm of Asaph. Compare the notes at the title to Psalm 73. On the phrase “upon Shoshannim-eduth” in the title, see the notes at the titles to Psalm 45. and Psalm 60. The word rendered eduth, which means testimony, may have been used here with reference to the contents of the psalm as a public testimony in regard to the dealings of God with his people. But it is not possible now to determine with certainty the meaning of these titles.

The psalm, in its design, has a strong resemblance to Psalm 74; 79, and was probably composed on the same occasion. It has been generally supposed to have reference to the time of the Babylonian captivity. Some have referred it, however, to the time of Antiochus Epiphanes; and others regard it as a prayer of the ten tribes which had been carried away to Assyria. Doederlein supposes that it refers to the wars of Jehoshaphat with the Ammonites (2 Chronicles 20); and others suppose that it refers to the troubles caused by the Philistines. It is impossible now to determine with certainty the time or the occasion of its composition. It can be best explained on the supposition that it refers to the desolations caused by the Chaldeans under Nebuchadnezzar.

The psalm is properly divided into three parts, each closing with the prayer “Turn us again, O God, and cause thy face to shine; and we shall be saved,” ~~Psalm~~ Psalm 80:3,7,19.

I. The first part is a prayer, addressed to God as a shepherd — as one who had led his people like a flock — that he would again shine forth on them now that they were in trouble, and that he would stir up his strength, and come and save them, ~~Psalm~~ Psalm 80:1-3.

II. The second is a prayer, also — founded on the troubles of his people; a people fed with their tears; a strife to their neighbors; and an occasion of laughter or mirth to their foes, ~~Psalm~~ Psalm 80:4-7.

III. The third is also a prayer — founded on the former dealings of God with his people, on his care for them in ancient times, and on the fact that they were now desolate; their state being represented under the image of a vine brought from abroad; planted with care; attentively nurtured until it sent out its branches in every direction, so that it filled the land; and then broken down — torn — rent — trampled on — by a wild boar out of the wood, <sup><3808></sup>Psalm 80:8-19. In view of this desolation the psalmist prays that God would interpose, and he pledges the assurance that if this were done for them, the people would no more go back from God.

<sup><3801></sup>Psalm 80:1. Give ear Incline the ear; as if the ear of God was then turned away, or as if he was inattentive to what was occurring. See the notes at <sup><1911></sup>Psalm 5:1. O Shepherd of Israel. See the notes at <sup><1231></sup>Psalm 23:1.

Thou that leadest Joseph like a flock Joseph, the father of Ephraim and Manasseh. See the notes at <sup><1987></sup>Psalm 78:67. The name Joseph seems here to be used poetically to represent the whole people of Israel, as he was a man so prominent in their history, and especially as Egypt is mentioned as the country from which the vine had been transplanted — a country where Joseph had acted so important a part, and in connection with which his name would be so naturally associated. The meaning is, that God had led the tribes of the Hebrew people as a shepherd leads or conducts his flock.

<sup><3812></sup>Psalm 80:2. Before Ephraim, and Benjamin, and Manasseh Ephraim and Manasseh were the two sons of Joseph, and their names were given to two of the tribes of Israel. See the notes at <sup><1987></sup>Psalm 78:67. They seem to have been particularly mentioned here, because Joseph, their father, had been referred to in the previous verse; and it was natural, in speaking of the people, to mention his sons. Benjamin is mentioned because, in the encampment and march through the wilderness, these three tribes always went together, as the descendants of the same mother. <sup><0469></sup>Genesis 46:19,20; <sup><0028></sup>Numbers 2:18-24; 10:22-24. It is probable that they were always especially united in the great operations of the Hebrew people, and that when one was mentioned it was customary to mention the others, as being of the same family, or descended from the same mother. There does not appear, from the psalm itself, any particular reason why the prayer is offered that God would manifest himself especially to these three tribes; and nothing in regard to the occasion on which the psalm was composed, can be argued from the fact that they are thus mentioned. Hengstenberg indeed supposes that the common idea that the tribe of Benjamin adhered to Judah in the revolt of the ten tribes is erroneous, and that Benjamin was one of the ten tribes which revolted; and that Simeon was not included in the number because he had no separate territory, but only certain towns and places within the limits of the tribe of Judah. Prof. Alexander, embracing this opinion, supposes that the psalm refers to the calamities which came upon the ten tribes at the time of their captivity. But this supposition seems to me to be improbable. The obvious and fair interpretation of the narrative on the subject is, that the tribe of Benjamin adhered to that of Judah at the time of the revolt, for it is said (<sup>1121</sup>1 Kings 12:21) that “when Rehoboam was come to Jerusalem, he assembled all the house of Judah, with the tribe of Benjamin, an hundred and fourscore thousand chosen men, which were warriors, to fight against the house of Israel, to bring the kingdom again to Rehoboam, the son of Solomon.” Besides, even on the supposition that Benjamin was one of the ten revolted tribes, the fact that these three tribes are particularly mentioned together would not prove that the psalm referred to the carrying away of the ten tribes into Assyria, for still the question would arise why these are particularly mentioned rather than any other of the ten. It seems to me, therefore, that the fact that these are specified can be explained on the suppositions above suggested:

- (a) That the main reference in the psalm was to the coming out of Egypt — the bringing the “vine” — that is, the people — from that land (<sup>1818</sup>Psalm 80:8);
- (b) That in alluding to that, it was natural to make mention of Joseph, who was so distinguished there, and who, after so many trials, was exalted to so great honor that his name might be given to the whole people;
- (c) That when Joseph had been spoken of, it was natural, in the progress of the psalm, to mention particularly the names of his sons, Ephraim and Manasseh; and
- (d) that having mentioned them, it was natural also to refer to one whose name was always associated with that of Joseph as his younger brother by the same mother, and to the tribe of that name which was always associated with Ephraim and Manasseh in the march.

I regard the psalm, therefore, as referring to the entire Hebrew people, and the names of these three tribes as representatives of the whole nation. The prayer is, that God would manifest; himself in the presence of his people.

Stir up thy strength As if he were indifferent to their condition; as if he put forth no effort to save them. See the notes at <sup><88B></sup>Psalm 35:23.

And come and save us Margin, as in Hebrew, come for salvation to us. That is, Come and deliver us from our enemies and our dangers.

<sup><88B></sup>Psalm 80:3. Turn us again This phrase in our translation would seem to mean, “Turn us again from our sins,” or, “Bring us back to our duty, and to thy love;” and this idea is commonly attached to the phrase probably by the readers of the Bible. But this, though in itself an appropriate prayer, is not the idea here. It is simply, Bring us back; cause us to return; restore us. The idea thus suggested would be either

(a) Restore us to our former state of prosperity; that is, Cause these desolations to cease; or

(b) Bring us back, as from captivity, to our own land; restore us to our country and our homes, from which we have been driven out.

Thus understood, it would be properly the language of those who were in captivity or exile, praying that they might be restored again to their own land.

And cause thy face to shine Be favorable or propitious to us. Let the frown on thy countenance disappear. See the notes at <sup><80B></sup>Psalm 4:6.

And we shall be saved Saved from our dangers; saved from our troubles. It is also true that when God causes his face to shine upon us, we shall be saved from our sins; saved from ruin. It is only by his smile and favor that we can be saved in any sense, or from any danger.

<sup><88D></sup>Psalm 80:4. O Lord God of hosts Yahweh, God of armies. That is either

(a) the God who rules among the hosts of heaven — the inhabitants of that holy world; or

(b) God of the hosts of the sky — the worlds above — the stars, that seem marshalled as hosts or armies, and that are led forth each night with such order and grandeur; or

(c) God of the hosts on earth — the armies that are mustered for war. The phrase is one which is often applied to God. See the notes at <sup><8240></sup>Psalm 24:10; and at <sup><2024></sup>Isaiah 1:24.

How long wilt thou be angry Margin, as in Hebrew, wilt thou smoke. The allusion is derived from the comparison of anger with fire. See the notes at <sup><9740></sup>Psalm 74:1.

Against the prayer of thy people That is, Thou dost not answer their prayer; thou seemest to be angry against them even when they pray; or in the act of calling upon thee. The earnest inquiry here is, how long this was to continue. It seemed as if it would never end. Compare the notes at <sup><9707></sup>Psalm 77:7-9.

<sup><8805></sup>Psalm 80:5. Thou feedest them with the bread of tears literally, “Thou causest them to eat the bread of tears,” or of weeping. That is, their food was accompanied with tears; even when they ate, they wept. Their tears seemed to moisten their bread, they flowed so copiously. See the notes at <sup><9413></sup>Psalm 42:3.

And givest them tears to drink So abundant were their tears that they might constitute their very drink.

In great measure Or rather by measure; that is, abundantly. The word here rendered “great measure” — <sup>vyl</sup> <sup>iv</sup>; <sup><47991></sup> — means properly a third, and is usually applied to a measure for grain — a third part of another measure — as, the third part of an ephah. See the notes at <sup><2402></sup>Isaiah 40:12. Then the word is used for any measure, perhaps because this was the most common measure in use. The idea seems to be, not so much that God gave tears to them in great measure, but that he measured them out to them, as one measures drink to others; that is, the cup, or cask, or bottle in which their drink was served to them was as if filled with tears only.

<sup><8805></sup>Psalm 80:6. Thou makest us a strife An occasion of strife or wrangling; that is, of strife among themselves, to see who will get the most of our spoils; or of contention, to see which could do most to aggravate their sufferings, and to bring disgrace and contempt upon them. They were emulous with each other in the work of desolation and ruin.

Unto our neighbors The surrounding nations. See <sup><970></sup>Psalm 79:4.

And our enemies laugh among themselves Over our calamities. They exult; they glory; they triumph in our ruin.

<sup><980></sup>Psalm 80:7. Turn us again, O God of hosts ... This verse is the same as <sup><980></sup>Psalm 80:3, except that here the appeal is to the “God of hosts;” there, it is simply to “God.” This indicates greater earnestness; a deeper sense of the need of the interposition of God, indicated by the reference to his attribute as the leader of hosts or armies, and therefore able to save them.

Thou hast cast out the heathen The nations; to wit, the nations that occupied the land of Canaan before the children of Israel dwelt there. See the notes at <sup><100></sup>Psalm 2:1,8; 77:55.

And planted it Thou hast established thy people there as one plants a vine in a field. See <sup><942></sup>Psalm 44:2.

<sup><980></sup>Psalm 80:9. Thou preparedst room before it The Hebrew word used here means properly to turn; to turn the back; then, to turn in order to look at anything; to look upon; to see; then, in Piel, to cause to turn away; to remove. Then it comes to mean to remove, or to clear from impediments so as to prepare a way ( <sup><240></sup>Isaiah 40:3; 57:14; 62:10; <sup><300></sup>Malachi 3:1), and hence, to remove the impediments to planting a vine, etc.; to wit, by clearing away the trees, brush, stones, etc. Compare <sup><210></sup>Isaiah 5:2. Here it means that the hindrances in planting the vine were taken out of the way; that is, God removed the pagan so that there was room then to establish his own people.

And didst cause it to take deep root Hebrew, “And didst cause it to root roots;” that is, Its roots struck deep into the soil, and the plant became firm.

And it filled the land Its branches ran everywhere, so as to fill the whole land. See the notes at <sup><2318></sup>Isaiah 16:8.

<sup><800></sup>Psalm 80:10. The hills were covered with the shadow of it That is, It made a shade, by its luxuriant foliage, on the hills in every part of the land; it seemed to cover all the hills.

And the boughs thereof were like the goodly cedars Margin, as in Hebrew, cedars of God; that is, lofty, majestic cedars. See the notes at <sup><1971></sup>Psalm 65:9. The reference here is to the cedars of Lebanon, among the most majestic objects known to the Hebrews.

And her branches Her sucklings. The word is usually applied to little children, and means here the little branches that are nourished by the parent vine.

Unto the river The Euphrates, for so the river usually means in the Scriptures. The Euphrates on the one side, and the Mediterranean Sea on the other, were the natural and proper boundaries of the country as promised to Abraham. See <sup><1973></sup>Psalm 72:8; <sup><1102></sup>1 Kings 4:21. Compare the notes at Psalm 60.

<sup><802></sup>Psalm 80:12. Why hast thou then broken down her hedges? Why hast thou dealt with thy people as one would with a vineyard who should break down all its enclosures, and leave it open to wild beasts? The word rendered hedges means wall or enclosure. Compare the notes at <sup><2382></sup>Isaiah 5:2.

So that all they which pass by the way All travelers; or, wild beasts. So that there is nothing to prevent their coming up to the vine and plucking the grapes.

Do pluck her Pluck, or pick off the grapes; or, if the phrase “all which pass by the way” denotes wild beasts, then the meaning is, that they eat off the leaves and branches of the vine.

<sup><803></sup>Psalm 80:13. The boar out of the wood Men come in and ravage the land, whose character may be compared with the wild boar. The word rendered boar means simply swine. The addition of the phrase “out of the wood” determines its meaning here, and shows that the reference is to wild or untamed swine; swine that roam the woods — an animal always extremely fierce and savage.

Doth waste it The word used here occurs nowhere else. It means to cut down or cut off; to devour; to lay waste.

And the wild beast of the field Of the unenclosed field; or, that roams at large — such as lions, panthers, tigers, wolves. The word here used — zyzi<sup>h2123</sup> — occurs besides only in <sup><6501></sup>Psalm 50:11; and <sup><2361></sup>Isaiah 66:11. In <sup><2361></sup>Isaiah 66:11, it is rendered abundance.

Doth devour it So the people from abroad consumed all that the land produced, or thus they laid it waste.

<sup><8014></sup>Psalm 80:14. Return, we beseech thee, O God of hosts Again come and visit thy people; come back again to thy forsaken land. This is language founded on the idea that God had withdrawn from the land, or had forsaken it; that he had left his people without a protector, and had left them exposed to the ravages of fierce foreign enemies. It is language which will describe what seems often to occur when the church is apparently forsaken; when there are no cheering tokens of the divine presence; and when the people of God, discouraged, seem themselves to be forsaken by him. Compare <sup><2448></sup>Jeremiah 14:8.

Look down from heaven The habitation of God. As if he did not now see his desolate vineyard, or regard it. The idea is, that if he would look upon it, he would pity it, and would come to its relief.

And behold, and visit this vine It is a visitation of mercy and not of wrath that is asked; the coming of one who is able to save, and without whose coming there could be no deliverance.

<sup><8015></sup>Psalm 80:15. And the vineyard ... Gesenius renders this as a verb: “Protect;” that is, “Protect or defend what thy right hand hath planted.” So the Septuagint renders it καταρτισαι <sup><2675></sup> — and the Vulgate, perforce, fit, prepare, order. Prof. Alexander renders it sustain. DeWette, “Guard what thy right hand hath planted.” This is doubtless the true idea. It is a prayer that God would guard, sustain, defend what he had planted; to wit, the vine which he had brought out of Egypt, <sup><8018></sup>Psalm 80:8.

And the branch literally, the son; that is, the offspring or shoots of the vine. Not merely the original plant — the parent stock — but all the branches which had sprung from it and which had spread themselves over the land.

That thou madest strong for thyself Thou didst cause it to grow so vigorously for thine own use or honor. On that account, we now call on thee to defend what is thine own.

<8016> Psalm 80:16. It is burned with fire That is, the vineyard. This is a description of the desolations that had come upon the nation, such as would come upon a vineyard if it were consumed by fire.

It is cut down It has been made desolate by fire and by the axe.

They perish at the rebuke of thy countenance At the frown on thy face, as if God has only to look upon people in anger, and they perish. The word they refers to those who were represented by the vine which had been brought out of Egypt — the people of the land.

<8017> Psalm 80:17. Let thy hand be upon the man of thy right hand Luther renders this, “Let thy hand guard the folks of thy right hand, and the people whom thou hast powerfully chosen.” The right hand is the place of honor; and the phrase “the man of thy right hand” means one who occupies such a position of honor. The phrase “Let thy hand be upon” is ambiguous. It may denote either favor or wrath; let it be upon him either to protect him, or to punish him. The connection, however, evidently demands the former interpretation, for it is in reference to the “man whom God had made strong for himself.” The allusion is either

(a) to some individual man whom God had raised up to honor, as a prince or ruler of the people; or

(b) to the people as such — as Luther understands it.

Most probably the former is the correct interpretation; and the prayer is, that God would interpose in behalf of the ruler of the people — the king of the nation — whom he had exalted to so high honor, and whom he had placed in such a position of responsibility; that he would now endow him properly for his work; that he would give him wisdom in counsel, and valor in battle, in order that the nation might be delivered from its foes. It is, therefore, a prayer for the civil and military ruler of the land, that God would give him grace, firmness, and wisdom, in a time of great emergency. Prof. Alexander strangely supposes that this refers to the Messiah.

Upon the son of man This means simply man, the language being varied for the sake of poetry. Compare the notes at <sup><498></sup>Psalm 8:4. It is true that the appellation “the Son of man” was a favorite designation which the Lord Jesus applied to himself to denote that he was truly a man, and to indicate his connection with human nature; but the phrase is often used merely to denote a man. Here it refers to the king or civil ruler.

whom thou madest strong for thyself The man whom thou hast raised up to that exalted station, and whom thou hast endowed to do a work for thee in that station. A magistrate is a servant and a representative of God, appointed to do a work for him — not for himself. See <sup><500></sup>Romans 13:1-6.

<sup><500></sup>Psalm 80:18. So will not we go back from thee That is, if thou wilt thus interpose; if thou wilt deliver the nation; if thou wilt help him whom thou hast placed over it, giving him wisdom and valor, we will hereafter be obedient to thy law; we will not apostatize from thee. It is a solemn promise or pledge of future obedience made by the psalmist as expressing the purpose of the people if God would be merciful and would withdraw his judgments; a pledge proper in itself, and often made by the Hebrew people only to be disregarded; a pledge proper for all who are in affliction, and often made in such circumstances, but, as in the case of the Hebrews, often made only to be forgotten.

Quicken us literally, Give us life. See the notes at <sup><501></sup>Ephesians 2:1. Restore life to us as a people; save us from ruin, and reanimate us with thy presence.

And we will call upon thy name We will worship thee; we will be faithful in serving thee.

<sup><501></sup>Psalm 80:19. Turn us again, O LORD God of hosts ... See the notes at <sup><501></sup>Psalm 80:3,7,14. This is the sum and the burden of the psalm. The repetition of the prayer shows the earnestness of the people, and their conviction that their only hope in their troubles was that God would interpose and bring them back again; that he would be favorable to them, and lift upon them the light of his countenance. So with all. In our backslidings, our afflictions, and our troubles, our only hope is that God will bring us back to himself; our proper place is at the throne of mercy; our pleadings should be urgent, earnest, and constant, that he will interpose and have mercy on us; our solemn purpose — our expressed and recorded pledge — should be that if we are restored to God, we will wander no more. But, alas! how much easier it is to say this than to do it; how much easier to promise than to perform; how much easier to pledge ourselves when we are in affliction that if the troubles are removed we will be faithful, than it is to carry out such a purpose when the days of prosperity return, and we are again surrounded by the blessings of health and of peace. If all people — even good people — kept the vows which they make, the world would be comparatively a pure and happy world; if the church itself would only carry out its own solemn pledges, it would indeed arise and shine, and the world would soon be filled with light and salvation.

APPENDIX NOTES ON PSALM 80

The mention of the three tribes, “Ephraim, Benjamin, and Manasseh,” may perhaps denote that this is a psalm for the northern kingdom. Some have supposed it to be a prayer of the ten tribes in their captivity in Assyria, and it has been conjectured that the inscription of the Septuagint, ὑπερ τοῦ Ἀσσυρίου, is to be taken in that sense. Calvin, on the other hand, thinks that it is a prayer for the ten tribes by a poet of the southern kingdom. He reminds us that even after the disruption prophets were sent from Judah to Israel, and that Amos (<sup><306></sup>Amos 6:6) rebukes those in Judah who do not “grieve for the wound in Joseph” ... In the course of time a portion of Benjamin may have become incorporated into the northern kingdom. The children of Rachel, Joseph (= Ephraim and Manasseh) and Benjamin, would naturally be drawn together. Benjamin, the tribe of Saul and Ishbosheth, and at one time the leading tribe, would not readily submit to the supremacy of Judah; a jealousy existed which was not extinguished in David’s reign (2 Samuel 19; 20; 21), and which may have been revived later. It is moreover in favor of this view, that in the previous verse Joseph is mentioned, and not Judah; and hence, the whole psalm refers apparently only to the kingdom of Israel. — Perowne.

It has long been felt that this psalm must have been written with reference to the gradual desolation of the ten tribes. This was pointed out by Calvin, and he has been followed by the best subsequent expositors. The reference to the ten tribes being evident, the psalm, according to Calvin, is a prayer of Judah for her afflicted sister. There was a time when, as the Lord complains by the prophet Amos (<sup><306></sup>Amos 6:6), the people of Judah, being “at ease in Zion,” were “not grieved for the affliction of Joseph;” there was a time when they would have taken pleasure in the captivity of the northern kingdom, looking upon it as the removal of their rival. But they have been brought to a better mind, and have learned to pray for their brethren. That this represents the general drift of the psalm, is unquestionable. But it would require to be taken with some modification. Those who, like Dr. Hengstenberg, adhere to the letter of Calvin’s view, are obliged to maintain that Benjamin, which is named along with Ephraim and Manasseh, belonged to Israel, not to Judah. If the psalm is a prayer for Ephraim, it is a prayer for Benjamin also. We get rid of all this difficulty if we look on the psalm as the joint prayer of all the tribes; the prayer in which the house of Joseph and the house of Judah, so long estranged from one another, unite once more in calling on the God of Abraham, and Isaac, and Jacob. The psalm has Asaph’s name in the superscription, and is inscribed “to the chief musician.” It is therefore a song of the temple. What more likely than that it was first sung in the temple in those early years of Hezekiah’s reign, when Benjamin found himself once more associated with Ephraim and Manasseh, his mother’s sons, in the solemn worship of the Lord; that it is the prayer in which the whole seed of Jacob, now happily restored to complete religious fellowship, united in spreading before the Lord the calamities of the nation, and prayed him to restore them again and cause his face to shine? — Binnie.

Psalm 80:17. Let thy hand be upon the man of thy right hand, upon the Son of Man ... A whole host of expositors unhesitatingly refer this to the Messiah, and among them not a few of distinguished name. We subjoin one or two examples:

“The man of God’s right hand,” and “the Son of Man” point out the promised Messiah very clearly. — Scott.

Here again the component parts of the name Benjamin are introduced as parallels, precisely as in <sup>80:16</sup>Psalm 80:16 (15). The man of thy right hand may either be the man whom thy power has raised up, or the man who occupies the post of honor at thy right hand. That the words were intended to suggest both ideas, is a supposition perfectly agreeable to Hebrew usage. A more doubtful question is that in reference to the first words of the sentence, let thy hand be upon him, whether this means in favor or in wrath. The only way in which both senses can be reconciled is by applying the words to the Messiah, as the ground of the faith and hope expressed.

Let thy hand fall not on us but on our substitute. Compare the remarkably similar expressions in <sup><4453></sup>Acts 5:31. — Alexander.

Some think that in <sup><4907></sup>Psalms 80:17 they are acknowledging Messiah, calling him by the name, “Man of thy right hand,” “Branch made strong for thyself.” The Chaldee Targum says this is “King Messiah.” Others claim these names for Israel, for Israel is God’s Benjamin, and God’s strong rod wherewith to rule the nations. The words are in the original such as surely point to Messiah, for they are not “son of thy right hand,” but vyaī<sup><h376></sup> ymj<sup><h325></sup>, “MAN of thy right hand,” and “SON OF MAN whom thou hast made strong for thyself,” uda<sup><h120></sup>; in this resembling <sup><4906></sup>Psalms 8:6. Even if the terms were appropriate to Israel as God’s favored people, still there would be here simply an allusion to that fact, while the real possessor of the name is Messiah, God’s true Israel. And if so, then <sup><4907></sup>Psalms 80:17 is Israel, in the latter day, crying “Hosanna!” to Christ, and so entitled to what his words implicitly promised in <sup><4013></sup>Matthew 20:39 —

“Thou shalt not see me henceforth TILL thou shalt say, Blessed is he that cometh in the name of the Lord.”

They pray, “Appoint him” our captain — let thy hand be upon him, designating him to his office, as Moses did Joshua,” <sup><4023></sup>Numbers 27:23. And so they may claim to be gathered and blessed with a fuller blessing than their fathers, who, by the hand of God upon them, were led up by Ezra (<sup><4309></sup>Ezra 7:9), and Nehemiah (<sup><4028></sup>Nehemiah 2:18), for they claim as their leader Messiah, the true Ezra, “Helper,” and true Nehemiah, “the Lord’s consolation.” Is not <sup><4301></sup>Psalms 110:1 of itself sufficient to justify the name, “The man of thy right hand?”

“Yahweh, God of Hosts, bring us back! Cause thy countenance to shine on us! and we shall be saved” h[*v*h] the response to “Hosanna!” anhvīwō. May we not sympathize in these appeals? May we not put in our own case with theirs? Appoint, Lord, Messtall to be our Captain, our soul’s leader, and we individually shall be saved! We cry “Hosanna!” anhvīwō, and thou wilt give a response that shall make us shout back, h[*v*h]. Yes, thy church in all the earth, Lord God of hosts, with one consent joins in presenting to thee Israel’s pleas for full restoration. — Andrew A. Bonar.

NOTES ON PSALM 81

This psalm purports also to be a psalm of Asaph. See Introduction to Psalm 73. In the absence of any evidence to the contrary, it may be assumed to have been composed by or for the Asaph who was the contemporary of David, and who was, appointed by him to preside over the music of the sanctuary. Venema, indeed, supposes that the psalm was composed in the time of Josiah, at the observance of the great Passover celebrated by him (2 Chronicles 35); but there is no positive evidence of this, though there is nothing in the psalm that is inconsistent with such a supposition. On the phrase in the title, upon Gittith, see the notes at the title to Psalm 8.

The occasion on which the psalm was composed seems to have been a festal occasion, and the circumstances in the psalm will probably best accord with the supposition that it was the Feast of the Passover. Rosenmuller has indeed endeavored to show (see his notes at <sup><1810></sup>Psalm 81:4) that it was composed on occasion of the Feast of Trumpets (<sup><1824></sup>Leviticus 23:24, following); but there is nothing in the psalm which would necessarily restrict it to that, and, as we shall see, all the circumstances in the psalm harmonize with the supposition that it was at the Feast of the Passover, the principal and the most important festival of the Hebrews. It is well remarked by DeWette (Introduction to the psalm), that as the Hebrews were required to make known to their children the design of the ordinance of the Passover (see <sup><1826></sup>Exodus 12:26,27), nothing would be more natural than that the sacred poets should take occasion from the return of that festival to enforce the truths pertaining to it in songs composed for the celebration. Such seems to have been the design of this psalm — reminding the people of the goodness of God in the past, and recalling them from their sins by a remembrance of his mercies, and by a view of what would be the consequences of fully obeying his law.

It would seem from the psalm not improbable that it was composed in a time of national declension in religion, and when there was a tendency to idolatry, and that the object of the author was to rouse the nation from that state, and to endeavor by a reference to the past to bring them back to a more entire devotedness to God.

The contents of the psalm are as follows:

I. The duty of praise, particularly on such occasions as that on which the psalm was composed; a duty enjoined even in Egypt, in the time of Joseph, when God delivered his people out of that strange land, <sup><8810></sup>Psalm 81:1-7.

II. The main command which was then ordained to be the guide of the people — the fixed law of the nation — the fundamental idea in their polity — that there was to be no strange god among them, but that they were to worship the true God, and him alone, <sup><8808></sup>Psalm 81:8-10.

III. The fact that the nation had refused to hear; that there had been such a proneness to worship other gods, and to fall into the habits of idolaters, that God had given them up to their own desires, and suffered them to walk in their own ways, <sup><8811></sup>Psalm 81:11,12.

IV. A statement of what God would have done for them if they had been obedient; of what would have been the effect on their national prosperity if they had hearkened to the commands of God; and consequently of what would still be the result if the people should be obedient, and submit themselves wholly to the law of God, <sup><8813></sup>Psalm 81:13-16. Particularly:

(1) Their enemies would have been subdued, <sup><8814></sup>Psalm 81:14.

(2) Those who hated the Lord would have yielded themselves to him, <sup><8815></sup>Psalm 81:15.

(3) God would have given them abundant prosperity; he would have fed them with the finest of the wheat, and would have satisfied them with honey out of the rock, <sup><8816></sup>Psalm 81:16.

The psalm is of special importance to the church now, as reminding it of its obligation from the past mercies of God, and as showing what would be the consequences if it should be wholly devoted to the service of God.

<sup><8801></sup>Psalm 81:1. Sing aloud unto God our strength The strength and support of the nation; he from whom the nation has derived all its power. The word rendered sing aloud means to rejoice; and then, to make or cause to rejoice. It would be appropriate to a high festal occasion, where music constituted an important part of the public service. And it would be a proper word to employ in reference to any of the great feasts of the Hebrews.

Make a joyful noise A noise indicating joy, as distinguished from a noise of mourning or lamentation.

Unto the God of Jacob Not here particularly the God of the patriarch himself, but of the people who bore his name — his descendants.

Psalm 81:2. Take a psalm literally, “Lift up a psalm; perhaps, as we should say, “Raise the tune.” Or, it may mean, Take an ode, a hymn, a psalm, composed for the occasion, and accompany it with the instruments of music which are specified.

And bring hither the timbrel For the purpose of praise. On the meaning of this word rendered “timbrel” — āṭō<sup><48596></sup> — see the notes at <sup><23512></sup>Isaiah 5:12.

The pleasant harp On the word here rendered “harp” — rwōki<sup><3658></sup> — see also the notes at <sup><23512></sup>Isaiah 5:12. The word translated “pleasant” — my[ī]<sup><45273></sup> — means properly pleasant, agreeable, sweet, <sup><49181></sup>Psalm 133:1; 147:1. It is connected here with the word harp, as meaning that that instrument was distinguished particularly for a sweet or pleasant sound.

With the psaltery On the meaning of the word used here — l bñ<sup><45035></sup> — see the notes at <sup><23512></sup>Isaiah 5:12. These were the common instruments of music among the Hebrews. They were employed alike on sacred occasions, and in scenes of revelry. See <sup><23512></sup>Isaiah 5:12.

Psalm 81:3. Blow up the trumpet The word rendered blow means to make a clangor or noise as on a trumpet. The trumpet was, like the timbrel, the harp, and the psaltery, a common instrument of music, and was employed on all their festive occasions. It was at first made of horn, and then was made similar in shape to a horn. Compare <sup><4065></sup>Joshua 6:5; <sup><4231></sup>Leviticus 25:9; <sup><43925></sup>Job 39:25.

In the new moon On the festival held at the time of the new moon. There was a high festival on the appearance of the new moon in the month of Tisri, or October, which was the beginning of their civil year, and it is not improbable that the return of each new moon was celebrated with special services. See the notes at <sup><23113></sup>Isaiah 1:13; compare <sup><4023></sup>2 Kings 4:23; <sup><41816></sup>Amos 8:5; <sup><43233></sup>1 Chronicles 23:31; <sup><4404></sup>2 Chronicles 2:4. It is not certain, however, that the word used here means new moon. Prof. Alexander renders it in the month; that is, in the month, by way of eminence, in which the passover was celebrated. The word used — vdj o<sup><42320></sup> — means, indeed, commonly the new moon; the day of the new moon; the first day of the lunar month (<sup><0205></sup>Numbers 29:6; <sup><0215></sup>1 Samuel 20:5,18,24); but it also means a month; that is, a lunar month, beginning at the new moon, <sup><0085></sup>Genesis 8:5; <sup><0130></sup>Exodus 13:4; et al. The corresponding or parallel word, as we shall see, which is rendered in our version, in the time appointed, means full moon; and the probability is, as Professor Alexander suggests, that in the beginning of the verse the month is mentioned in general, and the particular time of the month — the full moon — in the other part of the verse. Thus the language is applicable to the passover. On the other supposition — the supposition that the new moon and the full moon are both mentioned — there would be manifest confusion as to the time.

In the time appointed The word used here — aSkī<sup><h3678></sup> — means properly the full moon; the time of the full moon. In Syriac the word means either “the first day of the full moon,” or “the whole time of the full moon.” (Isa Bar Ali, as quoted by Gesenius, Lexicon) Thus, the word means, not as in our translation, in the time appointed, but at the full moon, and would refer to the time of the Passover, which was celebrated on the fourteenth day of the lunar month; that is, when the moon was at the full. <sup><0116></sup>Exodus 12:6.

On our solemn feast day Hebrew, In the day of our feast. The word solemn is not necessarily in the original, though the day was one of great solemnity. The Passover is doubtless referred to.

<sup><0304></sup>Psalm 81:4. For this was a statute for Israel ... See <sup><0116></sup>Exodus 12:3. That is, it was a law for the whole Jewish people, for all who had the name Israel, for all the descendants of Jacob. The word was is not in the original, as if this had been an old commandment which might now be obsolete, but the idea is one of perpetuity: it is a perpetual law for the Hebrew people.

A law of the God of Jacob Hebrew, a judgment; or, right. The idea is, that it was what was due to God; what was his right. It was a solemn claim that he should be thus acknowledged. It was not a matter of conventional arrangement, or a matter of convenience to them; nor was it to be observed merely because it was found to be expedient and conducive to the welfare of the nation. It was a matter of right and of claim on the part of God, and was so to be regarded by the nation. The same is true now of the Sabbath, and of all the appointments which God has made for keeping up religion in the world. All these arrangements are indeed expedient and proper; they conduce to the public welfare and to the happiness of man; but there is a higher reason for their observance than this. It is that God demands their observance; that he claims as his own the time so appropriated. Thus he claims the Sabbath, the entire Sabbath, as his own; he requires that it shall be employed in his service, that it shall be regarded as his day; that it shall be made instrumental in keeping up the knowledge of himself in the world, and in promoting his glory. <sup><1200></sup>Exodus 20:10. People, therefore, “rob God” (compare <sup><1008></sup>Malachi 3:8) when they take this time for needless secular purposes, or devote it to other ends and uses. Nor can this be sinless. The highest guilt which man can commit is to “rob” his Maker of what belongs to Him, and of what He claims.

<sup><1805></sup>Psalm 81:5. This he ordained in Joseph for a testimony literally, he placed this; that is, he appointed it. The word Joseph here stands for the whole Hebrew people, as in <sup><1800></sup>Psalm 80:1. See the notes at that verse. The meaning is, that the ordinance for observing this festival — the Passover — was to be traced back to the time when they were in Egypt. The obligation to observe it was thus enhanced by the very antiquity of the observance, and by the fact that it was one of the direct appointments of God in that strange and foreign land.

When he went out through the land of Egypt Margin, against. Or rather, In his going out of the land of Egypt. Literally, In going upon the land of Egypt. The allusion is, undoubtedly, to the time when the Hebrews went out of the land of Egypt — to the Exodus; and the exact idea is, that, in doing this, they passed over a considerable portion of the land of Egypt; or, that they passed over the land. The idea in the margin, of its being against the land of Egypt, is not necessarily in the original.

Where I heard a language that I understood not literally, “The lip [that is, the language] of one that I did not know, I heard.” This refers, undoubtedly, not to God, but to the people. The author of this psalm identifies himself here with the people — the whole nation — and speaks as if he were one of them, and as if he now recollected the circumstances at the time — the strange language — the foreign customs — the oppressions and burdens borne by the people. Throwing himself back, as it were, to that time (compare the notes at <sup><3047></sup>1 Thessalonians 4:17) — he seems to himself to be in the midst of a people speaking a strange tongue — a language unintelligible to him — the language of a foreign nation. The Jews, in all their long captivity in Egypt — a period of four hundred years (see the notes at <sup><4005></sup>Acts 7:6) — preserved their own language apparently incorrupt. So far as appears, they spoke the same language, without change, when they came out of Egypt, that Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob had used. The Egyptian was entirely a foreign language to them, and had no affinity with the Hebrew.

Psalm 81:6. I removed his shoulder from the burden The burden which the people of Israel were called to hear in Egypt. The reference is undoubtedly to their burdens in making bricks, and conveying them to the place where they were to be used; and perhaps also to the fact that they were required to carry stone in building houses and towns for the Egyptians. Compare <sup><0111></sup>Exodus 1:11-14; 5:4-17. The meaning is, that he had saved them from these burdens, to wit, by delivering them from their hard bondage. The speaker here evidently is God. In the previous verse it is the people. Such a change of person is not uncommon in the Scriptures.

His hands were delivered from the pots Margin, as in Hebrew, passed away. That is, they were separated from them, or made free. The word rendered pots usually has that signification. <sup><1812></sup>Job 41:20; <sup><0124></sup>1 Samuel 2:14; 2 Chronicles 35:13; but it may also mean a basket. <sup><2412></sup>Jeremiah 24:2; <sup><2107></sup>2 Kings 10:7. The latter is probably the meaning here. The allusion is to baskets which might have been used in carrying clay, or conveying the bricks after they were made: perhaps a kind of hamper that was swung over the shoulders, with clay or bricks in each — somewhat like the instrument used now by the Chinese in carrying tea — or like the neck-yoke which is employed in carrying sap where maple sugar is manufactured, or milk on dairy farms. There are many representations on Egyptian sculptures which would illustrate this. The idea is that of a burden, or task, and the allusion is to the deliverance that was accomplished by removing them to another land.

Psalm 81:7. Thou calledst in trouble The people of Israel. <sup><0123></sup>Exodus 2:23; 3:9; 14:10.

And I delivered thee I brought the people out of Egypt.

I answered thee in the secret place of thunder That is, in the lonely, retired, solemn place where the thunder rolled; the solitudes where there was no voice but the voice of thunder, and where that seemed to come from the deep recesses of the mountain gorges. The allusion is doubtless to Sinai. Compare <sup><0297></sup>Exodus 19:17-19. The meaning is, that he gave a response — a real reply — to their prayer — amid the solemn scenes of Sinai, when he gave them his law; when he recognized them as his people; when he entered into covenant with them.

I proved thee I tried you; I tested your fidelity.

At the waters of Meribah Margin, as in Hebrew, strife. This was at Mount Horeb. <sup><1717></sup>Exodus 17:5-7. The trial — the proof — consisted in his bringing water from the rock, showing that he was God — that he was their God.

<sup><880></sup>Psalm 81:8. Hear, O my people, and I will testify unto thee ... See the notes at the similar passage in <sup><810></sup>Psalm 50:7. God calls their attention to what he required of them; to what his law demanded; to what was the condition of their being his people and of securing his favor. What the demanded was, that they should acknowledge him; obey him; serve him; that there should be no strange god among them, and that they should worship no false god, <sup><880></sup>Psalm 81:9.

Neither shalt thou worship any strange god The Hebrew word here is different — rkne<sup><5236></sup> — but means substantially the same thing. The allusion is to gods worshipped by foreign nations.

<sup><880></sup>Psalm 81:10. I am the LORD thy God ... See <sup><1212></sup>Exodus 20:2. The meaning is, “I am Yahweh, that God; the God to be worshipped and honored by thee; I only am thy God, and no other god is to be recognized or acknowledged by thee.” The foundation of the claim to exclusive service and devotion is here laid in the fact that he had brought them out of the land of Egypt. Literally, had caused them to ascend, or go up from that land. The claim thus asserted seems to be twofold:

(a) That in doing this, he had shown that he was God, or that he had performed a work which none but God could perform, and had thus shown his existence and power; and

(b) that by this he had brought them under special obligations to himself, inasmuch as they owed all that they had — their national existence and liberty — entirely to him.

Open thy mouth wide, and I will fill it Possibly an allusion to young birds, when fed by the parent-bird. The meaning here is, “I can amply supply all your needs. You need not go to other gods — the gods of other lands — as if there were any deficiency in my power or resources; as if I were not able to meet your necessities. All your needs I can meet. Ask what you need — what you will; come to me and make any request with reference to yourselves as individuals or as a nation — to this life or the life to come — and you will find in me all abundant supply for all your needs, and a willingness to bless you commensurate with my resources.” What is here said of the Hebrews may be said of the people of God at all times. There is not a want of our nature — of our bodies or our souls; a want pertaining to this life or the life to come — to ourselves, to our families, to our friends, to the church, or to our country — which God is not able to meet; and there is not a real necessity in any of these respects which he is not willing to meet. Why, then, should his people ever turn for happiness to the “weak and beggarly elements of the world” (compare the notes at <sup><404></sup>Galatians 4:9), as if God could not satisfy them? Why should they seek for happiness in vain amusements, or in sensual pleasures, as if God could not, or would not, supply the real needs of their souls?

<sup><4811></sup>Psalm 81:11. But my people ... See <sup><4780></sup>Psalm 78:10,11,17-19. “And Israel would none of me.” Literally, “Did not will me;” that is, “did not incline to me; were not attached to me; were not disposed to worship me, and to find happiness in me.” Compare <sup><2019></sup>Isaiah 1:19; <sup><1830></sup>Job 39:9; <sup><1025></sup>Proverbs 1:25. They refused or rejected him. See <sup><1231></sup>Exodus 32:1; <sup><625></sup>Deuteronomy 32:15,18.

<sup><4812></sup>Psalm 81:12. So I gave them up unto their own hearts' lust Margin, as in Hebrew, to the hardness of their own hearts. Literally, “I sent them, or I dismissed them, to the hardness of their hearts.” I suffered them to have what, in the hardness of their hearts they desired, or what their hard and rebellious hearts prompted them to desire: I indulged them in their wishes. I gave them what they asked, and left them to themselves to work out the problem about success and happiness in their own way — to let them see what must be the result of forsaking the true God. The world — and the church too — has been often suffered to make this experiment.

<sup><4813></sup>Psalm 81:13. Oh that my people had hearkened unto me This passage is designed mainly to show what would have been the consequences if the Hebrew people had been obedient to the commands of God, <sup><4814></sup>Psalm 81:14-16. At the same time, however, it expresses what was the earnest desire — the wish — the preference of God, namely, that they had been obedient, and had enjoyed his favor. This is in accordance with all the statements, all the commands, all the invitations, all the warnings, in the Bible. In the entire volume of inspiration there is not one command addressed to people to walk in the ways of sin; there is not one statement that God desires they should do it; there is not one intimation that he wishes the death of the sinner. The contrary is implied in all the declarations which God has made — in all his commands, warnings, and invitations — in all his arrangements for the salvation of people. See <sup><4872></sup>Deuteronomy 5:29; 32:29,30; <sup><2488></sup>Isaiah 48:18; <sup><4823></sup>Ezekiel 18:23,32; 33:11; <sup><6189></sup>2 Peter 3:9; <sup><4292></sup>Luke 19:42.

And Israel had walked in my ways! Had kept my commandments; had been obedient to my laws. When people, therefore, do not walk in the ways of God it is impossible that they should take refuge, as an excuse for it, in the plea that God desires this, or that he commands it, or that he is pleased with it, or that he approves it. There is no possible sense in which this can be true; in every sense, and on every account, he prefers that people should be obedient, and not disobedient; good, and not bad; happy, and not miserable; saved, and not lost. Every doctrine of theology should be held and interpreted in consistency with this as a fundamental truth. That there are things which are difficult to be explained on the supposition that this is true, must be admitted; but what truth is there in reference to which there are not difficulties to be explained? And is there anything in this, or in any of the truths of the Bible, which more demands explanation than the facts which are actually occurring under the government of God: the fact that sin and misery have been allowed to come into the universe; the fact that multitudes constantly suffer whom God could at once relieve?

<sup><4814></sup>Psalm 81:14. I should soon have subdued their enemies This is one of the consequences which, it is said, would have followed if they had been obedient to the laws of God. The phrase rendered soon means literally like a little; that is, as we might say, in a little, to wit, in a little time. The word rendered subdued means to bow down; to be curved or bent; and the idea is, that he would have caused them to bow down, to wit, by submission before them. Compare <sup><1529></sup>Deuteronomy 32:29,30.

And turned my hand against their adversaries Against those who oppressed and wronged them. The act of turning the hand against one is significant of putting him away — repelling him — disowning him — as when we would thrust one away from us with aversion.

<sup><1815></sup>Psalm 81:15. The haters of the LORD The enemies of the Lord, often represented as those who hate him — hatred being always in fact or in form connected with an unwillingness to submit to God. It is hatred of his law; hatred of his government; hatred of his plans; hatred of his character. See <sup><1810></sup>Romans 1:30; <sup><1807></sup>John 7:7; 15:18; 23-25. Compare <sup><1815></sup>Exodus 20:5.

Should have submitted themselves unto him Margin, yielded retained obedience. Hebrew, lied. See the phrase explained in the notes at <sup><1814></sup>Psalm 18:44. The meaning is, that they would have been so subdued as to acknowledge his authority or supremacy, while it is, at the same time, implied that this would have been forced and not cordial. No external power, though it may so conquer as to make people outwardly obedient, can affect the will, or subdue that. The grace of God alone can do that, and it is the special triumph of grace that it can do it.

But their time The time of his people. They would have continued to be a happy and a flourishing nation.

Should have endured for ever Perpetually — as long as they continued to be obedient. If a nation were obedient to the will of God; if it wholly obeyed his laws; if it countenanced by statute no form of sin; if it protected no iniquity; if it were temperate, just, virtuous, honest, there is no reason why its institutions should not be perpetual, or why it should ever be overthrown. Sin is, in all cases, the cause of the ruin of nations, as it is of individuals.

<sup><1816></sup>Psalm 81:16. He should have fed them also He would have given them prosperity, and their land would have produced abundantly of the necessities — even of the luxuries — of life. This is in accordance with the usual promises of the Scriptures, that obedience to God will be followed by national temporal prosperity. See <sup><1623></sup>Deuteronomy 32:13,14; <sup><5008></sup>1 Timothy 4:8; <sup><1971></sup>Psalms 37:11. Compare the notes at <sup><4185></sup>Matthew 5:5.

With the finest of the wheat Margin, as in Hebrew, with the fat of wheat. The meaning is, the best of the wheat — as the words fat and fatness are often used to denote excellence and abundance. <sup><1072></sup>Genesis 27:28,39; <sup><1896></sup>Job 36:16; <sup><1918></sup>Psalms 36:8; 63:5; 65:11.

And with honey out of the rock should I have satisfied thee Palestine abounded with bees, and honey was a favorite article of food. <sup><4911></sup>Genesis 43:11; <sup><1808></sup>Deuteronomy 8:8; 32:13; <sup><1945></sup>1 Samuel 14:25,26; <sup><2375></sup>Isaiah 7:15; <sup><2613></sup>Ezekiel 16:13; <sup><4184></sup>Matthew 3:4. Much of that which was obtained was wild honey, deposited by the bees in the hollows of trees, and as it would seem in the caverns of the rocks. Much of it was gathered also from rocky regions, and this was regarded as the most delicate and valuable. I do not know the cause of this, nor why honey in high and rocky countries should be more pure and white than that obtained from other places; but the whitest and the most pure and delicate honey that I have ever seen I found at Chamouni in Switzerland. Dr. Thomson (land and the Book, vol. ii. p. 362) says of the rocky region in the vicinity of Timnath, that “bees were so abundant in a wood at no great distance from this spot that the honey dropped down from the trees on the ground;” and that “he explored densely-wooded gorges in Hermon and in Southern Lebanon where wild bees are still found, both in trees and in the clefts of the rocks.” The meaning here is plain, that, if Israel had been obedient to God, he would have blessed them with abundance — with the richest and most coveted productions of the field. Pure religion — obedience to God — morality — temperance, purity, honesty, and industry, such as religion requires — are always eminently favorable to individual and national prosperity; and if a man or a nation desired to be most prospered, most successful in the lawful and proper objects of individual or national existence, and most happy, nothing would tend more to conduce to it than those virtues which piety enjoins and cultivates. Individuals and nations, even in respect to temporal prosperity, are most unwise, as well as most wicked, when they disregard the laws of God, and turn away from the precepts and the spirit of religion. It is true of nations, as it is of individuals, that “Godliness is profitable unto all things, having promise of the life that now is,” <sup><5018></sup>1 Timothy 4:8.

APPENDIX NOTES ON PSALM 81

A partial reunion gladdened the whole church in the first year of Hezekiah. The recent captivity of two tribes and a half had weakened the northern kingdom; and Hoshea, who was Hezekiah's contemporary and the last of its kings, was led by a sense of duty to break the evil custom which his predecessors had inherited from Jeroboam the son of Nebat, "who sinned, and made Israel to sin." He suspended the law against going up to Jerusalem. Hezekiah's posts were permitted to carry to every part of the kingdom the invitation to unite once more with Judah in celebrating the passover in the city which God had chosen out of all the tribes of Israel (2 Chronicles 30) The invitation, scorned by many, was gladly accepted by others; and a passover was celebrated the like of which had not been seen in Israel since the days of Solomon and the undivided kingdom.

So happy a reunion — happy in itself, twice happy as the pledge of the time when Ephraim should no more envy Judah, and Judah no more vex Ephraim, but they should be one stick in the Lord's hand — could not fail to call forth new songs. There is, I think, sufficient ground to attribute to it Psalm 81. It is, obviously and by universal consent, a festal song. The reference to the exodus from Egypt shows that, although framed to suit all the three feasts, it had a special connection with the passover; and the emphatic reminder that the feast had been ordained in Joseph for a testimony may be fairly interpreted as pointing to an occasion when Ephraim and Manasseh, the sons of Joseph, participated with Judah in the solemn rite. There is an undertone of sadness toward the end which reminds us that the desolation of the northern kingdom was at hand; but it opens as with a blast of trumpets:

"Sing aloud unto God our strength," etc. — Binnie

<sup><1810></sup>Psalm 81:5. A language that I understood not What was this unknown tongue? Two interpretations have been given. It has been explained

(1) Of the language of the Egyptians, which was a foreign tongue to the Hebrews, who were "stranger's in the land of Egypt." Compare <sup><1841></sup>Psalm 114:1, "the people of strange language," with <sup><1839></sup>Deuteronomy 28:49; <sup><2339></sup>Isaiah 33:19; <sup><2455></sup>Jeremiah 5:15. Accordingly this fact is mentioned as one of the aggravations of their condition in Egypt, like the toiling with "the burden" and "the basket." Calvin, who takes this view, remarks that the redemption of Israel from a people of foreign language was a special mark of God's favor, inasmuch as the want of that common language, which is the bond of society, made foreigner and enemy synonymous terms:

“Quia enim lingua est veluti character mentis ac speculum, non secus ac sylvestres ferae, invicem alieni sunt qui carent linguae usu.”

It is no objection to this view that the words of God follow abruptly. See <sup><1972></sup>Psalm 75:2.

(2) Of the voice of God, a voice which the people had heard as uttered in his judgments upon the Egyptians, and in his covenant made with themselves, but had not understood (compare <sup><4175></sup>Acts 7:25). This language is there given in substance in a poetical form by the psalmist, who seems suddenly to hear it, and to become the interpreter to his people of the divine voice. He here places in a fresh light, gives a new application to the earlier revelation, the meaning and purpose of which were not then understood.

Hupfeld supposes it to be called an “unknown” language, merely because it is divine, unlike the everyday known language of people. Ab. Ezra sees a reference to the words of God uttered on Sinai. So also Delitzsch, who would explain the expression by reference to <sup><1848></sup>Exodus 6:2, ...

“It was the language of a known, and yet unknown God which Israel heard from Sinai. God in fact, now revealed himself to Israel in a new character, not only as the Redeemer and Saviour of his people from their Egyptian bondage, but also as their King, giving them a law which bound them together as a people, and was the basis of their national existence.”

This latter interpretation, which regards the language here spoken of as the voice of God, and as virtually given in the following verses, is now that most commonly adopted. It is that of Mendelssohn, Ewald, Delitzsch, and Hupfeld. — Perowne.

<sup><1886></sup>Psalm 81:6. The words of God follow without any indication of a change of speakers. The prophet identifies himself with, and becomes the organ of, the divine voice. He reminds Israel of that fact in connection with which the festival was instituted. It is as though, amidst all the gladness of the feast, and all the music and the pomp of its celebration, other thoughts arose, not to cheek, but to guide the current of holy exultation. The sound of trumpet and timbrel and sacred song must be hushed while Yahweh speaks, to tell his forgetful people the lesson of their past history associated with that festival, the warning and the exhortation suggested by their own perverseness. If they would praise him aright, it must be with hearts mindful of his goodness, and sensible of their own unworthiness and ingratitude. For the spirit in which all festivals should be kept, see on the offering of the first-fruits, <sup><1811></sup>Deuteronomy 26:1-11. — Perowne.

At the first clause of <sup><1816></sup>Psalm 81:6, compare <sup><1816></sup>Exodus 6:6,7, "I, the Lord, bring you out from under the burden of the Egyptians." The basket <sup><1730></sup>dwD is, according to the parallelism, the burdenbasket. Baskets of this kind were found in the sepulchral vaults which have been opened in Thebes, of which Rosellini first furnished drawings and descriptions: the Israelites used them for carrying from one place to another the clay and manufactured bricks. — Hengstenberg.

The same author, in his Egypt and the Books of Moses, has the following remarks illustrative of the allusion in our psalm: Of the laborers, says Rosellini (describing a picture from a tomb in Thebes), some are employed in transporting the clay in vessels, some in intermingling it with the straw, others are taking the bricks out of the form and placing them in rows, still others, with a piece of wood upon their backs and ropes on each side, carry away the bricks already burned or dried ... Their complexion, physiognomy, and beard permit us not to be mistaken in supposing them to be Hebrews. Among the Hebrews, four Egyptians are seen: two of them carry a stick in their hand ready to fall upon two other Egyptians, who are here represented like the Hebrews, one of them carrying on his shoulder a vessel of clay, and the other returning from the transportation of brick, carrying his empty vessel to get a new load.

NOTES ON PSALM 82

This, too, is a “Psalm of Asaph.” See Introduction to Psalm 73. There is nothing, however, in its contents to determine the time or the occasion of its being composed, although there is no difficulty in ascertaining the design for which it was written, or the use to be made of it. It is intended to state the duties and the responsibilities of magistrates or civil rulers. Though the language is such as was adapted especially to the Hebrew magistracy, and to the duties of magistrates as specified in the Jewish law, yet the principles are such as should guide magistrates at all times and in all countries; and the truths suggested are such as are eminently worthy the attention of all who are entrusted with authority.

The psalm was evidently composed at a time when there was much that was unjust and oppressive in the administration of justice; when the magistrates were corrupt; when they could be bribed; when they were forgetful of their obligation to defend the poor and the fatherless — the afflicted and the needy; when manifest consequences of the evil administration of justice prevailed in the land, and “all the foundations of the earth” seemed to be “out of course;” and when those in power were haughty and arrogant, as if they were not people, and were not to die. DeWette supposes that the psalm was composed in the time of the Babylonian exile, and had reference to the conduct of the oppressive rulers in that land; but it is not necessary to suppose this. There were doubtless many occasions in the history of the Hebrew people when all that is here said of the conduct of their rulers and judges was applicable to them. Compare <sup><2017></sup>Isaiah 1:17,23,26.

The contents of the psalm are as follows:

I. A reference to God as the Supreme Ruler; the Ruler of those that rule; the God to whom all magistrates, however exalted in rank, are responsible, <sup><981></sup>Psalm 82:1.

II. A reference to the character of the magistrates at the time when the psalm was written, as those who judged unjustly; who were partial in the administration of justice; and who favored people of rank and position, <sup><981></sup>Psalm 82:2.

III. A statement of the duties of magistrates, in reference particularly to the poor, the fatherless, the needy, and the afflicted, <sup><1931B></sup>Psalm 82:3,4.

IV. A further statement in regard to the character of the magistrates at the time when the psalm was written, particularly as ignorant, and as walking in darkness, <sup><1931B></sup>Psalm 82:5.

V. A solemn appeal to them as mortal people — as subject to death like others — though they had a rank which entitled them to the appellation of “gods,” and were the representatives of the Most High on earth, <sup><1931B></sup>Psalm 82:6,7.

VI. A call on God to arise and to execute judgment in the earth, for he was the Supreme Ruler, and the nations, with all their interests, pertained to him, <sup><1931B></sup>Psalm 82:8.

<sup><1931B></sup>Psalm 82:1. God standeth in the congregation of the mighty In the assembly of the rulers and judges; among those of most exalted rank and station. He is there to observe them; to give them law; to direct their decisions; to judge them. He is supreme over them; and he holds them responsible to himself The word rendered congregation is that which is commonly applied to the assembly of the people of Israel, considered as an organized body, or as a body politic. It here, however, refers to magistrates considered as a body or class of people; as those who have assemblages or meetings, with special reference to their duties as magistrates. The word rendered “mighty” — I ae<sup><h410></sup> — is in the singular number, and is one of the names which are given to God; hence, the literal rendering is, “God standeth in the assembly of God.” The Septuagint renders it, In the synagogue of the gods. So also the Latin Vulgate. The reference, however, is undoubtedly to magistrates, and the idea is, that they were to be regarded as representatives of God; as acting in his name; and as those, therefore, to whom, in a subordinate sense, the name gods might be given. Compare <sup><1931B></sup>Psalm 82:6. In <sup><1220B></sup>Exodus 21:6; 22:8,9,28, also, the same word in the plural is applied to magistrates, and is properly translated judges in our common version. Compare the notes at <sup><1931B></sup>John 10:34,35. The idea is, that they were the representatives of the divine sovereignty in the administration of justice. Compare <sup><1931B></sup>Romans 13:1,2,6. They were, in a sense, gods to other people; but they were not to forget that God stood among them as their God; that if they were exalted to a high rank in respect to their fellowmen, they were, nevertheless, subject to One to whom the name of God belonged in the highest sense.

He judgeth among the gods As they to whom the name gods is thus given as the representatives of the divine sovereignty judged among people, so God would judge among them. If they were, in some sense (in consequence of their representing the divine majesty, and deriving their power and appointment from God), independent of people, they were in no sense independent of God himself.

Psalm 82:2. How long will ye judge unjustly literally, Judge evil. This is designed, evidently, to denote the prevailing character of the magistrates at the time when the psalm was written. Unhappily such occasions occur very often in the course of human affairs.

And accept the persons of the wicked? literally, Lift up [or bear) the faces of the wicked. The meaning is, that they showed favor or partiality to wicked people; they did not decide cases according to truth, but were influenced by a regard for particular persons on account of their rank, their position, their wealth, or their relation to themselves. This is a common phrase in the Scriptures to denote favoritism or partiality. Job 34:19; Acts 10:34; Romans 2:11; 1 Peter 1:17; Leviticus 19:15; Deuteronomy 1:17.

Psalm 82:3. Defend the poor and fatherless literally, judge; that is, Pronounce just judgment; see that right is done to them. This is required everywhere in the Scriptures. The meaning is not that judgment is to be pronounced in their favor because they are poor, or because they are orphans, for this would be to do what they had just been charged with as in itself wrong, accepting of persons; that is, showing favor on account of condition or rank, rather than on account of a just claim. The idea is, that the poor and the fatherless, having no natural protectors, were likely to be wronged or oppressed; that they had none to defend their claims; and that magistrates, therefore, as if they were their natural protectors, should see that their rights were maintained. See the notes at Isaiah 1:17.

Do justice to the afflicted and needy See that justice is done them; that they are not wronged by persons of wealth, of power, and of rank. Such care does religion take of those who have no natural guardians. The poor and the needy — the widow and the fatherless — owe to the religion of the Bible a debt which no language can express.

Psalm 82:4. Deliver the poor and needy That is, Deliver them from the power and the arts of those who would oppress and wrong them. This would not be showing them partiality; it would be simply doing them justice.

Rid them out of the hand of the wicked Deliver, or Rescue them from their hands; that is, from their attempts to oppress and wrong them.

Psalm 82:5. They know not, neither will they understand This is designed still further to characterize the magistrates at the time referred to in the psalm. They not merely judged unjustly, and were not merely partial in the administration of justice (Psalm 82:2), but they did not desire to understand their duty, and the true principles on which justice should be administered. They were at no pains to inform themselves, either in regard to those principles, or in regard to the facts in particular cases. All just judgment must be based

(a) on a true knowledge of what the law is, or what is right; and

(b) on a knowledge of the facts in a particular case. Where there is no such knowledge, of course there must be a mal-administration of justice.

One of the first requisites, therefore, in a magistrate is, that he shall have a proper knowledge of the law; his duty is to ascertain the exact facts in each individual case that comes before him, and then impartially to apply the law to that case.

They walk on in darkness In ignorance of the law and of the facts in the case.

All the foundations of the earth See the notes at Psalm 11:3; 75:3. All settled principles; all the things on which the welfare of society rests; all on which the prosperity of the world depends. The manner in which justice is administered is as if the very foundations of the earth should be disturbed, and the world should move without order.

Are out of course Margin, as in Hebrew, moved. That is, they are moved from their proper place; the earth no longer rests firmly and safely on its foundation. This language is taken from the idea so often occurring in the Scriptures, and in the language of people generally, that the earth rests on solid foundations — as a building does. The idea is derived from the stability and fixedness of the earth, and from the fact that when a building is fixed and stable we infer that it has a solid foundation. The thought here is, that a proper administration of justice is essential to the stability and prosperity of a state — as essential as a solid foundation is to the stability of the edifice which is reared on it. The effect of a real-administration of justice in any community may be well compared with what the result would be if the foundations of the earth should be removed, or if the laws which now keep it in its place should cease to operate.

<82:6> Psalm 82:6. I have said, Ye are gods See the notes at <82:1> Psalm 82:1. I have given you this title; I have conferred on you an appellation which indicates a greater nearness to God than any other which is bestowed on men — an appellation which implies that you are God’s representatives on earth, and that your decision is, in an important sense, to be regarded as his.

And all of you are children of the Most High Sons of God. That is, You occupy a rank which makes it proper that you should be regarded as his sons.

<82:7> Psalm 82:7. But ye shall die like men You are mortal, like other people. This fact you have forgotten. You have been lifted up with pride, as if you were in fact more exalted than other people; as if you were not subject to the law which consigns all people to the grave. An ancient monarch directed his servant to address him each morning in this language: “Remember, sire, that thou art mortal.” No more salutary truth can be impressed on the minds of the rich and the great than that they are, in this respect, like other people — like the poorest, the meanest of the race: that they will die under similar forms of disease; that they will experience the same pain; that all which is fearful in death will be their portion as well as that of the most obscure; and that in the grave, with whatever pomp and splendor they descend to it, or however magnificent the monument which may be reared over the spot where they lie, there will be the same offensive and repulsive process of decay which occurs in the most humble grave in the country churchyard. Why, then — oh, why — should man be proud?

And fall like one of the princes And die as one of the princes. The idea in the word fall may be, perhaps, that they would die by the hand of violence — or be cut down, as princes often are, e.g. in battle. The use of the word princes here denotes that they would die as other persons of exalted rank do; that is, that they were mortal as all people, high and low, are — as common people are, and as princes are. Though they had names — l aē<sup><h410></sup>, and pyhi a<sup><h430></sup> — that suggested the idea of divinity, yet such appellations did not make any real change in their condition as people, and as subject to the ordinary laws under which people live. Whatever name they bore. it did not afford any security against death.

<82> Psalm 82:8. *Arise, O God, judge the earth That is, Since there is such a failure in the administration of justice by those to whom it pertains, and who are appointed to do it in thy stead, do thou, O God, come forth thyself, and see that justice is executed among people. Do thou take the matter into thine own hands, and see that impartial justice is done everywhere among people. It pertains to thee as the great Proprietor of the earth to exercise justice; and we have nowhere else to look when men fail to do their duty.

For thou shalt inherit all nations Or rather, All nations belong to thee as thine inheritance; that is, as thine own. The word “inherit” is used here, as it often is, merely to denote possession or proprietorship, without reference to the question how the possession is obtained. The word strictly refers to what has been received from parents, or what people are heirs to; and, in this sense, it is commonly applied to the land of Palestine, either as what was derived by the Jewish people from their ancestors the patriarchs, or as what they had received from God as a Father. <23> Exodus 32:13:

<13> Deuteronomy 1:38; 12:10. It is here used simply in the sense of possessing it. That is, the whole earth belonged to God, and the administration of its affairs pertained to him. As those had failed who had been appointed under him to the office of judges — as they had not been faithful to their trust — as no confidence could be reposed in them, — the psalmist calls upon God to interfere, either by appointing other magistrates; or by leading those who were in office to just views of their duty; or by his own direct judgments, punishing the wicked, and rewarding the righteous, by the interpositions of his providence. We may hence learn

(1) That there are times on earth when wickedness is so prevalent, and when there is such a want of faithfulness in civil rulers, that we have no other resource but to call upon God to interpose.

(2) That it is right to call upon Him to see that justice should be done in the earth even in the punishment of the guilty, since all the interests of society depend on the proper administration of justice.

(3) For the same reason it is right to pray that God would judge the world, and that justice may be done on the human race.

It is desirable and proper that justice should be done; hence, there is no malignity in desiring that there may be a universal judgment, and that the affairs of the universe should be placed on an equal and righteous foundation. It is possible that there may be a just and holy joy at the idea that justice is done, and that God shows himself the friend of truth, of order, and of law. Compare the notes at <sup><49810></sup>Psalm 58:10; <sup><66901></sup>Revelation 19:1-3.

APPENDIX NOTES ON PSALM 82

Ewald, DeWette, Hitzig, and others suppose the expostulations of the psalm to be addressed, not to Israelite but to pagan rulers, satraps, etc., by a poet who lived toward the end of the exile in Babylon, and who, witnessing the corruption which was fast undermining the Babylonian empire, lifted up his voice against it. This view rests mainly upon the appeal to God (in <sup><49817></sup>Psalm 82:7) as the Ruler and Judge of all nations, not of Israel exclusively. But the psalmists so frequently take a wider range than their own nation, so constantly in a true prophetic spirit recognize the special rule and revelation of God in Israel, as only a part of his universal dominion (compare for instance, <sup><49076></sup>Psalm 7:6-8), that there is no need to depart from the more common view that Israelite judges are meant; especially as this is confirmed by the general tenor of the psalm. Besides, as Stier and Hupfeld have pointed out, the names, “gods,” and “sons of the Highest,” are never given to pagan monarchs in Scripture. The former says,

“We look in vain for a passage where a pagan king, or even an Israelite, except David and Solomon as types of the Messiah, is thought worthy of this name (Son of God).” — Perowne.

If the psalm was composed in the time of David, in favor of which supposition may be pleaded the prophetic tone special to the Asaph of that period, and against which no tenable ground can be advanced (even Hitzig must allow that there is no allusion of any kind, no late form or connecting particle, no term which could be pronounced as being decidedly of later origin to betray an author belonging to a later age), the psalmist could not, in the first instance, assuredly have referred to the king — a view which is confirmed by the express mention of “the princes” in <sup><49817></sup>Psalm 82:7, as compared with “the ancients of his people and the princes thereof” in Isaiah

3. Still, though the psalm was in the first instance called forth by existing relations, yet being destined for all ages, it undoubtedly admits of being applied to kings in the discharge of their duty as judges, in so far as they are guilty of that perversion of right here imputed to them ...

In the law of Moses all those whose office it is to command, to judge, and to arbitrate, all those to whom in any respect reverence and regard is due, are set apart as the representatives of God on earth. The foundation of this is found in the commandment, "Honour thy father and mother," in the Decalogue. It was shown in the Beitr. P. iii. p. 605, that this commandment belongs to the first table — thou shalt fear and honor God, first in himself, second in those who represent him on earth — and further, that the parents are named in it only in an individualizing manner as representatives of all who are possessed of worth, and are worthy of esteem. The direction in <sup><B1932></sup>Leviticus 19:32 rises on the foundation of this commandment, where respect for the aged appears as the immediate consequence of respect for God, whose eternity was designed to be revered and honored under the emblem of their old age; also <sup><D227></sup>Exodus 22:27, according to which we are taught to recognize in governors a reflection of the majesty of God: "thou shalt not revile God, nor curse the ruler of thy people," that is, thou shalt not curse thy ruler (or in any other way dishonor him), for he bears the image of God, and every insult offered to such a representative of God in his kingdom is an insult against God, in him God himself is honored and revered — compare <sup><B323></sup>1 Chronicles 29:23, "and Solomon sat upon the throne of Yahweh." But it was in connection with the office of judge that the stamp of divinity was most conspicuous, inasmuch as that office led the people under the foreground of an humble earthly tribunal to contemplate the background of a lofty divine judgment: "the judgment is God's," <sup><B117></sup>Deuteronomy 1:17, whoever comes before it, comes before God, <sup><D206></sup>Exodus 21:6; 22:7,8.

The position assigned to the office of judge must, when properly considered, have exerted a practical influence of a twofold character. It must have filled those who were brought before its tribunal with a sacred reverence for an authority which maintained its right upon earth in the name of God. And on the part of the judges themselves it must have led them to take a lofty view of their calling, it must have called forth earnest efforts to practice the virtues of him whose place they occupied, him "who does not favor princes, and makes no distinction between rich and poor, for they are the work of his hands," <sup><B349></sup>Job 34:19, and it must have awakened a holy fear of becoming liable to his judgment. For there could be no doubt that as they judged in God's stead, the heavenly Judge would not suffer them to go unpunished should they misuse their office, but would in that ease come forth from his place, and utter his thundering cry, "How long!" This last idea is expressly brought forward in the law. In <sup><B117></sup>Deuteronomy 1:17 solemn admonitions are addressed to judges, grounded on the lofty position assigned to their office — compare <sup><4896></sup>2 Chronicles 19:6,7, where Jehoshaphat, with still greater copiousness of detail, addresses the following admonitions to the judges whom he commissioned:

"Take heed what ye do, for ye judge not for man, but for God, who is with you in the judgment: wherefore now let the fear of the Lord be upon you, take heed and do it, for there is no iniquity with the Lord our God, nor respect of persons, nor taking of gifts." — Hengstenberg.

<sup><B31></sup>Psalm 82:1. God standeth in the congregation of the mighty "God sitteth in the assembly of God." It is unquestionably a very unbecoming thing for those whom God has been pleased to invest with the government of mankind for the common good, not to acknowledge the end for which they have been exalted above the others, nor yet by whose blessing they have been placed in so elevated a station; but, instead of doing this, contemning every principle of equity, to rule just as their own unbridled passions dictate. So infatuated are they by their own splendor and magnificence, as to imagine that the whole world was made only for them. Besides, they think that it would derogate from their elevated rank were they to be governed by moderate counsels; and although their own folly is more than enough to urge them on in their reckless career, they notwithstanding seek for flatterers to soothe and applaud them in their vices. To correct this arrogance, the psalm opens by asserting, that although men occupy thrones and judgment-seats, God nevertheless continues to hold the office of supreme ruler. God has made even a pagan and licentious poet bear testimony to this truth:

*"Regum timendorum in proprios greges,
Reges in ipsos imperium est Jovis,
Clari giganteo triumpho,
Cuneta supercilio moventis."
— Hoatii Carm. lib. iii. od. 1.*

*“Kings rule their subject flocks; great Jove O’er kings themselves his reign extends,
Who hurl’d the rebel giants from above;
At whose majestic nod all nature bends.”*
— Boscawen’s Translations

That the potentates of this world may not arrogate to themselves more than belongs to them, the prophet here erects a throne for God, from which he judges them all, and represses their pride; a thing which is highly necessary. They may indeed admit that they owe their elevation to royal power to the favor of God, and they may worship him by outward ceremonies, but their greatness so infatuates them that they are chargeable with expelling and casting him to a distance from their assembly by their vain imaginations, for they cannot bear to be subject to reason and laws. Thus the design of the prophet was to deride the madness by which the princes of this world are bewitched in leaving God no place in their assembly. The more effectually to overthrow this irrational self-confidence with which they are intoxicated, civil order is termed the assembly of God, for although the divine glory shines forth in every part of the world, yet when lawful government flourishes among people, it is reflected therefrom with pre-eminent luster. I indeed grant that it is quite common for the Hebrews to adorn with the title of God whatever is rare and excellent. But here it would appear from the scope of the passage that this name of the Divine Being is applied to those who occupy the exalted station of princes, in which there is afforded a special manifestation of the majesty of God; even as Solomon in <sup><1117></sup>Proverbs 2:17 calls marriage “the covenant of God,” from the special sanctity with which that relation is distinguished. In the second clause of the verse it is not material whether we read, He will judge in the midst of the gods, or, He will judge the gods in the midst. The first construction, however, is the most easy and natural, that, however much the rulers of the world may exalt themselves, they cannot in the least impair the authority of God by divesting him of his sovereignty over them and of the government of all things, which he will ever retain as his inalienable prerogative. But here, as also a little after, the name gods is to be understood of judges, on whom God has impressed special marks of his glory. To apply it to angels is a fancy too strained to admit of serious consideration. — Calvin.

<sup><816></sup>Psalm 82:6. I have said, Ye are gods Luther, after giving a picture of the wickedness and profligacy of the great men of his time, remarks:

“There existed also among the Jewish people youths of this character, who kept continually in their mouths the saying of Moses in <sup>(122)</sup>Exodus 22:9. They employed this saying as a cloak and shield for their wickedness against the preachers and the prophets; and gave themselves great airs while they said, Wilt thou punish us and instruct us? Dost thou not know that Moses calls us gods? Thou art a rebel, thou speakest against the ordinance of God, thou preachest to the detriment of our honor. Now the prophet acknowledges, and does not deny, that they are gods, he will not be rebellious. or weaken their honor or authority, like the disobedient and rebellious people, or like the mad saints who make heretics and enthusiasts, but he draws a proper distinction between their power and the power of God. He allows that they are gods over men, but not over God himself. It is as if he said. It is true you are gods over us all, but not over Him who is the God of us all. From this we see in what a high and glorious position God intends to maintain the office of the magistracy. For who will set himself against those on whom God bestows his own name? Whoever despises them despises at the same time the true Magistrate, God, who speaks and judges in them and through them, and calls their judgment his judgment. The apostle Paul, <sup>(123)</sup>Romans 13:2, points out the consequences of this; and experience amply confirms his statement. But again, just as on the one hand he restrains the discontent of the populace, and brings them, on account of it, under the sword and under law, so does he, on the other hand, restrain the magistracy, that it shall not abuse such majesty and power for wickedness, but employ it in the promotion and maintenance of peace. But yet only so far, that he will not permit the people to lift up their arm against it, or to seize the sword for the purpose of punishing and judging it. No, that they shall not do; God has not commanded it. He himself, God, will punish wicked magistrates, he will be judge and master over them, he will get at them better than anyone else could, as he has done from the beginning of the world.” — Hengstenberg.

Children of the Most High It may well make one wonder that he calls such wicked individuals as those whom he here rebukes so sharply, by the name of sons of God or sons of the Highest, since children of God is an appellation which in Scripture is applied to holy believers. Answer — It is just as great a wonder that he should bestow upon such wicked people his own name; yea, it is rather a greater wonder that he should call them gods. But it all lies in the word: I have said. For we have often remarked that the word of God sanctifies and deifies all things to which it is applied. Wherefore we may call such situations as have had impressed upon them the word of God, in every respect holy divine conditions, although the persons are not holy. Just as father, mother, preacher, minister, etc., are in every respect holy divine situations, although the persons who are in them may be knaves and rogues. Thus, inasmuch as God stamps the office of magistracy with his word, magistrates are correctly called gods, and the children of God on account of their divine condition, and the word of God, although they are really vile knaves, as he complains that they are.” — Luther.

NOTES ON PSALM 83

This is another of the psalms of Asaph, the last of the group or collection that is found under his name. Compare the Introduction to Psalm 73. The occasion on which this was composed is not certainly known, and cannot now be ascertained. Grotius supposes that it relates to the time of David, and especially to the first war with the Syrians referred to in 2 Samuel 8, or to the second war with the Syrians referred to in 2 Samuel 10, and 1 Chronicles 19. Kimchi, DeWette, and others, suppose that it relates to the time of Jehoshaphat, and to the war with the Ammonites and Moabites, referred to in 2 Chronicles 20. Hengstenberg and Prof. Alexander concur in this opinion, and suppose that it was written on the same occasion as Psalm 47; 48; the first, composed and sung on the field of battle; the second, on the triumphant return to Jerusalem; the third — the one before us — in confident anticipation of victory. This is, perhaps, rather fanciful, and it certainly cannot be demonstrated that this is the correct opinion. It would seem, at least, to be hardly probable that a psalm would be composed and sung in a battlefield.

All that is certain in regard to the psalm is, that it was written in view of a threatened invasion by combined armies, and the prayer is, that God would give help, as he had done when the nation had been threatened on other occasions. The nations which were combined, or which had formed an alliance for this purpose, are specified in <sup><18316></sup>Psalm 83:6-8; Edom; Ishmael; Moab; the Hagarenes; Gebal; Ammon; Amalek; the Philistines; the Tyrians, Assur, and the children of Lot.

The contents of the psalm are as follows:

I. A prayer that God would no longer keep still, or be silent, <sup><18301></sup>Psalm 83:1.

II. A statement of the occasion for the prayer, to wit, the conspiracy or combination formed against his people, <sup><18312></sup>Psalm 83:2-5.

III. An enumeration of the nations thus combined, <sup><18316></sup>Psalm 83:6-8.

IV. A prayer that God would interpose as he had done in former times, in critical periods of the Jewish history — as in the case of the Midianites; as in the time of Sisera, and Jabin; and as in the wars waged with Oreb and Zeeb, Zebah and Zalmunna, <sup><BR1></sup>Psalm 83:9-12.

V. A prayer that these enemies might be utterly overthrown and confounded; that God would promote his own glory; and that his people might be secure and happy, <sup><BR13></sup>Psalm 83:13-18.

<sup><BR1></sup>Psalm 83:1. Keep not thou silence, O God See the notes at <sup><BR1></sup>Psalm 28:1. The prayer here is that in the existing emergency God would not seem to be indifferent to the needs and dangers of his people, and to the purposes of their enemies, but that he would speak with a voice of command, and break up their designs.

Hold not thy peace That is, Speak. Give command. Disperse them by thine own authority.

And be not still, O God Awake; arouse; be not indifferent to the needs and dangers of thy people. All this is the language of petition; not of command. Its rapidity, its repetition, its tone, all denote that the danger was imminent, and that the necessity for the divine interposition was urgent.

And they that hate thee Thine enemies; the enemies of thy cause, and of thy people. Who they were is specified in <sup><BR16></sup>Psalm 83:6-8.

Have lifted up the head Have become proud; bold; confident of success, all of which is indicated by the phrase “lifted up the head.” The head is bowed down in penitence and trouble; pride lifts it up; boldness, confidence, and wickedness, are indicated by its being thus lifted up.

<sup><BR18></sup>Psalm 83:3. They have taken crafty counsel The one word translated “have taken crafty” — <sup><BR19></sup>יִרְעוּ — means properly to make naked; and then, to be crafty, cunning, malignant, <sup><BR22></sup>1 Samuel 23:22. It is well rendered here, they have taken crafty counsel. The meaning is, they have made their counsel or their consultations crafty, cunning, artful, malignant. Instead of pursuing a course in their deliberations that would be just, true, honorable, they have followed the reverse. On the word rendered

Against thy people For the purpose of destroying them.

And consulted against thy hidden ones The word rendered “hidden ones” — from the verb ḥpæ<sup><16845></sup>, to hide, to conceal — properly denotes that which is secret, private, inaccessible (<sup><1072></sup>Ezekiel 7:22); and then, anything protected or hidden so as to be secure. Compare the notes at <sup><19715></sup>Psalms 27:5. It would seem here to refer to those who were so protected by Yahweh — so inaccessible to others by reason of his guardian care — that they would be safe.

<sup><18316></sup>Psalm 83:4. They have said, Come, and let us cut them off ... Let us utterly destroy them, and root them out from among the nations. Let us combine against them, and overpower them; let us divide their land among ourselves, attaching it to our own. The nations referred to (<sup><18316></sup>Psalms 83:6-8) were those which surrounded the land of Israel; and the proposal seems to have been to partition the land of the Hebrews among themselves, as has been done in modern times in regard to Poland. On what principles, and in what proportions, they proposed thus to divide the land is not intimated, nor is it said that the project had gone so far that they had agreed on the terms of such a division. The formation of such a purpose, however, was in itself by no means improbable. The Hebrew people were offensive to all the surrounding nations by their religion, their prosperity, and the constant rebuke of tyranny and idolatry by their religious and their social institutions. There had been enough, also, in their past history — in the remembrance of the successful wars of the Hebrews with those very nations — to keep up a constant irritation on their part. We are not to be surprised, therefore, that there was a deeply-cherished desire to blot out the name and the nation altogether.

That the name of Israel may be no more in remembrance That the nation as such may be utterly extinct and forgotten; that the former triumphs of that nation over us may be avenged; that we may no longer have in our very midst this painful memorial of the existence of one God, and of the demands of his law; that we may pursue our own plans without the silent or the open admonition derived from a religion so pure and holy. For the same reason the world has often endeavored to destroy the church; to cause it to be extinct; to blot out its name; to make the very names Christ and Christian forgotten among mankind. Hence, the fiery persecutions under the Roman government in the time of the Emperors; and hence, in every age, and in every land, the church has been exposed to persecution — originated with a purpose to destroy it as long as there was any hope of accomplishing that end. That purpose has been abandoned by Satan and his friends only because the result has shown that the persecution of the church served but to spread its principles and doctrines, and to fix it more firmly in the affections and confidence of mankind, so that the tendency of persecution is rather to overthrow the persecutor than the persecuted. Whether it can be destroyed by prosperity and corruption — by science — by error — seems now to be the great problem before the mind of Satan.

Psalm 83:5. For they have consulted together with one consent Margin, as in Hebrew, heart. There is no division in their counsels on this subject. They have one desire — one purpose — in regard to the matter. Pilate and Herod were made friends together against Christ (<sup><02912></sup>Luke 23:12); and the world, divided and hostile on other matters, has been habitually united in its opposition to Christ and to a pure and spiritual religion.

They are confederate against thee literally, “They cut a covenant against thee;” that is, they ratify such a covenant, compact, league — referring to the manner in which bargains and agreements were ratified by cutting in pieces a victim sacrificed on such occasions; that is, by giving to such a transaction the solemnity of a religious sanction. <sup><01510></sup>Genesis 15:10; <sup><03418></sup>Jeremiah 34:18,19. See Bochart, Hieroz. i. 35. The meaning here is, that they had entered into this agreement in the most solemn manner, under the sanctions of religion.

Psalm 83:6. The tabernacles of Edom The tents of Edom; meaning here, the dwellers in those tents, that is, the Edomites. The word tabernacles or tents does not necessarily imply that the nation then led a wandering life, for the word came to signify in process of time a dwelling-place, or a habitation. The Edomites were not, in fact, a roving and wandering people, but a people of fixed boundaries. In early periods, however, like most ancient people, they doubtless dwelt in tents. Edom, or Idumea, was south of Palestine. See the notes at <sup><23114></sup>Isaiah 11:14.

And the Ishmaelites The descendants of Ishmael. They dwelt in Arabia Deserta.

Of Moab On the situation of Moab, see the notes at Isaiah 15. It was on the southeast of Palestine.

And the Hagarenes The Hagarenes were properly Arabs, so called from Hagar, the handmaid of Abraham, the mother of Ishmael. <sup><0160></sup>Genesis 16:1; 25:12. As connected with the Ishmaelites they would naturally join in this alliance.

<sup><0807></sup>Psalm 83:7. Gebal The Gebal here referred to was probably the same as Gebalene, the mountainous tract inhabited by the Edomites, extending from the Dead Sea southward toward Petra, and still called by the Arabs Djebal. (Gesenius, Lexicon) The word means mountain. Those who are here referred to were a part of the people of Edom.

And Ammon The word Ammon means son of my people. Ammon was the son of Lot by his youngest daughter, <sup><0198></sup>Genesis 19:38. The Ammonites, descended from him, dwelt beyond the Jordan in the tract of country between the streams of Jabbok and Arnon. These also would be naturally associated in such a confederacy. <sup><0100></sup>1 Samuel 11:1-11.

And Amalek The Amalekites were a very ancient people: In the traditions of the Arabians they are reckoned among the aboriginal inhabitants of that country. They inhabited the regions on the south of Palestine, between Idumea and Egypt. Compare <sup><0278></sup>Exodus 17:8-16; <sup><0433></sup>Numbers 13:29; <sup><0957></sup>1 Samuel 15:7. They also extended eastward of the Dead Sea and Mount Seir (<sup><0401></sup>Numbers 24:20; <sup><0183></sup>Judges 3:13; 6:3,33); and they appear also to have settled down in Palestine itself, whence the name the Mount of the Amalekites, in the territory of Ephraim, <sup><0725></sup>Judges 12:15.

The Philistines Often mentioned in the Scriptures. They were the ancient inhabitants of Palestine, whence the name Philistia or Palestine. The word is supposed to mean the land of sojourners or strangers; hence, in the Septuagint they are uniformly called <sup><246></sup>αλλοφυλοι, those of another tribe, strangers, and their country is called <sup><1093></sup>γη αλλοφυλων <sup><246></sup>. They were constant enemies of the Hebrews, and it was natural that they should be engaged in such an alliance as this.

With the inhabitants of Tyre On the situation of Tyre, see the Introduction to Isaiah 23. Why Tyre should unite in this confederacy is not known. The purpose seems to have been to combine as many nations as possible against the Hebrew people, and — as far as it could be done — all those that were adjacent to it, so that it might be surrounded by enemies, and so that its destruction might be certain. It would not probably be difficult to find some pretext for inducing any of the kings of the surrounding nations to unite in such an unholy alliance. Kings, in general, have not been unwilling to form alliances against liberty.

Psalm 83:8. Assur also is joined with them Assyria. Assyria was on the northeast of Palestine. The conspirators had secured, it seems, the aid of this powerful kingdom, and they felt confident of success.

They have holpen the children of Lot The sons, or the descendants of Lot. The margin is, as the Hebrew, “been an arm to.” That is, they were an aid, or help; in other words, the sons of Lot were permitted, as it were, to make use of the arm of these powerful nations in accomplishing their purposes. The sons of Lot were Moab and Ammon, the ancestors of the Moabites and the Ammonites, <sup>Q1857</sup>Genesis 19:37,38. It would appear from this, that the purpose of destroying the Hebrew people had been originated by the Moabites and Ammonites, and that they had called in the aid of the surrounding nations to enable them to carry out their plan. The enumeration of those who had joined in the alliance shows that all the nations adjacent to Palestine, on every side, had entered into the agreement, so that the land was completely encompassed, or hemmed in, by enemies. In these circumstances, the conspirators felt secure; in these circumstances, the Hebrew people had no resource but to call upon God. Thus it often occurs that the people of God are so surrounded by enemies, or are so hemmed in by troubles and trials, that they have no other resource than this: they are shut up to the necessity of prayer. Often God so orders, or permits things to occur, as to cut off his people from every other dependence, and to make them feel that there is no help for them but in Him.

Psalm 83:9. Do unto them as unto the Midianites That is, Let them be overthrown and destroyed as the Midianites were. The reference here is to the complete overthrow of the Midianites, as related in Numbers 31.

As to Sisera The captain or commander of the army of Jabin, king of Canaan. He was conquered by the Hebrew armies under the direction of the prophetess Deborah, by the instrumentality of Barak (<sup><0040></sup>Judges 4:4,6,14,15), and was slain by Jael, the wife of Heber the Kenite, <sup><0047></sup>Judges 4:17-21.

As to Jabin The king of Canaan, in whose service Sisera was.

At the brook of Kison <sup><0043></sup>Judges 4:13. This is a stream which rises near Mount Tabor, and empties itself into the Bay of Ptolemais. In <sup><0051></sup>Judges 5:21, in the song of Deborah on occasion of this victory, it is mentioned as “that ancient river, the river Kishon;” that is, it was a stream which was well known; which had been referred to in ancient tales and poetry; not a newly discovered river, but a river whose name and locality were familiar to all.

<sup><0810></sup>Psalm 83:10. Which perished at En-dor Endor is not particularly mentioned in the history of the transaction in the book of Judges, but it is known that Endor was in the vicinity of Mount Tabor, and there is no improbability in the tradition which has fixed the site of the battle at or near Endor. The word or name “En-dor” means properly fount of the dwelling (or, habitation), and was probably given at first to a spring or fountain near to which some distinguished or well-known person dwelt. It is mentioned in <sup><0571></sup>Joshua 17:11; <sup><0287></sup>1 Samuel 28:7.

They became as dung for the earth The land was enriched or made fertile by their flesh, their blood, and their bones, as the field of Waterloo was by that of the slain, or as fields of battle commonly are.

<sup><0811></sup>Psalm 83:11. Make their nobles like Oreb and like Zeeb These were princes or rulers of the Midianites, slain by Gideon, the one on the rock Oreb, and the other at the wine-press of Zeeb. <sup><0025></sup>Judges 7:25. The prayer here is, that the enemies who had conspired against the land of Israel might be utterly destroyed.

Yea, all their princes as Zebah, and as Zalmunna The word here rendered princes means properly anointed, and was given to princes, kings, prophets, and priests, as anointed, or as set apart by anointing to their office. Zebah and Zalmunna were kings of Midian, slain also by Gideon. See <sup><0085></sup>Judges 8:5,21.

Psalm 83:12. Who said, Let us take to ourselves the houses of God in possession The houses of God here mean the habitations of God, or the places where he dwelt among the people. As there was but one ark, one tabernacle, and one temple, or one place of constituted public worship, this must refer to other places where God was worshipped, or where he might be supposed to reside; either to synagogues (see the notes at <sup><4918></sup>Psalm 74:8), or to the private dwellings of the people regarded as a holy people, or as a people among whom God dwelt. This may, therefore, imply that their dwellings — their private abodes — were also dwelling-places of God, as now the house of a religious family — a place where God is regularly worshipped — may be regarded as an abode of God on the earth. The language here is not to be understood as that of Oreb and Zeeb, of Zebah and Zalmunna, but of the enemies referred to in the psalm, who had entered into the conspiracy to destroy the Hebrew nation. They had said, “Let us inherit the houses of God;” that is, Let us take to ourselves, and for our possession, the dwellings of the land where God is supposed to reside.

Psalm 83:13. O my God, make them like a wheel ... Or rather, like a rolling thing — something that the wind rolls along. The word לגלגל <sup><41534></sup> — means properly a wheel, as of a chariot, <sup><5000></sup>Ezekiel 10:2,6; or a wheel for drawing water from a well, <sup><21206></sup>Ecclesiastes 12:6; then, a whirlwind, <sup><4979></sup>Psalm 77:19; and then, anything driven before a whirlwind, as chaff, or stubble, <sup><23713></sup>Isaiah 17:13. Compare the notes at <sup><23218></sup>Isaiah 22:18. The prayer here is, that they might be utterly destroyed, or driven away.

Psalm 83:14. As the fire burneth a wood ... The same idea is here presented under another form. No image of desolation is more fearful than that of fire raging in a forest; or of fire on the mountains. As trees and shrubs and grass fall before such a flame, so the prayer is, that they who had combined against the people of God might be swept away by his just displeasure.

Psalm 83:15. So persecute them So pursue them; so follow them up. The word “persecute” is now used in a somewhat different sense, as denoting pain or suffering inflicted on account of religious opinion. It means here simply to pursue.

With thy tempest With the expressions of thy displeasure; with punishment which may be compared with the fury of a storm.

And make them afraid with thy storm Or, Make them afraid, terrify them, so that they will flee away. As all that is here sought by prayer is what people endeavor to do when an enemy invades their country — as they make arrangements for repelling those enemies, and overthrowing them, and as they feel that it is right to do so — there is no impropriety in making this the subject of prayer to God. What it is right for men to attempt, it is right to pray for; what it would be right for them to do if they had the power, it is right to ask God to accomplish; what is free from malignity in the act, and in the design, may be free from malignity in the desire and the prayer; and if men can carry with them the idea that what they are endeavoring to do is right, whether as magistrates, judges, rulers, defenders of their country, or as private men, they will have very little difficulty in regard to the so-called “imprecatory psalms.” See this subject treated in the General Introduction

<sup><8316></sup> Psalm 83:16. Fill their faces with shame As those who are disappointed and foiled in their plans — such disappointment and confusion commonly manifesting itself in the face. The prayer here is, that their enemies might be so baffled in their designs — that they might be made so to feel how vain and hopeless were all their plans — that there might be such a manifest interposition of God in the case, as that they should be led to see that Yahweh reigned; that it was in vain to contend with him, and that his people were under his protection.

That they may seek thy name, O LORD That they may be led to seek thee. This explains the drift and design of the whole prayer in the psalm. It is not a malignant prayer for the destruction of their enemies; it is not a wish that they might be made to suffer; but it is a prayer that the divine dealing might be such as to lead them to the acknowledgment of the true God. It is a benevolent thing to desire that men may be brought to the knowledge of the true God, though it be through the discomfiture of their own plans, by defeat, or by suffering. Anything that leads people to an acquaintance with God, and results in securing his friendship and favor, is a gain, and will be cause of thankfulness in the end.

<sup><8317></sup> Psalm 83:17. Let them be confounded Let them be ashamed. That is, Let them have that kind of shame and confusion which results from the fact that their plans have not been successful, or that they have been foiled and baffled in their schemes.

And troubled Disturbed; put to confusion. Let them be troubled as men are who are unsuccessful in their projects.

Forever As a people; as confederated nations; as united in such an unholy alliance. Let them never again be able thus to combine, or to form a compact for the destruction of thy people. This does not refer to them as individuals, but as nations. It is a prayer that they may be so discomfited now that they may see the wickedness and folly of all such efforts, and that they may never again form such a combination.

Yea, let them be put to shame By utter failure in their schemes.

And perish Not individually, but as combined — as an alliance. Let there be a complete end to such a confederacy, so that it shall never be seen again.

<sup><0818></sup>Psalm 83:18. That men may know That all people may be impressed with the belief that thou art the true and only God. This was the design and aim of the prayer in the psalm. It was that there might be such a manifestation of the power of God; that it might be so evident that the events which had occurred could be traced to no other source than God himself, that all people might be led to honor him.

That thou whose name alone is JEHOVAH To whom alone this name belongs; to whom alone it can be properly ascribed. This was the special name by which God chose to be known. <sup><0118></sup>Exodus 6:3. Compare the notes at <sup><2308></sup>Isaiah 42:8. On the word Jehovah — <sup>hwbj</sup><sup><3068></sup> — see the notes at <sup><0804></sup>Psalm 68:4. It is found in combination, in <sup><0214></sup>Genesis 22:14; <sup><0275></sup>Exodus 17:15; <sup><0054></sup>Judges 6:24; <sup><2685></sup>Ezekiel 48:35; <sup><2236></sup>Jeremiah 23:6; 33:16.

Art the Most High over all the earth Thou art the Supreme God, ruling over all people. Thy dominion is so absolute over nations, even when combined together, and thy power is so complete in foiling their plans, and disconcerting their purposes, that it is clear that thou dost reign over them. He that could break up such a combination — he that could rescue his people from such an allied force — must have all power over the nations — must be the true God.

APPENDIX NOTES ON PSALM 83

Among those who ascribe the psalm to the age of Jehoshaphat, as Kimchi, DeWette, Hengstenberg, Alexander, etc., Dr. Binnie has also taken his place; and his remarks show how completely he has entered into the spirit of this grand warlike ode. (See Appendix — Psalm 48)

Title. “A song and psalm by Asaph;” lively, yet solemn, for there is in it both victory and vengeance. The appeal of last psalm to the Judge, by Asaph, in the name of Messiah and his people, is of the same spirit with this more lengthened and full prayer by the same Asaph. The times are the same. Whatever were the circumstances of the psalmist that furnished an appropriate season in the view of the Spirit of God for giving it to the church — whether such as those of Jehoshaphat’s reign (~~404~~ 2 Chronicles 20:14) or not — it seems probable that He who knew people’s hearts saw more than once this same hatred to Israel taking the form of a combined conspiracy of all the nations round. Even thus has it been more than once in regard to Britain, the retreat of God’s hidden ones; and even thus, were the veil lifted up, might it be found to be true at this hour of the foes of Protestant truth. And yet more shall the latter day bring to view a combination of kings and people against the Lamb and his faithful few — a combination which shall meet with extinction on the plains of Megiddo, most fully realizing the prayer and anticipations of this psalm, ~~389~~ Psalm 83:9-11. What a song for days when antichrist shall be wondered at by all the earth! It is pervaded by a tone of astonishment at the Lord’s long-suffering — A. A. Bonar.

~~388~~ Psalm 83:3. Hidden ones The safety of God’s people does not depend on their number, wit, prowess, or inherent strength, but on him who has made them his “hidden ones.” He that touches them, touches the apple of his eye, ~~388~~ Zechariah 2:8. In the time of trouble he shall hide them in his pavilion; in the secret of his tabernacle shall he hide them, ~~427~~ Psalm 27:5. They are in no sense hidden from the notice or care of God, ~~247~~ Isaiah 40:27; ~~389~~ Psalm 38:9; ~~388~~ Hosea 5:3; ~~329~~ 2 Timothy 2:19. Nor is their course clandestine or cunning. Their very candor makes them suspected. Though they are not ostentatious, they are not deceitful. Nor do they make a secret of their love to Christ. Nor do they try to hide their sins from the eyes of God, but freely confess and bewail them. They have renounced the hidden things of dishonesty, and do not walk in craftiness. Nor do they pass through life without a mark upon them. The world fixes its stigma, and God puts his name in their foreheads. They are the light of the world. And yet they are God's "hidden ones." They are hid in God. The being, the providence, every perfection of God, and every part of his Word, are chambers where the humble find refuge. See <sup><1917></sup>Psalm 32:7; 84:11; <sup><2080></sup>Proverbs 18:10. They are God's "hidden ones," because they are secretly nourished, having meat to eat which the world knows not of. Nor is their true character known, <sup><6101></sup>1 John 3:1. Nor does any roll of church-membership on earth contain a correct list of their names. They are often hidden under the calumnies, suspicions, and outcries of the wicked. Their best acts are misjudged, and their best qualities misnamed. And they are all hid in Christ, <sup><5103></sup>Colossians 3:3,4. They are all hidden under the shadow of Yahweh's wings. Though unknown, they are yet well known, where it is of most importance to be known. — Plumer.

<sup><1917></sup>Psalm 83:5-8. For they have consulted together ... Calvin's remarks on these verses afford a fine specimen of the Christian adaptation of the psalm to the circumstances of the church and people of God when numerous and fierce enemies are banded together against them:

"The multiplied hosts which united their powers together to oppose the church of God, and to effect her overthrow, are here enumerated. As so many nations, formed into one powerful confederacy, were bent on the destruction of a kingdom not greatly distinguished by its power, the miraculous aid of God was indispensably necessary for the deliverance of a people who, in such extremity, were altogether unable to defend themselves. In circumstances apparently as hopeless good king Asa gave utterance to that truly magnanimous reflection: 'Lord, it is nothing with thee to help, whether with many or with them that have no power: help us, O Lord our God! for we rest on thee, and in thy name we go against this multitude,' <sup><1341></sup>1 Chronicles 14:11. The same Spirit who inspired that pious king with such invincible fortitude dictated this psalm for the benefit of the whole church, to encourage her with unhesitating confidence to betake herself to God for aid. And in our own day he sets before us these words, in order that no danger or difficulty may prevent us from calling upon God. When the whole world may conspire together against us, we have as it were a wall of brass for the defense of Christ's kingdom in these words, 'Why do the pagan rage?' etc., <sup><911></sup>Psalm 2:1.

“It will be in no small degree profitable to us to contemplate this as an example in which we have represented to us, as in a mirror, what has been the lot of the church of God from the beginning. This, if rightly reflected on, will keep us at the present day from being unduly dejected when we witness the whole world in array against us ... When we have once arrived at a settled persuasion that no strange thing happens to us, the contemplation of the condition of the church in old time will strengthen us for continuing in the exercise of patience until God suddenly display his power, which is perfectly able, without any created aid, to frustrate all the attempts of the world.

“To remove from the minds of the godly all misgivings as to whether help is ready to be imparted to them from heaven, the prophet distinctly affirms that those who molest the church are chargeable with making war against God, who has taken her under his protection. The principle upon which God declares that he will be our helper is contained in these words, ‘He that toucheth you toucheth the apple of mine eye,’ ~~<3018>~~ Zechariah 2:8. And what is said in another psalm concerning the patriarchs is equally applicable to all true believers, ‘Touch not mine anointed, and do my prophets no harm,’ ~~<194515>~~ Psalm 105:15. He will have the anointing with which he has anointed us to be, as it were, a buckler to keep us in perfect safety.”

NOTES ON PSALM 84

On the meaning of the phrase in the title, “upon Gittith,” see the notes at the title to Psalm 8. On the meaning of the phrase “for (margin, to) the sons of Korah,” see the notes at the title to Psalm 42. The author of the psalm is unknown, though it bears a strong resemblance to the forty-second, and may have been composed by David himself. If so, it was dedicated, or devoted, as that was, to “the sons of Korah,” to be adapted by them to music, and to be employed in public worship, and it may also have been composed on the same occasion. It is to be observed, however, that there were not only numerous occasions in the life of David, but also in the lives of other pious Hebrews, to which the sentiments in this psalm would be appropriate; and we cannot, therefore, affirm with certainty that it was composed by David. If it had been, moreover, it is difficult to account for the fact that his name is not prefixed to it. See, however, the notes at ~~1840~~ Psalm 84:9.

The occasion on which the psalm was composed is apparent from the psalm itself. It was evidently when the writer was deprived, for some cause now unknown, of the privileges of the sanctuary. That cause may have been exile, or sickness, or distance, or imprisonment; but whatever it was, the psalmist expresses his own deep feelings on the subject; the sense which he has of the blessedness of an attendance on the sanctuary, and of the happiness of those who were permitted to attend — regarding it as such a privilege that even the sparrow and the swallow might be supposed to be happy in being permitted to dwell near the altar of God. He describes, also, the joy and rejoicing of those who went up in companies, or in solemn procession, to the place of public worship — a happy, triumphant group on their way to the house of God.

It is not possible, however, to ascertain the exact time, or the particular occasion, when the psalm was written. The language is such as might have been used when the public worship was conducted either in the tabernacle, or in the temple — for the words employed are such as were adapted to either. It must have been, however, before the temple was destroyed, for it is clear that the usual place of public worship was still standing, and consequently it was before the captivity. The psalm is not one indicating public calamity; it is one of private love and sorrow.

The contents of the psalm are as follows:

- I. The psalmist expresses his own sense of the loveliness of the place where God is worshipped, and his earnest longing for the courts of the Lord, <sup><381></sup>Psalm 84:1,2.
- II. He illustrates this feeling by a beautiful image drawn from the sparrow and the swallow — building their nests unobstructed and unalarmed near the very altar of God — as if they must be happy to be so near to God, and to dwell peaceably there, <sup><381B></sup>Psalm 84:3,4.
- III. He describes the happiness of those who are on the way to the place of public worship: their joy; their progress in strength of purpose as they approached the place; their happiness in appearing before God, <sup><381B></sup>Psalm 84:5-7.
- IV. He pours forth his earnest prayer that he might be permitted thus to approach God; that he might be allowed to abide in the courts of God; that he might find a home there; that he might even spend a day there — for a day there was better than a thousand elsewhere, <sup><381B></sup>Psalm 84:8-12.

The whole psalm is a beautiful expression of love to the sanctuary, as felt by all who truly worship God.

<sup><381></sup>Psalm 84:1. How amiable How much to he loved; how lovely. The word amiable is now used to denote a quality of mind or disposition — as gentle, affectionate, kind. The word used here, however in the original, means rather dear, beloved — as a token of endearment. Compare the notes at the title to Psalm 45. The idea here is, that the place of public worship is dear to the heart, as a beloved friend — a child — a wife — is. There is a strong and tender love for it.

Are thy tabernacles Thy dwelling-places. This word might be applied either to the tabernacle or the temple, or to any place where God was supposed to reside, or where his worship was celebrated. The plural form is used here probably because the tabernacle and the temple were divided into two parts or rooms, and each might be regarded as in a proper sense the dwelling-place of God. See the notes at <sup><212></sup>Matthew 21:12, following.

O LORD of hosts! Yahweh of hosts; Yahweh, controlling — ruling — guiding — marshalling — all the armies of heaven and earth: compare the notes at <sup><200></sup>Isaiah 1:9; <sup><3240></sup>Psalm 24:10.

Psalm 84:2. My soul longeth The word used here means properly to be pale; then, to be faint or weak; and then, to pine after, to long for, to desire earnestly. It would properly denote such a longing or desire as to make one faint or exhausted; that is, it indicates intense desire. In Psalm 17:12, it is applied to a hungry lion; “Like a lion that is greedy of its prey.” In Genesis 31:30, it conveys the idea of intense desire: “Because thou sore longedst after thy father’s house.” For an illustration of the sentiment here expressed, see the notes at Psalm 42:1,2.

Yea, even fainteth Is exhausted; fails of its strength. The word means properly to be completed, finished; then to be consumed, to be spent, to waste or pine away. Genesis 21:15; Jeremiah 16:4; Lamentations 2:11; Job 19:27.

For the courts of the LORD The word used here refers to the different areas around the tabernacle or temple, within which many of the services of public worship were conducted, and which were frequented by different classes of persons. See the notes at Matthew 21:12.

My heart and my flesh My whole nature; my body and my soul; all my desires and aspirations — all the longings of my heart are there. The body — the flesh — cries out for rest; the heart — the soul — for communion with God. Our whole nature demands the benefits which spring from the worship of God. Body and soul were made for his service, and the necessities of neither can be satisfied without religion.

Crieth out The word used here — næ<sup>17442</sup> — means properly to give forth a tremulous sound; then, to give forth the voice in vibrations, or in a tremulous manner; and thence it may mean either to utter cries of joy, (Leviticus 9:24; Job 38:7; Isaiah 12:6), or to utter a loud wail (Lamentations 2:19). Its common application is to joy (Psalm 98:4; 132:16; 65:8); and it might be rendered here, “Sing unto the Lord,” or “Rejoice unto the Lord.” The connection, however, seems to demand that it be understood as the cry of earnest longing or desire.

For the living God God, the true God, considered as living, in contradistinction from idols, always spoken of as dead. Compare Psalm 63:1.

Psalm 84:3. Yea, the sparrow hath found an house A home; a place where she may abide, and build her nest, and rear her young. The word here used — rwḶxi<sup>h6833</sup> — is a name given to a bird from its chirping or twittering. It is rendered sparrow in <sup><B40></sup>Leviticus 14:4 (margin); <sup><B20></sup>Psalm 102:7; and is often rendered bird (<sup><O74></sup>Genesis 7:14; 15:10, et al.), and fowl, <sup><B47></sup>Deuteronomy 4:17; <sup><K58></sup>Nehemiah 5:18; et al. It may denote a bird of any kind, but is properly applied here to a sparrow, a species of bird very common and abundant in Palestine; a bird that finds its home especially about houses, barns, etc. That sparrows would be likely to gather around the tabernacle and even the altar, will appear not improbable from their well-known habits.

“The sparrows which flutter and twitter about dilapidated buildings at Jerusalem, and crevices of the city walls, are very numerous. In some of the more lonely streets they are so noisy as almost to overpower every other sound. Their chirping is almost an articulate utterance of the Hebrew term rwḶxi<sup>h6833</sup>), which was employed to designate that class of birds. It may be taken for granted that the sparrows are not less numerous in other places where they have similar means for obtaining shelter and building their nests. The sparrows, in their resort to houses and other such places, appear to be a privileged bird. Encouraged by such indulgence, they are not timid — they frequent boldly the haunts of people. The sight of this familiarity reminded me again and again of the passage in the Psalms (<sup><B43></sup>Psalm 84:3), where the pious Israelite, debarred from the privileges of the sanctuary, felt as if he could envy the lot of the birds, so much more favored than himself.” — Professor Hackett, “Illustrations of Scripture,” pp. 94,95.

And the swallow a nest for herself A place where it may make its nest. The word used here — rwḶD<sup>h1865</sup> — denotes properly, swift flight, a wheeling or gyration; and it is applied to birds which fly in circles or gyrations, and the name is thus appropriately given to the swallow. It occurs in this sense only here and in <sup><B10></sup>Proverbs 26:2.

Where she may lay her young Where she may place her young. The wordplay here is not used in the sense in which we now apply it when we speak of “laying” eggs. It means to place them; to make a home for them; to dispose and arrange them.

Even thine altars ... The altars where thou art worshipped. The idea here is, that the sparrows and the swallows seemed to have a happy lot; to be in a condition to be envied. Even they might come freely to the place where God was worshipped — to the very altars — and make their home there undisturbed. How strongly in contrast with this was the condition of the wandering — the exiled — author of the psalm!

Psalm 84:4. Blessed are they that dwell in thy house Who are constantly there; whose permanent abode is there. The reference is to the priests and Levites — the ministers of religion — who had their permanent abode near the tabernacle and the temple, and who were wholly devoted to the sacred duties of religion. Their lot is here spoken of as a blessed, or as a happy lot, in contradistinction from those who had only the opportunity of occasionally going up to worship. Compare the notes at <sup><1974></sup>Psalm 65:4.

They will be still praising thee They will do it constantly, as their daily employment. It will not be worship begun and ended, but worship continued — the regular business from day to day. Such will heaven be; and this will constitute its glory. There will be

(a) a permanent residence there:

“Him that overcometh will I make a pillar in the temple of my God, and he shall go no more out,” (<sup><6112></sup>Revelation 3:12;)

and

(b) there will be the constant service of God; such a service that it may be described as perpetual praise.

The Septuagint and the Latin Vulgate render this, “They will praise thee for ages of ages;” that is, forever.

Psalm 84:5. Blessed is the man whose strength is in thee Not merely are they blessed who dwell there permanently, but the man also whose heart is there; who feels that his strength is in God alone who loves to go there when opportunity is afforded him, treading his way to Zion. The idea is, that all strength must come from God; that this Strength is to be obtained by waiting on him (compare the notes at <sup><2411></sup>Isaiah 40:31), and that, therefore, it is a privilege thus to wait on God. Compare <sup><1817></sup>Psalm 84:7.

In whose heart are the ways of them literally, “The ways in their heart.” DeWette renders this, “Who thinketh on the ways [or paths] to Jerusalem.” The word “ways” may refer either to the ways or paths that lead to the place of worship, or the ways to God and to heaven. As the allusion, however, is evidently to those who were accustomed to go up to the place of public worship, the meaning is, that the man is blessed or happy whose heart is on those ways; who thinks on them; who makes preparation for going up; who purposes thus to go up to worship. The sense is enfeebled in our translation by the insertion of the words “of them.” The literal translation is better: “The ways (that is, the paths — the going up — the journey — to the place of public worship) — are in their heart.” Their affections; their thoughts are there. The word rendered ways, means commonly a raised way, a highway, but it may refer to any public path. It would be applicable to what we call a turnpike (road), as a way thrown up for public use. The allusion is to the ways or paths by which the people commonly went up to the place of public worship; and the idea may be well expressed in the language of Watts:

The sentiment thus expressed finds a response in thousands of hearts: in the happiness — the peace — the joy — with which true worshippers go to the house of God. In the mind of the writer of the psalm this would have an additional beauty and attractiveness as being associated with the thought of the multitudes thronging that path — the groups — the companies — the families — that crowded the way to the place of public worship on their great festal occasions.

<sup><8816></sup>Psalm 84:6. Who passing through the valley of Baca This is one of the most difficult verses in the Book of Psalms, and has been, of course, very variously interpreted. The Septuagint and the Latin Vulgate, Luther, and Professor Alexander, render it a valley of tears. The word “Baca” akB,<sup><1056></sup>) means properly weeping, lamentation; and then it is given to a certain tree — not probably a mulberry tree, but some species of balsam — from its weeping; that is, because it seemed to distil tears, or drops of balsam resembling tears in size and appearance. It is translated mulberry trees in <sup><1023></sup>2 Samuel 5:23,24; <sup><1344></sup>1 Chronicles 14:14,15; and so in the margin here, “mulberry trees make him a well.” There is no reason, however, to think that it has that meaning here. The true rendering is, “valley of lamentation,” or weeping; and it may have reference to some lonely valley in Palestine — where there was no water — a gloomy way — through which those commonly passed who went up to the place of worship. It would be vain, however, to attempt now to determine the locality of the valley referred to, as the name, if ever given to it, seems long since to have passed away. It may, however, be used as emblematic of human life — “a vale of tears;” and the passage may be employed as an illustration of the effect of religion in diffusing happiness and comfort where there was trouble and sorrow — as if fountains should be made to flow in a sterile and desolate valley.

Make it a well Or, a fountain. That is, It becomes to the pilgrims as a sacred fountain. They “make” such a gloomy valley like a fountain, or like a road where fountains — full, free, refreshing — break forth everywhere to invigorate the traveler. Religious worship — the going up to the house of God — turns that in the journey of life which would otherwise be gloomy and sad into joy; makes a world of tears a world of comfort; has an effect like that of changing a gloomy path into one of pleasantness and beauty. The idea here is the same which occurs in <sup><2381></sup>Isaiah 35:7, “And the parched ground shall become a pool” (see the notes at that passage); and in <sup><4850></sup>Job 35:10, “Who giveth songs in the night” (see the notes at that passage); an idea which was so beautifully illustrated in the case of Paul and Silas in the jail at Philippi, when, at midnight they “sang praises to God” (<sup><4465></sup>Acts 16:25), and which is so often illustrated in the midst of affliction and trouble. By the power of religion, by the presence of the Saviour, by the influence of the Holy Spirit, the Comforter, such times become seasons of purest joy — times remembered ever afterward with most fervent gratitude, as among the happiest periods of life. For religion can diffuse smiles over faces darkened by care; can light up the eye sunk in despondency; can change tears of sorrow into tears of joy; can impart peace in scenes of deepest sorrow; and make the most gloomy vales of life like green pastures illuminated by the brightness of noonday.

The rain also filleth the pools Margin, “covereth.” This is a still more difficult expression than the former. The Septuagint and the Vulgate render it, “The teacher — the lawgiver — <sup><3588></sup>ὁ νομοθετων <sup><3549></sup> — “legislator” — gives blessings.” Luther, “The teachers shall be adorned with many blessings.” Gesenius, “Yea, with blessings the autumnal rain doth cover it.” DeWette, “And with blessing the harvest-rain covers it,” which he explains as meaning, “Where they come, though it would be sorrow and tears, yet they are attended with prosperity and blessing.” Professor Alexander, “Also with blessings is the teacher clothed.” The word rendered “rain” — <sup><4175></sup>ἄρρω — is from <sup><4384></sup>ἄρρω, to throw, to cast, to place, to sprinkle, and may denote

- (1) an archer;
 (2) the early rain
 (3) teaching, <sup><2915></sup>Isaiah 9:15; <sup><2173></sup>2 Kings 17:28; or a teacher, <sup><2311></sup>Isaiah 30:20; <sup><1862></sup>Job 36:22.

It is rendered rain, in the place before us; and former rain twice in <sup><2123></sup>Joel 2:23 (margin, a teacher). The word rendered “filleth” means properly to cover, and would be fitly so translated here. Compare <sup><1815></sup>Leviticus 13:45; <sup><2217></sup>Ezekiel 24:17,22. The word has not naturally the idea of filling. The word rendered “pools” — hkrBj<sup><1293></sup> — if pointed in one manner — hkrBj<sup><1295></sup> (in the singular) — denotes a pond, pool, or basin of water; if pointed in another manner — hkrBj<sup><1293></sup> — it means blessing, benediction, and is often so used in the Scriptures, <sup><1272></sup>Genesis 27:12; 28:4; 33:11; <sup><1111></sup>Proverbs 11:11, ... The rendering of Gesenius, as above, “Yea, with blessings the autumnal rain doth cover it,” (that is, the valley so desolate in the heat of summer — the valley of weeping), would perhaps be the most natural, though it is not easy to see the connection according to this interpretation, or according to any other proposed. Least of all is it easy to see the connection according to the translation of the Septuagint, the Vulgate, Luther, and Prof. Alexander. Perhaps the connection in the mind of the author of the psalm may have been this. He sees the sterile and desolate valley through which the pilgrims are passing made joyous by the cheerfulness — the happiness — the songs — of those who are on their way to the house of God. This fact — this image — suggests to him the idea that this is similar to the effect which is produced in that valley when copious rains descend upon it, and when, though commonly desolate, it is covered with grass and flowers, or is “blessed” by the rain. This latter image is to his mind an illustration of the happy scene now before him in the cheerful and exulting movements of the pilgrims on their way to the house of God. The one suggests the other; and the psalmist has a combined image before his mind, the one illustrating the other, and both showing how a vale naturally desolate and sterile may be made cheerful and joyous.

<sup><1817></sup>Psalm 84:7. They go from strength to strength ... Margin, “company to company.” The Septuagint and Vulgate, “They go from strength to strength; the God of gods is seen in Zion.” Luther, “They obtain one victory after another, that one must see that there is a righteous God in Zion.” DeWette, “Going they increase in strength, until they appear before God in Zion.” This last is doubtless the true idea. As they pass along, as they come nearer and nearer to the end of their journey, their strength, their ardor, their firmness of purpose increases. By their conversation; by their songs; by encouraging one another; by seeing one difficulty overcome after another; by the fact kept before their minds, and increasingly apparent, that they are constantly approaching the end of their journey — that the distance to be traveled is constantly diminishing — that the difficulties become less and less, and that they will soon see the towers and walls of the desired city — they are invigorated, cheered, comforted. What a beautiful illustration of the life of Christian pilgrims — of the bands of the redeemed — as they journey on toward the end of their course — the Mount Zion above! By prayer and praise and mutual counsel, by their songs, by the fact that difficulties are surmounted, leaving fewer to be overcome, and that the journey to be traveled is diminishing constantly — by the feeling that they are ever drawing nearer to the Zion of their home, until the light is seen to glitter and play on its towers and walls — they increase in strength, they become more confirmed in their purposes, they bear trials better, they overcome difficulties more easily, they walk more firmly, they tread their way more cheerfully and triumphantly.

Every one of them in Zion appeareth before God literally, “He shall appear to God in Zion.” The meaning evidently is, that they who are referred to in the previous verses as going up to Zion will be seen there, or will come before God, in the place of worship. There is a change of number here, from the plural to the singular — as, in <sup><4845></sup>Psalm 84:5, there is a change from the singular to the plural. Such changes are frequent in the Scriptures as in other writings, and the one here can be accounted for on the supposition that the author of the psalm, in looking upon the moving procession, at one moment may be supposed to have looked upon them as a procession — a moving mass — and then that he looked upon them as individuals, and spake of them as such. The idea here is, that they would not falter and fall by the way; that the cheerful, joyous procession would come to the desired place; that their wishes would be gratified, and that their joy would be full when they came to the end of their journey — to Zion. So it is of all Christian pilgrims. Every true believer — everyone that truly loves God — will appear before him in the upper Zion — in heaven. There their joy will be complete; there the long-cherished desires of their hearts will be fully gratified; there all that they ever hoped for, and more, will be realized.

Psalm 84:8. O LORD God of hosts See the notes at Psalm 84:1. God is appealed to here as a God of power; as a God who is able to accomplish all his purposes, and to impart every needed blessing.

Hear my prayer A prayer of the psalmist that he might also have a place among the servants of God in their worship, Psalm 84:2. To this earnestness of prayer he is excited by the view which he had of the blessedness of those who went with songs up to Zion. His soul longs to be among them; from the sight of them his prayer is the more fervent that he may partake of their blessedness and joy.

Give ear, O God of Jacob With whom Jacob wrestled in prayer, and prevailed. Genesis 32:24-30. On the phrase, “give ear,” see the notes at Psalm 5:1.

Psalm 84:9. Behold, O God our shield Our defense, as a shield is a defense in the day of battle. Compare the notes at Psalm 5:12; 18:2; 33:20. It is an appeal to God as a protector. The psalmist was an exile — a wanderer — and he looked to God as his defense.

And look upon the face of thine anointed Look favorably upon; look with benignity and kindness. The word anointed here is the word “Messiah” — יהוים, <sup><4899></sup> (Greek, Χριστος <sup><5547></sup>, “Christ”; see the notes at Matthew 1:1). Compare the notes at Psalm 2:2. It here refers, however, evidently to the author of the psalm; and the word used is evidence that the author was David, as the anointed of the Lord, or someone set apart to the kingly office. It is true that this word was applicable to other kings, and also to priests and prophets, but the circumstances in the case concur best on the supposition that David is referred to. The allusion here is not to Christ; and the language does not suggest or justify the use which is often made of it when prayer is offered, that “God would look upon us in the face of his anointed” — whatever may, or may not be, the propriety of that prayer on other, grounds.

Psalm 84:10. For a day in thy courts is better than a thousand Better — happier — more profitable — more to be desired — than a thousand days spent elsewhere. That is, I should find more happiness — more true joy — in one day spent in the house of God, in his worship, in the exercises of true religion — more that will be satisfactory to the soul, and that will be dwelt on with pleasure in the memory when life is coming to a close — than I could in a thousand days spent in any other manner. This was much for a man like David — or a man who had been encompassed with all the splendor of royalty — to say; it is much for any man to say. And yet it could be said with truth by him; it can be said with equal truth by others; and when we come to the end of life — to the time when we shall review the past, and ask where we have found most true happiness, most that was satisfactory to the soul, most that we shall delight then to dwell on and to remember, most that we should be glad to have repeated and perpetuated, most that would be free from the remembrance of disappointment, chagrin, and care — it will not be the banqueting hall — the scenes of gaiety — the honors, the praises, the flatteries of people — or even the delights of literature and of the social circle — but it will be the happy times which we shall have spent in communion with God — the times when in the closet we poured out our hearts to Him — when we bowed before him at the family altar, when we approached him in the sanctuary. The sweetest remembrances of life will be the sabbath and the exercises of religion.

I had rather be a doorkeeper in the house of my God Margin, “I would choose rather to sit at the threshold.” The verb used here is derived from a noun signifying sill or threshold, and it would seem to mean here to stand on the threshold; to be at the door or the entrance, even without the privilege of entering the house: I would prefer that humble place to a residence within the abodes of the wicked. The verb here used occurs nowhere else in the Scriptures. The exact idea is not, as would seem from our translation, to keep the door, as in the capacity of a sexton or servant, but that of occupying the sill — the threshold — the privilege of standing there, and looking in, even if he was not permitted to enter. It would be an honor and a privilege to be anywhere about the place of public worship, rather than to be the occupant of a dwelling-place of sin.

Than to dwell in the tents of wickedness The word “tents” here is equivalent to dwellings. It is used because it was so common in early periods to dwell in tents; and hence, the word was employed to denote a dwelling in general. The emphasis here is very much on the word “in:” — he would prefer standing at the door of the house of worship to dwelling within the abodes of the wicked — that is, to being admitted to intimacy with those who occupy such dwellings — however splendid, rich, and gorgeous, those abodes might be.

Psalm 84:11. For the LORD God is a sun The Septuagint and the Latin Vulgate render this, “For the Lord loveth mercy and truth.” Our translation, however, is the correct one. The sun gives light, warmth, beauty, to the creation; so God is the source of light, joy, happiness, to the soul. Compare <sup><310></sup>Isaiah 60:19; <sup><623></sup>Revelation 21:23; 22:5.

And shield See <sup><3819></sup>Psalm 84:9.

The LORD will give grace and glory Grace, or favor, here; glory, or honor, in the world to come. He will bestow all needful favor on his people in this life; he will admit them to glory in the world to come. Grace and glory are connected. The bestowment of the one will be followed by the other. <sup><639></sup>Romans 8:29,30. He that partakes of the grace of God on earth will partake of glory in heaven. Grace comes before glory; glory always follows where grace is given.

No good thing will he withhold ... Nothing really good; nothing that man really needs; nothing pertaining to this life, nothing necessary to prepare for the life to come. Compare <sup><508></sup>1 Timothy 4:8; <sup><519></sup>Philippians 4:19.

Psalm 84:12. O LORD of hosts, blessed is the man that trusteth in thee Blessed in every respect. His lot is a happy one; happy in thy friendship; happy in being permitted to worship thee; happy in the blessings which religion scatters along his path here; happy in thy sustaining grace in times of trial; happy in the support given in the hour of death; happy in the eternity to which he is going. Oh that all men would try it, and experience in their own souls the happiness — the real, genuine, deep, permanent joy — of trusting in God; of believing that there is a God; of confiding in his character; of leaning on him in every situation in life; of relying on his mercy, his grace, and his faithfulness, in the hour of death!

APPENDIX NOTES ON PSALM 84

A Korahite psalm. See Psalm 42; Psalm 43.

Psalm 84:3. Yea, the sparrow hath found an house ... We acknowledge a strong preference for the natural and beautiful rendering of this verse adopted by Calvin, Walford, Thrupp, Bossuet, Adam Clarke, and others — “Even as the sparrow findeth an house, and the swallow a nest for herself where she may lay her young, (so I seek) thine altars, O Lord of hosts.” The reader will observe that the English version supplies the particle “even,” and that the above supplement is equally competent, and furnishes the beautiful idea that the saint is drawn to the house of God with a gracious instinct akin to that which draws the wandering bird home to her nest. We subjoin Walford’s note:

“The common opinion respecting this verse is that it represents sparrows, etc., as building their nests in some parts of the sacred edifices. No other sense can indeed be drawn from the English translation. But there are serious objections to this view of the matter. It is not in the least degree likely that any such lodgments were permitted within these consecrated precincts; and even if they could have been allowed, there seems to be no reason why these birds should prefer this to other more commodious places, where they would not be liable to the disturbance unavoidable here, as the concourse to the house of God was incessant and very great. It is therefore clear that the psalmist expresses in this poetic imagery, his strong desire to be readmitted to the sacred abode. The particles of similitude, “as” and “so,” are not indeed in the original text; but there are many instances in which they are omitted in Hebrew, but where it is necessary to supply them in order to make an intelligible version. The sense of the passage thus taken is, As these birds delight in their appropriate abodes, and frequent them with constancy, so it is my earnest wish to be restored to the enjoyments which I have derived from a continued resort to thy house.”

Hengstenberg is not materially different:

“Modern expositors have gone astray in consequence of their having unfortunately taken up the idea that the psalm contains the expression of the earnest longings after the temple of one separated from it. They translate: ‘Even the sparrows find an house, and the swallows a nest, for themselves, where they lay their young in thine altars, Jehovah Sabaoth, my King and my God,’ and suppose the idea intended to be conveyed is: and are thus happier than I am, who am separated from thy sanctuary. But the thought obtained in this way is one, notwithstanding the defense which has been made of it by DeWette and Maurer, of a trivial character, and unworthy the holy earnestness of Israelite poetry; a bird certainly was in no very enviable situation which had fixed its place of dwelling and its nest in the house of the Lord. The main thing, moreover, “I am less fortunate than they,” is “wanting,” and added to the passage without any reason whatever. The ‘with thine altars,’ instead of ‘at,’ is very strange, and certainly the unusual tae<sup><h854></sup> would not have been used for the purpose of avoiding the ambiguity. The birds durst build their nest if generally in the sanctuary, yet certainly not in the neighborhood of the altars. Finally, <sup><880></sup>Psalm 84:4 is not at all suitable, if we suppose that <sup><880></sup>Psalm 84:3 contains a lamentation over absence from the sanctuary; and even <sup><880></sup>Psalm 84:2 can only by a false interpretation be brought in this case into harmony with <sup><880></sup>Psalm 84:3.”

<sup><880></sup>Psalm 84:6. Through the valley of Baca This verse is extremely obscure; so that no version can be given of it which is entirely free from objection. I take the meaning to be in general this, that the truly pious worshippers of God allowed no inconveniences or difficulties, many of which attended on traveling in Judea, to prevent their attendance on the solemn festivals at Jerusalem; but that, on the contrary, their regard for these sacred rites was such, that the most rugged paths through dry and barren deserts were transformed by their affectionate longing for the presence of God into pleasant ways; the thirsty valleys, irrigated by no streams and ornamented by no verdure, yet became fertile, irriguous, and delightful, by means of the associations which were connected with them in the minds of these devout pilgrims, and through the sacred enjoyments which sprung from the divine influence and favor which were vouchsafed to them. A stanza in Addison’s beautiful paraphrase of Psalm 23 expresses the precise notion of the psalmist’s words:

*“Though in a bare and rugged way,
Through devious lonely wilds I stray,
His bounty will my pains beguile;
The barren wilderness shall smile;
With sudden green and herbage crowned,
And streams shall murmur all around.” — Walford*

We give the following from Dickson on account of the quaintness and beauty of the style, and the spirituality and elevation of the sentiment: “In the fifth place he looketh upon their condition who dwell farre off from the tabernacle, who might at least thrice a year come from the farthest corner of the land to keep the solemnities appointed of God; and he counteth them blessed, albeit in their voyage they should endure never so much toile in traveling, and should with difficulty drink their water, either rained down from the clouds, or drawn from a well or cistern dug with much labor: for albeit they should sustaine toile and drought in their way, yet having refreshments one after another, and renewed strength for their journey, they should all come at last to the place of publick ordinances in Sion; and here he describeth the true and blessed Israelites, whether proselytes or borne Jews, resolved to come and appear before the Lord in the appointed solemnities by these six properties:

(1), they encourage themselves for the journey by hope in God to be furnished with strength: “Blessed is the man (saith he) “whose strength is in thee.”

(2), they are resolved in their heart for all the inconveniences they meet with in the journey, to hold on their course: “In whose heart are the wayes of them.”

(3), they do hold on their course through dry and comfortlesse places, which may be called places of Baca, or weeping: “They passe through the valley of Baca.”

(4), they overcome this difficulty of wanting water, either by digging a well, where they may find water; or by finding some already digged cistern wherein God’s providence had reserved some quantity of rain-water for them: “Who, passing through the valley or Baca, make it a well: the raine also filleth the pooles.”

(5), after refreshment found in their journey, they are encouraged to go on their way, until they need and find some new refreshment, and reparation of their strength: “They go from strength to strength.”

(6), these godly travelers all come at length to the place they aimed at, to Sion, where they appear before God in the holy feast, chearful and joyfull souls: “Everyone of them in Sion appeareth before God.”

And therefore doth he call them blessed, because at length they come through all the difficulties to have sweet communion with God. These two degrees of blessed Israelites are so painted out in figurative terms, as they may most easily lead the spiritual eye to the blessednesse which the figure is fit to represent, so that the typical words cannot well be understood, except the spiritual blessednesse be taken along: for there are two degrees of really blessed persons; some are at home already dwelling with God, of whom it may be most solidly said: “Blessed are they that dwell in thy house, they will be still praising thee,” which is their perpetual exercise. Others are travelers who are in their way toward heaven, the Lord’s house; who indeed despair of their own strength to make out their journey, but their confidence is in God’s strength, and their encouragement to set forward is this, that of them it may well be said, “Blessed is the man whose strength is in thee:” such men’s journey doth take up their heart, the stream of their affections runs thitherward; “In whose heart are the wayes of them.” Those travelers have a wilderness to go through, a comfortlesse valley wherein they do find matter of mourning and no solid consolation, save that which God doth provide beyond the nature of the place, which God, one way or other, doth furnish unto them, that they shall not fail to have a timous consolation: “Who, passing through the valley of Baca, make it a well; the rattle also filleth the pooles.” So that albeit God suffer them to thirst, yet he suffereth them not to want a sufficient measure for bringing them on their way; a strengthening them to go forward: if they misse a well, they shall have a cistern filled with rain from heaven; the measure furnished unto them, reneweth their strength after wearinesse, and sufficeth them until they need and meet with another renovation of their strength: “They go from strength to strength.” Not one of those resolute travelers or self-denying persons, relying on God’s strength and furniture, do perish by the way, all are upheld and brought forward, until they come where they would be, to enjoy God’s presence in “Sion” which is above: “Every one of them,” without exception, “in Sion appeareth before God.”

Psalm 84:10. I had rather be a door-keeper ... Compare ~~109~~1

Chronicles 9:19, where the Korahires are said to be “keepers of gates of the tabernacle; and their fathers keepers of the entry,” and the allusion is seen in its true point and beauty.

And now, ~~1810~~ Psalm 84:10,12, you are made to hear the report of the place given by those who reach it. Israelites would thus commend God’s holy place to their fellows; but they who reach the kingdom of which all this was the shadow, what would they not say of the glory, and beauty, and bliss, and peace? If a day in the Lord’s typical courts was so satisfying, what would be a day in the kingdom? And if one day, what the eternal day,

“dies sempiternus, cui non cedit hestenus, quem non urget crastinus?” (August)

*“For the Lord is a sun and shield:
God giveth grace and glory;
The Lord withholds no good
From them that walk uprightly.”*

The Lord is all brightness and no gloom, and all safety. He gives “honor and glory,” see ~~311D~~ Proverbs 4:9, ... He leaves not one unsatisfied wish. Not one in that kingdom but ever sings (and O that all on earth heard it now!) “O Lord of hosts, blessed is the man that trusteth in thee!” This is the heartfelt utterance of each one that has traveled there; the testimony ungrudging and unqualified of “The Righteous One on his way to the city of the living God.” — A. A. Bonar.

NOTES ON PSALM 85

On the phrase in the title, “To the chief Musician,” see the notes on the title to Psalm 4. On the expression, “for the sons of Korah,” see the notes at the title to Psalm 42. Neither of these expressions determines anything in regard to the authorship of the psalm, or the occasion on which it was composed, and conjecture on these points would be useless. There were in the Jewish history, as there have been in the Christian church, numerous occasions to which the sentiments of the psalm would be appropriate. It was evidently composed in view of the fact that God had, on some former occasion, interposed when his people were in trouble, but that now for similar causes he was again angry with them, and they were suffering similar calamities. The psalm contains a fervent prayer that God would again appear for them, and it implies a confident expectation that he would do this, so that the calamities which had come upon them would be removed — even as by a miraculous interposition. There is nothing to make it absolutely certain that it pertains to the Babylonian captivity, as DeWette supposes, but the language is so general that it might refer to any captivity.

The psalm consists essentially of three parts:

I. An allusion to God’s gracious interposition in former times, as the ground of the present appeal to him, <sup><B80L></sup>Psalm 85:1-3. In those times, when his people had been conquered, he had restored to them the possession of their own land; he had forgiven their iniquity; he had turned himself from the fierceness of his anger. These acts of mercy were now remembered; and this was the ground of confident hope in the present trouble.

II. A description of the state of the people at the time when the psalm was composed, as demanding help from God, <sup><B80L></sup>Psalm 85:4-7. It is clear that the nation was suffering from some calamity; that the anger of God seemed to be upon them; that it appeared as if his wrath would never be turned away; and that unless he should interpose the nation must perish.

III. The expression of a confident hope that God would deliver his people, <sup><B80B></sup>Psalm 85:8-13.

(a) The psalmist represents himself as willing to hear what God would say, with the hope that he would speak peace to his people; (<sup><1818></sup>Psalm 85:8);

(b) he declares his belief that God is near to them who fear him (<sup><1819></sup>Psalm 85:9), and that in the present case — in the manner in which he would meet the present emergency — there would be a mingling of mercy and truth — of righteousness and peace: that each of these, in proper proportions, and without collision, would meet and mingle in the divine dealings; that is, it would be seen, in his dealings with his people, that God was merciful and just — righteous and disposed to peace (<sup><1820></sup>Psalm 85:10);

(c) he expresses his assurance that, dark as things now appeared, there would be a divine interposition as if truth (or, a just solution of these difficulties) should spring out of the very earth — as if it would come from some unknown quarter and in some unexpected manner, as mysterious, and as incomprehensible, and as far removed from human agency as if it came up suddenly from the ground — or as if the heavens opened themselves, and it looked down from the sky (<sup><1821></sup>Psalm 85:11); and

(d) he, in conclusion, expresses his confident belief that the Lord would give that which was truly good; that the land would again yield its increase; that righteousness would attend his march through the land, going as it were before him, and causing all the people to walk in his steps, (<sup><1822></sup>Psalm 85:12,13.

There does not appear to have been in this psalm any original reference to the Messiah, or to his work: that is, all that there is in the psalm can be explained on the supposition that it has no such reference. But it must be obvious to every one that the language is such as is suited most beautifully and appropriately to describe many things in the plan of redemption, and especially to express the fact that in that work the attributes of God, some of which seem not easy to be reconciled, have been most perfectly and beautifully manifested and blended.

<sup><1823></sup>Psalm 85:1. LORD, thou hast been favorable unto thy land Margin, “well pleased with.” The idea is that he had been kind or propitious to the nation; to wit, on some former occasion. So Luther, (vormals) “formerly.” The reference is to some previous period in their history, when he had exercised his power in their behalf.

Thou hast brought back the captivity of Jacob That is, at the time referred to. It is not necessary to suppose that the allusion is to the period immediately preceding the time when the psalm was composed, but it may have been any period in their history. Nor is it necessary to suppose that the people had been removed from their land at the time, for all that would be necessary to suppose in interpreting the language would be that the land had been invaded, even though the inhabitants still remained in it.

<85B> Psalm 85:2. Thou hast forgiven the iniquity of thy people That is, These calamities came upon them in consequence of their sins, and thou hast dealt with them as if those sins were forgiven. The fact that the tokens of his anger had passed away, and that his judgments were withdrawn, seemed to prove that their sins had been forgiven. The same form of expression used here — with the same words in Hebrew — occurs in <85B> Psalm 32:5. See the notes at that passage. The language suggests the idea of an atonement. Literally, “Thou hast lifted up — or borne — the iniquity of thy people.”

Thou hast covered all their sin So that it is hidden; and therefore thou dost treat them as if they were righteous, or as if there were no sin. The idea of covering is that expressed in the Hebrew word, which is commonly rendered “atonement” — rpk<sup><372></sup> — to cover; to cover over; then, to cover over sin; to forgive. The idea suggested in this verse is, that when God withdraws the tokens of his displeasure, we may hope that he has pardoned the sin which was the cause of his anger.

<85B> Psalm 85:3. Thou hast taken away all thy wrath That is, formerly; on the occasion referred to. Thou didst so deal with thy people as to make it evident that thou didst cherish no anger or displeasure against them.

Thou hast turned thyself... Margin, “thine anger from waxing hot.” Literally, Thou didst turn from the heat of thine anger. His indignation was withdrawn, and he was again at peace with them. It is this fact, drawn from the former history of the people, which constitutes the basis of the appeal which follows.

<85B> Psalm 85:4. Turn us, O God of our salvation The God from whom salvation must come, and on whom we are dependent for it. The prayer here is, “turn us;” turn us from our sins; bring us to repentance; make us willing to forsake every evil way; and enable us to do it. This is the proper spirit always in prayer. The first thing is not that he would take away his wrath, but that he would dispose us to forsake our sins, and to turn to himself; that we may be led to abandon that which has brought his displeasure upon us, and then that he will cause his anger toward us to cease. We have no authority for asking God to turn away his judgments unless we are willing to forsake our sins; and in all cases we can hope for the divine interposition and mercy, when the judgments of God are upon us, only as we are willing to turn from our iniquities.

And cause thine anger toward us to cease The word used here, and rendered “cause to cease” — rrpe<sup>1665</sup> — means properly to break; then, to violate; and then, to annul, or to bring to an end. The idea here is, that if they were turned from sin, the cause of his anger would be removed, and would cease of course. Compare <sup>1815</sup>Psalm 80:3.

<sup>1815</sup>Psalm 85:5. Wilt thou be angry with us for ever? Thine anger is so long continued that it seems as if it would never cease.

Wilt thou draw out thine anger Wilt thou protract or prolong it? The idea is that of a determined purpose, in retaining his anger, as if his wrath would cease of necessity unless there were such a direct exercise of will.

To all generations literally, “from generation to generation.” That is, — so that not merely the generation which has sinned, and which has brought down these tokens of displeasure, shall suffer, but the next, and the next, and the next, forever. The plea is that the judgment might terminate, and not reach coming generations.

<sup>1815</sup>Psalm 85:6. Wilt thou not revive us again literally, “Wilt thou not turn (or return), cause us to live;” that is, and cause us to live. The expression is equivalent to “again” as in our translation. The Septuagint and Vulgate render it, “Returning, wilt thou not give us life?” The word rendered revive means to live; to cause to live; and the idea is that of recovering them from their condition as a state of death; that is, restoring them as if they were dead. The image is that of returning spring after the death of winter, or the young grass when the rain descends after a long drought, and when everything seemed to be dead. So of the people referred to in the psalm; everything among them was like such a winter, when there is neither leaf, nor flower, nor grass, nor fruit; or like such a drought, when desolation is seen everywhere; or like the grave, where the dead repose. The image of spring, after a long and dreary winter, is one also which will properly describe the condition of the church when the influences of the Spirit have been long withheld, and when, under the visitations of grace, religion seems to live again among the people of God.

That thy people may rejoice in thee In thy favor; in thy presence; in thee as their God.

(a) There is always joy in a revival of religion. Nothing is so much suited to make a people happy; nothing diffuses so much joy. Compare <sup><40B></sup>Acts 8:8.

(b) This is particularly joy in God. It is because he comes near; because he manifests his mercy; because he shows his power and his grace.

<sup><85D></sup>Psalm 85:7. Shew us thy mercy, O LORD That is, Manifest thy mercy in returning to us; in forgiving our sins; in taking from us the tokens of thy displeasure.

And grant us thy salvation Salvation or deliverance from our present trouble and calamities.

<sup><85E></sup>Psalm 85:8. I will hear what God the LORD will speak I, the psalmist; I, representing the people as looking to God. The state of mind here is that of patient listening; of a willingness to hear God, whatever God should say; of confidence in him that what he would say would be favorable to his people — would be words of mercy and of peace. Whatever God should command, the speaker was willing to yield to it; whatever God should say, he would believe; whatever God should enjoin, he would do; whatever God should ask him to surrender, he would resign. There was no other resource but God, and there was entire confidence in him that whatever he should say, require, or do, would be right.

For he will speak peace unto his people Whatever he shall say will tend to their peace, their blessedness, their prosperity. He loves his people, and there may be a confident assurance that all he will say will tend to promote their welfare.

And to his saints His holy ones; his people.

But let them not turn again to folly The Septuagint and the Vulgate render this, “To his saints and to those who turn the heart unto him.” Our common version, however, has expressed the sense of the Hebrew; and it contains very important truths and admonitions.

(a) The way which they had formerly pursued was folly. It was not mere sin, but there was in it the element of foolishness as well as wickedness. All sin may be contemplated in this twofold aspect: as wickedness, and as foolishness. Compare <sup><940></sup>Psalm 14:1; 73:3.

(b) There was great danger that they would turn again to their former course; that they would forget alike the punishment which had come upon them; their own resolutions; and their promises made to God. Compare <sup><980></sup>Psalm 78:10,11,17,18,31,32. Nothing is more common than for a people who have been afflicted with heavy judgments to forget all that they promised to do if those judgments should be withdrawn; or for an individual who has been raised up from a bed of sickness — from the borders of the grave — to forget the solemn resolutions which he formed on what seemed to be a dying bed — perhaps becoming more thoughtless and wicked than he was before, as if to make reprisals for the wrong done him by his Maker, or as if to recover the time that was lost by sickness.

(c) This passage, therefore, is a solemn admonition to all who have been afflicted, and who have been restored, that they return not to their former course of life. To this they should feel themselves exhorted

(1) by their obligations to their benefactor;

(2) by the remembrance of their own solemn vows made in a time of sincerity and honesty, and when they saw things as they really are; and

(3) by the assurance that if they do return to their sin and folly, heavier judgments will come upon them; that the patience of God will be exhausted; and that he will bear with them no longer.

Compare <sup><454></sup>John 5:14, “Sin no more, lest a worse thing come unto thee.”

<sup><89></sup>Psalm 85:9. Surely his salvation His help; his aid. The word here does not mean salvation in the restricted use of the term as applied to the future life, but it means deliverance of all kinds — rescue from trouble, danger, calamity.

Is nigh them that fear him All who truly reverence him, and look to him in a proper manner. They may expect his aid; they may be sure that he will soon come to help them. This expresses the confident assurance of the author of the psalm that God would interpose in the troubles of the nation, and would deliver them.

That glory may dwell in our land

- (a) The glory or honor of having such a God to dwell among them; and
 (b) the peace, the prosperity, the happiness, which will be the consequence — of his interposition.

The idea is, that this would be a permanent thing; that this honor or glory would then make the land its dwelling-place.

~~85:10~~ Psalm 85:10. mercy and truth are met together That is, in the divine dealings referred to in the psalm. There has been a blending of mercy and truth in those dealings; or, both have been manifested; truth, in the divine statements, threatenings, and promises; and mercy, in forgiving sin, and in sparing the people. There is no necessary contradiction between truth and mercy; that is, the one does not necessarily conflict with the other, though the one seems to conflict with the other when punishment is threatened for crime, and yet mercy is shown to the offender — that is, where the punishment is not inflicted, and the offender is treated as if he had not sinned. In this respect, the great difficulty in all human governments has been to maintain both; to be true to the threatening of the law, and at the same time to pardon the guilty. Human governments have never been able to reconcile the two. If punishment is inflicted up to the full measure of the threatening, there is no manifestation of mercy; if mercy is shown, there is a departure from justice, or a declaration that the threatenings of the law are not, in all cases, to be inflicted: that is, there is, to that extent, an abandonment of justice. Human governments have always felt the need, in their practical operations, of some device like an atonement, by which the two might be blended, and both secured. Such a method of reconciliation or of securing both objects — truth, in the fulfillment of the threat, and mercy toward the offender — has never been (and could not be) acted on in a human administration. It is only in the divine government that this has been accomplished, where a true and perfect regard has been paid to truth in the threatening, and to mercy toward the guilty by an atonement. It is true, indeed, that this passage does not refer to the atonement made by the Redeemer, but there can scarcely be found a better illustration of that work than occurs in the language used here. Compare the notes at ~~8:12~~ Romans 3:26. See also my work on the “atonement,” chapters ii., iii. (And “Way of Salvation,” chap. xvii.)

Righteousness In the maintenance of law, or the manifestation of justice. That is, in this case, God had shown his justice in bringing these calamities on the people for their sins. In the work of the Redeemer this was done by his being “wounded for our transgressions, and bruised for our iniquities;” by the fact that “the chastisement of our peace was upon him,” and that “the Lord laid on him the iniquity of us all.” <sup><816></sup>Isaiah 53:5,6. “And peace.” Pardon; mercy; restoration to favor. In the case of the Hebrew people this was done by his removing the calamities which their sins had brought upon them, and by his returning favor. In the work of redemption, it was done by the pardon of sin, and by reconciliation to God.

Have kissed each other As friends and lovers do; as they do who have been long separated; as they do who, after having been alienated and estranged, are made friends again. In like manner, there seemed to be an alienation — an estrangement — a state of hostility — between righteousness and mercy, between justice and pardon, but they have been now united as separated and alienated friends are, and have embraced each other as such friends do; that is, they blend together in beautiful harmony.

<sup><815></sup>Psalm 85:11. Truth shall spring out of the earth As plants do — for this is the meaning of the word. The blessings of truth and righteousness would be like the grass, the shrubs, the flowers, which spring up from the ground — and like the, rain and the sunbeams which come from heaven. Truth would spring up everywhere, and abound in all lands, as plants, and shrubs, and grass spring up all over the earth. There is not an intended contrast between the two clauses of this verse, as if truth came from the earth, and righteousness from heaven; but the idea is that they would come in a manner that might be compared with the way in which God’s other abundant blessings are bestowed, as springing, on the one hand, from the fertility of the earth, and on the other, from the rain, the dew, and the sunbeam.

And righteousness shall look down from heaven Shall descend from heaven; or shall come from above — as if the rain, and the sun looked down from heaven, and saw the needs of man. The original word here rendered “look down” — āqæ <sup><825></sup> — means to lay upon, or over; then, to project, lie over, look forward; then, to overhang; and the idea here is that it bent over, or leaned forward to look at the necessities of man — as one does who is desirous of gazing at an object. There was an anxiety, so to speak, to come to the earth — to meet the human need. As the rain and the sunbeams seem anxious to bestow their blessings on man, so God seems anxious to bestow on man the blessings of salvation.

Psalm 85:12. Yea, the LORD shall give that which is good All that is truly good: all needful temporal blessings; all blessings connected with salvation.

And our land shall yield her increase There shall be fruitful seasons, and the earth shall produce abundance. Compare the notes at Psalm 67:6.

Psalm 85:13. Righteousness shall go before him Shall anticipate his coming, and prepare his way. The idea seems to be, that in order to his appearing, there would be a proclamation of righteousness, and a preparation for his advent by the diffusion of righteousness among the people; in other words, the nation, in the prospect of his coming, would turn from sin, and would seek to be prepared for his appearing. Thus John proclaimed the coming of the Redeemer, “Repent ye, for the kingdom of heaven is at hand.” Matthew 3:2. So also

And shall set us in the way of his steps This might be rendered, “and set its steps for a way;” that is, the steps which would be taken by him would indicate the way in which his people should walk. Perhaps, however, the common interpretation best expresses the sense of the passage. According to that, the idea is, that the effect of his coming would be to dispose people to walk in the way of the steps which he took; to be his imitators and followers. The general thought is, that his coming would have the effect of turning the people to the paths of righteousness and truth. This is the designed effect of all the visitations of God to our world.

APPENDIX NOTES ON PSALM 85

It is impossible to determine with anything like certainty the date and occasion of this psalm. Expositors are very much divided. Hengstenberg and Alexander agree in thinking that the time of composition cannot be determined. Perowne and Binnie, however, incline to the date of the return from the captivity in Babylon. This opinion seems to carry much probability with it. We abridge the remarks of the firstnamed writer: There seems every reason to conclude that this psalm was written after the return of the exiles from the Babylonian captivity. It opens with an acknowledgment of God's goodness and mercy in the national restoration in terms which could hardly apply to any other event. But it passes immediately to earnest entreaty for deliverance from the pressure of existing evils in language which almost contradicts the previous acknowledgment. First, we hear the grateful confession, "Thou hast turned the captivity of Jacob;" and then we have the prayer, "Turn us, O God of our salvation." If the third verse contains the joyful announcement, "Thou hast withdrawn all thy wrath," etc., the fifth pleads as if no such assurance had been given: "Wilt thou forever be angry with us? Wilt thou draw out thine anger to all generations?"

The most probable way of explaining this conflict of opposing feelings is by referring the psalm to the circumstances mentioned by Nehemiah (~~1013~~ Nehemiah 1:3). The exiles on their return, he learned, were "in great affliction and reproach." And when he obtained leave to go to Jerusalem himself, it was only in the midst of perpetual opposition and discouragement (Nehemiah 4) that he was able to carry on his work of restoration. The bright prospect which was opening before them had been quickly dashed. They had returned, indeed, but it was to a desolate land and a forsaken city, whose walls were cast down, and her gates burned with fire; while jealous and hostile tribes were ever on the watch to assail and vex them. Hence, it is that the entreaty for mercy follows so hard upon the acknowledgment that mercy has been vouchsafed. Psalm 126 is conceived in a somewhat similar strain. In the latter portion of this psalm (from ~~1318~~ Psalm 85:8) the present misery is forgotten in the dawning of a glorious future. The prayer has been uttered; the storm of the soul is hushed; in quietness and resignation the psalmist sets himself to hear what God will say, and the divine answer is given, not in form, but in substance, in ~~1319~~ Psalm 85:9-12. It is a glowing prophecy of Messianic times, most naturally connecting itself with the hopes which the return from Babylon had kindled afresh, and well suited to enable those who heard it to triumph over the gloom and despondency of the present.

~~1350~~ Psalm 85:10. mercy and truth are met together ... Calvin has no doubt that we have here a prophecy concerning the kingdom of Christ. He does not, however, explain the attributes mentioned in the verse as attributes of God meeting in harmony at the cross, or in the person of Christ. He supposes the natural meaning of the passage to be "that mercy, truth, peace, and righteousness will form the grand and ennobling distinction of the kingdom of Christ;" in other words, that these four virtues shall flourish and rule supreme on the earth. The great commentator however, adds — "If anyone would rather understand "mercy and truth" as referring to God, I have no disposition to enter into dispute with him."

Such an understanding of the passage has prevailed extensively from the days of Augustine downward. "These words," says Ralph Erskine, "may be applied to the happy meeting of graces in men upon the revelation of Christ in the soul, yet I take it mainly to import the happy meeting of perfections in God, to be glorified in the sinner's salvation by Jesus Christ; which is a gloss that no interpreter I have had occasion to consult does neglect or omit: and if any of them should miss it, I think they would miss the very groundwork and foundation of all other happy meetings: 'mercy and truth have met together, righteousness and peace have kissed each other.'"

Lowth, remarking on these two views, justly says that the basis and source of these virtues in the hearts of people on earth is the sacrifice of Christ, by which God is reconciled and his character harmonized in the salvation of people. How admirable is that celebrated personification of the divine attributes by the psalmist! How just, elegant, and splendid does it appear, if applied only according to the literal sense, to the restoration of the Jewish nation from the Babylonian captivity! But if interpreted as relating to that sublimer, more sacred, and mystical sense, which is not obscurely shadowed under the ostensible image, it is certainly uncommonly noble and elevated, mysterious and sublime.

In allusion to this text, the cross of Christ has been quaintly but appropriately styled the "trysting-place" of the divine attributes. The following passage is an earnest and beautiful application of the text in this view:

"Are you afraid that truth and righteousness conspire against you, and hinder mercy and peace from ever meeting with you and embracing you? O no: fear not; only believe that mercy and truth are met together, and that righteousness and peace have kissed each other in Christ Truth will not stand in the way of mercy, for they have kissed each other. He is indeed an infinitely just God, to take vengeance upon, sin: but justice will not hinder mercy from coming to you: only believe that justice and mercy are reconciled in Christ, so as mercy can vent toward you, to the credit of justice. But, O! may such a blackmouthed sinner as I, as black as hell and the devil, expect a kiss from such an infinitely fair Jesus? Is that to be expected, that such opposites should meet in one another's arms? Yea, man, woman, allow me, a black sinner like yourself, to be the happy messenger, to tell you in God's name, that, be ye as black as you will, such a meeting and embracing between Christ and you is more to be expected than ever people or angels could have expected, that infinite justice and mercy should have met together and kissed each other in a Godman: and this unexpected meeting is the very ground upon which your expectation of a meeting with, and embracement of God in Christ, is to be founded.”

— Ralph Erskine.

(It may be mentioned here, as an interesting fact, that Mr. Barnes himself, who has just (Jan. 1871) passed away, preached his last sermon from this noble text.)

NOTES ON PSALM 86

This psalm purports to be a psalm of David; and there is nothing in the psalm that is contrary to this supposition. Why it has its place among the psalms which are designated as the compositions of “the sons of Korah,” and had not its place among those which are ascribed to David (Psalm 1—70) we have no means of ascertaining. It is not said, however, that those were the only psalms of David, and there is no improbability in supposing that he may have composed others. It is not improperly named “a prayer,” since it is made up mostly of petitions, though this is true of others which are called “psalms,” and though it is true that this one has so much of praise in it that it might also (as it is in the margin) be designated a psalm. The occasion on which it was composed is unknown, but it has been commonly supposed that it was written in the time of the persecutions under Saul. DeWette regards it as a national song composed in a time of national trouble.

This psalm does not admit of any minute subdivision. It is made up of earnest prayers, with reasons why those prayers should be answered; and perhaps the leading practical suggestion which would properly follow from the psalm is, that it is proper for us, in our prayers, to urge reasons why they should be answered: the reasons why we pray at all. We cannot, indeed, suppose that we can suggest anything which would not occur to the divine mind, but in all our prayers there is some reason why we pray; there are reasons why we ask the particular things which are the burden of our supplications, and it cannot be improper, in order that our own minds at least may be suitably impressed, to mention those reasons when we come before God.

Psalm 86:1. Bow down thine ear, O LORD, hear me See the notes at Psalm 5:1.

For I am poor and needy This is the reason here assigned why God should hear him. It is not a plea of merit. It is not that there was any claim on God in the fact that he was a poor and needy man — a sinner helpless and dependent, or that it would be any injustice if God should not hear, for a sinner has no claim to favor; but it is that this was a condition in which the aid of God was needed, and in which it was proper or appropriate for God to hear prayer, and to render help. We may always make our helplessness, our weakness, our poverty, our need, a ground of appeal to God; not as a claim of justice, but as a case in which he will glorify himself by a gracious interposition. It is also to be remarked that it is a matter of unspeakable thankfulness that the “poor and needy” may call upon God; that they will be as welcome as any class of people; that there is no condition of poverty and want so low that we are debarred from the privilege of approaching One who has infinite resources, and who is as willing to help as he is able.

Psalm 86:2. Preserve my soul Preserve, or keep, my life; for so the word rendered soul means in this place, as it does commonly in the Scriptures.

For I am holy Margin, “One whom thou favorest.” The Hebrew word — dysj, <sup><12623></sup> — means properly, benevolent, kind; then, good, merciful, gracious; and then pious, godly. <sup><1304></sup>Psalm 30:4; 31:23; 37:28. The ground of the plea here is, that he was a friend of God; and that it was proper on that account to look to him for protection. He does not say that he was holy in such a sense that he had a claim on that account to the favor of God, or that his personal holiness was a ground of salvation; but the idea is, that he had devoted himself to God, and that it was, therefore, proper to look to him for his protection in the time of danger. A child looks to a parent for protection, because he is a child; a citizen looks to the protection of the laws, because he is a citizen; and so the people of God may look to him for protection, because they are his people. In all this there is no plea of merit, but there is the recognition of what is proper in the case, and what may be expected and hoped for.

Save thy servant Save him from threatening danger and from death.

That trusteth in thee Because I trust or confide in thee. I go nowhere else for protection; I rely on no one else. I look to thee alone, and I do this with entire confidence. A man who does this has a right to look to God for protection, and to expect that God will interpose in his behalf.

Psalm 86:3. Be merciful unto me, O Lord It was mercy after all that he relied on, and not justice. It was not because he had any claim on the ground that he was “holy,” but all that he had and hoped for was to be traced to the mercy of God.

For I cry unto thee daily Margin, as in Hebrew, “All the day.” The meaning is, that he did this constantly, or without intermission.

Psalm 86:4. Rejoice the soul of thy servant Cause me to rejoice; to wit, by thy gracious interposition, and by delivering me from danger and death.

For unto thee, O Lord, do I lift up my soul Compare the notes at Psalm 24:4. The idea is that of arousing himself, or exerting himself, as one does who makes strenuous efforts to obtain an object. He was not languid, or indifferent; he did not put forth merely weak and fitful efforts to find God, but he bent his whole powers to that end; he arouses himself thoroughly to seek the divine help. Languid and feeble efforts in seeking after God will be attended with no success. In so great a matter — when so much depends on the divine favor — when such great interests are at stake — the whole soul should be roused to one great and strenuous effort; not that we can obtain his favor by force or power, and not that any strength of ours will prevail of itself, but

(a) because nothing less will indicate the proper intensity of desire; and

(b) because such is his appointment in regard to the manner in which we are to seek his favor.

Compare Matthew 7:7,8; Luke 13:24; 16:16.

Psalm 86:5. For thou, Lord, art good ... This is another reason why God should hear his prayer; and it is a reason which may be properly urged at all times, and by all classes of persons. It is founded on the benevolence of God; on the fullness of his mercy to all that invoke his name. We should call in vain on a God who was not merciful and ready to forgive; but in the divine character there is the most ample foundation for such an appeal. In his benevolence; in his readiness to forgive; in the plenitude of his mercy, God is all that a penitent sinner could wish him to be. For if such a sinner should endeavor to describe what he would desire to find in God as a ground of appeal in his prayers, he could not express his feelings in language more full and free than God has himself employed about his own readiness to pardon and save. The language of the Bible on this subject would express, better than any language which he could himself employ, what in those circumstances he would wish to find God to be.

Psalm 86:6. Give ear, O LORD, unto my prayer ... See the notes at Psalm 5:1.

Psalm 86:7. In the day of my trouble I will call upon thee That is, I do it now; I have done it; I will do it. The language implies a habit, or a steady purpose of mind, that in all times of trouble he would make God his refuge. It was this fixed purpose — this regular habit — which was now the ground of his confidence. A man who always makes God his refuge, who has no other ground of reliance, may feel assured that God will interpose and save him.

For thou wilt answer me This also implies a fixed and steady assurance of mind, applicable not only to this case, but to all similar cases. He had firm confidence in God at all times; an unwavering belief that God is a hearer of prayer. This is a just foundation of hope when we approach God. Compare ~~3006~~ James 1:6,7.

Psalm 86:8. Among the gods there is none like unto thee, O Lord Among all those which are worshipped as gods there is no one that can hear and save. The psalmist, in respect to prayer, and to help to be obtained by prayer, compares his own condition with that of those who worshipped false gods. He had a God who could hear; they had none. A true child of God now in trouble may properly compare his condition in this respect with that of those who make no profession of religion; who do not profess to worship God, or to have a God. To him there is a throne of grace which is always accessible; to them there is none. There is One to whom he may always pray; they profess to have no one on whom they can call.

Neither are there any works like unto thy works That is, as done by those “gods.” There is nothing they have done which can be a ground of confidence that can be compared with what thou hast done. The allusion is to the power, the wisdom, and the skill evinced in the works of creation, and in the merciful interpositions of Providence. From these the psalmist derives a proof that God is able to save. There is no such argument to which the worshippers of false gods can appeal in the time of trouble.

Psalm 86:9. All nations whom thou hast made shall come ... In this verse the psalmist expresses his belief that the conviction which he entertained about the ability of God to save — about his being the only true God — would yet pervade all the nations of the earth; that they all would yet be convinced that he was the true God, and would come and worship him alone. So clear to him seemed to be the evidence of the existence and perfections of God that he did not doubt that all people would come yet to see it also, and to acknowledge him. Compare <sup><210></sup>Isaiah 2:2,3; 60:3-14; <sup><100></sup>Psalms 2:8; 72:17.

And shall glorify thy name Shall honor thee as the true God. They will renounce their idols; they will come and worship thee. This belief — this hope — is held out through the entire volume of revealed truth. It cheered and encouraged the hearts of the saints of the Old Testament and the New; and it may and should cheer and encourage our hearts. It is not less certain because it seems to be long delayed. To the view of man this is all that is certain in the future. No man can predict what will occur in regard to any of the existing political institutions on the earth — either the monarchies of the old world, or the republics of the new.

(This I wrote some six years ago. Now, on revising it for publication (Oct. 13, 1864), how soon — how strangely — how fearfully — has the course of things in our country illustrated it. Who, six years since, could have foretold what has actually occurred during that time in our then happy Republic? It seemed to be permanent and enduring; and we made our boast to the other nations of the earth that it would be so. Alas! how have we been rebuked for our boastings; how have we been taught that no human sagacity can predict what will occur to any nation or to any government!)

No man can tell in reference to the arts; to the sciences; to social life; to manners; to the cities and towns which now exist on the earth, what they will be in the far distant future. Only one thing is certain in that future — that the kingdom of God will be set up, and that the Redeemer's throne will be established over all the earth; that the time is to come when "all nations shall come and worship before God, and shall glorify his name."

<sup><100></sup>Psalm 86:10. For thou art great, and doest wondrous things Things suited to excite wonder or admiration; things which lie beyond the power of any creature, and which could be performed by no one but a being of almighty power. A God who could do these things could also do that which the psalmist asked of him, for what God actually does proves that there is nothing within the limits of possibility which he cannot perform. The greatness and the power of God are reasons why we should appeal to him in our weakness, and in our times of trouble.

Thou art God alone Thou only canst do what a God can do, or what belongs to God. In those things, therefore, which require the interposition of divine power our appeal must be to thee alone. So in the matter of salvation.

<081> Psalm 86:11. Teach me thy way, O LORD That is, in the present emergency. Show me what thou wouldst have me to do that I may obtain thy favor, and thy gracious help.

I will walk in thy truth I will live and act in accordance with what thou dost declare to be true. Whatever that may be, I will pursue it, having no will of my own.

Unite my heart to fear thy name That is, to worship, obey, and honor thee.

(a) The end which he desired to secure was that he might truly fear God, or properly reverence and honor him;

(b) the means which he saw to be necessary for this was that his “heart” might be “united” in this one great object; that is, that his heart might be single in its views and purposes; that there might be no distracting purposes; that one great aim might be always before him.

The word rendered “unite” — dj yæ<sup><42162></sup> — occurs as a verb only in three places. In <0406> Genesis 49:6, it is rendered united: “Unto their assembly, mine honor, be not thou united.” In <2340> Isaiah 14:20, it is translated joined: “Thou shalt not be joined with them.” The adverb — dj yæ<sup><42162></sup>, occurs often, and is rendered together, <0136> Genesis 13:6; 22:6,8,19; 36:7; et saepe. The idea is that of union, or conjunction; of being together; of constituting one; and this is accomplished in the heart when there is one great ruling object before the mind which nothing is allowed to interfere with. It may be added, that there is no more appropriate prayer which a man can offer than that his heart may have such a unity of purpose, and that nothing may be allowed to interfere with that one supreme purpose.

<0812> Psalm 86:12. I will praise thee, O Lord my God, with all my heart This is but carrying out the idea in the previous verse. He would give his whole heart to God. He would allow nothing to divide or distract his affections. He would withhold nothing from God.

And I will glorify thy name for evermore Not merely in the present emergency; but I will do it ever onward — even to eternity. The meaning is, that he would in all cases, and at all times — in this world and in the world to come — honor God. He would acknowledge no God but him, and he would honor him as God.

<883> Psalm 86:13. For great is thy mercy toward me In respect to me; or, Thou hast manifested great mercy to me; to wit, in past times. He makes use of this now as an argument or reason why God should interpose again.

(a) He had shown on former occasions that he had power to save;

(b) the fact that he had thus treated him as his friend was a reason why he should now befriend him.

And thou hast delivered my soul My life. The meaning is, that he had kept him alive in times of imminent danger. At the same time David could say, as every child of God can say, that God had delivered his soul in the strict and proper sense of the term — from sin, and death, and hell itself.

From the lowest hell Margin, grave; Hebrew, לְבַבְי<sup><47585></sup>; Greek, ἀδης<sup><86></sup>. See the word explained in the notes at <2349> Isaiah 14:9. Compare the notes at <8021> Job 10:21,22. The word rendered “lowest” means simply under, or beneath: the grave or hades beneath. The idea of lowest, or the superlative degree, is not necessarily implied in the word. The idea of the grave as deep, or as under us, however, is implied, and the psalmist means to say that he had been saved from that deep dwelling-place — from the abode of departed spirits, to which the dead descend under ground. The meaning is, that he had been kept alive; but the greatness of the mercy is designed to be set forth by having before the mind a vivid idea of the darkness, the horror, and the gloom of the world to which the dead descend, and where they dwell.

<884> Psalm 86:14. O God, the proud are risen against me People who are self-confident, ambitious, haughty; who do not regard the welfare or the rights of others; who are disposed to trample down all others in order that they may accomplish their own purposes; these are the people who have opposed me and sought my life. This would apply either to the time of Saul or of Absalom. In both these cases there were men who would correspond to this description.

And the assemblies of violent men Margin, “terrible.” The Septuagint and the Vulgate render this, “the synagogue of the wicked.” The word rendered violent means properly terrible, inspiring terror; then, violent, fierce, lawless, tyrants. The idea here is that they pursued their object by violence and not by right; they did it in a fierce and savage manner, or in such a way as to inspire terror. The word assembly here means merely that they were banded together; what was done was the result of a conspiracy or combination.

Have sought after my soul After my life.

And have not set thee before them They do not fear thee; they do not act as if in thy presence; they have no regard for thee, for thy law, for thy favor, for thy threatenings.

<sup><1885></sup>Psalm 86:15. But thou, O Lord, art a God full of compassion ... See the notes at <sup><1885></sup>Psalm 86:5. The words rendered “long-suffering” mean that there was and would be delay in his anger; that it was not soon excited; that he did not act from passion or sudden resentment; that he endured the conduct of sinners long without rising up to punish them; that he was not quick to take vengeance, but bore with them patiently. On this account the psalmist, though conscious that he was a sinner, hoped and pleaded that God would save him.

Plenteous in ... truth That is, in faithfulness. When thou hast made a promise, thou wilt faithfully keep it.

<sup><1886></sup>Psalm 86:16. O turn unto me, and have mercy upon me Look upon me; as if God were now turned away, and were unmindful of his danger, his needs, and his pleading. The expression is equivalent to those in which he prays that God would incline his ear to him. See <sup><1880></sup>Psalm 86:1,6, and the notes at <sup><1880></sup>Psalm 5:1.

Give thy strength unto thy servant Give such strength as proceeds from thee, and such as will accomplish what thou alone canst effect. Enable me to act as if clothed with divine power. The ground of the plea here is, that he was the “servant” of God, and he might, therefore, hope for God’s interposition.

And save the son of thine handmaid This is, as far as I know, the only separate allusion which David ever makes to his mother individually, unless the passage in <sup><1854></sup>Psalm 35:14 — “I bowed down heavily as one that mourneth for his mother” — be supposed to refer to his own mother. But we have elsewhere no such mention of his mother as can give us any idea of her character, and indeed it is not easy to determine who she was. The language here, however, would seem to imply that she was a pious woman, for the words “thy handmaid,” as employed in the Scriptures, would most naturally suggest that idea. If so, then the ground of the plea here is that his mother was a child of God; that she had lived for his service; and that she had trained up her children for him. David now prays that, as he had been devoted to God by her, and had thus been trained up, God would remember all this, and would interfere in his behalf. Can it be wrong to urge before God, as a reason for his interposition, that we have been devoted to him by parental faithfulness and prayer; that we have been consecrated to him by baptism; that we have been trained up for his service; that in reference to us high hopes were cherished that we might carry out the purposes of pious parents, and live to accomplish what was so dear to their hearts? He who has had a pious mother has entered on life under great advantages; he has been placed under solemn responsibilities; he is permitted to hope that a mother’s prayers will not be forgotten, but that her example, her teachings, and her piety will shed a hallowed influence on all the paths of life until he joins her in heaven.

~~1867~~ Psalm 86:17. Shew me a token for good ... Hebrew, “Make me a sign for good;” that is, Do that for me in my trouble which will be an evidence that thou dost favor me, and wilt save me. Let there be such a manifest interposition in my behalf that others may see it, and may be convinced that thou art God, and that thou art the Protector and Friend of those who put their trust in thee. We need not suppose that the psalmist refers here to a miracle in his behalf. Any interposition which would save him from the hands of his enemies — which would defeat their purposes — which would rescue him when there seemed to be no help, would be such an evidence that they could not doubt that he was the friend of God. Thus they would be made “ashamed” of their purposes; that is, they would be disappointed and confounded; and there would be furnished a new proof that God was the protector of all who put their trust in him.

APPENDIX NOTES ON PSALM 86

There can be little doubt of the Davidic origin of the psalm. Calvin, Luther, Hengstenberg, Alexander, etc., ascribe it to David; and there is no reason for rejecting the title.

“The whole psalm,” says Alexander, “is called a prayer, because entirely made up either of direct petitions, or of arguments intended to enforce them. The tone and substance of the composition are well suited to David’s situation in his days of suffering at the hands of Saul or Absalom, more probably the latter, on account of the repeated allusions to deliverance from former trials of the same kind. Some account for the position of this psalm in the midst of a series inscribed to the sons of Korah, by supposing that the latter composed it in the person or the spirit of David. The same hypothesis is used by these interpreters to explain the many forms of expression borrowed from other psalms of David, as if the sons of Korah meant to comfort him by the repetition of his own consolatory words in other cases. Compare ~~FORA~~ 2 Corinthians 1:4. The psalm admits of no minute or artificial division.”

~~BRU~~ Psalm 86:7. In the day of my trouble I will call upon thee This was the wisest thing he could do; and it is the best thing we can do. For,

(1), Prayer is enjoined upon us in trouble ... “Is any afflicted? Let him pray.”

(2), Prayer is the design of trouble. He does not afflict willingly ... It is to bring us to himself. It is to quicken us to pray more frequently, more earnestly — “I will go and return to my place, until they acknowledge their offence and seek my face. In their affliction they will seek me early.”

(3), Prayer is the evidence that trouble is sanctified. It is a great thing not to lose a trial. A trial is never neutral in its effect. It always injures or improves. It is worse than nothing when it sends us to the creature, either in way of accusation or relief. But when we turn to him that smiteth us, and acknowledge that his judgments are right, and cast ourselves at his feet, resolved, if we perish, there to die — we need not say with Job, “I am afraid of all my sorrows;” but confess with David, “It is good for me that I have been afflicted.”

(4), Prayer is the solace of trouble. There is some relief in tears, and therefore nature is provided with them. It eases and soothes the bursting heart to pour our grief into the ear of a friend ... But how good it is to draw near to God! ... to pour out our tears unto him, and resemble the child that sobs himself asleep in his mother’s arms!

(5), Prayer is the medium of our deliverance from trouble. For this release we are allowed to be concerned; but we must seek it from God. And in doing this we have not only his power to encourage us ... but his goodness anti love ... Yea, more: we have his faithfulness and truth that we shall not seek him in vain. He has engaged himself to appear to our joy, in his own time and way. He has bound himself and put the bond into our hand; and we can produce and plead it: “Call upon me in the day of trouble and I will deliver thee, and thou shalt glorify me.”

“Because he hath set his love upon me, therefore will I deliver him; I will set him on high, because he hath known my name. He shall call upon me, and I will answer him; I will be with him in trouble; I will deliver him and honor him.” — Jay.

<1861> Psalm 86:9-10. All nations ... Nothing can well exceed the plainness, directness, and precision with which the conversion of the nations is announced.

“All nations whom thou hast made shall come and worship before thee, O Lord; and shall glorify thy name. For thou art great, and doest wondrous things: thou art God alone,” <1861> Psalm 86:9,10.

“All the ends of the world shall remember, and turn unto the LORD; and all the kindreds of the nations shall worship before thee,” <1927> Psalm 22:27.

There is no mistaking the meaning of these announcements. They are as unambiguous as anything that can be spoken by the most sanguine advocate of Christian missions in this nineteenth century. Yet they come from the age and the pen of David. By him the Holy Spirit has, for eight and twenty centuries, been bearing witness that God’s visible church is destined to embrace all the nations whom God has created on the face of the whole earth. A day is coming when they shall all resort to the Lord’s throne, and bow themselves down before him. They have long forgotten him; but they shall one day call to remembrance his claims upon them and will turn to him again, even in the uttermost parts of the earth. — Binnie.

<1861> Psalm 86:11. Teach me thy way, O Lord There is here a beautiful connection. We have a prayer for divine teaching. That prayer springs from a resolute will to walk in the divine truth; otherwise it would be hypocritical and vain. But this walk again can only be secured by unity and simplicity of heart and aim. “Unite my heart to fear thy name.” The meaning has been well expressed by Perowne. He says:

“Unite my heart” — suffer it no longer to scatter itself upon a multiplicity of objects, to be drawn here and there by a thousand different aims, but turn all its powers, all its affections, in one direction, collect them in one focus, make them all one in thee. The prayer derives a special force from the resolve immediately preceding: ‘I will walk in thy truth.’ The same integrity of heart which made the resolve could alone utter the prayer. The nearest Old Testament parallels are, the ‘one heart,’ <sup><2402></sup>Jeremiah 32:29; ‘And I will give them one heart and one way, that they may fear me for ever;’ and the ‘whole heart’ of love to God, <sup><1105></sup>Deuteronomy 6:5; 10:12. Our Lord teaches us how needful the prayer of this verse is. Compare what he says of ‘the single eye;’ the impossibility of serving two masters, the folly and wearisomeness of those anxious cares by which people suffer themselves to be hampered and distracted, and in contrast with all this, the exhortation, ‘Seek ye first the kingdom of God,’ etc., <sup><4069></sup>Matthew 6:19-34. See also the history of Martha and Mary, <sup><2108></sup>Luke 10:38-42.”

NOTES ON PSALM 87

This psalm, like some others, is entitled “a psalm or song;” that is, it so far combined the properties of both a “psalm” and a “song” that it might be called by either name. See the notes at the title to Psalm 65. The phrase “for the sons of Korah” may mean, as in the margin, “of the sons of Korah.” See the notes at the title to Psalm 42.

The occasion on which the psalm was composed is unknown. The design of the psalm is obvious. It is to exalt Zion as a place to dwell in, and to state the privileges or advantages of having been born there; the honor of such a birth, and the benefit which would be connected with it, from having been brought early under the influence of the true religion, and from having been trained up amidst its institutions. The practical truth which is suggested by the psalm is the honor and benefit of having been born in a land where the true religion prevails; of having been born in connection with the church; of having been early devoted to God; and of having had the benefits of a religious training. The foundation of what is said in the psalm is the honor which we naturally associate with the idea of birth; birth as connected with a family of distinguished worth, wealth, or rank; birth as connected with a particular country, city, or town.

Psalm 87:1. His foundation This is an abrupt commencement of the psalm. The adjective “his” has been supposed by some to refer to the psalm itself, and this expression has been considered to be a part of the title to the psalm, meaning that the foundation of the psalm is the holy mountain where the praises of God were celebrated; that is Zion. This, however, is a forced and unnatural interpretation. The most obvious explanation is to refer it to God, and the meaning is, that his “foundation,” or that which he had founded and established, to wit, the place for his worship, or for the institutions of religion, was in the holy mountains of Jerusalem. It would seem that the psalmist was contemplating the city — looking on its walls, and its palaces, and especially on the place which had been reared for the worship of God, and that he breaks out in this abrupt manner, by saying that this was what God had founded; that here he had established his home; that here was the place where he was worshipped, and where he dwelt; that this was the place which he loved more than all the other places where the descendants of Jacob dwelt.

Is in the holy mountains The mountains of Jerusalem. Jerusalem is surrounded by hills, and within the city itself there were the hills of Zion, Moriah, Acra, and Bezethah; See the notes at <sup><410E></sup>Matthew 2:1. These sacred hills God had selected as the place of his solemn worship — of his own abode. Compare the notes at <sup><490E></sup>Psalms 48:1,2.

<sup><480E></sup>Psalm 87:2. The LORD loveth the gates of Zion Compare <sup><478E></sup>Psalms 78:68. The gates of a city were the places of concourse; where business was transacted; where courts were held. The particular allusion here seems to be to the thronging multitudes pressing into the city for public worship — the numbers that gathered together at the great feasts and festivals of the nation; and the meaning is, that he looked with more pleasure on such multitudes as they thronged the gates, pressing in that they might worship him, than on any other scene in the land.

More than all the dwellings of Jacob Than any of the places where the descendants of Jacob, or where his people dwell. Much as he might be pleased with their quiet abodes, with their peace, prosperity, and order, and with the fact that his worship was daily celebrated in those happy families, yet he had superior pleasure in the multitudes that crowded the ways to the place where they would publicly acknowledge him as their God.

<sup><480E></sup>Psalm 87:3. Glorious things are spoketh of thee, O city of God Jerusalem, called the “city of God” as being the place of his unique home on earth. The word rendered “are spoken” may mean either “have been spoken,” or “are to be spoken;” that is, either, such things have been said, or they may be said. They have been placed on record; or, they may now be put on record concerning thee. Probably the former is the true meaning; and the language would embrace such points as these:

- (1) Those things which had been spoken as to its beauty of situation; its magnificence and splendor. Compare the notes at <sup><490E></sup>Psalms 48:2,3,12,13.
- (2) Such things as had been spoken or recorded in regard to its future prosperity, its triumphs, and its influence in the world; the promises which had been made in reference to the prosperity of Zion, and the spread of the true religion from that point as a center.

Compare the notes at <sup><300E></sup>Isaiah 2:3. The Old Testament abounds with promises concerning the future glory of Zion — the “glorious things” that are spoken respecting the final triumph of religion in the world. Of this the statement here is to be mainly understood, where Zion is referred to as the seat of the true religion, and as therefore the representative of the true church on earth. It is that of which the real record has been made, and not merely of Jerusalem or Zion as a city. That might pass away; the church, of which that was the representative, will endure forever. Compare <sup><250></sup>Isaiah 54:1-3; 60; <sup><620></sup>Revelation 21:2-4.

<sup><80></sup>Psalm 87:4. I will make mention of Rahab and Babylon ... The word Rahab here refers to Egypt. See <sup><250></sup>Isaiah 51:9. It is also applied to Egypt in <sup><800></sup>Psalm 89:10. The reason why the name was given to Egypt is not certainly known. The Hebrew word properly means fierceness, insolence, pride; and it may have been given to Egypt by the Hebrews on account of its haughtiness, pride, and insolence. It has been supposed by some (Jablonski, Opusc. i. 228) that the name is of Egyptian origin, but this has not been clearly made out. (Gesenius, Lexicon) Egypt, Babylon, Philistia, Tyre, and Ethiopia, are mentioned here as among the best known nations and cities of the world; as places where it would commonly be regarded as an honor to have been born. The meaning is, "I will refer to these as places well-known and distinguished; I will refer to the honor of having been born there; but great as is such an honor, the honor of having been born in Zion is far above that; it conveys the idea of a much higher distinction; it should be more sacredly cherished as among those things on which men value themselves." The word "I" here seems to have reference to the psalmist, and not to God. The psalmist is mentioning what to him would seem to have a claim to the highest honor.

This man was born there That is, It would be said of individuals that they were born in one of those places, and it would be regarded as an honor thus to have been born. People would pride themselves on the fact that they were born there, and the world would hold them in esteem on that account. This refers to a very natural, and a very common feeling among people. We can, of course, claim no credit, and deserve no real honor, on account of the place where we happen to have been born; but the fact that one has been born in a place distinguished for its advantages and its fame, — in a place where liberty, religion, and the arts have flourished — in a place renowned for its public spirit, and for producing illustrious people, — may be properly accounted as an occasion for gratitude, and as a stimulus to high and honorable efforts, and may thus be made an important auxiliary to virtue, patriotism, and piety.

~~<87>~~ Psalm 87:5. And of Zion it shall be said In respect to Zion; or, in honor of Zion. People shall regard it as a privilege to have been born in Zion. They shall speak of such a birth as a marked and honored distinction. “This and that man,” etc. Designating them, or pointing them out, as having been born there. Those in a crowd, those passing along, those brought in any way to notice, will be spoken of in reference to their birth in Zion, and will be treated with a degree of favor and esteem, arising from their birth there corresponding to what those receive who are born in Egypt, Babylon, or Tyre. They will not be shunned and avoided on account of their birth as if it were ignoble, but they will be honored for it.

And the Highest himself shall establish her Will establish Zion, or will give it prosperity and perpetuity. This, too, is what would be “said” respecting Zion by such as should speak of those born there; and it indicates

(a) their conviction that it would be permanent; and

(b) their desire that it might be: that a place so honored and distinguished might be perpetuated.

The practical truths suggested by this verse, as applied to the church, are

(1) That it is a privilege to have been born in connection with the Christian church; to have had a Christian parentage, and to have been early dedicated to God;

(2) that the time will come when this will be a ground of commendation, or when it will be spoken of as an honor, or when it will be regarded as presumptive evidence of a claim to esteem in the eyes of the world, that one was born in the church, was early devoted to God, and was trained up under the influences of religion;

(3) that the character of those who are thus born, and who are thus trained up, will constitute, in the view of the world, evidence of the stability of the church, and proof that God regards it with favor. It has not always been deemed an honor, or a passport to favor, to have been born in the church, but the time will come when this will be universally so; and, even now, no child can fully appreciate the honor and the real advantage of having been born in a family where God is served, and of having been early consecrated to God by parental purpose, by prayer, and by Christian baptism.

Psalm 87:6. The LORD shall count That is, God himself will honor those who are so born. In the previous verse, the effect of such a birth was described as securing honor from human beings. Here a higher honor is adverted to — that which will be derived from God himself.

When he writeth up the people ... The word rendered “people” here is in the plural number. At the time of making an enrollment of the people, or taking an account or a census of the nations, he would mark, or cause to be marked, with special honor the man that had his birth in Zion. Out of such would his own people be taken, and those thus born would have an honor which no one else would receive from him. He would not mark with any special approbation those who had been born in Egypt, in Babylon, or in Tyre, but he would mark with special interest those who had been born in Zion. The practical truth suggested here is, that God will in the main take his people from among those who have been born in the church. As a matter of fact, while it is true that others are converted and added to the church, the great mass of church-members consist of those who have been born of Christian parents; who have been early dedicated to God; and who have been trained up for his service. See the notes at Isaiah 44:3-5.

Psalm 87:7. As well the singers as the players on instruments shall be there literally, “The singers as the players on instruments.” The image is that of a musical procession, where the singers go before, followed by those who play on various instruments of music. The idea seems to be that when the number of the true friends of God shall be made up, or shall all be enrolled, there will be a triumphal procession; or, they are seen by the psalmist, moving before God as in a triumphal procession. Compare the notes at Isaiah 35:10. Perhaps the reference is to heaven — the true Zion; to the assembling of all who shall have been born in Zion, and who shall have become citizens of the true Zion, the Jerusalem above.

All my springs are in thee The word rendered springs means properly a place of fountains (see the notes at Psalm 84:6), and also a fountain, ~~1071~~Genesis 7:11; 8:2. It thus becomes an emblem of happiness; of delight; of pleasure; and the ideal here is that the highest happiness of the psalmist was found in what is here referred to by the word “thee.” That word may refer either to God or to Zion; but as the subject of the psalm is Zion, it is most natural to suppose that the reference is to that. Thus it accords with the sentiment so often found in the Psalms, where the writer expresses his love for Zion; his pleasure in its solemnities; his desire to abide there as his permanent home. Compare ~~1276~~Psalm 23:6; 84:2-4,10. The idea has been beautifully expressed by Dr. Dwight, in his version of ~~1376~~Psalm 137:6:

*“I love thy church, O God;
Her walls before thee stand,
Dear as the apple of thine eye,
And graven on thy hand.*

*“If e'er my heart forget
Her welfare or her woe,
Let every joy this heart forsake,
And every grief o'erflow.*

*“Beyond my highest joy
I prize her heavenly ways
Her sweet communion, solemn vows,
Her hymns of love and praise.”*

APPENDIX NOTES ON PSALM 87

It is difficult, if not impossible, to determine the date and occasion of the psalm. Alexander and Hengstenberg suppose the historical occasion to be the great deliverance from the power of Assyria in the days of Hezekiah. Calvin makes it a post-captivity psalm. Dr. Binnie refers it to the eve of the captivity.

“An attention to the time when this psalm was composed,” says Calvin, “will contribute in no small degree to a clear understanding of its contents. Although the people had returned from their captivity in Babylon; although the church of God had been again gathered together and united into one body after a long dispersion; although the temple had been rebuilt, the altar set up, and the service of God restored; yet, as of a vast multitude of people there was only a small portion remaining, which made the condition of the church very low and despised, as the number left was daily diminished by their enemies, and as the temple was far inferior in magnificence to what it originally was: all this being considered, the faithful had hardly any ground to entertain favorable hopes as to the future. It certainly seemed impossible that they would ever again be raised to their former state from which they had fallen. There was, therefore, reason to apprehend that the minds of the godly, both from the remembrance of the overthrow which they had already experienced, and from the weight of the present miseries with which they were oppressed, would faint, and finally sink into despair. That they might not succumb under such heavy adversities, the Lord not only promises in this psalm that they would recover what they had lost, but also encourages them in the hope of an incomparable glory with which the church should yet be invested, according to that prophecy of Haggai, <sup><3119></sup>Haggai 2:9, ‘The glory of this latter house shall be greater than of the former.’”

<sup><3806></sup>Psalm 87:4. I will make mention of Rahab ... The name of Rahab is put for Egypt in many other parts of Scripture; and this signification is very suitable to the present passage, the object of which is to portray the magnificent amplitude of the church, which as yet was only matter of hope. It is therefore said that those who formerly were deadly enemies, or entire strangers, shall not only become familiar friends, but shall also be ingrafted into one body, that they may be accounted citizens of Jerusalem. In the first clause it is said, “I will make mention of Egypt and Babylon among my household.” In the second, it is added that the Philistines, Tyrians, and Ethiopians, who hitherto had been so much at variance with the people of God, shall now be brought into as cordial harmony with them as if they were Jews by birth. What a glorious distinction of the church, that even those who held her in contempt shall come flocking to her from every quarter, and that those who desired to see her completely cut up and destroyed shall consider it the highest honor to have a place among the number of her citizens, and to be accounted such! All of them shall voluntarily renounce their own countries in which they had before proudly boasted. Wherever they may have been born, whether in Palestine, or Ethiopia, or Tyre, they shall profess themselves citizens of the holy city. — Calvin.

<sup><3806></sup>Psalm 87:5. And of Zion it shall be said, This and that man ... The phrase “This man and that man” is literally “man and man,” or every man, or one man after another, in a series indefinitely extended. The idea is that of immense numbers. Calvin gives the sense thus: It is asserted in the fourth verse, that the new citizens shall be gathered into the church of God from different parts of the world; and here the same subject is prosecuted. Another figure is, however, employed, which is, that strangers by birth shall be accounted among the holy people, just as if they were descended from Abraham. It had been stated in the preceding verse that the Chaldeans and Egyptians would be added to the household of the church; and that the Ethiopians, Philistines, and Tyrians would be enrolled among her children. Now, it is added, by way of confirmation, that the number of the new progeny shall be exceeding great, so that the city which had been for a time uninhabited, and afterward only half filled with a few people, shall be crowded with a vast population. The prophet Isaiah describes more at length what is here promised in a few words, <sup>2301</sup>Isaiah 54:1:

“Sing, O barren, thou that didst not bear! break forth into singing, and cry aloud, thou that didst not travail with child, for more are the children of the desolate than the children of the married wife, saith the Lord. Enlarge the place of thy tent, and let them stretch forth the curtains of thine habitations: spare not, lengthen thy cords and strengthen thy stakes, for thou shalt break forth on the right hand and on the left; and thy seed shall inherit the Gentiles, and make the desolate cities to be inhabited.”

Also, <sup>2304</sup>Isaiah 60:4,

“Lift up thine eyes round about and see; all they gather themselves together, they come to thee: thy sons shall come from far, and thy daughters shall be nursed at thy side.”

And in <sup>2345</sup>Isaiah 44:5, we meet with almost the same language as in the passage before us, or, at least; what comes very near to it:

“One shall say, I am the Lord’s; and another shall call himself by the name of Jacob; and another shall subscribe with his hand unto the Lord, and surname himself by the name of Israel.”

NOTES ON PSALM 88

This psalm is altogether of a mournful and desponding character. The author is a sufferer; he is expecting to die; he fears to die; he longs to live; his mind is overwhelmed with gloom which does not seem to be irradiated by one ray of hope or consolation. It is, in this respect, unlike most of the psalms which relate to sickness, to sorrow, to suffering, for in those psalms generally there springs up, in answer to prayer, a gleam of hope — some cheerful view — some sustaining prospect; so that, though a psalm begins in despondency and gloom, it ends with joy and triumph. Compare, among others, <sup><1016></sup>Psalm 6:9,10; 7:17; 13:6; 42:8,11; 56:11-13; 59:16; 69:34,36. But in this psalm there is no relief; there is no comfort. As the Book of Psalms was designed to be useful in all ages, and to all classes of people, and as such a state of mind as that described in this psalm might occur again and often — it was proper that such a condition of utter despondency, even in a good man, should be described, in order that others might see that such feelings are not necessarily inconsistent with true religion, and do not prove that even such a sufferer is not a child of God. It is probable that this psalm was designed to illustrate what may occur when disease is such as to produce deep mental darkness and sorrow. And the Book of Psalms would have been incomplete for the use of the church, if there had not been at least one such psalm in the collection.

The psalm is said, in the title, to be “A Psalm or Song for (margin, of) the sons of Korah” — combining, in some way unknown to us, as several of the other psalms do, the properties of both a psalm and a song. The phrase, “for the sons of Korah,” means here, probably, that it was composed for their use, and not by them, unless “Heman the Ezrahite” was one of their number. On the phrase, “To the chief Musician,” see the notes at the title to Psalm 4. The words, “upon Mahalath Leannoth,” are of very uncertain signification. They are rendered by the Septuagint and the Vulgate “for Maeleth, to answer;” by Luther, “to sing, of the weakness of the miserable;” by Prof. Alexander, “concerning afflictive sickness.” The word “Mahalath” seems here to be a form of hl j mæ <sup><4245></sup>, which means properly, “sickness, disease.” It is rendered, with a slight variation in the pointing, “disease” in <sup><1215></sup>2 Chronicles 21:15; <sup><1256></sup>Exodus 15:26; “infirmity,” in <sup><1084></sup>Proverbs 18:14; and “sickness” in <sup><1225></sup>Exodus 23:25; <sup><1087></sup>1 Kings 8:37; <sup><1028></sup>2 Chronicles 6:28. It does not occur elsewhere, and would be properly rendered here, therefore, “disease, sickness, or infirmity.” The Hebrew which is rendered “Leannoth,” hn<sup><h6031></sup>, is made up of a preposition (L) and a verb. The verb — hn<sup><h6030></sup> — means:

- (1) to chant or sing;
- (2) to lift up the voice in any way — to begin to speak;
- (3) to answer;
- (4) to mean to say, to imply.

The verb also has another class of significations;

- (a) to bestow labor upon,
- (b) to suffer, to be afflicted, and might here refer to such affliction or trouble.

According to the former signification, which is probably the true one here, the allusion would be to something which was said or sung in respect to the sickness referred to; as, for example, a mournful melody composed for the occasion; and the purpose would be to express the feelings experienced in sickness. According to the other signification it would refer to affliction, and would be little more than a repetition of the idea implied in the word Mahalath. It seems to me, therefore, that there is a reference in the word “Leannoth” to something which was said or sung on that occasion; or to something which might be properly said or sung in reference to sickness. It is difficult to translate the phrase, but it might be somewhat literally rendered, “concerning sickness — to be said or sung;” that is, in reference to it. The word Maschil (see the notes at the title to Psalm 32) conveys the idea that it is a didactic or instructive psalm — suggesting appropriate thoughts for such a season. The psalm is ascribed to “Heman the Ezrahite.” The name Heman occurs in 1 Kings. 4:31; <sup><1316></sup>1 Chronicles 2:6; 6:33; 15:17,19; 16:42; 25:1,4-6; <sup><4462></sup>2 Chronicles 5:12; 29:14; 35:15 — usually in connection with Ethan, as among those whom David placed over the music in the services of the sanctuary.

Nothing is known of the occasion on which the psalm was composed, except, as is probably indicated in the title, that it was in a time of sickness; and from the psalm itself we find that it was when the mind was enveloped in impenetrable darkness, with no comfort.

The psalm consists of two parts:

I. A description of the sick man's suffering, <sup><1880></sup>Psalm 88:1-9. His soul was full of troubles, and he drew near to the grave, <sup><1880></sup>Psalm 88:3; he was, as it were, already dead, and like those laid in the deep grave, whom God had forgotten, <sup><1880></sup>Psalm 88:4-6; the wrath of God lay heavily on him, and all his waves went over him, <sup><1880></sup>Psalm 88:7; God had put away all his friends from him, and had left him to suffer alone, <sup><1880></sup>Psalm 88:8; his eye mourned by reason of his affliction, and he cried daily to God, <sup><1880></sup>Psalm 88:9.

II. His prayer for mercy and deliverance, <sup><1880></sup>Psalm 88:10-18. The reasons for the earnestness of the prayer, or the grounds of petition are,

(a) that the dead could not praise God, or see the wonders of his hand, <sup><1880></sup>Psalm 88:10-12;

(b) that the faithfulness and loving-kindness of God could not be shown in the grave, <sup><1880></sup>Psalm 88:11;

(c) that his troubles were deep and overwhelming, for God had cast off his soul, and had hid his face from him; he had been long afflicted; he was distracted with the terrors of God; the fierce wrath of God went over him; lover and friend and acquaintance had been put far from him, <sup><1880></sup>Psalm 88:13-18.

<sup><1880></sup>Psalm 88:1. O LORD God of my salvation On whom I depend for salvation; who alone canst save me. Luther renders this, "O God, my Saviour."

I have cried day and night before thee literally, "By day I cried; by night before thee;" that is, my prayer is constantly before thee. The meaning is, that there was no intermission to his prayers; he prayed all the while. This does not refer to the general habit of his life, but to the time of his sickness. He had prayed most earnestly and constantly that he might be delivered from sickness and from the dangers of death. He had, as yet, obtained no answer, and he now pours out, and records, a more earnest petition to God.

<sup><1880></sup>Psalm 88:2. Let my prayer come before thee As if there were something which hindered it, or which had obstructed the way to the throne of grace; as if God repelled it from him, and turned away his ear, and would not hear.

<sup><983></sup>Psalm 88:3. For my soul is full of troubles I am full of trouble. The word rendered as “full” means properly to satiate as with food; that is, when as much had been taken as could be. So he says here, that this trouble was as great as he could bear; he could sustain no more. He had reached the utmost point of endurance; he had no power to bear anymore.

And my life draweth nigh unto the grave Hebrew, to Sheol. Compare the notes at <sup><3149></sup>Isaiah 14:9; <sup><802></sup>Job 10:21,22. It may mean here either the grave, or the abode of the dead. He was about to die. Unless he found relief he must go down to the abodes of the dead. The Hebrew word rendered life is in the plural number, as in <sup><007></sup>Genesis 2:7; 3:14,17; 6:17; 7:15; et al. Why the plural was used as applicable to life cannot now be known with certainty. It may have been to accord with the fact that man has two kinds of life; the animal life — or life in common with the inferior creation; and intellectual, or higher life — the life of the soul. Compare the notes at <sup><5123></sup>1 Thessalonians 5:23. The meaning here is, that he was about to die; or that his life or lives approached that state when the grave closes over us; the extinction of the mere animal life; and the separation of the soul — the immortal part — from the body.

<sup><984></sup>Psalm 88:4. I am counted with them that go down into the pit I am so near to death that I may be reckoned already as among the dead. It is so manifest to others that I must die — that my disease is mortal — that they already speak of me as dead. The word “pit” here means the grave — the same as Sheol in the previous verse. It means properly

- (1) a pit,
- (2) a cistern, <sup><0572></sup>Genesis 37:20,
- (3) a prison or dungeon, <sup><2322></sup>Isaiah 24:22,
- (4) the grave, <sup><9201></sup>Psalm 28:1; 30:4; <sup><2388></sup>Isaiah 38:18.

I am as a man that hath no strength Who has no power to resist disease, no vigor of constitution remaining; who must die.

<sup><985></sup>Psalm 88:5. Free among the dead Luther renders this, “I lie forgotten among the dead.” DeWette renders it, “Pertaining to the dead — (den Todten angehorend) — stricken down, like the slain, I lie in the grave,” and explains it as meaning, “I am as good as dead.” The word rendered “free” — yvpj ; <sup><12670></sup> — means properly, according to Gesenius (Lexicon),

- (1) prostrate, weak, feeble;
- (2) free, as opposed to a slave or a captive;
- (3) free from public taxes or burdens.

The word is translated “free” in <sup><1210></sup>Exodus 21:2,5,26,27; <sup><1512></sup>Deuteronomy 15:12,13,18; <sup><1725></sup>1 Samuel 17:25; <sup><1819></sup>Job 3:19; 39:5; <sup><2816></sup>Isaiah 58:6; <sup><2419></sup>Jeremiah 34:9,10,11,14; and at liberty in <sup><2416></sup>Jeremiah 34:16. It occurs nowhere else except in this verse. In all these places (except in <sup><1725></sup>1 Samuel 17:25, where it refers to a house or family made free, and <sup><1816></sup>Job 39:5, where it refers to the freedom of the wild ass), it denotes the freedom of one who had been a servant or slave. In <sup><1819></sup>Job 3:19, it has reference to the grave, and to the fact that the grave delivers a slave or servant from obligation to his master: “And the servant is free from his master.” This is the idea, I apprehend, here. It is not, as DeWette supposes, that he was weak and feeble, as the spirits of the departed are represented to be (compare the notes at <sup><2149></sup>Isaiah 14:9-11), but that the dead are made free from the burdens, the toils, the calamities, the servitudes of life; that they are like those who are emancipated from bondage (compare <sup><1800></sup>Job 7:1,2; 14:6); that death comes to discharge them, or to set them at liberty. So the psalmist applies the expression here to himself, as if he had already reached that point; as if it were so certain that he must die that he could speak of it as if it had occurred; as if he were actually in the condition of the dead. The idea is that he was to all appearance near the grave, and that there was no hope of his recovery. It is not here, however, the idea of release or emancipation which was mainly before his mind, or any idea of consolation as from that, but it is the idea of death — of hopeless disease that must end in death. This he expresses in the usual language; but it is evident that he did not admit any comfort into his mind from the idea of freedom in the grave.

Like the slain that lie in the grave When slain in battle. They are free from the perils and the toils of life; they are emancipated from its cares and dangers. Death is freedom; and it is possible to derive solace from that idea of death, as Job did (<sup><1819></sup>Job 3:19); but the psalmist here, as remarked above, did not so admit that idea into his mind as to be comforted by it.

whom thou rememberest no more As if they were forgotten by thee; as if they were no longer the object of thy care. They are suffered to lie and waste away, with no care on thy part to restore them to life, or to preserve them from offensiveness and decay. So the great, the beautiful, and the good lie neglected in the grave.

And they are cut off from thy hand Margin, “by.” The Hebrew is literally “from thy hand,” but still the idea is that it was by the agency of God. They had been cut down, and were forgotten — as if God regarded them no more. So we shall all moulder in the grave — in that deep, dark, cold, silent, repulsive abode, as if even God had forgotten us.

Psalm 88:6. Thou hast laid me in the lowest pit That is, I am as if I were thus laid; the deep grave seems now to lie so certainly before me, that it may be spoken of as if it were already my abode. The words rendered “lowest pit” mean literally the pit under, or beneath. The reference is to the sepulchre, as in Psalm 88:4.

In darkness The dark grave; the realms of the dead. See the notes at Job 10:21,22.

In the deeps The caverns; the deep places of the earth or the sea. All these expressions are designed to convey the idea that he was near the grave; that there was no hope for him; that he must die. Perhaps also there is connected with this the idea of trouble, of anguish, of sorrow; of that mental darkness of which the grave was an image, and into which he was plunged by the prospect of death. The whole scene was a sad one, and he was overwhelmed with grief, and saw only the prospect of continued sorrow and gloom. Even a good man may be made afraid — may have his mind made sad and sorrowful — by the prospect of dying. See Isaiah 38. Death is naturally gloomy; and when the light of religion does not shine upon the soul, and its comforts do not fill the heart, it is but natural that the mind should be full of gloom.

Psalm 88:7. Thy wrath lieth hard upon me Presses me down; burdens me. The meaning is, that that which was the proper and usual expression of wrath or displeasure — to wit, bodily and mental suffering — pressed hard on him, and crushed him to the earth. These bodily sufferings he interpreted, in the sad and gloomy state of mind in which he was, as evidences of the divine displeasure against himself.

And thou hast afflicted me Thou hast oppressed me, or broken me down.

With all thy waves literally, “thy breakers;” that is, with expressions of wrath like the waves of the sea, which foam and break on the shore. Nothing could be a more striking image of wrath. Those “breakers” seem to be so furious and angry, they rush along with so much impetuosity, they are so mighty, they dash with such fury on the shore, that it seems as if nothing could stand before them. Yet they find a barrier such as we should little expect. The low and humble beach made of shifting sand, where there seems to be no stability, is an effectual barrier against all their rage; as the humble piety of the child of God, apparently without strength to resist calamity, bears all the beatings of affliction, and maintains its place as the heavy waves of sorrow roll upon it. On the meaning of the word used here, and on the idea expressed, see the notes at <sup><1947></sup>Psalm 42:7.

<sup><188></sup>Psalm 88:8. Thou hast put away mine acquaintance far from me The same ground of complaint, or expression of the depth of affliction, occurs elsewhere, <sup><1811></sup>Psalm 31:11; 38:11; 69:8. See also <sup><1893></sup>Job 19:13-17.

Thou hast made me an abomination unto them As something which they would avoid, or from which they would revolt and turn away — as we turn away from the body of a dead man, or from an offensive object. The word means properly an object to be detested or abominated, as things unclean, <sup><1432></sup>Genesis 43:32; or as idolatry, <sup><1142></sup>1 Kings 14:24; <sup><2162></sup>2 Kings 16:3; 23:13.

I am shut up As in prison; to wit, by disease, as when one is confined to his house.

And I cannot come forth I cannot leave my couch, my room, my house. Compare <sup><1824></sup>Job 12:14.

LORD, I have called daily upon thee That is, I have prayed earnestly and long, but I have received no answer.

I have stretched out my hands unto thee I have spread out my hands in the attitude of prayer. The idea is that of earnest supplication.

Psalm 88:10. Wilt thou show wonders to the dead? The wonders — or the things suited to excite admiration — which the living behold. Shall the dead see those things which here tend to excite reverence for thee, and which lead people to worship thee? The idea is that the dead will be cut off from all the privileges which attend the living on earth; or, that those in the grave cannot contemplate the character and the greatness of God. He urges this as a reason why he should be rescued. The sentiment here is substantially the same as in Psalm 6:5. See the notes at that passage. Compare Isaiah 38:18.

Shall the dead arise and praise thee? The original word, here rendered “the dead,” is Rephaim — aprr; <sup><17496></sup>. On its meaning, see the notes at Isaiah 14:9. It means, properly, relaxed, languid, feeble, weak; and is then applied to the dead — the shades — the Manes — dwelling in the under-world in Sheol, or Hades, and supposed to be as shades or shadows, weak and feeble. The question here is not whether they would rise to live again, or appear in this world, but whether in Sheol they would rise up from their resting places, and praise God as men in vigor and in health can on the earth. The question has no reference to the future resurrection. It relates to the supposed dark, dismal, gloomy, inactive state of the dead.

Psalm 88:11. Shall thy loving-kindness be declared in the grave? Thy goodness; thy mercy. Shall anyone make it known there? shall it there be celebrated?

Or thy faithfulness in destruction? In the place where destruction seems to reign; where human hopes perish; where the body moulders back to dust. Shall anyone there dwell on the fidelity — the truthfulness — of God, in such a way as to honor him? It is implied here that, according to the views then entertained of the state of the dead, those things would not occur. According to what is now made known to us of the unseen world it is true that the mercy of God will not be made known to the dead; that the Gospel will not be preached to them; that no messenger from God will convey to them the offers of salvation. Compare Luke 16:28-31.

Psalm 88:12. Shall thy wonders be known in the dark? In the dark world; in “the land of darkness and the shadow of death; a land of darkness, as darkness itself, and where the light is as darkness.” Job 10:21,22. “And thy righteousness.” The justice of thy character; or, the ways in which thou dost maintain and manifest thy righteous character.

In the land of forgetfulness Of oblivion; where the memory has decayed, and where the remembrance of former things is blotted out. This is a part of the general description, illustrating the ideas then entertained of the state of the dead; that they would be weak and feeble; that they could see nothing; that even the memory would fail, and the recollection of former things pass from the mind. All these are images of the grave as it appears to man when he has not the clear and full light of revelation; and the grave is all this — a dark and cheerless abode — all abode of fearfulness and gloom — when the light of the great truths of the Gospel is not suffered to fall upon it. That the psalmist dreaded this is clear, for he had not yet the full light of revealed truth in regard to the grave, and it seemed to him to be a gloomy abode. That people without the Gospel ought to dread it, is clear, for when the grave is not illuminated with Christian truth and hope, it is a place from which man by nature shrinks back, and it is not wonderful that a wicked man dreads to die.

<sup><9883></sup>Psalm 88:13. But unto thee have I cried, O LORD I have earnestly prayed; I have sought thy gracious interposition.

And in the morning That is, each morning; every day. My first business in the morning shall be prayer.

Shall my prayer prevent thee Anticipate thee; go before thee: that is, it shall be early; so to speak even before thou dost awake to the employments of the day. The language is that which would be applicable to a case where one made an appeal to another for aid before he had arisen from his bed, or who came to him even while he was asleep — and who thus, with an earnest petition, anticipated his rising. Compare the notes at <sup><1882></sup>Job 3:12; compare <sup><6208></sup>Psalm 21:3; 59:10; 79:8; 119:148; <sup><4175></sup>Matthew 17:25; <sup><5045></sup>1 Thessalonians 4:15.

<sup><9884></sup>Psalm 88:14. LORD, why castest thou off my soul? Why dost thou forsake or abandon me? Why is it that thou dost not interpose, since thou hast all power, and since thou art a God of mercy? Why dost thou not deliver me from my troubles? How often are good people constrained to ask this question! How often does this language express exactly what is passing in their minds! How difficult, too, it is to answer the question, and to see why that God who has all power, and who is infinitely benevolent, does not interpose to deliver his people in affliction! The answer to this question cannot be fully given in this world; there will be an answer furnished doubtless in the future life.

Why hidest thou thy face from me? Why dost thou not lift up the light of thy countenance upon me, and show me thy favor? God seemed to turn away from him. He seemed unwilling even to look upon the sufferer. He permitted him to bear his sorrows, unpitied and alone.

~~1885~~ Psalm 88:15. I am afflicted and ready to die I am so afflicted — so crushed with sorrow and trouble — that my strength is nearly gone, and I can endure it but a little longer.

From my youth up That is, for a long time; so long, that the remembrance of it seems to go back to my very childhood. My whole life has been a life of trouble and sorrow, and I have not strength to bear it longer. It may have been literally true that the author of the psalm had been a man always afflicted; or, this may be the language of strong emotion, meaning that his sufferings had been of so long continuance that they seemed to him to have begun in his very boyhood.

While I suffer thy terrors I bear those things which produce terror; or, which fill my mind with alarm; to wit, the fear of death, and the dread of the future world.

I am distracted I cannot compose and control my mind; I cannot pursue any settled course of thought; I cannot confine my attention to anyone subject; I cannot reason calmly on the subject of affliction, on the divine government, on the ways of God. I am distracted with contending feelings, with my pain, and my doubts, and my fears — and I cannot think clearly of anything. Such is often the case in sickness; and consequently what we need, to prepare us for sickness, is a strong faith, built on a solid foundation while we are in health; such an intelligent and firm faith that when the hour of sickness shall come we shall have nothing else to do but to believe, and to take the comfort of believing. The bed of sickness is not the proper place to examine the evidences of religion; it is not the place to make preparation for death; not the proper place to become religious. Religion demands the best vigor of the intellect and the calmest state of the heart; and this great subject should be settled in our minds before we are sick — before we are laid on the bed of death.

Psalm 88:16. Thy fierce wrath goeth over me Like waters. See Psalm 88:7.

Thy terrors have cut me off That is, I am as one already dead; I am so near to death that I may be spoken of as dead.

Psalm 88:17. They came round about me daily like water Margin, “as in” Hebrew, all the day. That is, his troubles seemed to be like the waves of the sea constantly breaking on the shore. See Psalm 42:7.

They compassed me about together My troubles did not come singly, so that I could meet them one at a time, but they seemed to have banded themselves together; they all came upon me at once.

Psalm 88:18. Lover and friend hast thou put far from me That is, Thou hast so afflicted me that they have forsaken me. Those who professed to love me, and whom I loved — those whom I regarded as my friends, and who seemed to be my friends — are now wholly turned away from me, and I am left to suffer alone. See the notes at Psalm 88:8.

And mine acquaintance into darkness The Septuagint and the Latin Vulgate render this, “my acquaintance from my misery.” Luther, “Thou hast caused my friends and neighbors, and my kindred, to separate themselves far from me, on account of such misery.” The literal rendering would be, my acquaintances are darkness. This may mean either that they had so turned away that he could not see them, as if they were in the dark; or, that his familiars now — his companions — were dark and dismal objects — gloomy thoughts — sad forebodings. Perhaps the whole might be translated, “Far away from me hast thou put lover and friend — my acquaintances! All is darkness!” That is, When I think of any of them, all is darkness, sadness. My friends are not to be seen. They have vanished. I see no friends; I see only darkness and gloom. All have gone, leaving me alone in this condition of unpitied sorrow! This completes the picture of the suffering man; a man to whom all was dark, and who could find no consolation anywhere — in God; in his friends; in the grave; in the prospect of the future. There are such cases; and it was well that there was one such description in the sacred Scriptures of a good man thus suffering — to show us that when we thus feel, it should not be regarded as proof that we have no piety. Beneath all this, there may be true love to God; beyond all this, there may be a bright world to which the sufferer will come, and where he will forever dwell.

APPENDIX NOTES ON PSALMS 88

We maintain, says Hengstenberg, that the two psalms together, like Psalm 9 and Psalm 10; Psalm 42 and Psalm 43, and many other pairs of psalms, form one whole consisting of two parts. He adds that the character of a Song of Praise (title) belongs to the whole as soon as it is recognized as a whole. The introductory and concluding portions, dark in themselves, are illuminated by the light of a centersun. And the design of the whole then becomes manifest, namely, to give instruction how, in circumstances of great distress, to gain the victory over despair by praising God. If we separate Psalm 88 from Psalm 89 it stands alone in the whole book of Psalms. All expositors remark with one voice, that such a comfortless complaint nowhere else occurs throughout its entire compass. Stier, for example, says: "The most mournful of all the plaintive psalms; yea, so wholly plaintive, without any ground of hope, that nothing like it is found in the whole Scriptures." The fact is all the more striking, that the psalm begins with the words, "O Lord, thou the God of my salvation!" after which one certainly might expect anything else rather than a mere description of trouble, in which the darkness is thickest at the close, contrary to the usual practice, for in all other cases the sun breaks through the clouds at the end, if it had not done so before. The special feature of this psalm is, that it ends entirely in night. The importance of these facts is obvious from the circumstance that Muntinghe has been led by them to adopt the idea that the psalm is merely a fragment of a larger one — an idea utterly destitute of probability, for we have no such thing as fragments either in the book of Psalms or indeed within the whole compass of the literature of the Old Testament. As soon as the connection between Psalm 88 and Psalm 89 is acknowledged, the difficulty disappears. The psalmist might, in this case, give free scope in the first part to his pain and lamentation, in obedience to an irresistible impulse of human nature, knowing that in the second part the rising sun of consolation would dispel all this darkness. (Introduction to Psalm 88)

The historian of Solomon's reign has preserved the names of some of the sages who graced his court, and who doubtless stood related to him in his studies in much the same way as Asaph and the other Levitical seers to David. The list occurs in the encomium on the wisdom of Solomon, which tells how "he was wiser than all men (that is to say, wiser than all the men of his own age and country); than Ethan the Ezrahite, and Heman, and Chalcol, and Darda, the sons of Mahol; and his fame was in all nations round about,” <sup><106></sup>1 Kings 4:31. Questions not a few have been raised respecting the sages here enumerated — the wise satellites who revolved around the wisest king. Were they of the tribe of Judah, the king’s own tribe, as the insertion of their names in <sup><106></sup>1 Chronicles 2:6 has been thought to imply? Or were they not rather Levites, registered among the families of Judah, because their lot had fallen to them within the inheritance of that tribe? These questions must remain unanswered here. I quote the list at present simply to call attention to the fact that two of the names that occur in it are found also in the superscriptions of Psalm 88; 89. The former has the singular peculiarity of possessing two superscriptions, for it is entitled both “A song or psalm of the sons of Korah,” and a psalm “of Heman the Ezrahite, to give instruction.” The latter is entitled “A psalm of Ethan the Ezrahite, to give instruction.” Is the coincidence of these names with those of Solomon’s sages a mere accident? or are the Heman and Ethan of the superscriptions to be identified with the Heman and Ethan of the history? ... I can only say that I am satisfied Calvin hit the truth when he conjectured that Psalm 89 was written by some prophet of Solomon’s time who lived on into the disastrous reign of Rehoboam; and that it was written to give expression to the sorrowful feelings with which the godly in Judah had witnessed the disruption of the kingdom and the collapse of the shortlived glory of David’s house ... With regard to Psalm 88, one must speak with more hesitation. Neither author nor date is at all certain. It is a tearful song; indeed, it stands alone in the Psalter in this respect, that no ray of light breaks the gloom of the suppliant. Were it not that he calls upon God, in the opening verse, as “Yahweh, the God of his salvation,” the whole might have seemed the cry of despair rather than of struggling faith. Dr. Hengstenberg, and some other commentators of note, are of opinion that the two psalms go together. If so, we may pretty confidently identify the “Heman the Ezrahite” of the one superscription, and the “Ethan the Ezrahite” of the other, with the Heman and Ethan of Solomon’s time. Some go further, and identify them with the Heman and Ethan-Jeduthun, the Levitical seers and psalmists whom David appointed, along with Asaph their kinsman, to preside over the service of song. It is just possible they may be the same; but in that case they must have lived to extreme old age. The forty years of Solomon’s reign, in addition to some of the last years of David’s, intervened between the establishment of the Levitical choirs and the disruption of the kingdom. However this may be, since Psalm 89 is a voice from the calamitous reign of Rehoboam, the circumstances of its origin must ever invest it with a certain melancholy interest, as being the last utterance of the Holy Spirit, in this kind, for a long time — the last pulsation of the mighty tide of inspired psalmody which commenced to flow when David was anointed at Bethlehem. — Binnie.

NOTES ON PSALM 89

This psalm is entitled “Maschil of Ethan the Ezrahite.” In the margin this is rendered, “A Psalm for Ethan the Ezrahite to give instruction.” On the word Maschil, see the notes at the title to Psalm 42. As both Heman (Psalm 88 title) and Ethan, in the title before us, are mentioned as Ezrahites, it would seem that they were of the same family, and were probably brethren. Ethan and Heman, in connection with Zimri, and Calcol, and Dara, five of them in all, are mentioned as “the sons of Zerach,” grandsons of Judah, <sup><1116></sup>1 Chronicles 2:6. If these were the persons referred to, and if they were the authors of these two psalms, then the period of the composition of these psalms was laid far back in the history of the Hebrew people, far anterior to the time of David. Compare <sup><1116></sup>1 Chronicles 2:6-12. It is hardly probable, however, that they were composed at so early a period in the Jewish history; and there are some things in this psalm, which cannot be reconciled with such a supposition (compare <sup><1808></sup>Psalm 89:3,20,35,39,49), and which make it certain that it was either composed by David, or after the time of David. The probability, therefore, seems to be that these names, “Heman” and “Ethan,” were either the names of some persons subsequent to the time referred to in <sup><1116></sup>1 Chronicles 2:6, (see General Introduction, Section 2 (5)); or that these their names were given to classes of “the sons of Korah” who had charge of the music, and that the psalms were composed by some persons of those classes. As thus composed, they might be spoken of as the psalms of Heman and Ethan.

There are no certain methods of ascertaining when the psalm before us was composed, or what was the occasion of its composition. DeWette supposes that it must have been written about the time of the exile, as the family of David is represented in the psalm as dishonored and dethroned — and yet before the exile, as there is no mention of the destruction of the city and temple. He accords, therefore, with the opinion of Venema that it was not far from the time of the death of Josiah, <sup><4831></sup>2 Chronicles 35:20-24. The author he supposes to be either a successor of David — an humbled monarch — or, someone who personates the king, and who represents the calamity of the king as his own. Hengstenberg also supposes that it was composed between the time of the death of Josiah and the Babylonian exile. There is a strong probability in the psalm itself that it was composed at such a period, but it is impossible to determine the exact time, or the precise occasion. The burden of the psalm is, that most precious promises had been made to David of the perpetuity of his throne, but that now these promises scorned to fail; that reverses and calamities had come which threatened to overturn his throne, and to bring his kingdom to an end. His “crown” had been “profaned” and “cast to the ground.” See <sup><1888></sup>Psalm 89:38-44.

The psalm consists properly of three parts:

- I. The promise made to David in respect to the perpetuity of his throne, <sup><1891></sup>Psalm 89:1-37. The illustration of this occupies a considerable part of the psalm.
- II. The fact that this promise seemed to be disregarded; that the “covenant” had been “made void;” that the “crown” had been “profaned,” and “cast to the ground,” <sup><1888></sup>Psalm 89:38-45.
- III. An earnest plea for the divine interposition in the fulfillment of the promise, and the restoration of the divine favor and mercy, <sup><1896></sup>Psalm 89:46-52.

<sup><1891></sup>Psalm 89:1. I will sing of the mercies of the LORD for ever

Particularly how the “mercy” was manifested in the promise made to David; the solemn covenant made with him in respect to the perpetuity of his throne. The appointment of David to the throne was an act of mere mercy or favor, since he was not in the royal line, and had no claim to the crown. It will be seen, also, that if it be supposed that the covenant with David, and the promise therein made to him, was intended to include the Messiah as descending from him, there was a still higher reason for celebrating the “mercies” of God, inasmuch as all mercy to our world comes through him.

With my mouth Not merely in my heart, but with words. The meaning here is that he would make a record which might be used evermore as the language of praise.

Will I make known thy faithfulness In the fulfillment of these promises. He felt assured that they would be fulfilled. Whatever appearances there might be to the contrary, the psalmist had no doubt that God would prove himself to be faithful and true. See the notes at <sup><2583></sup>Isaiah 55:3, on the expression, “the sure mercies of David.”

To all generations Margin, as in Hebrew, generation and generation. He would make a record which would carry down the remembrance of this faithfulness to all future ages.

Psalm 89:2. For I have said The Septuagint and the Latin Vulgate render this, “Thou hast said,” which is more in accordance with what the connection seems to demand; but the Hebrew will not admit of this construction. The true meaning seems to be, that the psalmist had said; that is, he had said in his mind; he had firmly believed; he had so received it as a truth that it might be spoken of as firmly settled, or as an indisputable reality. It was in his mind one of the things whose truthfulness did not admit of a doubt.

mercy shall be built up for ever The mercy referred to; the mercy manifested in the promise made to David. The idea is, that the promise would be fully carried out or verified. It would not be like the foundation of a building, which, after being laid, was abandoned; it would be as if the building, for which the foundation was designed, were carried up and completed. It would not be a forsaken, half-finished edifice, but an edifice fully erected.

Thy faithfulness shalt thou establish In the matter referred to — the promise made to David.

In the very heavens literally, “The heavens — thou wilt establish thy faithfulness in them.” That is the heavens — the heavenly bodies — so regular, so fixed, so enduring, are looked upon as the emblem of stability. The psalmist brings them thus before his mind, and he says that God had, as it were, made his promise a part of the very heavens; he had given to his faithfulness a place among the most secure, and fixed, and settled objects in nature. The sun in its regular rising; the stars in their certain course; the constellations, the same from age to age, were an emblem of the stability and security of the promises of God. Compare <sup>2333</sup>Jeremiah 33:20,21.

Psalm 89:3. I have made a covenant with my chosen With my chosen one; that is, with David. The original is in the singular number, though by the Septuagint, and the Vulgate, and by Luther, it is rendered in the plural — chosen ones — elect. This is undoubtedly the language of God himself, though it is not expressly ascribed to him. The design is to describe the solemn promise which God had made to David and to his posterity.

Compare <sup><1980></sup>Psalm 78:70,71. See also, on the use of the phrase “made a covenant,” see the notes at <sup><1815></sup>Psalm 50:5; 83:5.

I have sworn unto David my servant I have taken a solemn oath in regard to him. The substance of the oath is stated in the next verse. The promise referred to is found in <sup><1071></sup>2 Samuel 7:11-16.

<sup><880></sup>Psalm 89:4. Thy seed will I establish for ever Thy children; thy posterity. The reference is to his successors on the throne. The promise was that there should not fail to be one on his throne; that is, that his dynasty should never become extinct. See <sup><1071></sup>2 Samuel 7:16:

“And thy house and thy kingdom shall be established forever before thee: thy throne shall be established forever.”

Compare also <sup><1004></sup>1 Kings 2:4. The word rendered “establish” means properly to fit; then, to make firm; to put on a solid basis.

And build up thy throne It shall be kept up; it shall be like a building that is constantly progressing toward completion. The meaning is, that it would not fail. He would not begin the work, and then abandon it. The dynasty, the kingdom, the throne, would be complete and perpetual.

To all generations As long as the world should stand. This can have been accomplished only by the Messiah occupying in a spiritual sense the throne of “his father David.” Compare <sup><413></sup>Luke 1:32,33.

That is, the inhabitants of heaven shall find new occasion for praise in the faithfulness evinced in carrying out the promise to David, and in the marvelous things which will occur under that promise, and in its accomplishment. If we suppose that this promise embraced the Messiah and his reign, then we shall see what new occasions the angels would find for praise — in the incarnation of the Redeemer, and in all that would be accomplished by him.

Thy faithfulness also in the congregation of the saints In the assembly of the holy ones; that is, the angels. In their songs of praise, this will be among the things which will fill them with joy. The idea is, that the inhabitants of the heavens — the holy angels — would take a deep interest in the fulfillment of this promise, as it would furnish new manifestations of the character of God. Compare <sup><651></sup>Revelation 5:11-14; <sup><1012></sup>1 Peter 1:12.

Psalm 89:6. For who in the heaven ... literally, In the cloud; that is, in the sky. The idea is that none in the regions above — the upper world — can be compared with God. There is no other god — there is no one among the angels, great and glorious as they are, that can be likened to him.

Who among the sons of the mighty ... The angels — regarded as mighty. The “sons of the mighty” on earth are spoken of as mighty men — as men of power — as men of exalted rank. So here, the idea is, that none of the angels, though of exalted rank (“principalities,” or “powers,” compare Romans 8:38; Ephesians 1:21), could be put in comparison with God. See the notes at Isaiah 40:25.

Psalm 89:7. God is greatly to be feared There is that in him which is suited to fill the mind with solemn feelings, and this is a proper state of mind with which to come before him. Nature teaches us that God should be approached with awe; and all the teachings of revelation confirm this. His power is to be feared; his justice is to be feared; his holiness is to be feared; and there is much also in his goodness, his benevolence, his mercy, to fill the mind with solemn emotions.

In the assembly of the saints The assembly of the holy; the assembly that is convened for his worship. The reference here may be either to worshippers on earth or in heaven. Wherever, and whenever, in this world or in other worlds, creatures are engaged in the worship of God, there should be deep solemnity and reverence. On the word rendered “assembly” here — dw <sup><15475></sup> — a council, or assemblage for counsel, see the notes at Psalm 25:14; 64:2; compare Job 15:8. The idea here is founded on what is said in the previous verse, that none can be compared with God.

And to be had in reverence In fear; in awe.

Of all them that are about him That approach him; that are in his presence. The conscious presence of God should fill the mind with awe. When we feel that his eye is upon us, when we know that he sees us, how can we trifle and be thoughtless? How can we then be sinful?

Psalm 89:8. O LORD God of hosts See the notes at Isaiah 1:9; Psalm 24:10. God, commanding the armies of heaven; leading forth the stars; controlling all forces — all powers.

Who is a strong LORD like unto thee? The original word here rendered “Lord” is Hy,<sup><h3050></sup> or Jah. This is one of the few places where that word occurs, except in the compounding of words. It is an abbreviation of the name Yahweh, and has the same signification. See the notes at <sup><h6804></sup>Psalm 68:4. The meaning is, that there was no one who in respect to power could be compared with Yahweh.

Or to thy faithfulness round about thee? Rather, “thy faithfulness is round about thee.” That is, It attends thee at all times; it is always with thee; it is a part of thy very nature. To all round about thee, thou art faithful; wherever God is — and he is everywhere — there is faithfulness. He never changes; and people and angels may always trust in him. The psalmist then proceeds to illustrate the greatness of his power, and of his faithfulness, in the works of creation. The design of these illustrations, doubtless, is to keep before the mind the idea of the divine faithfulness as shown in the works of nature, and then to apply this to the covenant which had been made with David. The idea is, that he who is so faithful in nature will be the same in grace; that he who had shown such unchangeableness in the works of creation might be expected to show the like in respect to the promises which he had made.

<sup><h8909></sup>Psalm 89:9. Thou rulest the raging of the sea The pride; the anger; the lifting up of the sea. That is, when the sea is raging and boisterous; when it seems as if everything would be swept away before it, thou hast absolute control over it. There is, perhaps, no more impressive exhibition of divine power than the control which God has over the raging waves of the ocean: and yet this was the power which Jesus exercised over the raging sea of Galilee — showing that he had the power of God. <sup><h4049></sup>Mark 4:39-41.

When the waves thereof arise In the lifting up of the waves; when they seem to raise themselves up in defiance.

Thou stillest them At thy pleasure. They rise no higher than thou dost permit; at thy command they settle down into a calm. So in the troubles of life — the storms — the waves of affliction; they rise as high as God permits, and no higher; when he commands they subside, and leave the mind as calm as the smooth sea when not a breath of wind moves over its surface, or makes a ripple on its placid bosom.

Psalm 89:10. Thou hast broken Rahab in pieces Margin, “Egypt.” See the notes at <sup><8870></sup>Psalm 87:4. The reference is to the exodus of the Hebrew people, when he destroyed the power of Egypt.

As one that is slain Slain on the field of battle; as a man pierced through with a sword or spear.

Thou hast scattered thine enemies At the time referred to, in Egypt; and at other times, when the enemies of God and of his people had been discomfited.

With thy strong arm Margin, as in Hebrew, the arm of thy strength. That is, by his power — the arm being the symbol of power. See the notes at <sup><8975></sup>Psalm 77:15. Compare <sup><8815></sup>Deuteronomy 5:15; 7:8,19, et al.

Psalm 89:11. The heavens are thine Are thy work; and, therefore, thy property — the highest conception of property being that which is derived from creation. It is also implied here that as all things belong to God, he has a right to dispose of them as he pleases.

The earth also is thine The earth itself, as made by thee; all that the earth produces, as having sprung out of that which thou hast made. The entire proprietorship is in thee.

As for the world In the use of this word, the earth is spoken of as inhabitable, meaning that the earth and all that dwell upon it belong to God.

And the fulness thereof All that it produces; what constitutes its entireness. That is, the earth itself considered as earth, or as a mass of matter; and all that springs from it; all that constitutes the earth, with all its mountains, seas, rivers, people, animals, minerals, harvests, cities, towns, monuments — the productions of nature, the works of power, and the achievements of art. Compare the notes at <sup><8241></sup>Psalm 24:1.

Thou hast founded them They all have their foundation in thee; that is, thou hast caused them all to exist. They have no independent and separate basis on which to rest.

Psalm 89:12. The north and the south, thou hast created them All that there is in the north and in the south — in the northern and the southern sky — the constellations and the stars; and all that there is in the earth — in the regions of cold and of heat — far as they extend in either direction. The word rendered “north” here — <sup>~wpx, <46828></sup> — means properly that which is hidden or dark, and was applied to the north, because the ancients regarded it as the seat of gloom and darkness. Hom. Od., ix. 25. The south, on the other hand, was regarded by them as illuminated and made bright by the beams of the sun. The word rendered “south” — <sup>~ymj, <43225></sup> — means literally the right hand, and was applied to the south because the ancient geographers were supposed to face the east, as now they are supposed to face the north. Compare the notes at <sup><48239></sup> Job 23:9.

Tabor and Hermon That is, the west and the east — the former of these mountains being on the western side of Palestine, the other on the eastern, and both of them being objects of beauty and grandeur. The idea is, that God had control of all parts of the universe; that the world in every direction, and in every part, declared his power, and made known his greatness.

Shall rejoice in thy name Or, do rejoice in thee. That is, They, as it were, exult in thee as their God. They are clothed with beauty, as if full of joy; and they acknowledge that all this comes from thee as the great Creator. Compare <sup><49818></sup> Psalm 65:8,12; 96:11,12.

<sup><48913></sup> Psalm 89:13. Thou hast a mighty arm Margin, as in Hebrew, “an arm with might.” That is, Thou hast great power — the arm being the instrument by which we accomplish our purposes.

Strong is thy hand The hand, too, is an instrument by which we execute our plans. Hence, God is so often represented as having delivered his people with a strong hand.

And high is thy right hand It is by the right hand particularly that we carry out our purposes. We lift it high when we are about to strike with force. All this is expressive of the divine omnipotence.

<sup><48914></sup> Psalm 89:14. justice and judgment are the habitation of the throne Margin, “establishment.” The Hebrew word — <sup>~wkm, <44349></sup> — means properly a place where one stands; then, a foundation or basis. The idea here is, that the throne of God is founded on justice and right judgment; it is this which supports it; his administration is maintained because it is right. This supposes that there is such a thing as right or justice in itself considered, or in the nature of things, and independently of the will of God; that the divine administration will be conformed to that, and will be firm because it is thus conformed to it. Even omnipotent power could not maintain permanently a throne founded on injustice and wrong. Such an administration would sooner or later make its own destruction sure.

mercy, and truth shall go before thy face literally, anticipate thy face; that is, thy goings. Wherever thou dost go, wherever thou dost manifest thyself, there will be mercy and faithfulness. Thy march through the world will be attended with kindness and fidelity. So certain is this, that his coming will, as it were, be anticipated by truth and goodness.

Psalm 89:15. Blessed is the people Happy is their condition. See the notes at Psalm 1:1.

That know the joyful sound That hear that sound. DeWette explains this of the call to the festivals and offerings, Leviticus 23:24; Numbers 10:10; Psalm 27:6. That is, says he, those who honor and worship God. The Hebrew word — h[WrT] — means a loud noise; a tumult; especially, shouts of joy, or rejoicing, Job 8:21; 1 Samuel 4:5; the “shout of a king,” that is, the joyful acclamations with which a king is welcomed, Numbers 23:21; the shout of battle, Jeremiah 4:19; 49:2. Then it means the sound or clangor of trumpets, Leviticus 25:9; Numbers 29:1-6. The word is, therefore, especially applicable to the sounding of the trumpets which attended the celebration of the great festivals among the Hebrews, and there can be little doubt that this is the reference here. The idea is, that they are blessed or happy who are the worshippers of Yahweh, the true God; who are summoned to his service; who are convened to the place of his worship.

They shall walk, O LORD, in the light of thy countenance They shall live in thy favor, and enjoy thy smiles.

Psalm 89:16. In thy name shall they rejoice In thee shall they rejoice, or find their happiness. In thy being; thy perfections; thy protection; thy government; thy favor.

All the day That is, continually. It is their privilege, and it is their duty to rejoice always. Thou art always the same, and the happiness which is found in thy being and attributes at one time may be found at all times; thy promises are ever the same, and thy people may find happiness in them always. There is no reason why the people of God should not be constantly happy; they who have such a God, and such hopes as they are permitted to cherish, should be so. Compare the notes at <sup><5181></sup>Philippians 3:1; 4:4.

And in thy righteousness Under thy righteous government; or, in the knowledge of thy righteous character.

Shall they be exalted See <sup><3181></sup>Proverbs 14:34. The effect of that knowledge shall be to exalt or to elevate them in moral character, in happiness, in the esteem of others, and in true prosperity. Compare <sup><5048></sup>1 Timothy 4:8.

<sup><8917></sup>Psalm 89:17. For thou art the glory of their strength The ornament; the beauty; the honor; that is, Their strength derives its beauty and honor, not from anything in themselves, but from the fact that it is derived from thee. The strength thus imparted is an honor or ornament in itself; it is an honor and glory to them that it is imparted to them.

And in thy favor Or, by thy favor, or good pleasure.

Our horn shall be exalted The horn is a symbol of power. Compare the notes at <sup><4921></sup>Psalm 22:21; 75:4; <sup><2008></sup>Daniel 7:8; <sup><1865></sup>Job 16:15. The meaning here is, that their power had been derived from God; or that all which contributed to their exaltation and honor in the world, had been derived from him.

<sup><8918></sup>Psalm 89:18. For the LORD is our defense Margin, “Our shield is of the Lord.” The original word rendered “defense,” is shield. Compare the notes at <sup><4952></sup>Psalm 5:12; 33:20; 59:11. The meaning is, that protection was to be found in God alone. The true construction of this verse is, “For to Yahweh (belongs) our shield, and to the Holy One of Israel our king.” That is, All that they had, and all that they relied on as a defense, belonged to God, or was of God; in other words, their very protectors were themselves protected by Yahweh. They had no other defense; nothing else on which they could depend.

<sup><8919></sup>Psalm 89:19. Then thou spakest in vision Or, by a vision. See this word explained in the notes at <sup><2001></sup>Isaiah 1:1. The meaning is, that God had spoken this by means of visions, or by communications made to his people by the prophets. This “vision” was especially made known to Nathan, and through him to David. See <sup><3004></sup>2 Samuel 7:4-17. The substance of what is here said is found in that passage in Samuel. In <sup><3077></sup>2 Samuel 7:17, it is expressly called a “vision.”

To thy holy one The vision was addressed particularly to David, but was made through him to the people of Israel. The ancient versions render this in the plural, as referring to the people of Israel. The Hebrew is in the singular number.

I have laid help upon one that is mighty I have so endowed him that he shall be the protector and defender of my people. He is qualified for the office entrusted to him, and in his hands the interests of the nation will be safe. This was not expressly said in the vision; but this was the substance of what was said. See <sup><1070></sup>2 Samuel 7:9.

I have exalted one chosen out of the people One not of exalted rank; one not descended from kings and conquerors; but one that had grown up among the people; one called from the ranks of common life; one chosen from among those engaged in humble occupations. In this way it was the more apparent that the power really came from God. Compare <sup><1078></sup>2 Samuel 7:8; see also the notes at <sup><1070></sup>Psalm 78:70-72.

<sup><1080></sup>Psalm 89:20. I have found David my servant That is, I found him among the sheepfolds; in humble life. I saw there one who was qualified for the high office of being the ruler of the nation, and I designated, or set him apart, for that office. The idea is, that there was in him a precious qualification for this work, and that God had seen this, and, in accordance with this, had summoned him to his service.

With my holy oil have I anointed him By the hand of Samuel. <sup><1083></sup>1 Samuel 16:13. Oil was used in setting apart prophets, priests, and kings. It was poured upon the person — emblematic of the pouring out upon him of wisdom and grace from on high to qualify him for his office.

<sup><1082></sup>Psalm 89:21. With whom my hand shall be established Septuagint: “My hand shall aid him.” Luther; “My hand shall hold him.” DeWette; “With him my hand shall be continually.” Professor Alexander; “Shall ever be present.” The idea is, that God would always defend or protect him. He would not merely interpose at times, or at intervals, but he would be his constant protector. His hand would be permanently, or constantly, extended for his aid — as if it were a part of David’s own person, or were his own hand, to be used as he pleased. So God is the constant helper of his people. They may rely on his power; they may avail themselves of it, as if it were their own.

Mine arm also shall strengthen him In using his own arm, he will in fact make use of the strength of mine. The people of God are as really defended as if the strength of God were theirs; or as if they were themselves almighty. The omnipotence of God is employed in their defense, and it will be as certainly exerted in their favor, and as constantly, as if it were their own. It will be no less surely employed in their defense in the hand of God than if it were in their own hand. It will be more wisely employed by him in their behalf than it would be by themselves.

Psalm 89:22. The enemy shall not exact upon him The literal meaning here is derived from the force sometimes used in extorting or demanding a debt, where no indulgence is shown, but where it is exacted to the last mite, whether the man is able to pay it or not. Compare Matthew 18:25,28. Then it is used to denote oppression, or subjugation, which is the idea here. The enemy shall not be suffered to act the part of one who rigidly exacts the payment of a debt; that is, he shall not be allowed to oppress him.

Nor the son of wickedness afflict him This is copied almost literally from 2 Samuel 7:10. The phrase “the son of wickedness” means simply the wicked. He shall not fall into the hands, or under the power of wicked men.

Psalm 89:23. And I will beat down his foes before his face I will crush them, or destroy them: showing that the power of doing this was not his own, but was the power of God exerted in his behalf.

And plague them that hate him His enemies. I will bring “plagues” upon them: calamities, judgments, afflictions. The word is commonly used to denote those judgments which come directly from the hand of God — as famine, pestilence, wasting sickness, the plague, or the “plagues” of Egypt. Exodus 12:13; 30:12; Numbers 8:19; 17:11,12. These are all in the hand of God, and can be employed at his pleasure, as storms and tempests may be, in executing his purposes.

Psalm 89:24. But my faithfulness and my mercy shall be with him I will at the same time be faithful to him, and merciful. These attributes of my nature shall be always attendant on him, as if they were his own.

And in my name By me; or — He, acting in my name, and in my cause, shall be exalted.

Shall his horn be exalted See the notes at Psalm 89:17.

Psalm 89:25. I will set his hand also in the sea ... His dominion shall extend from the sea on the one hand to the rivers on the other. The sea here evidently refers to the Mediterranean; and the rivers to the great rivers on the east — the Tigris and Euphrates. These were the promised boundaries of the land. <sup><0158></sup>Genesis 15:18. David secured a conquest over all these territories, and united all under his scepter, thus securing the accomplishment of the promise made to Abraham. See the notes at Psalm 60.

Psalm 89:26. He shall cry unto me, Thou art my Father He shall appeal to me, or come to me as a Father, and as his only hope and defense.

My God He shall come to me as God, and shall recognize me as his God, his only trust and hope.

And the rock of my salvation See the notes at <sup><1982></sup>Psalm 18:2. The meaning of all this is, that he would at all times recognize him as his only trust and hope, and that he would be faithful on his part to God.

Psalm 89:27. Also I will make him my first-born He shall be regarded and treated by me as the first-born son is in a family; that is, with distinguished favor and honor. Compare <sup><0279></sup>Genesis 27:19; 29:26; <sup><0422></sup>Exodus 4:22; 13:12; <sup><3609></sup>Jeremiah 31:9. See also the notes at <sup><5005></sup>Colossians 1:15,18.

Higher than the kings of the earth Than other kings; the most exalted among kings and rulers. This was entirely fulfilled in David, who occupied a pre-eminence among princes and rulers which no other king did: a prominence alike in his own personal character and his reign; in his relation to God; and in the fact that he was the ancestor of the Messiah, the “King of kings, and Lord of lords” (<sup><6916></sup>Revelation 19:16); “the prince of the kings of the earth,” <sup><6005></sup>Revelation 1:5.

Psalm 89:28. My mercy will I keep for him for evermore I will not withdraw my favor from him, nor from his posterity, <sup><1883></sup>Psalm 89:33-36. In him, and in his Great Descendant, the throne shall be established forever. This dominion will not be like the changing dynasties of this world, but will be perpetual and eternal.

And my covenant shall stand fast with him See <sup><1074></sup>2 Samuel 7:14-16; 23:5. It shall be firm, or established with him and his family.

Psalm 89:29. His seed also will I make to endure for ever That is, His posterity shall occupy the throne:

(a) This would have been true of his descendants, if they had been faithful to God, and had not revolted from him;

(b) It is true of him who is the successor of David in his spiritual kingdom, the Lord Jesus, the Messiah. Compare the notes at <sup><2306></sup>Isaiah 9:6,7.

And his throne as the days of heaven As long as the heavens endure; that is, to the end of the world. Compare the notes at <sup><9725></sup>Psalm 72:5,7,17.

Psalm 89:30. If his children His posterity; his successors on the throne.

Forsake my law If they are not regulated by it in the administration of their government, and in their private lives. It is here supposed that they might forsake his law, or fail to observe it; but still there is the assurance that the power would not depart permanently from the successors of David, but that it would be restored ultimately to that line, and be permanent and eternal.

And walk not in my judgements And do not obey my commandments.

Psalm 89:31. If they break my statutes Margin, “profane.” The Hebrew word means to pollute or defile; and the idea is, If they practically contemn them; if they regard them as things of nought, or treat them with disdain as a polluted or defiled thing. It is in this way that the mass of mankind do regard the commands of God. They treat them with no respect; they practically class them among objects that are polluted, and that are to be avoided as defiled and defiling.

And keep not my commandments If they do not regulate their conduct by my laws.

Psalm 89:32. Then will I visit their transgression with the rod They shall be punished, though my mercy shall not be wholly taken from them. God has two objects in his dealings with his backsliding and offending people;

(a) one is to show his displeasure at their conduct, or to punish them;

(b) the other is to reclaim them.

All who have been truly converted, or who are truly his people, will be recovered though they fall into sin; but it may be done, and will be likely to be done, in such a way as to show his own displeasure at their offences.

And their iniquity with stripes The word rendered stripes means properly a stroke, a blow; then, judgments or calamities such as God sends on mankind as a punishment for their sins. <sup><0127></sup>Genesis 12:17; <sup><0210></sup>Exodus 11:1; <sup><0381></sup>Psalms 38:11.

<sup><0383></sup>Psalm 89:33. Nevertheless my loving-kindness My mercy; my favor. I will not utterly cast him off. He shall not be in the condition of those who are my enemies, or who are entirely forsaken.

Will I not utterly take from him Margin, "I will not make void from." The Hebrew word — <sup>רָפָה</sup><sup><0655></sup> — means to break, to break in pieces; then, to violate, as a covenant; then, to make vain, to bring to nought, to frustrate; then, to annul, to abolish. The idea here is that of making entirely vain; wholly removing from; or taking completely away. The meaning is, that he would not wholly take away his favor; he would not entirely abandon him; he would not suffer him to become wholly apostate; he would not leave him to ruin. The covenant once made would be accomplished; the promise given would be carried out.

Nor suffer my faithfulness My faithfulness as pledged in the covenant or promise. "To fail." Margin, "lie." I will not prove false, or deal falsely in the pledge which I have made. It shall not appear at last that I have made a promise which has not been kept. This passage contains a very important principle in regard to the dealings of God with his people. The principle is, that if people are converted, if they in fact become his people — he will never suffer them wholly to fall away and perish. They may be suffered to backslide; they may fall into sin, but they will not be allowed to go so far as to apostatize wholly. They will be brought back again. Whatever method may be necessary for this, will be adopted. Commands; warnings; entreaties; remonstrances; — their own experience; the admonitions of others; the influences of the Holy Spirit: judgments and calamities; sickness; loss of property; bereavement; disappointment; disgrace; any of these, or all of these, may be resorted to, in order to bring them back; but they will be brought back. God, in mercy and in love, will so visit them with sorrow and trouble that they shall be recovered, and that their "spirit shall be saved in the day of the Lord Jesus."

Psalm 89:34. My covenant will I not break literally, I will not pollute, defile, profane. See the notes at Psalm 89:31, where the same word is used. God says that he will not do in regard to the covenant as they had done.

Nor alter the thing ... The promise which I have made. I will not make it a different thing. I will not modify its conditions, or withdraw it. It shall stand precisely as it was when I uttered it. What God promises will be exactly performed.

Psalm 89:35. Once have I sworn by my holiness That is, once for all; — a single oath — an oath once taken by me — makes it certain. To swear by his “holiness” is to pledge his own holy nature; to make it as certain as that he is holy; to stake the whole question of his holiness on that. That is, If this should not be accomplished — if he should fail in this — it would prove that he was not a holy God.

That I will not lie unto David Margin, as in Hebrew, “if I lie.” The meaning is, He would be found faithful to the promise. See Psalm 89:3,4; compare 2 Samuel 7:8-16.

Psalm 89:36. His seed shall endure forever ... His posterity. See the notes at Psalm 89:29. There, the expression is, “his throne as the days of heaven.” Here it is, “his throne as the sun before me.” The meaning is the same. It would stand through all time. Compare the notes at Psalm 72:5.

Psalm 89:37. It shall be established forever as the moon As long as the moon shall endure. The heavenly bodies are the most permanent objects that we know of; and they, therefore, became the emblems of stability and perpetuity. Compare the notes at Psalm 72:7.

And as a faithful witness in heaven As the witness in heaven, or in the sky, is sure. The reference is to the moon, regarded as a witness for God. What is said here of the moon as an index of his faithfulness, might be said also of the sun and the stars; but the beauty of the image is increased by the attention being fixed to a single object. As the moon is fixed, regular, enduring — so are the promises and purposes of God. Such were the promises made to David; such was the oath which had been taken by God; such the covenant which he had made. The psalmist now proceeds (Psalm 89:38-45) to show that this oath and these promises seemed to be disregarded; that there were things occurring which appeared as if God had forgotten them; that there was not that manifest prosperity and favor which was implied in the promise; but that a series of calamities had occurred which it was difficult to reconcile with these solemn pledges. On the ground of this he prays (<sup><18946></sup>Psalm 89:46-52) that God would return, and would remember his covenant, and would bless David and his people.

<sup><1888></sup>Psalm 89:38. But thou hast cast off literally, Thou hast treated as a foul, offensive thing; thou hast treated him to whom these promises were made, as if he were a vile and detestable object — as that which one throws away because it is worthless or offensive.

And abhorred Hast despised; that is, as if it were an object of aversion or contempt. Compare <sup><18601></sup>Psalm 60:1,10.

Thou hast been wroth literally, “Thou hast suffered (thine anger) to overflow,” or to pour itself forth. See <sup><19721></sup>Psalm 78:21,59.

With thine anointed With him who had been anointed as king — anointed as thine own — to administer justice, and to rule for thee. <sup><19101></sup>1 Samuel 16:1,13. This might seem to refer to the time of Absalom, when David was driven from his throne and his kingdom; see, however, the Introduction to the Psalm.

<sup><1889></sup>Psalm 89:39. Thou hast made void the covenant of thy servant Thou hast dealt with him as if there were no such covenant; as if no such promise had been made to him. The word rendered “made void,” means to abhor, or reject.

Thou hast profaned his crown, by casting it to the ground literally, “Thou hast profaned to the earth his crown;” that is, Thou hast treated it as a polluted thing; a thing to be rejected and abhorred; a thing which one casts indignantly upon the ground.

<sup><1890></sup>Psalm 89:40. Thou hast broken down all his hedges His walls or defenses; all that he relied on for safety.

Thou hast brought his strongholds to ruin His towers, fortifications; defenses. The enemy has been suffered to destroy them. They are now heaps of ruins.

Psalm 89:41. All that pass by the way spoil him The sentiment here is substantially the same as in Psalm 80:12. See the notes at that place. The idea is that of fields or vineyards, where all the fences, the walls, and the hedges are thrown down so that they become like an open common.

He is a reproach to his neighbors An object of ridicule, as if he were forsaken by God; as if cast out and despised.

Psalm 89:42. Thou hast set up the right hand of his adversaries Hast given them the victory. Thou hast suffered them to accomplish their purposes.

Thou hast made all his enemies to rejoice They joy or rejoice in the success of their plans; in their triumphs over thy servant and over his people.

Psalm 89:43. Thou hast also turned the edge of his sword That is, Thou hast turned it away, so that when it is raised to strike, it does not descend on the object aimed at by the blow. The meaning is, that he had not been successful in battle, or had been defeated.

And hast not made him to stand in the battle To stand firm; to hold his ground. He has been driven back; his forces have fled.

Psalm 89:44. Thou hast made his glory to cease Margin, "brightness." Luther, "Thou destroyest his purity." The original word means brightness, splendour. The literal translation here would be, "Thou causest to cease from being brightness;" that is, Thou hast taken away from his brightness, so that it is gone. The allusion is to the splendor, the glory, the magnificence connected with his rank as king. This had been destroyed, or had come to nought.

And cast his throne down to the ground See Psalm 89:39.

Psalm 89:45. The days of his youth hast thou shortened This does not mean that he had shortened his life, but that he had abbreviated the period of his vigor, his hope, and his prosperity; instead of lengthening out these, and prolonging them into advancing years, he had by calamities, disappointments, reverses, and troubles, as it were, abridged them. No such youthful vigor, no such youthful hope now remained. The feelings of age — the cutting off from the world — had come suddenly upon him, even before he had reached the season when this might be expected to occur.

Though at a time of life and in circumstances when he might have hoped for a longer continuance of that youthful vigor, he had suddenly been brought into the sad condition of an old man.

Thou hast covered him with shame Hast clothed him with shame or disgrace. Everything in his circumstances and in his appearance indicates shame and disgrace, and the divine displeasure.

<sup><8846></sup>Psalm 89:46. How long, LORD? How long is this to continue? Can it be that this is to continue always? Is there to be no change for the better? Are the promises which have been made, never to be fulfilled? Compare the notes at <sup><4930></sup>Psalm 13:1; 77:7-9.

Wilt thou hide thyself for ever? Thy favor. Wilt thou never come forth and manifest thyself as the Helper of those who trust in thee?

Shall thy wrath burn like fire? Fire which entirely consumes; fire which never ceases as long as there is anything to burn; fire which never puts itself out, but which wholly destroys that on which it preys.

<sup><8847></sup>Psalm 89:47. Remember how short my time is The word rendered “time” — dl j, <sup><12465></sup> — means duration; lifetime. <sup><4930></sup>Psalm 39:5. Then it means life; time; age; the world. Literally, here, “Remember; I; what duration.” The meaning is plain. Bear in remembrance that my time must soon come to an end. Life is brief. In a short period the time will come for me to die; and if these promises are fulfilled to me, it must be done soon. Remember that these troubles and sorrows cannot continue for a much longer period without exhausting all my appointed time upon the earth. If God was ever to interpose and bless him, it must be done speedily, for he would soon pass away. The promised bestowment of favor must be conferred soon, or it could not be conferred at all. The psalmist prays that God would remember this. So it is proper for us to pray that God would bless us soon; that he would not withhold his grace now; that there may be no delay; that he would (we may say it with reverence) bear in remembrance that our life is very brief, and that if grace is to be bestowed in order to save us, or in order to make us useful, it must be bestowed soon. A young man may properly employ this prayer; how much more appropriately one who is rapidly approaching old age, and the end of life!

Wherefore hast thou made all men in vain? As thou dost seem to have done, since they accomplish so little in the world, and since so many appear wholly to miss the great purpose of life! Nothing, in certain moods of mind, will strike one more forcibly or more painfully than the thought that the mass of people seem to have been made in vain. Nothing is accomplished by them worthy of the powers with which they are endowed; nothing worthy of so long living for; nothing worthy of the efforts which they actually put forth. In a large portion of mankind there is an utter failure in securing even the objects which they seek to secure; in numerous cases, when they have secured the object, it is not worth the effort which it has cost; in all cases, the same effort, or an effort made less strenuous, laborious, costly, and continuous, would have secured an object of real value — worth all their effort — the immortal crown!

Psalm 89:48. What man is he that liveth, and shall not see death?

Shall not die — to see death being an expression often used to denote death itself. Death is represented as a real object, now invisible, but which will make itself visible to us when we die. The meaning here is, “All men are mortal; this universal law must apply to kings as well as to other men; in a short time he to whom these promises pertain will pass away from the earth; and the promises made to him cannot then be fulfilled.”

Shall he deliver his soul from the hand of the grave? His life. Will he be able to deliver that from the power of the grave; in Hebrew, לְוַאֲבִי<sup>sh7585</sup>. Death — the grave — Sheol — asserts a universal dominion over mankind, and no one can be rescued from that stern power.

Psalm 89:49. Lord, where are thy former loving-kindnesses Thy mercies; thy pledges; thy promises. Where are those promises which thou didst make formerly to David? Are they accomplished? Or are they forgotten and disregarded? They seem to be treated as a thing of nought; as if they had not been made. He relied on them; but they are not now fulfilled.

Which thou swarest unto David Which thou didst solemnly promise, even with the implied solemnity of an oath.

In thy truth Pledging thy veracity.

Psalm 89:50. Remember, Lord, the reproach of thy servants

Remember this, so as to cause it to pass away; he not forgetful or unmindful of this. Compare Psalm 89:47. The psalmist desired that all this might be before the mind of God as a reason why he should help him.

These promises had been made to David and his people. They had relied on them, and they were now reproached as having trusted to promises which had never been made. This reproach was consequent on what seemed to be the failure to fulfill those promises; and as this reproach came upon God, and was a reflection on his fidelity, the psalmist prays that he would allow it to come before him.

How I do bear in my bosom the reproach of all the mighty people literally, “I bear in my bosom all the many people.” That is, everything that pertained to them came upon him. All their troubles; all their reverses; all their complaints; all their murmurings, seemed to come upon him. He was held responsible for everything pertaining to them; all this pressed upon his heart. Compare the bitter complaint of Moses in <sup><04111></sup>Numbers 11:11-15. The phrase “to bear in the bosom” here, is equivalent to bearing it on the heart. Trouble, anxiety, care, sorrow, seem to press on the heart, or fill the bosom with distressing emotions, and lay on it a heavy burden. The allusion here is not merely to reproach, but the meaning is that everything pertaining to the people came on him, and it crushed him down. The burdens of his own people, as well as the reproaches of all around him, came upon him; and he felt that he was not able to bear it.

<sup><086></sup>Psalm 89:51. Wherewith thine enemies have reproached, O LORD Have reproached thee and me. Wherewith they reproach thy character and cause, and reproach me for having trusted to promises which seem not to be fulfilled. As the representative of thy cause, I am compelled to bear all this, and it breaks my heart.

Wherewith they have reproached the footsteps of thine anointed Of myself, as the anointed king. They have reproached my footsteps; that is, they have followed me with reproaches — treading along behind me. Wherever I go, wherever I put my foot down in my wanderings, I meet this reproach.

<sup><086></sup>Psalm 89:52. Blessed be the LORD for evermore Praise to God always. So Chrysostom was accustomed to say, even when driven out as an exile and a wanderer, “Blessed be God for everything.” The passage here denotes entire acquiescence in God; perfect confidence in him; a belief that he was right, and faithful, and true. It is an instance of the faith which those who are truly pious have in God, in all circumstances, and at all times; of their belief that he is worthy of entire confidence, and ought always to be praised. Compare <sup><0021></sup>Job 1:21. At the close of all kinds of trouble — and in the midst of all kinds of trouble — true piety will enable us to say, “BLESSED BE GOD.”

APPENDIX NOTES ON PSALM 89

There is a very obvious and important observation to be made on the description of the apparent change that had taken place in the conduct of God toward the family and descendants of David. The extraordinary promises which had been given to that prince were certainly not accomplished in the fortunes of his descendants, the kings of Judah; nor shall we be able to discover how the truth of these promises is to be sustained without an admission of their being given in reference to the Messiah, that spiritual King, who “was born of the seed of David according to the flesh.” When we take the assurances which were made to David, and which pledged to him the perpetuity of his kingdom in this sense, the mystery is disclosed, and the difficulty is completely removed: “the loving-kindness of God has not been withdrawn from him, nor has his faithfulness failed.” David has still a royal successor, though the genealogy of his posterity is lost upon earth; a successor who will endure forever, and whose throne will be perpetuated in glory, not merely as long as the sun and the moon continue, but will still be rising in splendor, when these lights of heaven shall be extinguished, and the new heavens and the new earth shall witness the imperishable glories of the Son of David. — Walford.

~~<1880>~~ Psalm 89:30-33. If his children forsake my law ... In ~~<1880>~~ Psalm 89:30,31 the strongest possible descriptions of sin are designedly chosen in order to express the thought that the substance of the covenant is altogether independent of human conditions, that even the greatest unfaithfulness on the part of man does not alter the faithfulness of God. In ~~<1880>~~ Psalm 89:32 the words themselves do by no means convey the idea of a slight punishment; and neither can this be said of the fundamental passage, ~~<1074>~~ 2 Samuel 7:14,

“If he (the seed of David, his race) errs, I will visit him with the rod of men, and with the stripes of the children of men,” that is, with such punishments as all people (because all are sinners) are exposed to, grace shall not remove him from this the common lot of people, he has no commission to sin, contrary to ~~<1213>~~ Proverbs 23:13,14, “Withdraw not thy son from chastisement; if thou smitest him with the rod he shall not die, and thou shalt deliver his soul from hell.”

The alleviating limitation is here first given in ~~<1083>~~ Psalm 89:33, as it is in the fundamental passage in ~~<1085>~~ Psalm 89:15. The alleviation, however, is not to be misunderstood as if it referred to individuals contrary to the nature of the thing, and contrary to the history, according to which annihilating judgments did descend upon the rebellious members of the family of David; but the opposition is of the punishment of sin in the individual, and of grace continually remaining to the family. We must not fail to notice that in ~~<1083>~~ Psalm 89:33 it is not said: I will not withdraw my mercy from them, the sinners, but from him, the family as such. Now that the kingdom has passed from the sinful to the holy seed of David, the direct application of this paragraph has ceased. The case provided for in the promise cannot again occur. Still there exists between Christ and his church a case analogous to that between David and his seed. As David's family was chosen in him (compare ~~<1113>~~ 1 Kings 11:36; ~~<1189>~~ 2 Kings 8:19; ~~<2375>~~ Isaiah 37:35; ~~<4162>~~ 2 Chronicles 6:42), so that it always remained in possession of the favor of God, notwithstanding the fall and rejection of many of its individual members, in like manner the church is chosen in Christ, and the sins of its members may hurt themselves but cannot injure it. Notwithstanding the fall of a whole generation, it always flourishes again, and under the most inexorable judgments which are not removed by the appearance of Christ, but rendered more severe, compassionate grace is always concealed. — Hengstenberg.

NOTES ON PSALM 90

This psalm is one of the most remarkable in the whole collection. It is said, in the title, to be “A Prayer of Moses, the man of God;” or, as it is in the margin, “being a Psalm of Moses.” The original word — hLpīl <sup>Th8605</sup> — means properly

- (1) intercession, supplication for anyone;
- (2) prayer or supplication in general;
- (3) a hymn or inspired song.

Gesenius, Lexicon. In <sup><19721></sup>Psalm 72:20, the word is applied to the whole preceding part of the Book of Psalms — “The prayers of David, the son of Jesse, are ended.” The word “prayer” would better represent the nature of the contents of this psalm than the word “psalm,” or “hymn.”

If the author was Moses, then this is the only one of his compositions which we have in the Book of Psalms. We know, from not a few places in the Pentateuch, that Moses was a poet as well as a lawgiver and statesman; and it would not be improbable that there might have been some compositions of his of this nature which were not incorporated in the five books that he wrote, and which would be likely to be preserved by tradition. This psalm bears internal evidence that it may have been such a composition. There is no local allusion which would make it necessary to suppose that it was written at a later period; there is nothing inconsistent with the sentiments and style of Moses in the Pentateuch; there is much that is in accordance with his style and manner; and there were numerous occasions when the sentiments of the psalm would be exceedingly suitable to the circumstances in which he was, and to the train of thoughts which we may suppose to have passed through his mind. The following remarks of Prof. Alexander seem to me to be eminently just and appropriate: “The correctness of the title which ascribes the psalm to Moses is confirmed by its unique simplicity and grandeur; its appropriateness to his times and circumstances; its resemblance to the law in urging the connection between sin and death; its similarity of diction to the poetical portions of the Pentateuch, without the slightest trace of imitation or quotation; its marked unlikeness to the Psalms of David, and still more to those of later date; and finally the proved impossibility of plausibly assigning it to any other age or author.” As a relic thus of most ancient times — as coming down from the most remarkable man in the Jewish history, if not in the world — as well as for its own instructive beauty and appropriateness to all times and lands — it is a composition of great interest and value.

This psalm is placed at the beginning of the fourth book of the Psalter, according to the ancient traditional division of the Psalms. Or, perhaps, the author of the arrangement — probably Ezra — designed to place this “by itself” between the two great divisions of the book, containing respectively the earlier and the later psalms. It may be regarded, therefore, as “the heart or center of the whole collection,” suggesting thoughts appropriate to the entire current of thought in the book.

The phrase, “the man of God,” in the title, is given to Moses in <sup><1631></sup>Deuteronomy 33:1; <sup><1646></sup>Joshua 14:6; <sup><1578></sup>Ezra 3:2; as a title especially appropriate to him, denoting that he was faithful to God; that he was a man approved by God. The title is indeed given to others, <sup><1716></sup>Judges 13:6,8; <sup><1027></sup>1 Samuel 2:27; 9:6-8; <sup><1122></sup>1 Kings 12:22, et al.; but there was a special appropriateness in the title as given to Moses on account of his character, his eminent rank, and his influence in founding the Hebrew commonwealth.

It is impossible, of course, now to determine the time when the psalm was composed, but it may not improbably be supposed to have been near the close of the wanderings in the wilderness. The Hebrew people were about to enter the promised land; the generation that came out of Egypt was passing away; Moses himself felt that he was near the end of his course, for he had been apprized that he could not enter the land of promise to the borders of which he had conducted the people. These things were eminently suited to suggest such views of the shortness of human life, and of its frailty, as are here presented. At the same time, all these circumstances were suited to suggest the reference to the future, and the prayer in respect to that future, with which the psalm so beautifully closes. It seems, then, not improper to regard this psalm as one of the last utterances of Moses, when the wanderings of the Hebrew people were about to cease; when an entire generation had been swept off; and when his own labors were soon to close.

The main subject of the psalm is the brevity — the transitory nature — of human life; the reflections on which seem designed to lead the soul up to God, who does not die. The races of people are cut down like grass, but God remains the same from age to age. One generation finds him the same as the previous generation had found him — unchanged, and as worthy of confidence as ever. None of these changes can affect him, and there is in each age the comforting assurance that he will be found to be the refuge, the support, the “dwelling-place” of his people.

The psalm consists of the following parts:

I. The fact that God is unchanging; that he is the refuge of his people, and always has been; that from the eternity past to the eternity to come, he is the same — he alone is God, <sup><9901></sup>Psalm 90:1,2.

II. The frailty of man — the brevity of human life — as contrasted with this unchanging nature — this eternity — of God, <sup><9903></sup>Psalm 90:3-11. Man is turned to destruction; he is carried away as with a flood; his life is like a night’s sleep; the human race is like grass which is green in the morning and is cut down at evening; — human existence is like a tale that is told — brief as a meditation — and narrowed down to threescore years and ten.

III. A prayer that the living might be able so to number their days — to take such an account of life as to apply the heart to wisdom; — to make the most of life, or to be truly wise, <sup><9902></sup>Psalm 90:12.

IV. A prayer for those who were to follow — for the coming generation — that God would continue his favors; that though the present generation must die, yet that God, who is unchanging and eternal, would meet the next generation, and all the generations to come, with the same mercies and blessings, enjoyed by those who went before them — prolonging these to all future time, <sup><9903></sup>Psalm 90:13-17.

The psalm, therefore, has a universal applicability. Its sentiments and its petitions are as appropriate now as they were in the time of Moses. The generations of people pass away as certainly and as rapidly now as they did then; but it is as true now as it was then, that God is unchanging, and that he is the “dwelling-place” — the home — of his people.

Thou hast been our dwelling-place The Septuagint renders this, “refuge” — καταφυγη <sup><5437></sup>. So the Latin Vulgate, “refugium;” and Luther, “Zuflucht.” The Hebrew word — מִקְוֵה, <sup><4583></sup> — means properly a habitation, a dwelling, as of God in his temple, <sup><4218></sup> Psalm 26:8; heaven, <sup><4915></sup> Psalm 68:5; <sup><6315></sup> Deuteronomy 26:15. It also means a den or lair for wild beasts, <sup><4122></sup> Nahum 2:12; <sup><4911></sup> Jeremiah 9:11. But here the idea seems to be, as in the Septuagint, Vulgate, and Luther, “a refuge”; a place to which one may come as to his home, as one does from a journey; from wandering; from toil; from danger: a place to which such a one naturally resorts, which he loves, and where he feels that he may rest secure. The idea is, that a friend of God has that feeling in respect to Him, which one has toward his own home — his abode — the place which he loves and calls his own.

In all generations Margin, “generation and generation.” That is, A succeeding generation has found him to be the same as the previous generation had. He was unchanged, though the successive generations of men passed away.

<sup><4912></sup> Psalm 90:2. Before the mountains were brought forth Before the earth brought forth or produced the mountains. In the description of the creation it would be natural to represent the mountains as the first objects that appeared, as emerging from the waters; and, therefore, as the “first” or “most ancient” of created objects. The phrase, therefore, is equivalent to saying, Before the earth was created. The literal meaning of the expression, “were brought forth,” is, in the Hebrew, “were born.” The mountains are mentioned as the most ancient things in creation, in <sup><6315></sup> Deuteronomy 33:15. Compare <sup><01425></sup> Genesis 49:26; <sup><3706></sup> Habakkuk 3:6.

Or ever thou hadst formed literally, “hadst brought forth.” Compare <sup><8301></sup> Job 39:1.

The earth and the world The word “earth” here is used to denote the world as distinguished either from heaven (<sup><0001></sup> Genesis 1:1), or from the sea (<sup><0010></sup> Genesis 1:10). The term “world” in the original is commonly employed to denote the earth considered as “inhabited,” or as capable of being inhabited — a dwelling place for living beings.

Even from everlasting to everlasting From duration stretching backward without limit to duration stretching forward without limit; that is, from eternal ages to eternal ages; or, forever.

Thou art God Or, “Thou, O God.” The idea is, that he was always, and ever will be, God: the God; the true God; the only God; the unchangeable God. At any period in the past, during the existence of the earth, or the heavens, or before either was formed, he existed, with all the attributes essential to Deity; at any period in the future — during the existence of the earth and the heavens, or beyond — far as the mind can reach into the future, and even beyond that — he will still exist unchanged, with all the attributes of Deity. The creation of the universe made no change in him; its destruction would not vary the mode of his existence, or make him in any respect a different being. There could not be a more absolute and unambiguous declaration, as there could not be one more sublime, of the eternity of God. The mind cannot take in a grander thought than that there is one eternal and immutable Being.

Psalm 90:3. Thou turnest man to destruction In contradistinction from his own unchangeableness and eternity. Man passes away; God continues ever the same. The word rendered “destruction” — akDæ <sup>ak1793</sup> — means properly anything beaten or broken small or very fine, and hence, “dust.” The idea here is, that God causes man to return to dust; that is, the elements which compose the body return to their original condition, or seem to mingle with the earth. ak1793 Genesis 3:19: “Dust thou art, and unto dust shalt thou return.” The word “man” here, of course, refers to man in general — all people. It is the great law of our being. Individual man, classes of people, generations of people, races of people, pass away; but God remains the same. The Septuagint and the Latin Vulgate render this, “Thou turnest man to “humiliation;” which, though not the sense of the original, is a true idea, for there is nothing more humiliating than that a human body, once so beautiful, should turn back to dust; nothing more humbling than the grave.

And sayest, Return, ye children of men Return to your dust; go back to the earth from which you came. Return, all of you without exception; — kings, princes, nobles, warriors, conquerors; mighty people, captains, and counselors; ye learned and great, ye honored and flattered, ye beautiful and happy, ye youthful and vigorous, and ye aged and venerable; whatever is your rank, whatever are your possessions, whatever are your honors, whatever you have to make you lovely, to charm, to please, to be admired; or whatever there is to make you loathsome and detestable; ye vicious, ye profane, low, grovelling, sensual, debased; go all of you alike to “dust!”

Oh, how affecting the thought that this is the lot of man; how much should it do to abase the pride of the race; how much should it do to make any man sober and humble, that he himself is soon to turn back to dust — unhonored, undistinguished, and undistinguishable dust!

Psalm 90:4. For a thousand years in thy sight Hebrew, “In thy eyes;” that is, It so appears to thee — or, a thousand years so seem to thee, however long they may appear to man. The utmost length to which the life of man has reached — in the case of Methuselah — was nearly a thousand years (<sup><0052></sup>Genesis 5:27); and the idea here is, that the longest human life, even if it should be lengthened out to a thousand years, would be in the sight of God, or in comparison with his years, but as a single day.

Are but as yesterday when it is past Margin, “he hath passed them.” The translation in the text, however, best expresses the sense. The reference is to a single day, when we call it to remembrance. However long it may have appeared to us when it was passing, yet when it is gone, and we look back to it, it seems short. So the longest period of human existence appears to God.

And as a watch in the night This refers to a portion of the night — the original idea having been derived from the practice of dividing the night into portions, during which a watch was placed in a camp. These watches were, of course, relieved at intervals, and the night came to be divided, in accordance with this arrangement, into parts corresponding with these changes. Among the ancient Hebrews there were only three night-watches; the first, mentioned in <sup><2129></sup>Lamentations 2:19; the middle, mentioned in <sup><0079></sup>Judges 7:19; and the third, mentioned in <sup><2144></sup>Exodus 14:24; <sup><0911></sup>1 Samuel 11:11. In later times — the times referred to in the New Testament — there were four such watches, after the manner of the Romans, <sup><4135></sup>Mark 13:35. The idea here is not that such a watch in the night would seem to pass quickly, or that it would seem short when it was gone, but that a thousand years seemed to God not only short as a day when it was past, but even as the parts of a day, or the divisions of a night when it was gone.

Psalm 90:5. Thou carriest them away as with a flood The original here is a single verb with the suffix — præ<sup><4229></sup>. The verb — præ<sup><4229></sup> — means, to flow, to pour; then, to pour upon, to overwhelm, to wash away. The idea is, that they were swept off as if a torrent bore them from the earth, carrying them away without regard to order, rank, age, or condition.

So death makes no discrimination. Every day that passes, multitudes of every age, sex, condition, rank, are swept away and consigned to the grave — as they would be if a raging flood should sweep over a land.

They are as a sleep The original here is, “a sleep they are.” The whole sentence is exceedingly graphic and abrupt: “Thou sweepest them away; a sleep they are — in the morning — like grass — it passes away.” The idea is that human life resembles a sleep, because it seems to pass so swiftly; to accomplish so little; to be so filled with dreams and visions, none of which remain or become permanent.

In the morning they are like grass which groweth up A better translation of this would be to attach the words “in the morning to the previous member of the sentence, “They are like sleep in the morning;” that is, They are as sleep appears to us in the morning, when we wake from it — rapid, unreal, full of empty dreams. The other part of the sentence then would be, “Like grass, it passeth away.” The word rendered “groweth up,” is in the margin translated “is changed.” The Hebrew word — āl jē<sup>12498</sup> — means to pass, to pass along, to pass by; to pass on, to come on; also, to revive or flourish as a plant; and then, to change. It may be rendered here, “pass away;” and the idea then would be that they are like grass in the fields, or like flowers, which soon “change” by passing away. There is nothing more permanent in man than there is in the grass or in the flowers of the field.

Psalm 90:6. In the morning it flourisheth This does not mean that it grows with any special vigor or rapidity in the morning, as if that were illustrative of the rapid growth of the young; but merely that, in fact, in the morning it is green and vigorous, and is cut down in the short course of a day, or before evening. The reference here is to grass as an emblem of man.

And groweth up The same word in the Hebrew which is used in the close of the previous verse.

In the evening it is cut down, and withereth In the short period of a day. What was so green and flourishing in the morning, is, at the close of the day, dried up. Life has been arrested, and death, with its consequences, has ensued. So with man. How often is this literally true, that those who are strong, healthy, vigorous, hopeful, in the morning, are at night pale, cold, and speechless in death! How striking is this as an emblem of man in general: so soon cut down; so soon numbered with the dead. Compare the notes at <sup>2406</sup>Isaiah 40:6-8; <sup>40124</sup>1 Peter 1:24,25.

Psalm 90:7. For we are consumed by thine anger That is, Death — the cutting off of the race of man — may be regarded as an expression of thy displeasure against mankind as a race of sinners. The death of man would not have occurred but for sin (<sup>OKB3</sup>Genesis 3:3,19; <sup>EB12</sup>Romans 5:12); and all the circumstances connected with it — the fact of death, the dread of death, the pain that precedes death, the paleness and coldness and rigidity of the dead, and the slow and offensive returning to dust in the grave — all are adapted to be, and seem designed to be, illustrations of the anger of God against sin. We cannot, indeed, always say that death in a specific case is proof of the direct and special anger of God “in that case;” but we can say that death always, and death in its general features, may and should be regarded as an evidence of the divine displeasure against the sins of people.

And by thy wrath As expressed in death.

Are we troubled Are our plans confounded and broken up; our minds made sad and sorrowful; our habitations made abodes of grief.

Psalm 90:8. Thou hast set our iniquities before thee Thou hast arrayed them, or brought them forth to view, as a “reason” in thy mind for cutting us down. Death may be regarded as proof that God has brought before his mind the evidence of man’s guilt, and has passed sentence accordingly. The fact of death at all; the fact that anyone of the race dies; the fact that human life has been made so brief, is to be explained on the supposition that God has arrayed before his own mind the reality of human depravity, and has adopted this as an illustration of his sense of the evil of guilt.

Our secret sins literally, “our secret;” or, that which was concealed or unknown. This may refer to the secret or hidden things of our lives, or to what has been concealed in our own bosoms; and the meaning may be, that God has judged in the case not by external appearances, or by what is seen by the world, but by what “he” has seen in the heart, and that he deals with us according to our real character. The reference is, indeed, to sin, but sin as concealed, hidden, forgotten; the sin of the heart; the sin which we have endeavored to hide from the world; the sin which has passed away from our own recollection.

In the light of thy countenance Directly before thee; in full view; so that thou canst see them all. In accordance with these, thou judgest man, and hence, his death.

<910> Psalm 90:9. For all our days are passed away in thy wrath Margin, “turned.” The Hebrew word — hnp,<sup><h6437></sup> — means to “turn;” then, to turn to or “from” anyone; and hence, to turn away as if to flee or depart. Here it means that our days seem to turn from us; to give the back to us; to be unwilling to remain with us; to leave us. This seems to be the fruit or result of the anger of God, as if he were unwilling that our days should attend us any longer. Or, it is as if he took away our days, or caused them to turn away, because he was angry and was unwilling that we should any longer enjoy them. The cutting off of life in any manner is a proof of the divine displeasure; and in every instance death should be regarded as a new illustration of the fact that the race is guilty.

We spend our years as a tale that is told Margin, “meditation.” The Hebrew word — hgh,<sup><h1899></sup> — means properly

- (a) a muttering, or growling, as of thunder;
- (b) a sighing or moaning;
- (c) a meditation, thought.

It means here, evidently, thought; that is, life passes away as rapidly as thought. It has no permanency. It makes no impression. Thought is no sooner come than it is gone. So rapid, so fleeting, so unsubstantial is life. The Septuagint and the Latin Vulgate in some unaccountable way render this “as a spider.” The translation in our common version, “as a tale that is told,” is equally unauthorized, as there is nothing corresponding to this in the Hebrew. The image in the original is very striking and beautiful. Life passes with the rapidity of thought!

<900> Psalm 90:10. The days of our years Margin, “As for the days of our years, in them are seventy years.” Perhaps the language would better be translated: “The days of our years! In them are seventy years;” or, they amount to seventy years. Thus the psalmist is represented as reflecting on human life — on the days that make up the years of life; — as fixing his thought on those days and years, and taking the sum of them. The days of our years — what are they?

Are threescore years and ten Not as life originally was, but as it has been narrowed down to about that period; or, this is the ordinary limit of life. This passage proves that the psalm was written when the life of man had been shortened, and had been reduced to about what it is at present; for this description will apply to man now. It is probable that human life was gradually diminished until it became fixed at the limit which now bounds it, and which is to remain as the great law in regard to its duration upon the earth. All animals, as the horse, the mule, the elephant, the eagle, the raven, the bee, the butterfly, have each a fixed limit of life, wisely adapted undoubtedly to the design for which they were made, and to the highest happiness of the whole. So of man. There can be no doubt that there are good reasons — some of which could be easily suggested — why his term of life is no longer. But, at any rate, it is no longer; and in that brief period he must accomplish all that he is to do in reference to this world, and all that is to be done to prepare him for the world to come. It is obvious to remark that man has enough to do to fill up the time of his life; that life to man is too precious to be wasted.

And if by reason of strength ... If there be unusual strength or vigor of natural constitution; or if the constitution has not been impaired or broken by toil, affliction, or vicious indulgence; or if the great laws of health have been understood and observed. Any of these causes may contribute to lengthen out life — or they may all be combined; and under these, separately or combined, life is sometimes extended beyond its ordinary limits. Yet the period of seventy is the ordinary limit beyond which few can go; the great mass fall long before they reach that.

Yet is their strength Hebrew, “Their pride.” That of which a man who has reached that period might be disposed to boast — as if it were owing to himself. There is, at that time of life, as well as at other times, great danger lest that which we have received from God, and which is in no manner to be traced to ourselves, may be an occasion of pride, as if it were our own, or as if it were secured by our own prudence, wisdom, or merit. May it not, also, be implied here that a man who has reached that period of life — who has survived so many others — who has seen so many fall by imprudence, or vice, or intemperance — will be in special danger of being proud, as if it were by some special virtue of his own that his life had been thus lengthened out? Perhaps in no circumstances will the danger of pride be more imminent than when one has thus passed safely through dangers where others have fallen, and practiced temperance while others have yielded to habits of intemperance, and taken care of his own health while others have neglected theirs. The tendency to pride in man does not die out because a man grows old.

Labour and sorrow The word rendered “labour” — l m<sup>[h5999]</sup> — means properly “toil;” that is, wearisome labor. The idea here is, that toil then becomes burdensome; that the body is oppressed with it, and soon grows weary and exhausted; that life itself is like labor or wearisome toil. The old man is constantly in the condition of one who is weary; whose powers are exhausted; and who feels the need of repose. The word rendered “sorrow” — wā<sup>[h205]</sup> — means properly “nothingness, vanity;” <sup>[2342]</sup>Isaiah 41:29; <sup>[3802]</sup>Zechariah 10:2; then, nothingness as to worth, unworthiness, iniquity — which is its usual meaning; <sup>[0221]</sup>Numbers 23:21; <sup>[3321]</sup>Job 36:21; <sup>[2313]</sup>Isaiah 1:13; and then, evil, adversity, calamity; <sup>[1218]</sup>Proverbs 22:8; <sup>[0518]</sup>Genesis 35:18. This latter seems to be the meaning here. It is, that happiness cannot ordinarily be found at that period of life; that to lengthen out life does not add materially to its enjoyment; that to do it, is but adding trouble and sorrow. The ordinary hopes and plans of life ended; the companions of other years departed; the offices and honors of the world in other hands; a new generation on the stage that cares little for the old one now departing; a family scattered or in the grave; the infirmities of advanced years on him; his faculties decayed; the buoyancy of life gone; and now in his second childhood dependent on others as he was in his first; how little of happiness is there in such a condition! How appropriate is it to speak of it as a time of “sorrow!” How little desirable is it for a man to reach extreme old age! And how kind and merciful the arrangement by which man is ordinarily removed from the world before the time of “trouble and sorrow” thus comes! There are commonly just enough people of extreme old age upon the earth to show us impressively that it is not “desirable” to live to be very old; just enough to keep this lesson with salutary force before the minds of those in earlier life; just enough, if we saw it aright, to make us willing to die before that period comes!

For it is soon cut off ... Prof. Alexander renders this, “For he drives us fast;” that is, God drives us — or, one seems to drive, or to urge us on. The word used here — zWC<sup>[h1468]</sup> — is commonly supposed to be derived from zzgac<sup>[h1494]</sup>, to cut, as to cut grass, or to mow; and then, to shear, sc. a flock — which is its usual meaning. Thus it would signify, as in our translation, to be cut off. This is the Jewish interpretation. The word, however, may be more properly regarded as derived from ZWG<sup><h1468></sup>, which occurs in but one other place, <0413>Numbers 11:31, where it is rendered “brought,” as applied to the quails which were brought or driven forward by the east wind. This word means, to pass through, to pass over, to pass away; and then, to cause to pass over, as the quails were (<0413>Numbers 11:31) by the east wind. So it means here, that life is soon passed over, and that we flee away, as if driven by the wind; as if impelled or urged forward as chaff or any light substance is by a gale.

<0911>*Psalm 90:11. Who knoweth the power of thine anger? Who can measure it, or take a correct estimate of it, as it is manifest in cutting down the race of people? If the removal of people by death is to be traced to thine anger — or is, in any proper sense, an expression of thy wrath — who can measure it, or understand it? The cutting down of whole generations of people — of nations — of hundreds of million of human beings — of the great, the powerful, the mighty, as well as the weak and the feeble, is an amazing exhibition of the “power” — of the might — of God; and who is there that can fully understand this? Who can estimate fully the wrath of God, if this is to be regarded as an expression of it? Who can comprehend what this is? Who can tell, after such an exhibition, what may be in reserve, or what further and more fearful displays of wrath there may yet be?

Even according to thy fear, so is thy wrath literally, “And according to thy fear, thy wrath.” The word rendered “fear” would here seem to refer to the “reverence” due to God, or to what there is in his character to inspire awe: to wit, his power, his majesty, his greatness; and the sense seems to be that his wrath or anger as manifested in cutting down the race seems to be commensurate with all in God that is vast, wonderful, incomprehensible. As no one can understand or take in the one, so no one can understand or take in the other. God is great in all things; great in himself; great in his power in cutting down the race; great in the expressions of his displeasure.

<0912>*Psalm 90:12. So teach us to number our days literally, “To number our days make us know, and we will bring a heart of wisdom.” The prayer is, that God would instruct us to estimate our days aright: their number; the rapidity with which they pass away; the liability to be cut down; the certainty that they must soon come to an end; their bearing on the future state of being.

That we may apply our hearts unto wisdom Margin, “Cause to come.” We will bring, or cause to come, a heart of wisdom. By taking a just account of life, that we may bring to it a heart truly wise, or act wisely in view of these facts. The prayer is, that God would enable us to form such an estimate of life, that we shall be truly wise; that we may be able to act “as if” we saw the whole of life, or as we should do if we saw its end. God sees the end — the time, the manner, the circumstances in which life will close; and although he has wisely hidden that from us, yet he can enable us to act as if we saw it for ourselves; to have the same objects before us, and to make as much of life, “as if” we saw when and how it would close. If anyone knew when, and where, and how he was to die, it might be presumed that this would exert an important influence on him in forming his plans, and on his general manner of life. The prayer is, that God would enable us to act “as if” we had such a view.

Psalm 90:13. Return, O LORD Come back to thy people; show mercy by sparing them. It would seem probable from this that the psalm was composed in a time of pestilence, or raging sickness, which threatened to sweep all the people away — a supposition by no means improbable, as such times occurred in the days of Moses, and in the rebellions of the people when he was leading them to the promised land.

How long? How long shall this continue? How long shall thy wrath rage? How long shall the people still fall under thy hand? This question is often asked in the Psalms. Psalm 4:2; 6:3; 13:1,2; 35:17; 79:5, et al.

And let it repent thee That is, Withdraw thy judgments, and be merciful, as if thou didst repent. God cannot literally “repent,” in the sense that he is sorry for what he has done, but he may act “as if” he repented; that is, he may withdraw his judgments; he may arrest what has been begun; he may show mercy where it seemed that he would only show wrath.

Concerning thy servants In respect to thy people. Deal with them in mercy and not in wrath.

Psalm 90:14. O satisfy us early with thy mercy literally, “In the morning;” as soon as the day dawns. Perhaps there is an allusion here to their affliction, represented as night; and the prayer is, that the morning — the morning of mercy and joy — might again dawn upon them.

That we may rejoice and be glad all our days All the remainder of our lives. That the memory of thy gracious interposition may go with us to the grave.

<9015> Psalm 90:15. Make us glad according to the days wherein thou hast afflicted us Let the one correspond with the other. Let our occasions of joy be measured by the sorrows which have come upon us. As our sufferings have been great, so let our joys and triumphs be.

And the years wherein we have seen evil Affliction and sorrow. They have been continued through many wearisome years; so let the years of peace and joy be many also.

<9016> Psalm 90:16. Let thy work appear unto thy servants That is, thy gracious work of interposition. Let us see thy power displayed in removing these calamities, and in restoring to us the days of health and prosperity.

And thy glory unto their children The manifestation of thy character; the display of thy goodness, of thy power, and thy grace. Let this spreading and wasting evil be checked and removed, so that our children may live, and may have occasion to celebrate thy goodness, and to record the wonders of thy love.

<9017> Psalm 90:17. And let the beauty of the LORD our God be upon us The word translated “beauty” —  $\mu\lambda\alpha\sigma\tau\eta\varsigma$ <sup><95278></sup> — means properly “pleasantness;” then, beauty, splendor; then grace or layout. The Septuagint renders it here,  $\lambda\alpha\mu\pi\rho\tau\eta\varsigma$ , “splendor;” and so the Latin Vulgate. The wish is clearly that all that there is, in the divine character, which is “beautiful,” which is suited to win the hearts of people to admiration, gratitude, and love — might be so manifested to them, or that they might so see the excellency of his character, and that his dealings with them might be such, as to keep the beauty, the loveliness, of that character constantly before them.

And establish thou the work of our hands upon us What we are endeavoring to do. Enable us to carry out our plans, and to accomplish our purposes.

Yea, the work of our hands establish thou it The repetition of the prayer here is emphatic. It indicates an intense desire that God would enable them to carry out their plans. If this was written by Moses, we may suppose that it is expressive of an earnest desire that they might reach the promised land; that they might not all be cut down and perish by the way; that the great object of their march through the wilderness might be accomplished; and that they might be permanently established in the land to which they were going. At the same time it is a prayer which it is proper to offer at any time, that God would enable us to carry out our purposes, and that we may be permanently established in his favor.

APPENDIX NOTES ON PSALM 90

“The Fourth Book of Psalms.” The Fourth Book of the Psalter numbers, like the Third Book, seventeen psalms. It comprises, along with the psalm of Moses, those of the last hundred years of the Jewish monarchy, up to the date of the Babylonian captivity. At what time they were collected and arranged in their present order there is no certain evidence to show; perhaps not until the days of Nehemiah, when the Fifth Book of the Psalter was also arranged, and the canon of Old Testament Scripture closed. Of the psalms composing the Fourth Book, Psalm 90 is entitled “A Prayer of Moses the Man of God;” Psalm 150; 103 bear the name of David; Psalm 102 is “A Prayer of the Afflicted,” etc. In the superscriptions of the rest there is no indication of the authorship; they are probably the productions of the sons of Asaph, who formed during this period the only surviving temple-choir.

These psalms do not reflect, to the same extent as those of Book III, the political events and vicissitudes of their period. They were all written (excepting, of course, the prayer of Moses) after the irrevocable doom of destruction upon Jerusalem for the wickedness of Manasseh had been solemnly pronounced. In consequence of that doom the expected full redemption of Israel and the glorification of the sovereignty of the house of David in the person of the promised Messiah were in the eyes of the people indefinitely deferred; and the continuity of progress to the future of glory being thus destroyed, the immediate political events of the times lost in great measure their prospective interest. Whatever impatient hopes the events of the reign of Hezekiah had served to nurture of a speedy fulfillment of God’s promises to Israel, must have yielded with many to the recklessness of despair and indifference; but mean. while the faith of the true servants of God was being disciplined, and their expectations spiritualized. Deeply prophetic as are many of the psalms on which we now enter, the result of the dissociation of the anticipations of the future from the contemplations of the present is that they depict the events of the future rather in their divine than in their human aspect; they speak not so much of the truth which should spring out of the earth as of the righteousness which should look down from heaven. These psalms have a freshness of their own; not the freshness of national youth, nor that of national rejuvenescence; but rather the freshness which will ever spring from solid depth of faith. They are the utterance of the traveler who, finding but little of interest in the long weary plain that extends around him, rejoices nevertheless in gazing on the glories of the distant hills; and, in the assurance that he will not fail to reach them in the end, contentedly plods on along his level road, aware that the journey, however dull, is necessary, and trusting that in the Lord even his present labors will not have been in vain. — Thrupp.

There is a very general concurrence in ascribing the ninetieth Psalm to Moses. The accuracy of the superscription is admitted by all the ancient versions, by Luther, Calvin, Fabricius, etc., by Tholuck, Delitzsch, Hengstenberg, Alexander, and Binnie, and by modern commentators generally. Even those who range themselves on the other side, such as Hupfeld and Ewald, seem to speak doubtfully, and admit that the internal evidence is of the strongest possible kind. We give one or two passages from distinguished writers on the side of the ascription to Moses:

“There are important internal reasons which may be urged in favor of the composition of the psalm by Moses, as announced in the title. The poem bears throughout the character of high antiquity; there is no other psalm which so decidedly conveys the impression of being the original expression of the feelings to which it gives utterance. There is, moreover, no other psalm which stands so much by itself, in regard to its fundamental tone and peculiarities, for which parallel passages furnish so little kindred matter in characteristic peculiarities. On the other hand, there occurs a series of striking allusions to the Pentateuch, especially to the poetical passages, and, above all others, to Deuteronomy 32 (compare the exposition), allusions which are of another kind than those which occur in other passages in the Psalms, and which do not bear like them the character of borrowing. Luther, in the following quotation, intimates that even here the deep seriousness of the lawgiver may be seen: ‘Just as Moses acts in teaching the law, so does he in this prayer. For he preaches death, sin, and condemnation, in order that he may alarm the proud who are secure in their sins, and that he may set before their eye their sin and evil, concealing, hiding nothing.’ The strong prominence given to the doctrine of death as the wages of sin is especially characteristic, a doctrine which is not of frequent occurrence in Scripture, and especially not so in the Psalms, and which is proclaimed as distinctly and impressively as it is here only in the Pentateuch, Genesis 2; 3, and in those ordinances of the ceremonial law which threaten death.

“The reasons which have been adduced against the composition of the psalm by Moses are of very little weight. The objection that <sup><1910></sup>Psalm 90:10, where the length of human life is limited to seventy, or, at the most, eighty years, stands opposed to <sup><1547></sup>Deuteronomy 34:7, according to which, Moses reached the age of 120, is disposed of by the remark, that Moses, throughout the whole psalm, does not speak in his own name, but in that of the people. It is obvious from <sup><1542></sup>Deuteronomy 14:22,23, that among the Israelites at that time the exceptions to the general rule, as to the duration of human life, were much fewer than at ordinary times. Koester’s assertion that <sup><1915></sup>Psalm 90:15 supposes a long period of suffering, and scarcely applies to the Israelites in the wilderness, who rather beheld the glorious deeds of Yahweh, is disposed of as soon as we direct our attention to ‘that terrible oath which God had flashed down upon them in Numbers 14.’ Eight-and-thirty years spent amidst the gradual destruction of people lying under the curse, were well suited to call forth the prayer, ‘Make us glad according to the days in which thou hast afflicted us, the years during which we have seen evil;’ they are sufficient to explain ‘the melancholy view of life’ which here meets us, and the dread earnestness ‘with which he instructs us of our melancholy necessities:’ no glass was more suitable than this for giving a view of the common condition of human life. Finally, the assertion that the psalm could not have been composed by Moses, because it resembles the other psalms in language and general poetical structure, is an a priori assertion, which may be met with at least as much force by another, that Moses, ‘the fountain out of which all the prophets have drunk divine wisdom,’ gave at first the tone no less for prophecy, Deuteronomy 32; 33, than for psalm poetry.” — Hengstenberg.

“Viewed with reference to its author, this psalm is the utterance of the feelings of the great prophet and lawgiver of Israel during his pilgrimage through the wilderness. It was probably written toward the end of the forty years’ wanderings (see <sup><1915></sup>Psalm 90:15); but its solemnity makes it more likely that it was the result of the long and habitual contemplations of Moses during those wanderings, than that it was occasioned by any single incident. The leading thought of the psalm is that to which vent is given in the first verse; that God is the eternal abiding-place of his people. This thought is first expanded in <sup><1912></sup>Psalm 90:2. ‘There is indeed,’ so runs the current of the prophet’s meditation — ‘an earth, which some might deem their home, and which, with all its ancient hills, might verily be called permanent as compared with the shortlived beings that inhabit it; for across its fields have flitted the living bodies, and beneath its soil have rested the bones of successive generations of people, who, from the swiftness with which they passed away, knew nothing of each other, though the earth meanwhile remained the same, and experienced no sensible change. Yet even this earth is itself but the thing of a day in comparison of Him whose infinity of existence no language can express, and who from everlasting to everlasting is God: it is therefore in the Creator, rather than in the creature, that we recognize our true abiding-place.’ In order further to illustrate the everlastingness and power of God, they are contrasted in <sup><1913></sup>Psalm 90:3-6 with the transitoriness of man; as also, in <sup><1917></sup>Psalm 90:7-11, with his misery, the result of the divine wrath upon his sin. <sup><1912></sup>Psalm 90:12, which stands in connection with the preceding, contains a short petition that by the contemplation of is own impotence man may acquire a heart of wisdom, so as to learn that God is his abiding-place indeed.” — Thrupp.

“This psalm is one of the oldest of the inspired utterances. It is the prayer which is read over the mortal dust of some hundreds of the children of men every week in London alone. And so used, none of us finds it antiquated. The lapse of 3000 years has not made it necessary to discard this clause and that. Words that described the relation of the children of Israel to the eternal God, serve still to express the devotion of English hearts turning to God in their sorrow. As these grand words are uttered, the curtain that hangs round our life seems to draw back, and we see beyond depths that we dreamed not of. From time and the slow succession of events, from the minutes and the hours that seem so long and so many, we turn to God, whose eternal nature was as it now is even when the world was formed, and to whom a thousand years are no more than the middle watch of the night is to a sound sleeper. Nations that seem established forever are carried off down the roaring cataract of time; men full of pride, and glory, and power, grow and perish like grass; and God alone remains unchangeable, the same yesterday, and today, and forever.” — the Archbishop of York’s sermons in Perowne.

“Three thousand years and more have passed away since the congregation of Israel made the solitudes of the wilderness vocal with the plaintive music of this ninetieth psalm. There is probably not another song now sung in any nation under heaven that possesses such a hoary antiquity. And yet there is about it the freshness of a perpetual youth. In what nation have God’s people ceased to employ it? It forms part of the English Order for the Burial of the Dead, and in all Christian nations is in one form or another devoted to a similar use. Moreover, as each new year comes round, bringing its train of saddening memories and summoning us to count our days, who does not turn to the prayer of Moses for the most adequate expression of the thoughts and feelings awakened by the season? In the Protestant churches of Hungary it is sung every New Year’s Day, and the same custom is widely prevalent in other countries. It is a solemnizing and stimulating thought, that when we lift up our voices to the Eternal in this psalm, we put ourselves into communion with the church of all generations and of every nation, we yield our hearts to the guidance of a song given three and thirty centuries ago by the inspiration of the Holy Spirit, and which has been a fountain of pensive comfort to God’s saints in all the hundred generations that have lived and died since its notes first awoke the echoes of the desert.” — Binnie.

<sup><991></sup>Psalm 90:11. Who knows the power of thine anger? even according to thy fear, so is thy wrath The English version is obscure. The common interpretation is that God's wrath is as terrible as any man apprehends it to be; that those fears of the Deity are not vain bugbears, but are most just, and are vindicated by the terrible effects of the divine wrath upon mankind. Or, God's wrath is equal to the apprehensions which the most thoughtful and serious people have of it. So Pool and Henry. The real meaning of the words seems to us best brought out, and the connection with the general subject of the psalm best maintained, by the translation of Hengstenberg, Alexander, and others, which unites the two clauses of the text; and makes of both one interrogation implying the strongest possible negation — "Who knows the power of thine anger, and according to thy fear, thy wrath?" According to thy fear then has the sense "as true piety or reverence for God demands." No one has a just sense of the divine wrath, or knows and feels it as it ought to be known and felt. We give the following from Hengstenberg, who quotes Luther largely:

On <sup><1901></sup>Psalm 90:11, Luther:

"From this point he shows why and for whose sake he had given this narrative, for the sake, namely, of unfeeling sinners, in order that they may be brought to a sense of their misery. For this is the greatest misery that we men live in such great manifold innumerable distresses, have such a short life, and are in perpetual danger, yea, certain prospect of eternal death, and yet do not feel all this, nor know it sufficiently. Who can sufficiently express such stupidity!"

The expression, "who knows the power of thy wrath," equivalent to "thy wrath as it is made known in the brevity of our existence, the power of death in all its strength," is in the first instance an expression of painful lamentation over the inconceivable blindness of men; it however, contains within it the heartfelt wish that it may be otherwise, and the prayer that God would alter it, which in <sup><1902></sup>Psalm 90:12 rises out of the lamentation. The [<sup><13045></sup>dæ there refers manifestly to the [<sup><13045></sup>dæ here. Luther:

"This complaint also contains a prayer in it. For Moses wishes that such pestilential security may be torn out of his heart, and out of the hearts of all people, and that all hearts may be animated by faith, so that men may believe that such a thing is true, and may be alarmed at such great wrath of God."

"As thy fear" is to be understood as equivalent to "in proportion as is demanded by that fear of thee, that piety which is becoming in thy people."

Several explain after the example of Venema: according to thy dreadfulness, according to the infinite measure of which in God, are his wrath against sin, and his punishment of sin. But the fear of God is a phrase of constant occurrence in the sense of “fear before God” (compare <sup><1825></sup>Deuteronomy 2:25; <sup><1807></sup>Psalms 5:7), and, on the other hand, there is only one passage which can be referred to in the sense of dreadfulness — namely, <sup><3018></sup>Ezekiel 1:18, a writer who supplies so many anomalous expressions, and even in this one passage, the above sense depends upon a false exposition, compare Gesenius Thesaurus — For what object the psalmist, in <sup><1902></sup>Psalms 90:12, wishes his days to be numbered, appears from the reference of the [<sup><3045></sup>dye] to the [<sup><3045></sup>dye] of the preceding verse, according to which, to number the days, and to know the wrath of God must be strictly connected together. May God, the sense is, lead us to lay rightly to heart the brevity of our life, thus cause us to know the greatness of his wrath, the depth of our corruption, and in this way lead us to repentance. Luther:

“Such a thing would never have come into my mind as to pray for this, if I had not seen that Moses prayed here for it with all earnestness and valor. For I thought that the hearts of all people were as full of fear and terror as mine is. But if we carefully examine we shall find there are scarcely ten in ten thousand moved by these things as they ought to be; all the others live as if there were no God and no death. This is the greatest misery, and the one to be most deeply deplored, that people even in death dream of life. There are certainly to be found some people of experience who feel this misery very severely without any such prayer, but the greater part do not feel it, for these generally live in such a way that they value their moment or life as if it were an eternal existence.” — Hengstenberg.

<sup><1902></sup>Psalm 90:12. So teach us to number our days ... The serious consideration of our lives’ frailty and shortness will confer to our right valuation (or esteem) of things, and consequently to our well-placing, and our duly moderating our cares, affections, and endeavors about them ... To begin with that which takes the chief place, which the world most dotes on, which seems most great and eminent among people; secular state and grandeur, might and prowess, honor and reputation, favor and applause of people, all the objects of human pride and ambition: of this kind Peter thus pronounces, "All the glory of people is as the flower of the grass; the grass is dried up, and the flower thereof doth fall off;" it is as the flower of the grass, how specious so ever, yet the most fading and failing part thereof; the grass itself will soon wither, and the flower doth commonly fall off before that. We cannot hold this flower of worldly glory beyond our short time of life; and we may easily much sooner be deprived of it: many tempests of fortune may beat it down, many violent hands may crop it; it is apt of itself to fade upon the stalk; however, the sun (the influence of age and time) will assuredly burn and dry it up, with our life that upholds it ... Perhaps, could it, without much care, trouble, and hazard, continue forever, or for a long time, it might be thought somewhat considerable: but since its duration is uncertain and short; since "man in honor abideth not, but is like the beasts that perish;" that they who look so "like gods," and are called so, and are worshipped as such, "yet must die like men, like men, yea like sheep shall be laid in the grave;" since, as it is said of the king of Babylon in Isaiah, "their pomp must be brought down to the grave;" seeing that a moment of time shall extinguish all their luster, and still all that tumult about them; that they must be disrobed of their purple, and be clothed with corruption; and that their so spacious and splendid palaces must soon be exchanged for close darksome coffins; that both their own breath and the breath of them who now applaud them, must be stopped; that they who now bow to them, may presently trample on them; and they who today trembled at their presence may the morrow scornfully insult their memory. "Is this the man" (will they say, as they did of that great king) "who made the earth to tremble, that did shake kingdoms; that made the world as a wilderness, and destroyed the kingdoms thereof?" Since this is the fate of the greatest and most glorious among men, what reason can there be to admire their condition, to prize such vain and shortlived pre-eminences? For who can account it a great happiness to be styled and respected as a prince, to enjoy all the powers and prerogatives of highest dignity for a day or two; then being obliged to descend into a sordid and despicable estate? Who values the fortune of him that is brought forth upon the stage to act the part of a prince; though he be attired there, and attended as such, hath all the garb and ceremony, the ensigns and appurtenances of majesty about him, speaks and behaves himself imperiously, is flattered and worshipped accordingly; yet who in his heart doth adore this idol, doth admire this mockery of greatness? Why not? Because, after an hour or two the play is over, and this man's reign is done. And what great difference is there between this and the greatest worldly state? Between Alexander in the history and Alexander on the stage? Are not (in the psalmist's account) "all our years spent as a tale that is told?" — Barrow, Sermons.

NOTES ON PSALM 91

The author of this psalm, and the occasion on which it was composed, are alike unknown. The psalm has no title; and there are no internal marks by which we can ascertain when, or by whom, it was written. It is very general in its application, and may have been composed with no particular reference to any event occurring at the time, as it is evident that it had no special reference to the circumstances of the writer. Though it follows a psalm composed by Moses, yet there is no reason to suppose that it was written by him, nor is there any particular resemblance to that psalm.

From some things in the psalm, as <sup><1910></sup>Psalm 91:3,4,5,9,11; it would appear to be not improbable that the psalm was composed with reference to some individual who was exposed to temptation, or to danger, either from secret enemies or from pestilence, and that it was intended to assure such an one that there was nothing to be feared if he put his trust in God. There is no evidence that it was designed to refer particularly to the Saviour. It is, indeed, applied to him by Satan in the temptation in the wilderness (<sup><1910></sup>Matthew 4:6); but there is, in that case, no such recognition of its applicability to himself on the part of the Saviour as to justify us in the conclusion that it originally referred to him. Its quotation by the tempter is no proof that this was the original reference of the psalm, and the quotation made is one which could be applied to him in the same way as any general premise in the Old Testament made to those who trusted in God might have been.

The most remarkable thing in the structure of the psalm is the frequent change of persons, leading some to suppose that it may have been composed with a view to its being sung by choirs in alternate responses, and Michaelis has suggested that there were probably two such choirs; the one — as in <sup><1910></sup>Psalm 91:1,2 — celebrating the praises of those who trusted in God; the other — as in <sup><1910></sup>Psalm 91:3-8 — exciting and encouraging the people to put their trust in God, and suggesting reasons why they should do it. Such a thing is, undoubtedly, possible; but the evidence that this was the intention of the author of the psalm is not clear.

Tholuck has divided the psalm, on the supposition that it was thus intended to be sung by alternate choirs, into portions arranged with that view:

the choir; <sup><1910></sup>Psalm 91:9, the response; <sup><1910></sup>Psalm 91:10-13, the choir; <sup><1914></sup>Psalm 91:14-16, the response. This, however, is quite arbitrary, as it cannot be demonstrated to have been the original design.

This arrangement, however, suggests a good division of the psalm:

I. The general statement of the safety of those who put their trust in God, <sup><1910></sup>Psalm 91:1.

II. A responsive declaration of the author of the psalm, that he would make the Lord his refuge, and the Most High his habitation, <sup><1910></sup>Psalm 91:2.

III. A statement of the security or benefit of doing this, <sup><1913></sup>Psalm 91:3-8.

IV. A responsive declaration — repeated — by the author of the psalm that he would do this; that God “was” his refuge, <sup><1910></sup>Psalm 91:9 (part first).

V. A further statement of the benefit of this, <sup><1910></sup>Psalm 91:10-13.

VI. A general declaration embracing the sum of all that is said in the psalm, as coming from God himself, containing assurances of his protection to those who thus put their trust in him, and confide in him, <sup><1914></sup>Psalm 91:14-16.

This mode of division meets substantially all the changes of “persons” in the psalm, or arranges the different portions of it into parts belonging to the different speakers in the psalm. There is reason to believe that this was the line of thought in the mind of the psalmist, though it is not clear that this was designed to be so used in public responses in singing.

<sup><1910></sup>Psalm 91:1. He that dwelleth Everyone that so dwells. The proposition is universal, and is designed to embrace all who are in this condition. It is true of one; it is true of all. The word rendered “dwelleth” here is a participle from the verb to “sit,” and here means “sitting:” literally, “sitting in the secret place,” etc. The idea is that of calm repose; of resting; of sitting down — as one does in his dwelling.

In the secret place On the meaning of this see the notes at <sup><1975></sup>Psalm 27:5. Compare <sup><1912></sup>Psalm 31:20; 32:7. Abiding where God abides. The idea is that of having one's home or residence in the most holy place in the tabernacle or the temple, and of sitting with him in that sacred place.

Of the Most High Of God, represented as exalted above all; over all the universe.

Shall abide Margin, as in Hebrew, "lodge." That is his home — his resting place — where he lodges, or passes the night. He takes up his lodging there; he makes it his home.

Under the shadow of the Almighty Under his protection, as if under his wings. Compare the notes at <sup><917B></sup>Psalm 17:8. This is a general statement, and is designed as an introduction to the whole psalm, or as expressing what the psalm is intended to illustrate, "the blessedness" of the man who thus dwells with God; who makes him his friend; who makes the home of God his home.

<sup><918B></sup>Psalm 91:2. I will say of the LORD I, the psalmist; I will take this to myself; I will endeavor to secure this blessedness; I will thus abide with God. In view of the blessedness of this condition, and with the hope of securing it to myself; I will adopt this resolution as the purpose of my life. It is what I need; it is what my soul desires.

My refuge and my fortress "I will say of Jehovah, My refuge and my fortress!" I will address him as such; I will regard him as such. On the meaning of these terms, see the notes at <sup><918D></sup>Psalm 18:2.

My God I will address him as my God; as the God whom alone I worship; as the only being to whom the name "God" can properly be applied; as being to me all that is implied in the word God.

In him will I trust I will repose that confidence in him which is evinced by making my home with him, and seeking permanently to dwell with him.

<sup><918E></sup>Psalm 91:3. Surely he shall deliver thee from the snare of the fowler The snare or gin set for catching birds; meaning, here, that God would save him from the purposes of wicked people; such purposes as might be compared with the devices employed to catch birds. On the meaning of the figure used here, see the notes at <sup><918E></sup>Psalm 18:5.

And from the noisome pestilence The "fatal" pestilence; the pestilence that spreads death in its march. That is, he can prevent its coming upon you; or, he can save you from its ravages, while others are dying around you. This promise is not to be understood as absolute, or as meaning that no one who fears God will ever fall by the pestilence — for good people “do” die at such times as well as bad people; but the idea is, that God “can” preserve us at such a time and that, as a great law, he will be thus the protector of those who trust him. It is to be remembered that in times of pestilence (as was the case during the prevalence of the Asiatic cholera in 1832 and 1848), very many of the victims are the intemperate, the sensual, the debased, and that a life of this kind is a predisposing cause of death in such visitations of judgment. A large part of those who die are of that number. From the danger arising from this cause, of course the virtuous, the temperate, the pious are exempt; and this is one of the methods by which God saves those who trust in him from the “noisome pestilence.” Religion, therefore, to a considerable extent, constitutes a ground of security at such times; nor is there any reason to doubt that, in many cases also, there may be a special interposition protecting the friends of God from danger, and sparing them for future usefulness. The promise here is substantially that general promise which we have in the Scriptures everywhere, that God is the Protector of his people, and that they may put their trust in him.

<sup><1914></sup>Psalm 91:4. He shall cover thee with his feathers ... As the parent bird protects its young. See the notes at <sup><1918></sup>Psalm 17:8. Compare <sup><1921></sup>Deuteronomy 32:11. “His truth.” His unfailing promise; the certainty that what he has promised to do he will perform.

Shall be thy shield and buckler literally, “Shield and buckler is his truth.” The meaning is, that his pledge or promise would be unto them as the shield of the soldier is to him in battle. Compare <sup><1931></sup>Psalm 35:2. The word rendered “buckler” is derived from the verb “to surround,” and is given to the defensive armor here referred to, because it “surrounds,” and thus “protects” a person. It may apply to a coat of mail.

<sup><1915></sup>Psalm 91:5. Thou shalt not be afraid for the terror by night That which usually causes alarm at night — a sudden attack; an unexpected incursion of enemies; sudden disease coming on by night; or the pestilence which seems to love night, and to “walk in darkness.” Any one of these things seems to be aggravated by night and darkness; and hence, we most dread them then. We cannot see their approach; we cannot measure their outlines; we know not the extent of the danger, or what may be the calamity.

Nor for the arrow that flieth by day Whether shot from the bow of God — as pestilence and disease; or from the hand of man in battle. The idea is, that he that trusts in God will be calm. Compare the notes at <sup><9906></sup>Psalm 56:3.

<sup><9906></sup>Psalm 91:6. Nor for the pestilence The plague or pestilence was common in Oriental countries.

That walketh in darkness Not that it particularly comes in the night, but that it seems to creep along as if in the night; that is, where one cannot mark its progress, or anticipate when or whom it will strike. The laws of its movements are unknown, and it comes upon people as an enemy that suddenly attacks us in the night.

Nor for the destruction The word used here — <sup>bfq</sup>,<sup><9986></sup> — means properly a cutting off, a destruction, as a destroying storm, <sup><9902></sup>Isaiah 28:2; and then, contagious pestilence, <sup><9924></sup>Deuteronomy 32:24. It may be applied here to anything that sweeps away people — whether storm, war, pestilence, or famine.

That wasteth at noonday It lays waste, or produces desolation, at noon; that is, visibly, openly. The meaning is, that whenever, or in whatever form, calamity comes which sweeps away the race — whether at midnight or at noon — whether in the form of pestilence, war, or famine — he who trusts in God need not — will not — be afraid. He will feel either that he will be preserved from its ravages, or that if he is cut off he has nothing to fear. He is a friend of God, and he has a hope of a better life. In death, and in the future world, there is nothing of which he should be afraid. The Septuagint and the Latin Vulgate render this, strangely enough, “Nor of mischance and the demon of noonday.”

And ten thousand at thy right hand Compare <sup><9916></sup>Psalm 3:6. The word “myriad” would better represent the exact idea in the original, as the Hebrew word is different from that which is translated “a thousand.” It is put here for any large number. No matter how many fall around thee, on the right hand and the left, you will have nothing to fear.

But it shall not come nigh thee You will be safe. You may feel assured of the divine protection. Your mind may be calm through a sense of such guardianship, and your very calmness will conduce to your safety. This refers, as remarked above, to a “general” law in regard to the judgments of God. It is true that others, beside the dissipated, vicious, and debased, may be the victims; but the great law is that temperance, soberness, virtue, cleanliness, and that regard to comfort and health to which religion and virtue prompt, constitute a marked security — so marked as to illustrate the “general” law referred to in the psalm before us.

~~4908~~ Psalm 91:8. Only That is, This is “all” that will occur to you. The only thing which you have to anticipate is, that you will see how God punishes sinners.

With thine eyes shalt thou behold and see the reward of the wicked Your own eyes shall see it. See the notes at ~~49734~~ Psalm 37:34. You will see the just punishment of the ungodly, the vicious, the profane, the sensual. You will see what is the proper fruit of their conduct; what is the just expression of the views which God takes of their character. This undoubtedly refers to the general principle that there is a moral government on earth; that vice is often punished as such; that the general course of the divine dealings is such as to show that God is favorable to virtue, and is opposed to vice. The system is not complete here, and there are many things which could not be reconciled with this, if the present world were all, and if there were no future state: but the course of events indicates the general character of the divine administration, and what is the tendency of things. The completion — the actual and perfect adjustment — is reserved for a future state. The facts as they occur on earth prove that there is an attribute of justice in God; the fact that his dealings here are not wholly and fully in accordance with what justice demands, proves that there will be a state where full justice will be done, and where the whole system will be adjusted.

~~4909~~ Psalm 91:9. Because thou hast made the LORD, which is my refuge literally, “For thou, O Jehovah, (art) my refuge.” The Chaldee Paraphrase regards this as the language of Solomon, who, according to that version, is one of the speakers in the psalm: “Solomon answered and said, ‘Since thou, O Lord, art my refuge,’” etc. Tholuck regards this as the response of the choir. But this is unnecessary. The idea is, that the psalmist “himself” had made Yahweh his refuge, or his defense. The language is an expression of his own feeling — of his own experience — in having made God his refuge, and is designed here to be a ground of exhortation to others to do the same thing. He could say that he had made God his refuge; he could say that God was now his refuge; and he could appeal to this — to his own experience — when he exhorted others to do the same, and gave them assurance of safety in doing it.

Even the Most High thy habitation literally, “The Most High hast thou made thy habitation;” or, thy home. On the word habitation, see the notes at <sup><9910></sup>Psalm 90:1. The idea is, that he had, as it were, chosen to abide with God, or to dwell with him — to find his home with him as in a father’s house. The consequence of this, or the security which would follow, he states in the following verses.

<sup><9910></sup>Psalm 91:10. There shall no evil befall thee The Chaldee Paraphrase has, “The Lord of the world answered and said, ‘There shall no evil befall thee,’” etc. The sentiment, however, is that the psalmist could assure such an one, from his own personal experience, that he would be safe. He had himself made Yahweh his refuge, and he could speak with confidence of the safety of doing so. This, of course, is to be understood as a general truth, in accordance with what has been said above.

Neither shall any plague come nigh thy dwelling On the word rendered “plague” here [<sup><5061></sup>gab] — see the notes at <sup><9912></sup>Psalm 38:12; 39:11. It is not the same word which is used in <sup><9916></sup>Psalm 91:6, and translated “pestilence;” and it does not refer to what is technically called the “plague.” It may denote anything that would be expressive of the divine displeasure, or that would be sent as a punishment. The word rendered “dwelling” here means a tent; and the idea is, that no such mark of displeasure would abide with him, or enter his tent as its home. Of course, this also must be understood as a general promise, or as meaning that religion would constitute a general ground of security.

<sup><9911></sup>Psalm 91:11. For he shall give his angels charge over thee literally, “He will give ‘command’ to his angels.” That is, he would instruct them, or appoint them for this purpose. This passage (<sup><9911></sup>Psalm 91:11,12) was applied to the Saviour by the tempter. <sup><4016></sup>Matthew 4:6. See the notes at that passage. This, however, does not prove that it had an original reference to the Messiah, for even if we should suppose that Satan was a correct and reliable expounder of the Scriptures, all that the passage would prove as used by him would be, that the righteous, or those who were the friends of God, might rely confidently on his protection, and that Jesus, if he was of God, might do this as others might. On the sentiment in the passage, to wit, that God employs his angels to protect his people, see the notes at <sup><1947></sup>Psalm 34:7; compare the notes at <sup><8014></sup>Hebrews 1:14.

To keep thee in all thy ways To preserve thee wheresoever thou goest.

<sup><4912></sup>Psalm 91:12. They shall bear thee up ... As if they took hold of thee, and held thee up, when about to fall.

Lest thou dash thy foot ... Lest you should stumble and fall. They will protect you so that you may walk safely.

<sup><4913></sup>Psalm 91:13. Thou shalt tread upon the lion and adder Thou shalt be safe among dangers, as if the rage of the lion were restrained, and he became like a lamb, and as if the poisonous tooth of the serpent were extracted. Compare <sup><4168></sup>Mark 16:18. The word used here to denote the “lion” is a poetic term, not employed in prose. The word rendered “adder” is, in the margin, asp. The Hebrew word — <sup><4662></sup>תִּפְ — commonly means viper, asp, or adder. See the notes at <sup><1814></sup>Job 20:14,16; compare <sup><1950></sup>Psalm 58:4; <sup><2108></sup>Isaiah 11:8. It may be applied to any venomous serpent.

The young lion The “young” lion is mentioned as particularly fierce and violent. See <sup><1972></sup>Psalm 17:12.

And the dragon ... Hebrew, <sup><4877></sup>יָנִיתָ. See the notes at <sup><1943></sup>Psalm 74:13; <sup><1872></sup>Job 7:12; <sup><2370></sup>Isaiah 27:1. In <sup><1070></sup>Exodus 7:9,10,12, the word is rendered serpent (and serpents); in <sup><1002></sup>Genesis 1:21; and <sup><1872></sup>Job 7:12; whale (and whales); in <sup><1623></sup>Deuteronomy 32:33; <sup><1623></sup>Nehemiah 2:13; <sup><1943></sup>Psalm 74:13; 148:7; <sup><2370></sup>Isaiah 27:1; 51:9; <sup><2513></sup>Jeremiah 51:34, as here, dragon (and dragons); in <sup><2043></sup>Lamentations 4:3, sea monsters. The word does not occur elsewhere. It would perhaps properly denote a sea monster; yet it may be applied to a serpent. Thus applied, it would denote a serpent of the largest and most dangerous kind; and the idea is, that he who trusted in God would be safe amidst the most fearful dangers, as if he should walk safely amidst venomous serpents.

<sup><4914></sup>Psalm 91:14. Because he hath set his love upon me Has become attached to me; has united himself with me; is my friend. The Hebrew word expresses the strongest attachment, and is equivalent to our expression —

“to fall in love.” It refers here to the fact that God is the object of supreme affection on the part of his people; and it also here implies, that this springs from their hearts; that they have seen such beauty in his character, and have such strong desire for him, that their hearts go out in warm affection toward him.

Therefore will I deliver him I will save him from trouble and from danger.

I will set him on high By acknowledging him as my own, and treating him accordingly.

Because he hath known my name He has known me; that is, he understands my true character, and has learned to love me.

<sup><9915></sup>Psalm 91:15. He shall call upon me He shall have the privilege of calling on me in prayer; and he will do it.

And I will answer him I will regard his supplications, and will grant his requests. There could be no greater privilege — no more precious promise — than this.

I will be with him in trouble I will stand by him; I will not forsake him.

I will deliver him, and honor him I will not only rescue him from danger, but I will exalt him to honor. I will recognize him as my friend, and will regard and treat him as such. On earth he shall be treated as my friend; in another world he shall be exalted to honor among the redeemed, and become the associate of holy beings forever.

<sup><9916></sup>Psalm 91:16. With long life will I satisfy him The margin here, is “length of days;” that is, days lengthened out or multiplied. The meaning is, I will give him length of days as he desires, or until he is satisfied with life; implying

(1) that it is natural to desire long life;

(2) that long life is to be regarded as a blessing (compare <sup><1002></sup>Proverbs 3:2,16; <sup><1012></sup>Exodus 20:12);

(3) that the tendency of religion is to lengthen out life; since virtue, temperance, regular industry, calmness of mind, moderation in all things, freedom from excesses in eating and in drinking — to all of which religion prompts — contribute to health, and to length of days (see the notes at <sup><4842></sup>Psalm 34:12-14; 37:9; 55:23); and

(4) that a time will come, even under this promised blessing of length of days, when a man will be “satisfied” with living; when he will have no strong desire to live longer; when, under the infirmities of advanced years, and under his lonely feelings from the fact that his early friends have fallen, and under the influence of a bright hope of heaven, he will feel that he has had enough of life here, and that it is better to depart to another world.

And shew him my salvation In another life, after he shall be “satisfied” with this life. The promise extends beyond the grave: “Godliness is profitable unto all things, having promise of the life that now is, and of that which is to come.” See the notes at <sup><508></sup>1 Timothy 4:8. Thus, religion blesses man in this life, and blesses him forever. In possession of this, it is a great thing to him to live long; and then it is a great thing to die — to go to be forever with God.

General remarks on Psalms 91 to 100.

The eve of the captivity was blessed with psalms which take rank among the brightest and the most joyous the church ever sang. As the coming on of night brings into view the far-off starry worlds, so God made choice of the age when the temporal glories of David’s house were sinking into darkness, for disclosing to the faith of the godly the higher glories he had in store for that house and for his people ... The decline of the temporal grandeur of the nation was suited, as it was no doubt intended, to wean God’s people from that transitory glory, and to prepare them for listening to predictions respecting a more excellent. It was at this epoch, accordingly, that the divine purposes regarding the church and the world, in the latter days, began to be fully opened up by the prophets, and especially by Isaiah. Assuming that the predicted captivity would certainly come to pass, they spoke of a happy return to Zion; and with their announcement of that return were mingled intimations regarding the advent of the Messiah, his sufferings and consequent glory, the mission of the Comforter, the calling of the Gentiles, the establishment of the kingdom of God in all the earth. Occasionally, as in Isaiah xii, the predictions of the prophets blossom into song. It would have been strange if, at such a time, the stock of psalmody in actual use had not been enriched with an increment of new psalms — anthems in which the church might express her faith in the disclosures God had made, and the gladness with which they filled her heart.

Every devout reader will remember psalms of the character anticipated. The middle of the Psalter derives a special brightness from a constellation of them; the decade, I mean, which closes with Psalm 100. With perhaps one or two exceptions, all the ten, from Psalm 91—100, belong to the prophetic order. They are Messianic in the sense of celebrating the kingdom of Christ, although not Messianic in the narrower sense of celebrating his person. They soar above the level of the Old Testament economy, several of them carrying the soul forward and upward to a state of things such as the apostolical church itself never saw. Dr. Delitzsch has, with much felicity, entitled them apocalyptic psalms: some of them I should prefer to call the Songs of the Millennium. Psalm 100, for instance, how grandly does it anticipate the millennial time, and summon all the nations to unite in the high praises of the Lord! ... The Ninety-third is another star in this constellation. The drift of it cannot be better expressed than in the two words with which it opens, JEHOVAH REIGNETH. It is a kind of proclamation in which God's people are invited to declare before human beings and angels that the Lord is King, He and He only. It is the response of the church to the preaching of the gospel, so rapturously hailed in Isaiah — the preaching of the message “that bringeth good tidings, that publisheth peace; that bringeth good tidings of good, that publisheth salvation; that saith unto Zion, Thy God reigneth.” — Binnie.

APPENDIX NOTES ON PSALM 91

There are no marks of date in the psalm. The author and the occasion are alike unknown. Hengstenberg remarks as follows: “Several expositors have incorrectly assumed the occasion to have been a destructive disease. How God affords protection at such an emergency is indeed brought prominently forward in <sup>1906</sup>Psalm 91:6, and perhaps with the design that the church should use this psalm, among other occasions, also in a season of pestilence, as it has done at all times: among all the psalms, no one is more suitable for this purpose. But this reference, so far from being the exclusive, is not even once the preponderating one, which it would have been had the psalm been called forth by such an occasion. According to a correct exposition, it occurs only in the verse above referred to. And even here it is oppression arising from enemies that occupies the foreground, as is usually the case in the psalm, among the dangers against which the protection of God is sufficient.

“The alternation of thou and I in the psalm has led many expositors to divide it among alternating choruses. But that this is not the case is clear from the fact that in this way we are obliged to tear asunder what is manifestly connected together; thus, in the introduction, where the first portion in the first verse must belong to the first chorus, and the second in the second verse to the second chorus; next in ~~1910~~ Psalm 91:9, where the change occurs in one and the same verse, and where the first portion allotted to a particular chorus is remarkably distinguished for its being far too short and bald. The fact, however, upon which this hypothesis leans may be far more easily explained by supposing that the psalmist speaks at one time from his own person to the soul of the righteous one who is in danger, and revives its courage, while at another time he expresses confidence from the soul of the righteous man; and thus in that pleasant alternation which forms the characteristic uniqueness of the psalm, he employs at one time the thou in the character of teacher, and at another time the I in the character of scholar. If we take a right view of the I throughout the psalm, keeping our attention not so much upon the person of the psalmist, as upon those who were intended to appropriate the psalm to themselves, the difference between the thou and the I will be felt as less marked, and will occasion scarcely any difficulty. Under the thou an I is everywhere concealed, for the psalmist teaches what the person for whose use the psalm was designed ought to acknowledge: and, in like manner, under the I there is a thou, for the person using the psalm adopts language put into his mouth by the psalmist, who is only a thou in disguise. The call of instruction in Scripture (this is the meaning of the alternation) ought always to be responded to by the acknowledgment of the hearer.”

~~1915~~ Psalm 91:5,6. Thou shalt not be afraid for the terror by night ...

“Here is, first,” says Henry, “great danger supposed, the mention of it is enough to frighten us; night and day we lie exposed, and those that are apt to be timorous will, in neither period, think themselves safe. When we are retired into our chambers, our beds, and have made all as safe as we can about us, yet there is terror by night, from thieves and robbers, winds and storms, beside those things that are creatures of fancy and imagination, which are often moat frightful of all; we read of “fear in the night,” <sup><218></sup>Song of Solomon 3:8. There is also a “pestilence that walketh in darkness,” as that was which killed the first-born of the Egyptians and the army of the Assyrians. No locks or bars can shut out diseases, while we carry about with us in our bodies the seeds of them. But surely in the daytime, when we can look about us, we are not so much in danger; yes, there is an “arrow that flieth by day too,” and yet flies unseen; there is a destruction that wasteth at high noon, when we are awake and have all our friends about us; even then we cannot secure ourselves, nor can they secure us. It was in the daytime that that pestilence wasted which was sent to chastise David for numbering the people, on occasion of which some think this psalm was penned. But, secondly, here is great security promised to believers in the midst of this danger, ‘Thou shalt not be afraid, God by his grace will keep thee from disquieting, distrustful fear (that fear which hath torment), in the midst of the greatest dangers. Wisdom shall keep thee from being causelessly afraid, and faith shall keep thee from being inordinately afraid. Thou shalt not be afraid of the arrow, as knowing that though it may hit thee, it cannot hurt thee; if it take away the natural life, yet it shall be so far from doing any prejudice to the spiritual life, that it shall be its perfection.’ A believer needs not fear, and therefore should not fear, any arrow, because the point is off, the poison is out; “O death, where is thy sting?” It is also under divine direction, and will hit where God appoints, and not otherwise. Every bullet has its commission. Whatever is done, our heavenly Father’s will is done; and we have no reason to be afraid of that.”

<sup><911></sup>Psalm 91:11. He shall give his angels charge over thee This is added by the psalmist expressly with the view of obviating any fears which might arise from our infirmity; so that we cannot raft to be struck with the benignant condescension of God in thus not only forgiving our diffidence, but proposing the means by which it may be best removed. Does he exhibit himself to us as a fortress and shield, proffer the shadow of his protection, make himself known to us as a habitation in which we may abide, and stretch out his wings for our defense? Surely we are chargeable with the worst ingratitude if we are not satisfied with promises so abundantly full and satisfactory. If we tremble to think of his majesty, he presents himself to us under the lowly figure of the hen: if we are terrified at the power of our enemies, and the multitude of dangers by which we are beset, he reminds us of his own invincible power, which extinguishes every opposing force. When even all these attempts to encourage us have been tried, and he finds that we still linger and hesitate to approach him, or cast ourselves upon his sole and exclusive protection, he next makes mention of the angels and proffers them as guardians of our safety. As an additional illustration of his indulgent mercy and compassion for our weakness, he represents those whom he has ready for our defense as being a numerous host; he does not assign one solitary angel to each saint, but commissions the whole armies of heaven to keep watch over every individual believer. It is the individual believer whom the psalmist addresses, as we read also ~~<1347>~~ Psalm 34:7, that “angels encamp round about them that fear him.” We may learn from this that there is no truth in the idea that each saint has his own special guardian angel; and it is of no little consequence to consider that as our enemies are numerous, so also are the friends to whom our defense is entrusted. It were something no doubt to know that even one angel was set over us with this commission, but it adds weight to the promise when we are informed that the charge of our safety is committed to a numerous host, as Elisha was enabled, by a like consideration, to despise the great army of adversaries which was arrayed against him (~~<1346>~~ 2 Kings 6:16). Nor is this inconsistent with the passages of Scripture which seem to speak as if a distinct angel were assigned to each individual. It is evident that God employs his angels in different ways, setting one angel over several whole nations, and again several angels over one man. There is no necessity that we should be nice and scrupulous in inquiring into the exact manner in which they minister together for our safety; it is enough that, knowing from the authority of an apostle the fact of their being appointed ministers to us, we should rest satisfied of their being always intent upon their commission. We read elsewhere of their readiness to obey and execute the commands of God; and this must go to strengthen our faith, since their exertions are made use of by God for our defense.

The psalmist, in the passage now before us, speaks of the members of the church generally; and yet the devil did not wrest the words when, in his temptation in the wilderness, he applied them particularly to Christ. It is true that he is constantly seeking to pervert and corrupt the truth of God; but, so far as general principles are concerned, he can put a specious gloss upon things, and is a sufficiently acute theologian. It is to be considered that when our whole human family were banished from the divine favor, we ceased to have anything in common with the angels, and they to have any communication with us. It was Christ, and he only, who, by removing the ground of separation, reconciled the angels to us; this being his proper office, as the apostle observes (~~4010~~Ephesians 1:10), to gather together in one what had been dispersed both in heaven and on earth. This was represented to the holy patriarch Jacob under the figure of a ladder (~~0E8D~~Genesis 28:12); and, in allusion to our being united into one collective body with the angels, Christ said, “Afterward ye shall see the heavens opened and the angels of God ascending and descending.” — Calvin.

NOTES ON PSALM 92

The author of this psalm is not indicated in the title, and it is impossible now to ascertain who he was. Nor can the occasion be determined “when” it was composed. It is of so general a character that it might have been written at any period of the Jewish history; and, so far as the style and the contents are concerned, it may have been written by either of those whose names are attached to the other psalms. That it may have been composed by David, is certainly possible, but of that there is no evidence.

In the title it is called “A Psalm or Song for the sabbath-day;” that is, to be used on the sabbath. The Chaldee Paraphrase has in the title, “Praise and a song which the first man spoke for the sabbath-day.” This may indicate that there was an early tradition on this subject; but we have no proof of what would be so interesting a fact, that we have a genuine poetic composition of Adam. The contents are all such as might be properly used on the sabbath, though there is nothing in the psalm that has any “special” reference to the sabbath, or that is derived from the appointment of such a day. It is not improbable, however, that special psalms and hymns were composed with a view to be used on festal occasions; and this, as a psalm of praise, is well adapted still to the services of the sabbath.

The psalmist refers:

I. To the blessedness of praise, or to the propriety of celebrating the praise of God, ~~1911~~ Psalm 92:1-4.

II. He refers to the works of God as laying the foundation of praise, ~~1915~~ Psalm 92:5,6.

III. He refers to the justice of God, or the fact that the wicked, however they may seem to be prospered, will be cut off, ~~1917~~ Psalm 92:7-9.

IV. He refers to the prosperity and the security of the righteous; to the influence of religion and the favor of God on life, as making it prosperous and happy, and as preparing people to be useful and cheerful in old age, ~~1920~~ Psalm 92:10-15.

◀92▶ Psalm 92:1. It is a good thing to give thanks unto the LORD literally, “Good is it to give thanks unto Jehovah.” That is, the act is appropriate; the effect is good.

(1) The thing itself is appropriate, for there is much, under all circumstances, to be thankful for: life, health, food, raiment, air, water, friends, recollections, hopes — and, above all, the blessings of redemption, and the assurance that we may be happy forever. Many of these things may be found in the condition of all; but if all else fail, the hope of heaven — the assurance that the Redeemer died — the offer of salvation — cannot fail. That is ours, and cannot be taken away.

(2) The effect is good. It is a desirable state of mind. It tends to happiness, contentment, peace. A gloomy mind makes all things around more gloomy; an unthankful mind is an unhappy mind; a murmuring, complaining, dissatisfied mind makes its possessor wretched, and all around him miserable.

(3) It is good as it is due to God. For all his favor we should be thankful — and all that we enjoy is his gift.

(4) It tends much to lessen the real troubles and afflictions of life to dwell on those things for which we should be thankful.

And to sing praises unto thy name Unto thee. As this psalm was designed for the “Sabbath day,” this proves that one of the appropriate services of the Sabbath is “praise.” It is a day when it is fit to recall the mercies of God to our recollection; and the remembrance of those mercies, and their celebration by appropriate songs, tend to diffuse joy over all the coming days of the week.

O Most High God exalted over all. The fact that “he” is exalted over all — over us — over our friends — over all worlds — is an appropriate thought when we come before him to praise him; appropriate at all times, and in all circumstances of life.

◀92▶ Psalm 92:2. To show forth thy loving-kindness To celebrate thy mercy; thy goodness; thy love.

In the morning That is, there is a fitness in doing this in the morning; or, there are special reasons why we should do this at that time.

(a) We have been preserved through the dangers of the night; dangers when we were asleep, unconscious, and defenseless.

(b) Life is then, as it were, a new gift — for we are raised from “the image of death” — sleep — and we should regard life then “as if” we had been raised from the dead.

(c) To praise God in the morning will have a good influence on us, in promoting cheerfulness; in making us benignant and kind; in preparing us for the toils and trials of the day.

There is no better preparation for a day, in view of its burdens, cares, toils, and trials, than a thankful, cheerful mind in the morning. He who begins a day with a sour, a morose, a complaining, an irritable spirit — who has been preserved through the night, and sees nothing to be thankful for in the morning — will be a miserable man through the day, and will make all miserable around him. He who sees nothing to be thankful for in the morning will see nothing to hope for in the day; he who has no gratitude for the past, will have no bright anticipations of the future.

And thy faithfulness Faithfulness in the laws of nature; in thy promises; in thy character: in thy providential dealings with people.

Every night Margin, in the nights.” The reference is to the return of evening; and the meaning is, that it is a good thing, or that it is appropriate to contemplate the faithfulness of God at the close of every day.

(a) The mind is then calm, after the toils of the day are over.

(b) The time — evening — its stillness — its twilight — its approaching darkness — all is favorable for reflection.

(c) There is much in every day to be thankful for, and it is well to recall it at night.

(d) It has a happy effect on the mind when we are about to lie down to rest, to recall the mercies of God; to reflect on what he has done for us; to gather, from his kindness in the past, lessons of confidence and hope for the times to come.

We lie down at night more calmly in proportion as we are disposed at the close of a day to think of the mercies which we have received at the hand of God; and the recalling of those mercies to remembrance with the voice, and with instruments of praise, is always an appropriate mode of closing a day.

Psalm 92:3. Upon an instrument of ten strings The general idea in this verse is, that instruments “of all kinds” are to be employed in celebrating the praises of God. On the instrument here referred to, see the notes at Psalm 33:2.

And upon the psaltery Or “lyre.” See the notes at Isaiah 5:12. The word is there translated viol.

Upon the harp with a solemn sound Margin, upon the solemn sound with the harp.” Prof. Alexander renders this, “On meditation with a harp.” On the word rendered “harp,” see the notes at Isaiah 5:12. The Hebrew word rendered “solemn sound” is <sup>thi1902</sup> wqchi which means properly “murmur;” then, the sound of a harp; and then, meditation. See the notes at Psalm 9:16. Here the meaning seems to be, “with murmurs upon the harp;” that is, with the sound of the harp — its murmuring tones. It does not denote here a distinct instrument of music, but it refers to the tones of the harp: not to the meditations of the mind — of the worshipper — but to the low and gentle sounds of the instrument itself.

Psalm 92:4. For thou, LORD, hast made me glad Thou hast made me happy; thou hast given me such a state of feeling as finds an appropriate expression in “praise.”

Through thy work Either the work of creation, the finishing of which the Sabbath was designed particularly to commemorate; or the works of God in general — the universe; or the general dealings of his providence; or some particular interpositions of Providence in his behalf that called for special praise. All these are appropriately combined in the celebrations — the praises — of the Sabbath; to these should be added, as among the most marvelous of his works, and that which furnishes special occasion for praise on the Christian Sabbath, the wonderful work of redemption — that which of all the “works” of God makes a heart rightly affected most “glad.”

I will triumph I will exult or rejoice.

In the works of thy hands In all thy works; in all that thou hast done.

Psalm 92:5. O LORD, how great are thy works! Compare <sup><1916></sup>Psalm 8:3; 40:5. See also the notes at <sup><1810></sup>Job 11:7. The meaning here is this: The psalmist, on the Sabbath, in giving himself to meditation on the works of God, is overwhelmed with a sense of their vastness, their incomprehensible nature, and the depth of wisdom evinced, far beyond the grasp of man, in what God had done. How soon is man lost; how soon does he get beyond his depth; how soon does he feel that here is greatness which he cannot comprehend, and wisdom which he cannot fathom, and goodness which he cannot appreciate, when he sits down to meditate on the works of God!

And thy thoughts are very deep Compare <sup><2309></sup>Isaiah 28:29; <sup><4113></sup>Romans 11:33,34. The meaning is, that the plans or the purposes of God, as evinced in the works of creation and providence, are too profound for man to understand them. Who but God himself can comprehend them?

Psalm 92:6. A brutish man knoweth not A man who is stupid, and who is like the beasts or brutes; that is, a man whose tastes and propensities are like the brutes, or who does not seem to act as if endowed with a rational nature. The idea evidently is, that there are many such people, and that it is not to be wondered at that they have no exalted idea of the greatness of God. As a matter of fact there are many in human form — many made in the image of God — who seem to have no more notion of God, and who see no more wisdom and goodness in his works, than the horse or the ox. Compare <sup><2003></sup>Isaiah 1:3.

Neither doth a fool understand this A fool, in the sense that he has been made foolish and stupid by sin; that he does not worship and honor God. He has no right understanding in regard to the Maker and the Governor of the universe.

Psalm 92:7. When the wicked spring as the grass When they grow up as plants do; when they seem to flourish and prosper. Compare <sup><1916></sup>Psalm 90:5,6; 37:2,35,38. The word “grass” here refers to the vegetable creation generally, embracing plants and flowers of all kinds.

And when all the workers of iniquity do flourish As plants and flowers do. They are like vigorous plants; not like the stunted and dry shrubs of the desert.

It is that they shall be destroyed for ever The meaning here is, not that the design of their being thus made to flourish is that they should be destroyed, or that they are made to flourish for that purpose, but that such “will be” the result. They will not be made happy in another world by their prosperous and prospered wickedness here, as if God approved of their course; but the end will be that they will be destroyed forever. The design of the psalmist seems to be to turn the mind from the idea that mere external prosperity is necessarily connected with happiness; or that one who is prospered in this life is on that account safe. There is another world, and “there” ample justice will be done to all. See <sup><49736></sup>Psalm 73:16-20.

<sup><4988></sup>Psalm 92:8. But thou, LORD, art most high for evermore In the treatment of the righteous and the wicked, thou wilt maintain thine own exalted place as a sovereign. Whatever may occur to people, God will maintain this exalted position as supreme over all.

<sup><4989></sup>Psalm 92:9. For, lo, thine enemies, O LORD, for, lo, thine enemies shall perish The repetition of the word “lo” here — “behold!” — is emphatic. The attention of the psalmist was fixed on this as an event which would be sure to occur. It was certain that God would be exalted; it followed from this, that all his enemies would be subdued in order that he might be thus exalted.

All the workers of iniquity shall be scattered More literally, “shall scatter or disperse themselves;” implying eagerness and activity, as if they were in haste to flee away. The allusion is to an army that is discomfited, disorganized, “demoralized,” and scattered; or to chaff that is dispersed by the wind. See <sup><48218></sup>Job 21:18; <sup><2373></sup>Isaiah 17:13; 29:5; <sup><2833></sup>Hosea 13:3.

<sup><4920></sup>Psalm 92:10. But my horn shalt thou exalt The horn is a symbol of strength or power (see the notes at <sup><9182></sup>Psalm 18:2); and the meaning here is, that, while the wicked would be cut off, he would be prospered; that is, he had such confidence that he was the friend of God, that he believed God would honor him and exalt him. The psalmist here speaks of himself not so much with reference to his own particular case, but as the representative of the righteous. The idea is, that God will thus exalt “a righteous man.”

Like the horn of an unicorn Supposed to be remarkable for the strength of its horn. On the animal here referred to, see the notes at <sup><4830></sup>Job 39:9; compare <sup><49221></sup>Psalm 22:21.

I shall be anointed with fresh oil Oil pure and sweet; not old and rancid. That is, he would be made happy, cheerful, bright, and prosperous.

Anointing with oil in the East was the symbol of all this, or was equivalent to what we mean by putting on festive apparel — holiday apparel. Compare the notes at <sup><4921f></sup>Psalm 23:5.

<sup><4921></sup>Psalm 92:11. Mine eye also shall see my desire That is, I shall be permitted to see the destruction of my foes; I shall be gratified with seeing them overthrown. On the sentiment here expressed, see the notes at <sup><4947></sup>Psalm 54:7; 59:10.

On mine enemies The word used here — <sup><4779i></sup>רִוּוּ — occurs nowhere else. It means, properly, a liar-in-wait; one who “watches;” one who is in ambush; and refers to persons who “watched” his conduct; who “watched” for his ruin.

And mine ears ... literally, “Of those rising up against me, evil-doers, my ear shall hear.” He would hear of their ruin; he would hear what he desired to hear.

<sup><4922></sup>Psalm 92:12. The righteous shall flourish like the palm-tree That is, the beauty, the erectness, the stateliness, the growth of the palm-tree — all this is an emblem of the condition, the prosperity, the happiness of a righteous man. The wicked shall be cut down; but the righteous shall flourish. This image — the comparison of a righteous man to a flourishing, majestic, green, and beautiful tree — is not uncommon in the Scriptures. See the notes at <sup><4908></sup>Psalm 1:3; compare <sup><2478></sup>Jeremiah 17:8. On the “palm-tree,” see the notes at <sup><4218></sup>Matthew 21:8. “The stem,” says Dr. Thomson (“land and the Book,” vol. i. p. 65)” tall, slender, and erect as Rectitude herself, suggests to the Arab poets many a symbol for their lady-love; and Solomon, long before them, has sung, ‘How fair and how pleasant art thou, O love! for delights; this thy stature is like the palm-tree.’ Cant. 7:6,7. The following remarks of Dr. Thomson (“land and the Book,” vol. i. pp. 65,66) will illustrate the passage before us; — “The palm grows slowly, but steadily, from century to century, uninfluenced by those alternations of the seasons which affect other trees. It does not rejoice overmuch in winter’s copious rain, nor does it droop under the drought and the burning sun of summer. Neither heavy weights which people place upon its head, nor the importunate urgency of the wind, can sway it aside from perfect uprightness. There it stands, looking calmly down upon the world below, and patiently yielding its large clusters of golden fruit from generation to generation. They ‘bring forth fruit in old age.’ The allusion to being planted in the house of the Lord is probably drawn from the custom of planting beautiful and long-lived trees in the courts of temples and palaces, and in all 'high places' used for worship. This is still common; nearly every palace, and mosque, and convent in the country has such trees in the courts, and, being well protected there, they flourish exceedingly. Solomon covered all the walls of the 'holy of holies' round about with palm-trees. They were thus planted, as it were, within the very house of the Lord; and their presence there was not only ornamental, but appropriate and highly suggestive; the very best emblem, not only of patience in well-doing, but of the rewards of the righteous — a fat and flourishing old age — a peaceful end — a glorious immortality." The following cut will furnish an apt representation of the appearance of the tree, and a proper illustration of the beauty of the passage before us.

He shall grow like a cedar in Lebanon On the cedars of Lebanon, see the notes at <sup>2013</sup>Isaiah 2:13. The following remarks by Dr. Thomson ("land and the Book," vol. i. pp. 292,295), with the accompanying cut, will show the propriety of the image here. "The platform where the cedars stand is more than six thousand feet above the Mediterranean, and around it are gathered the very tallest and grayest heads of Lebanon. The forest is not large — not more than five hundred trees, great and small, grouped irregularly on the sides of shallow ravines, which mark the birthplace of the Khadisha, or Holy River.

"But, though the space covered by them does not exceed half a dozen acres, yet, when fairly within the grove, and beneath the giant arms of those old patriarchs of a hundred generations, there comes a solemn hush upon the soul as if by enchantment. Precisely the same sort of magic spell settles on the spirits, no matter how often you repeat your visits. But it is most impressive in the night. Let us by all means arrange to sleep there. The universal silence is almost painful. The gray old towers of Lebanon, still as a stone, stand all around, holding up the stars of heaven to look at you, and the trees gather like phantoms about you, and wink knowingly, or seem to, and whisper among themselves you know not what. You become suspicious, nervous, until, broad awake, you find that it is nothing but the flickering of your drowsy fire, and the feeble flutter of bats among the boughs of the trees. A night among the cedars is never forgotten; the impressions, electrotyped, are hid away in the inner chamber of the soul, among her choicest treasures, to be visited a thousand times with never-failing delight.

“There is a singular discrepancy in the statements of travelers with regard to the number of trees. Some mention seven, others thirteen — intending, doubtless, only those whose age and size rendered them Biblical, or at least historical. It is not easy, however, to draw any such line of demarcation. There is a complete gradation from small and comparatively young to the very oldest patriarchs of the forest. I counted four hundred and forty-three, great and small, and this cannot be far from the true number. This, however, is not uniform. Some are struck down by lightning, broken by enormous loads of snow, or torn to fragments by tempests. Even the sacrilegious axe is sometimes lifted against them. But, on the other hand, young trees are constantly springing up from the roots of old ones, and from seeds of ripe cones. I have seen these infant cedars in thousands just springing from the soil; but as the grove is wholly unprotected, and greatly frequented both by human beings and animals, they are quickly destroyed. The fact, however, proves that the number might be increased “ad libitum.” Beyond a doubt, the whole of these upper terraces of Lebanon might again be covered with groves of this noble tree, and furnish timber enough not only for Solomon’s Temple and the house of the forest of Lebanon, but for all the houses along this coast. But, unless a wiser and more provident government controls the country, such a result can never be realized, and, indeed, the whole forest will slowly die out under the dominion of the Arab and Turk. Even in that case the tree will not be lost. It has been propagated by the nut or seed in many parks in Europe, and there are more of them within fifty miles of London than on all Lebanon.”

We have seen larger trees every way, and much taller, on the banks of the Ohio, and the loftiest cedar might take shelter under the lowest branches of California’s vegetable glories. Still, they are respectable trees. The girth of the largest is more than forty-one feet; the height of the highest may be one hundred. These largest, however, part into two or three only a few feet from the ground. Their age is very uncertain, nor are they more ready to reveal it than others who have an uneasy consciousness of length of days. Very different estimates have been made. Some of our missionary band, who have experience in such matters, and confidence in the results, have counted the “growths” (as we Western people call the annual concentric circles) for a few inches into the trunk of the oldest cedar, and from such data carry back its birth three thousand five hundred years. It may be so. They are carved full of names and dates, going back several generations, and the growth “since the earliest date” has been almost nothing. At this rate of increase they must have been growing ever since the Flood. But young trees enlarge far faster, so that my confidence in estimates made from such specimens is but small.” The idea in the passage before us is, that the righteous will flourish like the most luxuriant and majestic trees of the forest; they may be compared with the most grand and beautiful objects in nature.

Psalm 92:13. Those that be planted in the house of the LORD As if plants were reared up in the house of God. The same image, under the idea of the olive tree, occurs in Psalm 52:8. See the notes at that verse. The passage here may refer particularly to those who have been trained up in connection with the church; young plants set out in the sanctuary, and cultivated until they have reached their growth.

Shall flourish in the courts of our God That is, Having been planted there, they will grow there; they will send out their boughs there; they will produce fruit there. The “courts” of the house of God were properly the areas or open spaces around the tabernacle or the temple (see the notes at Matthew 21:12); but the word came also to denote the tabernacle or the temple itself, or to designate a place where God was worshipped. It has this meaning here. The passage affords an encouragement to parents to train up their children in attendance on the ordinances of public worship; and it shows the advantage of having been born in the church, and of having been trained up in it — an advantage which no one can fully appreciate. The passage may also be regarded as furnishing a proof of what will be the result of being thus “planted” and nurtured in connection with the church, inasmuch as trees carefully planted and cultivated are expected to produce more and better fruit than those which grow wild.

Psalm 92:14. They shall still bring forth fruit in old age As a tree that is carefully planted and cultivated may be expected to live long, and to bear fruit even when it is old. It is true that such a tree may be cut down; or that it may be blown down by winds and tempests; or that it may be unproductive, but as a general rule, and as laying the foundation of a reasonable hope, such a tree may be expected to live long, and to produce fruit even when it is old. So of one devoted early to God, and trained up under the influences of religion. The care, the culture, the habits of temperance, of industry, of moderation, and of sobriety so formed, are favorable to length of days, and lay the foundation for usefulness when old age comes. An aged man should be useful. He should feel that whatever wisdom he may possess as the result of long study and experience, belongs to God and to truth; that one great reason for sparing him is that he may be useful; that the world needs the benefit of his counsel and his prayers; that his life is lengthened out not for his own ease or enjoyment, but that virtue and piety may be extended in the world by all the influence which he can bring to bear upon it in advanced years. It may be added that, as a matter of fact, those who are thus trained and are thus preserved, are useful in old age. No one thus spared need be useless; perhaps almost none are. There is something appropriate for old men to do, as there is for the young and the middle-aged; and it should be the object of an aged Christian to find out what that is, and to do it. The word rendered “old age means literally grey or hoary hair.”

They shall be fat The meaning is, that they shall be vigorous, or have the appearance of vigor and health.

And flourishing Margin, as in Hebrew, “green.” This image is taken from a tree, as if it were still green in old age, or gave no indications of decay.

Psalm 92:15. To shew that the LORD is upright That is, This will be a proof that God is faithful to his promises; that he is the true friend of his people. The fact that they live long — that they are happy and useful even in old age, will be a demonstration that God is the friend of virtue, and that he deals with people according to their character.

He is my rock He is my defense; that which constitutes my security. See the notes at <sup><498D></sup>Psalm 18:2. This is language of strong confidence in view of all that is said in the psalm.

And there is no unrighteousness in him This is said in the most absolute form — implying the most entire confidence. God is altogether to be trusted. There is no evil or wrong in his character or in his dealings. In all respects he is worthy of confidence: “worthy” to be loved, trusted, adored, obeyed, by the inhabitants of all worlds. What a sublime thought is this! What a consolatory truth! What would the universe be if God, a Being of infinite POWER, were not a Being of perfect RIGHTEOUSNESS, and could not be trusted by the creatures which he has made!

APPENDIX NOTES ON PSALM 92

<sup><498E></sup>Psalm 92:6. A brutish man knoweth not, neither doth a fool understand this Compare <sup><497D></sup>Psalm 73:22. Were God’s thoughts less deep and glorious, did he repay the wicked at every particular transgression immediately with his punishment, and did he bestow salvation immediately upon the righteous according to the canon which Job’s friends with their limited views lay down, the government of the world would become plain even to the dark eye of ungodliness. But its depth makes it a secret, the understanding of which very often in times of conflict is withheld even from the pious, as is manifest from the example of Job and the author of Psalm 73, and in which there is always much that may be learned. He who has got a deep insight into this secret, and has seen that the conduct of God toward his people is always and only grace, even though often under the deepest covering; and that his conduct toward the wicked is always only wrath, even when they flourish and blossom, he alone can cry out, “O the depth of the riches,” etc., and to him these works of God appear greater and more glorious still than the works of creation. On <sup><498F></sup>Psalm 92:7 compare <sup><497B></sup>Psalm 37:38. The annihilation of the wicked comes into notice here as the basis of the deliverance of the righteous, which is the proper theme of the psalm. Arnd:

“Nothing, except it be of God, can stand, whether it be skill, or riches, or honor, or power. It rises and flourishes to appearance, but in the end it is only a thistle bush and a noxious weed, good for nothing but the fire.” — Hengstenberg.

Psalm 92:12. He shall flourish like the palm-tree; he shall grow up like a cedar in Lebanon Of the wicked he had just said before, “When the wicked spring as the grass, and when all the workers of iniquity do flourish, it is that they shall be destroyed forever.” They flourish as the grass, which today is, and tomorrow is cast into the oven. What a contrast with the worthlessness, the weakness, transitoriness, and destiny of grass — in a warm country too — are the palm-tree, and the cedar in Lebanon! They are evergreens. How beautifully, how firmly, how largely they grow! How strong and lofty is the cedar! How upright, and majestic, and tall the palm-tree — the palm also bears fruit, called dates, like bunches of grapes. It sometimes yields a hundredweight at once. — Jay.

Those that be planted in the house of the Lord, shall flourish in the courts of our God The allusion is striking. It compares the house of God to a garden, or fine, well-watered soil, favorable to the life, and verdure, and fertility of the trees fixed there. The reason is, that in the sanctuary we have the communion of saints. There our fellowship is with the Father, and with his Son Jesus Christ. There are dispensed the ordinances of religion, and the Word of truth. There God commandeth the blessing, even life forevermore. “Blessed is the man that heareth me, watching daily at my gates, waiting at the posts of my doors.” They that wait upon the Lord renew their strength. Hence, from their own experience, as well as from the word of promise, they are increasingly induced to say with David, “I will dwell in the house of the Lord forever.” — Jay.

They shall still bring forth fruit in old age This is to show the permanency of their principles, and to distinguish them from natural productions:

*“The plants of grace shall ever live;
Nature decays, but grace must thrive:
Time, that doth all things else impair,
Still makes them flourish strong and fair.”*

The believer does not escape all the effects of years. The eye may grow dim; the ear become dull of hearing. But as the outward man perisheth, the inward man is renewed day by day. The young Christian is lovely, like a tree in the blossoms of spring; the aged Christian is valuable, like a tree in autumn, bending with ripe fruit. We therefore look for something superior in old disciples. More deadness to the world, the vanity of which they have had more opportunities to see — more meekness of wisdom — more disposition to make sacrifices for the sake of peace — more maturity of judgment in divine things — more confidence in God — more richness of experience. — Jay.

NOTES ON PSALM 93

The author of this psalm is unknown, and there is nothing by which we can determine this, or its date, or the occasion on which it was written. It seems, from <sup><9905></sup>Psalm 93:5, to have been composed with some reference to the sanctuary, and to the service there: “Holiness becometh thine “house,” O Lord,” and it may have been designed, with the last psalm, to have been used in the place of public worship on the sabbath-day. It would appear, also, from the structure of the psalm, that it was composed in view of some danger which may have threatened the nation from some hostile power (<sup><9901></sup>Psalm 93:1-4), and that the design was to impart confidence in God, or to keep up the assurance in the mind of the people that God presided over all, and that his kingdom was safe. With this view, it is adapted to inspire confidence in God in all ages, and in all times of danger. In the Septuagint and the Latin Vulgate, the title is, “The praise of an ode by David, for the day preceding the sabbath, when the earth was founded.” The origin of this title is unknown, and it has no authority. There is no evidence that it was composed by David, and the presumption from <sup><9905></sup>Psalm 93:5 is that it was composed after the temple was built, and consequently after the death of David.

He is clothed with majesty That is, he puts on, or wears this; he appears in this as a garb, or robe. The word rendered “majesty” means properly “loftiness,” and is applied to the swelling of the sea (<sup><9909></sup>Psalm 89:9), or to a column of smoke, <sup><2908></sup>Isaiah 9:18. The idea here is, that God is exalted; and that he appears in such a manner as to indicate his proper dignity. See the notes at <sup><210></sup>Isaiah 6:1.

The LORD is clothed with strength, wherewith he hath girded himself

There is an allusion here to the mode of dress among the Orientals — the custom of girding the loins when one labored, or walked, or ran. See the notes at <sup><158></sup>Matthew 5:38-41.

The world also is stablished Is firm; is on a solid foundation. It cannot be shaken or destroyed by natural convulsions, or by the power of man.

That it cannot be moved Moved out of its place; overthrown; destroyed. This seems to have been spoken in view of some impending calamity, as if everything were to be swept away. The psalmist consoles himself with the thought that the world was firmly established; that no storm or tempest could be so violent as to remove it out of its place. The ground of consolation is the essential stability of what God has ordained.

<sup><99></sup>Psalm 93:2. Thy throne is established of old Whatever might occur, the throne of God was firm. That could not be moved. It had been set up from all eternity. It had stood through all the convulsions and changes which had occurred in the universe; and it would stand firm forever. Whatever might change, that was immovable; and as long as that is unchanged we have a ground of security and hope. Should “that” be moved, all would be gone. The margin here is, as in Hebrew, “from then:” but it means “of old;” from the most ancient times; that is, from the period indicated by the next clause, “from everlasting.”

Thou art from everlasting From all eternity; thou hast always existed; thou art ever the same (<sup><90></sup>Psalm 90:1).

<sup><93></sup>Psalm 93:3. The floods have lifted up, O LORD, the floods have lifted up their voice The word here rendered “floods,” means properly rivers, and then it may be applied to any waters. The word voice here refers to the noise of raging waters when they are agitated by the winds, or when they dash on the shore. See the notes at <sup><94></sup>Psalm 42:7.

The floods lift up their waves As if they would sweep everything away. The allusion here is to some calamity or danger which might, in its strength and violence, be compared with the wild and raging waves of the ocean. Or if it refers literally to the ocean in a storm, then the psalm may have been the reflections of the author as he stood on the shore of the sea, and saw the waves beat and dash against the shore. To one thus looking upon the billows as they roll in toward the shore, it seems as if they were angry; as if they intended to sweep everything away; as if the rocks of the shore could not resist them. Yet they have their bounds. They spend their strength; they break, and retire as if to recover their force, and then they renew their attack with the same result. But their power is limited. The rocky shore is unmoved. The earth abides. God is over all. His throne is unshaken. No violence of the elements can affect that; and, under his dominion, all is secure.

Psalm 93:4. The LORD on high is mightier than the noise of many waters That is, he is more powerful than those waters; he is able to control them. See the notes at Psalm 65:7; Job 38:11. The original here is more rapid in the course of the thought; more emphatic and forcible: “More than the voice of waters — many — mighty — the breakers of the sea — in the high place is Jehovah.” He is over all those billows and breakers; more mighty than they all. They can proceed no further than he permits; they will be stayed when and where he commands. We can conceive of few things which more illustrate the power and the majesty of God than the fact that he thus presides over, and controls, the waves of the ocean.

Yea, than the mighty waves of the sea The original word here corresponds precisely with our word “breakers” — the mighty waves that “break” on the beach.

Psalm 93:5. Thy testimonies are very sure All that thou hast borne witness to; all that thou hast affirmed or declared to be true. This would embrace “all that” God has spoken, whether his law, his promises, his commands, his prophecies, or his statements of what has occurred and of what will occur. See the notes at Psalm 19:7.

Holiness becometh thine house, O LORD The psalm seems to have been intended to be used in the sanctuary, as a part of public worship, and the word “holiness” here would seem to mean a proper respect for God; confidence in him; a state of mind free from all doubt, and from all that is impure. Perhaps there may be here, also, the idea that in all the convulsions of the world; in all that threatens to overthrow truth and righteousness; in all the attacks which are made on the divine government; in all the efforts of the defenders of error, and in the midst of abounding iniquity, the church should maintain a firm adherence to the principles of “holiness,” to that which is right and true. There should be one place — the church — where there would be no wavering in regard to truth and holiness; one place, where the truth would be defended whatever commotions might be abroad. The main idea, therefore, in the psalm is, that, in view of the fact that God reigns, and that nothing can frustrate his plans, or disturb his throne, we should approach him with reverence, with humble trust, with sincere and pure hearts. In a larger sense, also, in the largest sense conceivable — it is true that “holiness,” purity, freedom from evil thoughts, from a wanton eye and a wanton imagination, from unholy plans and purposes, should prevail in the house of God, and should be regarded as indispensable to proper worship. As heaven is pure, and as there shall enter there nothing “that defileth, neither whatsoever worketh abomination or maketh a lie” (<sup><427></sup>Revelation 21:27), so in the place where we seek to prepare for that holy world — the sanctuary of God — nothing should be allowed to enter that is impure and polluting; nothing that tends to corrupt or defile the soul. It may be added, that attendance in a place of public worship is calculated to make the heart pure, and to banish unholy thoughts and purposes from the soul. A man who feels that he is in the presence of a holy God, will not be likely to welcome into his soul polluted images and unholy desires.

Forever Margin, as in Hebrew, “to length of days.” The idea is, that it is always appropriate. See the notes at <sup><426></sup>Psalm 23:6.

APPENDIX NOTES ON PSALM 93

<sup><423></sup>Psalm 93:3. The floods have lifted up, O Lord ... Various meanings have been attached to this verse. Some think there is an allusion to the violent assaults made upon the church by her enemies, and the goodness of God seen in restraining them. Others are of opinion that the words should be taken literally, and not figuratively, in this sense: Though the noise of many waters be terrible, and the waves of the sea more fearful still, God is more terrible than all. I would not be inclined to insist too nicely upon any comparison that may have been intended. I have no doubt the psalmist sets forth the power of God by adducing one brief illustration out of many which might have been given, intimating that we need not go further for a striking instance of divine power — one that may impress us with an idea of his tremendous majesty — than to the floods of waters, and agitations of the ocean; as in <sup><424></sup>Psalm 29:4, the mighty voice of God is said to be in the thunder. God manifests his power in the sound of the floods, and in the tempestuous waves of the sea, in a way calculated to excite our reverential awe. — Calvin.

To this the translator of Calvin has added the following apposite note:

“Dr. Morison, after stating the opinion of Mudge, who thinks that this psalm was composed on the occasion of some violent inundation, which threatened a general confusion to the world, adds, ‘It is more probable, perhaps, that the floods spoken of are entirely figurative; and that they represent in eastern phrase those powerful enemies by whom the peace of David and the ancient church was so often disturbed. But though the floods were lifted high, and threatened destruction to those who were within their reach, yet Yahweh was seen, as it were, riding on their most tempestuous billows, and amidst their mightiest tumult, his throne was unshaken and his kingdom unmoved.’ In support of this view he refers to other passages of Scripture, as ~~23RE~~ Isaiah 8:7,8; 17:12,13; and Job 46:7,8, where the confederated enemies of God’s church are compared to the tempestuous waves of the mighty ocean, which roll one after another with resistless fury upon the storm-tossed bark.”

~~19RE~~ Psalm 93:5. Holiness becometh thine house, O Lord, for ever
Hengstenberg quotes Amyrald:

“Thy house shall by thy sacred august presence remain for ever undefiled, nor shall it be violated or polluted by the insolence of thine enemies.” He adds, “The holiness which becomes the house of such a God (compare ~~23RE~~ Psalm 33:1) must be preserved for it by himself. It is becoming in God that he take care that it be not desecrated by impious hand, compare Psalm 74; 79:1. He can at times, in punishment of the sins of his people, give it up to be laid waste by the ungodly world, but he must always see to it that it rise like a phoenix again from the ashes, so that its holiness is again restored to it. And he has seen to this. In room of the first house destroyed by the Chaldeans, there arose the second, and the second was not destroyed until it had become a mere shell without a kernel, and a glorious new erection of the house of God had come into life in the Christian church. The world did not destroy it; but God himself took down the poor provisional building when the proper one was completed: and this last one shall preserve its sanctity at all times in spite of all the assaults of the destruction-loving world. The fundamental passage is <sup><19216></sup>Psalm 23:6, ‘I dwell in the house of the Lord forever,’ Ἐραὸ <sup><h753></sup> μῶϞ <sup><h3117></sup>, properly ‘for length of days.’ The import in both passages is essentially the same. For the house on behalf of whose preservation the psalmist here expresses his confident hope is the house where the Lord dwells with his people and they with him; and it comes into view only in connection with this property. The preservation of the house for its own sake is not what is spoken of, but only in so far as it is the seat of the church; it is therefore the preservation of the church that lies near the psalmist’s heart. The common translation is, the maintenance of holiness becomes thy house, it is becoming that it should be held holy by us. By this mistranslation the point of the psalm is destroyed. There are to be urged against it: that the thought in the connection is wholly a strange one — the design of the psalm is evidently to impart confident reliance on the protection of the Lord in oppressions from the world — that in Psalm 93; 92; and even in 91; the subject spoken of is what God does for his people, not what they should do for him; besides this, we have the analogous conclusion in Psalm 92, the parallelism, the fundamental passage <sup><19216></sup>Psalm 23:6, and also ‘for the length of days,’ and finally, the which does not signify maintenance of holiness, but holiness.” — Hengstenberg.

NOTES ON PSALM 94

This psalm, in the Septuagint and the Latin Vulgate, is entitled “A Psalm of David, for the fourth day of the week.” What is the origin of this title is unknown, as there is nothing corresponding to it in the Hebrew. In the original the psalm is without a title, nor is there anything in the contents of it which will enable us to determine who was the author, or to fix the date or the occasion of its composition. There is in it nothing necessarily inconsistent with the supposition that David was the author; and there were undoubtedly occasions in his life, when it would have been appropriate. There have been many conjectures as to the author, and as to the occasion on which it was composed. Rudinger refers it to the times of David and the rebellion of Absalom; Venema supposes that it refers to the time of Antiochus Epiphanes, and the persecution under him; DeWette refers it to the time of the Babylonian exile; others suppose that it was written on the eve of the Babylonian captivity. Whatever may have been the occasion, the style and form of the psalm are so general that it may be made a vehicle of pious thought, and of the feelings of the people of God, in all ages.

From the psalm itself it is plain that it was composed during some impending or actual national calamity. This is evident from <sup><194B></sup>Psalm 94:3,4,5,14,20. It would seem, also, from <sup><194C></sup>Psalm 94:7-10, that it was probably some calamity which was brought upon the people by a foreign nation — a nation that defied Yahweh, and proclaimed that he was unable to defend his friends, or that he would not interpose in their behalf: “They say, the Lord shall not see, neither shall the God of Jacob regard it.” The object of the psalm is to show that God “is” the protector of his people; that he “does” regard them; that he “will” interpose in their behalf.

The psalm embraces the following subjects:

- (1) An appeal or prayer to God as the God of vengeance, or as a just God, <sup><194D></sup>Psalm 94:1,2.
- (2) A statement of the character and purposes of the wicked who were bringing these calamities upon the nation, <sup><194E></sup>Psalm 94:3-7.
- (3) A direct appeal to these invaders themselves — an appeal based on the ground that God could “not” be indifferent to the conduct of people; that he must hear their words, understand their thoughts, see their acts, and know all that they did, <sup><9918></sup>Psalm 94:8-11.

(4) Consolation in the trouble derived from the fact that this was a deserved chastening of the Lord, and was not designed for their destruction, but for their good, <sup><9912></sup>Psalm 94:12-15.

(5) The fact that God is a source of confidence, comfort, and support to his people, in all Such times of trial, <sup><9916></sup>Psalm 94:16-23.

<sup><9911></sup>Psalm 94:1. O LORD God, to whom vengeance belongeth ... Margin, God of revenges The idea is, that it pertains to God to take vengeance, or to punish for crimes. See the notes at <sup><6129></sup>Romans 12:19. The appeal here is made to God in view of the crimes committed by others, and which are referred to in the subsequent part of the psalm. God is addressed as having the right to restrain and punish wicked people, and he is asked to interpose and assert that right in a case which clearly demanded it. The appeal is repeated to make it emphatic, or to denote “earnestness” in the petition.

Show thyself Margin, as in Hebrew, “shine forth.” The meaning is, Manifest thyself; come forth as such a God; prove thy right; display thy power, and show that thou art a God opposed to crime and wrong. The same Hebrew word is used here which is found in <sup><9801></sup>Psalm 80:1, and which is there rendered “shine forth.” See the notes at that passage.

<sup><9912></sup>Psalm 94:2. Lift up thyself Be exalted or lifted up so as to be manifest in thy true character. The idea is that God was, as it were, sitting at his ease, or as if he were indifferent to what was occurring in the world. See the notes at <sup><9917></sup>Psalm 3:7.

Thou Judge of the earth Ruler of the world; to whom it pertains to exercise judgment over all classes of people, and in all circumstances. The meaning here is, that as he was the Ruler of the whole earth, this matter came without doubt under his jurisdiction. It was a case for his interposition.

Render a reward to the proud A just recompence to the people who are confident in their own strength, and who are manifesting their pride in depriving others of their rights.

<sup><9913></sup>Psalm 94:3. LORD, how long shall the wicked ... As if there were to be no end to their exaltation; their joy; their success. How long would God allow this? How long would he sit by and see it done? Was he disposed to let them go on forever? Would he never interpose, and arrest them in their career? How often do we wonder that God does not interpose! How often does it seem inexplicable that a Being of almighty power and infinite goodness does not interfere with respect to the wickedness, the oppression, the slavery, the wrong, the cruelty, the fraud, the violence of the world — and put an end to it! Nay, how entirely are we overwhelmed at the thought that he does not put an end to iniquity in the universe altogether; that he never “will” thus interpose, and put an end to sin and sorrow! Such things are too high for us now; perhaps will be always so. Things on earth are not as we should suppose they would be; and we can only pause and adore where we cannot comprehend!

Psalm 94:4. How long shall they utter and speak hard things? The word rendered utter means to pour forth — as water from a fountain; to pour forth copiously. The meaning is, that they seemed to be full, and that they poured forth evil words as a fountain pours forth water. The phrase “hard things” means proud, unfeeling, insolent things; things which are unjust, unkind, severe, harsh.

And all the workers of iniquity boast themselves? Boast of their power and their success. How long shall they be permitted to have such success as may seem to justify them in their exultation?

Psalm 94:5. They break in pieces thy people They tread down; they grind; they crush. The Hebrew word is often used as meaning to crush under foot; to trample on; and hence, it means to oppress. Lamentations 3:34; Isaiah 3:15.

And afflict To wit, by oppression and wrong. If this refers to foreigners, it means that they did this by invasion and by the ravages of war.

Thine heritage Thy people, regarded as an inheritance or possession. See the notes at Psalm 28:9; 33:12; 68:9; 74:2; Isaiah 19:25; 47:6; 1 Peter 5:3.

Psalm 94:6. They slay the widow and the stranger, and murder the fatherless To do this is everywhere represented as a special crime, and as especially offensive to God from the fact that these classes are naturally feeble and unprotected. See the notes at Isaiah 1:17; Psalm 68:5; 82:3.

<9417> Psalm 94:7. Yet they say By their conduct; or, they seem to say.

The LORD shall not see In the original, Hy,<sup><13050></sup>. This is an abbreviation of the word hwbyj<sup><13068></sup>. See the notes at <9804> Psalm 68:4; 83:18. On the impious sentiment here expressed, see the notes at <9101> Psalm 10:11.

Neither shall the God of Jacob regard it Implying that God was indifferent to the conduct of people; that he would not punish the wicked; that sinners have nothing to fear at his hand. This sentiment is very common still, either as an article in their creed, or as implied in their conduct. The doctrine of universal salvation is really founded on this opinion; and most people ACT as if it were their belief that the wicked are in no danger of being punished, and that there is no such attribute in God as justice.

<9418> Psalm 94:8. Understand, ye brutish among the people See <9732> Psalm 73:22. The meaning here is,

“You who are like the brutes; you who see and understand no more of the character and plans of God than the wild beasts of the desert.”

The meaning is, that they did not employ their reason in the case; they acted like beasts, regardless of the consequences of their conduct — AS IF God would treat people as he does the beasts; as if there were no retribution in the future world.

And ye fools, when will ye be wise? How long is this stupidity to continue? When will you attend to the truth; when will you act as immortal beings; when will you suffer your rational nature to lead you up to just views of God? It is implied that this folly had been manifested for a long period, and that it was time they should arouse from this condition, and act like people. With what propriety may this language be addressed still to the great mass of mankind! What numbers of the human race are there now, who in respect to God, and to the purpose for which they were made, evince no more wisdom than the brutes that perish! Oh, if people were truly wise, what a beautiful world would this be; how noble and elevated would be our now degraded race!

<9419> Psalm 94:9. He that planted the ear He that made the ear. The word here used in the original is a participle. “Shall not he planting the ear;” that is, the “planter” of the ear. The idea seems to have been taken from the act of making a “hole” in the ground when we set out a plant — as if, in like manner, a “hole” had been made in the side of the head to insert the ear.

Shall he not hear? He could not have created the faculty of hearing, without possessing it himself. Or, it is reasonable to suppose that he who has made man capable of hearing, must be able to hear himself. We have nothing in our nature which is not possessed in an infinitely higher measure by God.

He that formed the eye This, too, is a participle: “He forming the eye;” that is, the Former of the eye. The word used here is frequently employed in reference to a “potter;” and the idea is that God has moulded or formed the eye as the potter fashions the clay. The more the eye is studied in its structure, the more deeply shall we be impressed with the wonderful skill and wisdom of God. See this beautifully illustrated in Paley’s Natural Theology.

Shall he not see? He that made the eye to see must himself be able to see. He must see all that the eye itself can see; he must see all that all eyes see; he must have the power of sight far beyond what there is in the mere organ which he has made.

<sup><9410></sup>Psalm 94:10. He that chastiseth the heathen More literally, “Shall not the Reprover of nations — shall he not chastise — he that teaches man knowledge?” The idea is, that God exercises a government over the nations of the earth; that he has them under his control; that he brings heavy judgments on them; that he thus conveys great lessons to man. And shall not such a Being, in individual cases, reprove and correct for sin? It is assumed here that God, in fact, brings judgments on nations; that he does this by fire, flood, famine, pestilence; that these things are proofs that he presides over the nations of the earth; and the question here is, whether he that does this on the large scale must not be expected to do it in individual cases, so that the offender will not escape.

Shall not he correct? Shall he not chastise, or bring judgments on offenders?

He that teacheth man knowledge ... The idea in our translation, that he who imparts knowledge to mankind must himself possess intelligence, is a true one, but it is probably not that which is in the original. The sense is probably merely that God is the great Teacher, and this is the impression which it is intended should be impressed on the mind, leaving the consequences of this to be supplied by the reader: “He that teaches man all the knowledge that he has!” — reflect on the consequences of this, or what must follow from this! Such a Being cannot be ignorant; he must understand all things; he must, therefore, see human conduct everywhere as it is. The consequence — the result — of this is stated in the next verse, that he must see the thoughts of man, and understand his real character.

Psalm 94:11. The LORD knoweth the thoughts of man That is, He who teaches people all that they know (<sup>3940</sup>Psalm 94:10), must understand all that there is in the mind. See the notes at <sup>4121</sup>1 Corinthians 3:20.

That they are vanity That is, that they are foolish, vain, unwise, wicked. The knowledge of the thoughts themselves carries with it also the knowledge that they are vain and foolish — for that is their character, and to know them truly is to know this of them. They do not appear to him as they do to people themselves. They are to his view stripped of all that is flattering and illusive, and are seen to be vain and foolish.

Psalm 94:12. Blessed is the man whom thou chastenest, O LORD “Happy the man;” or “Oh the blessedness of the man.” See the notes at <sup>3001</sup>Psalm 1:1. The word here rendered “chastenest” does not mean to chasten in the sense of afflicting or punishing. It means here to instruct; to warn; to admonish; to exhort. So the word is employed in <sup>2007</sup>Proverbs 9:7; <sup>3043</sup>Job 4:3; <sup>19107</sup>Psalm 16:7. The meaning here is, that the man is blessed or happy whom God so “instructs, warns, or teaches,” that he understands the principles of the divine administration. Such a man will see reasons for confidence in him in trouble, and for calmness of mind until punishment is brought upon his enemies.

And teachest him out of thy law Causest him, from thy word, to understand the great principles of thy government.

Psalm 94:13. That thou mayest give him rest Mayest make his mind quiet and calm; mayest save him from murmuring, from despondency, from impatience, by just confidence in thee, and in thy government.

From the days of adversity Or, in the days of evil; the time of calamity and trouble. That his mind may then be composed and calm.

Until the pit be digged for the wicked Until the wicked be punished; that is, while the preparations are going on, or while God seems to delay punishment, and the wicked are suffered to live as if God did not notice them, or would not punish them. The idea is, that the mind should not be impatient as if their punishment would not come, or as if God were unconcerned; and that just views of the divine administration would tend to make the mind calm even when the wicked “seemed” to prosper and triumph. See the notes at <sup><497316></sup>Psalm 73:16-22. The phrase “until the pit be digged” is derived from the method of hunting wild beasts by digging a pit into which they might fall and be taken. See the notes at <sup><49715></sup>Psalm 7:15.

<sup><4945></sup>Psalm 94:15. But judgment shall return unto righteousness That is, The exercise of judgment shall be so manifest to the world — as if it “returned” to it — as to show that there is a righteous God. The truth here taught is, that the “results” of God’s interposition in human affairs will be such as to show that he is on the side of righteousness, or such as to vindicate and maintain the cause of righteousness in the earth.

And all the upright in heart shall follow it Margin, shall be after it. The meaning is, that all who are upright in heart — all who are truly righteous — will follow on in the path of justice; that they will regard what God does as right, and will walk in that path. The fact that what occurs is done by God, will be to them a sufficient revelation of what ought to be done; and they will follow out the teachings properly suggested by the divine dealings as their rules of life. In other words, the manifested laws of the divine administration will be to them an indication of what is right; and they will embrace and follow the lessons thus made known to them by the dealings of Divine Providence as the rules of their own conduct.

<sup><4946></sup>Psalm 94:16. Who will rise up for me against the evil-doers? ... This is the language of the psalmist. It is what he had said in the circumstances referred to in the first part of the psalm, when the wicked seemed to triumph; when they had come in upon the land, and laid waste the heritage of God, <sup><4943></sup>Psalm 94:3-6. At that time, full of anxiety and trouble, and deeply impressed with a sense of danger, he had anxiously looked around for help, and had asked with deep concern who would stand up for him and defend him. The following verses (<sup><39417></sup>Psalm 94:17,18) show what was then his reliance, and in what way confidence in God had kept him from falling into despair.

<sup><39417></sup>Psalm 94:17. Unless the LORD had been my help At the time referred to. If I had not had a God to whom I could have gone — if my mind had not been directed to him — if I had not actually found him a refuge and strength, I should have despaired altogether. There was no other one to whom I could go; there was nothing else but the help of God on which I could rely.

My soul had almost dwelt in silence Margin, quickly. The original is, “It was as it were but little;” that is, there was little lacking to bring this about; a little heavier pressure — a little added to what I was then suffering — a little longer time before relief was obtained — would have brought me down to the land of silence — to the grave. The Latin Vulgate renders this, “My soul had dwelt ‘in inferno.’” “The Septuagint, “in Hades” —  $\tau\omega$  <sup><3588></sup>  $\acute{\alpha}\delta\eta$  <sup><86></sup>. See <sup><3817></sup>Psalm 31:17. The grave is represented as a place of silence, or as the land of silence: <sup><3857></sup>Psalm 115:17: “The dead praise not the Lord, neither any that go down into silence.” Compare <sup><108></sup>Amos 8:3.

<sup><39418></sup>Psalm 94:18. When I said, My foot slippeth I can no longer stand. My strength is gone; and I must sink into the grave. The original here is, “If I say, My foot slippeth,” etc. The statement is general; that if at any time he had been, or should be, in such circumstances, then God would interpose. The general remark, however, is founded on his interposition on this particular occasion. His aid was then so marked and timely, that he felt that he could make the declaration general in regard to his whole life — to all circumstances in which he would ever be placed.

Thy mercy, O LORD, held me up By thy merciful interposition thou didst keep me from falling. It was strength put forth as the expression of “mercy;” not strength to which he had any claim. How often in life may we say this of ourselves, that when just ready to sink; when our strength was almost gone; when a little severer pressure would have brought us to the grave, God by his mercy and his power interposed and saved us! Every such act of mercy — every new interposition in this manner — is a new gift of life, and lays us under obligation as if we had been just created, for it is just so much more of life given us by God.

Psalm 94:19. In the multitude of my thoughts within me thy comforts delight my soul The Septuagint and the Latin Vulgate render this, “In the multitude of my griefs within me,” etc. DeWette renders it, “Bei meinen vielen Sorgen,” “in my many cares.” The Hebrew word, however, properly means “thoughts;” and the idea seems to be that in the great number of thoughts which passed through his mind, so many of them perplexing, anxious, burdensome — so many of them vain and profitless — so many of them that seemed to come and go without any aim or object, there was one class that gave him comfort. They were those which pertained to God. In those thoughts he found calmness and peace. However much he might be disturbed by other thoughts, yet here he found rest and peace. In God — in his character, in his law, in his government — he had an unfailing source of consolation; and whatever trouble he might have from the cares of life, and from the evil imaginings in his own mind, yet here his soul found repose. God was an unfailing refuge; and meditation on him and his perfections made the mind calm. How many thoughts pass through our minds in a single day or a single hour! Who can tell from where they come, or by what laws they are linked together! How many of them seem to have no connection with any that went before! How many of them seem to be thrown into our minds when we would avoid them! How many are vain and frivolous; how many are skeptical; how many are polluted and polluting! How many come into the mind which we would not for worlds disclose to our best friends! How few of us would walk abroad if we were conscious that all whom we meet could look into our bosoms, and see all that is passing there! What a consolation it is to us that they cannot see it! What a world of confusion and blushes would this be if, in the streets of a crowded city, or when man meets his fellow man anywhere, all that is in his bosom were known! And yet, in this multitude of thoughts — so empty, so foolish, so sinful, so vexing, so skeptical, so polluting — there are others — there are thoughts of God, of Christ, of heaven, of hope, of faith, of love, of benevolence; thoughts within us, when the divine promises come to the heart, and the prospect of heaven warms the soul. These give “comfort;” these fill the soul with “delight.” Happy he who can find in his bosom, amidst the multitude of thoughts within him, those which pertain to God; to a higher life; to heaven!

Psalm 94:20. Shall the throne of iniquity The throne established in iniquity; or, sustaining iniquity. The allusion is probably to what was referred to in the former part of the psalm — the powers that were spreading desolation through the land — wicked princes or rulers, <sup><194B></sup>Psalm 94:3-7. Their thrones were established on evil; they defended wickedness and wrong by their authority; they abused their power, and employed it to overthrow the rights of others. The “phrase” would be applicable to any unjust government, or to any laws that are designed to uphold that which is wrong. Such are all the laws which authorize or uphold slavery, gaming, lotteries, the traffic in intoxicating drinks, etc.

Have fellowship with thee With God. Shall they be united with thee; be sustained by thee; be regarded as a part of thine administration? Wilt thou sanction them? Wilt thou give to them thy patronage, as if they met with thine approbation? The Hebrew word means to be associated with, or allied to, and would be properly applied to a partnership, or anything where there is fellowship or alliance. The interrogative form here strongly implies that this “cannot be.” Such laws — such purposes — “cannot” be in accordance with the laws and authority of God; or, in other words, God does not sit on the same throne with those who authorize and by law sustain slavery, intemperance, and gambling. There can be no partnership here.

Which frameth mischief by a law The word rendered “mischief” usually means labor, toil; and then, trouble, vexation, sorrow. It may, however, be used to denote evil of any kind — crime, or wrong. The word rendered frameth means to form, to fashion, to make, as a potter does clay; <sup><100E></sup>Genesis 2:7,8,19; or as a workman does statues, <sup><234D></sup>Isaiah 44:9,10,12; or as one makes weapons, <sup><2547></sup>Isaiah 54:17. It is often applied to God as the Creator. See the notes at <sup><194D></sup>Psalm 94:9: “he that formed the eye.” The word law here means a rule or statute; and the idea is, that the iniquity referred to was not the result of an irregular and fitful impulse; or of passion; of sudden excitement; or of mere “will” in a particular case; but was reduced to statute, and sustained by law. The expression would apply to all those cases where evil is upheld by the government or by civil authority, or where those who are engaged in it can plead in their defense the sanction of law. The statement here is, that such acts “cannot” have fellowship with God, or receive his approval. It is an insult to God to suppose that he has ever appointed legislators or magistrates for the purpose of making or upholding such enactments. Yet there are many such laws in the world; and a main reason why it is so difficult to remove such evils as have been above referred to is the fact that they are sustained by law, and that they who hold slaves, or open gambling-houses, or sell intoxicating drinks, can plead the authority of the law; or, in other words, that the laws have done all they can to place such things on a level with those which “ought” to be protected by statute. Many a man in his business looks no further than to the laws of the land, and if he has their sanction, in vain is the attempt to induce him to abandon a business that leads to oppression, or that scatters woe and sorrow through a community.

<sup><4902></sup>Psalm 94:21. They gather themselves together against the soul of the righteous Against the life of the righteous; that is, to take their lives. The Hebrew word rendered “gather together,” means to press or crowd upon anyone; to rush in crowds or troops. It would refer particularly to a tumultuous gathering — “a mob” — intent on accomplishing its purpose.

And condemn the innocent blood literally, make guilty; that is, they hold that blood to be guilty; or, they treat the innocent as if they were guilty.

<sup><4902></sup>Psalm 94:22. But the LORD is my defense ... In all these purposes of the wicked; in all that they do — whether under the form and sanction of law (<sup><4901></sup>Psalm 94:20), or by the excitement of passion — my trust is still in God. He is able to interpose in either case, and I may confidently commit my cause to him. On the language used here, as well as the sentiment, see the notes at <sup><4980></sup>Psalm 18:2.

<sup><4903></sup>Psalm 94:23. And he shall bring upon them their own iniquity The consequences of their sin. He shall punish them as they deserve. See the notes at <sup><4976></sup>Psalm 7:16.

And shall cut them off in their own wickedness As the result of their wickedness, and while they are engaged in perpetrating acts of sin.

Yea, the LORD our God shall cut them off Expressing, by the repetition of the sentiment, the utmost confidence that this would be so. This is in accordance with the prayer with which the psalm opens, and is expressive of entire faith that God will deal justly with the children of men. However the wicked may seem to prosper and to triumph, yet the day of vengeance is approaching, and all which they have deserved will come upon them.

APPENDIX NOTES ON PSALM 94

<sup><4901></sup>Psalm 94:11. The Lord knoweth the thoughts of man, that they are vanity Surely it is the design of God in all his dispensations, and by all the discoveries of his Word, to stain the pride of all flesh. The dust is the proper place for a creature, and that place we must occupy. What a humbling thought is here suggested to us! Let us examine it:

1. If vanity had been ascribed to the meaner parts of the creation — if all inanimate and irrational beings, whose days are as a shadow, and who know not from where they came nor where they go, had been thus characterized — it had little more than accorded with our own ideas. But the humiliating truth belongs to man, the lord of the lower creation — to man, that distinguished link in the chain of being which unites in his person mortality and immortality, heaven and earth. The “Lord knoweth the thoughts of man, that they are vanity.”
2. Had vanity been ascribed to the exercises of our sensual or mortal part, or of that which we possess in common with other animals, it had been less humiliating. But the charge is pointed at that which is the special glory of man, the intellectual part, his thoughts. It is here, if anywhere, that we excel the creatures which are placed around us. We can contemplate our own existence, dive into the past and the future, and understand from where we came and where we go. Yet in this tender part are we touched. Even the thoughts of man are vanity.
3. If vanity had been ascribed merely to those loose and trifling excursions of the imagination which fall not under the influence of choice, a kind of comers and goers, which are ever floating in the mind, like insects in the air on a summer’s evening, it had been less affecting. The soul of man seems to be necessarily active. Everything we see, hear, taste, feel, or perceive, has some influence upon thought which is moved by it, as the leaves on the trees are moved by every breeze of wind. But “thoughts” here include those exercises of the mind in which it is voluntarily or intensely engaged, and in which we are in earnest; even all our schemes, contrivances, and purposes. One would think, if there were anything in man to be accounted of, it should be those exercises in which his intellectual faculty is seriously and intensely employed. Yet the Lord knoweth that even these are vanity.
4. If, during our state of childhood and youth only, vanity had been ascribed to our thoughts, it would have been less surprising. This is a truth of which numberless parents have painful proof; yea, and of which children themselves, as they grow up to maturity, are generally conscious. Vanity at this period, however, admits of some apology. The obstinacy and folly of some young people, while they provoke disgust, often excite a tear of pity.

But the charge is exhibited against man. “Man at his best estate is altogether vanity.”

5. The decision proceeds from a quarter from which there can be no appeal: “The Lord knoweth” it. Opinions dishonorable to our species may sometimes arise from ignorance, sometimes from spleen and disappointment, and sometimes from a gloomy turn of mind which views mankind through a distorted medium. But the judgment given in this passage is the decision of him who cannot err; a decision therefore to which, if we had no other proof, it becomes us to accede. — Fuller.

Psalm 94:19. In the multitude of my thoughts within me, thy comforts delight my soul

1. Uneasy thoughts arise from the disordered state of the world. On this subject great consolation springs from the conviction that the Lord reigneth. There sit at the helm infinite power, wisdom, and goodness. These perfections are of such a nature that renders it impossible to lie dormant or inactive: they are in perpetual operation; and in the final result they will appear with in effable splendor and beauty. “Clouds and darkness are round about him, righteousness and judgment are the habitation of his throne.” Under the administration of such a being, all events will infallibly terminate well — well for the interests of his glory, and well for the interests of his people. With whatever uneasiness we may contemplate the prevalence of moral disorder, and its portentous effects in a future state, the page of revelation assures us that ultimately the world will be filled with holy and happy creatures; that religion and virtue will prove triumphant; and that all nations shall see the glory of God and worship at his footstool. And with respect to the final state of the wicked, there is every reason to conclude that their numbers will bear no proportion to those of the blessed, and that thus no more misery will be inflicted than what will be rendered conducive to the order and happiness of the universe.

2. Under painful apprehensions respecting the state of the church, the comforts of God are neither few nor small. It behoves us, on such occasions, to reflect that it is incomparably more his care than ours; that as the Saviour bought it with his blood, he will not fail to guide and govern it in the best manner possible. He has promised, “The gates of hell shall not prevail against it.” His interpositions in its favor afford a pledge of what he will still accomplish: “I gave Egypt for thy ransom, Ethiopia and Sheba for thee. Since thou wast precious in my sight thou hast been honorable, and I have loved thee; therefore will I give men for thee, and people for thy life.” ... Afflictions are designed to purify the church.

3. Under the distressing thoughts arising from the state of a Christian, as an individual, the divine comforts are proposed. In temporal affliction and privations how consoling is it to reflect that they are all ordered in infinite wisdom, and proceed from the purest benignity; that they will issue in our advantage, and that they will be but of short duration. This, may the afflicted Christian reflect, is not an eternal state; these afflictions are but for a moment. “Weeping may endure for a night, but joy cometh in the morning.” — Robert Hall.

NOTES ON PSALM 95

Of the author of this psalm nothing is certainly known. It is, however, ascribed to David in the Latin Vulgate and in the Septuagint; and in ~~<3017>~~Hebrews 4:7, it is referred to as a psalm of David: “Again, he limiteth a certain day, saying in David, “Today, if ye will hear his voice,”” etc. This language may refer in general to the Book of Psalms, called from their chief author, the Psalms of David; or it may mean that David was the author of this particular psalm. Either supposition would meet all that is demanded by the quotation in the Epistle to the Hebrews. There is, however, no improbability in the supposition that the psalm was written by David, as he doubtless composed many songs to which his name was not attached.

Nothing is known of the “occasion” on which the psalm was composed. It is a general song of praise, and contains only such language as might be proper in any period of the Jewish history after the people were established in the promised land. It is, indeed, a “Hebrew” song; it has reference to the Hebrew people; and it contains such arguments and appeals as would be particularly adapted to influence them.

The psalm consists of three parts:

I. An exhortation to praise and worship God, ~~<1981>~~Psalm 95:1,2.

II. Reasons for offering such praise, ~~<1983>~~Psalm 95:3-7:

(a) He is a great God, ~~<1983>~~Psalm 95:3;

(b) He has made all things, and all things are under his control, ~~<1984>~~Psalm 95:4,5;

(c) He is our Maker, ~~<1985>~~Psalm 95:6;

(d) He is our God, and we are his people, ~~<1987>~~Psalm 95:7.

III. An exhortation not to harden the heart; not to be perverse and rebellious, ~~<1987>~~Psalm 95:7-11. This is enforced by the example of the Israelites in the wilderness, and by the results which followed from their tempting God, and provoking his wrath. The appeal is founded on the fact that, in consequence of their rebellion, they were shut out of the promised land. On the same principle, if we are rebellious, we shall be excluded from heaven.

Psalm 95:1. O come, let us sing unto the LORD The word here rendered come, means properly “go;” but it is used here, as it often is, as a formula of invitation, in calling on others to share in what is done by the speaker. It is here to be understood as used by one portion of an assembly convened for worship addressing the other portion, and calling on them to unite in the praise of God.

Let us make a joyful noise The word used here means commonly to make a loud noise, to shout, <sup><1830></sup>Job 30:5. It is especially used

(a) of warlike shouts, <sup><676></sup>Joshua 6:16; <sup><972></sup>1 Samuel 17:20;

(b) of the shout of triumph, <sup><754></sup>Judges 15:14;

(c) of the sound or clangor of a trumpet, <sup><409></sup>Numbers 10:9; <sup><200></sup>Joel 2:1.

It may thus be used to denote any shout of joy or praise. In public worship it would denote praise of the most animated kind.

To the Rock of our salvation The strong ground of our confidence; the basis of our hope; our security. See the notes at <sup><982></sup>Psalm 18:2.

Psalm 95:2. Let us come before his presence Margin, as in Hebrew, “prevent his face.” The word in Hebrew means literally to come before; to anticipate. It is the word which is commonly rendered “prevent.” See the notes at <sup><182></sup>Job 3:12; <sup><973></sup>Psalm 17:13; 59:10; <sup><505></sup>1 Thessalonians 4:15. Here it means to come before, in the sense of “in front of.” Let us stand before his face; that is, in his very presence.

With thanksgiving Expressing our thanks.

And make a joyful noise unto him The same word which occurs in <sup><981></sup>Psalm 95:1.

With psalms Songs of praise.

Psalm 95:3. For the LORD is a great God For Yahweh is a great God. The object is to exalt Jehovah, the true God, as distinguished from all who were worshipped as gods. The first idea is that he is “great;” that he is exalted over all the universe; that he rules over all, and that he is to be worshipped as such.

And a great King above all gods This does not mean that he is a great ruler of all other gods, as if they had a real existence, but that he is king or ruler far above all that were worshipped as gods, or to whom homage was paid. Whoever, or whatever was worshipped as God, Yahweh was supreme over all things. He occupied the throne; and all others must be beneath him, and under his dominion. If the sun, the moon, or the stars were worshipped — if the mountains or the rivers — if angels good or bad — yet Yahweh was above all these. If imaginary beings were worshipped, yet Yahweh in his perfections was exalted far above all that was ascribed to them, for He was the true God, and the Ruler of the universe, while they were beings of the imagination only.

<sup><1984></sup>Psalm 95:4. In his hand In his power, or under his control as his own. That is, he so possesses all things that they can be claimed by no other. His right over them is absolute and entire.

Are the deep places of the earth The word used here — rqj jn,<sup><14278></sup> — means the interior, the inmost depth; that which is “searched out,” from — rqjæ<sup><12713></sup> — to search, search out, explore. The primary idea is that of searching by boring or digging; and the allusion here is to the parts of the earth which could be explored only by digging — as in mining, or sinking shafts in the earth. The meaning is, that all those places which lie beyond the ordinary power of observation in man are in the hand of God. He knows them as clearly as those which are most plain to human view; he possesses or owns them as his own as really as he does those which are on the surface of the ground.

The strength of the hills is his also Margin, “The heights of the hills are his.” The word rendered “strength” — hp[w]<sup><18443></sup> — means properly swiftness or speed in running; then, weariness, wearisome labor; and hence, wealth obtained by labor; “treasures.” Here the expression means “treasures of the mountains;” that is, treasures obtained out of the mountains, the precious metals, etc. Compare the notes at <sup><18225></sup>Job 22:25, where the same word occurs. All this belongs to God. As he is the Maker of these hills, and of all that they contain, the absolute proprietorship is in him.

<sup><1985></sup>Psalm 95:5. The sea is his Margin, as in Hebrew, “Whose the sea is.” That is, The sea belongs to him, with all which it contains.

And he made it It is his, “because” he made it. The creation of anything gives the highest possible right over it.

And his hands formed the dry land He has a claim, therefore, that it should be recognized as his, and that all who dwell upon it, and derive their support from it, should acknowledge him as its great Owner and Lord.

Psalm 95:6. O come, let us worship and bow down Let us worship him by bowing down; by prostrating ourselves before him. The word here rendered “come” is not the same which is used in <sup><95:1></sup>Psalm 95:1. Its literal meaning is “come,” and it is an earnest exhortation to come and worship. It is not a particle merely calling attention to a subject, but it is an exhortation to approach — to enter — to engage in a thing. The word rendered “worship,” means properly to bow down; to incline oneself; and then, to bow or prostrate oneself before anyone in order to do him homage, or reverence. Then it means to bow down before God in the attitude of worship. It would most naturally refer to an entire “prostration” on the ground, which was a common mode of worship; but it would also express adoration in any form. The word rendered “bow down,” means properly to bend, to bow, spoken usually of the knees. <sup><45:23></sup>Isaiah 45:23: “every knee shall bow.” Compare <sup><7:5,6></sup>Judges 7:5,6; <sup><8:54></sup>1 Kings 8:54; <sup><1:13></sup>2 Kings 1:13. The word might be applied, like the former word, to those who bow down with the whole person, or prostrate themselves on the ground. <sup><7:3></sup>2 Chronicles 7:3.

Let us kneel before the LORD our Maker The usual attitude of prayer in the Scriptures. See the notes at <sup><6:10></sup>Daniel 6:10; compare <sup><6:13></sup>2 Chronicles 6:13; <sup><22:41></sup>Luke 22:41; <sup><7:60></sup>Acts 7:60; 9:40; 20:36; 21:5. All the expressions here employed denote a posture of profound reverence in worship, and the passage is a standing rebuke of all irreverent postures in prayer; of such habits as often prevail in public worship where no change of posture is made in prayer, and where a congregation irreverently sit in the act of professedly worshipping God. People show to their fellowmen the respect indicated by rising up before them: much more should they show respect to God — respect in a posture which will indicate profound reverence, and a deep sense of his presence and majesty. Reverently kneeling or standing “will” indicate this; sitting does not indicate it.

Psalm 95:7. For he is our God Not only the God whom we worship as the true God, but One who has revealed himself to us as our God. We worship him as God — as entitled to praise and adoration because he is the true God; we worship him also as sustaining the relation of God to us, or because we recognize him as our God, and because he has manifested himself as ours.

And we are the people of his pasture whom he has recognized as his flock; to whom he sustains the relation of shepherd; who feeds and protects us as the shepherd does his flock. See the notes at <sup><97913></sup>Psalm 79:13; compare <sup><921></sup>Psalm 23:1-3.

And the sheep of his hand The flock that is guided and fed by his hand.

To day if ye will hear his voice His voice calling you; commanding you; inviting you; encouraging you. See this passage explained in the notes at <sup><8817></sup>Hebrews 3:7-11. The word “today” here means “the present time;” now. The idea is, that the purpose to obey should not be deferred until tomorrow; should not be put off to the future. The commands of God should be obeyed at once; the purpose should be executed immediately. All God’s commands relate to the present. He gives us none for the future; and a true purpose to obey God exists only where there is a willingness to obey “now,” “today;” and can exist only then. A purpose to repent at some future time, to give up the world at some future time, to embrace the Gospel at some future time, is “no obedience,” for there is no such command addressed to us. A resolution to put off repentance and faith, to defer attention to religion until some future time, is real disobedience — and often the worst form of disobedience — for it is directly in the face of the command of God. “If ye will hear.” That is, If there is a disposition or willingness to obey his voice at all; or, to listen to his commands. See the notes at <sup><8817></sup>Hebrews 3:7.

<sup><988></sup>Psalm 95:9. When your fathers Your ancestors. See this verse explained in the notes on <sup><8817></sup>Hebrews 3:9.

Tempted me Tried me; tried my patience, to see how much I would bear. This does not mean, as it commonly does now with us, to place inducements before one to lead him into sin, but to try one — to put his patience to the test. This they did, in the case referred to, by their obduracy and evil conduct.

Proved me See the notes at <sup><880></sup>Hebrews 3:9. “And saw my work.” Though they constantly saw my work; saw my gracious interpositions; saw what I was doing for their own good.

<sup><950></sup>Psalm 95:10. Forty years long All the time that they were in the wilderness. During this long period their conduct was such as to try my patience and forbearance.

Was I grieved The word used here — <sup>fWq</sup><sup><16962></sup> — means properly to loathe, to nauseate, to be disgusted with. It is translated “loathe” in <sup><880></sup>Ezekiel 6:9; 20:43; 36:31; and grieved in <sup><880></sup>Psalm 119:158; 139:21. It is here expressive of the strong abhorrence which God had of their conduct. Compare <sup><880></sup>Revelation 3:16.

With this generation With the entire generation that came out of Egypt. They were all cut off in the wilderness, except Caleb and Joshua.

And said, It is a people It is a characteristic of the entire people, that they are disposed to wander from God.

That do err in their heart In the Epistle to the Hebrews (<sup><880></sup>Hebrews 3:10) where this is quoted, it is, “They do always err in their heart.” The sense is substantially the same. See the notes at that place.

And they have not known my ways See the notes at <sup><880></sup>Hebrews 3:10.

That they should not enter into my rest Margin, as in Hebrew, “If they enter into my rest.” The “rest” here referred to was the land of Canaan. They were not permitted to enter there as a place of “rest” after their long and weary wanderings, but died in the wilderness. The meaning is not that none of them were saved (for we must hope that very many of them were brought to the heavenly Canaan), but that they did not come to the promised land. Unbelief shut them out; and this fact is properly made use of here, and in Hebrews 3, as furnishing a solemn warning to all not to be unbelieving and rebellious, since the consequence of unbelief and rebellion must be to exclude us from the kingdom of heaven, the true place of “rest.”

APPENDIX NOTES ON PSALM 95

The psalm is an invitation to the chosen people, the flock of God’s pasture, to worship their divine Shepherd and to serve him with sincerity and willingness. The calling and training of a special people were the means by which from an early period God had unfolded his design of bringing all mankind to a recognition of his sovereignty. Israel was thus the light that was to give light to the whole world; and in the dealings of God with Israel, and of Israel with God, were to be practically exemplified the mutual relation of the sheep and their Creator-shepherd. Hence, the solemn summons to Israel to worship and bow down, and kneel before the Lord their Maker, who was their God, they being the people of his pasture and the sheep of his hand. But what if the light should itself become darkness? What if those who were to be the special witnesses for God’s sovereignty should themselves become like the world who despised it? What if those whose history was designed especially to illustrate the blessings of obedience to God’s shepherd-rule should themselves tempt and provoke the God who had called them? Alas! the fathers of the Israelites had already thus transgressed, and God had been forced to punish them by not suffering them to enter into his rest. And hence the solemn warning in the latter part of the psalm, to succeeding generations of the chosen flock not to harden their hearts in like manner.

The particular appropriateness of such a warning in the days of Josiah’s reign, when this psalm was probably written, was long ago noticed by Theodoret. The discovery of the lost book of the law had then shown how fearfully the Israelites of that and the preceding generations had departed from the precepts that had been given for their observance. And the spirit of God’s sentence upon the rebellious generation of the wilderness, that they should not enter into his rest, had been then again displayed in the doom uttered by the prophetess Huldah:

“Thus saith the Lord, Behold I will bring evil upon this place, and upon the inhabitants thereof, even all the words of the book which the King of Judah hath read; because they have forsaken me, and have burned incense unto-other gods, that they might provoke me to anger with all the works of their hands; therefore my wrath shall be kindled against this place, and shall not be quenched.”

The indirect evidence thus afforded of the date at which the psalm was written is corroborated by the protests which are introduced into the earlier portion of the psalm against the follies of idolatry, <sup><99B></sup>Psalm 95:3-5: idolatry being the special sin for which the doom of God was in Josiah's reign hanging over the city of Jerusalem.

It would, however, have been mere mockery, after the doom of destruction on Jerusalem was pronounced, to bid the people be not hard-hearted like their fathers, had nothing more remained to which they might still look forward. But there were blessings in store. The series of psalms of which this forms a part, Psalm 93—100, is, as we have already explained, essentially prophetic. Behind the darkness of the approaching Chaldean catastrophe the prophets had already hailed the advancing light of the future manifestation of God's kingdom; and it was to this that the people's expectations were now being directed by the psalmist. In closing his psalm with an allusion to God's promised rest, he implied that for the people of God a rest still remained. His own generation might at least welcome from afar that promised glory of God which their children should behold; and in that prospect might, with Moses toward the close of the wanderings in the wilderness, seek to be taught to apply their hearts to wisdom.

With the above view of the import of this psalm agrees the practical exposition of its latter verses given in the Epistle to the Hebrews; if at least we allow the fact that the New Testament writer, living under the Christian dispensation, necessarily looked forward not to the first but to the second advent. For it has been the property of each divine dispensation under which people have lived to show the incompleteness of past events with reference to the promises which God has made. The Israelites after entering Canaan found that God's rest should not be theirs until God's Messiah should appear: hence, the “today if ye will hear his voice” of the psalmist. And in like manner, after the coming of the Messiah and the proclamation of the divine kingdom, Christian believers still found that God's rest could not be fully theirs until all earthly toil and sin should be ended by the second appearance of their King in glory: hence the “today if ye will hear his voice” of the apostle. The name David, <sup><80U></sup>Hebrews 4:7, is, it need scarcely be remarked, a general designation of the Psalter, and does not indicate the authorship of the particular psalm quoted: we in like manner still apply the name Samuel to two historical books narrating events long posterior to that prophet's death. — Thrupp.

NOTES ON PSALM 96

This psalm is similar in structure and design to Psalm 95. It is an exhortation to universal praise, and was doubtless designed to be used in public worship — in the service of the sanctuary.

The psalm has no title in the Hebrew, and its authorship cannot with any certainty be determined. There is, however, a very marked similarity between this psalm and a portion of that which was composed and sung at the removal of the ark by David, as recorded in 1 Chronicles 16, and of which it is said (~~1~~1 Chronicles 16:7), “Then on that day David delivered first this psalm to thank the Lord, into the hand of Asaph and his brethren.” Of the original psalm, therefore, David was undoubtedly the author. Psalm 96 is merely an abridgment of that one, or more properly an extract from it, since it is essentially similar to one portion of it, and is taken from it with very slight variations, ~~1~~1 Chronicles 16:23-33. But by whom the extract and the slight alterations were made, and on what occasion this was done, we have no certain means of ascertaining. The title in the Septuagint is, “When the house was built after the captivity. An ode by David.” The same is the title in the Latin Vulgate. According to this, it is supposed that on the dedication of the temple, when it was rebuilt after the Babylonian captivity, a portion of a psalm composed by David was selected and arranged for that purpose. Hence, it might be properly called “A Psalm of David;” though not, of course, composed by him for that particular occasion. This seems to me to be a very probable account of the origin of the psalm, and of the reason why it has its present form. In the original psalm (1 Chronicles 16) there were things which would not be particularly appropriate to the dedication of the temple, while the portion which is extracted is eminently suited for such a service. DeWette doubts the genuineness of the psalm in 1 Chronicles 16; and Hengstenberg supposes that that psalm was made up of parts taken from psalms which were then in common use. But it seems to me that the suggestion above is the most natural, and sufficiently explains the origin of this psalm. It would be very appropriate to the re-dedication of the temple; and it is appropriate to be used in similar services at all times.

The structure of the psalm is very simple, and it does not admit of any particular analysis.

Psalm 96:1. O sing unto the LORD a new song See the notes at Psalm 33:3. This is the only addition made to the original form of the psalm. The word new here implies that there was some fresh occasion for celebrating the praises of God; that some event had occurred, or that some truth relating to the divine character had now been made known, which could not well be expressed in any psalm or hymn then in use. It is a call on all to celebrate the praises of the Lord in a “new” song — new, particularly, as it calls on “all the earth” to join in it; and possibly this was designed to suggest the idea that while that temple stood, a dispensation would commence, under which the distinction between the Jews and the Gentiles would be broken down, and all mankind would unite in the praise of God.

Sing unto the LORD, all the earth All nations. All people had occasion to bless his name; to praise him. What he had done, what he was still doing, was of interest to all lands, and made an appeal to all people to praise him. The psalm is constructed on this supposition, that the occasion for praise referred to was one in which all people were interested; or, in other words, that Yahweh was the true God over all the nations, and that all people should acknowledge him.

Psalm 96:2. Sing unto the LORD, bless his name This verse is substantially the same as 1 Chronicles 16:23; “Sing unto the Lord, all the earth; show forth from day to day his salvation.”

Show forth his salvation His interposition; the fact that he has saved or delivered us. This may have referred originally in particular to what he had done to save the people in time of danger, but the language is such also as to express salvation in a higher sense — salvation from sin and death. As such it may be employed to express what God has done for mankind — for all people, Jews and Gentiles — in providing a way of salvation, and making it possible that they should reach heaven. For this all people have occasion for praise.

From day to day Continually; always. It is a fit subject for unceasing praise. Every man should praise God every day — on each returning morning, and on every evening — for the assurance that there is a way of salvation provided for him, and “that he may be happy forever.” If we had right feelings, this would be the first thought which would burst upon the mind each morning, irradiating, as with sunbeams, all around us; and it would be the last thought which would linger in the soul as we lie down at night, and close our eyes in slumber — making us grateful, calm, happy, as we sink to rest, for whether we wake or not in this world we may be forever happy.

Psalm 96:3. Declare his glory among the heathen Among the nations; the people who are not Hebrews. The meaning is, Let it be proclaimed in all lands, among all people. Let it not be confined to those who are professedly his people, but let it be announced everywhere. This is copied literally from <sup><3163></sup>1 Chronicles 16:24.

His wonders among all people His “marvelous works;” those things which are suited to produce astonishment in the mind. The reference is to those works and doings of God which lie so far beyond the power of any created being, and which by their vastness, their wisdom, and their benevolence, are suited to produce a deep impression on the human mind.

Psalm 96:4. For the LORD is great Yahweh is great. See the notes at <sup><3173></sup>Psalm 77:13. This verse is taken literally from <sup><3165></sup>1 Chronicles 16:25.

And greatly to be praised Worthy of exalted praise and adoration.

He is to be feared above all gods He is to be revered and adored above all that are called gods. Higher honor is to be given him; more lofty praise is to be ascribed to him. He is Ruler over all the earth, and has a claim to universal praise. Even if it were admitted that they were real gods, yet it would still be true that they were local and inferior divinities; that they ruled only over the particular countries where they were worshipped and acknowledged as gods, and that they had no claim to “universal” adoration as Yahweh has.

Psalm 96:5. For all the gods of the nations are idols All the gods worshipped by the people of other lands are mere “idols.” None of them can claim to have a real existence as gods. The word here rendered “idols” is translated by the Septuagint, δαίμονια <sup><1140></sup>, “demons.” So the Latin Vulgate “daemonia.” The Hebrew word — לַיִלְאִים <sup><h457></sup> — means properly “of nothing, nought, empty, vain.” See <sup><3134></sup>Job 13:4. The meaning here is, that they were mere nothings; they had no real existence; they were the creations of the imagination; they could not in any sense be regarded as what it was pretended they were; they had no claim to reverence and worship as gods. Of most of them it was a fact that they had no existence at all, but were mere creatures of fancy. Of those that did really exist, as the sun, moon, stars, animals, or the spirits of departed people, though it was true that they had an actual existence, yet it was also true that they had no existence “as gods,” or as entitled to worship; and hence, it was also true that the worship offered to them was as vain as that which was offered to mere beings of the imagination. This verse is extracted literally from <sup><1316></sup>1 Chronicles 16:26. The Hebrew is the same.

But the LORD made the heavens Yahweh CREATED the heavenly hosts, and therefore he is the true God, and is entitled to worship. The power of “creation” — of causing anything to exist where there was nothing before — must pertain to God alone, and is the highest act of Divinity. No pretended pagan god has that power; no man has that power. The true God has reserved the exercise of that power to himself, and has never, in any instance, imparted it to a created being.

Strength and beauty are in his sanctuary This is slightly varied from the parallel passage in <sup><1316></sup>1 Chronicles 16:27. The word rendered “strength” is in both places the same. The word rendered “beauty” here — hrapji<sup><1859></sup> — is in <sup><1316></sup>1 Chronicles 16:27 hwdj, <sup><1230></sup> — “joy or gladness.” The word here rendered “sanctuary” — vDqjñ<sup><1472></sup> — is in <sup><1316></sup>1 Chronicles 16:27 — μwQm,<sup><1472></sup> — “place.” These variations are such as to show that the psalm is not a mere extract, but that it was altered of design, and adapted to the occasion on which it was to be employed — confirming the supposition that it may have been used in the re-dedication of the temple after the return from the captivity. The word “sanctuary” refers to the holy place where God dwells; his sacred abode, whether his residence in heaven, or the temple on earth as the place of his earthly habitation. When it is said that “strength” is there, it means that the dwelling-place of God is the source of “power,” or that power emanates from thence; that is, from God himself. When it is said that “beauty” is there, the meaning is, that whatever is suited to charm by loveliness; whatever is a real ornament; whatever makes the world attractive; whatever beautifies and adorns creation, has its home in God; it proceeds from him. It may be added that whatever there is of “power” to reform the world, and convert sinners; whatever there is to turn people from their vicious and abandoned course of life; whatever there is to make the world better and happier, proceeds from the “sanctuary” — the church of God. Whatever there is that truly adorns society, and makes it more lovely and attractive; whatever there is that diffuses a charm over domestic and social life; whatever there is that makes the world more lovely or more desirable to live in — more courteous, more gentle, more humane, more kind, more forgiving — has its home in the “sanctuary,” or emanates from the church of God.

Psalm 96:7. Give unto the LORD Ascribe unto the Lord — to Yahweh. This is extracted literally from <sup><1368></sup>1 Chronicles 16:28.

O ye kindreds of the people Hebrew, “Families” of the people: people, as united by family ties. The idea is that of worship not merely as individuals, nor as a mere “aggregate” of individuals united by no common bonds, but as those united by strong ties; bound by blood and affection; constituted into communities. It is a call on such to worship God in their capacity as thus bound together; to come as families and to worship God. In other words, it is a call on families “as such” to acknowledge God. A family is a proper place where to honor God. When the same joy pervades all hearts in prosperity, and when all are alike made sorrowful in adversity, there is an evident fitness that all should unite in the same worship of God; and that, as in all other things they have common interests, sympathies, and affections, so they should have in religion — in the service of their Creator.

Give unto the LORD glory and strength That is, Proclaim that these belong to God; or, worship him as a God of glory and power.

Psalm 96:8. Give unto the LORD the glory due unto his name This also is literally taken from 1 Chronicles 16: (<sup><1368></sup>Psalm 96:28). The margin here is, as in Hebrew, of “his name:” the honor of his name. The idea is that which is expressed in our translation. Bring to God what is due to him; or, render such an acknowledgment as he deserves and claims. Acknowledge him as God, and acknowledge him to be such a God as he is. Let the honor due to God as such be given him; and let the honor due to him, for the character which he actually has, be ascribed to him.

Bring an offering This is language taken from the temple-worship, and means that God is to be worshipped, in the manner which he has prescribed, as a suitable expression of his majesty. The word here rendered “offering” — h̄j n̄j̄n̄<sup>h4503</sup> — is that which is commonly used to denote a “bloodless” offering — a thank-offering. See the notes at <sup>2013</sup>Isaiah 1:13.

And come into his courts The courts or areas around the tabernacle and the temple, where sacrifices were made, and where the people worshipped. See the notes at <sup>4212</sup>Matthew 21:12.

Fear before him, all the earth All lands; all people. The word rendered “fear” means properly to writhe, to twist, to be in pain; and then, to tremble, to quake, to be afraid. The word “tremble” would perhaps best express the idea here. It is that solemn awe produced by the sense of the divine presence and majesty which causes trembling. It denotes profound reverence for God.

<sup>990</sup>Psalm 96:10. Say among the heathen Among the nations; all nations. Make this proclamation everywhere. This is changed from the parallel passage in 1 Chronicles 16. The language there is, “Fear before him, all the earth; the world also shall be stable, that it be not moved: let the heavens be glad, and let the earth rejoice: and let people say among the nations, The Lord reigneth.” The sense is, however, essentially the same. The idea here is, “Make universal proclamation that Yahweh is King.”

That the LORD reigneth See the notes at <sup>991</sup>Psalm 93:1.

The world also shall be established ... Under the reign of God. The meaning is, that the world is fixed or immovable. It has its place, and it cannot be moved out of it. The government of God is fixed and stable. It is not temporary, changing, vacillating, like the dynasties of the earth, but is stedfast and abiding, and is well represented by the earth — so fixed and firm that nothing can move it from its place.

He shall judge the people righteously The people of all lands; the nations of the earth. See the notes at <sup>9604</sup>Psalm 67:4.

<4961> Psalm 96:11. Let the heavens rejoice, and let the earth be glad Let all worlds be full of joy, as they are all interested in the fact here stated. The universe is one. It has been made by the same hand; it is under the control of the same mind; it is governed by the same laws. The God who reigns on earth reigns in heaven; and what affects one part of the universe affects all. Hence, in all the manifestation of the character of God, whether made in heaven or in the earth, it is proper to call on all the universe to partake in the general joy.

Let the sea roar In praise to God. It is not uncommon in the Scriptures to call on inanimate things to praise God. Compare <4870> Psalm 148:7-9. The same thing is common in all poetry.

And the fulness thereof Its abundance. That which fills it. All that it contains. That is, Let all that dwell in the seas praise God. His reign is an occasion for universal gladness. All in the inanimate world; all among the irrational tribes of being; all in the air, in the waters, or on the earth, have occasion for praise, and would render praise if they could appreciate the wisdom and goodness evinced in their creation. Though unconscious, the lower creatures seem to celebrate his praise; but man only can give an intelligent utterance to thanksgiving.

<4962> Psalm 96:12. Let the field be joyful ... This is taken — with the change of a single letter, not affecting the sense — from <1362> 1 Chronicles 16:32,33. It is a call on the fields — the cultivated portions of the earth — to rejoice in the reign of God. As if conscious of the beauty with which he clothes them, and of the happiness which they confer on man in their beauty and in the abundance of their productions, they are called on to praise God.

Then shall all the trees of the wood rejoice The forests — the oaks, the cedars, the pines, that wave with so much majesty. If they were conscious of their own magnificence and beauty — if they could see how much wisdom and goodness God has lavished on them, in their forms, their branches, their leaves, their flowers, their fruit — if they could know how much they are made to accomplish in rendering the world beautiful, and in contributing to the happiness of man — if they understood what a bare, bleak, cold, desert world this would be but for them, they, too, would have abundant occasion for praise and joy.

Psalm 96:13. Before the LORD This is altered from 1 Chronicles 16. The language there is simply, “Then shall the trees of the wood sing out at the presence of the Lord, because he cometh to judge the earth.” The meaning here is, that all these things have occasion to praise the Lord whenever he appears; to rejoice in the presence of Him who has made them what they are.

For he cometh That is, he will come. He will manifest himself as a righteous judge. He will come to reign over the world, and there will be in his reign universal occasion for joy. The allusion would seem to be to some future time when God would come to reign among people; to dispense justice; to vindicate his people, and to establish truth. The “language” is such as would properly refer to the anticipated reign of the Messiah, as a reign of righteousness, and is such language as is frequently employed in the Old Testament to denote the character of his reign. There is no reason to doubt that this psalm may be “designed” to describe the reign of the Messiah, and that the psalmist in this language may have looked forward to that future kingdom of righteousness and peace.

For he cometh to judge the earth ... See this language explained in the notes at <sup>1971B</sup>Psalm 72:2-4; <sup>2510B</sup>Isaiah 11:2-5. What is here stated occurs now, wherever the gospel reigns in the hearts of people; it will be fully accomplished when the Lord Jesus shall come again and judge the world.

APPENDIX NOTES ON PSALM 96

We shall only arrive at a true appreciation of the contents of this psalm when we perceive that it is the companion-psalm to Psalm 95. It is in some sort the jubilant outpouring of praise to which Psalm 95 had invited. Being too purely lyrical, too much a mere utterance of the joyousness of thanksgiving to stand alone, it attaches itself to the preceding psalm, which was in part of a hortatory character. The subject which lies at the basis of each psalm is substantially the same; namely, Israel a witness to the world for the sovereignty of God. But this witness was twofold. There was the witness of the people and the witness of the sanctuary. Psalm 95 dwells upon the former; Psalm 96 upon the latter. The Israelite people witnessed for the sovereignty of God, or so should have witnessed by a holy and dutiful obedience to his commandments. The Israelite sanctuary witnessed for the sovereignty of God by being the symbol of his divine presence in the midst of his people on earth, by the consequent reverence with which it was regarded, and by the purity and solemnity of its ritual. The “honor and majesty,” the “strength and beauty” of the Lord God of Israel, the King of the whole earth, were symbolized in various ways within the wall of the sanctuary of Zion; e.g., in the figures of the cherubim overshadowing the mercy-seat. The reverence which was paid to the sanctuary by the Israelites, and which they claimed for it from all the world, was shown by the offerings which they brought into the temple-courts. The ritual of the sanctuary was pure; it repudiated the use of idols and likenesses, and bade the people bow down and worship the very-Lord: it was also solemn; it ordered the use of holy apparel (E.V. beauty of holiness), and forbade such personal disfigurements as the pagan practiced.

Such being the witness borne to the sovereignty of God by his dwelling-place, the Israelite sanctuary, the people are in this psalm invited to sing a new song in anticipation of that future manifestation of God’s sovereignty for which the establishment of his sanctuary in Israel was helping to prepare the way. They are bidden show forth day by day that salvation which they had been taught that he was working out. They are bidden proclaim in prophetic anticipation among the pagan that “the Lord reigneth;” in other words, that he has publicly assumed and displayed abroad his sovereignty. And at the tidings of his approaching advent to judge the world in righteousness all creation also is summoned to rejoice; which, had it but the needful consciousness, it might well do, seeing that the Lord’s coming would be the signal for the removal of that curse which had been inflicted even on the ground for man’s sake.

In illustration of the close alliance between the contents of this psalm and those of the latter part of the prophecy of Isaiah, Hengstenberg notes the literal agreement in particular expressions between <sup><9901></sup>Psalm 96:1,11; and <sup><320></sup>Isaiah 42:10. “The verbal reference to Isaiah in <sup><9901></sup>Psalm 96:1,” he justly remarks, “is designedly placed at the beginning, for the purpose of pointing out the prophetic fountain from which the lyric stream has flowed.” It may deserve notice that the same chapter of Isaiah furnishes toward the close — more especially in <sup><320></sup>Isaiah 42:19 — the best illustration of the subject treated in the preceding psalm, namely, the shortcomings of that Israel who had been expressly designed to be the messenger and witness for God in the world; but who would only fully realize that high calling in the person of the Servant-Son, in whom the Father should be well-pleased. The true Israel was Christ.

In reference to the present use by the Christian church of Psalm 96, it is sufficiently obvious that we, whose lot is cast upon these latter days, intervening between the two advents of Christ, occupy a place in the midst of the fulfillment of the events to which the worshippers in the days of the psalmist looked forward. Now already, we are told, is the day of salvation. Yet still we expect a salvation to come, and rejoice that it should be nearer than when we first believed. Long ago did the herald proclaim the time fulfilled, and the kingdom of heaven at hand; yet "thy kingdom come" is still our prayer. We have known of one who for judgment came into this world; yet to the great day of judgment we still look forward. And the result is that while we have already a new song to sing for what has been achieved, and find the psalms of Israel practically insufficient to express the manifold mercies of redemption which we have received of God through Christ, there must still be another new song for blessings yet to come; and thus the whole creation, which was to rejoice for the advent of the Lord to judgment, still groaneth and travaileth in pain together, even until now. Under these circumstances the church of Christ both in the several members of whom she consists and also in her collective capacity, must, like the Israelite people and sanctuary of olden times, still witness for God's sovereignty to the world. "Say among the pagan that the Lord reigneth," must be the Christian's as it was the Israelite's motto. — Thrupp.

The exhortation, "Sing to the Lord a new song," could only be responded to by the pagan after the salvation which forms the subject of the poem had arisen. Behind the exhortation, however, addressed to the pagan to praise God, there lies concealed another address to the Israelites. The church of the Lord should be raised by this psalm to joyful hope, should be awakened to an active zeal to serve with uprightness the Lord who had formed such a mighty purpose with her. She beheld indeed the pagan preparing to destroy the kingdom of the Lord in the small corner which still remained to her. But at the same time she beheld at a greater distance with the eye of the Spirit of the Lord, the Lord himself coming, in the full glory of his being, to judge the whole earth, to judge the world in righteousness, and the nations in faithfulness.

As the promise which forms the basis of our psalm is as yet unfulfilled in its whole extent, the whole fullness of the pagan have not yet entered into the kingdom of God, the psalm is fraught with importance to us, not only in regard to its general thought, but even as to its very language. It is a missionary hymn for all ages of the church; and it becomes more and more appropriate to our times in proportion as the pagan begin to respond to the call, "Sing to the Lord a new song," and in proportion as we find in the melancholy condition of the church at home occasion to look with a hopeful eye toward the pagan world. — Hengstenberg.

~~1908~~ Psalm 96:8. Give unto the Lord the glory ... bring an offering, and come into his courts He calls upon the Gentile nations in so many words to render unto God the same worship which the Jews did; not that we must worship God now according to the outward ritual which was prescribed under the law, but he signifies that there would be one rule and form of religion in which all nations should accord. Now, unless the middle wall of partition had been broken down, the Gentiles could not have entered along with God's children into the courts of the sanctuary. So that we have here a clear prediction of the calling of the Gentiles, who needed to have their uncleanness taken away before they could be brought into the holy assembly. The mincha, or oblation, was only one kind of sacrifice, but it is here taken to denote the whole worship of God, because it was a part of divine service more ordinarily practiced. We see from this and other passages that the inspired penmen describe the inward Worship of God under symbols common in the age when they lived. God would not have meat-offerings presented to him after Christ had come; but the words which the psalmist employs intimate that the doors of the temple, once shut, were now to be opened for the admission of the Gentiles. The apostle, in his Epistle to the Hebrews (~~3835~~ Hebrews 13:15), tells us what are those sacrifices with which God will now be worshipped. Hence, the absurdity of the Papists, who would adduce such passages in support of the mass and their other fooleries. We may very properly learn from the words, however, that we ought not to come empty-handed into the presence of God, enjoined as we are to present ourselves and all that we have as a reasonable service unto him (~~5121~~ Romans 12:1; ~~1015~~ 1 Peter 2:5). — Calvin.

NOTES ON PSALM 97

The author of this psalm is unknown, and the occasion on which it was composed cannot be ascertained. Its structure is similar to that of the two preceding psalms, and it may have been written by the same author, and at the same time; but it is of so general a nature that it may be employed at all times, and in all lands. From the contents, it would seem not improbable that it may have been composed in view of some victory over the enemies of the Hebrew people, and especially over idolaters; but when this occurred, if the psalm had such an origin, it is impossible now to determine. Venema supposes that it had reference to the times of the Maccabees, but of that there is no proof. Many of the expressions in the psalm are taken from the older portions of the Scriptures; and it has been remarked (Hengstenberg) that none are taken from the writings after the return from the Babylonian captivity. From this it has been inferred that it must have been composed before the exile. Still, this inference is not certain, for a writer after the return from Babylon may have made his references solely to the more ancient writings of his country.

The author of the Septuagint version regarded this as a psalm of David, when the land was restored to peace. The title in that version is, Τω <sup><3588></sup> Δαυιδ <sup><1138></sup>, ὅτ <sup><3754></sup> ἦ <sup><3588></sup> γῆ <sup><1093></sup> αυτου <sup><846></sup> καθισταται <sup><2525></sup>; “by David, when his land was restored,” (or, was at peace). The same title occurs in the Latin Vulgate. Luther entitles it, “Of Christ and his kingdom.” The general subject of the psalm is the sovereignty or the supremacy of God, and the manifestation of that sovereignty or supremacy in vindicating his people, and in bringing to pass events which gave them ground of confidence and rejoicing in him.

Perhaps the most that can be said now on the origin and design of the psalm is, that these “six” psalms (Psalm 95—100) seem to have been composed with reference to the same occasion, and may have been designed to be used together. They are similar in their contents and structure; and they refer to the same thing — the sovereignty or the supremacy of God. Dr. Horsley regards these psalms as “one entire prophetic poem.” “Each psalm,” says he, “has its proper subject, which is some particular branch of the general argument, the establishment of the Messiah’s kingdom. Psalm 95 asserts Yahweh’s Godhead power over all nature, and exhorts people to serve him. In Psalm 96, all nations are exhorted to join in his service, because he cometh to judge all mankind, Jew and Gentile. In Psalm 97, Yahweh reigns over all the world, the idols are deserted, and the Just One is glorified. In Psalm 98, Yahweh hath done wonders, and performed deliverance for himself; he hath remembered his mercy toward the house of Israel; he comes to judge the whole world ... In Psalm 99, Yahweh, seated between the cherubim in Zion (the visible church), reigns over all the world, to be praised for the justice of his government. ... In Psalm 100, all the world is called upon to praise Yahweh the Creator, whose mercy and truth are everlasting.” There may be something fanciful in this position, but the views thus expressed the general course of thought in this group of psalms.

In this psalm (Psalm 97) the particular point, then, is, that Yahweh is supreme over all the world; that the idols are proved to be nought; and that the righteous are vindicated.

The psalm embraces the following points:

- I. A description of the majesty and glory of God as a sovereign, ~~97:1~~ Psalm 97:1-6. Clouds and darkness are around him; fire goes before him; the lightnings play, and the earth trembles; the hills melt, and are dissolved; the heavens in their splendor declare his righteousness.
- II. In view of this, all idol images and gods are confounded, and are shown to be nothing; and the friends of the true God have occasion for joy, ~~97:7~~ Psalm 97:7-9.
- III. The prosperity and happiness of the righteous under the reign of God, ~~97:10~~ Psalm 97:10-12. God will deliver them; light is sown for them in darkness; gladness is their portion, and they are called on to rejoice and give thanks at the remembrance of his holiness.

~~97:1~~ Psalm 97:1. The LORD reigneth See the notes at ~~93:1~~ Psalm 93:1. This is the general fact to be dwelt upon; this is the foundation of joy and praise. The universe is not without a sovereign. It is not the abode of anarchy. It is not the production of chance. It is not subject to mere physical laws. It is not under the control of evil. It is under the government of a GOD: a wise, holy, intelligent, just, benevolent Being, who rules it well, and who presides over all its affairs. If there is anything for which we should rejoice, it is that there is One Mind, everlasting and most glorious, who presides over the universe, and conducts all things according to his own wise and eternal plan.

Let the earth rejoice The earth itself; all parts of it; all that dwell upon it. As the earth everywhere derives whatever it has of fertility, beauty, grandeur, or stability, from God — as order, beauty, productiveness are diffused everywhere over it — as it has received so many proofs of the divine beneficence toward it, it has occasion for universal joy.

Let the multitude of isles be glad thereof Margin, “Many, or great isles.” The Hebrew is many. So the Septuagint, the Latin Vulgate, the Chaldee, and the Syriac. The eye of the psalmist is evidently on the many islands which are scattered over the sea. Not merely the continents — the extended countries where nations dwell — have occasion for joy, but the beautiful islands — the spots of earth which have risen from the deep, and which are covered with fruits and flowers — these, too, have occasion to rejoice: to rejoice that God has raised them from the waters; that he keeps them from being overflowed or washed away; that he clothes them with beauty; that he makes them the abode of happy life; that he places them in the wastes of the ocean as he does the stars in the wastes of the sky, to beautify the universe. The idea in the verse is, that all the earth has cause to rejoice that Yahweh reigns.

Psalm 97:2. Clouds and darkness are round about him This is a description of the majesty of God, derived probably from the manner in which he manifested himself at Mount Sinai. <sup><1916></sup>Exodus 19:16-19. God is often thus represented as encompassed with clouds. <sup><1941></sup>Psalm 104:3; <sup><2073></sup>Daniel 7:13; <sup><1240></sup>Matthew 24:30; <sup><1007></sup>Revelation 1:7. See the notes at <sup><1912></sup>Psalm 18:7-15. The word rendered “clouds” is the common word to denote a cloud; the word translated “darkness” means properly “thick clouds, cloudy darkness, gloom.” It would refer to a cloud considered as dark, and as casting a gloom over the world. There is no reference here to the fact that the dealings of God are dark, mysterious, and incomprehensible, as if he were surrounded by clouds and darkness. This is indeed often true; but that is not the truth taught here. The meaning here is, that the character of God is suited to fill the mind with solemn awe, or with emotions of sublimity.

Righteousness and judgment He is a righteous God; he is a God who will execute just judgment. Though he is encompassed with clouds, yet he is a just God; and this is suited to impress the mind with profound reverence.

That he will do right we may be assured, even when he covers himself with clouds; the fact that he will thus do right is suited to calm the minds of those who love and obey him, and at the same time to fill the minds of the wicked with alarm.

Are the habitation of his throne Margin, “establishment.” The Hebrew word means “place;” the place where one stands, or where one abides; a habitation, or a dwelling. It then means a foundation or basis, <sup><18914></sup>Psalm 89:14; 104:5. This would seem to be the idea here. His throne rests upon, or is sustained by, justice and righteousness. Nothing else would uphold the government of the universe; nothing else will sustain any government.

And burneth up his enemies round about Is especially directed against his foes. That is, he manifests himself as a just God, inflicting vengeance on his enemies. He comes to reign, and in his reign all his foes will be destroyed.

<sup><19715></sup>Psalm 97:5. The hills melted like wax at the presence of the LORD They seemed to flow down as if they were like melted wax: that is, they could not stand before him. The most firm, solid, lofty things were as nothing in his presence. Compare <sup><19111></sup>Revelation 20:11; <sup><19715></sup>Judges 5:5; <sup><19301></sup>Micah 1:4; <sup><19105></sup>Nahum 1:5. The object here is to describe the sublimity, the greatness, the majesty of God, as if nothing could stand before him; as if everything fled away when he approached. There is perhaps a general allusion to his glory and power as manifested at Sinai.

At the presence of the Lord of the whole earth The Creator and Ruler of the entire world. The God who thus manifested himself is not a local Deity, or the God of a particular nation or country, but the God of the whole world, before whom all created things are as nothing.

And all the people see his glory As manifested in the heavens, and in the power which he puts forth on the earth. That is, (they have the opportunity of seeing it; it is made manifest in all his works. They see what in fact is a manifestation of his glory, to wit, his great and wondrous works. It is not affirmed that they “appreciate” all this, or that they see this to be a manifestation of his glory — which would not be true — but that they see what is in fact a revelation of his greatness, his wisdom, and his power.

Psalm 97:7. Confounded be all they that serve graven images Hebrew, “Let them be ashamed.” The idea is, that they would be disappointed. They would find that these were not real gods; that their trust in them was vain; and that they had evinced great folly in relying on that which could not aid them in the day of necessity. See the notes at <sup><810></sup>Job 6:20; <sup><921></sup>Psalm 22:5; 25:2. Compare <sup><230></sup>Isaiah 20:5. What is here affirmed of the worshippers of idols will be found to be true at last of all who put their trust in anything but the true God.

That boast themselves of idols That worship idols, and glory in them as if they could save; or, that glory in their own idol-gods as if they were more powerful than those of other people. It would not be unnatural that nations which worshipped idols should glory in them, or that one people should boast of their gods as more powerful — more worthy to be trusted — than those which were worshipped in other lands.

Worship him, all ye gods Hebrew, muhi a<sup><h430></sup>. The Septuagint and the Vulgate render this, “all his angels.” The original word Elohim is that which is commonly applied to the true God (<sup><0100></sup>Genesis 1:1, et saepe), though it may be applied to angels, or to magistrates. See the notes at <sup><820></sup>Psalm 82:1,6. On the general meaning of this passage, and the question respecting its reference to the Messiah, see the notes at <sup><800></sup>Hebrews 1:6. The reference here, according to the quotation in <sup><800></sup>Hebrews 1:6, is to the angels. The original word will admit of this interpretation, and the entire structure of the psalm will justify its application to the Messiah.

Psalm 97:8. Zion heard, and was glad The good news came to Zion that all the idols of the pagan were confounded or were overcome: that is, that the Lord reigned. There was joy in Zion that the evils and abominations of idolatry were at an end, and that the worship of Yahweh had taken the place of idol-worship. The idea is, that the displacement of idols, or the fact that they had ceased to be worshipped, was a cause of joy to the worshippers of the true God. Whatever tends to remove the worship of idols from the world, and to extend and establish the worship of the living God, is an occasion of gladness.

And the daughters of Judah rejoiced ... See the notes at <sup><1981></sup>Psalm 48:11. Woman has special occasion to rejoice in the spread of the true religion. It is that only which has lifted her from a state of deep degradation; which has elevated her to be a companion instead of a slave; which has made her the intelligent wife and mother, rather than the mere inmate of a harem.

<sup><1970></sup>Psalm 97:10. Ye that love the LORD, hate evil Show your love for the Lord “by” hating all that is evil; that is, all that he hates, or that is evil in his sight. There can be no true love for God where evil is not hated in all its forms, since it is the object of the divine abhorrence. We cannot be like God unless we love what he loves, and hate what he hates. There is nothing more clearly affirmed in the Scriptures than that in order to the love of God there must be the hatred of all that is wrong, and that where there is the love of sin in the heart, there can be no true religion. Compare the notes at <sup><2116></sup>Isaiah 1:16-20.

He preserveth the souls of his saints The lives of his saints, or his holy ones. That is, he guards them from danger, and watches over them with a careful eye. See <sup><1983></sup>Psalm 3:8; 37:39.

He delivereth them out of the hand of the wicked That is, he often does this; they may expect that he will do it. He does not, indeed, always deliver them from the temporal calamities which wicked people bring upon them — for they are not unfrequently persecuted and wronged; but ultimately he will deliver them altogether from the power of the wicked. In heaven none of the machinations of wicked people can reach them. At the same time it is also true that God often interposes in behalf of his people, and delivers them as such from the designs of the wicked: that is, he delivers them because they are righteous, or because they are his friends. Compare the notes at <sup><2116></sup>Daniel 3:16,17,24,25; 6:18-23.

<sup><1971></sup>Psalm 97:11. Light is sown for the righteous That is, There is light for the righteous; or, they shall be brought into light, though they may be for a time in darkness. The word rendered “sown” — [rae<sup><223></sup>] — is from a verb which properly denotes to scatter, to disperse — as seed is scattered or dispersed when sown in a field. It is hence used with reference to moral subjects, as to sow righteousness, <sup><0118></sup>Proverbs 11:18; to sow iniquity, <sup><0128></sup>Proverbs 22:8; to sow mischief, <sup><0048></sup>Job 4:8; that is, these things are scattered or sown, as seed is in a field, and produce a corresponding harvest. Thus light is scattered abroad, and will produce an appropriate harvest — a harvest of joy. It will spring up around the righteous, and he shall reap that which light tends to produce — happiness, intelligence, and peace. The figure of sowing light is an unusual one, but the meaning is plain. It is, that the righteous will not always be in darkness; that there is in preparation for him a harvest of joy; that it will as certainly be produced as a harvest will from grain that is sown; that though there may be present calamities, there will be ultimate peace and triumph.

And gladness for the upright in heart The word gladness here — joy, or rejoicing — is parallel to the word light. Joy or gladness is sown for the righteous; that is, arrangements are made for producing joy, as preparations are made by sowing seed for a harvest. The world is full of arrangements for conferring happiness on the righteous.

And give thanks at the remembrance of his holiness Margin, “to the memorial” (compare <sup><0304></sup>Psalm 30:4). The idea is, “to the memory of his holiness;” that is, when his holiness comes before the mind; when it is remembered; when it is thought of. Give thanks or rejoice,

(a) that God is holy; that he is of purer eyes than to behold iniquity; that there is One eternally pure who presides over the universe; that there is One who will always do what is right;

(b) that such a Being is our God — our covenant-keeping God; that we may look to him, trust in him, enjoy him.

Wicked people do not rejoice that there is a God at all, and especially that God is a “holy God;” but it is one of the characteristics of true piety to rejoice in the thought that there is a God, and that he is perfectly holy, and hence, to feel conscious happiness whenever his name is mentioned, and whenever his attributes are referred to. The highest source of joy for man is that there is a God, and that God is exactly what he is, pure and holy. It would be a source of deepest sorrow if there were no God, or if God were in any respect, even the slightest, a different being from what he is.

APPENDIX NOTES ON PSALM 97

The text here consists of the words of Isaiah, "The Lord reigneth," placed at the head of the psalm, and to which the psalmist looks, when on the eve of a time of great oppression, as to a clear light which shines at the end of a long dark cavern, and which he opposes to the cry of the world, which may be soon expected, "The king of Babylon reigns," or "Bel and Nebo reign." He brings forward, however, a new view of the reign of the Lord. The language here does not apply to the conversion of the worshippers of idols to the living God, but singly and alone to judgment on the idolatrous world, by which its pride shall be completely humbled, and with which Sion's salvation is connected. The figure of the indignant judge meets us in the whole of the first half. Nothing but shame is the portion of the worshippers of idols in ~~1970~~ Psalm 97:7. Sion, according to ~~1978~~ Psalm 97:8, only hears of it and is glad.

The beginning of the fulfillment of the hopes expressed here took place at the destruction of Babylon, and the deliverance of Israel connected with it; compare Isaiah 46. These hopes, however, in their main import, are Messianic. The appearance of Christ was of the nature of a judgment even for those among the pagan who became obedient to the gospel; the nullity of their whole previous existence became thereby apparent, and, in place of their pride and high-minded contempt of Sion, there appeared deep shame. While, however, behind the judgment, which is alone brought prominently forward in our psalm, the grace was concealed, which comes clearly forward in other passages, and especially in the preceding psalm: the view which is here the only predominant one comes forward, in other passages, alone in its power, for those who, like Julian for example, will know nothing of "the Lord reigneth." Even in our day the hopes here expressed are in the act of fulfillment. The exclamation, "The Lord reigneth," always sounds forth anew; the church calls it out to the naked and to the clothed world, to the worshippers of wooden and of imaginary gods, until it shall have reached to full and absolute truth, and all the kingdoms of the earth have become the kingdom of the Lord and his Anointed. — Hengstenberg.

NOTES ON PSALM 98

This is entitled simply “A Psalm.” But who is its author is unknown. It is similar in its design and structure to the group of Psalms (Psalm 95—100) in which it is found. Dr. Horsley, in accordance with the views which he has of the design of the group (see the Introduction to Psalm 97), supposes that this psalm refers to the restoration of the Jewish people. It is a psalm which would have been appropriate at the dedication of the temple after the Babylonian captivity, and may have been composed for that occasion. It is of so general a character, however, that it is appropriate to all times in the church. The psalm does not admit of a particular analysis.

~~1981~~ Psalm 98:1. O sing unto the LORD a new song Compare ~~1983~~ Psalm 33:3; 96:1. “For he hath done marvelous things.” Things suited to excite wonder, or to fill the mind with astonishment. See ~~1974~~ Psalm 77:14; 86:10.

His right hand The instrument by which we execute any purpose. Compare ~~2396~~ Isaiah 59:16; 63:5.

And his holy arm The arm of his holiness; that is, his arm put forth in a righteous cause, or vindicating that which is right.

Hath gotten him the victory literally, “has worked salvation for him:” for himself, or in his own cause. The victory — the salvation — was really in defense of his own government; in maintaining his own authority against those who set themselves in opposition to it. What is here said may be applied to all that God does. It is really in his own cause, in order to maintain the principles of his own administration.

~~1982~~ Psalm 98:2. The LORD hath made known his salvation See the notes at ~~2320~~ Isaiah 52:10. This does not mean that he had merely “proclaimed” his salvation, or his willingness to save, but that he had shown his salvation — his power to save — by some public act. What the particular act referred to here was, it is impossible now to ascertain. Such acts, however, have been often performed, as when he delivered his people out of Egypt; when he restored the Hebrews from the Babylonian captivity; and whenever he interposed in their behalf in times of danger. He has done it also in the gift of a Saviour; he does it in every revival of true religion; he does it in the salvation of a single sinner.

His righteousness His righteous character; his faithfulness to his people. Whenever he interposes, it is in behalf of that which is right; and such interposition, therefore, is an illustration of his character as just. It is in this way we learn that his character is that of a just God.

Hath he openly showed Margin, as in Hebrew, “revealed.” He has disclosed it, or made it manifest.

In the sight of the heathen The nations; or, so that the nations could see it: that is, the nations outside of Palestine. His acts were so public — so remarkable — that surrounding nations could learn what was his true character. Thus it was when he delivered his people from Egyptian bondage; and thus also frequently in the history of his people.

Psalm 98:3. He hath remembered his mercy Compare the notes at <sup><1915></sup>Luke 1:54,55,72, where this passage in the Psalms was not improbably referred to by Mary and Zacharias. The idea is, that God had called to mind his promise of mercy to his people; that he had not suffered it to pass out of his recollection; that he had kept his word.

And his truth He has kept his promise; he has shown that he is a God of truth.

Toward the house of Israel Toward his people.

All the ends of the earth have seen the salvation of our God This appears to have been quoted from <sup><2520></sup>Isaiah 52:10. See the notes at that passage. The resemblance in the language is so strong as to make it probable that the psalm was composed after the times of Isaiah, and not improbably to be used (as remarked above) in the dedication of the temple after the captivity. The whole psalm would be appropriate to celebrate that deliverance; while, at the same time, like the language in Isaiah, it would be adapted to celebrate a higher deliverance — under the Messiah — of which that was an emblem.

Psalm 98:4. Make a joyful noise unto the LORD By singing; by instruments of music. See the notes at <sup><4930></sup>Psalm 95:1.

All the earth All lands. The event is of sufficient importance to be celebrated by all nations. It is a matter of universal exultation and joy.

Make a loud noise The word used here — j xp<sup><16476></sup> — means properly to break in pieces; then, to break forth, as a shout of triumph or joy, as if the joy could be no longer confined or repressed. See the notes at <sup><2347></sup>Isaiah 14:7. The word occurs only in the following places (besides that which is before us), in all of which it is rendered “break forth.” <sup><2347></sup>Isaiah 14:7; 44:23; 49:13; 52:9; 54:1; 55:12 — (except in <sup><388B></sup>Micah 3:3, where it is rendered “break”). It is expressive of irrepressible joy.

Rejoice and sing praise This very combination of the words, “Break forth into joy, sing together” — the same words in Hebrew as here — occurs in <sup><259D></sup>Isaiah 52:9, showing, as above remarked, that the psalm was composed after the times of Isaiah, and probably had reference to the same event.

<sup><98B></sup>Psalm 98:5. Sing unto the LORD with the harp A song or psalm accompanied by the harp. On the harp. See the notes at <sup><2362></sup>Isaiah 5:12.

And the voice of a psalm The voice in singing; a musical voice. Let it not be mere instrumental music, but let that be accompanied with the voice uttering intelligible sounds or words. The only proper use of instrumental music in the worship of God is to deepen the impression which the words are adapted to make; to secure a better influence of truth on the heart.

And sound of cornet ... The word here translated “cornet” is also usually rendered “trumpet,” <sup><12916></sup>Exodus 19:16,19; 20:18; <sup><82D></sup>Leviticus 25:9; <sup><1004></sup>Joshua 6:4-6,8,9,13,16,20; et saepe. It is rendered “cornet” in <sup><315B></sup>1 Chronicles 15:28; <sup><4454></sup>2 Chronicles 15:14; <sup><388B></sup>Hosea 5:8. In the Septuagint and the Latin Vulgate it is here rendered “horn” — the meaning of “cornet.” The name — rpw<sup><47782></sup> — is supposed to have been given to this instrument from its clear and shrill sound, like the English name “clarion.” It was either made of horn, or similar to a horn — an instrument curved like a horn. The instrument was in frequent use among the Hebrews.

Psalm 98:7. Let the sea roar, and the fulness thereof See the notes at Psalm 96:11.

The world, and they that dwell therein The habitable world — the land — in contradistinction from the sea. Let there be universal praise on the water and the land.

Psalm 98:8. Let the floods clap their hands The rivers. Let them join in the universal praise. As if conscious of their beauty, their grandeur, their usefulness; as if sensible that all this was conferred by God; as if rejoicing in the goodness of God manifested to them, and through them, let them unite in the universal praise. Compare the notes at Isaiah 55:12.

Let the hills be joyful together The mountains — in view of the goodness of God toward them — crowning them with beauty — clothing them with sublimity and grandeur — let them also rejoice in God as “their” God. Let all nature thus join in praise.

Psalm 98:9. Before the LORD, for he cometh to judge the earth ... This verse is essentially the same as Psalm 96:13. See the notes at that verse. The psalm calls for universal praise. The very “reading” of the psalm — so joyous — so jubilant — so animated — so exulting — is suited to awaken the mind to praise; to rouse it to thankfulness; to fill it with joy. One cannot read the psalm without being a happier man; without being lifted above the world; without lofty views of God; without a feeling that he is worthy of this universal praise; without recognizing that we are in a world where the mind should be joyful; that we are under the dominion of a God whose reign should fill the mind with gladness.

APPENDIX NOTES ON PSALM 98

This psalm, observes Theodoret, treats of the same subject as the preceding: it fore-announces both the advents of our Saviour. It is the only piece in the Psalter which, without any author’s name attached, bears in the Hebrew the simple title “Mizmor” — “A Psalm.” This marks it as emphatically a psalm among psalms, a genuine lyrical effusion: it forms, in fact, the lyrical complement to the more decidedly prophetic psalm by which it is preceded, standing to it in nearly the same relation as Psalm 96 to Psalm 95, or as Psalm 33 to Psalm 32. It is the “new song” of praise for the victory which the previous psalm represented the Lord as gaining, in behalf of his true worshippers, and for his own glory’s sake, over the wicked, and over all that boasted themselves of idols. It contains, however, one new feature: the victory for which in Psalm 97 only Zion and the daughters of Judah were pictured as rejoicing, is in Psalm 98 treated as a source of gladness to all the earth. Thus almost instinctively, as it were, did the Jewish psalmists, especially at seasons when their hearts were most expanded in praise, recognize the world-wide importance of God's dealings with their own little nation, and virtually anticipate the day of the catholicity of Zion, when there should be neither Greek nor Jew, circumcision nor uncircumcision, barbarian, Scythian, bond, nor free; but Christ should be all and in all. That this levelling of all distinction between Jew and Gentile was never clearly present to their minds we may reasonably admit; but yet it was the legitimate development of their invitation to all the world to rejoice. In its formal structure the psalm falls into three parts. Announcing in the opening verses the victory that has been gained, and implying in the concluding words of <sup><19806></sup>Psalm 98:6, "before the Lord, the King, that by that victory God has publicly vindicated his sovereignty abroad, the psalmist calls first on Israel (<sup><19801></sup>Psalm 98:1-3), then on all mankind (<sup><19804></sup>Psalm 98:4-6), lastly on all creation (<sup><19807></sup>Psalm 98:7-9), to testify their joy. — Thrupp.

NOTES ON PSALM 99

This psalm is closely linked in its general character and design with those which have gone before (Psalm 95—98), and with the one following (Psalm 100) — forming a connected group or series. The general subject is the kingship of Yahweh, or the foundations of praise derived from the fact that he reigns, or is king. As the foundation of praise on this account, reference is made in this group of psalms to his attributes; to what he has done in the works of creation; to what he has done for his people; and to the certainty that he will come ultimately to rule over all the earth, and to exercise just judgment among people.

This psalm consists of the following parts:

I. A statement of the fact that Yahweh reigns, and that this should make a deep impression on the world; that the people should tremble; that the earth should be moved, ~~99:1~~ Psalm 99:1.

II. Reasons for this, or reasons why he should be revered and adored by mankind, ~~99:2-9~~ Psalm 99:2-9. These reasons are two:

(1) The first is derived from the fact that he is a holy and a righteous God, and is therefore worthy of universal adoration, ~~99:2-5~~ Psalm 99:2-5.

(2) The second is derived from what he has done for his people: for his merciful interposition in times of trouble, when Moses, and Aaron, and Samuel called upon his name; and from the fact that he answered his people when they cried unto him; and from the manner in which it was done, ~~99:6-9~~ Psalm 99:6-9. He had shown himself ready to hear their protection in the cloudy pillar, he had answered their supplications, and had forgiven them. He had not swept them wholly away, or cut them off, but had spared them, and had shown mercy to them.

~~99:1~~ Psalm 99:1 The LORD reigneth The Lord, Yahweh, is king. See ~~99:1~~ Psalm 93:1.

Let the people tremble The Septuagint and the Latin Vulgate render this, “Let the people rage” — or, be angry: as if the idea were that God reigned, although the people were enraged, and were opposed to him. The true meaning of the word used here, however, is “tremble,” properly signifying to be moved, disturbed, disquieted, thrown into commotion; and then it may mean to be moved with anger, <sup><180></sup>Proverbs 29:9; <sup><382></sup>Isaiah 28:21; or with grief, <sup><1083></sup>2 Samuel 18:33; or with fear, <sup><904></sup>Psalm 4:4; or with joy, <sup><380></sup>Jeremiah 33:9. Hence, it means to be agitated or moved with fear or reverence; and it refers here to the reverence or awe which one has in the conscious presence of God.

He sitteth between the cherubims See the notes at <sup><881></sup>Psalm 80:1.

Let the earth be moved Margin, “stagger.” The word means to move or quake. It occurs nowhere else. Compare the notes at <sup><937></sup>Psalm 18:7. See also <sup><316></sup>Habakkuk 3:6,10.

<sup><992></sup>Psalm 99:2. The Lord is great in Zion Compare <sup><993></sup>Psalm 95:3. The meaning here is, not that God is “absolutely” great — which is indeed true — but that there is a sense in which he has shown himself great “in Zion;” that is, in his manifestations toward his own people. He has evinced power in their behalf; he has interposed for them in times of danger; he has so discomfited their enemies as to show that he is a great God — a God worthy to be adored.

And he is high above all the people Above all the nations. He has them under his control. He rules over all. The God who rules in Zion also rules all the nations of the earth; and his people, therefore, have special occasion to praise him.

<sup><993></sup>Psalm 99:3. Let them praise thy great and terrible name The word rendered “terrible” means “to be feared or revered;” that is, his name — his being — he himself — is suited to inspire awe and reverence. The word “them” here refers to the nations over whom God reigns. It is a call on them to praise their king and their God.

For it is holy See the notes at <sup><315></sup>Isaiah 6:3; <sup><605></sup>Revelation 4:8. The fact that God “is” holy — that he is pure and righteous — that he cannot look upon sin but with abhorrence — is a just foundation for universal praise. Who could worship or honor a God who was not pure and holy?

<sup><994></sup>Psalm 99:4. The king’s strength The word king here undoubtedly refers to God as a king, <sup><991></sup>Psalm 99:1. The word rendered “strength,” means power, force; and the reference here is to what constitutes the main strength or power of his character and government. It is rendered in the Septuagint, τιμη <sup><5092></sup> — “honor.” So in the Latin Vulgate — “honor.” DeWette renders it, “The praise of the king who loves judgment.” So Rosenmuller, “Let them praise the strength — the power — of the king who loves judgment.” But perhaps our common version best expresses the sense, that whatever there is in the character of the “king,” that is God, which constitutes strength, or gives power to his administration, is favorable to justice, or will be exerted in the cause of right. God’s essential character; all the acts of his power; all the demonstrations of his authority, will be in favor of justice, and may be relied on as sustaining the righteous cause. It is not the “mere” exertion of power — it is power that is always exercised in favor of right; and this lays the foundation of praise. We could not praise a being of “mere” power, or one who was merely “almighty,” without respect to his moral character. It is only when the character is such that power will be exerted in favor of that which is right and just that it becomes the proper subject of praise.

Loveth judgment Is always on the side of justice and right. He so loves justice that his power will be put forth only in behalf of that which is right. God shows this by his law, and by all the acts of his administration.

Thou dost establish equity That which is equal and just; alike by thy law, and by thine interpositions. All that thou doest, and all that thou dost appoint, is in favor of that which is equal and just.

Thou executest judgment and righteousness in Jacob That which is just; that which ought to be done. Thou doest this among thy people; thou doest it in their relation to the surrounding nations. All the acts of thy administration tend to the establishment of that which is right.

Psalm 99:5. Exalt ye the LORD our God See the notes at <sup><930></sup>Psalm 30:1. The meaning is, Let his name be, as it were, lifted up on high, so as to be conspicuous or seen from afar. Let it be done with a lofty voice; let it be with ascriptions of praise.

And worship at his footstool By humble prostration at his feet. The footstool is that on which the feet rest when one is sitting, and the reference here is to the footstool on which the feet of a king rested when he sat on his throne or chair of state. To worship at his footstool — compare <sup><138></sup>1 Chronicles 28:2; <sup><139></sup>Psalm 132:7 — denotes the deepest humility and the profoundest prostration and reverence. It is as if we could not look on his face, or on his throne, or on his gorgeous and magnificent robes, but bowed our heads in lowly reverence, and deemed it sufficient honor to lie low before that on which his feet rested. To show the dignity and majesty of God, the earth itself is represented as being merely his footstool; as being, in comparison with the heaven — the place of his seat — his “throne,” only as the footstool is as compared with the splendid chair of state. <sup><260></sup>Isaiah 66:1; <sup><405></sup>Matthew 5:34,35.

For he is holy See <sup><99B></sup>Psalm 99:3. Margin, “it is holy.” The translation in the text best expresses the sense. The fact that God is “holy” is a reason for lowly and profound prostration before him.

<sup><99B></sup>Psalm 99:6. Moses and Aaron among his priests Among the ministers of religion; or, as officiating in the service of God. Let them come as representatives of their order — as representing those who conduct the public worship of God, and join in his praise. The idea is, that all mankind should join in his praise, and those mentioned here as among the most eminent of those who were engaged in directing the public worship of God. Moses could be called a “priest” only in the most general sense of the term, as having been employed in directing and arranging for public worship, and as being of the original tribe of Levi, from whom the whole sacerdotal order sprang.

And Samuel among them that call upon his name Among those who are true worshippers, in distinction from the priests who were specially appointed to the public service of God. The idea is, that praise should be offered by “all” classes: by priests and by people. As Moses and Aaron were among the most eminent of the former class, so Samuel was among the most distinguished of those who were not of the priestly order. These were “representative men;” and the meaning is, that all who were of their order or rank — priests and people — should unite in the worship of God.

They called upon the LORD They did call upon the Lord; they worshipped Yahweh. They gave the influence of their names and of their position to his public service. They thus showed their sense of the propriety of praising God; they gave the countenance of their example to public worship and praise; and the benefits which they received in answer to prayer showed the propriety and advantage of thus publicly acknowledging God.

And he answered them They did not call upon him in vain. He heard their prayers. He bestowed blessings on them in connection with their worship. It was not a useless thing to praise and worship him. The worship of God is thus commended to us not merely from the propriety of the act itself, but from its advantages. It is unnecessary to refer to particular instances in the history of these people when their prayers were answered. Their lives were full of such instances — as the lives of all who truly call upon God are now. If a man who prays could “see” all that comes to him every day in answer to prayer — all the things bestowed which he had “desired” in prayer, and which would not have been conferred on him if he had not prayed, there would no longer be any doubt on the question whether God answers prayer.

Psalm 99:7. He spake unto them in the cloudy pillar He spake to the men of other times; to those who called upon his name. It cannot be meant literally that he spake to “Samuel” from the “cloudy pillar” — the pillar which guided the Israelites in the wilderness, unless that term be understood in the general sense as denoting the “Shechinah” — the visible symbol of the divine presence — the cloud that rested on the ark. The idea is, that God his people in ancient times from the cloud — the symbol of his presence; that he communed with them; that he heard their prayers; that he gave them his commandments; that he interposed in their behalf, and that it was not a vain thing that they worshipped him. All this was as true of Samuel — it is as true now of those who call upon God — as it was of Moses and Aaron.

They kept his testimonies ... They obeyed his laws, and he thus heard and answered them.

Psalm 99:8. Thou answeredst them, O LORD our God The reference here is to God as “our” God; that is, the language used by those who now worship him is designed to give encouragement in approaching his throne. The God that “we” worship is the same that “they” worshipped; and as he answered them, we may feel assured that he will answer us.

Thou wast a God that forgavest them They were not perfect; they were sinners; they often offended thee, and yet thou didst answer them, and show them mercy.

Though thou tookest vengeance Though thou didst manifest thy displeasure at their misconduct; though thou in thy judgments didst show that thou wast displeased with them; nevertheless thou didst answer them. Sinners as they were, and often as thou didst show thy displeasure at their conduct, yet thou didst hear their prayers and bless them.

Of their inventions The Hebrew word denotes work, deed, doing, conduct. It means here what they did — their sins. There is no allusion to any special art or “cunning” in what they did — as if they had “invented” or found out some new form of sin.

¶ Psalm 99:9. Exalt the LORD our God See the notes at ¶ Psalm 99:5.

And worship at his holy hill In ¶ Psalm 99:5, this is, “at his footstool.” The “holy hill” refers to Zion, as the seat of the national worship.

For the LORD our God is holy See ¶ Psalm 99:5. This appropriately closes the psalm, by a distinct and solemn statement that the fact that Yahweh is a holy God is a reason for worshipping him. This is at all times the highest reason for adoration and praise.

NOTES ON PSALM 100

This psalm — so beautiful — so grand — so often sung in all lands and languages — completes this “group” of psalms respecting the reign of God, or the reasons for praise as derived from the fact that he reigns. In the previous psalms in this group (Psalm 95—99) the call to praise had been in some respects local and particular; in this, it is universal. All lands are called on to praise him; all people to worship him as God. The “ground” of this, as stated in the psalm, is that he is their “Maker;” that he is the Creator of all. As all have derived their being from him, they are called on to praise him as their common Creator and Father. So far as the reason here referred to is a ground for praise and worship, it applies to all people now. The nations — the people of the earth — are one. However much they may differ in complexion, in language, in customs, in religion, they have all been formed by the same God; they are all of one family; they are all entitled to the same privileges; they may all have the same access to his throne. The races of people are one; and all should gather around the throne of their common Creator, and render him united praise. This psalm has been sung by million and hundreds of million; it will continue to be sung to the end of time.

The psalm is entitled “A Psalm of praise In the margin, “thanksgiving.” The Septuagint is, “A Psalm of Confession” — εἰς ὁμολογησιν. So the Latin Vulgate, and the Chaldee. The Syriac version is, “anonymous,” or, without a name; “concerning Joshua the son of Nun, when he subdued the Ammonites.” Luther: “A Psalm of thanksgiving.”

Psalm 100:1. Make a joyful noise unto the LORD See the notes at Psalm 95:1.

All ye lands Margin, as in Hebrew, “all the earth.” The margin expresses the sense. The idea in the psalm is, that praise did not pertain to one nation only; that it was not appropriate for one people merely; that it should not be confined to the Hebrew people, but that there was a proper ground of praise for “all;” there was that in which all nations, of all languages and conditions, could unite. The ground of that was the fact that they had one Creator, Psalm 100:3. The psalm is based on the unity of the human race; on the fact that there is one God and Father of all, and one great family on earth.

Psalm 100:2. Serve the LORD with gladness That is, In your worship, and in all your acts of obedience. Let there be joy in this service. Let it not be with the fear of slaves; not as a matter of compulsion and force; not with reluctance, moroseness, or gloom. Let it be a cheerful, happy service; let it be freely rendered, let it be an occasion of joy to the soul. The service of God is a source of the highest joy that man knows.

Come before his presence with singing As expressive of joy. So the birds sing; so nature rejoices; so should man — intelligent, redeemed, immortal man, be joyful.

Psalm 100:3. Know ye that the LORD, he is God That is, Let all the nations know that Yahweh is the true God. The idols are vanity. They have no claim to worship; but God is the Creator of all, and is entitled to universal adoration.

It is he that hath made us The Hebrew is, “He made us,” and this expresses the exact idea. The fact that he is the Creator proves that he is God, since no one but God can perform the work of creation. The highest idea that we can form of power is that which is evinced in an act of creation; that is, in causing anything to exist where there was nothing before. Every created thing, therefore, is a proof of the existence of God; the immensity of the universe is an illustration of the greatness of his power.

And not we ourselves Margin, “And his we are.” The difference between the text and the margin is owing to a different reading in the Hebrew, varying only in a single letter. The reading in the text is, “And not al o we;” in the margin, “And to him we.” These words would be pronounced in the same manner, and either of them would convey good sense. The weight of authority is in favor of the common reading, “And not we;” that is, We are not self-created; we derive our being from him. All that we have and are, we owe to him.

We are his people By virtue of creation. The highest “property” which can exist is that derived from an act of creation. He that has brought anything into existence has a right to it, and may dispose of it as he pleases. It is on this idea essentially that all idea of “property” is founded.

And the sheep of his pasture As the shepherd owns the flock, so God is our owner; as the shepherd guards his flock and provides for it, so God guards us and provides for us. See the notes at Psalm 95:7.

Psalm 100:4. Enter into his gates ... The gates which lead to his temple, or to the place of public worship.

Into his courts ... The “courts” were literally the open spaces which surrounded the tabernacle or temple. It was in these that worship was celebrated, and not in the tabernacle or temple. See the notes at Psalm 65:4; 84:2; 92:13.

Be thankful unto him That is, Offer thanksgiving and praise. Come before him with a grateful heart. See the notes at Psalm 50:14.

Bless his name Bless him; praise him; ascribe honor to him; acknowledge him as God.

Psalm 100:5. For the LORD is good For good is Yahweh. That is, He is not a being of mere “power;” he is not merely the Creator; but he is benevolent, and is, therefore, worthy of universal praise. In the former verses, his claim to adoration is founded on the fact that he is the “Creator,” and has, as such, a right to our service; in this verse, the claim is asserted on account of his moral character:

- (1) his benevolence;
- (2) his mercy;
- (3) his truth;
- (a) the fact that he is a God of truth; and
- (b) the fact that his truth endures, or that in all generations he shows himself to be faithful to his promises.

The first of these is his “benevolence:” “The Lord is good.” As such, assuredly, God is worthy of praise and honor. A being of “mere” power we could not love or praise; a being whose power was united with malignity or malevolence, could only be the object of hatred and terror; but a being whose power is united with goodness or benevolence ought to be loved.

His mercy is everlasting This is the “second” reason, drawn from his moral character, why he should be praised and adored. A being of mere “justice” may be feared and respected; but a character of “mere” justice would be to man an object of dread — and may be so anywhere. There are other attributes than the one of “justice,” high and valuable as that may be, which are necessary to constitute a perfect character; and man, in order to find happiness and security, must find some other attribute in God than mere “justice,” for man is a sinner, and needs pardon; he is a sufferer, and needs compassion; he is to die, and needs support and consolation. Besides, mere “justice” may drive its decisions over some of the kindest and tenderest feelings of human nature, for there are cases, under all administrations, where pardon is desirable and mercy is proper. It is, therefore, a ground of unspeakable joy for man that God is not a Being of “mere justice,” but that there is mingled in his character the attribute of mercy and kindness. But for this, man could have no hope; for, as a sinner, he has no claim on God, and all his hope must be derived from God’s infinite compassion. To all this as a ground of praise is to be added the fact that this mercy of God is “everlasting.” Its fruits — its results — will extend to the vast eternity before us; and in all that eternity we shall never cease to enjoy the benefits of that mercy; never be suffered to fall back on the mere “justice” of God.

And his truth endureth to all generations Margin, as in Hebrew, “to generation and generation.” That is, forever. It is the same in every generation of the world. This is the third reason derived from the moral character of God for praising him; and this is a just ground of praise. We could not love and honor a God who was not true to his promises, and who did not himself love the truth; we could not honor one who was changeable and flexible — who loved one thing in one generation and a different thing in the next; who in one age was the friend of truth, and in the next the patron of falsehood. It is the just foundation for praise to God — our God — that he is essentially and always — in all worlds, and in all the generations of people — toward all in the universe — a Being of unchangeable benevolence, mercy, and truth. Such a God is worthy to be had in universal reverence; such a God is worthy of universal praise.

APPENDIX NOTES ON PSALM 100

See again under Psalm 91 for observations on the decade which closes with Psalm 100.

There can be no doubt that Psalm 91—100 belong to the same time and same author, that they form a connected series, that they are on the territory of the psalm poetry what the second part of Isaiah is on the territory of prophecy, and that we have before us in them a decalogue of psalms intimately connected together. The reference to the relation in which Israel stands to the might of the world is common to all these psalms. The objective view of suffering also is a common feature: the psalmist stands everywhere above it, no crying from the depths, no conflict with despair — the explanation being that the psalmist has to do with future suffering, and is preparing for it a shield of consolation. These psalms also are in common characterized by a confident expectation of a glorious revelation of the Lord, which the author, following up the prophetic writings, sees with the eye of faith as already present. It is common to them all to quote with marked intelligence from older passages, especially from the Davidic psalms, and from the second part of Isaiah, in connection with an originality of thought and expression which it is impossible to mistake. It is a common feature also that these quotations are in all cases taken from writings of a date prior to the captivity, in accordance with a series of other marks of a pre-Chaldaic era which are scattered everywhere throughout these psalms. It is common to them all that the tone never rises above a certain height, and never sinks beneath it, just as in the second part of Isaiah, in common with which our psalm bears the character of mild sublimity. There are common to them all a great many parallel passages (compare the exposition), the use of the anadiplosis, the predilection for the mention of musical instruments, proceeding from the joyful character of the psalm.

It is impossible also not to notice design in the arrangement. Two introductory psalms of a general character stand at the head: Psalm 91, an expression of joyful confidence in the help of God in all troubles and dangers; Psalm 92, the greatness of God, which brings on the destruction of the wicked, and the salvation of the just; Psalm 93 is then opened with the watchword, "the Lord reigneth," which henceforward is uttered on all sides, and applied for comfort and exhortation. The whole ends in the exhortation addressed to the whole earth to serve the Lord and to praise him, and to give him glory for the abundant salvation which he imparts — the full-toned chorus of all nations and tongues who knew that the Lord is God.

We have already pointed to the intimate connection between this cycle of psalms and the second part of Isaiah. We have hence, a very strong proof in behalf of the genuineness of this portion of Scripture. — Hengstenberg.

That the psalm depends upon the preceding one is clear, not only from the formal arrangement, but also from the entirely general character of what is here laid down as a basis for the exhortation “to serve the Lord,” etc., by which many expositors, who did not observe the connection of both psalms, have been led to an entirely false view of the psalm, and a misapprehension of its Messianic character, which becomes clearly established as soon as it is observed that the address in the whole psalm is directed to the pagan, and that they are exhorted, not only to shout with joy to the Lord, but also to be subject to him. The psalm forms not merely a conclusion to Psalm 99: it is assuredly with design that it is put at the end of the whole series, the ecumenic character of which becomes very obvious in it at the close. — Hengstenberg.

This noble version, Old Hundred, is, I believe, the most ancient now in common use in our language, as it is certainly one of the very best; faithful to the original, and yet full of grace and strength. It was first printed in the psalm-book published for the English exiles at Geneva in 1561; and is believed to have been written by William Kethe, a native of Scotland, who joined the exiles at Geneva in 1556. See the Third of the learned and valuable “Dissertations” by Nell Livingstone, prefixed to the sumptuous reprint of The Scottish Metrical Psalter of 1635 (Glasgow, 1864). From an allusion in Shakespeare, the psalm in this version and the well-known melody named after it, would appear to have been as great favorites in Queen Elizabeth’s time as they are among ourselves. — Binnie.

Luther would have immortalized his name had he done no more than written the majestic air and harmony to which we are accustomed to sing this psalm, and which, when the mind is in a truly worshipping frame, seems to bring heaven down to each, and to raise earth to heaven, giving us anticipations of the pure and sublime delight of that noble and general assembly in which saints and angels shall forever celebrate the praises of God. — Cobbin (in Plumer).

The grandeur and simplicity of our metrical version will be best seen by placing alongside of it the version of one of our most gifted poets:

*“Be joyful in God, all ye lands of the earth
O serve him with gladness and fear!
Exult in his presence with music and mirth,
With love and devotion draw near.*

*“For Jehovah is God — and Jehovah alone,
Creator and ruler o’er all;
And we are his people, his scepter we own;
His sheep, and we follow his call.*

*“O enter his gates with thanksgiving and song,
Your vows in his temple proclaim;
His praise with melodious accordance prolong,
And bless his adorable name!*

*“For good is the Lord, inexpressibly good,
And we are the work of his hand;
His mercy and truth from eternity stood,
And shall to eternity stand. — Montgomery*

NOTES ON PSALM 101

This psalm purports to be a Psalm of David, and there is no reason to doubt that it was composed by him, though it is not possible to ascertain why it did not have a place in the collection of his psalms in the early part of the book (Psalm 1—72). There are several such, however, scattered through the latter part of the Book of Psalms, leading us to suppose that this which may have been an early collection or “edition” of his psalms, became known as the Psalms of David, and that miscellaneous psalms — and among them not a few of his composition — perhaps later psalms — were subsequently “added” to the volume.

The time when it was composed cannot be ascertained with any certainty or probability. It would “seem” to have been written when he was entering on domestic life, as the psalm consists of “rules” which he appears to have laid down for himself as the head of a family, or as indicating the course which he purposed to pursue in the management of his household. As such, the psalm has a universal application, and may be useful in all times and in all places. Few questions are more important than those which occur to one entering on married life, in regard to his own conduct as the head of a family, to the principles which he shall maintain in his own dwelling, and to the rules by which he shall govern his own conduct. For one in such circumstances it is an inestimable advantage to have an inspired composition like this, indicating what is proper, and suggesting the rules which should guide one in such circumstances.

The psalm consists of the following parts:

- I. The introduction — the purpose to praise God with respect to “mercy and judgment;” that is, to make these the theme of his song, <sup><BAID></sup>Psalm 101:1.
- II. His purpose to lead an upright life — a life characterized by wisdom — especially in his own family, <sup><BAID></sup>Psalm 101:2,3. It is a purpose to “begin” life in this relation aright; “to be” an upright man in his family.
- III. The principles on which he purposed to do this, especially in reference to those who should be in his employ as domestics, servants, or laborers, <sup><BAID></sup>Psalm 101:4-7:

- (1) He would employ no “froward” person, <sup><B></sup>Psalm 101:4.
- (2) He would employ no one who was a “slanderer,” <sup><B></sup>Psalm 101:5.
- (3) He would employ no one who had “a high look or a proud heart,” <sup><B></sup>Psalm 101:5.
- (4) He would seek out the faithful and the pious in the land to be in his service, <sup><B></sup>Psalm 101:6.
- (5) He would employ no one who was deceitful; no one who could not be trusted; no one who was a liar, <sup><B></sup>Psalm 101:7.

IV. These same principles, he says, should govern him in a higher relation — as a sovereign and monarch, for they were principles which were as needful in administering the government of a nation, as in a family; they were principles which a good man should take with him to all the public duties of life, whatever might be his rank, <sup><B></sup>Psalm 101:8. Thus understood, the psalm contains important principles applicable

- (a) to man or woman entering on the married life;
- (b) to those who are at the head of manufacturing establishments;
- (c) to farmers and mechanics;
- (d) to those who occupy official positions, and who administer the government of a land — judges, rulers, princes, monarchs.

No better rules could be given to guide those who have others under them or in their employ, in respect to their own conduct, or in respect to those who shall be employed, than such as the psalmist here says should guide him.

<sup><B></sup>Psalm 101:1. I will sing of mercy and judgment That is, In the psalm which he was about to compose, he would make these the burden of his song; he would, in fact, by stating his views as to the regulation of his own conduct, commend these virtues — mercy and justice — to mankind, and celebrate their value. He who himself “adopts” the principles of mercy, kindness, truth, and justice, as his own guide, commends these virtues to mankind in the best way possible. No language can do it effectually, unless a man practices these virtues himself.

Unto thee, O LORD, will I sing As commending and approving these things; as having put it into my heart to practice them; as displaying them in thine own higher administration: for a father of a family, or a magistrate, is but the representative of God.

Psalm 101:2. I will behave myself wisely In the choice of principles to guide me; in my conduct in my family; in my official relations. This expresses a “desire” to act wisely, and a “purpose” to do it.

In a perfect way In accordance with the perfect rules of right. I will make these my guide. I will “aim” to be perfect; I will have before me a perfect standard.

O when wilt thou come unto me? Perhaps this would be better rendered, “When thou dost come unto me;” that is, When then dost visit me and my dwelling, thou shalt find that these are the principles which regulate and govern me in my house. The idea is that God would come to visit his habitation, and inspect his conduct; and that whenever this should occur, however often it might be, or however unexpectedly he might come, he should “always” find these principles governing him in his family. A man should so live that “whenever” God comes into his dwelling, or when anyone comes, or however narrow and searching may be the inspection, these principles shall be found to regulate his conduct.

I will walk within my house Before my family; in the principles which shall govern me there.

With a perfect heart Always aiming to do exactly that which is right: in my general conduct; in the rules by which I live; in my treatment of all under my charge and in my employ. The great principles of “right,” in everything — in the smallest matters — shall guide and govern me.

Psalm 101:3. I will set no wicked thing before mine eyes That is, I will propose no wicked thing to be done; I will have no such object in view; I will employ no one to do that which is wrong. The margin, as the Hebrew, is, “thing of Belial.” See the notes at Psalm 41:8. It here means that which is worthless, bad, wicked. He would have no wicked aim; he would not look upon a wicked thing for a moment, or with the least favor.

I hate the work of them that turn aside All their doings, motives, plans. The word rendered “turn aside” means to turn out of the way; out of the right path: Wanderers — transgressors — those who leave the path of truth and honesty.

It shall not cleave to me I will have nothing to do with it. It shall not be allowed to attach itself to me. A wicked plan or purpose is thus represented as having a tendency to fasten itself on a man, or to “stick to him” — as pitch, or wax, as a “burn” does.

Psalm 101:4. A froward heart shall depart from me The word here rendered froward means perverse, false, deceitful, depraved. See the notes at Psalm 18:26. The “idea” here is that of one who is inclined to evil; who has some wrong passion or inclination to indulge; who has an obstinate and perverse will; who does not listen to reason or the voice of wise persuasion; who will do wrong, despite all the means which may be employed to induce him to do right. The language may either refer to the author of the psalm himself, as regulating his own conduct; or it may refer to those in his employ. In the former sense, it would mean that he would not himself be perverse and froward; in the latter sense, that he would not have such persons in his employ. The connection seems to require that we should understand it in the latter sense, as referring to the class of persons that the psalmist would have about him.

I will not know a wicked person I will not countenance such a one; I will not recognize such a one among those who are admitted into my house, or own him as my friend; or, I will not have such in my employ. Probably the language embraces both these ideas — as it should in the case of all who are at the head of a family:

(a) I will not countenance or recognize as among my friends, who are to be admitted to my fireside and family, and who are to be familiar with me and my children, those who are profligate, wicked, and unprincipled, whatever may be their rank, their wealth, their accomplishments, their fascination of manner, or their power of conversation;

(b) I will have in my employ no one who is not honest, temperate, virtuous, pure. The welfare of a family depends more on the former of these things than the latter; no family can be well ordered where both are not found.

Psalm 101:5. Whoso privily slandereth his neighbour literally, “One who speaks concerning his neighbor in secret.” If a man has any good to say of another, he will be likely to say it openly; if he has any evil to say, it will be likely to be said in secret. Hence, to speak in secret of anyone comes to mean the same thing as to slander him.

Him will I cut off That is, I will cut him off from me; I will not employ him. He would not have one in his house, or in his service, who did injustice to the character of others; who stabbed their reputation in the dark. This was alike indicative of the personal character of the author of the psalm, and of his purpose as the head of a family. It is hardly necessary to say that no one should employ another who is in the habit of slandering his neighbor.

Him that hath an high look That is proud — as a proud man commonly carries his head high.

And a proud heart The Hebrew word here rendered “proud” commonly means wide, broad, large, as of the sea, or of an extended country, <sup><810></sup>Job 11:9; <sup><818></sup>Exodus 3:8. It is applied also to the law of God as comprehensive, and without limit, <sup><896></sup>Psalms 119:96. Then it comes to mean swelled up — made large — inflated (<sup><825></sup>Proverbs 28:25); and hence, proud and arrogant.

Will not I suffer I will not tolerate such a person near me. No one can have peace in his house who has such a class of servants or domestics; no one should countenance such persons. Humility is the very foundation of all virtue.

<sup><916></sup>Psalm 101:6. Mine eyes shall be upon the faithful of the land ... I will look to them to be employed in my house, and in my service. The word rendered “faithful” means those who are worthy of belief or confidence. It does not “necessarily” mean those who are pious or religious — though it is often used to denote such persons, in reference to the principal trait in the character of the pious, that is, confidence or faith in God. The essential meaning here is, that he would seek those who were trustworthy; on whom he could place reliance; whose truth, fidelity, and honesty he could confide in. This would be most certainly found in those who are “faithful” to God, and who would then be “faithful” to lower obligations. Undoubtedly, also, it is desirable, on some accounts, to have only such in our employ, if such can be found. But we are not to regard this passage as teaching the doctrine, even by the example of the psalmist, that we are to employ no persons but such as are truly religious. There are others who will be found faithful, honest, and reliable; and they have such a claim to our confidence as to impose on us a moral obligation to show them that confidence — so far, at least, that we shall not, by any act of ours, declare them not worthy of trust because they are not religious. Besides, it may be desirable, on many accounts, that persons who are not religious should be brought under the influence of religion in pious families, and enjoy the advantages which may be connected with a religious household. In seeking our own interest, and what will be for our own welfare and happiness, we should not be unmindful of what may be for the good of others. Religion may extend itself much in the world by thus bringing into the service of religious households those who may, by example, instruction, and prayer, be led to the possession and practice of true religion.

He that walketh in a perfect way ... Margin, “perfect in the way.” The translation in the text is the more correct. The phrase means an upright man; a man of integrity. It does not necessarily imply that he is absolutely holy, or free from all sin, but that he is upright, consistent, honest: a man whose moral character is developed in proper proportions, or is such that it may be relied on. See the notes at ~~ROME~~ Job 1:1.

~~BALE~~ Psalm 101:7. He that worketh deceit The man who is dishonest — who is full of tricks, false pretences, and devices — who cannot be confided in as straight-forward and sincere — one whose word cannot be relied on — one whose course is subterranean or serpentine.

Shall not dwell within my house Shall neither be employed in my service, nor be admitted as a guest and companion. I will not, in any way, patronise or countenance such a person.

He that telleth lies In any way: by stating what is false; by promising what is not performed; by deceiving me in his professions. I will seek only those who love and speak the truth.

Shall not tarry in my sight Margin, “shall not be established.” The idea is that of being confirmed or established. The sense here seems to be, that though such a person should gain admittance to his house on any pretence or profession, he should not obtain a permanent residence there. As soon as his real character was known, he would be dismissed or discharged. The psalmist says that he would do nothing to show him countenance; he would not give occasion to have it represented that he favored liars or dishonest persons, or that such persons might find employment with him. As a universal rule, no man should have such plans to accomplish in his family, or in his business-transactions, that he cannot employ, in accomplishing those things, persons who are perfectly honest; or, in other words, no man should engage in any undertaking, or pursue any kind of business, that would require people of loose principles — the cunning, the crafty, the deceitful, the dishonest — to carry it out. Yet there are many such employments in the world; and there are men suited for such employments, and who are willing to engage in such work. It may be a good test for a man in regard to the business in which he is engaged, to ask himself what kind of agents, clerks, or servants, it will be necessary for him to employ in carrying it out. If the business is such as to make it necessary to employ unprincipled people — people who have easy consciences — people who will violate the sabbath — men who have more skill than honesty — more cunning than principle — that very fact should determine him at once in regard to the propriety of the business.

~~9A108~~ Psalm 101:8. I will early destroy ... Hebrew, “In the mornings I will destroy.” That is, It shall be my first business as I enter upon the day. Possibly, also, by the use of the plural here — “in the mornings”—there may be the idea that this would be his constant rule of conduct: he would do it every day; he would do it morning by morning. He would on no day — at no time — allow the wicked to be in his service. This rule would be unvarying. It would extend through his life. The word “destroy” here may refer not only to his conduct as a man, and as the head of a family, but to the act of a magistrate; and the idea may be, that the rule which he prescribed for himself in his own house was a rule which he would carry with him into public: that is, as the psalm was composed by David, that, as a king and sovereign, it should be his aim to carry those principles to the throne; that, in respect to the state, he would do what he purposed to do in his home-relations. The strict and stern regard for truth, sincerity, honesty, fidelity, which he would evince in the one case he would evince in the other; carrying to the high employments of public life, where there were so many temptations to a contrary course, the inflexible virtues which were needful for peace, for happiness, and for success in domestic life.

That I may cut off By discountenancing them; by punishing them if they are guilty.

All wicked doers All violators of law.

From the city of the LORD From Jerusalem, the place where God dwelt, and which was sacred to his service. See the notes at ~~Psalm~~ Psalm 46:4; 48:2,8. Happy is the man at the head of a family — happy is the magistrate — who adopts for himself, and who faithfully carries out the principles laid down by the author of this psalm — divinely inspired to adopt such rules for himself, and to suggest them for others in all ages.

APPENDIX NOTES ON PSALM 101

It is not agreed whether David wrote this psalm in early life, before his accession to power; after he had been partly acknowledged as king; or after all the tribes had given in their adhesion. The psalm has in it a tone of authority, indicating that David was already invested with legal functions. It expresses his solemn purpose. Some old writers call this the Householder's Psalm. In the seventeenth century, and perhaps earlier, it was customary among pious people to have a sermon preached at the setting up of each new family, or at the occupation of a new domicile. Old books give us accounts of these discourses. Some of them are expositions of this psalm. Nor is this perverting Scripture. A good king in his dominions ought to be like a good father and head of a family in his house. We have here the principles on which David would rule the nation. — Plumer.

This is the psalm which the old expositors used to designate “The Mirror for Magistrates;” and an excellent mirror it is. It would mightily accelerate the coming of the time when every nation shall be Christ's possession, and every capital a “city of the Lord,” if all magistrates could be persuaded to dress themselves by it every time they go forth to perform the functions of their godlike office. When Sir George Villiers became the favorite and prime minister of King James, Lord Bacon, in a beautiful letter of advice, counseled him to take this psalm for his rule in the promotion of courtiers. “In these the choice had need be of honest and faithful servants, as well as of comely outsides who can bow the knee and kiss the hand. King David (~~Psalm~~ Psalm 101:6,7) propounded a rule to himself for the choice of his courtiers. He was a wise and a good king: and a wise and a good king shall do well to follow such a good example; and if he find any to be faulty, which perhaps cannot suddenly be discovered, let him take on him this resolution as King David did, There shall no deceitful person dwell in my house.” It would have been well, both for the philosopher and the favorite, if they had been careful to walk by this rule. — Binnie.

Psalm 101:1. I will sing of mercy and judgment Very different opinions obtain regarding the meaning of this clause. We leave the reader to choose between that given in the commentary and that of Hengstenberg and Alexander. We quote the words of the latter, having ourselves a decided preference for the view presented by them:

“As such a declaration of a present purpose in the Psalms is always followed by its execution, the older interpreters suppose “mercy and judgment” to be those which David meant to practice, as he states more fully in the remainder of the psalm. But besides that he says nothing in what follows of his mercy, there is no usage of the Psalms more settled than that mercy and justice are combined to denote divine, not human attributes, and that to sing and make music to Yahweh never means to praise something else in an address to him, but always to sing praises to himself. See Psalm 9:11; 13:5; 18:49; 30:4,12; 33:2; 68:4; 71:22,23, in all which cases the form of expression seems to be derived from Judges 5:3. But the psalm before us contains no such celebration of God’s mercy and justice beyond this first verse. The best solution of this fact appears to be the one proposed by Hengstenberg, according to which the execution of the purpose here avowed is contained in Psalm 103, which then, together with the one before us, and of course the intervening one, compose a trilogy or series of three psalms, all by David, each complete in itself, and yet designed to be connected with the others and interpreted by them. Supposing this to be the case, we must regard them all as psalms of David, whose name is prefixed to the third and the one before us, in which he lays down a rule, as it were, for his own government and that of his successors in the regal office. The impression made by these inspired instructions on the first of these successors may account for the remarkable coincidences of expression between this psalm and the Book of Proverbs.”

God’s work toward his people is a checkered work; a mixture of mercy and judgment: and when he exercises us with both, it is our duty to sing of both, and to be suitably affected with both; whether our circumstances be joyful or sorrowful, still we must give glory to God; and in everything give thanks: neither the laughter of a prosperous condition nor the tears of an afflicted condition must put us out of tune for the sacred songs of praise ... We find the psalmist singing both of mercy and judgment; as Psalm 30:6-9; 42:7,11. You have an elegant description of the lot of God's people while here, as consisting both of mercy and judgment, and so affording occasion to sing of both, <sup><408></sup>2 Corinthians 6:8-10; where you will see the blink and the shower, the mercies and judgments that are in their lot; how God hath set the one over against the other; by honor and dishonor, by evil report and good report, etc. Thus they have occasion to sing both of mercies and crosses, while they find the Lord supporting them under trials, and remembering mercy in the midst of wrath, and making all things work together for good to them; "I will sing of mercy and judgment; unto thee, O Lord, will I sing." The Chaldee paraphrase of this text is remarkable, and suitable to the doctrine I have raised from it, namely, it is as if the psalmist had said, "If thou bestowest mercies upon me; or if thou bringest any judgment upon me; before thee, O Lord, will I sing my hymn for all!" — Ralph Erskine.

<sup><949></sup>Psalm 101:2. O when wilt thou come unto me? Hengstenberg retains the interrogative form as in our English version: "The affecting and anxious question, 'When wilt thou come to me,' blessing and helping me in my trouble? which follows immediately after the first words of the description of the pious resolutions, in order to render prominent the object of these resolutions, and to exhibit them as introductory to Psalm 102, depends upon <sup><920></sup>Exodus 20:21, 'In every place where I erect a memorial for my name, I shall come to thee, and bless thee,' and is equivalent to, When wilt thou, faithful to thy promises, come to me, and bless me, thou who hast erected in Sion 'the city of the Lord,' <sup><940></sup>Psalm 101:8, a memorial of thy name, and hast chosen it as the place of thy sanctuary. The reference is all the more suitable, as David speaks here in name of his family, and the family represents the people to whom, in the fundamental passage, the promise had been given. Other interpretations have arisen merely from failing to observe the reference to this fundamental passage, from which the indefinite coming is defined to be a coming fraught with blessing and help, and also from failing to observe the reference to Psalm 102, which makes itself known as the expansion of the cry, 'When wilt thou come to me?' by the clauses at the very beginning, 'Lord, hear my prayer, and let my cry come before thee,' according to which the coming of the Lord here can only be such a coming as goes hand in hand with the coming of the cry of the miserable to him. A host of different interpretations, like Luther's entirely arbitrary one, 'with those who belong to me,' are set aside by the simple remark, that ytæ<sup><4970></sup> is never anything else than an interrogative

‘when;’ it is so also in ~~23:35~~ Proverbs 23:35; compare Michaelis on the passage.”

NOTES ON PSALM 102

This psalm purports, in the title, to be a “Prayer of the afflicted, when he is overwhelmed, and poureth out his complaint before the Lord.” It is a prayer, made up of earnest supplications, as of one who was in great affliction, whether he refers to his own individual sorrows, or whether he speaks as one of the people. The word “afflicted,” means here a suffering one; one who is in trouble. The word is in the singular number, and is one which is often applied to a person who is in trouble — whatever may be the nature of that trouble. The word rendered “overwhelmed” means properly to cover as with a garment; to clothe; and then, to be covered with darkness, affliction, grief, <sup><5610></sup>Psalm 61:2. This is the meaning here. It denotes a state where the soul was enshrouded in gloom and sorrow. The word rendered “complaint,” means properly meditation; then, moaning; then, the expression of sorrow. It does not necessarily mean, as the word does with us, “finding fault,” or expressing dissatisfaction, but it rather denotes that deep sorrow which finds utterance in low and plaintive sounds; not in boisterous and loud outcry, but in subdued notes — in sounds uttered not because one wishes to complain, but because the sorrow is such that it will find vent. Compare <sup><1016></sup>1 Samuel 1:16; <sup><1187></sup>1 Kings 18:27; <sup><1073></sup>Job 7:13; 9:27; 10:1; 21:4; <sup><552></sup>Psalm 55:2; 64:1 (Hebrew).

On what occasion, or by whom, this psalm was composed, it is not possible now to ascertain. Hengstenberg and Prof. Alexander suppose that it was by David. It seems more probable, however, from <sup><10213></sup>Psalm 102:13-21, that it was in the time of the captivity, and was in view of the troubles of that long and weary exile, and that the psalmist speaks not of individual and personal troubles, but speaks as one of the people — as one in exile with others who had been long held in captivity, and who sighed for deliverance, and for a restoration to their native land. In the midst of these troubles, which are so tenderly described in the first eleven verses, he saw encouraging evidences that the Lord was about to manifest his mercy, and to restore the people to their native land; and he pleads most earnestly with God, on the ground that he was faithful and unchanging, that he would thus interpose and accomplish the earnest desire of his afflicted people. The “language,” indeed, in the psalm, is that of an individual, and the author of the psalm speaks of his own personal sorrows, but it may be as one among many who were equally crushed and overwhelmed, so that the language used to represent his sorrow may describe the sorrows experienced by others in the same circumstances. Beyond all question, the language used in the psalm would express the feelings of many a pious Hebrew in the time of the exile, the sorrow — the sadness — the cherished hopes — the prayers — of many a one in that prolonged and painful captivity.

The psalm may be divided into three parts:

- I. A description of the sorrows of the author of the psalm, as representative of the condition and feelings of the exiles, <sup><19A20></sup>Psalm 102:1-11. In this, the language of lamentation and complaint predominates.
- II. The grounds of hope — the indications of deliverance — the evidences that God was about to show favor to his people, and to restore them to their own country — that the time, the set time, to favor Zion was about to come, <sup><19A21></sup>Psalm 102:12-22.
- III. The confidence of the psalmist in God, on the ground of his unchangeableness: on the fact that God is always the same; that his promises must be sure; that his purposes must be accomplished; that the very heavens and the earth would change — that the skies would grow old like a garment and pass away — but that God did not, would not change. All that he had spoken must be true; all that he had purposed must be accomplished; all that he had promised must come to pass, <sup><19A22></sup>Psalm 102:23-28.

<sup><19A23></sup>Psalm 102:1. Hear my prayer, O LORD The prayer which I offer in view of my personal trials; the prayer which I offer as one of an afflicted people. Compare <sup><19A24></sup>Psalm 4:1; 17:1; 18:6.

And let my cry come unto thee My prayer, accompanied with an outward expression of my earnestness. It was not a silent, or a mental prayer; it was a loud and earnest cry. <sup><19A25></sup>Psalm 5:2; 18:6,41; 30:2; 72:12; <sup><19A26></sup>Job 35:9; 36:13.

<sup><19A27></sup>Psalm 102:2. Hide not thy face from me The Septuagint and the Latin Vulgate render this, “Do not turn away thy face from me.” The sense is essentially the same. The prayer is, that God would not refuse to look graciously upon him; that he would turn his attention to him; that he would regard his supplications. See the notes at <sup><19A28></sup>Psalm 10:1; compare <sup><19A29></sup>Psalm 13:1; 27:9; <sup><19A30></sup>Job 13:24; 34:29; <sup><19A31></sup>Deuteronomy 31:17.

In the day when I am in trouble When sorrows come upon me; when I need thy gracious help. Literally, “When there is distress to me.”

Incline thine ear unto me See the notes at <sup><4911></sup>Psalm 5:1; 17:6; compare <sup><4911></sup>Psalm 17:1; 55:1; 86:6; 39:12.

In the day when I call, answer me speedily Grant at once my requests; give me immediate evidence that my prayer is heard. The psalmist believed in an immediate answer to prayer. He often had evidence that his prayer was answered at once; his mind became calm; he had comfort and peace; he obtained the blessing which he earnestly sought. No one can doubt that prayer may be answered at once; no one who prays can fail to find such answers in his own case, in his peace, his calmness, his joy. In multitudes of cases blessings are granted in such a way that there can be no doubt that they have come in answer to prayer. Compare the notes at <sup><2701></sup>Daniel 9:20-23.

<sup><4912></sup>Psalm 102:3. For my days are consumed like smoke Margin, “into smoke.” Literally, “in smoke.” That is, They vanish as smoke; they pass away and become nothing; they are spent in affliction, and seem to accomplish nothing. The idea is, that in his affliction he seemed to accomplish none of the ends of life. His life seemed to be wasted. This is often the feeling in trial: and yet in trial a man may be more useful, he may do more to accomplish the real ends of life, he may do more to illustrate the power and excellence of religion, than he ever did in the days of prosperity.

PELICAN.

And my bones are burned as an hearth Or rather, as faggots or fuel. Literally, “They are burned as a burning.” The idea is, that in his troubles, his very bones, the most solid and substantial part of himself, seemed to be consumed and to waste away. See the notes at <sup><4910></sup>Psalm 31:10.

Psalm 102:4. My heart is smitten Broken; crushed with grief. We now speak of “a broken heart.” Even death is often caused by such excessive sorrow as to crush and break the heart.

And withered like grass It is dried up as grass is by drought, or as when it is cut down. It loses its support; and having no strength of its own, it dies.

So that I forget to eat my bread I am so absorbed in my trials; they so entirely engross my attention, that I think of nothing else, not even of those things which are necessary to the support of life. Grief has the effect of taking away the appetite, but this does not seem to be the idea here. It is that of such a complete absorption in trouble that everything else is forgotten.

Psalm 102:5. By reason of the voice of my groaning By suffering and trouble, so great as to produce groaning, my flesh is wasted away.

My bones cleave to my skin Margin, “flesh.” The Hebrew word means “flesh.” The effect described is that of a wasting away or an emaciation of flesh from deep distress, so that the bones became prominent, and had nothing to hide them from view; so that they seemed to adhere fast to the flesh itself. See the notes at <sup><3101></sup>Job 19:20.

Psalm 102:6. I am like a pelican of the wilderness A bird in the midst of desolation becomes a striking image of loneliness and distress. The word rendered “pelican” — <sup><16893></sup>taep — is supposed to have been a name given to the pelican from the idea of vomiting, as it “vomits the shells and other substances which it has too voraciously swallowed.” The word occurs in the following places, where it is rendered as here “pelican:” <sup><8118></sup>Leviticus 11:18; <sup><5147></sup>Deuteronomy 14:17; and in <sup><2341></sup>Isaiah 34:11; <sup><3124></sup>Zephaniah 2:14, where it is rendered “cormorant.” The following description, taken from the “Land and the Book,” vol. i. p. 403, by Dr. Thomson, will illustrate this passage. Speaking of the outlet of the Huleh, and the region of the exit of the Jordan from that lake in its course toward the sea of Tiberias, he says, “Here only have I seen the pelican of the wilderness, as David calls it. I once had one of them shot just below this place, and, as it was merely wounded in the wing, I had a good opportunity to study its character. It was certainly the most sombre, austere bird I ever saw. It gave one the blues merely to look at it. David could find no more expressive type of solitude and melancholy by which to illustrate his own sad state. It seemed as large as a half-grown donkey, and when fairly settled on its stout legs, it looked like one. The pelican is never seen but in these unfrequented solitudes, and to this agree all the references to it in the Bible.”

I am like an owl of the desert The owl is a well-known bird which dwells in solitudes and old ruins, and which becomes, alike by its seeking such places of abode, by its appearance, and by its doleful cry, the very emblem of desolation.

Psalm 102:7. I watch, and am as a sparrow alone upon the house-top That is, I am “sleepless;” trouble drives sleep from my eyes, and I am kept awake at night — a common effect of grief. The following remarks, copied from the “Land and the Book” (i. 54,55), will furnish all the illustration needful of this verse. “They are a tame, troublesome, and impertinent generation, and nestle just where you don’t want them. They stop up your stove and waterpipes with their rubbish, build in the windows and under the beams of the roof, and would stuff your hat full of stubble in half a day if they found it hanging in a place to suit them... . When one of them has lost its mate — a matter of everyday occurrence — he will sit on the house-top alone, and lament by the hour his sad bereavement.”

SPARROW.

Psalm 102:8. Mine enemies reproach me all the day Continually. They reproach me as one of thy people; or, I bear reproaches in common with others, and it becomes to me a personal matter, so entirely are my feelings and interests identified with those of thy people. Perhaps there were also, mingled with this, personal reproaches and calumnies.

And they that are mad against me Angry; excited even to madness.

Are sworn against me literally, “swear by me,” or against me. The meaning is, that they have conspired together under the solemnity of an oath to do me harm. It is not the wrath of an individual that I am to meet, but the combined wrath of those who act under the solemnities of an oath. Compare <sup><423D></sup>Acts 23:12.

<sup><192D></sup>Psalm 102:9. For I have eaten ashes like bread I have seated myself in ashes in my grief (compare <sup><181B></sup>Job 2:8; 42:6; <sup><281B></sup>Isaiah 58:5; 61:3; <sup><181B></sup>Jonah 3:6; <sup><201B></sup>Daniel 9:3; <sup><111D></sup>Matthew 11:21); and ashes have become, as it were, my food. The ashes in which he sat had been mingled with his food.

And mingled my drink with weeping Tears have fallen into the cup from which I drank, and have become a part of my drink. The idea is, that he had shed copious tears; and that even when he took his food, there was no respite to his grief.

<sup><192D></sup>Psalm 102:10. Because of thine indignation and thy wrath Hebrew, “From the face of thine indignation,” etc. That is — he regarded all his sufferings as proof of the indignation and wrath of God against him. See <sup><191D></sup>Psalm 90:7-9.

For thou hast lifted me up In former times. Thou hadst given me prosperity; thou hadst given me an elevated and honorable place among men.

And cast me down Thou hast brought me into a low condition, and I feel it all the more from the fact that I had enjoyed prosperity. Compare the notes at <sup><181D></sup>Psalm 30:7. The passage, however, is susceptible of another interpretation: “Thou hast lifted me up, and cast me away.” That is, Thou hast lifted me from the ground as a storm or tempest takes up a light thing, and hast whirled me away. This idea occurs in <sup><202B></sup>Isaiah 22:18. See the notes at that passage. The former, however, seems to me to be the more correct interpretation.

<sup><192D></sup>Psalm 102:11. My days are like a shadow that declineth The shadow made by the gnomon on a sun-dial, which marks the hours as they pass. See <sup><211D></sup>2 Kings 20:10. The idea is that the shadow made by the descending sun was about to disappear altogether. It had become less distinct and clear, and it would soon vanish. It would seem from this, that the dial was so made that the shadow indicating the hour ascended when the sun ascended, and declined when the sun went down. See the notes at <sup><281B></sup>Isaiah 38:8.

<19A212> Psalm 102:12. But thou, O LORD, shalt endure for ever Though my condition has been changed, though I have been cast down from an exalted position, though kingdoms rise and fall, yet thou art unchanged. Thy purposes will abide. Thy promises will be fulfilled. Thy character is the same. As thou hast been the hearer of prayer in past times, so thou art now. As thou hast interposed in behalf of thy people in other ages, so thou wilt now. As thy people in affliction have been permitted to come to thee, so they may come to thee now. The psalmist here brings to his own mind, as an encouragement in trouble, as we may at all times, the fact that God is an unchanging God; that he always lives; that he is ever the same. We could have no ground of hope if God changed; if he formed purposes only to abandon them; if he made promises only to disregard them; if today he were a Being of mercy and goodness, and tomorrow would be merely a Being of justice and wrath. This argument is enlarged upon in <19A25> Psalm 102:25-28.

And thy remembrance unto all generations Thy memory; or, the remembrance of thee. My days are like a shadow. I shall pass away, and be forgotten. No one will recollect me; no one will feel any interest in remembering that I have ever lived (see the notes at <18B12> Psalm 31:12). But while one knows that this must be so in regard to himself and to all other people — that he and they are alike to be forgotten — he may also feel that there is One who will never be forgotten. God will never pass away. He will be always the same. All the hopes of the church — of the world — are based on this. It is not on man — on any one individual — on any number of people — for they will all alike pass away and be forgotten; but one generation of people after another, to the end of time, may call on God, and find him an ever-living, an unchanged and unchangeable protector and friend.

<19A213> Psalm 102:13. Thou shalt arise Thou wilt come forth — as if God had been inattentive or inactive.

And have mercy upon Zion That is, Upon Jerusalem — represented as in a state of desolation. God would at length pity her, and interpose in her behalf.

For the time to favor her Implying that there was an appointed time to favor her, or to bring her troubles to an end.

Yea, the set time is come The word used here — ד [ מ <sup>4150</sup> ] — means properly an appointed season — a designated moment. It refers to some purpose or appointment in regard to anything that is to be done, as in <sup>138</sup>1 Samuel 13:8,11; <sup>1015</sup>2 Samuel 20:5; <sup>1172</sup>Genesis 17:21; or to a fixed period, as when certain things are to be done, certain festivals to be held regularly at a certain season of the year, <sup>2104</sup>Lamentations 1:4; 2:6; <sup>2005</sup>Hosea 9:5; 12:9; <sup>1323</sup>Leviticus 23:2,4,37,44. Here it means that there was some period fixed in the Divine Mind when this was to occur, or a definite time when it had been predicted or promised that it would occur. The language is such as would be applicable to the captivity in Babylon, concerning which there was a promise that it should continue but seventy years. If the psalm refers to that, then the meaning is that there were indications in the course of events that that period was about to arrive. Compare the notes at <sup>2702</sup>Daniel 9:2. What those indications were in this case, the psalmist immediately states, <sup>1924</sup>Psalm 102:14. It may be remarked here, that there are usually some previous intimations or indications of what God is about to do. “Coming events cast their shadows before.” Even the divine purposes are accomplished usually in connection with human agency, and in the regular course of events; and it is frequently possible to anticipate that God is about to appear for the fulfillment of his promises. So it was in the coming of the Saviour. So it was in the destruction of Jerusalem by the Romans. So it is when God is about to revive religion in a church. So it is, and will be, in regard to the conversion of the world.

<sup>1924</sup>Psalm 102:14. For thy servants take pleasure in her stones Those who profess to be thy servants; thy friends. This was the “evidence” to the mind of the psalmist that God was about to visit his people, and to rebuild Jerusalem. It was an “awakened interest” among the professed people of God, leading them to manifest their love for Zion, and for all that pertained to her — a love for the very stones that lay in undistinguished heaps where the city once stood — the piles of rubbish where the walls and dwellings had once been. The people of God in their captivity began to look with strong interest on these very ruins, and with an earnest wish that from these ruins the city may again arise, and the walls be rebuilt.

And favor the dust thereof literally, pity — or, show compassion for. They no longer look with indifference on these ruins of Zion. They look with a tender heart on the very dust of those ruins. They feel that a wrong has been done to Zion; they ardently desire its restoration to its former splendor and glory. They long for a return to it as to their home. They are weary with their captivity, and they are anxiously waiting for the time when they may revisit their native land. This would seem to refer to an awakened interest on the subject, caused perhaps in part by the fact that it could be ascertained (see <sup><Z01></sup>Daniel 9:2) that the period of the captivity was about to end, and partly by an influence on their hearts from on high, awakening in them a deeper love for Zion — a revival of pure religion. The practical truth taught here is, that an indication of a coming revival of religion is often manifested by the increased attention to the subject among its professed friends; by the desire in their hearts that it may be so; by tenderness, pity, compassion among them in view of abounding desolations, the coldness of the church, and the prevalence of iniquity; by their looking with interest on that which had before been neglected, like shapeless ruins — the prayer-meeting, the communion, the sanctuary; by a conscious returning love in their hearts for all that pertains to religion, however unimportant it may be in the eyes of the world, or however it may be despised. A surrounding world would look with unconcern on the ruins of Jerusalem; a friend of God, in whose heart religion was revived, would look with the most tender concern even on that rubbish, and those ruins. So it is in a revival of religion, when God is about to visit his church in mercy. Everything in regard to the church becomes an object of deep interest.

<sup><A215></sup>Psalm 102:15. So the heathen The nations. That is, The surrounding people, who hear what thou hast done for thy people, will see the evidence that thou art God, and learn to love and worship thee.

Shall fear the name of the LORD Shall reverence and honor thee.

And all the kings of the earth thy glory The sovereigns of the earth will be especially affected and impressed with thy majesty. If this refers to the return from the captivity at Babylon, then it means that that event would be particularly suited to impress the minds of the rulers of the world, as showing that God had all nations under his control; that he could deliver a captive people from the grasp of the mighty; that he was the friend of those who worshipped him, and that he would frown on oppression and wrong.

<sup><A216></sup>Psalm 102:16. When the LORD shall build up Zion The Septuagint, the Latin Vulgate, and Luther, venter this, “Because the Lord hath built up Zion.” This also is the most natural and correct translation of the Hebrew.

The reference, however, may be to the future. The psalmist may throw himself into the future, and — standing there — he may describe things as they will appear then — as already done.

He shall appear in his glory The idea is that the building up of Zion would be an occasion in which God would manifest his glory. In reference to the restoration of his people from bondage; in rebuilding Zion, then in ruins; in restoring the splendor of the place where he had been so long worshipped, he would display his true character as a God of glory, truth, power, and goodness. As applied to the church in general, this would mean that when God comes to revive religion, to visit his people, to recover them from their backslidings, to convert and save sinners, he appears in his appropriate character as the God of his people — as a glorious God. Then the perfections of his nature are most illustriously displayed; then he appears in his true character, as a God of mercy, grace, and salvation. There is no scene on earth where the character of God is more gloriously exhibited than in a revival of true religion.

Psalm 102:17. He will regard the prayer literally, “He looks upon,” or “he ‘turns himself’ to their prayer.” He does not any longer seem to turn away from them and disregard them. He shows by thus building up Zion that he does regard prayer; that he hears the supplications of his people. There is no higher proof that prayer is heard than that which is often furnished in a revival of pure religion. All such revivals, like that on the day of Pentecost (<sup><411></sup>Acts 2:1ff), are usually preceded, as that was (<sup><411></sup>Acts 1:13,14), by special prayer; in those revivals there are often most manifest and clear answers to prayer for the conversion of individuals; to prayer for a blessing on a preached gospel; to prayer for particular relatives and friends.

Of the destitute literally, “of the poor.” The word — r[r]æ<sup><419></sup> — occurs only here and in <sup><417></sup>Jeremiah 17:6, where it is rendered “heath:” “He shall be like the ‘heath’ in the desert.” The word, according to its etymology, means “naked;” then, poor, stripped of everything, impoverished, wholly destitute. It would thus be eminently applicable to the poor exiles in Babylon; it is as applicable to sinners pleading with God, and to the people of God themselves, destitute of everything like self-righteousness, and feeling that they have nothing in themselves, but that they are wholly dependent on the mercy of God. Compare <sup><417></sup>Revelation 3:17.

And not despise their prayer Not treat it with contempt; not pass it by unheard. This is stated as one of the reasons why the nations would be struck with awe — that God, the infinite God, would hear the prayers of those who were so poor, so powerless, so friendless. There is, in fact, nothing more suited to excite wonder than that God does hear the prayer of poor, lost, sinful man.

Psalm 102:18. This shall be written for the generation to come It shall be recorded for the instruction and encouragement of future ages. The fact that God has heard the prayer of his people in a time of trial shall be so recorded and remembered that it may be referred to in similar circumstances in all time to come, for he is an unchanging God. What he has done now, he will always be willing to do hereafter.

And the people which shall be created Future generations. Each successive generation is in fact a new “creation;” each individual is also; for the essential idea in creation is that of bringing something into existence where there was nothing before. There is a “beginning” of existence in every human being. Man is not in any proper sense a “development” from former being, nor is his life merely a “continuance” of something which existed before.

Shall praise the LORD Shall praise the Lord for what he has now done; shall learn, from the great principles now illustrated in regard to his administration, to praise him.

Psalm 102:19. For he hath looked down from the height of his sanctuary From his high and holy dwelling-place, in heaven. The word here rendered “looked down,” means, in Kal, to lay upon or over; then, in Niphil, to lie out over anything, to project; and then, to bend forward. It then means to bend or incline forward with an intention to look at anything, as from a window, <sup><1218></sup>Genesis 26:8. Compare <sup><1942></sup>Psalm 14:2. See also the notes at <sup><1952></sup>Psalm 85:12; <sup><1012></sup>1 Peter 1:12.

From heaven did the LORD behold the earth Did he look abroad over all the world.

Psalm 102:20. To hear the groaning of the prisoner Meaning here, probably, the captives in Babylon; those who were held as prisoners there, and who were subjected to such hardships in their long captivity. See the notes at <sup><1991></sup>Psalm 79:11.

To loose those that are appointed to death Margin, as in Hebrew, “the children of death.” Compare the notes at <sup><4100></sup>Matthew 1:1. This may mean either those who were sentenced to death; those who were sick and ready to die; or those who, in their captivity, were in such a state of privation and suffering that death appeared inevitable. The word rendered “loose” means, properly, to “open,” applied to the mouth, for eating, <sup><2410></sup>Ezekiel 3:2; or in song, <sup><1970></sup>Psalms 78:2; or for speaking, <sup><1800></sup>Job 3:1; — or the ear, <sup><2805></sup>Isaiah 50:5; or the hand, <sup><6508></sup>Deuteronomy 15:8; or the gates of a city, a door, etc., <sup><6011></sup>Deuteronomy 20:11. Then it means to set free, as by opening the doors of a prison, <sup><2347></sup>Isaiah 14:17; <sup><1824></sup>Job 12:14. Here it means to “set free,” to deliver. Compare <sup><2600></sup>Isaiah 61:1.

<sup><1921></sup>Psalm 102:21. To declare the name of the LORD in Zion ... That his name might be declared in Zion, or that his praise might be set up in Jerusalem again. That is, that his people might be returned there, and his praise be celebrated again in the holy city.

<sup><1922></sup>Psalm 102:22. When the people are gathered together When they shall be brought from their dispersion in distant lands; when they shall assemble again in the city of their fathers, and when public worship shall be celebrated there as in former ages.

And the kingdoms, to serve the LORD The Septuagint and the Latin Vulgate render this, “kings.” The reference must be to the time when those of other lands — kings and their people — would be converted to the true religion; when the Gentiles as well as the Jews, then one undistinguished people, would be brought to the knowledge of the true God, and would unite in his worship. See the notes at Isaiah 60. All of all lands, will yet praise the Lord “as if” they were one great congregation, assembled in one place. Thus, though separate, they will with united feeling recount the mercy and goodness of God to his people in past times.

<sup><1923></sup>Psalm 102:23. He weakened my strength in the way Margin, as in Hebrew, “afflicted.” The idea is, that God had taken his strength away; he had weakened him — humbled him — brought him low by sorrow. The word “way” refers to the course which he was pursuing. In his journey of life God had thus afflicted — humbled — prostrated him. The psalmist here turns from the exulting view which he had of the future (<sup><1921></sup>Psalm 102:21,22), and resumes his complaint — the remembrance of his troubles and sorrows (<sup><1923></sup>Psalm 102:3-11). He speaks, doubtless, in the name of his people, and describes troubles which were common to them all. Perhaps the allusion to his troubles here may be designed, as such a recollection should do, to heighten his sense of the goodness and mercy of God in the anticipated blessings of the future.

He shortened my days Compare <sup><1871></sup>Job 21:21; <sup><1895></sup>Psalms 89:45. That is, He seemed to be about to cut me off from life, and to bring me to the grave. The psalmist felt so confident that he would die — that he could not endure these troubles, but must sink under them, that he spoke as if it were already done. Compare <sup><1904></sup>Psalms 6:4,5.

<sup><1924></sup>Psalm 102:24. I said, O my God, take me not away in the midst of my days This was the burden of my prayer, for this I earnestly pleaded. See <sup><1919></sup>Psalms 30:9; <sup><2381></sup>Isaiah 38:1-3,9-18. The word used here means “to cause to ascend or go up” and the expression might have been translated, “Cause me not to ascend.” The Septuagint and the Latin Vulgate render it, “Call me not away.” Dr. Horsley, “Carry me not off.” In the word there may be an allusion — an obscure one, it is to be admitted — to the idea that the soul ascends to God when the body dies. The common idea in the Old Testament is that it would descend to the regions of the departed spirits — to Sheol. It is plain, however, that there was another idea — that the soul would ascend at once to God when death occurred. Compare <sup><21021></sup>Ecclesiastes 3:21; 12:7. The word rendered “in the midst” means properly in the half; as if life were divided into two portions. Compare <sup><1973></sup>Psalms 55:23.

Thy years are throughout all generations Thou dost not die; thou art ever the same, though the generations of people are cut off. This seems to have been said here for two reasons:

- (1) As a ground of consolation, that God was ever the same; that whatever might happen to people, to the psalmist himself, or to any other man, God was unchanged, and that his great plans would be carried forward and accomplished;
- (2) As a reason for the prayer. God was eternal. He had an immortal existence. He could not die. He knew, in its perfection, the blessedness of “life” — life as such; life continued; life unending. The psalmist appeals to what God himself enjoyed — as a reason why life — so great a blessing — should be granted to him a little longer. By all that there was of blessedness in the life of God, the psalmist prays that that which was in itself — even in the case of God — so valuable, might yet a little longer be continued to “him.”

<sup><19A28></sup>Psalm 102:28. The children of thy servants shall continue The descendants of those that serve and obey thee. This represents the confident expectation of the psalmist that, as God was unchangeable, all his promises toward his people would be fulfilled, even though the heavens and the earth should pass away. God was the same. His word would not fail. His promises were sure. Compare <sup><41518></sup>Matthew 5:18; 24:35. The word rendered “continue,” means to dwell, as in a habitation; then, to abide. It stands opposed to a wandering, nomadic life, and indicates permanency.

And their seed shall be established before thee The word used here means properly to stand erect; then to set up, to erect, to place, to found, to make firm, as a city, <sup><19A76></sup>Psalm 107:36; the earth, <sup><19212></sup>Psalm 24:2; the heavens, <sup><11819></sup>Proverbs 3:19. It means here that they would be firmly and permanently established: that is, the church of God would be permanent in the earth. It would not be like the generations of people that pass away. It would not be like the nomadic tribes of the desert that have no fixed habitation, and that wander from place to place. It would not be even like the heavens that might put on new forms, or wholly pass away: it would be as enduring and changeless as God himself; it would, in its proper form, endure forever. As God is eternal and unchangeable, so would the safety and welfare of his people be.

APPENDIX NOTES ON PSALM 102

It must be confessed that the theory of Hengstenberg and Alexander which regards Psalm 101—103 as a series of psalms, all by David, each complete in itself and yet connected (see on last psalm), is with difficulty maintained in the face of the obvious allusion to the times of the captivity in <sup>1921</sup>Psalm 102:13-21. We give Dr. Binnie's note:

“Psalm 102 brings before us the captivity in its third phase. The Lord had, by Jeremiah, announced a return after seventy years. This was spoken in plain terms. We are not surprised therefore to find that, as the years wore away, the fearers of God among the exiles began to look out for the fulfillment of the prediction. Daniel had come to understand ‘by books, the number of the years, whereof the word of the Lord came to Jeremiah the prophet, that he would accomplish seventy years in the desolations of Jerusalem.’ He knew more. He knew that when God holds forth the promise of blessings, he desires to be inquired of by his Israel with respect to it. Accordingly, he ‘set his face unto the Lord God, to seek by prayer and supplication, with fasting;’ and the burden of his prayer was that the Lord would at length turn the captivity of his people. ‘O our God, cause thy face to shine upon thy sanctuary that is desolate, for the Lord’s sake.’ I refer to these exercises of the man greatly beloved, because I am persuaded that the chapter which relates them, Daniel 9, furnishes the best and most apposite commentary on Psalm 102. There is no reason to attribute the psalm to Daniel, but it gives expression to the very thoughts and feelings which filled his soul, as the time fixed for the return drew near.”

This plaintive poem was written by some pious exile toward the expiration of the seventy years of captivity, during which the people of Israel were detained in Babylon. The holy land was now lying desolate and uncultivated; its towns and cities were demolished; Jerusalem was a heap of ruins; and the magnificent temple, which had so long been honored with the presence of the Most High, was overthrown and consumed by the flames in which its enraged and victorious captors had involved it. How keenly this state of public and individual degradation was felt there are many expressive proofs in the Scriptures; and this psalm delineates the feeling by most affecting images and mournful exclamations. In the midst, however, of this intense and accumulated grief, the devout author seeks to draw for himself and his distressed compatriots some consolation from the unchangeable existence, the universal providence, and the faithful promises of God. He depicts with deep sensibility the ardent affection which still glowed in the bosoms of these outcasts from their native soil, and the fondness with which they cherished the hope that they should yet be restored to it; that the walls of their beloved and long-lost Zion should be rebuilt, and the praises of Yahweh yet again resound through the courts of his temple, and among the exulting multitudes of his worshippers.

But though these pious exiles did not altogether lose their hold upon the promises and covenant of God, the language of the psalm shows that their spirits were broken by the long years of their desolate condition, and their hearts depressed by the sorrows to which they were subjected in a strange land, dwelling amidst proud and insuring masters, and daily witnessing scenes of idolatry and impiety which pierced their bosoms with poignant grief. The author of the psalm had most probably been carried away captive in early youth; he had survived nearly to the end of the term, and now, worn with cares and anxieties, he was earnest with God that deliverance might speedily arrive, lest he should sink into the grave without revisiting the delightful scenes by which his imagination was enraptured, without witnessing the fulfillment of the hopes which the prophets of God. had excited by the predictions which they had delivered relative to the returning prosperity of his beloved country. He at length takes refuge in the eternity of God, and the everlasting continuance of his kingdom; and glancing at the bright display that was yet to come of the blessings of the reign of the Messiah, when the nations and kingdoms of the world should be numbered among his disciples and worshippers, he concludes by asserting the final triumph and ever-during glory of that brightest illustration of the wisdom, power, and benevolence of the Most High. — Walford.

Psalm 102:6. Like a pelican in the wilderness The pelican (Pelicanus onocrotalus) is spread over many parts of Asia, Africa, and Europe. Its plumage, when full grown, is nearly all white, with an expanse of wings that sometimes reaches to twelve feet. The most remarkable feature in the pelican is the pouch, a curious dilatation of the throat, for the bestowment of the food until the hour of retirement and eating has come round. We have often seen one of the species sitting on the ledge of a rock a foot or two above the surface of the water, in pensive silence during the whole day; the continuity of its proceeding being only interrupted at distant intervals by the near approach of some unlucky fish, upon which it darted with unerring certainty and then resumed its wonted stillness. At other times we have observed them urging their way, with rapid flight, thirty or forty miles into the country; after a day's fishing, to feast in the lonely wilderness upon the contents of their well-stored pouches: and were then reminded of the words, "I am like a pelican in the wilderness." These birds are very distinctly represented in the paintings of ancient Egypt, in which they are represented as congregated among the reeds in great numbers, the natives collecting basketfuls of their eggs. They still frequent the marshes of the Delta of the Nile, and the islands of the river high up the country; they are also seen on all the lakes of Palestine, except the Dead Sea. — Kitto.

Psalm 102:7. A sparrow alone on the house-top Some understand the screech-owl; others, "a solitary bird simply." "The word," says Dr. Kitto on the verse,

"we have explained elsewhere to be a general term for birds, or perhaps for small birds in particular, while at the same time it is the proper name of the sparrow. It is quite clear that the word should be understood here in its general, not in its restricted signification, for the intimations do not by any means agree with a pert, active, chattering bird, fond of society, like the sparrow, but seem rather to require some moping bird, that sits watching solitary upon the house-tops in the night season. The owl might well enough be understood; but it is safer to take the reference indefinitely, as indeed most translators do, having instead of 'sparrow alone,' — 'solitary bird,' or 'solitary little bird;' and 'bird alone,' or 'little bird alone.'"

Waterston the naturalist fixes on the Passer solitarius, which is known in Egypt and Syria, and in the south of Italy. This bird is like a thrush in size, shape, habits, and has a sweet plaintive note: but never associates with others of its species, not even with its own mate, except in breeding time. It is seen sitting solitary on house-tops, warbling it may be its plaintive song. — Bonar.

Psalm 102:25-27. These verses are quoted in the Epistle to the Hebrews (<sup><3010></sup>Hebrews 1:10-12) as addressed to Christ, and form a part of the writer's proof from the Old Testament that he, as the Son of God, is higher than the angels. The quotation stands between two others, one from Psalm 45: the other from Psalm 110., bearing on the same argument. But these are both of them Messianic psalms, and the principle on which the quotation rests is sufficiently obvious. It is by no means so easy to Understand why the words of this psalm should have been quoted, as it does not seem at first sight to be a Messianic psalm. It may be observed, however,

- (1) that it is in this sense Messianic, that it looks forward to Israel's redemption from captivity and the future glory of Zion;
- (2) that there are two great lines of Messianic hope running through the Psalms, the one human, the other divine; the one of which the reign of the Son of David, the other of which the advent of Yahweh, is the great end and object. Here the psalmist is occupied with the latter, the appearing of Yahweh in his glory.
- (3) This identification of the Jesus of the New Testament with the Yahweh of the Old Testament, is what we find elsewhere: compare <sup><B24></sup>John 12:41 with Isaiah 6 (Isaiah sees the glory of Yahweh, John tells us it was the glory of Christ), and <sup><B37></sup>John 19:37, "They shall look on him whom they pierced;" which in <sup><B10></sup>Zechariah 12:10, is language used directly of Yahweh. The difference between these quotations in John and the one in the Epistle to the Hebrews is that the argument in the latter requires that the Messianic character of the psalm should be conceded.
- (4) Not only the revelation, the appearing of Yahweh in Zion, but also the creation of the world (<sup><B25></sup>Psalms 102:25), would point to the great Mediator, the eternal Word, as the person here spoken of, and on this last ground especially the quotation in the Epistle to the Hebrews seems to rest — Perowne.

NOTES ON PSALM 103

This very beautiful psalm is entitled “A Psalm of David.” Nothing in the psalm forbids the supposition that he was its author, although nothing in the psalm or elsewhere enables us to ascertain the precise occasion on which it was written.

It seems to have been composed after some signal manifestation of the mercy of God, or some striking proof of his compassion and loving-kindness; after some danger which threatened life, and was regarded as evidence of the divine displeasure, but had now passed by; after God had interposed, and checked and arrested judgments which threatened ruin, and had manifested himself again as a loving Father. This merciful interposition filled the heart of the psalmist with emotions of gratitude and praise, and led him to call on his own soul (<sup><BAGLE></sup>Psalm 103:1,2), and all the angels (<sup><BAGLE></sup>Psalm 103:20), and the hosts of heaven (<sup><BAGLE></sup>Psalm 103:21), and all the works of God everywhere (<sup><BAGLE></sup>Psalm 103:22) to unite in celebrating his praise. The psalm is exceedingly regular in its structure and composition; beautiful in its language and conceptions; adapted to all times and ages; suited to express the feelings of gratitude to God for deliverance from trouble, and for the manifestation of his mercy; suited to elevate the soul, and to fill it with cheerful views. These circumstances have made it a favorite psalm as a vehicle of praise in all ages. It is, moreover, eminently suited to express the feelings of the soul in view of the redeeming love and mercy of God; the goodness of God in the forgiveness of sin through a Saviour; and his tender compassion for his people as a Father; and it is, therefore, one to which the Christian oftener turns than to almost any other of the psalms as expressive of the deep and grateful feelings of his heart.

<sup><BAGLE></sup>Psalm 103:1. Bless the LORD, O my soul The word “bless,” as applied to God, means to praise, implying always a strong affection for him as well as a sense of gratitude. As used with reference to people, the word implies a “wish” that they may be blessed or happy, accompanied often with a prayer that they may be so. Such is the purport of the “blessing” addressed to a congregation of worshippers. Compare <sup><BAGLE></sup>Numbers 6:23-27. The word “soul” here is equivalent to mind or heart: my mental and moral powers, as capable of understanding and appreciating his favors. The soul of man was “made” to praise and bless God; to enjoy his friendship; to delight in his favor; to contemplate his perfections. It can never be employed in a more appropriate or a more elevated act than when engaged in his praise.

And all that is within me ... All my powers and faculties; all that can be employed in his praise: the heart, the will, the affections, the emotions. The idea is, that God is worthy of all the praise and adoration which the entire man can render. No one of his faculties or powers should be exempt from the duty and the privilege of praise.

Psalm 103:2. Bless the LORD, O my soul The repetition here denotes the intensity or earnestness of the wish or desire of the psalmist. It is an emphatic calling upon his soul, that is, himself, never to forget the many favors which God was continually conferring upon him.

And forget not all his benefits Any of his favors. This refers not to those favors in the aggregate, but it is a call to remember them in particular. The word rendered “benefits” — I WmG<sup>3h1576</sup> — means properly an act, work, doing, whether good or evil, AD78 Psalm 137:8; and then, “desert,” or what a man deserves “for” his act; “recompence.” It is rendered “deserving” in UD96 Judges 9:16; benefit, as here, in 4825 2 Chronicles 32:25; “desert,” 4804 Psalm 28:4; “reward,” 494D Psalm 94:2; 2811 Isaiah 3:11; 3015 Obadiah 1:15; “recompence,” 2024 Proverbs 12:14; 2384 Isaiah 35:4; 59:18; 66:6; 2516 Jeremiah 51:6; 2884 Lamentations 3:64; 2904 Joel 3:4,7. The proper reference here is to the divine “dealings,” — to what God had done — as a reason for blessing his name. His “dealings” with the psalmist had been such as to call for praise and gratitude. What those “dealings” particularly were he specifies in the following verses. The call here on his soul is not to forget these divine dealings, as laying the foundation for praise. We shall find, when we reach the end of life, that all which God has done, however dark and mysterious it may have appeared at the time, was so connected with our good as to make it a proper subject of praise and thanksgiving.

Psalm 103:3. Who forgiveth all thine iniquities Pardoning all thy sins. That is, It is a characteristic of God to pardon sin, and I have evidence that he has done it in my own case, and this is a ground for praise. It is observable that this is the first thing in view of the psalmist — the first of the “benefits” which he had received from God, or the first thing in importance among his acts or his dealings, which called for praise. Properly considered, this is the first thing which calls for praise. That God is a merciful God — that he has declared his willingness to pardon sin — that he has devised and revealed a way by which this can be done, and that he has actually done it in our own case, is the most important matter for which we should praise him. When we understand all the things which most affect our welfare, and which enter most deeply into our happiness here and hereafter, we shall find that this is a blessing compared with which all other favors are comparative trifles.

Who healeth all thy diseases Perhaps, in the case of the psalmist, referring to some particular instance in which he had been recovered from dangerous sickness. The word rendered “diseases” — אַלִּיּוֹת <sup>4846</sup> — occurs only in the plural form. It is translated “sicknesses,” in <sup>1622</sup>Deuteronomy 29:22; “diseases,” as here, in <sup>1219</sup>2 Chronicles 21:19; “them that are sick,” in <sup>2448</sup>Jeremiah 14:18; and “grievous (deaths)” in <sup>2401</sup>Jeremiah 16:4. It does not elsewhere occur. It is applicable to all forms of sickness; or in this place it may refer to some particular diseases with which David had been afflicted. We have several allusions in the Psalms to times when the authors of the psalms were afflicted with sickness. So in the Psalms of David. Compare <sup>1982</sup>Psalms 6:2; 38:7; 41:8. The thought here is, that it is a proper ground of praise to God that he has the power of healing disease. All instances of restoration to health are illustrations of this, for whatever may be the skill of physicians, or the wise adaptation of means, healing virtue comes from God alone.

<sup>1938</sup>Psalm 103:4. Who redeemeth thy life from destruction That is, who saves it from death when exposed to danger, or when attacked by disease. The word “destruction” or “corruption” here is equivalent to the grave, since it is there that the body returns to corruption. Compare the notes at <sup>1960</sup>Psalms 16:10.

Who crowneth thee The idea here is not merely that God is the source of these blessings, but that there is something of beauty, of dignity, of honor, as in the conferring of a crown or garland on anyone. Compare the notes at <sup>1951</sup>Psalms 65:11.

With loving-kindness and tender mercies mercy and compassions. God showed mercy to him — evinced compassion — and these were so abundant that they might be said to be the crown or ornament of his life.

Arabic, the Septuagint, and the Latin Vulgate, “thy desire;” in the Syriac, “thy body;” DeWette renders it, “thy age.” So also Tholuck. The Hebrew word — יְדִי <sup><15716></sup> — is rendered “ornaments” in <sup><12304></sup>Exodus 33:4-6; <sup><10124></sup>2 Samuel 1:24; <sup><2308></sup>Isaiah 49:18; <sup><2423></sup>Jeremiah 2:32; 4:30; <sup><2471></sup>Ezekiel 7:20; 16:11,17 (margin,); 23:40; and “mouth” in <sup><939></sup>Psalms 32:9, as here. These are the only places in which it occurs. Gesenius renders it here “age,” and supposes that it stands in contrast with the word “youth” in the other part of the verse. The connection would seem to demand this, though it is difficult to make it out from any usage of the Hebrew word. Professor Alexander renders it “thy soul” — from the supposition that the Hebrew word “ornament” is used as if in reference to the idea that the “soul” is the chief glory or ornament of man. This seems, however, to be a very forced explanation. I confess myself unable to determine the meaning.

So that thy youth is renewed like the eagle's Compare <sup><2418></sup>Isaiah 40:31. The allusion, to which there is supposed to be a reference here, is explained in the notes at that passage. Whatever may be true in regard to the supposed fact pertaining to the eagle, about its renewing its strength and vigor in old age, the meaning here is simply that the strength of the psalmist in old age became like the strength of the eagle. Sustained by the bounty of God in his old age he became, as it were, young again.

That is, “justice.” He sees that justice is done to the oppressed. He is on their side. His law, his commands, his judicial decisions, his providential interpositions, are in their favor. This does not mean that it will be done at once; or that there will never be any delay; or that they may not suffer even for a long time — for this occurs in fact; but the meaning is, that God has their true interest at heart; that at proper times, and whenever and wherever there are any dealings of his in the case, his acts are in favor of those that are oppressed; and that there will be sooner or later such interpositions in their behalf as shall entirely vindicate their cause.

For all that are oppressed By harsh laws; by unjust governments; by slavery; by unrighteous decisions in courts; by the pride and power of wicked people. Compare the notes at <sup><2017></sup>Isaiah 1:17,23-27.

<sup><9A317></sup>Psalm 103:7. He made known his ways unto Moses This is another ground of praise — that God had “revealed his will;” that this had been done in an indubitable manner to Moses; and that these revelations had been recorded by him for the instruction and guidance of his people. The word “ways” here means his laws; his methods of administration; the principles on which he governs mankind, and the conditions on which he will save people. There is no higher ground of gratitude to God than the fact that he has given a revelation to mankind.

His acts unto the children of Israel His methods of doing things have been made known to them; and his acts — his interpositions — have been in their favor.

Psalm 103:8. The LORD is merciful and gracious See the notes at Psalm 78:38. The idea here is derived evidently from Exodus 34:6,7 — that great and glorious statement of God himself in regard to his own character. Our world is a different world under that statement from what it would be if that and kindred declarations had not been made. There is here a “progression” of thought; an “advance” on the previous statements. At first the psalmist referred to his own individual experience (Psalm 103:3-5); then he referred to the dealings of God toward the Hebrew people (Psalm 103:6,7); and now he rises to the general contemplation of his character as it relates to all mankind. It was a characteristic of God in respect to all, that he was kind, compassionate, and forbearing.

Slow to anger That is, patient; not soon excited; bearing much, and bearing it long. See James 5:11; compare Exodus 34:6,7.

And plenteous in mercy Margin, “great of mercy.” The Hebrew word means “much,” or great;” and the idea is, that mercy is not manifested by him in small or stinted measure. It is rich; full; abundant; overflowing; free.

Psalm 103:9. He will not always chide Rebuke; contend; strive; for so the Hebrew word means. He will not always contend with people, or manifest his displeasure. See the notes at Isaiah 57:16; Psalm 78:38,39. This implies that he may chide or rebuke his people, but that this will not be forever. He will punish them; he will manifest his displeasure at their sins; he will show that he does not approve of their course, but he will show that he “loves them,” and does not seek their ruin.

Neither will he keep his anger for ever The words “his anger” are supplied by the translators, but not improperly. The meaning is the same as in the former member of the sentence. He will not cherish hatred when the object of the chastisement is accomplished. It is not his character to retain anger for its own sake, or for any personal gratification.

Psalm 103:10. He hath not dealt with us after our sins All may say this, and this “is” a ground of thanksgiving and praise. It is a matter for which we should render unceasing praise that God has not done to us as our sins deserved. Who of us can fail to stand in awe and to tremble when we think what God “might” have justly done to us; what sufferings he “might” have brought upon us, which would have been no more than we have deserved; what pain of body, what distress of mind, what anguish of bereavement — what sorrow, danger, sickness, losses — we “might” have suffered before the point would be reached at which it could be said that we were suffering more than a holy and just God might properly inflict on us.

Nor rewarded us according to our iniquities That is, he has not inflicted suffering on us that could be regarded in any proper sense as a just retribution for what we have done; or, so that it could properly be said that the one fairly “measured” the other.

Psalm 103:11. For as the heaven is high above the earth See the notes at Psalm 57:10. Compare the notes at Isaiah 55:9. The literal translation of the phrase here would be, “For like the height of the heavens above the earth.” The heavens — the starry heavens — are the highest objects of which we have any knowledge; and hence, the comparison is used to denote the great mercy of God — meaning that it is as great as can be conceived; that there is nothing beyond it; that we cannot imagine that it could be greater — as we can imagine nothing higher than the heavens.

So great is his mercy toward them that fear him To those who reverence and serve him. That is, His mercy is thus great in forgiving their offences; in imparting grace; in giving them support and consolation.

Psalm 103:12. As far as the east is from the west As far as possible; as far as we can imagine. These are the points in our apprehension most distant from each other, and as we can conceive nothing beyond them, so the meaning is, that we cannot imagine our sins could be more effectually removed than they are. The literal meaning of the Hebrew is, “like the distance of the east from the west” or, “like its being far.”

So far hath he removed our transgressions from us That is, he has put them entirely away. They are so removed that they cannot affect us any more. We are safe from all condemnation for our sins, as if they had not been committed at all. Compare the notes at <sup><23425></sup>Isaiah 43:25; 44:22.

<sup><49313></sup>Psalm 103:13. Like as a father pitieth his children Hebrew, “Like the compassion of a father for his children.” See the notes at <sup><4079></sup>Matthew 7:9-11. God often compares himself with a father, and it is by carrying out our ideas of what enters into the parental character that we get our best conceptions of the character of God. See the notes at <sup><4069></sup>Matthew 6:9. That which is referred to here, is the natural affection of the parent for the child; the tender love which is borne by the parent for his offspring; the disposition to care for its needs; the readiness to forgive when an offence has been committed. Compare <sup><2152></sup>Luke 15:22-24. Such, in an infinitely higher degree, is the compassion — the kindness — which God has for those that love him.

So the LORD pitieth them that fear him He has compassion on them. He exercises toward them the paternal feeling.

<sup><49314></sup>Psalm 103:14. For he knoweth our frame Our formation; of what we are made; how we are made. That is, he knows that we are made of dust; that we are frail; that we are subject to decay; that we soon sink under a heavy load. This is given as a reason why he pities us — that we are so frail and feeble, and that we are so easily broken down by a pressure of trial.

He remembereth that we are dust Made of the earth. <sup><40077></sup>Genesis 2:7; 3:19. In his dealings with us he does not forget of what frail materials he made us, and how little our frames can bear. He tempers his dealings to the weakness and frailty of our nature, and his compassion interposes when the weight of sorrows would crush us. Remembering, too, our weakness, he interposes by his power to sustain us, and to enable us to bear what our frame could not otherwise endure. Compare the notes at <sup><23716></sup>Isaiah 57:16.

<sup><49315></sup>Psalm 103:15. As for man literally, “Man; like the grass are his days!” The thought is fixed on man: man so frail and weak; man, not only made originally of earth, but man delicate, feeble, soon to pass away like the springing grass, or like the fading flower.

His days are as grass See the notes at <sup><49016></sup>Psalm 90:5,6; compare The notes at <sup><23406></sup>Isaiah 40:6-8; <sup><6012></sup>1 Peter 1:24.

As a flower of the field As a blossom. It opens with beauty and fragrance, but soon fades and perishes.

So he flourisheth Rather, “So he blossoms.” That is, he is like a flower that is fresh and beautiful, and that soon withers away.

<sup><49316></sup>Psalm 103:16. For the wind passeth over it, and it is gone Margin, as in Hebrew, “it is not.” The reference is either to a hot and burning wind, that dries up the flower; or to a furious wind that tears it from its stem; or to a gentle breeze that takes off its petals as they loosen their hold, and are ready to fall. So man falls — as if a breath — a breeze — came over him, and he is gone. How easily is man swept off! How little force, apparently, does it require to remove the most beautiful and blooming youth of either sex from the earth! How speedily does beauty vanish; how soon, like a fading flower, does such a one pass away!

And the place thereof shall know it no more That is, It shall no more appear in the place where it was seen and known. The “place” is here personified as if capable of recognizing the objects which are present, and as if it missed the things which were once there. They are gone. So it will soon be in all the places where we have been; where we have been seen; where we have been known. In our dwellings; at our tables; in our places of business; in our offices, counting-rooms, studies, laboratories; in the streets where we have walked from day to day; in the pulpit, the courtroom, the legislation-hall; in the place of revelry or festivity; in the prayer-room, the Sabbath-school, the sanctuary — we shall be seen no longer. We shall be GONE: and the impression on those who are there, and with whom we have been associated, will be best expressed by the language, “he is gone!” Gone; — where? No one that survives can tell. All that they whom we leave will know will be that we are absent — that we are “gone.” But to us now, how momentous the inquiry, “Where shall we be, when we are gone from among the living?” Other places will “know” us; will it be in heaven, or hell?

<sup><49317></sup>Psalm 103:17. But the mercy of the LORD The favor of the Lord; or, his loving-kindness.

Is from everlasting to everlasting Is from the eternity past to the eternity to come. It had its foundation in the eternal decrees of God; it has its security in his purpose that where it is conferred, it shall not be withdrawn. It had no beginning; it will have no end. There never was a period in the past when it was not the purpose of God to save his people; there never will be a period in the future when it will be said that his saving mercy has ceased. It would be difficult to think of a statement which would at the same time, in so few words, confirm at once the doctrine of the divine decrees, and the doctrine of the perseverance of the saints. If either of these doctrines is denied, then what is here stated by the psalmist is not true: if the doctrine of the divine decrees is denied, then his purpose of mercy had a beginning, and is not “from everlasting;” if the doctrine of the perseverance of the saints is denied, then his mercy has an end, and is not “to everlasting.”

Upon them that fear him In respect to those who are his true worshippers, or his true people.

And his righteousness His righteous purpose; or, his purpose in regard to their “becoming” righteous.

Unto children’s children literally, “sons of sons.” That is, his purposes embrace the children and children’s children of the righteous; or, they are included in the covenant of mercy. See the notes at ~~4123~~ Acts 2:39. Compare ~~1216~~ Exodus 20:6.

~~9438~~ Psalm 103:18. To such as keep his covenant To such as adhere to the arrangements of his covenant, or who are faithful on their part. God will be faithful to his part of the covenant; and where there is fidelity on the part of his people, the blessings implied in the covenant will be conferred on them and on their children. The promise is ample, and the fidelity of God is certain, but still it is true that in those promises, and in that fidelity, it is implied that his people on their part must be faithful also, or the blessings will not be bestowed. There are no promises of blessings to the unfaithful, nor have those who are unfaithful any reason to hope that they or theirs will be partakers of the blessings of the covenant of mercy. Our only hope that we or our children will be partakers of the blessings of the covenant is to be found in the fact that we ourselves are faithful to God.

And to those that remember his commandments to do them Who do not “forget” his law. If they do forget it, they have no right to expect the blessing. Obedience and fidelity are our only reasonable grounds of expectation of the blessing of God.

Psalm 103:19. The LORD hath prepared his throne in the heavens

He has “fixed” his throne there. This is the ground of the security that his blessing will be imparted to those who fear him, and to their children’s children, or that it will be transmitted to coming generations. God is a Sovereign. His throne is fixed and firm. His dominion is not vacillating and changing. His reign is not, like the reign of earthly monarchs, dependent on the capriciousness of a changeable will, or on passion; nor is it liable to be altered by death, by revolution, or a new dynasty. The throne of God is ever the same, and nothing can shake or overthrow it. Compare the notes at Psalm 11:4.

And his kingdom ruleth over all He reigns over all the universe — the heavens and the earth; and he can, therefore, execute all his purposes. Compare Psalm 47:2.

Psalm 103:20. Bless the LORD The psalm began (Psalm 103:1,2) with an exhortation to “bless the Lord.” That exhortation was, however, then addressed by the psalmist to his own soul, and was especially founded on the benefits which he had himself received. The psalm closes also with an exhortation to “bless the Lord,” yet on a much wider scale. The psalmist feels that there is not only occasion for him to do it, but that the reason for it extends to the whole universe. The meaning is, that God is worthy of universal praise; and all ranks of beings — all worlds — should join in that praise. Man, feeble, frail, dying, could not come up to the fullness of the praise required. Praise such as was appropriate to God — such as his perfections and works deserved — demanded loftier powers than those of man; the loftiest powers in the universe.

Ye his angels All beings higher than man; beings around and before his throne.

That excel in strength Margin, as in Hebrew, “mighty in strength,” and therefore more “able” to offer adequate praise.

That do his commandments Who perfectly obey his law, and who, therefore, can render more acceptable praise than can ever come from human lips.

Hearkening unto the voice of his word Who always listen to his voice; who never are disobedient; and who can, therefore, approach him as holy beings, and more appropriately worship him.

~~9A321~~ Psalm 103:21. Bless ye the LORD, all ye his hosts His armies; the vast multitudes of holy beings, arranged and marshalled as hosts for battle, in all parts of the universe. Compare the notes at ~~23009~~ Isaiah 1:9; ~~40121~~ Ephesians 1:21.

Ye ministers of his The same beings referred to by the word “hosts,” and all others who may be employed in executing his will. The “hosts” or armies of the Lord are thus marshalled that they may “do his pleasure,” or that they may execute his purposes.

That do his pleasure What is agreeable to him; that is, who perform his will. Employed in his service, and appointed to execute his will, they are called on to bless his name. The fact of being employed in his service is a sufficient reason for praise. It is implied here that those “ministers of his” actually do his will. They are obedient to his commands; they regard themselves as employed for him.

~~9A322~~ Psalm 103:22. Bless the LORD, all his works All that he has made, animate and inanimate, intelligent and brute. It is not uncommon to call on the inanimate creation to join with intelligent beings in praising God. Compare Psalm 148. The same thing is often found in the “Paradise Lost,” and in fact occurs in all poetry.

In all places of his dominion Wherever he reigns, on earth, or in heaven; here or in distant worlds.

Bless the LORD, O my soul Ending the psalm as it began, and with the additional reason derived from the fact that the “universe” is called on to do it. As one of the creatures of God; as a part of that vast universe, the psalmist now calls on his own soul to unite with all others — to be one of them — in praising and blessing the Creator. He “desired” thus to unite with all others. His heart was full; and in a universe thus joyous — thus vocal with praise — he wished to be one among the immense multitudes that lifted their voices in adoration of the great Yahweh.

APPENDIX NOTES ON PSALM 103

Henry's first remark on this ode is: "This psalm calls more for devotion than exposition." He who with a warm heart and ordinary good sense enters into its spirit in any version of it extant, is more enriched by it, and has a better understanding of it, than he who with a cold heart can critically weigh every word in the original, and in each of the many translations given us by ripe scholars. The Hebrew and all the ancient versions give David as author. This is doubtless correct, although Clarke thinks it "refers to the times of the captivity, or rather to its conclusion." He dates it B.C. 536; Scott, 1030 B.C. Delaney, Patrick, Morison, and Scott think David wrote it on occasion of delivery from dangerous sickness. Yet I have never heard it repeated with more ardor, or more appropriateness, than by God's people enduring great bodily distress. — Plumer.

Psalm 103:5. Thy youth is renewed like the eagle's; that is, so that in strength and vigor thou art like the eagle. The rendering of the E. V. is grammatically justifiable, but very unnecessarily makes the psalmist responsible for the fable of the eagle's renewing its youth. This fable has received different embellishments. The version of Saadia, given by Kimchi, is as follows: The eagle mounts aloft into heaven until he comes near the seat of central fire in the sun, when, scorched by heat, he casts himself down into the sea. Thence he emerges again with new vigor and fresh plumage, until at last, in his hundredth year, he perishes in the waves. Augustine's story is more elaborate and far less poetical. According to him, when the eagle grows old, the upper curved portion of the beak becomes so enlarged that the bird is unable to open its mouth to seize its prey. It would die of hunger, therefore, did it not dash this part of its beak against a rock until the troublesome excrescence is got rid of. Then it can devour its food as before, vigor is restored to its body, splendor to its plumage, it can soar aloft; a kind of resurrection has taken place. Thus it renews its youth. And then, wonderful to say, having told this story gravely, he makes Christ the rock, adding, "In Christ thy youth shall be renewed as the eagle's." — Perowne.

Psalm 103:15-18. His righteousness unto children's children The family is honored in the Psalms, because it has a very honorable place assigned it in God's economy of salvation. Christian families are ordained to be nurseries for heaven. Not that the grace of God can be made an heirloom in any line of natural descent. It is not transmissible by man.

Every child of Adam who is saved must have been the subject, in his own person, of a radical change, by the special grace of the Holy Spirit. But it is plain that we are not left altogether without information with regard to the quarters in which the ministration of the Spirit is ordinarily vouchsafed; and both Scripture and experience bear witness that God is accustomed to pour out his quickening Spirit especially on the seed of true believers. "The promise is to them and to their children." Under the Old Testament, as under the New, the initial sacrament, which was the "seal of the righteousness of faith," was appointed to be administered to believers and to their seed along with them; and thus the Lord intimated that the children of those who are members of the covenant society are members along with them. That this is the principle underlying the domestic element which receives such honorable prominence in the Psalter, is plain from such passages as ~~19A35~~ Psalm 103:15-18.

This promise respecting children and children's children, is intended, like every other, to be a stimulus to duty, not a pillow for sloth. — Binnie.

NOTES ON PSALM 104

This psalm in the Syriac, the Arabic, the Greek, and the Latin versions, is ascribed to David, but on what authority is now unknown. That it “may” have been composed by him cannot be doubted, but there is no certain evidence that he was the author. In the Hebrew, it has no title, and there is nothing in the psalm itself which would furnish any indication as to its authorship.

The occasion on which the psalm was composed is unknown, and cannot now be ascertained. Rosenmuller and Hengstenberg suppose that it was at the time of the return from the Babylonian exile, and that it was intended to be used at the re-dedication of the temple. But it has no special applicability to such a service; it has no such local references as would fix it to that time; it has nothing which would make it inappropriate at “any” time, or in “any public service. It is such a psalm as might be composed at any period of the world, or in any country, where there was an intelligent view and a careful observation of the works of God. It implies, indeed, such a knowledge of the fact that God made the world as could be obtained only by revelation; but it evinces also a power of close observation; a large acquaintance with the creation around us; a relish for the scenes of nature; as well as a rich poetic faculty, and a power of description, adapted to place such scenes before the mind as realities, and to make us feel, in reading it, that we are in the very midst of the things which are described — so that they seem to live and move before our eyes.

The psalm was probably founded on the record of the creation in Genesis 1; with a design to show that the order of the creation, as there described, “was adapted to the purposes which were intended, and was carried out in the providential arrangements now existing on the earth;” or, that, taking the order of the creation as described there, the existing state of things furnished an illustration of the wisdom and benevolence of that order. Accordingly, in the psalm, it was convenient for the writer to follow substantially the “order” observed in Genesis 1 in narrating the creation of the world; and he states, under each part, the “acting out” of that order in existing things; creation in its being actually carried out, or in its results — the creation “developing itself” in the varied and wonderful forms of being — of vegetable and animal life — of beauty, of harmonious movement, of ceaseless activity — on the land, in the air, and in the waters. Accordingly there is in the psalm:

I. An allusion to the work of the “first” day, <sup><9A4D></sup>Psalm 104:2-5 (compare <sup><000E></sup>Genesis 1:1-5): to the stretching out of the heavens as a curtain; to the source of light — “who coverest thyself with light as with a garment;” — to the laying of the foundations of the earth to abide forever; to God as Creator of all things, with the additional ideas of his being clothed with honor and majesty; making the clouds his chariot; walking upon the wings of the wind; making the winds his messengers, and flames of fire his ministers.

II. An allusion to the work of the “second” day, <sup><9A46></sup>Psalm 104:6-9 (compare <sup><0006></sup>Genesis 1:6-8). Here it is the separation of the waters — the power exerted on the waters of the earth; in Genesis, the dividing of the waters above from those on the earth; in the psalm, the poetic images of the deep covering the earth as with a garment; the waters climbing up the mountains, and rolling down into the valleys, until they found the place appointed for them, a boundary which they could not pass so as to return again and cover the earth.

III. An allusion to the work of the “third” day, <sup><9A40></sup>Psalm 104:10-18 (compare <sup><0009></sup>Genesis 1:9-13). In Genesis, the waters gathering together; the dry land appearing, and the earth yielding grass, and herbs, and fruit trees — the creation of vegetables; in the psalm, the springs running into the valleys, and winding among the hills — giving drink to the beasts, and quenching the thirst of wild asses — furnishing a lace for the fowls to build their nests, causing the grass to grow for the cattle, and herbs for the service of man — supplying him wine to make him glad, and oil to make his face shine, and bread to strengthen his heart — bringing forth the trees of the Lord, the cedars of Lebanon for the birds to make their nests, and the fir trees for the stork — making the hills a refuge for the wild goats, and the rocks for the conies: that is, the work of creation on the third day is seen by the eye of the psalmist not “as” mere “creation,” but in the “result,” as enlivened and animated by all these varied forms of life, activity, and beauty which had been spread over the earth as the “consequence” of this part of the work of creation.

IV. An allusion to the work of the “fourth” day, <sup><9A49></sup>Psalm 104:19-23 (compare <sup><0014></sup>Genesis 1:14-19). Here, as in the previous divisions of the psalm, it is not a reference to the mere “creation” — to the power evinced — but to the creation of the sun and moon “as seen in the effects” produced by them — the living world as it is influenced by the sun and moon: the seasons — the alternations of day and night. Thus (<sup><19A01></sup>Psalm 104:20), at night, when the sun has gone down, all the beasts of the forest are seen creeping forth; the lions roar after their prey, and seek their meat from God; and again when the sun arises (<sup><19A02></sup>Psalm 104:22,23), they are seen gathering themselves together, and retiring to their dens, and man is seen going forth to his work and to his labor until the evening. It is thus not the original act of creation which is before the mind of the psalmist, but that act in its development, or when it is seen what God contemplated by it, or what he intended that in this respect the world should be when he made the sun, the moon, and the stars.

V. An allusion to the work of the “fifth” day, (<sup><19A03></sup>Psalm 104:24-30 (compare <sup><19001></sup>Genesis 1:20-23); the creation of “life” in the waters, and in the air; as the fowls of heaven — the whales, etc. Here, too, the psalmist sees all this as it is — or developed on the sea, and in the air. In the sea there are things creeping innumerable, small and great; there are the ships; there is leviathan; there is everywhere animated life; there are beings innumerable all dependent on God; there are the processes of renewing, creating, destroying, continually going on — a moving scene, showing the “effect of life” as it is produced by God.

VI. It is remarkable, however, that the allusion to the successive days of the work of creation, so obvious in the other parts of the psalm, seems to close here, and there is no distinct reference to the sixth day, or the seventh — to the creation of “man” as the crowning work, and to the “rest” provided for man in the appointment of the Sabbath. The purpose of the psalmist seems to have been to celebrate the praises of God in the varied scene — the panorama passing before the eye in the works of “nature.” The purpose did not seem to be to contemplate “man” — his creation — his history — but “nature,” as seen around us. The remainder of the psalm, therefore, is occupied with a description of the glory of the Lord “as thus manifested;” the works of God as suited to fill the mind with exalted views of his greatness, and with a desire that his reign may be universal and perpetual, (<sup><19A04></sup>Psalm 104:31-36.

O LORD my God, thou art very great This is a reason why the psalmist calls on his soul to bless God; namely, for the fact that he is so exalted; so vast in his perfections; so powerful, so wise, so great.

Thou art clothed with honor and majesty That is, with the emblems of honor and majesty, as a king is arrayed in royal robes. Creation is the garment with which God has invested himself. Compare the notes at <sup><4981></sup>Psalm 93:1.

<sup><4942></sup>Psalm 104:2. Who coverest thyself with light as with a garment Referring to the first work of creation (<sup><0003></sup>Genesis 1:3), “And God said, Let there be light, and there was light.” He seemed to put on light as a garment; he himself appeared as if invested with light. It was the first “manifestation” of God. He seemed at once to have put on light as his robe.

Who stretchest out the heavens like a curtain As an expanse spread over us. The word used here means a curtain or hanging, so called from its tremulous motion, from a word meaning to tremble. Thus it is applied to a curtain before a door; to a tent, etc. It is applied here to the heavens, as they seem to be “spread out” like the curtains of a tent, as if God had spread them out for a tent for himself to dwell in. See the notes at <sup><3412></sup>Isaiah 40:22.

<sup><4943></sup>Psalm 104:3. Who layeth the beams of his chambers in the waters The word here rendered “layeth” — from hrqj, <sup><47135></sup> — means properly to meet; then, in Hiphil, to cause to meet, or to fit into each other, as beams or joists do in a dwelling. It is a word which would be properly applied to the construction of a house, and to the right adjustment of the different materials employed in building it. The word rendered “beams” — hyj <sup><45944></sup> — means “an upper chamber, a loft,” such as rises, in Oriental houses, above the flat roof; in the New Testament, the ὑπερωον <sup><45253></sup>, rendered “upper room,” <sup><44113></sup>Acts 1:13; 9:37,39; 20:8. It refers here to the chamber — the exalted abode of God — as if raised above all other edifices, or above the world. The word “waters” here refers to the description of the creation in <sup><0006></sup>Genesis 1:6,7 — the waters “above the firmament,” and the waters “below the firmament.” The allusion here is to the waters above the firmament; and the meaning is, that God had constructed the place of his own abode — the room where he dwelt — in those waters; that is, in the most exalted place in the universe. It does not mean that he made it of the waters, but that his home — his dwelling-place — was in or above those waters, as if he had built his dwelling not on solid earth or rock, but in the waters, giving stability to that which seems to have no stability, and making the very waters a foundation for the structure of his abode.

Who maketh the clouds his chariot Who rides on the clouds as in a chariot. See the notes at <sup><3801></sup>Isaiah 19:1. Compare the notes at <sup><3811></sup>Psalms 18:11.

Who walketh upon the wings of the wind See the notes at <sup><3810></sup>Psalms 18:10.

<sup><3841></sup>Psalm 104:4. Who maketh his angels spirits The meaning here literally would be, “Who makes the winds his messengers,” or “his angels;” that is, who employs them to execute his purpose; who sends them out as messengers or angels to do his will.

His ministers a flaming fire That is, Fire is employed by him — in lightnings — to accomplish his purpose as his ministers or his servants. They are entirely under his command. They are sent by him to do his will; to carry out his designs. This is intended to describe the majesty and the power of God — that he can employ wind and lightning — tempest and storm — to go on errands such as he commands; to fulfill his plans; to do his bidding. For the application of this to the angels, and as employed by the apostle Paul to prove the inferiority of the angels to the Messiah, see the notes at <sup><3807></sup>Hebrews 1:7.

<sup><3841></sup>Psalm 104:5. Who laid the foundations of the earth Referring still to the creation of the earth. The margin is, “He hath founded the earth upon her bases.” The Hebrew word rendered in the margin “her bases” means properly a place; then a basis or foundation. The idea is, that there was something, as it were, placed under the earth to support it. The idea is not uncommon in the Scriptures. Compare the notes at <sup><3834></sup>Job 38:4.

That it should not be removed for ever So that it cannot be shaken out of its place. That is, It is fixed, permanent, solid. Its foundations do not give way, as edifices reared by man. but it abides the same from age to age — the most fixed and stable object of which we have any knowledge. Compare the notes at <sup><3839></sup>Psalms 78:69.

<sup><3841></sup>Psalm 104:6. Thou coveredst it with the deep as with a garment Compare the notes at <sup><3839></sup>Job 38:9. The meaning is, that God covered the earth with the sea — the waters — the abyss — as if a garment had been spread over it. The reference is to <sup><0100></sup>Genesis 1:2; where, in the account of the work of creation, what is there called “the deep” — the abyss — (the same Hebrew word as here — <sup><0100></sup>מַבְּרַת<sup><0100></sup>) — covered the earth, or was what “appeared,” or was manifest, before the waters were collected into seas, and the dry land was seen.

The waters stood above the mountains Above what are now the mountains. As yet no dry land appeared. It seemed to be one wide waste of waters. This does not refer to the Deluge, but to the appearance of the earth at the time of the creation, before the gathering of the waters into seas and oceans, <sup><0100></sup>Genesis 1:9. At that stage in the work, all that appeared was a wide waste of waters.

<sup><0100></sup>Psalm 104:7. At thy rebuke they fled At thy command; or when thou didst speak to them. The Hebrew word also implies the notion of “rebuke,” or “reproof,” as if there were some displeasure or dissatisfaction.

<sup><0100></sup>Proverbs 13:1; 17:10; <sup><0100></sup>Ecclesiastes 7:5; <sup><0100></sup>Isaiah 30:17; <sup><0100></sup>Psalm 76:6. It is “as if” God had been displeased that the waters prevented the appearing or the rising of the dry land, and had commanded them to “hasten” to their beds and channels, and no longer to cover the earth. The allusion is to <sup><0100></sup>Genesis 1:9, and there is nowhere to be found a more sublime expression than this. Even the command, “And God said, Let there be light; and there was light,” so much commended by Longinus as an instance of sublimity, does not surpass this in grandeur.

At the voice of thy thunder they hasted away They fled in dismay. The Hebrew word — <sup><0100></sup>זָפַתָּ<sup><0100></sup> — contains the idea of haste, trepidation, consternation, alarm, “as if” they were frightened; <sup><0100></sup>Psalm 31:22. God spake in tones of thunder, and they fled. It is impossible to conceive anything more sublime than this.

<sup><0100></sup>Psalm 104:8. They go up by the mountains ... That is, when they were gathered together into seas. They seemed to roll and tumble over hills and mountains, and to run down in valleys, until they found the deep hollows which had been formed for seas, and where they were permanently collected together. The margin here is, “The mountains ascend, the valleys descend.” So it is translated in the Septuagint, in the Latin Vulgate, by Luther, and by DeWette. The more natural idea, however, is that in our translation: “They (the waters) go up mountains; they descend valleys.”

Unto the place The deep hollows of the earth, which seem to have been scooped out to make a place for them.

Which thou hast founded for them Where thou hast laid a permanent foundation for them on which to rest; that is, which thou hast prepared for them.

Psalm 104:9. Thou hast set a bound that they may not pass over See the notes at Job 26:10; 38:10,11.

That they turn not again to cover the earth As it was before the dry land appeared; or as the earth was when “darkness was upon the face of the deep” (Genesis 1:2), and when all was mingled earth and water. It is “possible” that in connection with this, the psalmist may also have had his eye on the facts connected with the deluge in the time of Noah, and the promise then made that the world should no more be destroyed by a flood, Genesis 9:11,15.

Psalm 104:10. He sendeth the springs into the valleys Though the waters are gathered together into seas, yet God has taken care that the earth shall not be dry, parched, and barren. He has made provision for watering it, and by a most wise, wonderful, and benevolent arrangement, he has formed springs among the valleys and the hills. It is now animated nature which comes before the eye of the psalmist; and all this he traces to the fact that the earth is “watered,” and that it is not a waste of rocks and sands. The allusion in this part of the psalm (see the Introduction) is to the earth as covered with vegetation — or, to the third day of the week of creation (Genesis 1:9-13), which, in Genesis, is connected with the gathering of the waters into seas. This description continues in Psalm 104:18. The literal rendering here would be, “sending springs into the valleys.” He conducts the waters from the great reservoirs — lakes and seas — in such a way that they form springs in the valleys. The way in which this is done is among the most wonderful and the most benevolent in nature — by that power, derived from heat, by which the waters of the ocean, contrary to the natural law of gravitation, are lifted up in small particles — in vapor — and carried by the clouds where they are needed, and let fall upon the earth, to water the plants, and to form fountains, rivulets, and streams — and borne thus to the highest mountains, to be filtered through the ground to form springs and streams below.

Which run among the hills Margin, “walk.” That is, they go between the hills. The streams of water flow along in the natural valleys which have been made for them.

Psalm 104:11. They give drink to every beast of the field All are thus kept alive. The wild beasts that roam at large, find water thus provided for them.

The wild donkeys quench their thirst Margin, as in Hebrew, “break.” The meaning is, that the most wild and ungovernable of beasts — those which are farthest from the habits of domesticated animals, and the most independent of any aid derived from man, find abundance everywhere. On the word rendered “wild asses,” and on the habits of the animals here referred to, see the notes at Job 11:12.

Psalm 104:12. By them shall the fowls of the heaven have their habitation Among them the fowls of the air dwell. That is, among the trees which spring up by the fountains and water-courses. The whole picture is full of animation and beauty.

Which sing among the branches Margin, as in Hebrew, “give a voice.” Their voice is heard — their sweet music — in the foliage of the trees which grow on the margin of the streams and by the fountains. There is scarcely to be found a more beautiful poetic image than this.

Psalm 104:13. He watereth the hills from his chambers The waters, as stated before, run in the valleys — in the natural channels made for them among the hills, Psalm 104:10. But still, it was a fact that the hills themselves were watered; that there were springs far up their heights; and that vegetation was sustained above the reach of the fountains and streams below; and it was a proof of the divine skill and beneficence that, in some way, water was furnished on the summits and sides of the hills themselves. This was caused, the psalmist says, by God’s pouring water on them, as it were, from his own “chambers” — his abode on high. The allusion is, doubtless, to rain, which seems to be poured down from the very abode of God. The word rendered “chambers” means “upper rooms,” (see the notes at Psalm 104:3); and the reference is to the dwelling-place of God, as far above the earth.

The earth is satisfied with the fruit of thy works Thy doings; with what thou hast done. All the needs of the earth seem to be met and “satisfied;”

all that it could desire to make it fertile and beautiful; and the proper abode of man, of beast, and of fowl, has been granted. It has no cause of complaint; nothing has been left undone, in the valleys or on the hills, on the dry land or in the waters, that was needful to be done to carry out the purpose for which it has been called into being.

Psalm 104:14. He causeth the grass to grow for the cattle Out of the earth there is caused to grow every variety of food necessary for the various orders of beings that are placed upon it. The idea here is not merely that of “abundance;” it is also that of “variety:” the needs and tastes of all have been consulted in the productions of the earth. The one earth — the same earth — has been made to produce the endless varieties of food required for the creatures that have been placed on it. The word “grass” here refers to all the vegetable productions needful for cattle.

And herb for the service of man <sup><0029></sup>Genesis 1:29. The word “herb” here would include every green plant or vegetable; or all that the earth produces for the food of man. This, of course, refers to the earth as it came from the hand of God, and to the original arrangement, before permission was given to man to eat the flesh of animals, <sup><0003></sup>Genesis 9:3. The word translated “service” might be rendered “culture,” as if man was to cultivate it for his use, not that it was to be produced, as the food for cattle, spontaneously.

That he may bring forth food out of the earth Hebrew, “bread.” That is, that by culture he may bring forth that which would make bread.

Psalm 104:15. And wine that maketh glad the heart of man ... literally, “And wine (it) gladdens the heart of man to make his face to shine more than oil.” Margin, “to make his face shine with oil, or more than oil.” The latter expresses the idea most accurately. So DeWette renders it. The meaning is, that the earth is made to produce wine (or grapes which produce wine), and this exhilarates the heart, so that the effect is seen on the countenance, making it more bright and cheerful than it is when anointed with oil. On the use of oil, see the notes at <sup><0215></sup>Psalm 23:5. The reference here, in the original, is not to wine and oil as produced by the earth, as would seem to be implied in our translation, but to wine that makes the heart glad, and the face brighter than if anointed with oil. The psalmist here states a fact about the use of wine — a wellknown fact that it exhilarates the heart, and brightens the countenance; and he states it merely as a fact. He says nothing on the question whether the use of wine as a beverage is, or is not, proper and safe. Compare the notes at <sup><B210></sup>John 2:10.

And bread which strengtheneth man's heart That is, Which sustains the heart — that being regarded as the seat of life. Compare <sup><B185></sup>Genesis 18:5.

<sup><B416></sup>Psalm 104:16. The trees of the LORD From the grass, from the herb, from the vine, and from bread, as adapted to sustain the living beings upon the earth, the psalmist passes to the more lofty and grand productions of the vegetable world — to those which display more manifestly the power of God, and which furnish abodes and retreats for the various orders of living beings. The phrase “the trees of the Lord” means great and magnificent trees — as the expression “mountains of God” means great and lofty mountains — as if they seemed to “approach” God, or as if no appellation would so well describe their nature as that which was derived from the Infinite One. See the notes at <sup><B316></sup>Psalm 36:6; 65:9; 80:10.

Are full of sap The word so rendered means merely to be full, to be saturated — the words “of sap” being supplied by the translators. The idea is, that, lofty as they are, they are abundantly supplied with that which is necessary to their growth. There is no want — no lack — of that which is needful to supply them. They flourish, sustained abundantly by that which is derived from the earth and the waters.

The cedars of Lebanon As among the loftiest and most magnificent productions of the earth. See the notes at <sup><B215></sup>Psalm 29:5; 92:12; <sup><B213></sup>Isaiah 2:13.

Which he hath planted So lofty and large, that it would seem as if none could plant them but the Almighty.

<sup><B417></sup>Psalm 104:17. Where the birds make their nests Furnishing a home for the birds where they may breed their young. In <sup><B412></sup>Psalm 104:12, the birds are introduced as singing among the foliage of trees and shrubs by the water-courses; here they are introduced as having their home in the lofty cedars in places which God had made for them. The word rendered “birds” here is the word which in <sup><B313></sup>Psalm 84:3 is translated “sparrow,” and which is commonly used to denote “small birds.” Compare <sup><B140></sup>Leviticus 14:4 (margin), and <sup><B145></sup>Leviticus 14:5-7,49-53. It is used, however, to denote birds of any kind. See <sup><B074></sup>Genesis 7:14; <sup><B088></sup>Psalm 8:8; 11:1; 148:10.

As for the stork See the notes at <sup><B313></sup>Job 39:13.

The fir trees are her house Her retreat; her abode. The stork here is used to represent the larger class of birds. The meaning is, that they build their nests among the fir-trees or cypresses. See the notes at <sup><294B></sup>Isaiah 14:8; 41:19. So Milton says:

*“The eagle and the stork
On cliffs and cedar-tops their eyries build.”*

They build their nests, however, not only on fir and pine trees, but on houses and castles. Dr. Thomson (“Land and the Book,” vol. i. p. 504), says of them, “These singular birds do not breed in Syria, but pass over it to Asia Minor, and into Northwestern Europe, where they not only build in fir and pine trees upon the mountains, but also enter cities and villages, and make their nests on houses, castles, and minarets.”

<sup><944B></sup>Psalm 104:18. The high hills are a refuge for the wild goats Still keeping up the description of animated nature — the carrying out of the work of creation. The idea is, that nature is full of life. Even the most inaccessible places — the rocks — the high hills — have their inhabitants. Where man cannot climb or dwell, there are abodes of animals which God has made to dwell there, and which find there a refuge — a shelter — a home. On the word used here, and rendered “wild goats,” see the notes at <sup><830></sup>Job 39:1. The word occurs elsewhere only in <sup><944></sup>1 Samuel 24:2.

And the rocks for the conies The word here “employed” — <sup><1827></sup>ִּפְּנִי — denotes a quadruped that chews the cud, in the manner of a hare (<sup><810></sup>Leviticus 11:5; <sup><647></sup>Deuteronomy 14:7), and living in flocks. The rabbis render it the “coney,” or rabbit, as our translators have done. The habits of the rabbit accord with this description. The word occurs nowhere else, except in <sup><1826></sup>Proverbs 30:26, where it is rendered, as here, “conies.”

<sup><949></sup>Psalm 104:19. He appointed the moon for seasons <sup><0014></sup>Genesis 1:14-18. That is, The moon, as well as the sun, is appointed to divide time; to determine its progress; to indicate the return of festival occasions, or appointed times to be observed in any manner. It is, in fact, the foundation of the division of the year into “months,” and consequently the indication of all that is to be observed in the “months” of the year. But for this, there would be no natural divisions of time except those of day and night, and of the year. How great an advantage it is for the purpose of life, to have time broken up into brief intervals or periods which can be marked and remembered, both in our private life and in history, it is not necessary to say. God has been pleased to add to the natural divisions of time into days, and years, and months, an “artificial” division — the “fourth” part of the moon’s course — “a week,” indicated by the Sabbath, thus greatly facilitating the plans of life in regard to stated times or “seasons,” and especially in regard to religious observances. The idea in the passage before us is, that the whole arrangement is one of benevolence, promoting the comfort of man, and bringing the ideas of succession, variety, and beauty into the system.

The sun knoweth his going down As if conscious of what he is doing, he knows the exact time of setting, and never varies, but always obeys the divine command; never sets “before” his time — unexpectedly shortening the day, and leaving man in sudden darkness in the midst of his toil; and never lingers above the horizon “after” the moment has come for his setting, but withdraws at the exact time, enabling man to close his toil, and seek repose, and giving an opportunity for another class of creatures to come forth on the animated scene. Their good is regarded as well as that of man; and the operations of nature are so arranged as to promote the welfare of all.

Psalm 104:20. Thou makest darkness, and it is night Thou hast made arrangements for the return of night — for the alternations of day and night. The Hebrew word rendered “makest,” means “to place;” and the idea is, that God constitutes the darkness, or so disposes things that it occurs.

Wherein all the beasts of the forest The margin is, “the beasts thereof do trample on the forest.” The reference is to the beasts which seek their prey at night.

Do creep forth The Hebrew word used here means properly “to creep,” as the smaller animals do, which have feet, as mice, lizards, crabs, or as those do which glide or drag themselves upon the ground, having no feet, as worms and serpents. <sup><0012></sup>Genesis 1:21,26,28,30; 9:2. The allusion here is to the quiet and noiseless manner in which the animals come forth at night in search of their prey, or seem to crawl out of their hiding-places — the places where they conceal themselves in the day-time. The idea is, that the arrangements which God has made in regard to day and night are wisely adapted to the animals which he has placed on the earth. The earth is full of animated beings, accomplishing by day and night the purposes of their existence.

Psalm 104:21. The young lions roar after their prey This is a continuation of the description in the previous verse. At night the beasts which had been hidden in the daytime crawl forth and seek their food. The lion is particularly specified as one of the beasts that in a general survey would attract attention. The psalmist hears his “roar” as he goes forth in the forest in pursuit of his prey.

And seek their meat from God Their food. That is, God bestows it on them, and they act as if they sought it at his hand. They seek it where he has placed it; they are dependent on him for it. It is a beautiful idea that even the brute creation act as if they called on God, and sought the supply of their needs at his hands.

Psalm 104:22. The sun ariseth A new scene in this endless variety of incidents in a world full of life and beauty. The psalmist sees the light break in the east, and the sun appear above the horizon — and the whole scene is changed. The animals that had gone forth at night are seen to return again to their hiding-places, and man in his turn (Psalm 104:23) is seen to go forth to his daily toil.

They gather themselves together Though scattered in the night, when light returns, they all bend their steps to the places where they are accustomed to repose in the daytime. The scene is most beautiful. At night they sally forth for their prey; when the morning light returns, they all retrace their steps to the places in dens and caverns where they pass the day, and there they repose in silence until night returns again.

Psalm 104:23. Man goeth forth ... Man is now seen to go forth from his dwelling, and he appears on the stage to perform his daily toil, until evening comes, and then again he gives way for the beasts of night. Thus the scene is ever varying — showing how full of animated existence the earth is; how varied are the occupations of its different inhabitants; and how the varieties of being are adapted to its own varied condition in the alternations of day and night.

Psalm 104:24. O LORD, how manifold are thy works! literally, “how many.” The reference is to the “number” and the “variety” of the works of God, and to the wisdom displayed in them all. The earth is not suited up merely for one class of inhabitants, but for an almost endless variety; and the wisdom of God is manifested alike in the number and in the variety. No one can estimate the “number” of beings God has made on the earth; no one can comprehend the richness of the variety. By day the air, the earth, the waters swarm with life — life struggling everywhere as if no place was to be left unoccupied; even for the dark scenes of night countless numbers of beings have been created; and, in all this immensity of numbers, there is an endless variety. No two are alike. Individuality is everywhere preserved, and the mind is astonished and confounded alike at the numbers and the variety.

In wisdom hast thou made them all That is, Thou hast adapted each and all to the different ends contemplated in their creation. Anyone of these beings shows the wisdom of God in its formation, and in its adaptations to the ends of its existence; how much more is that wisdom displayed in these countless numbers, and in this endless variety!

The earth is full of thy riches Hebrew, “possessions.” So the Septuagint and the Vulgate. That is, these various objects thus created are regarded as the “possession” of God; or, they belong to him, as the property of a man belongs to himself. The psalmist says that this wealth or property abounds everywhere; the earth is full of it.

<sup><19425></sup>Psalm 104:25. So is this great and wide sea ... Our translation here does not quite express the beauty and the force of the original; “This sea! Great and broad of hands! There is the creeping thing — and there is no number; animals — the little with the great.” The reference here is, undoubtedly to the Mediterranean Sea, which not improbably was in sight when the psalm was composed — as it is in sight not only along the coast, but from many of the elevations in Palestine. The phrase “wide of hands” applied to the sea, means that it seems to stretch out in all directions. Compare the notes at <sup><23321></sup>Isaiah 33:21. The “creeping things” refer to the variety of inhabitants of the deep that glide along as if they crept. See the notes at <sup><19421></sup>Psalm 104:20. The word “beasts” refers to any of the inhabitants of the deep, and the idea is that there is an endless variety “there.” This reflection cannot but impress itself on the mind of anyone when looking on the ocean: What a countless number, and what a vast variety of inhabitants are there in these waters — all created by God; all provided for by his bounty!

<sup><19426></sup>Psalm 104:26. There go the ships There the vessels move along — objects that would, of course, attract the attention of one looking at the sea, and admiring its wonders. The psalmist is describing the active scenes on the surface of the globe, and, of course, on looking at the ocean, these would be among the objects that would particularly attract his attention.

There is that leviathan The Septuagint and the Vulgate render this, dragon. On the meaning of the word “leviathan,” see the notes at <sup><BHD></sup>Job 41:1.

whom thou hast made Margin, as in Hebrew, “formed.” The idea of creation is implied in the word.

To play therein As his native element. To move about therein; to make quick and rapid motions, as if in sport.

<sup><DAB></sup>Psalm 104:27. These wait all upon thee That is, These are all dependent on thee. It does not, of course, mean that they “wait” in the sense that they are conscious of their dependence on God, but that they are “actually” dependent. The original word implies the idea of “expecting” or “hoping,” and is so rendered in the Septuagint and Vulgate. They have no other ground of expectation or hope but in thee.

That thou mayest give them their meat in due season Their food at the proper time. That is, They are constantly dependent on thee, that thou mayest give them food from day to day. Perhaps there is also the idea that they do not lay up or hoard anything; or that they cannot anticipate their own needs, but must receive from one day to another all that they want directly from God.

<sup><DAB></sup>Psalm 104:28. That thou givest them they gather What thou dost place before them they collect. They have no resources of their own. They can invent nothing; they cannot vary their food by art, as man does; they cannot make use of reason, as man does, or of skill, in preparing it, to suit and pamper the appetite. It comes prepared for them direct from the hand of God.

Thou openest thine hand As one does who bestows a gift on another. The point in the passage is, that they receive it immediately from God, and that they are wholly dependent on him for it. They have not to labor to prepare it, but it is made ready for them, and they have only to gather it up. The allusion in the “language” may be to the gathering of manna in the wilderness, when it was provided by God, and people had only to collect it for their use. So it is with the brute creation on land and in the waters.

They are filled with good They are “satiated” with good; that is, They are satisfied with what to them is good, or with what supplies their needs.

Psalm 104:29. Thou hidest thy face As if God turned away from them; as if he was displeased with them; as if he withdrew from them the tokens of his friendship and favor.

They are troubled They are confounded; they are overwhelmed with terror and amazement. The word “troubled” by no means conveys the sense of the original word — לִהְרֹס<sup>h926</sup> — which means properly to tremble; to be in trepidation; to be filled with terror; to be amazed; to be confounded. It is that kind of consternation which one has when all support and protection are withdrawn, and when inevitable ruin stares one in the face. So when God turns away, all their support is gone; all their resources “fail, and they must die.” They are represented as conscious of this; or, this is what would occur if they were conscious.

Thou takest away their breath Withdrawing that which thou gavest to them.

They die, and return to their dust Life ends when thou dost leave them, and they return again to earth. So it is also with man. When God withdraws from him, nothing remains for him “but to die.”

Psalm 104:30. Thou sendest forth thy spirit, they are created That is, New races are created in their place, or start up as if they were created directly by God. They derive their being from him as really as those did which were first formed by his hand, and the work of creation is constantly going on.

And thou renewest the face of the earth The earth is not suffered to become desolate. Though one generation passes off, yet a new one is made in its place, and the face of the earth constantly puts on the aspect of freshness and newness.

Psalm 104:31. The glory of the LORD shall endure for ever Margin, as in Hebrew, “shall be.” It might be rendered, “Let the glory of the Lord be for ever,” implying a strong desire that it should be so. But the language may denote a strong conviction that it would be so. The mind of the writer was filled with wonder at the beauty and variety of the works of God on the land, in the air, and in the waters; and he exclaims, with a heart full of admiration, that the glory of a Being who had made all these things could never cease, but must endure forever. All the glory of man would pass away; all the monuments that he would rear would be destroyed; all the works of art executed by him must perish; but the glory of One who had made the earth, and filled it with such wonders, could not but endure forever and ever.

The LORD shall rejoice in his works See <sup><MOSE></sup>Genesis 1:31. The idea here is, that God finds pleasure in the contemplation of his own works; in the beauty and order of creation; and in the happiness which he sees as the result of his work of creation. There is no impropriety in supposing that God finds pleasure in the manifestation of the wisdom, the power, the goodness, the mercy, and the love of his own glorious nature.

<sup><DAVE></sup>Psalm 104:32. He looketh on the earth, and it trembleth There is great sublimity in this expression, as indicating the power and the majesty of God. He has only to “look” upon his works, and they stand in awe and tremble. The most mighty and fearful convulsions of nature occur as if they were the mere effect of God’s “looking” on the earth. Compare <sup><ABD></sup>Habakkuk 3:10 — “The mountains saw thee, and they trembled.”

He toucheth the hills, and they smoke That is, as Mount Sinai did when God came down upon it. <sup><DEIS></sup>Exodus 19:18. It is as if the hills were conscious of his presence, and were awed.

<sup><DAVE></sup>Psalm 104:33. I will sing unto the LORD as long as I live That is, I will continue to praise him; I will never cease to adore him. The result of the psalmist’s meditations on the wonderful works of God is to awaken in his mind a desire to praise God forever. He is so filled with a sense of his greatness and glory that he sees that there would be occasion for eternal praise; or that the reason for praise could never be exhausted. He who has any proper sense of the greatness, the majesty, and the glory of God “intends” to praise him forever. He sees that there is enough in the character of God to demand eternal praise, and he does not anticipate that a period can ever occur in all the future when he will feel that the causes for praise have come to an end, or when his heart will be indisposed to celebrate that praise.

<sup><DAVE></sup>Psalm 104:34. My meditation of him shall be sweet That is, I will find pleasure in meditating on his character and works. See the notes at <sup><BOU></sup>Psalm 1:2. It is one of the characteristics of true piety that there is a “disposition” to think about God; that the mind is “naturally” drawn to that subject; that it does not turn away from it, when it is suggested; that this fills up the intervals of business in the day-time, and that it occupies the mind when wakeful at night. <sup><9616></sup>Psalm 63:6. It is also a characteristic of true piety that there is “pleasure” in such meditations; happiness in thinking of God. The sinner has no such pleasure. The thought of God is painful to him; he does not desire to have it suggested to him; he turns away from it, and avoids it. Compare the notes at <sup><2301P></sup>Isaiah 30:11. It is one of the evidences of true piety when a man “begins” to find pleasure in thinking about God; when the subject, instead of being unpleasant to him, becomes pleasant; when he no longer turns away from it, but is sensible of a desire to cherish the thought of God, and to know more of him.

I will be glad in the LORD That is, I will rejoice that there is such a Being; I will seek my happiness in him as my God.

<sup><9445></sup>Psalm 104:35. Let the sinners be consumed out of the earth

Compare <sup><18738></sup>Psalm 37:38. This might with propriety be rendered, “Consumed are the sinners out of the earth,” expressing a fact and not a desire; and it may have been prompted by the feeling of the psalmist that such an event would occur; that is, that the time would come when sin would no more abound, but when the world would be filled with righteousness, and all the dwellers on the earth would praise God. The word translated “consumed” — from  $\mu\acute{\alpha}\epsilon$ <sup><48552></sup> — means properly to complete, to perfect, to finish, to cease. It does not mean “consume” in the sense of being burned up — as our word means — or destroyed, but merely to come to an end, to cease, to pass away: that is; Let the time soon come — or, the time will soon come — when there will be no sinners on the earth, but when all the inhabitants of the earth will worship and honor God. The “connection” here seems to be this: The psalmist was himself so filled with the love of God, and with admiration of his works, that he desired that all might partake of the same feeling; and he looked forward, therefore, as those who love God must do, to the time when all the dwellers on earth would see his glory, and when there should be none who did not adore and love him. All that is “fairly” implied in the wish of the psalmist here would be accomplished if all sinners were converted, and if, in that sense, there were to be no more transgressors in the world.

And let the wicked be no more Let there not be anymore wicked persons; let the time come when there shall be no bad people on the earth, but when all shall be righteous. In this prayer all persons could properly unite.

Bless thou the LORD, O my soul The psalm closes (as Psalm 103 does) as it began. The psalmist commenced with the expression of a purpose to bless God; it closes with the same purpose, confirmed by a survey of the wonderful works of God.

Praise ye the LORD Hebrew, Hallelu-jah. The psalmist expresses the earnest desire of a truly pious heart (in looking upon a world so beautiful, so varied in its works, so full of the expressions of the wisdom and goodness of God — a world where all the inferior creation so completely carries out the purpose of the Creator), that man, the noblest of all the works of God, might unite with the world around and beneath him in carrying out the great purpose of the creation — so that he might, in his own proper place, and according to the powers with which he is endowed, acknowledge God. How beautiful — how sublime — would be the spectacle on earth, if man accomplished the purpose of his creation, and filled his place, as well as the springs, the hills, the trees, the fowls, the wild goats, the moon, the sun, the young lions, and the inhabitants of the “great and wide sea” do in their spheres! Oh, come the time when on earth there shall be harmony in all the works of God, and when all creatures here shall carry out the purpose which was contemplated when God called the earth into existence.

APPENDIX NOTES ON PSALM 104

The general argument of this divine ode of creation has been well expressed by Calvin. “This psalm,” he says, “differs from the last, in that it neither treats of God’s special mercies bestowed on his church, nor lifts us to the hope of a heavenly life; but painting for us in the frame of the world, and the order of nature, the living image of God’s wisdom, power, and goodness, exhorts us to praise him, because in this one frail mortal life he manifests himself to us as a Father.” It is a bright and living picture of God’s creative power, pouring life and gladness throughout the universe.

It is not surprising that this great hymn of creation should have called forth the warmest expressions of admiration from those who have studied it, and that they should have vied with one another in praising it as a master-piece which has rarely been exceeded. One writer (Amyraldus) “prefers it to all the lyric poetry of the Greeks and Romans.” Another (Hupfeld) declares that “in Hebrew poetry there is little that can compare with it in precision of outline, and in the delicacy of its transitions, as well as in its warm sympathy with nature, and in the beauty of its images.”

A third (Sanchez) says,

“The psalm is delightful, sweet, and instructive, as teaching us the soundest views of nature, and the best method of pursuing the study of it, namely, by admiring with one eye the works of God, and with the other God himself, their Creator and Preserver.”

The great naturalist, A. Von Humboldt, writes:

“It might almost be said that one single psalm represents the image of the whole cosmos. ... We are astonished to find in a lyrical poem of such limited compass the whole universe — the heavens and earth — sketched with a few bold touches. The contrast of the labor of man with the animal life of nature, and the image of omnipresent, invisible power, renewing the earth at will, or sweeping it of inhabitants, is a grand and solemn poetical creation.”

“With what an eye of gladness,” says Herder, “does the poet survey the earth! It is a green mountain of Yahweh, which he lifted above the waters; a paradise which he established for the dwelling-place of so many living creatures above the seas. The series of pictures which the poet here displays is in fact the natural history of the earth.” — Perowne.

Psalm 104:4. Who maketh his angels spirits ... According to the simplest and most obvious construction of this verse, it can only mean that God makes his angels or ministering spirits swift and ardent in his service. But such a statement would be wholly out of place in a psalm, the rest of which relates exclusively to the material creation. The best interpreters are therefore of opinion that angels and ministers are predicates, not subjects, or in other words, that the idea meant to be conveyed is, that he makes the winds his messengers or angels, and the flaming fire his minister or servant. This agrees exactly with the previous declaration that he makes the cloud his chariot or conveyance, and moves upon the wings of the wind. It may seem, however, to be inconsistent with the use made of the passage in ~~SC007~~ Hebrews 1:7, as a proof that the angels are inferior to the Son of God. But how could this inferiority be proved by the fact that the angels are spirits, or even wind and fire? The latter cannot be literally true, and if metaphorical, can only mean that they are swift and ardent in God's service, which they might be and yet equal to the Son in nature, who, considered as a messenger or agent of the Father, exhibits precisely the same qualities. The truth is, that the passage, as thus understood, is perfectly irrelevant and useless to the argument, and therefore that this mode of explaining it is not entitled to the preference, whatever difficulties may attend the other. Let it be observed, too, that the Septuagint, which is quoted in ~~SC007~~ Hebrews 1:7, is an exact transcript of the Hebrew, both as to the sense and collocation of the words, so that if the original admits of a different construction, it may be extended to the version likewise. The most satisfactory conclusion is, that the words are not quoted as an argument or proof of the inferiority of angels, but merely as a striking yet familiar form of words in which to clothe the writer's own idea, which is this, that angels are mere messengers and ministers, and as such may be classed with the material agencies which God employs in execution of his purpose. The wind and the lightning are God's angels and his ministers, and are expressly so described in the Old Testament; but they are never called his sons, much less addressed directly as the sovereign, eternal, righteous, ever-blessed God. Nor are the ministering spirits who share with these material agencies the character of messengers and servants, ever so described or so addressed. By thus supplying the suppressed links of the chain of argument, the verse before us in the only sense of which the context really admits, will be found not only as appropriate as the oilier to the purpose for which it is quoted in the New Testament, but incomparably more so. — Alexander.

~~BA415~~ Psalm 104:15. Wine that maketh glad the heart of man ... In these words we are taught, that God not only provides for people's necessity, and bestows upon them as much as is sufficient for the ordinary purposes of life, but that in his goodness he deals still more bountifully with them by cheering their hearts with wine and oil. Nature would certainly be satisfied with water to drink; and therefore the addition of wine is owing to God's superabundant liberality ... But as there is nothing to which we are more prone than to abuse God's benefits by giving way to excess, the more bountiful he is toward people, the more ought they to take care not to pollute, by their intemperance, the abundance which is presented before them. Paul had therefore good reason for giving that prohibition (<sup><6134></sup>Romans 13:14), “Make not provision for the flesh, to fulfil the lusts thereof;” for if we give full scope to the desires of the flesh, there will be no bounds. As God bountifully provides for us, so he has appointed a law of temperance, that each may voluntarily restrain himself in his abundance. He sends out oxen and donkeys into pastures, and they content themselves with a sufficiency; but while furnishing us with more than we need, he enjoins upon us an observance of the rules of moderation, that we may not voraciously devour his benefits; and in lavishing upon us a more abundant supply of good things than our necessities require, he puts our moderation to the test. The proper rule with respect to the use of bodily sustenance, is to partake of it that it may sustain, but not oppress us. The mutual communication of the things needful for the support of the body, which God has enjoined upon us, is a very good check to intemperance, for the condition upon which the rich are favored with their abundance is that they should relieve the needs of their brethren. As the prophet in this account of the divine goodness in providence makes no reference to the excesses of men, we gather from his words that it is lawful to use wine not only in cases of necessity, but also thereby to make us merry. This mirth must however be tempered with sobriety, first, that people may not forget themselves, drown their senses, and destroy their strength, but rejoice before their God according to the injunction of Moses, (<sup><6234></sup>Leviticus 23:40; and, secondly, that they may exhilarate their minds under a sense of gratitude, so as to be rendered more active in the service of God. He who rejoices in this way will also be always prepared to endure sadness whenever God is pleased to send it. That rule of Paul ought to be kept in mind (<sup><3012></sup>Philippians 4:12), “I have learned to abound — I have learned to suffer want.” If some token of the divine anger is manifest, even he who has an overflowing abundance of all kinds of dainty food will restrict himself in his diet, knowing that he is called to put on sackcloth and to sit among ashes. Much more ought he whom poverty compels to be temperate and sober, to abstain from such delicacies. In short, if one man is constrained to abstain from wine by sickness, if another has only vapid wine, and a third nothing but water, let each be content with his own lot, and willingly and submissively wean himself from those gratifications which God denies him. — Calvin.

<sup><6445></sup>Psalm 104:35. Let the sinners be consumed out of the earth Coming now to the great question brought up by these imprecatory psalms, are we in a condition to throw any light upon it? It is the undoubted law of Christ that we should love our enemies, bless them that curse us, do good to them that hate us, pray for them that despitefully use us and persecute us. Can we explain how the language of the psalmists can be reconciled with the sentiments and conduct enjoined in that command?

In some instances the reconciliation is easy. Take, for example, the prayer with which Psalm 104 concludes, "Let the sinners be consumed out of the earth, and let the wicked be no more." The psalm is a meditation on God's works in nature, and has excited the admiration of the historians of natural science as the fullest and brightest expression of that sympathy with nature, and appreciation of its unity, in which the sacred poets so remarkably excelled all the pagan writers. At first sight it seems unaccountable that such a sunny joyous ode should be wound up with a petition for the rooting out of wicked people; it seems a jarring note in the song with which the church expresses her participation in the joy of her Lord over this fair world, the product of his beneficent wisdom. But, in truth, the prayer is both in harmony with the song and necessary to its completeness. An anecdote will explain my meaning. It fell to my lot some years ago to undertake a walk of some miles, on a summer morning, along a sea-shore of surpassing beauty. It was the Lord's-day, and the language of Psalm 104 rose spontaneously in my mind as one scene after another unfolded itself before the eye. About halfway to my destination the road lay through a dirty hamlet, and my meditations were rudely interrupted by the brawling of some people, who looked as if they had been spending the night in a drunken debauch. Well, I thought, the psalmist must have had some such unpleasant experience. He must have fallen in with people, located in some scene of natural beauty, who, instead of being a holy priesthood to give voice to nature in praise of her Creator — instead of being, in the pure and holy tenor of their lives, the heavenliest note of the general song — filled it with a harsh discord. His prayer is the vehement expression of a desire that the earth may no longer be marred by the presence of wicked people — that they may be utterly consumed, and may give place to people animated with the fear of God, just and holy men, people that shall be a crown of beauty on the head of this fair creation. If this be the right explanation of the psalmist's prayer, it is not only justifiable, but there is something wrong in our meditations on nature, if we are not disposed to join in it. — Binnie.

NOTES ON PSALM 105

The author of this psalm is unknown, as is the occasion on which it was composed. It resembles the seventy-eighth psalm in the fact that both are of an historical nature, recounting the dealings of God with his people in their deliverance from the bondage in Egypt. The object of the former psalm however, seems to have been “to recall the nation from their sins,” and to vindicate the dealings of God with the Hebrews in his arrangements for their government, or in the change of the administration, by giving the government to the tribe of Judah under David, rather than to Ephraim; the object of this psalm is “to excite the people to gratitude” by the remembrance of the goodness of God to the people in former times. Accordingly this psalm is occupied with recounting the mercies of God — his various acts of intervention in their history — all appealing to the nation to cherish a grateful remembrance of those acts, and to love and praise him.

The first sixteen verses of the psalm are substantially the same as the first part of the psalm composed by David when he brought up the ark, as recorded in ~~13108~~ 1 Chronicles 16:8-22. But at that point the resemblance ceases. Probably the author of this psalm found in the one composed by David what was suitable to the occasion on which this was composed, and adopted it without any material change. In the remainder of the psalm, he has simply carried out in the history of the Jews what was suggested by David in the psalm in 1 Chronicles 16, and has applied the idea to the other events of the Jewish history, as furnishing a ground of praise. The psalm is a mere summary of the principal events of that history to the time when the people entered the promised land — as laying the foundation of praise to God.

~~19518~~ Psalm 105:1. O give thanks unto the LORD The design here is to show that thanks should be given to the Lord in view of his dealings with his people, as stated in the subsequent portions of the psalm.

Call upon his name More literally, “Call him by his name;” that is, Address him by his proper title; ascribe to him the attributes which properly belong to him; or, address him in a proper manner.

Make known his deeds among the people What he has done in former times. The allusion is to his acts in behalf of his people in delivering them from Egyptian bondage, and bringing them to the promised land. The word “people” here refers to the Hebrew people; and the exhortation is, that the knowledge of these deeds should be diffused and kept up among them. One of the ways of doing this was that proposed by the psalmist, to wit, by a psalm of praise — by recording and celebrating these acts in their devotions. One of the most effective modes of keeping up the knowledge of what God has done in our world is by songs of praise in worshipping assemblies.

Psalm 105:2. Sing unto him Sing before him; offer him praise.

Sing psalms unto him The word here rendered “sing psalms” means properly “to prune,” and then, to” cut off,” as a discourse at regular periods; or, to utter in rhythmical numbers; and then it means to accompany such words with an instrument of music. The idea here is, that he is to be approached, not merely with “singing,” but with sentiments expressed in the form of regular composition — in musical numbers.

Talk ye The word used here very commonly means to meditate, to muse (compare the notes at Psalm 1:2), but would here seem to be employed in the sense of “talking over,” to wit, in singing. That is, In the psalms used let there be a “narrative” of what God has done. Let his works be the subject of the words used in the psalm.

Of all his wondrous works Of what he has done that is suited to excite wonder and admiration. Compare Psalm 77:12.

Psalm 105:3. Glory ye in his holy name The original word rendered “glory” is the same word which is commonly used to denote “praise,” and it has that meaning here. The idea is, In your praises let the main subject be the name of God — that holy name by which he chooses to be known. The Hebrew is, “the name of his holiness.” It implies

(a) that we should rejoice in God — in his very name — in that by which he chooses to make himself known;

(b) that it is a special subject of praise and rejoicing that his name is “holy;” that is, that he is a holy Being.

This can be a subject of real rejoicing only to those who are themselves holy; but properly considered, one of the highest reasons for rejoicing in God is the fact that he is holy; that he cannot look upon sin but with abhorrence. There would be no ground of confidence in God if this were not so.

Let the heart of them rejoice that seek the LORD That desire to know him; that come to praise him. Let their hearts rejoice — or, let them be happy:

- (a) because they are “permitted” to seek him;
- (b) because they are inclined to seek him;
- (c) because they have such a God to come to — One so mighty, so holy, so good, so gracious.

Psalm 105:4. Seek the LORD and his strength Seek strength from him; seek that his strength may be imparted to you; seek him as a Being of almighty power; as One by whom you may be strengthened. The Septuagint and Vulgate render this, “Seek the Lord, and ‘be strengthened.’” “Strength comes from God, and it is only by his strength that we can be strong; only by our making use of his omnipotence in our own behalf that we can discharge the duties, and bear the trials of this life. Compare the notes at <sup><241B></sup>Isaiah 40:29-31.

Psalm 105:5. Remember his marvelous works ... The works suited to excite wonder. Call them to remembrance in your psalm; seek the aid of music and song to impress the memory of them deeply on your hearts.

His wonders His miracles. See the notes at <sup><378B></sup>Psalm 78:43; <sup><218B></sup>Isaiah 8:18.

And the judgments of his mouth That is, properly, the judgments which he pronounced on his enemies, and which were followed by their overthrow. The word does not refer here, as it often does, to his statutes or commands.

Psalm 105:6. O ye seed of Abraham his servant, ye children of Jacob his chosen All you who are descendants of Abraham and Jacob; the former being particularly mentioned here because he was the great ancestor of the Hebrew people; the latter, because the events referred to were closely connected with the history of Jacob — with his going down into Egypt, and with the division of the tribes named after his sons. The word rendered “his chosen” would seem in our version to refer to Jacob. In the original, however, it is in the plural number, and must agree with the word rendered “children,” “Ye chosen sons of Jacob” (compare <sup><9A5B></sup>Psalm 105:43). So it has been translated in <sup><31G3></sup>1 Chronicles 16:13, “Ye children of Jacob, his chosen ones.”

<sup><9A5D></sup>Psalm 105:7. He is the LORD our God His name is Yahweh — the true God; and this God is ours. See the notes at <sup><99R7></sup>Psalm 95:7.

His judgments are in all the earth More properly “in all the land;” that is, in every part of the land he is honored as our God. His institutions are established here; his laws are obeyed here; his worship is celebrated here. No other God is worshipped here; everywhere he is acknowledged as the nation’s God.

<sup><9A5B></sup>Psalm 105:8. He hath remembered his covenant forever That is, God has had it constantly in remembrance, or always. Compare the notes at <sup><9172></sup>Luke 1:72. Though the covenant was made long since; though many generations of people have passed by; though great changes have occurred; though many calamities have come upon the nations, yet his ancient covenant and promise have never been forgotten. All his promises have been fulfilled; all ever will be. The “covenant” here referred to is that which was made with Abraham, and through him with the Hebrew people.

The word which he commanded The thing which he commanded; that is, all which he ordained and appointed.

To a thousand generations Very many generations; or, any number of generations: that is, always. Compare <sup><9216></sup>Exodus 20:6. The experience of the people through all the generations of their history has shown that in what he has promised and directed he is unchanging.

<sup><9A5D></sup>Psalm 105:9. Which covenant he made with Abraham Which he “ratified” with Abraham. Literally, “which he cut with Abraham.”

And his oath unto Isaac Confirming the promise made to Abraham. See <sup><9212></sup>Genesis 26:2-5.

Psalm 105:10. And confirmed the same unto Jacob literally, “caused it to stand;” that is, he made it fast or secure. He renewed it, commanding the same things; making the same promises; and pledging himself for its fulfillment in the same manner. <sup><0280></sup>Genesis 28:10-15.

For a law For an established or settled ordinance, for a rule by which future things were to be regulated: that is, they would occur according to that promise, and be conformed to it. It was, as it were, a rule which God prescribed for himself in regard to his own future conduct.

And to Israel ... Another name for Jacob, <sup><0328></sup>Genesis 32:28.

Psalm 105:11. Saying, Unto thee will I give the land of Canaan <sup><0134></sup>Genesis 13:14,15.

The lot of your inheritance Or, that shall be the lot of your inheritance; or, what you shall inherit. The margin is, “the cord.” The Hebrew word — l bj, <sup><02256></sup> — means properly a cord, a rope; and then, a measuring-line. Hence, it means a portion “measured out” and assigned to anyone as land, <sup><0674></sup>Joshua 17:14; 19:9. Compare <sup><0916></sup>Psalm 16:6. The meaning is, that the land of Canaan was given by promise to the patriarchs as their lot or portion of the earth; as that which they and their descendants were to possess as their own.

Psalm 105:12. When they were but a few men in number literally, “In their being people of number, very little.” That is, They could then be easily numbered, and they were so few that they could not take possession of it themselves. This is in contrast with the promise then made to them that they should be in number as the stars, and as the sand on the sea shore.

And strangers in it Foreigners. They were mere sojourners. They did not become incorporated with the people of the land. They did not acquire property there. They were regarded and treated as belonging to a foreign people. See the notes at <sup><0810></sup>Hebrews 11:9.

Psalm 105:13. When they went from one nation to another ... Wandered about, as if they had no home and no fixed habitation. See <sup><0126></sup>Genesis 12:6,9,10; 13:1; 20:1; 26:1,17,22,23.

Psalm 105:14. He suffered no man to do them wrong He protected them as they wandered from place to place, and as they were exposed to dangers. See the history of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, in their wanderings, as it is recorded in the book of Genesis.

Yea, he reprov'd kings for their sakes That he might protect them; that he might keep them from danger and from sin. See the case of Pharaoh in the time of Abraham, <sup><0127></sup>Genesis 12:17-20, and the case of Abimelech, <sup><0128></sup>Genesis 20:3,6.

<sup><0129></sup>Psalm 105:15. Saying, Touch not mine anointed That is, This was the language of his “providence.” It was as though God had said this. It is not meant that this was said in so many words, but this is the “poetic” form of representing the dealings of Providence. Compare <sup><0131></sup>Genesis 26:11. The word “anointed” here means that God had, as it were, set them apart to his service, or that they were to him as kings, and priests, and prophets, sacred people, belonging to God. The “language” is not found in the Old Testament as applied to the patriarchs, but the “idea” is fairly implied there, that they belonged to God as sacred and holy men.

And do my prophets no harm As if God had thus spoken to them, and called them prophets. That is, they belonged to God as a sacred order: they were separate from other men, and God regarded them as his own.

<sup><0136></sup>Psalm 105:16. Moreover, he called for a famine upon the land It was not by chance; not by the mere operation of physical laws, but it was because God “ordered” it. The famine here referred to, as the connection shows, was that which occurred in the time of Jacob, and which was the occasion of the migration into Egypt. There was also a famine in the time of Abraham (<sup><0120></sup>Genesis 12:10); but the design of the psalmist here is to refer to that period of the Jewish history which pertained to their residence in Egypt, and to the dealings of God with the nation when there, as furnishing an occasion for gratitude. Genesis 41; 42.

He brake the whole staff of bread That which supports life, as a staff does a feeble man. See the notes at <sup><0138></sup>Isaiah 3:1.

<sup><0137></sup>Psalm 105:17. He sent a man before them That is, He so ordered it by his providence that a man — Joseph — was sent before the family of Jacob into Egypt, that he might make arrangements for their reception and preservation. The whole matter was as God had sent him, or had commanded him to go. And yet it was brought about as the result of a series of acts of the most wicked character; by the envy and the hatred of his brethren; by their guilt and hardness of heart in proposing at first to put him to death, and then in their arrangements for selling him to hopeless slavery; by their plan so to dispose of him that their father might never hear of him again, and that they might be troubled with him no more. God did not cause these acts. He did not command them; he did not approve of them. And yet, since they did occur, and since Joseph's brethren were so wicked, God made use of these things to accomplish his own benevolent purposes, and to carry out his great designs. So he makes use of the passions of wicked people at all times to execute his plans (compare the notes at <sup><23015></sup>Isaiah 10:5-7; see also <sup><19730></sup>Psalms 76:10; and <sup><01511></sup>Genesis 50:20); and so he will do to the end of time. People are free in their wickedness; but God is equally free in frustrating their schemes, and overruling their designs for the accomplishment of his own purposes.

<sup><094518></sup>Psalm 105:18. Whose feet they hurt with fetters In <sup><04418></sup>Genesis 40:3; it is said of Joseph that he was "bound" in prison. It is not improbable that his "feet" were bound, as this is the usual way of confining prisoners.

He was laid in iron In the prison. The margin is, "his soul came into iron." The version in the Prayer-Book of the Episcopal Church is, the iron entered into his soul. This is a more striking and beautiful rendering, though it may be doubted whether the Hebrew will permit it. DeWette renders it, "In iron lay his body."

<sup><094519></sup>Psalm 105:19. Until the time that his word came The word, or the communication from God.

The word of the LORD tried him That is, tested his skill in interpreting dreams, and his power to disclose the future. Genesis 41. This furnished a "trial" of his ability, and showed that he was truly the favorite of God, and was endowed with wisdom from on high. The word rendered "tried" is that which is commonly applied to metals in testing their genuineness and purity. Compare the notes at <sup><091216></sup>Psalms 12:6.

<sup><094520></sup>Psalm 105:20. The king sent and loosed him Released him from prison. <sup><04414></sup>Genesis 41:14. The object was that he might interpret the dreams of Pharaoh.

The ruler of the people, and let him go free Hebrew, "peoples," in the plural — referring either to the fact that there were "many" people in the land, or that Pharaoh ruled over tributary nations as well as over the Egyptians.

Psalm 105:21. He made him lord of his house <sup><0444></sup>Genesis 41:40.

This implied that the administration of the affairs of the nation was virtually committed to him.

And ruler of all his substance Margin, as in Hebrew, “possession.” Of all he had. He placed all at his disposal in the affairs of his kingdom.

Psalm 105:22. To bind his princes at pleasure Giving him absolute power. The power here referred to was that which was always claimed in despotic governments, and was, and is still, actually practiced in Oriental nations. Literally, “to bind his princes ‘by his soul;’” that is, at his will; or, as he chose.

And teach his senators wisdom This is now an unhappy translation. The word “senator” in fact originally had reference to “age” (see Webster’s Dictionary), but it is now commonly applied to a body of men entrusted with a share in the administration of government — usually a higher body in a government — as the Senate of the United States. As these were usually “aged men,” the word has acquired its present meaning, and is now ordinarily used without reference to age. But there was no such constituted body in the government of Egypt — for despotism does not admit of such an arrangement. The Hebrew word here means “aged men,” and is employed with reference to those who were connected with the administration, or whom the monarch would consult — his counselors. The meaning of the phrase “to teach them wisdom” is, that he would instruct them “what to do;” literally, he would “make them wise,” that is, in reference to the administration. He had the right of commanding them, and directing them in the administration. At the same time, it is doubtless true that Joseph was endowed with practical wisdom in the affairs of government far beyond them, and that in instructing them what to do, he actually imparted “wisdom” to them.

Psalm 105:23. Israel also came into Egypt Another name for Jacob; see <sup><0450></sup>Psalm 105:10.

And Jacob sojourned in the land of Ham Not as a permanent abode, but as a temporary arrangement, until the time should come for the people to be removed to the land of promise. See <sup><0406></sup>Genesis 46:6. The more literal rendering would be, “Jacob was a stranger — a foreigner — in the land of Ham.” On the meaning of the word “Ham,” see the notes at <sup><1978></sup>Psalm 78:51.

<sup><1952></sup>Psalm 105:24. And he increased his people greatly ... God caused them to multiply. <sup><1007></sup>Exodus 1:7,9.

<sup><1955></sup>Psalm 105:25. He turned their heart to hate his people God turned their heart. That is, He so ordered things that they became the enemies of his people, and made it necessary that they should be removed into another land. It is not said that God did this by his direct “power;” or that he “compelled” them to hate his people; or that he in any way interfered with their “will;” or that he regarded this “as a good” in itself; or that he “approved” of it: but this is said in accordance with the usual representations in the Bible, where God is spoken of as having all things under his control, and where it is constantly affirmed that nothing takes place without his own proper agency and government in the matter. Nothing — not even the human will — free as it is — is independent of God; and not even the worst passions of men are “outside of his plan,” or independent in such a sense that he does not afford the opportunity for their development and display. Compare the notes at <sup><2360></sup>Isaiah 6:10; 10:5-7,15.

To deal subtilly In a fraudulent, or deceitful manner. See <sup><1010></sup>Exodus 1:10.

<sup><1956></sup>Psalm 105:26. He sent Moses his servant He sent Moses to be his servant in delivering his people; that is, to accomplish the work which he had designed should be done.

And Aaron whom he had chosen whom he had selected to perform an important work in delivering his people from bondage.

<sup><1957></sup>Psalm 105:27. They shewed his signs among them literally, “They placed among them the words of his signs.” So the margin. The reference is to the miracles performed in Egypt in bringing calamities upon the Egyptians to induce them to permit the children of Israel to go out from their bondage. They were the agents in setting these wonders before the Egyptians. The term words is employed here — “the words of his signs” — to keep up the idea that it was by the command of God that this was done, or by his word. It was by no power of their own, but only by the authority of God.

And wonders in the land of Ham Miracles. Things suited to produce astonishment. See <sup><19457></sup>Psalm 105:5.

And they rebelled not against his word More literally, “his words.” The reference is to Moses and Aaron; and the idea, as expressed here, is that they were obedient to the command of God; that they went and did what he ordered them; that, although he required them to go before a mighty and proud monarch, to denounce against him the vengeance of heaven, and to be the instruments of bringing upon the land unspeakably severe judgments, yet they did not shrink from what God commanded them to do. They were true to his appointment, and showed themselves to be faithful messengers of God. Others, however, suppose that this refers to the Egyptians, and that it is to be taken as a question: “And did they not rebel against his word?” The language might bear this, and the translators of the Septuagint seem to have so understood it, for they render it, “And they rebelled against his words.” But the most natural construction is that in our common version, and the design is evidently to commend the boldness and the fidelity of Moses and Aaron.

<sup><19457></sup>Psalm 105:29-36. See an account of these plagues in Exodus 6—11. Compare <sup><19783></sup>Psalm 78:43-51. This is mostly a mere enumeration of the plagues in the order in which they occurred, but without, of course, the details of the circumstances attending them. There are no circumstances mentioned here which require particular explanation.

<sup><19457></sup>Psalm 105:37. He brought them forth also with silver and gold Which they had begged of the Egyptians. In <sup><19125></sup>Exodus 12:35, it is said, in our translation, that they had “borrowed” this gold and silver, together with raiment, of the Egyptians. This is an unhappy translation, as our word “borrow” means to ask anything of another for the purpose of using it for a time, with an implied understanding that it shall be returned, if an article to be used — or that as much money shall be repaid, if it is money that is borrowed — and according to this there would have been dishonesty and fraud on the part of the Israelites in “borrowing” these things of the Egyptians, when not intending (as they evidently did not) to return them. The Hebrew word, however, in <sup><19125></sup>Exodus 12:35 — l aac<sup><47592></sup> — means merely to ask, “to demand, to require, to request, to petition, to beg.” The idea of an obligation to “return” the things, as in our word “borrow,” is not attached to the Hebrew word.

And there was not one feeble person ... literally, Not one who was lame; or, who halted, or staggered. This, of course, is not necessarily to be understood literally. It is a general description of the capability of the people for traveling, or for war.

Psalm 105:38. Egypt was glad when they departed They had suffered so many plagues; the land was so utterly desolate, there was so much sorrow in their dwellings, from the calamities which had come upon them for refusing to let the Israelites go, that at last they were glad to have them depart, and they were willing to aid them that they might get rid of them. This will, in part, account for the fact that they were willing to give them what they asked — even silver and gold — if they might thus facilitate their departure.

For the fear of them fell upon them The fear of them, as being under the protection of God; and the fear of the judgments, which must follow if they continued to oppress them.

Psalm 105:39. He spread a cloud for a covering See the notes at Psalm 78:14. In Numbers 10:34; it is said that “the cloud of the Lord was upon them by day,” and from this seems to have been derived the idea of its “covering” them, as if it were a protection from the heat in the desert.

Psalm 105:40. The people asked, and he brought quails See the notes at Psalm 78:26-29.

And satisfied them with the bread of heaven manna, sent down, as it were, from heaven. In Psalm 78:25, it is called “angels’ food.” See the notes at that verse.

Psalm 105:41. He opened the rock ... See the notes at Psalm 78:15. “They ran in the dry places like a river.” Or, “a river.” They flowed along in the desert — a river of waters. See the notes at 1 Corinthians 10:4.

Psalm 105:42. For he remembered ... He was faithful to his promise made to Abraham, and did not forget his descendants in the hour of need. This is the statement made in Psalm 105:8,9; and to illustrate and confirm the faithfulness of God, this reference is made to the history of the Hebrew people. See the notes at those verses.

~~1954~~ Psalm 105:43. And he brought forth his people with joy With joy at their deliverance from bondage, and for his merciful interposition.

And his chosen with gladness Margin, as in Hebrew, “singing.” See Exodus 15.

~~1954~~ Psalm 105:44. And gave them the lands of the heathen Of the “nations” of the land of Palestine, according to his promise. See the notes at ~~1955~~ Psalm 78:55.

And they inherited the labor of the people The fruit of their labors. See ~~1960~~ Deuteronomy 6:10,11; ~~1961~~ Joshua 13:7ff.

~~1955~~ Psalm 105:45. That they might observe his statutes, and keep his laws The end — the design — of all this was that they might be an obedient people. This was the purpose of all his interventions in their behalf; and their obligation to obedience was enforced and measured by what he had done. The same is true in regard to his people now.

Praise ye the LORD Hebrew, Hallelu-jah. See ~~1945~~ Psalm 104:35.

NOTES ON PSALM 106

The author of this psalm is unknown, and the occasion on which it was composed cannot now be ascertained. It belongs to the same “class” as Psalm 78; 105; as referring to the ancient history of the Hebrew people, and as deriving lessons of instruction, admonition, gratitude and praise from that history. The 105th Psalm referred to that history particularly as showing the mercy and favor of God to that people, and hence, their obligation to love and serve him; this psalm is occupied mainly with a confession, drawn from a review of that history, that the nation had not been mindful of those mercies, but that they had rebelled against God, and incurred his displeasure. The psalm has a striking resemblance in many respects to the prayer in Daniel 9; and, like that, is a prayer that God would now interpose and deliver the people as in times that were past. It is possible that the psalm may have been composed in the time of the Babylonian captivity (compare <sup><BAG67></sup>Psalm 106:47), and this is the opinion of Hengstenberg; but it is impossible to demonstrate this with any certainty. It was evidently composed in some period of public calamity, and there is no impropriety in supposing that it may have been then.

The psalm consists essentially of three parts:

I. A brief introduction, setting forth the duty of praising God, and referring to his mercy, and expressing the desire of the author of the psalm that he himself might participate in his mercy, and share the happy lot of the “chosen” of God, <sup><BAG61></sup>Psalm 106:1-5.

II. A reference to the history of the nation, and a confession of their sins in all the periods of their history, and their proneness as a people to disobey God, referring particularly to their history in Egypt, <sup><BAG66></sup>Psalm 106:6-12; in the desert, <sup><BAG63></sup>Psalm 106:13-33; and in the land of Canaan, <sup><BAG64></sup>Psalm 106:34-43.

III. A prayer — founded on the fact that God had often interposed in their behalf — that he would now again interpose, and gather them from among the pagan, that they might again sing his praises, <sup><BAG64></sup>Psalm 106:44-48.

<sup><BAG61></sup>Psalm 106:1. Praise ye the LORD Margin, “Hallelu-jah.” The two Hebrew words mean, “praise ye the Lord.” They are the same words with which the previous psalm closes, and are here designed to indicate the general duty illustrated in the psalm.

O give thanks unto the LORD See the notes at <sup><P></sup>Psalm 105:1.

For he is good: for his mercy endureth for ever See the notes at <sup><P></sup>Psalm 100:5; 107:1; where the language in the Hebrew is the same.

<sup><P></sup>Psalm 106:2. Who can utter the mighty acts of the LORD? Who can speak the great things of God? Who can find language which will suitably express what he has done, or which will “come up” in sublimity to his acts? In other words, human language must fall immeasurably short of adequately expressing the praises of Yahweh, or conveying the fullness of what he has done. Who has not felt this when he has endeavored to praise God in a proper manner? Compare the notes at <sup><P></sup>Psalm 40:5.

Who can shew forth all his praise Hebrew, “Cause to be heard.” That is, Language cannot be found which would cause “it to be heard” in a suitable manner.

<sup><P></sup>Psalm 106:3. Blessed are they that keep judgment They are blessed, for their conduct is right, and it leads to happiness. The Hebrew is, “the keepers of judgment;” that is, they who observe the rules of justice in their conduct, or who are governed by the principles of integrity.

And he that doeth righteousness at all times All who yield obedience to just law — whether a nation or an individual. The psalm is designed to illustrate this “by contrast;” that is, by showing, in the conduct of the Hebrew people, the consequences of “disobedience,” and thus impliedly what would have been, and what always must be, the consequences of the opposite course. Compare Psalm 15.

<sup><P></sup>Psalm 106:4. Remember me, O LORD, with the favor that thou bearest unto thy people literally, “Remember me with the favor of thy people.” This is the language of the author of the psalm: a pious ejaculation such as will occur to the mind in recounting what God has done for his church; what are the advantages of being his friends; what blessings of peace, happiness, and joy are connected with true religion. Even the wicked sometimes have this feeling when they look on the happy life, and the peaceful death of the godly. So Balaam said, “Let me die the death of the righteous, and let my last end be like his!” <sup><P></sup>Numbers 23:10.

O visit me with thy salvation Come to me with salvation; confer it upon me.

Psalm 106:5. That I may see the good of thy chosen Thy chosen people; or, thine elect. That I may possess and enjoy the same favor and happiness which they do. It is implied here that there are special favors conferred on them; or, that happiness is found in the friendship of God which is not to be found elsewhere. It is a characteristic of true piety to desire to make that our own. A truly religious man more desires the happiness which results from being among the “chosen” of God than all that the world can confer.

That I may rejoice in the gladness of thy nation The happiness found in the nation that serves thee. True religion — the favor of God — not only confers happiness on the “individual” who possesses it, but on the nation or people where it prevails. It is just as much suited to produce happiness there, and is just as necessary for happiness there, as in the case of an individual.

That I may glory with thine inheritance That I may share the honor of thy people. The word “inheritance” here is used to denote that which is one’s own, and is thus applied to the people of God considered as “his.” The meaning is, that the psalmist desired no other glory, honor, or distinction, than that which pertained to God’s people as such. He sought not the “glory” connected with the distinctions of the world; the display of wealth; the triumph of genius, of conquest, of arms — but the “glory” of being a friend of God, and of partaking of that which God confers on his people.

Psalm 106:6. We have sinned with our fathers We have sinned as “they” did; we have followed their example. The illustration of the manner in which the nation had sinned occupies a considerable part of the remainder of the psalm; and the idea here is, that, in the generation in which the psalmist lived, there had been the manifestation of the same rebellious spirit which had so remarkably characterized the entire nation. The “connection” of this with the foregoing verses is not very apparent. It would seem to be that the psalmist was deeply impressed with a sense of the great blessings which follow from the friendship of God, and from keeping his commandments — as stated, Psalm 106:3-5; but he remembered that those blessings had not come upon the people as might have been expected, and his mind suddenly adverts to the cause of this, in the fact that the nation had “sinned.” It was not that God was not disposed to bestow that happiness; it was not that true religion “failed” to confer happiness; but it was that the nation had provoked God to displeasure, and that in fact the sins of the people had averted the blessings which would otherwise have come upon them. The psalmist, therefore, in emphatic language — repeating the confession in three forms, “we have sinned — we have committed iniquity, we have done wickedly,” acknowledges that the failure was in them, not in God. The language here is substantially the same as in <sup><2015></sup>Daniel 9:5,6, and it would seem not improbable that the one was suggested by the other. Which was prior in the order of time, it is now impossible to determine. Compare the notes at <sup><2015></sup>Daniel 9:5,6.

<sup><1947></sup>Psalm 106:7. Our fathers understood not They did not fully comprehend the design of the divine dealings. They did not perceive the greatness of the favor shown to them, or the obligation to obey and serve God under which they were placed by these remarkable manifestations.

Thy wonders in Egypt The miracles performed there in behalf of the Hebrew people.

They remembered not the multitude of thy mercies The great number of the divine interpositions in their behalf. They did not allow them to influence their conduct as they should have done. The aggravation of their offence in the case here referred to was particularly in the “multitude” of the mercies. It would have been sinful to have forgotten even one act of the divine favor; it was a great aggravation of their guilt that “so many” acts were forgotten, or that they failed to make an impression on them. So now. It is a great sin to be unmindful of a “single” favor conferred by God; it is a great aggravation of guilt that men live continually amidst so many proofs of the divine goodness; that they are fed, and clothed, and protected; that they breathe the pure air, and look upon the light of the sun; that they enjoy the comforts of domestic life, the blessings of liberty, and the offers of salvation; that they lie down and rise up; that their toils are crowned with success, and that the blessings of every land are made to come around them — and yet they forget or disregard all these proofs of the divine mercy.

But provoked him at the sea, even at the Red Sea <sup><1240></sup>Exodus 14:10-12. They “rebelled” against him. Even amidst the wonders there occurring, and after all the blessings which they had received at his hands, when they were in danger they doubted his power, and called in question his faithfulness.

Psalm 106:8. Nevertheless, he saved them for his name's sake For the promotion of his own honor and glory; that it might be seen that he is powerful and merciful. This is constantly given as the reason why God saves people; why he forgives sin; why he redeems the soul; why he delivers from danger and from death. Compare <sup><2672></sup>Ezekiel 36:22,32; <sup><3375></sup>Isaiah 37:35; 43:25; 48:9; <sup><2447></sup>Jeremiah 14:7; <sup><3004></sup>Psalm 6:4; 23:3; 25:11; 31:16; 44:26. This is the highest reason which can be assigned for pardoning and saving sinners.

That he might make his mighty power to be known <sup><1096></sup>Exodus 9:16. Compare the notes at <sup><8197></sup>Romans 9:17.

Psalm 106:9. He rebuked the Red Sea also The word rendered “rebuke” commonly means to chide — as when one is angry with another for having done wrong. Here it is evidently a poetic term, meaning that he spake “as if” he were angry; or “as if” the Red Sea did wrong in presenting an obstacle or obstruction to the passage of his people. Compare <sup><1421></sup>Exodus 14:21,22.

So he led them through the depths Through what had been the abyss; what had seemed to be depths, being covered with water.

As through the wilderness As through a desert or dry place; as he afterward led them through the wilderness. The waters parted asunder, and made a way for them.

Psalm 106:10. And he saved them from the hand of him that hated them From Pharaoh. By making a path through the waters, they were enabled to escape; by the overthrow of the Egyptians in the Red Sea, they were completely and forever delivered from their oppressors. <sup><1443></sup>Exodus 14:30.

Psalm 106:11. And the waters covered their enemies ... <sup><1447></sup>Exodus 14:27,28; 15:5.

Psalm 106:12. Then believed they his words In immediate view of his interpositions in their behalf in conducting them through the Red Sea, and in the destruction of their enemies.

They sang his praise In the song composed by Moses on the occasion of their deliverance. Exodus 15.

Psalm 106:13. They soon forgot his works On Psalm 106:13-15, see the notes at Psalm 78:17-22. Literally, here, as in the margin, “They made haste, they forgot.” They did it soon; did it without any delay. It was as if they were impatient to have it done.

They waited not for his counsel For the fulfillment of his promise; or for his command in regard to their future conduct. They did not look to him, but they depended on themselves, and followed their own desires and wishes.

Psalm 106:14. But lusted exceedingly in the wilderness Margin, as in Hebrew, “lusted a lust.” The reference is to their desire of better food than the manna.

And tempted God in the desert Tried God, whether he “could” provide for them food and drink. Psalm 78:19,20.

Psalm 106:15. And he gave them their request By sending great quantities of quails. Numbers 11:31,32.

But sent leanness into their soul The word translated “leanness” is from a verb — h<sub>zr</sub>,<sup>47330</sup> — to make thin; to cause to waste away; to destroy. The radical idea is that of abrading or “scraping;” and hence, it means to become lean, to waste away. It occurs only here and in Isaiah 10:16, rendered “leanness,” and in Micah 6:10, rendered “scant;” margin, “leanness.” It means here that the effect of all this on their souls was similar to the effect on the body when it wastes away by disease or want of food. This effect often occurs. In the gratification of their desires, in great temporal success and prosperity, individuals, churches, nations, often forget their dependence on God; lose their sense of the value of spiritual privileges and blessings: are satisfied with their condition; become selfconfident and proud, and forfeit the favor of God. If we pray for temporal prosperity, we should also pray that we may at the same time have grace commensurate with it, that it may be a blessing and not a curse; if we are visited with prosperity when it has not been a direct object of our prayer — if we inherit riches, or if our plans are successful beyond our expectations — or, in the language of the world, if “fortune smiles upon us,” there should be special prayer on our part that it may not be a curse rather than a blessing; that it may be so received and used as not to alienate our minds from God. Few are the Christian people who can bear continued success in life; few are those who are not injured by it; rare is it that growth in grace keeps pace with uninterrupted worldly prosperity; rare is it that the blessings of earth are so received and employed that they are seen to be a means of grace, and not a hindrance to growth in piety. A man does not know what is best for him when his heart is set on worldly prosperity; and God is more benevolent to people than they are to themselves, in withholding what is so often the object of their intense desire. “What is asked in passion, is often given in wrath” — Henry.

Psalm 106:16. They envied Moses also in the camp They were envious of him, or rebelled against him, as assuming too much authority. See <sup><0400></sup>Numbers 16:1,2. The reference here is rather to the “result” of that envy in producing rebellion than to the envy itself. It is true, however, that the foundation of their opposition to him “was” envy.

And Aaron the saint of the LORD That is, as set apart to the service of the Lord; or, as employed in holy things. The reference is to his “office,” not to his personal character.

Psalm 106:17,18. On these verses see <sup><0465></sup>Numbers 16:31-35. This refers to the time when they rebelled against Moses.

Psalm 106:19. They made a calf in Horeb <sup><0230></sup>Exodus 32:4. Probably in resemblance of the Egyptian god “Apis.” The image was made by Aaron out of materials furnished by the people, and at their request (<sup><0230></sup>Exodus 32:1-3), so that it might be said to be the act of the people.

And worshipped the molten image The word rendered “molten” is from a verb <sup><0525></sup>Esā — to pour, to pour out; hence, to cast, to found; and it means anything that is made by fusion or casting. This image was cast (<sup><0230></sup>Exodus 32:4), and hence, this name is given to it.

Psalm 106:20. Thus they changed their glory Their true glory — the proper object of worship — God. Compare the notes at <sup><0123></sup>Romans 1:23. They “exchanged” that as an object of worship for the image of an ox.

Into the similitude of an ox that eateth grass Into the likeness of an ox. That is, They worshipped God under that image. The circumstance of its “eating grass” is added to show the absurdity of the act. Instead of worshipping God — an independent Being, who does not need to be supported, but who himself sustains all things, and provides for all — they worshipped an animal that had need of constant sustenance, and would itself soon die if deprived of its proper nourishment. Compare the notes at <sup><2408></sup>Isaiah 40:18-20; 41:6,7.

<sup><1962></sup>Psalm 106:21,22. They forgot God their Saviour ... The God who had saved, or delivered them, out of Egypt. The sentiment here is the same as in <sup><1971></sup>Psalm 78:11,12. See the notes at that place.

<sup><1963></sup>Psalm 106:23. Therefore he said that he would destroy them See <sup><1210></sup>Exodus 32:10-14. He threatened to destroy them, and he would have done it, if Moses had not interposed and pleaded for them. There was nothing strange or very unusual in this. Many a descending curse upon guilty people is turned away by prayer, and by human intervention. We are constantly endeavoring to turn aside evils which would come upon others — by our intervention — by labor or by prayer. Thus, when we toil to provide food for our children, or give it in charity to the poor, we are endeavoring to avert the evil of starvation which would otherwise come upon them; when we provide for them clothing, we turn away the evils of nakedness and cold; when we give them medicine we turn away the evil of long-continued disease or of death; when we rush through the flames if a house is on fire, or venture out in a rough sea in a boat, to save others from devouring flame or from a watery grave, we seek to turn aside evils which would otherwise come upon them. So when we pray for others we may turn away evils which would otherwise descend on the guilty. No one can estimate the number or the amount of evils which are thus turned away from the guilty and the suffering by intervention and intercession; no one can tell how many of the blessings of his own life he owes to the intercessions and the toils of others. “All the blessings that come upon sinners — “all” that is done to turn away deserved wrath from people — is owing to the fact that the one great Intercessor — greater than Moses — cast himself into the “breach,” and himself met and rolled back the woes which were coming upon a guilty world. “Had not Moses his chosen.” Chosen to lead and guide his people to the promised land.

Stood before him Presented himself before him.

In the breach literally, “in the breaking.” The allusion is to a breach made in a wall (<sup><1117></sup>1 Kings 11:27; <sup><2303></sup>Isaiah 30:13; <sup><3003></sup>Amos 4:3; <sup><1804></sup>Job 30:14), and to the force with which an army rushes through a breach that is thus made. So God seemed to be about to come forth to destroy the nation.

Psalm 106:24. Yea, they despised the pleasant land Margin, as in Hebrew, “land of desire.” That is, a country “to be desired,” — a country whose situation, climate, productions, made it desirable as a place of abode. Such Palestine was always represented to be to the children of Israel (<sup><0318></sup>Leviticus 20:24; <sup><0437></sup>Numbers 13:27; 14:8; 16:14; <sup><0618></sup>Deuteronomy 6:3; 11:9; et al.) but this land had to them, at the time here referred to, no attractions, and they rather desired to return again to Egypt; <sup><0415></sup>Numbers 11:5.

They believed not his word His assurance in regard to the land to which they were going.

Psalm 106:25. But murmured in their tents ... <sup><0442></sup>Numbers 14:2,27. They complained of Moses; they complained of their food; they complained of the hardships of their journey; they complained of God. They did this when “in their tents;” when they had a comfortable home; when safe; when provided for; when under the direct divine protection and care. So people often complain: perhaps oftener when they have “many” comforts than when they have “few.”

Psalm 106:26. Therefore he lifted up his hand against them <sup><0447></sup>Numbers 14:27-33. He resolved to cut them off, so that none of them should reach the promised land.

To overthrow them in the wilderness literally, to cause them to “fall.”

Psalm 106:27. To overthrow their seed also among the nations Margin, as in Hebrew, “to make them fall;” to wit, among the surrounding people. The reference here is to the posterity of those who complained and fell in the wilderness. The result of their rebellion and complaining would not terminate with them. It would extend to their posterity, and the rebellion of the fathers would be remembered in distant generations. The overthrow of the nation, and its captivity in Babylon was thus one of the remote consequences of their rebellion in the wilderness.

And to scatter them in the lands In foreign lands — as at Babylon. If this psalm was written at the time of the Babylonian captivity, this allusion would be most appropriate. It would remind the nation that its captivity there had its origin in the ancient and long-continued disposition of the people to revolt from God.

Psalm 106:28. They joined themselves also unto Baal-peor They joined in their devotions, or, they shared in the rites of idolatrous worship. This occurred when they were in the regions of Moab, and on the very borders of the promised land. Numbers 25. Many other instances of a similar kind are passed over by the psalmist, and this seems to have been selected because of its special aggravation, and to show the general character of the nation. Even after their long-continued enjoyment of the favor and protection of God — after he had conducted them safely through the wilderness — after he had brought them to the very border of the land of Canaan, and all his promises were about to be fulfilled, they still showed a disposition to depart from God. Baal-peor was an idol of the Moabites, in whose worship females prostituted themselves. Gesenius, Lexicon. Compare <sup><Q21></sup>Numbers 25:1-3. Baal was the name of the idol; Peor was the name of a mountain in Moab, where the idol was worshipped.

And ate the sacrifices of the dead Of false gods, represented as “dead” or having no life, in contradistinction from the true and “living God.” They ate the sacrifices offered to those idols; that is, they participated in their worship. <sup><Q21></sup>Numbers 25:2.

Psalm 106:29. Thus they provoked him to anger with their inventions The word rendered “inventions” means properly “works; deeds;” then it is used in the sense of “evil” deeds, crimes.

And the plague brake in upon them See <sup><Q21></sup>Numbers 25:8,9. No less than twenty-four thousand fell in the plague. <sup><Q21></sup>Numbers 25:9.

Psalm 106:30. Then stood up Phinehas, and executed judgment ... Inflicted summary punishment upon a principal offender. <sup><Q21></sup>Numbers 25:7,8.

Psalm 106:31. And that was counted unto him for righteousness See <sup><Q21></sup>Numbers 25:11-13. Compare the notes at <sup><Q21></sup>Romans 4:3. The meaning here is, that this was regarded as a “proof” or “demonstration” that he was a righteous man — a man fearing God.

Unto all generations for evermore Hebrew, “To generation and generation forever.” The record would be transmitted from one generation to another, without any intermission, and would be permanent. This is one of the illustrations of the statement so frequently made in the Scriptures (compare <sup><Q21></sup>Exodus 20:6; <sup><Q21></sup>Deuteronomy 7:9; <sup><Q21></sup>Romans 11:28) that the blessings of religion will descend to a distant posterity. Such instances are constantly occurring, and there is no legacy which a man can leave his family so valuable as the fact that he himself fears God and keeps his laws.

Psalm 106:32. They angered him also at the waters of strife

Numbers 20:3-13. They complained of the lack of water. They wished that they had died as others had done. They murmured against God as if he could not supply their needs. They showed an unbelieving and rebellious spirit — provoking God, and tempting Moses to in act of great impatience by their conduct. In Numbers 20:13, this is, “the waters of Meribah;” — margin, “strife.” This is the meaning of the Hebrew word. The place took its name from the fact that the people there strove against the Lord and against Moses.

So that it went ill with Moses for their sakes Evil came upon him. He was betrayed into impatience, and was tempted to use words which offended God, and prevented his being permitted to lead the people into the promised land. Numbers 20:12.

Psalm 106:33. Because they provoked his spirit literally, “They made his spirit bitter;” or they embittered his soul. They threw him off his guard, so that instead of manifesting the meekness and gentleness which so eminently characterized him in general (see Numbers 12:3), he gave way to expressions of anger. See Numbers 20:10.

So that he spake unadvisedly with his lips Passionately; in a severe, harsh, and threatening manner. He did not bear with them as he should have done; he did not refer to God, to his power, and to his goodness as he should have done; he spake as if the whole thing depended on him and Aaron: “Hear now, ye rebels; must we fetch you water out of this rock?” The word rendered “spake unadvisedly” — aFB<sup>h981</sup> — means properly to “babble;” and then, to talk idly, or unadvisedly; to utter that which has no meaning, or an improper meaning. Let us not harshly blame Moses, until we are placed in circumstances similar to his, and see how we would ourselves act. Who is there that would not have been provoked as he was, or even to a greater degree? If there are any such, let them “cast the first stone.”

Psalm 106:34. They did not destroy the nations The Canaanites, Hivites, Jebusites, etc.; the nations that inhabited the land of Canaan.

Concerning whom the LORD commanded them The command on this subject was positive; and it was to destroy them, to spare none of them. <sup><4882></sup>Numbers 33:52; <sup><4876></sup>Deuteronomy 7:5,16.

<sup><4965></sup>Psalm 106:35. But were mingled among the heathen Among the nations; by intermarriage, and by commerce. They suffered them to remain in the land, contrary to the command of God, and thus greatly exposed and endangered the purity of their religion and their own morals. See <sup><4002></sup>Judges 2:2; 3:5,6.
